His growing conservatism led the establishment to think him a safe bet for the post of Poet Laureate, to which he was appointed in 1813. But at what cost? As Laureate he was aligned with a conservative government that prosecuted a ruinously expensive war for which the poorest people in Britain would continue to pay for many years after its bloody conclusion at Waterloo. The King, who suffered prolonged bouts of madness, was unpopular and out of touch, and his heir, the Prince Regent, the butt of endless ridicule for his extravagant and self-indulgent lifestyle. As it happened, Southey's personal politics were Tory: he was an opponent of revolution, Catholic emancipation, and parliamentary reform – views that colour his work, not least in such pro-government works as Carmen Triumphale (1814) and The Poet's Pilgrimage to Waterloo (1816).

As a result, virtually every noteworthy writer of the time, with the possible exceptions of Wordsworth and Coleridge (who had also drifted into a conservative middle age), were to regard him as a traitor to the views he had once espoused – and it was as such they lampooned him. Byron spouted venom at him most famously (and amusingly) in the dedication to Don Juan (see p. 959), while Hazlitt's Political Essays (1819) is festooned with attacks on him, though nothing in that volume compares with the acid observation in The Spirit of the Age (1825) that:

It is indeed to be deplored, it is a stain on genius, a blow to humanity, that the author of Joan of Arc – that work in which the love of Liberty is exhaled like the breath of spring, mild, balmy, heaven-born, that is full of tears and virgin-sighs, and yearnings of affection after truth and good, gushing warm and crimsoned from the heart – should ever after turn to folly, or become the advocate of a rotten cause. After giving up his heart to that subject, he ought not (whatever others might do) ever to have set his foot within the threshold of a court. (Wu vii 217)

It is worth adding that both Hazlitt and Byron had personal grudges against Southey. Hazlitt somehow got wind of the fact that he had written to the Prime Minister, Lord Liverpool, demanding that radical journalists be punished with transportation to Australia (a punishment that often ended in death); while Byron resented the fact that Southey had spread rumours in London that he and Shelley had been involved in a 'league of incest' with Mary Shelley and Claire Clairmont.⁶ For this he described Southey, in his letters, as 'a dirty, lying rascal',⁷ among other things. When Southey published A Vision of Judgment, a tribute to the late King George III, in 1821, he made the mistake of referring to Byron, without naming him, as the leader of the Satanic school of writers whose works 'breathe the spirit of Belial in their lascivious parts'. This was the cue for a brilliant tour de force by Byron in his own The Vision of Judgment (1822), which satirized Southey's verses, depicting the Laureate reading his work and sending the devils howling back to hell.

He never recovered from the death of his favourite child, Herbert, in 1816, at the age of 9. Nearly two years after his wife's death in November 1837, he married the poetess Caroline Bowles. By this time he was exhausted after a lifetime of unremitting literary toil, and in summer 1839 his mind and memory failed. His remaining years were lamentable; increasingly debilitated, unable to read or write, he died on 21 March 1843 and was buried in Crosthwaite Church in Keswick, where the Brazilian government paid for his monument out of gratitude for his History of Brazil (1810).

Largely unread today, Southey's poetry enjoyed considerable popularity in its time: Thalaba the Destroyer (1801), Madoc (1805), The Curse of Kehama (1810) and Roderick, the Last of the Goths (1814) were all reprinted. But it is his prose works that do him most credit. His Life of Nelson (1813) remained compulsory reading for all schoolchildren until well into the last century.

From The Monthly Magazine (October 1797)

The coffin, as I crossed the common lane,
Came sudden on my view; it was not here
A sight of every day, as in the streets
Of the great city – and we paused and asked
Who to the grave was going. It was one, 5

A village girl; they told us she had borne
An eighteen months' strange illness, pined away
With such slow wasting as had made the hour
Of death most welcome. To the house of mirth
We held our way and, with that idle talk 10
That passes o'er the mind and is forgot,
We wore away the hour. But it was eve
When homewardly I went, and in the air
Was that cool freshness, that discolouring shade
That makes the eye turn inward. Then I heard, 15
Over the vale, the heavy toll of death²
Sound slow, and questioned of the dead again.

It was a very plain and simple tale.
She bore, unhusbanded, a mother's name,
And he who should have cherished her, far off 20
Sailed on the seas, self-exiled from his home,
For he was poor. Left thus, a wretched one,
Scorn³ made a mock of her, and evil tongues
Were busy with her name. She had one ill
Heavier: neglect, forgetfulness from him 25
Whom she had loved so dearly. Once he wrote,
But only once that drop of comfort came,
To mingle with her cup of wretchedness;
And when his parents had some tidings from him
There was no mention of poor Hannah there; 30
Or 'twas the cold enquiry, bitterer
Than silence. So she pined and pined away,
And for herself and baby toiled and toiled,
Till she sunk with very weakness;⁴ her old mother
Omitted no kind office, and she worked 35
Most hard, and with hard working barely earned
Enough to make life struggle. Thus she lay
On the sickbed of poverty, so worn
That she could make no effort to express
Affection for her infant – and the child 40

Whose lisping love perhaps had solaced her,
With strangest infantine ingratitude,
Shunned her as one indifferent. She was past
That anguish, for she felt her hour draw on,
And 'twas her only comfort now to think 45
Upon the grave. 'Poor girl!' her mother said,
'Thou hast suffered much.' 'Aye mother; there is none
Can tell what I have suffered', she replied,
'But I shall soon be where the weary rest.'
And she did rest her soon, for it pleased God 50
To take her to his mercy.

Hannah, A Plaintive Tale

¹ When 'Hannah' was published, revised, in Southey's Poems (1799), Southey noted: 'It is proper to remark that the story related in this Eclogue is strictly true. I met the funeral, and learnt the circumstances, in a village in Hampshire. The indifference of the child was mentioned to me; indeed, no addition whatever has been made to the story. I should have thought it wrong to have weakened the effect of a faithful narrative by adding anything.'

² the heavy toll of death i.e. the death-bell.

³ Scorn i.e. scornful people.

⁴ So she pined ... weakness cf. Wordsworth's The Ruined Cottage 428–31.

The Idiot

From The Morning Post (30 June 1798)

The circumstance related in the following ballad happened
some years since in Herefordshire.

It had pleased God to form poor Ned
A thing of idiot mind,
Yet to the poor unreas'ning man
God had not been unkind.

Old Sarah loved her helpless child 5
Whom helplessness made dear,
And life was happiness to him
Who had no hope nor fear.

She knew his wants, she understood
Each half-artic'late call, 10
And he was ev'rything to her
And she to him was all.

And so for many a year they dwelt
Nor knew a wish beside,
But age at length on Sarah came, 15
And she fell sick and died.

He tried in vain to waken her,
And called her o'er and o'er;
They told him she was dead – the sound
To him no import bore. 20

They closed her eyes and shrouded her,
And he stood wond'ring by;
And when they bore her to the grave
He followed silently.

They laid her in the narrow house,¹ 25
They sung the fun'ral stave,²
But when the fun'ral train dispersed
He loitered by the grave.

The rabble boys who used to jeer
 Whene'er they saw poor Ned 30
Now stood and watched him at the grave,
 And not a word they said.

They came and went and came again
 Till night at last came on,
And still he loitered by the grave 35
 Till all to rest were gone.

And when he found himself alone
 He swift removed the clay,
And raised the coffin up in haste
 And bore it swift away. 40

And when he reached his hut he laid
 The coffin on the floor,
And with the eagerness of joy
 He barred the cottage door.

And out he took his mother's corpse 45
 And placed it in her chair,
And then he heaped the hearth and blew
 The kindling fire with care.

He placed his mother in her chair
 And in her wonted place, 50
And blew the kindling fire that shone
 Reflected on her face.

And pausing now, her hand would feel,
 And now her face behold –
'Why, mother, do you look so pale 55
 And why are you so cold?'

It had pleased God from the poor wretch
 His only friend to call,
But God was kind to him and soon
 In death restored him all. 3 60

The Idiot

1 narrow house grave.

2 stave i.e. hymn.

3 When 'The Idiot' was published in Sarah Farley's Bristol Journal (21 July 1798), two new stanzas were substituted for the last stanza of this text:

But, hapless boy, he now found out
His efforts were in vain,
Sarah would warmth again ne'er feel,
Her eyes ne'er ope again.
Heaven pitying, saw the wretch had lost
The only friend it gave;
Then shortly had his lifeless limbs
Conveyed to Sarah's grave.

The Battle of Blenheim¹

From The Morning Post (9 August 1798)

I

It was a summer evening,
Old Kaspar's work was done,
And he before his cottage door
Was sitting in the sun,
And by him sported on the green 5
His little grandchild Wilhelmine.

