UNIVERSAL HUMAN RIGHTS ORGANIZATION ® - UHRO

Empowering Marginalized and Ensuring Peace and Interfaith Harmony

Background: Nonprofit Organization

Every day, nonprofit peace, health and human services organizations are making a difference in someone's life. Parents use nonprofit child care services to help them juggle work and family life. A homeless person may get a bed for the night at a nonprofit shelter. A low-income family may obtain groceries from a nonprofit food bank. An older homebound adult may have a meal delivered to her front door. And children may spend their out-of-school hours at the local Boys and Girls Club having fun in a structured and protected environment.

In so many ways, nonprofit organizations improve people's lives. They help build relationships and trust among residents, foster civic participation and social cohesion, and generally help strengthen and enrich communities. Nonprofits are also an economic force, providing jobs, purchasing commodities, and sometimes selling their products and services. Yet despite the pervasiveness of nonprofit organizations, most people have only a vague idea of the number and types of nonprofits in their local communities or the amount of financial resources needed to support and sustain this work.

Now more than ever, nonprofits are being called upon to address community needs and help people through financially troubled times. The federal government is calling for new partnerships between local nonprofits and government. Private philanthropy from both individuals and foundations is being asked to step-up its financial support for community-based organizations. And all citizens are being asked to volunteer their time in whatever ways they can. To make these policies work, it is essential to understand the size, scope, and structure of the nonprofit sector in local areas, its capacity to expand its current operations, and the challenges it faces in today's environment.
