

- What is the main difference between photojournalism and photography?

- The main difference is that photography can mean a whole spectrum of things related to photos (photo shooting, equipment, ...) and photojournalism is about telling stories true photos
- Photojournalism is a subset of the universe of photography. The most unique characteristic is that in photojournalism you capture what is there. You don't control it, you don't photoshop it, you don't set it up. A photojournalist documents what he sees. It requires good technical skills and a keen eye for observation. Photojournalism can be very powerful because you can make strong political and social statements with the pictures you take. But, you have to guard against bias. A photojournalist should be objective
- Photography includes photojournalism as a category as well as fine art photography, photo illustration and others. Photojournalism is usually associated with news but can also include editorial photographs in travel, home decor, and so on. There are also many types of photography which might be included in more than one category. Many editorial images can easily be considered fine art. Sometimes a still life studio shot is photojournalism. It's hard to categorize images!
- Photojournalism is the visual story telling dealing with the everyday lives of people and the many facets of their daily activities. Photojournalism can chronicle the life of the inner city, soldiers fighting on the battlefield, or a Little League baseball game. Photography, on the other hand, depicts images taken with a camera. It is a much broader brush than photojournalism. Photojournalism deals with PEOPLE, while photography deals with making visual images of anything.
- Photojournalism is communicative photography to tell a story. A photojournalist has the same responsibilities as any other reporter, i.e.

to tell the story without prejudice or preference. Just the truth. The advantage that photojournalism can have if done effectively, is that the viewer need not speak the language, just the ability to see.

- Photojournalism is a specific branch of photography dealing with mostly current events (catastrophic, social and public interest). Photography has a much wider range of specializations: product, editorial, scientific, etc
- There are definitely a whole lot that's very different about these two first I'll talk about their their broadness and narrowness respectively, first photography is the use of light electro magnetic field combined with skills to capture images whatsoever, while photojournalism on the other hand is presenting journalism in camera and lense which is is even more narrow, photography covers any length while photojournalism is more of reporting in visual form.
- Basically anybody can be a photographer, while you'll need a degree if you want to be a photojournalist, because photojournalism follow strict rules and adherence while photography allows you to be creative, explore and may basically not have much rules if you ask me.
- These two basically uses camera as well but the truth is that the both allows you to be proffesional and earn however in photojournalism you'll need a degree from a university in other to get a job in a telecommunications firm or newspaper as a journalist with lenses either way a photographer can be a freelancers while a photojournalist is narrowed to a firm in a contract and collecting basic salaries as well.
- Basically a photojournalist do not rely on the moments or magic of the image, the main job of a photojournalist is to report news with camera whether the moment is right or not, but unlike a photographer they rely on the moment and the scenario to bring amazing images as well