II

She saw her brother Peterkin
Roll something large and round
That he beside the rivulet
In playing there had found; 10
He came to ask what he had found
That was so large, and smooth, and round.

III

Old Kaspar took it from the boy
Who stood expectant by,
And then the old man shook his head 15
And with a natural sigh,
'Tis some poor fellow's skull', said he,
'Who fell in the great victory.

IV

I find them in the garden for
There's many here about, 20
And often when I go to plough
The ploughshare turns them out –
For many thousand men', said he,
'Were slain in the great victory.'

V

'Now tell us what 'twas all about', 25
Young Peterkin he cries,
And little Wilhelmine looks up
With wonder-waiting eyes,
'Now tell us all about the war
And what they killed each other for.' 30

VI

‘It was the English’, Kaspar cried,
‘That put the French to rout,
But what they killed each other for
I could not well make out.
But everybody said’, quoth he, 35
‘That ’twas a famous victory.

VII

My father lived at Blenheim then,
Yon little stream hard by –
They burnt his dwelling to the ground
And he was forced to fly; 40
So with his wife and child he fled,
Nor had he where to rest his head.

VIII

With fire and sword the country round
Was wasted far and wide,
And many a childing² mother then 45
And new-born infant died.
But things like that, you know, must be
At every famous victory.

IX

They say it was a shocking sight
After the field was won, 50
For many thousand bodies here
Lay rotting in the sun –
But things like that you know must be
After a famous victory.

X

Great praise the Duke of Marlbro' won, 55
And our good Prince Eugene.'
'Why 'twas a very wicked thing!'
Said little Wilhelmine.
'Nay, nay, my little girl', quoth he,
'It was a famous victory, 60

XI

And everybody praised the Duke
Who such a fight did win.'
'But what good came of it at last?'
Quoth little Peterkin.
'Why that I cannot tell', said he, 65
'But 'twas a famous victory.'

The Battle of Blenheim

¹ The Battle of Blenheim, 13 August 1704, the most famous victory in the Wars of the Spanish Succession, was credited to John Churchill, 1st Duke of Marlborough, and Prince Eugene of Savoy; the French and Bavarians were defeated.

² childing pregnant.

Night¹

From The Morning Post (26 September 1798)

How calm, how quiet all!² still, or at times
Just interrupted by such stirring sounds
As harmonise with stillness; even the bark
Of yonder watch-dog, heard at intervals,³
Comes from the distance pleasantly. Where now 5

The lovely landscape! hill and vale and wood,⁴
Broad oak, high-tufted elm or lighter ash,
Green field and stubble meadows sapless grey,
Or brown variety of new-ploughed land?
A dim obscurity o'ermantles all, 10
An undistinguished greyness, save that near
The church tower seems in heavier gloom to rest
More massy, and those light-leaved poplars rise
Dark as a cypress grove. How fair at morn
It opened on the eye as the grey mists 15
Rolled off, how bright at noon, how beautiful
Its evening glories, when more radiant,
Of majesty more visible, the sun
Beyond the brow of yonder western hill
Blazed o'er the clustered clouds! nor charmless now 20
The scene so dim, nor idly wanders there
The unprofitable eye; earth, air and heaven,
Earth so o'ershadowed, air thus void of sounds,
And yonder moonless vastity⁵ of heaven,
With all its countless worlds, all minister⁶ 25
To fill with soothing thoughts the ready mind.
No dissipating objects now distract
Her calm employ; the stir of this low earth
Is silenced, and the bodily powers subdued
By the day's business, leave her tranquillized, 30
And aptest for such feelings as this hour
Inspires – nor light nor fruitless; for as now
The lively hues of nature all are fled,
Gone with the light that gave them; so the toys
The puppetry of life⁷ have lost their glare, 35
Their worthless splendour. Wise is he⁸ who lets
The influence of this spirit-soothing hour
Fill all his thoughts, who passively receives⁹
The calmness that descends upon his soul,

That like the sober¹⁰ wisdom of old age, 40
Softens and purifies the hallowed heart.

Night

¹ This poem is strongly influenced by Coleridge's Frost at Midnight, which had been published shortly before 'Night' was written; Southey did not reprint the poem.

² How calm, how quiet all! cf. Coleridge, Frost at Midnight 8: "'Tis calm indeed!'

³ yonder watch-dog, heard at intervals cf. Wordsworth, An Evening Walk (1793) 444: 'And at long intervals the mill-dog's howl.'

⁴ hill and vale and wood Cf. Coleridge, Frost at Midnight 10: 'Sea and hill and wood.'

⁵ vastity vastness – a seventeenth-century word.

⁶ minister an obvious reference to Coleridge, Frost at Midnight 72: 'the secret ministry of frost.'

⁷ The puppetry of life While staying with Southey in August 1797, Charles Lloyd composed 'Written at Burton', published 1798, which contains the lines:

The noble soul
Swells as the tempest thickens, and most feels
Its own sufficiencies of happiness,
Its plenitude of solitary strength,
When all the puppetry of life's brief day
Has done its business; when the dark night comes,
And all is vacancy, or unshaped gloom,
Big with invisible perils. (ll. 40–7)

8 Wise is he The tone is highly reminiscent of the concluding passage of Wordsworth's 'Lines Left upon a Seat in a Yew-Tree' 55: 'Oh be wiser thou!'

9 passively receives This proves that Southey was aware of Coleridge and Wordsworth's poetry of the preceding years, even if he did not understand it. As early as 1795 Coleridge had written, in 'The Eolian Harp', of 'my indolent and passive brain' – but from the outset, the idea was that the mind was not purely receptive; the imagination shaped the data which it received. Hence Wordsworth's concept of 'wise passiveness' ('Expostulation and Reply' 24), by which wisdom consists of imaginative engagement with the natural world.

10 sober a Wordsworthian word if ever there was one. Cf. the 'sober pleasure' at 'Tintern Abbey' 140. The tone, if not the language of these lines, is highly reminiscent of 'Animal Tranquillity and Decay'.

From Critical Review (October 1798)

The majority of these poems, we are informed in the Advertisement, are to be considered as 'experiments': 'They were written chiefly with a view to ascertain how far the language of conversation in the middle and lower classes of society is adapted to the purposes of poetic pleasure'.²

Of these 'experimental' poems, the most important is 'The Idiot Boy', the story of which is simply this: Betty Foy's neighbour Susan Gale is indisposed, and no one can be conveniently sent for the doctor but Betty's idiot boy. She therefore puts him upon her pony at eight o'clock in the evening, gives him proper directions, and returns to take care of her sick neighbour. Johnny is expected with the doctor by eleven, but the clock strikes eleven, and twelve, and one, without the appearance either of

Johnny or the doctor. Betty's restless fears become insupportable and she now leaves her friend to look for her idiot son. She goes to the doctor's house but hears nothing of Johnny. About five o'clock, however, she finds him sitting quietly upon his feeding pony. As they go home they meet old Susan, whose apprehensions have cured her, and brought her out to seek them. And they all return merrily together. Upon this subject the author has written nearly five hundred lines. With what spirit the story is told, our extract will evince. [Southey quotes Idiot Boy 322–401.]

No tale less deserved the labour that appears to have been bestowed upon this. It resembles a Flemish picture in the worthlessness of its design and the excellence of its execution. From Flemish artists we are satisfied with such pieces; who would not have lamented if Corregio or Raphael³ had wasted their talents in painting Dutch boors or the humours of a Flemish wake?⁴

The other ballads of this kind are as bald in story, and are not so highly embellished in narration. With that which is entitled 'The Thorn' we were altogether displeased. The Advertisement says it is not told in the person of the author, but in that of some 'loquacious narrator'. The author should have recollected that he who personates tiresome loquacity becomes tiresome himself.⁵ The story of a man who suffers the perpetual pain of cold because an old woman prayed that he never might be warm is perhaps a good story for a ballad because it is a well-known tale – but is the author certain that it is 'well-authenticated'?⁶ And does not such an assertion promote the popular superstition of witchcraft?

In a very different style of poetry is 'The Rime of the Ancyent Marinere' – a ballad (says the Advertisement) 'professedly written in imitation of the style, as well as of the spirit, of the elder poets.' We are tolerably conversant with the early English poets and can discover no resemblance whatever, except in antiquated spelling and a few obsolete words. This piece appears to us perfectly original in style as well as in story. Many of the stanzas are laboriously beautiful, but in connection they are absurd or unintelligible. Our readers may exercise their ingenuity in attempting to unriddle what follows. [Southey quotes 'Ancient Mariner' 301–22.] We do not sufficiently understand the story to analyze it. It is a Dutch attempt at

With pleasure we turn to the serious pieces, the better part of the volume. ‘The Foster-Mother’s Tale’ is in the best style of dramatic narrative; ‘The Dungeon’ and the ‘Lines upon the Yew-Tree Seat’ are beautiful. The tale of ‘The Female Vagrant’ is written in the stanza, not the style, of Spenser. We extract a part of this poem. [Southey quotes ‘Female Vagrant’ 91–180.] Admirable as this poem is, the author seems to discover still superior powers in the ‘Lines written near Tintern Abbey’. On reading this production it is impossible not to lament that he should ever have condescended to write such pieces as ‘The Last of the Flock’, ‘The Convict’, and most of the ballads. In the whole range of English poetry, we scarcely recollect anything superior to a part of the following passage. [Southey quotes ‘Tintern Abbey’ 65–111.]

The ‘experiment’, we think, has failed, not because the language of conversation is little adapted to ‘the purposes of poetic pleasure’, but because it has been tried upon uninteresting subjects. Yet every piece discovers genius, and, ill as the author⁹ has frequently employed his talents, they certainly rank him with the best of living poets.

Review of William Wordsworth and S. T. Coleridge

¹ Southey’s review upset Coleridge and Wordsworth, whom he knew to be the authors of Lyrical Ballads, even though he pretends not to.

² Southey quotes accurately from the Advertisement to Lyrical Ballads, p. 337.

³ Corregio or Raphael Italian Renaissance artists who specialized in biblical subjects.

⁴ This was not Southey’s true opinion. In a letter to his friend Charles Wynn of December 1798, Southey remarked: ‘though “The Idiot Boy” is sadly dilated, it is very well done' (Curry i 177).

⁵ This remark may have prompted Wordsworth to add his Note to 'The Thorn' to the second edition of Lyrical Ballads; see p. 518.

⁶ well-authenticated Southey was apparently unaware of the poem's source in Erasmus Darwin's Zoönomia (see p. 370 n. 1).

⁹ the author Southey was aware of the joint authorship of Wordsworth and Coleridge despite the fact that Lyrical Ballads was published anonymously.

The Sailor who had Served in the Slave- Trade¹

From Poems (1799)

He stopped: it surely was a groan
That from the hovel came!
He stopped and listened anxiously –
Again it sounds the same.

It surely from the hovel comes! 5
And now he hastens there,

And thence he hears the name of Christ
Amidst a broken prayer.

He entered in the hovel now,
A sailor there he sees, 10
His hands were lifted up to heaven
And he was on his knees.

Nor did the sailor so intent
His entering footsteps heed,
But now the Lord's prayer said, and now 15
His half-forgotten creed.²

And often on his Saviour called
With many a bitter groan,
In such heart-anguish as could spring
From deepest guilt alone. 20

He asked the miserable man
Why he was kneeling there,
And what the crime had been that caused
The anguish of his prayer.

'Oh I have done a wicked thing!³ 25
It haunts me night and day,
And I have sought this lonely place,
Here undisturbed to pray.

I have no place to pray on board
So I came here alone, 30
That I might freely kneel and pray
And call on Christ and groan.

If to the mainmast-head⁴ I go,
The wicked one⁵ is there –
From place to place, from rope to rope, 35
He follows everywhere.

I shut my eyes, it matters not,
Still still the same I see;
And when I lie me down at night
'Tis always day with me. 40

He follows, follows everywhere⁶
And every place is hell!
Oh God! – and I must go with him
In endless fire to dwell.

He follows, follows everywhere, 45
He's still above, below –
Oh tell me where to fly from him!

Oh tell me where to go!
'But tell me', quoth the stranger then,
'What this thy crime hath been? 50
So haply I may comfort give
To one that grieves for sin.'

'Oh I have done a cursed deed'⁷
The wretched man replies,
'And night and day and everywhere 55
'Tis still before my eyes.

I sailed on board a Guinea-man⁸
And to the slave-coast went –
Would that the sea had swallowed me
When I was innocent! 60

And we took in our cargo there,
Three hundred Negro slaves,
And we sailed homeward merrily
Over the ocean waves.

But some were sulky of the slaves 65
And would not touch their meat,

So therefore we were forced by threats
And blows to make them eat.

One woman sulkier than the rest
Would still refuse her food – 70
Oh Jesus God! I hear her cries,
I see her in her blood!

The Captain made me tie her up
And flog while he stood by,
And then he cursed me if I stayed 75
My hand to hear her cry.

She groaned, she shrieked – I could not spare,
For the Captain he stood by –
Dear God! that I might rest one night
From that poor woman's cry! 80
She twisted from the blows – her blood,
Her mangled flesh I see;
And still the Captain would not spare –
Oh, he was worse than me!

She could not be more glad than I 85
When she was taken down,
A blessed minute – 'twas the last
That I have ever known!

I did not close my eyes all night,
Thinking what I had done; 90
I heard her groans and they grew faint
About the rising sun.

She groaned and groaned, but her groans grew
Fainter at morning tide,
Fainter and fainter still they came 95
Till at the noon she died.

They flung her overboard – poor wretch,
She rested from her pain;

But when, oh Christ! oh blessed God!
Shall I have rest again? 100

I saw the sea close over her,
Yet she was still in sight;
I see her twisting everywhere,
I see her day and night.

Go where I will, do what I can, 105
The wicked one I see –
Dear Christ, have mercy on my soul,
Oh God deliver me!

Tomorrow I set sail again
Not to the Negro shore; 110
Wretch that I am, I will at least
Commit that sin no more.

Oh give me comfort if you can,
Oh tell me where to fly –
And bid me hope, if there be hope 115
For one so lost as I.’

‘Poor wretch,’ the stranger he replied,
‘Put thou thy trust in Heaven,
And call on Him for whose dear sake
All sins shall be forgiven.’⁹ 120

This night at least is thine – go thou
And seek the house of prayer,
There shalt thou hear the word of God
And he will help thee there!’¹⁰

The Sailor

¹ Southey printed this poem under the following note: ‘In September 1798, a Dissenting Minister of Bristol discovered a sailor in the neighbourhood of that city, groaning and praying in a hovel. The circumstance that occasioned his agony of mind is detailed in the annexed ballad, without the slightest addition or alteration. By presenting it as a poem the story is made more public, and such stories ought to be made as public as possible.’ Southey was strongly opposed to the slave trade and, like many of his contemporaries, advised friends not to put sugar in their tea, as it was the product of slave labour. His early poems include many anti-slavery poems, including a series of sonnets and a poem entitled To the Genius of Africa. Many efforts were made to abolish the trade during the 1790s, but complete abolition did not come until 1807. This poem is influenced by ‘The Ancient Mariner’, which Southey had condemned in his review of Lyrical Ballads; see p. 752.

2 creed beliefs of the Christian church, repeated as a form of devotion.

3 Oh I have done a wicked thing! strongly reminiscent of Coleridge, ‘The Ancient Mariner’ 89: ‘And I had done a hellish thing.’ See also line 54 of Southey’s poem.

4 mainmast-head the top of the principal mast in the ship.

5 The wicked one the Devil.

6 He follows, follows everywhere cf. Coleridge, ‘The Ancient Mariner’ 115: ‘Water, water everywhere.’

7 a cursed deed Southey borrows the idea of a curse from ‘The Ancient Mariner’. He also knew of its use in Wordsworth’s ‘Goody Blake and Harry Gill’.

8 Guinea-man ship trading slaves from Guinea.

9 This advice is similar to that given at ‘The Ancient Mariner’ 645–6.

10 Charles Lamb criticized this conclusion in a letter of March 1799, shortly after the poem had been reprinted in Southey’s Poems (1799):

‘This is to convert religion into mediocre feelings, which should burn and glow and tremble. A moral should be wrought into the body and soul, the matter and tendency, of a poem, not tagged to the end, like a “God send the good ship into harbour”, at the end of our bills of lading.... The finishing of the “Sailor” is also imperfect. Any dissenting minister may say and do as much’ (Marrs i 163).

Charles Lamb (1775–1834)

‘I want individuals. I am made up of queer points and I want so many answering needles’, Lamb once said of himself – as concise and perceptive a summary of his essential nature as anyone would ever produce. He was an eccentric, a misfit, and one of the finest essayists of the age.

Charles Lamb was the youngest son of John Lamb and Elizabeth Field, born in 1775 at Crown Office Row, London, where his father was clerk to Samuel Salt, a Bencher (senior member of the Inns of Court) of the Inner Temple. He had an older brother, John (1763–1821), and a sister, Mary (1764–1847). He was educated at Christ’s Hospital in Newgate Street, where he was a contemporary of Coleridge, as recalled in his essay, ‘Christ’s Hospital Five and Thirty Years Ago’.

Lamb spent vacations at Blakesware, a country house in Hertfordshire, where his grandmother was housekeeper. It was here that he met his first love, Ann Simmons, but her rejection of him in 1795 was such a shock that it precipitated a fit of insanity. By now he had begun a long career with the East India Company (1792–1825), which kept him in his office for nine hours a day, six days a week. He was always to regret not having gone to university, but he suffered from a stutter that made it impossible for him to pursue a career in the church (the usual destiny for men of his class and background). Instead, his ‘university’ would be his beloved London, where he was surrounded by his favourite things: old books, theatre, drink and good conversation.

On Thursday, 22 September 1796 he came home from work to find that his sister Mary had stabbed their mother to death and wounded their father by embedding a fork in his head. He took her straight to the Islington Asylum, Fisher House, and saved her from permanent incarceration by agreeing in future to look after her at home, which he did for the rest of his life. This was the 'strange calamity' which cast its shadow over him when he was given an offstage role in Coleridge's This Lime-Tree Bower My Prison. He was only 21 years old, and these events determined the course of his future life. Subject to occasional relapses, his sister needed constant care, and he vowed to provide it. 'We are in a manner marked', he would tell Coleridge.

Lamb's early literary career was promising. He became known for his poetry, much of it inspired by the Unitarian theology that underpins Coleridge's Religious Musings. In 1798 he published Blank Verse with Coleridge's pupil and acolyte Charles Lloyd, which contained his best-known poem, 'The Old Familiar Faces' (pp. 760–1). It is an inspired example of confessional verse in unrhymed stanzas derived from the Elizabethan dramatist Philip Massinger. Using this unexpected vehicle, Lamb manages to universalize his experience of the 'day of horrors' when he arrived home to find his mother dead and his sister with a carving-knife in her hand. Beginning with that, he reviews other losses he has sustained through his life, before concluding with the elegant refrain, 'All, all are gone, the old familiar faces.' Not only does it transcend the particular context out of which it comes, but it sets the tone for much of Lamb's later prose writing, which also concerns the riches taken from us by time and circumstance.

It is worth emphasizing for a moment the fact that Lamb visited Coleridge at Nether Stowey in July 1797, at the beginning of the annus mirabilis. He there met Wordsworth and Dorothy for the first time, with whom he would enjoy a close friendship that lasted for the rest of his life. More important, Lamb understood the way in which Wordsworth and Coleridge were thinking from the outset, providing him with the most valuable education he could have received for his burgeoning career as a writer. Their beliefs and aspirations permeate his writings.

This can be observed in 'Living without God in the World', written at the height of the fashion for atheism, popular among those who espoused radical political ideologies. Wordsworth himself had been described by Coleridge as 'a semi-atheist', partly because of his former attachment to Godwinian philosophy. Coleridge, like Lamb, was devoutly religious, and both were adherents of Priestleyan Unitarianism. When he visited Coleridge at Nether Stowey in July 1797, Lamb met Wordsworth for the first time and almost certainly heard a reading of his play, The Borderers (1797). By then disillusioned with Godwinism, Wordsworth critiques it through his portrait of the amoral Rivers, who champions the law of an 'independent intellect'. That phrase makes its way into Lamb's poem as part of an attack on Godwinism, atheists, 'Deists only in the name', all of whom form a Jacobinical congregation united to 'deny a God'.¹

In 1798 he published Rosamund Gray, a novella whose eponymous heroine was a thinly disguised portrait of Ann Simmons, and, in 1802, a play – John Woodvil, a Tragedy. Although Blank Verse made him sufficiently well known to be portrayed in Gillray's famous 1798 caricature of radical intellectuals, New Morality, Lamb's talents did not lie in poetry. In subsequent years he turned to prose, often in collaboration with his sister. Together they produced Tales from Shakespear (1807) – so popular it has remained in print ever since, Mrs Leicester's School and Poetry for Children (both 1809). These ventures helped turn him into one of the finest prose stylists of the day.

In the second decade of the nineteenth century he began to write for journals including Leigh Hunt's Reflector, Examiner and Indicator. At the same time he cultivated his skills as the author of some of the most entertaining letters of the period, which also contain much critical disquisition. Then, in 1820, came the turning point in his career; he was asked to contribute to John Scott's London Magazine. Under the pseudonym 'Elia', Lamb began to publish what are now regarded as some of the finest essays in the history of English letters. In due course these were collected as Elia (1823) and Last Essays of Elia (1833). It was the glory of those essays to seek to retrieve, in fine romantic fashion, that instinct from which the adult has long been cut adrift – a sense of the numinous and magical. They are a distinctive and inimitable combination of romantic yearning for the intensity of childhood vision, combined with an underlying fear that the world may turn out to be no more than the materialist nightmare – matter in motion.

Elia's art lay to some extent in his manner; as Lamb told his publisher, John Taylor, 'The Essays want no Preface: they are all Preface. A Preface is nothing but a talk with the reader; and they do nothing else.'² Doubtless it was the persona of Elia that enabled Lamb to indulge his prejudices and whims with a freedom he would not have enjoyed otherwise. Such was his success that he was soon the highest paid contributor to the London Magazine; indeed, still turning up at his office at East India House, he became a literary celebrity, being invited to dine with the Lord Mayor at the Guildhall.

For this volume two essays are presented in full: the first, 'Imperfect Sympathies', may be read as the manifesto for a philosophy applied in the second, 'Witches, and Other Night-Fears'.

In 1819 he fell in love again, with an actress, Fanny Kelly; she refused his proposal of marriage, but remained a friend. Perhaps she simply could not contemplate a life spent living with both Lamb and his sister, whose bouts of insanity continued, or perhaps she did not believe that they were suited to one another. He found consolation by entertaining groups of friends at home on Thursday evenings, riotous occasions that were mythologized by Hazlitt in one of his finest essays, 'On the Conversation of Authors':

There was Lamb himself, the most delightful, the most provoking, the most witty and sensible of men. He always made the best pun, and the best remark in the course of the evening. His serious conversation, like his serious writing, is his best. No one ever stammered out such fine, piquant, deep, eloquent things in half a dozen half-sentences as he does. His jests scald like tears: and he probes a question with a play upon words. What a keen, laughing, hare-brained vein of home-felt truth! What choice venom! How often did we cut into the haunch of letters, while we discussed the haunch of mutton on the table! How we skimmed the cream of criticism! How we got into the heart of controversy! How we picked out the marrow of authors! (Wu viii 32)

Lamb's eventual retirement from the East India Company was something of a disappointment, as he moved to the London suburbs of Enfield and Edmonton. There he felt increasingly exiled from the excitements of the town, and Mary's occasional return visits to the asylum left him isolated and lonely. He died of erysipelas after a bad fall on 27 December 1834 and was buried in Edmonton; Mary died in 1847 and was interred alongside him.

The Old Familiar Faces (composed January 1798)

From Blank Verse by Charles Lloyd and Charles Lamb (1798)

Where are they gone, the old familiar faces?
I had a mother, but she died and left me,
Died prematurely in a day of horrors –
All, all are gone, the old familiar faces.

I have had playmates, I have had companions 5
In my days of childhood, in my joyful schooldays –
All, all are gone, the old familiar faces.

I have been laughing, I have been carousing,
Drinking late, sitting late, with my bosom cronies –

All, all are gone, the old familiar faces. 10

I loved a love once, fairest among women;¹
Closed are her doors on me, I must not see her –
All, all are gone, the old familiar faces.

I have a friend,² a kinder friend has no man;
Like an ingrate, I left my friend abruptly, 15
Left him, to muse on the old familiar faces.

Ghostlike, I paced round the haunts of my childhood;
Earth seemed a desert I was bound to traverse,
Seeking to find the old familiar faces.

Friend of my bosom, thou more than a brother!³ 20
Why wert not thou born in my father's dwelling,
So might we talk of the old familiar faces?

For some they have died, and some they have left me,
And some are taken from me ⁴ – all are departed,
All, all are gone, the old familiar faces. 25

The Old Familiar Faces

² a friend Charles Lloyd.

⁴ And some are taken from me Shortly before this poem was written, Mary Lamb suffered a relapse and was returned to hospital.

Living without God in the World (probably composed between 1796 and 1798)¹

From The Annual Anthology (1799)

Mystery of God! thou brave and beauteous world,
Made fair with light and shade and stars and flowers,
Made fearful and august with woods and rocks,
Jagg'd precipice, black mountain, sea in storms,
Sun over all that no co-rival owns, 5
But through Heaven's pavement rides as in despite
Or mockery of the littleness of man!
I see a mighty arm, by man unseen,
Resistless, not to be controlled, that guides,
In solitude of unshared energies, 10
All these thy ceaseless miracles, oh world!
Arm of the world, I view thee, and I muse
On Man, who trusting in his mortal strength,
Leans on a shadowy staff, a staff of dreams.

We consecrate our total hopes and fears 15
To idols, flesh and blood, our love (heaven's due),
Our praise and admiration; praise bestowed
By man on man, and acts of worship done
To a kindred nature, certes² do reflect
Some portion of the glory and rays oblique 20
Upon the politic worshipper – so man
Extracts a pride from his humility.
Some braver spirits of the modern stamp
Affect a Godhead nearer: these talk loud
Of mind and independent intellect,³ 25
Of energies omnipotent in man,
And man of his own fate artificer –
Yea, of his own life Lord, and of the days
Of his abode on earth, when time shall be

That life immortal shall become an art; 30
 Or Death, by chemic practices deceived,
 Forego the scent which for six thousand years,
 Like a good hound he has followed, or at length,
 More manners learning, and a decent sense
 And reverence of a philosophic world, 35
 Relent, and leave to prey on carcasses.
 But these are fancies of a few: the rest,
 Atheists, or Deists only in the name,
 By word or deed deny a God. They eat
 Their daily bread, and draw the breath of heaven, 40
 Without or thought or thanks; heaven's roof to them
 Is but a painted ceiling hung with lamps,
 No more, that light them to their purposes.
 They wander 'loose about',⁴ they nothing see,
 Themselves except, and creatures like themselves, 45
 Short-lived, short-sighted, impotent to save.
 So on their dissolute spirits, soon or late,
 Destruction cometh 'like an armed man',⁵
 Or like a dream of murder in the night,
 Withering their mortal faculties, and breaking 50
 The bones of all their pride.

Living without God in the World

¹ This intriguing poem is one of Lamb's most important from the 1790s. It is usefully discussed by Nicholas Roe, The Politics of Nature (2nd edn, Basingstoke, 2002), pp. 78–83, and David Chandler, 'A Study of Lamb's "Living Without God in the World"', Charles Lamb Bulletin NS99 (July 1997) 86–101. As Chandler points out, the title alludes to Joseph Priestley's criticism of the 'merely nominal believer' in God who 'may be a practical atheist, and worse than a mere speculative one, living as without God in the world, entirely thoughtless of his being, perfections, and providence' (Letters to a Philosophical Unbeliever (1780), p. x).

² certes certainly.

³ independent intellect probably a borrowing from Wordsworth's play The Borderers, which refers to the Godwinian virtues of an 'independent intellect' (III v 33).

⁴ loose about from Milton's damning reference to the 'common rout', Samson Agonistes 675.

⁵ like an armed man Lamb alludes to the attack on the slothful and the ignorant at Proverbs 24:34.

Letter from Charles Lamb to William Wordsworth, 30 January 1801(extract)

Separate from the pleasure of your company, I don't much care if I never see a mountain in my life.¹ I have passed all my days in London until I have formed as many and intense local attachments as any of you mountaineers can have done with dead nature.

The lighted shops of the Strand and Fleet Street, the innumerable trades, tradesmen and customers, coaches, wagons, playhouses, all the bustle and wickedness round about Covent Garden,² the very women of the town, the watchmen, drunken scenes, rattles; life awake, if you awake, at all hours of the night, the impossibility of being dull in Fleet Street, the crowds, the very dirt and mud, the sun shining upon houses and pavements, the print shops, the old book stalls,³ parsons cheapening⁴ books, coffee-houses, steams of soups from kitchens, the pantomimes⁵ – London itself a pantomime and a masquerade:⁶ all these things work themselves into my mind and feed me without a power of satiating me.

The wonder of these sights impels me into night-walks about her crowded streets, and I often shed tears in the motley⁷ Strand from fullness of joy at so much life. All these emotions must be strange to you; so are your rural emotions to me. But consider, what must I have been doing all my life not to have lent great portions of my heart with usury⁸ to such scenes?

My attachments are all local, purely local. I have no passion (or have had none since I was in love – and then it was the spurious engendering of poetry and books) to groves and valleys. The rooms where I was born,⁹ the furniture which has been before my eyes all my life, a bookcase which has followed me about like a faithful dog (only exceeding him in knowledge) wherever I have moved, old chairs, old tables, streets, squares where I have sunned myself, my old school¹⁰ – these are my mistresses. Have I not enough, without your mountains? I do not envy you. I should pity you, did I not know that the mind will make friends of anything. Your sun and moon and skies and hills and lakes affect me no more, or scarcely come to me in more venerable characters, than as a gilded room with tapestry and tapers where I might live with handsome visible objects. I consider the clouds above me but as a roof beautifully painted, but unable to satisfy the mind, and at last, like the pictures of the apartment of a connoisseur, unable to afford him any longer a pleasure.

Letter from Charles Lamb to William Wordsworth

¹ In fact, Lamb was to visit the Lake District in August 1802, when he was to climb Skiddaw and Helvellyn.

² all the bustle...Covent Garden Covent Garden was the heart of a red-light district.

³ old book stalls stalls selling old books.

⁴ cheapening bargaining for.

⁵ pantomimes dramatic entertainments in which the performers express themselves by gestures to the accompaniment of music.

⁶ a masquerade i.e. London is as diverse, varied and fantastic as a masked ball.

⁷ motley varied, diverse, unpredictable.

⁸ usury interest, advantage.

⁹ The rooms ... born No. 2 Crown Office Row, Inner Temple.

¹⁰ my old school Christ's Hospital, in the City of London.

Letter from Charles Lamb to John Taylor,¹ 30 June 1821(extract)

Poor Elia the real (for I am but a counterfeit) is dead. The fact is a person of that name, an Italian, was a fellow-clerk of mine at the South Sea House thirty (not forty) years ago,² when the characters I described there existed, but had left it like myself many years – and I having a brother³ now there, and doubting how he might relish certain descriptions in it, I clapped down the name of Elia to it, which passed off pretty well, for Elia himself added the function of an author to that of a scrivener, like myself.

I went the other day (not having seen him for a year) to laugh over with him at my usurpation of his name, and found him, alas, no more than a name, for he died of consumption eleven months ago, and I knew not of it.

So the name has fairly devolved to me, I think, and 'tis all he has left me.

Letter from Charles Lamb to John Taylor

² thirty...years ago Lamb was a clerk in the Pacific trade office of the South Sea House, 1791–2.

Imperfect Sympathies¹

From Elia (1823)

I am of a constitution so general, that it consorts and sympathizeth with all things; I have no antipathy, or rather idiosyncrasy, in anything. Those national repugnancies do not touch me, nor do I behold with prejudice the French, Italian, Spaniard, or Dutch.

(Sir Thomas Browne, Religio Medici)²

That the author of the Religio Medici, mounted upon the airy stilts of abstraction, conversant about notional and conjectural essences, in whose categories of being the possible took the upper hand of the actual, should have overlooked the impertinent individualities³ of such poor concretions⁴ as mankind, is not much to be admired. It is rather to be wondered at, that in the genus of animals he should have condescended to distinguish that species at all.

For myself, earthbound and fettered to the scene of my activities, ‘Standing on earth, not rapt above the sky’,⁵ I confess that I do feel the differences of mankind, national or individual, to an unhealthy excess. I can look with no indifferent eye upon things or persons. Whatever is, is to me a matter of taste or distaste, or, when once it becomes indifferent, it begins to be disrelishing.⁶ I am, in plainer words, a bundle of prejudices made up of likings and dislikings, the veriest thrall⁷ to sympathies, apathies,⁸ antipathies.

In a certain sense, I hope it may be said of me that I am a lover of my species. I can feel for all indifferently,⁹ but I cannot feel towards all equally. The more purely English word that expresses sympathy will better explain my meaning. I can be a friend to a worthy man who, upon another account, cannot be my mate or fellow. I cannot like all people alike.¹⁰

I have been trying all my life to like Scotchmen and am obliged to desist from the experiment in despair. They cannot like me and, in truth, I never knew one of that nation who attempted to do it. There is something more plain and ingenuous¹¹ in their mode of proceeding. We know one another at first sight. There is an order of imperfect intellects (under which mine must be content to rank) which in its constitution is essentially anti-Caledonian. The owners of the sort of faculties I allude to have minds rather suggestive¹² than comprehensive.¹³ They have no pretences to much clearness or precision in their ideas, or in their manner of expressing them. Their intellectual wardrobe (to confess fairly) has few whole pieces in it. They are content with fragments and scattered pieces of Truth; she presents no full front to them – a feature or side-face at the most. Hints and glimpses, germs and crude essays at a system, is the utmost they pretend to. They beat up a little game peradventure,¹⁴ and leave it to knottier heads, more robust constitutions, to run it down.¹⁵ The light that lights them is not steady and polar,¹⁶ but mutable and shifting – waxing, and again waning. Their conversation is accordingly.¹⁷ They will throw out a random word in or out of season, and be content to let it pass for what it is worth. They cannot speak always as if they were upon their oath, but must be understood, speaking or writing, with some abatement.¹⁸ They seldom wait to mature a proposition, but e'en bring it to market in the green ear.¹⁹ They delight to impart their defective discoveries as they arise, without waiting for their full development. They are no systematizers, and would but err more by attempting it. Their minds, as I said before, are suggestive merely.

The brain of a true Caledonian (if I am not mistaken) is constituted upon quite a different plan. His Minerva is born in panoply.²⁰ You are never admitted to see his ideas in their growth – if indeed they do grow, and are not rather put together upon principles of clockwork. You never catch his mind in an undress. He never hints or suggests anything, but unlades²¹ his stock of ideas in perfect order and completeness. He brings his total wealth into company, and gravely unpacks it. His riches are always about him. He never stoops to catch a glittering something in your presence to share it with you, before he quite²² knows whether it be true touch²³ or not. You cannot cry halves ²⁴ to anything that he finds – he does not find, but bring. You never witness his first apprehension of a thing. His understanding is always at its meridian;²⁵ you never see the first dawn, the early streaks. He has no falterings of self-suspicion. Surmises, guesses, misgivings, half-intuitions, semi-consciousnesses, partial illuminations, dim instincts, embryo conceptions, have no place in his brain or vocabulary. The twilight of dubiety²⁶ never falls upon him. Is he orthodox? He has no doubts. Is he an infidel? He has none either. Between the affirmative and the negative there is no borderland with him. You cannot hover with him upon the confines of truth, or wander in the maze of a probable argument. He always keeps the path. You cannot make excursions with him, for he sets you right. His taste never fluctuates. His morality never abates.²⁷ He cannot compromise, or understand middle actions. There can be but a right and a wrong. His conversation is as a book. His affirmations have the sanctity of an oath. You must speak upon the square²⁸ with him. He stops a metaphor like a suspected person in an enemy's country. 'A healthy²⁹ book!' said one of his countrymen to me, who had ventured to give that appellation to John Bunce, ³⁰ 'Did I catch rightly what you said? I have heard of a man in health, and of a healthy state of body, but I do not see how that epithet can be properly applied to a book.'

Above all, you must beware of indirect expressions before a Caledonian. Clap an extinguisher upon your irony if you are unhappily blessed with a vein of it: remember you are upon your oath. I have a print of a graceful female after Leonardo da Vinci,³¹ which I was showing off to Mr *. After he had examined it minutely, I ventured to ask him how he liked 'my beauty' (a foolish name it goes by among my friends), when he very gravely assured me that he had considerable respect for my character and talents (so he was pleased to say) but had not given himself much thought about the degree of my personal pretensions. The misconception staggered me, but did not seem much to disconcert him.

Persons of this nation³² are particularly fond of affirming a truth which nobody doubts. They do not so properly affirm, as annunciate³³ it. They do indeed appear to have such a love of truth (as if, like virtue, it were valuable for itself) that all truth becomes equally valuable whether the proposition that contains it be new or old, disputed, or such as is impossible to become a subject of disputation. I was present not long since at a party of north Britons³⁴ where a son of Burns was expected, and happened to drop a silly expression (in my south British way), that I wished it were the father instead of the son – when four of them started up at once to inform me, that ‘that was impossible, because he was dead.’ An impracticable wish, it seems, was more than they could conceive. Swift has hit off this part of their character (namely their love of truth) in his biting way, but with an illiberality³⁵ that necessarily confines the passage to the margin.³⁶

The tediousness of these people is certainly provoking. I wonder if they ever tire one another? In my early life I had a passionate fondness for the poetry of Burns. I have sometimes foolishly hoped to ingratiate myself with his countrymen by expressing it. But I have always found that a true Scot resents your admiration of his compatriot even more than he would your contempt of him. The latter he imputes to your ‘imperfect acquaintance with many of the words which he uses’, and the same objection makes it a presumption in you to suppose that you can admire him. Thomson³⁷ they seem to have forgotten. Smollett they have neither forgotten nor forgiven for his delineation of Rory and his companion upon their first introduction to our metropolis.³⁸ Speak of Smollett as a great genius and they will retort upon you Hume’s History compared with his continuation of it.³⁹ What if the historian had continued Humphrey Clinker?⁴⁰

I have, in the abstract, no disrespect for Jews. They are a piece of stubborn antiquity compared with which Stonehenge is in its nonage.⁴¹ They date beyond the pyramids. But I should not care to be in habits of familiar intercourse with any of that nation. I confess that I have not the nerves to enter their synagogues; old prejudices cling about me – I cannot shake off the story of Hugh of Lincoln.⁴² Centuries of injury, contempt, and hate, on the one side, of cloaked revenge, dissimulation, and hate, on the other, between our and their fathers, must and ought to affect the blood of the children. I cannot believe it can run clear and kindly yet, or that a few fine words, such as candour, liberality, the light of a nineteenth century, can close up the breaches of so deadly a disunion.

A Hebrew is nowhere congenial to me. He is least distasteful on ‘Change,⁴³ for the mercantile spirit levels all distinctions, as all are beauties in the dark. I boldly confess that I do not relish the approximation⁴⁴ of Jew and Christian which has become so fashionable. The reciprocal endearments have, to me, something hypocritical and unnatural in them. I do not like to see the Church and Synagogue kissing and congeeing⁴⁵ in awkward postures of an affected civility. If they are converted, why do they not come over to us altogether? Why keep up a form of separation when the life of it is fled? If they can sit with us at table, why do they keck⁴⁶ at our cookery? I do not understand these half-convertites: Jews christianizing, Christians judaizing, puzzle me. I like fish or flesh. A moderate Jew is a more confounding piece of anomaly than a wet Quaker.⁴⁷ The spirit of the Synagogue is essentially separative.

Braham⁴⁸ would have been more in keeping if he had abided by the faith of his forefathers;⁴⁹ there is a fine scorn in his face, which nature meant to be of⁵⁰ – Christians. The Hebrew spirit is strong in him, in spite of his proselytism.⁵¹ He cannot conquer the shibboleth.⁵² How it breaks out when he sings, ‘The Children of Israel passed through the Red Sea!’⁵³ The auditors, for the moment, are as Egyptians to him, and he rides over our necks in triumph. There is no mistaking him. Braham has a strong expression of sense⁵⁴ in his countenance, and it is confirmed by his singing. The foundation of his vocal excellence is sense. He sings with understanding, as Kemble⁵⁵ delivered dialogue. He would sing the Commandments and give an appropriate character to each prohibition.

His nation, in general, have not over-sensible countenances. How should they? But you seldom see a silly expression among them. Gain, and the pursuit of gain, sharpen a man's visage. I never heard of an idiot being born among them. Some admire the Jewish female physiognomy.⁵⁶ I admire it, but with trembling. Jael⁵⁷ had those full dark inscrutable eyes.

In the Negro countenance you will often meet with strong traits of benignity. I have felt yearnings of tenderness towards some of these faces, or rather masks, that have looked out kindly upon one in casual encounters in the streets and highways. I love what Fuller⁵⁸ beautifully calls these 'images of God cut in ebony.' But I should not like to associate with them, to share my meals and my goodnights with them – because they are black.

I love Quaker ways and Quaker worship. I venerate the Quaker principles. It does me good for the rest of the day when I meet any of their people in my path. When I am ruffled or disturbed by any occurrence, the sight, or quiet voice of a Quaker, acts upon me as a ventilator, lightening the air and taking off a load from the bosom. But I cannot like the Quakers (as Desdemona would say) 'to live with them.'⁵⁹ I am all over-sophisticated⁶⁰ – with humours,⁶¹ fancies,⁶² craving hourly sympathy. I must have books, pictures, theatres, chit-chat,⁶³ scandal, jokes, ambiguities, and a thousand whim-whams which their simpler taste can do without. I should starve at their primitive banquet. My appetites are too high for the salads which (according to Evelyn)⁶⁴ Eve dressed for the angel, my gusto⁶⁵ too excited 'To sit a guest with Daniel at his pulse.'⁶⁶

The indirect answers which Quakers are often found to return to a question put to them may be explained, I think, without the vulgar⁶⁷ assumption that they are more given to evasion and equivocating than other people. They naturally look to their words more carefully, and are more cautious of committing themselves. They have a peculiar character to keep up on this head. They stand in a manner upon their veracity.⁶⁸ A Quaker is by law exempted from taking an oath. The custom of resorting to an oath in extreme cases, sanctified as it is by all religious antiquity, is apt⁶⁹ (it must be confessed) to introduce into the laxer sort of minds the notion of two kinds of truth – the one applicable to the solemn affairs of justice, and the other to the common proceedings of daily intercourse. As truth bound upon the conscience by an oath can be but truth, so in the common affirmations of the shop and the marketplace a latitude is expected and conceded upon questions wanting this solemn covenant. Something less than truth satisfies. It is common to hear a person say, ‘You do not expect me to speak as if I were upon my oath.’ Hence a great deal of incorrectness and inadvertency (short of falsehood) creeps into ordinary conversation, and a kind of secondary or laic-truth⁷⁰ is tolerated, where clergy-truth – oath-truth, by the nature of the circumstances – is not required. A Quaker knows none of this distinction. His simple affirmation being received upon the most sacred occasions, without any further test, stamps a value upon the words which he is to use upon the most indifferent topics of life. He looks to them, naturally, with more severity.

You can have of him no more than his word. He knows, if he is caught tripping in a casual expression,⁷¹ he forfeits, for himself at least, his claim to the invidious exemption.⁷² He knows that his syllables are weighed – and how far a consciousness of this particular watchfulness, exerted against a person, has a tendency to produce indirect answers and a diverting of the question by honest means, might be illustrated (and the practice justified) by a more sacred example than is proper to be adduced upon this occasion. The admirable presence of mind, which is notorious in Quakers upon all contingencies, might be traced to this imposed self-watchfulness, if it did not seem rather an humble and secular scion of that old stock of religious constancy which never bent or faltered in the Primitive Friends,⁷³ or gave way to the winds of persecution, to the violence of judge or accuser, under trials and racking examinations. ‘You will never be the wiser, if I sit here answering your questions till midnight’, said one of those upright Justicers⁷⁴ to Penn,⁷⁵ who had been putting law-cases with a puzzling subtlety. ‘Thereafter as the answers may be’, retorted the Quaker.

The astonishing composure of this people is sometimes ludicrously displayed in lighter instances. I was travelling in a stagecoach with three male Quakers, buttoned up in the straitest non-conformity of their sect. We stopped to bait⁷⁶ at Andover, where a meal (partly tea apparatus, partly supper) was set before us. My friends confined themselves to the tea-table. I in my way took supper. When the landlady brought in the bill, the eldest of my companions discovered that she had charged for both meals. This was resisted. Mine hostess was very clamorous and positive. Some mild arguments were used on the part of the Quakers, for which the heated mind of the good lady seemed by no means a fit recipient. The guard⁷⁷ came in with his usual peremptory notice. The Quakers pulled out their money and formally tendered it (so much for tea), I, in humble imitation, tendering mine for the supper which I had taken. She would not relax in her demand. So they all three quietly put up⁷⁸ their silver, as did myself, and marched out of the room, the eldest and gravest going first, with myself closing up the rear, who thought I could not do better than follow the example of such grave and warrantable personages. We got in. The steps went up. The coach drove off. The murmurs of mine hostess (not very indistinctly or ambiguously pronounced) became after a time inaudible – and now, my conscience (which the whimsical scene had for a while suspended) beginning to give some twitches, I waited in the hope that some justification would be offered by these serious persons for the seeming injustice of their conduct. To my great surprise not a syllable was dropped on the subject. They sat as mute as at a meeting. At length the eldest of them broke silence, by enquiring of his next neighbour, ‘Hast thee heard how indigos⁷⁹ go at the India House?’ And the question operated as a soporific⁸⁰ on my moral feeling as far as Exeter.

Imperfect Sympathies

² Sir Thomas Browne (1605–82) was a favourite author of Lamb, Coleridge and Wordsworth.

³ impertinent individualities trivial distinctions.

4 concretions masses.

5 Paradise Lost vii 23.

6 disrelishing disgusting.

7 thrall prisoner.

8 apathies feelings of indifference.

9 indifferently disinterestedly.

10 ‘I would be understood as confining myself to the subject of imperfect sympathies. To nations or classes of men there can be no direct antipathy. There may be individuals born and constellated so opposite to another individual nature, that the same sphere cannot hold them. I have met with my moral antipodes, and can believe the story of two men meeting (who never saw one another before in their lives) and instantly fighting’ (Lamb’s note).

11 ingenuous frank, candid.

12 suggestive fitted to conceive, or comprehend suggestions, rather than to reach final conclusions.

13 comprehensive interested only in understanding conclusively.

14 They beat up...peradventure i.e. they put forward an argument as it chances to occur.

15 run it down i.e. dispute it.

16 polar fixed; ‘as fixed as the poles’.

17 accordingly i.e. consistent with these tendencies.

18 abatement i.e. indulgence; it is the expectation of seriousness that must be abated in the listener.

19 in the green ear prematurely.

20 in panoply in armour. Minerva sprang fully armed from the head of her father, Zeus.

21 unlades unloads.

22 quite completely.

23 true touch indisputably correct.

24 cry halves to claim a half share in anything found or caught by someone else.

25 meridian fullest height.

26 dubiety doubt.

27 abates weakens.

28 upon the square with extreme exactness and precision. Lamb goes on to criticize extreme literal-mindedness.

29 healthy in the sense of wholesome.

30 Thomas Amory's novel, The Life and Opinions of John Buncler, Esq. (1756–66), was one of Lamb's favourite books.

31 The Virgin of the Rocks.

32 this nation Scotland, though Lamb means all those of Caledonian tendencies, wherever they may come from.

33 annunciate proclaim, declare.

34 north Britons i.e. Scots.

35 illiberality rudeness, ungenerousness.

36 the margin i.e. of the page. Lamb notes a passage from Swift's 'Hints towards an Essay on Conversation':

There are some people who think they sufficiently acquit themselves, and entertain their company, with relating facts of no consequence, not at all out of the road of such common incidents as happen every day. And this I have observed more frequently among the Scots than any other nation, who are very careful not to omit the minutest circumstances of time or place – which kind of discourse, if it were not a little relieved by the uncouth terms and phrases, as well as accent and gesture peculiar to that country, would be hardly tolerable.

38 Rory, the eponymous hero of Roderick Random (1748) by Tobias Smollett, arrives in London at chapter 13.

39 Smollett's A Complete History of England (1757–8) was frequently published as a continuation of David Hume's History of Great Britain (1754–62).

40 The Expedition of Humphry Clinker (1771), the most accomplished of Smollett's novels. Lamb's point is that it is so thoroughly imaginative (and, in effect, anti-Caledonian), that no historian could have written a sequel.

41 nonage infancy.

42 Hugh of Lincoln a 10-year-old boy supposedly crucified and killed by Jews.

43 Change place where merchants meet for the transaction of business, an exchange.

44 approximation closeness, proximity.

45 congeeing bowing in courtesy.

46 keck retch.

47 a wet Quaker a Quaker lax in the observances of his or her sect.

48 John Braham (1774–1856), renowned tenor of Jewish parentage who converted to Christianity.

49 the faith of his forefathers Judaism (see preceding note).

50 of i.e. directed towards.

51 proselytism conversion.

52 shibboleth accent or intonation revealing a person's racial origins.

53 Presumably a version of Hebrews 11:29 set to music.

54 sense i.e. understanding of what he sings.

55 John Philip Kemble (1757–1823), manager of Drury Lane Theatre (1788–1802) and Covent Garden Theatre (1803–17), the leading Shakespearian actor/director of his time.

56 physiognomy facial cast.

57 Judges 4:21: 'Then Jael Heber's wife took a nail of the tent, and took an hammer in her hand, and went softly unto him, and smote the nail into his temples, and fastened it into the ground: for he was fast asleep and weary. So he died.'

58 Thomas Fuller (1608–61), author of History of the Worthies of England (1662), one of Lamb's favourite books.

59 Othello I iii 248.

60 over-sophisticated completely and utterly lacking in the natural and simple tastes demanded of the Quaker.

61 humours inclinations, likings, enthusiasms.

62 fancies whims.

63 chit-chat gossip.

64 according to Evelyn Lamb refers to John Evelyn, Acetaria: A Discourse of Sallets (1699), a short account of salad plants and dressings.

65 gusto appetite for good food.

66 Paradise Regained ii 278. Daniel refused to eat the food provided for the children of Jewish nobles, preferring the simple diet of 'pulse' (lentils, beans, etc.); see Daniel 1:3–21.

67 vulgar usual.

68 veracity honesty.

69 is apt tends.

70 laic-truth the sort of honesty expected of those not under oath.

71 tripping in ... expression committing an error by using a casual expression.

72 exemption i.e. as a Quaker.

73 the Primitive Friends The Quakers, or Religious Society of Friends, was founded by George Fox in 1648–50, distinguished by its stress on the ‘Inner Light’ and rejection of sacraments, an ordained ministry and set forms of worship.

74 Justicers judges.

75 William Penn (1644–1718), an English Quaker.

76 bait stop at an inn to refresh the horses.

77 guard i.e. of the stagecoach, to warn them of its departure.

78 put up i.e. put their money back in their pockets.

Witches, and Other Night-Fears¹

From Elia (1823)

We are too hasty when we set down our ancestors in the gross for fools, for the monstrous inconsistencies (as they seem to us) involved in their creed of witchcraft. In the relations of this visible world we find them to have been as rational, and shrewd to detect an historic anomaly, as ourselves. But when once the invisible world was supposed to be opened, and the lawless agency of bad spirits assumed, what measures of probability, of decency, of fitness, or proportion of that which distinguishes the likely from the palpable absurd, could they have to guide them in the rejection or admission of any particular testimony? That maidens pined away, wasting inwardly as their waxen images consumed before a fire; that corn was lodged² and cattle lamed;³ that whirlwinds uptore in diabolic revelry the oaks of the forest; or that spits and kettles only danced a fearful-innocent vagary about some rustic's kitchen when no wind was stirring – were all equally probable where no law of agency was understood. That the Prince of the powers of darkness, passing by the flower and pomp of the earth, should lay preposterous siege to the weak fantasy of indigent eld,⁴ has neither likelihood nor unlikelihood a priori ⁵ to us who have no measure to guess at his policy, or standard to estimate what rate those anile⁶ souls may fetch in the devil's market. Nor, when the wicked are expressly symbolized by a goat, was it to be wondered at so much, that he should come sometimes in that body and assert his metaphor. That the intercourse was opened at all between both worlds was perhaps the mistake – but that once assumed, I see no reason for disbelieving one attested story of this nature more than another on the score of absurdity. There is no law to judge of the lawless, or canon by which a dream may be criticized.

I have sometimes thought that I could not have existed in the days of received witchcraft, that I could not have slept in a village where one of those reputed hags dwelt. Our ancestors were bolder (or more obtuse). Amidst the universal belief that these wretches were in league with the author of all evil, holding hell tributary⁷ to their muttering, no simple Justice of the Peace seems to have scrupled issuing, or silly headborough⁸ serving, a warrant upon them – as if they should subpoena Satan! Prospero in his boat, with his books and wand about him, suffers himself to be conveyed away at the mercy of his enemies to an unknown island.⁹ He might have raised a storm or two, we think, on the passage.¹⁰ His acquiescence is in exact analogy to the non-resistance of witches to the constituted powers. What stops the fiend in Spenser from tearing Guyon to pieces?¹¹ Or who had made it a condition of his prey that Guyon must take assay of the glorious bait?¹² We have no guess; we do not know the laws of that country.

From my childhood I was extremely inquisitive about witches and witch-stories. My maid, and more legendary aunt, supplied me with good store. But I shall mention the accident which directed my curiosity originally into this channel. In my father's book-closet, the History of the Bible by Stackhouse¹³ occupied a distinguished station. The pictures with which it abounds – one of the ark, in particular, and another of Solomon’s temple, delineated with all the fidelity of ocular admeasurement,¹⁴ as if the artist had been upon the spot – attracted my childish attention. There was a picture, too, of the witch raising up Samuel, which I wish that I had never seen. (We shall come to that hereafter.)

Stackhouse is in two huge tomes, and there was a pleasure in removing folios¹⁵ of that magnitude, which, with infinite straining, was as much as I could manage, from the situation which they occupied upon an upper shelf. I have not met with the work from that time to this, but I remember it consisted of Old Testament stories, orderly set down, with the ‘objection’ appended to each story, and the ‘solution’ of the objection regularly tacked to that. The objection was a summary of whatever difficulties had been opposed to the credibility of the history, by the shrewdness of ancient or modern infidelity,¹⁶ drawn up with an almost complimentary¹⁷ excess of candour; the solution was brief, modest, and satisfactory. The bane and antidote were both before you. To doubts so put (and so quashed), there seemed to be an end for ever. The dragon lay dead, for the foot of the veriest babe to trample on.

But (like as was rather feared than realized from that slain monster in Spenser) from the womb of those crushed errors young dragonets¹⁸ would creep, exceeding the prowess of so tender a St George as myself to vanquish. The habit of expecting objections to every passage set me upon starting more objections, for the glory of finding a solution of my own for them. I became staggered¹⁹ and perplexed, a sceptic in long coats. The pretty Bible stories which I had read, or heard read in church, lost their purity and sincerity of impression, and were turned into so many historic or chronologic theses to be defended against whatever impugners. I was not to disbelieve them, but (the next thing to that) I was to be quite sure that someone or other would or had disbelieved them. Next to making a child an infidel is the letting him know that there are infidels at all. Credulity is the man’s weakness, but the child’s strength. Oh, how ugly sound scriptural doubts from the mouth of a babe and a suckling!

I should have lost myself in these mazes and have pined away, I think, with such unfit sustenance as these husks afforded, but for a fortunate piece of ill-fortune, which about this time befell me. Turning over the picture of the ark with too much haste, I unhappily made a breach in its ingenious fabric – driving my inconsiderate fingers right through the two larger quadrupeds (the elephant and the camel) that stare, as well they might, out of the two last windows next the steerage in that unique piece of naval architecture. Stackhouse was henceforth locked up, and became an interdicted²⁰ treasure. With the book, the objections and solutions gradually cleared out of my head, and have seldom returned since in any force to trouble me. But there was one impression which I had imbibed from Stackhouse which no lock or bar could shut out, and which was destined to try my childish nerves rather more seriously – that detestable picture!

I was dreadfully alive to nervous terrors. The night-time solitude and the dark were my hell. The sufferings I endured in this nature would justify the expression. I never laid my head on my pillow, I suppose, from the fourth to the seventh or eighth year of my life (so far as memory serves in things so long ago), without an assurance, which realized its own prophecy, of seeing some frightful spectre. Be old Stackhouse then acquitted in part, if I say that to his picture of the witch raising up Samuel²¹ (oh, that old man covered with a mantle!)²² I owe not my midnight terrors, the hell of my infancy, but the shape and manner of their visitation. It was he who dressed up for me a hag that nightly sat upon my pillow – a sure bedfellow when my aunt or my maid was far from me. All day long, while the book was permitted me, I dreamed waking over his delineation,²³ and at night (if I may use so bold an expression) awoke into sleep, and found the vision true. I durst not, even in the daylight, once enter the chamber where I slept, without my face turned to the window, aversely from the bed where my witch-ridden pillow was. Parents do not know what they do when they leave tender babes alone to go to sleep in the dark. The feeling about for a friendly arm, the hoping for a familiar voice when they wake screaming and find none to soothe them – what a terrible shaking it is to their poor nerves! The keeping them up till midnight, through candlelight and the unwholesome hours (as they are called), would, I am satisfied, in a medical point of view, prove the better caution. That detestable picture, as I have said, gave the fashion²⁴ to my dreams – if dreams they were, for the scene of them was invariably the room in which I lay. Had I never met with the picture, the fears would have come self-pictured in some shape or other – ‘Headless bear, black man, or ape’²⁵ – but, as it was, my imaginations took that form.

It is not book, or picture, or the stories of foolish servants which create these terrors in children; they can at most but give them a direction. Dear little T.H.²⁶ who, of all children, has been brought up with the most scrupulous exclusion of every taint of superstition, who was never allowed to hear of goblin or apparition, or scarcely to be told of bad men, or to read or hear of any distressing story, finds all this world of fear, from which he has been so rigidly excluded ab extra in his own ‘thick-coming fancies’²⁷ – and from his little midnight pillow, this nurse-child of optimism will start at shapes unborrowed of tradition, in sweats to which the reveries of the cell-damned murderer are tranquillity.

Gorgons and hydras and chimeras,²⁸ dire stories of Celaeno and the harpies,²⁹ may reproduce themselves in the brain of superstition – but they were there before. They are transcripts, types; the archetypes are in us, and eternal.³⁰ How else should the recital of that which we know in a waking sense to be false come to affect us at all? Or ‘Names whose sense we see not, / Fray us with things that be not?’³¹ Is it that we naturally conceive terror from such objects, considered in their capacity of being able to inflict upon us bodily injury? Oh, least of all! These terrors are of older standing. They date beyond body – or, without the body, they would have been the same. All the cruel, tormenting, defined devils in Dante³² – tearing, mangling, choking, stifling, scorching demons – are they one half so fearful to the spirit of a man as the simple idea of a spirit unembodied following him?

Like one that on a lonesome road
Doth walk in fear and dread,
And having once turned round walks on

And turns no more his head
Because he knows a frightful fiend

Doth close behind him tread.³³

That the kind of fear here treated of is purely spiritual, that it is strong in proportion as it is objectless upon earth, that it predominates in the period of sinless infancy – are difficulties, the solution of which might afford some probable insight into our ante-mundane³⁴ condition, and a peep at least into the shadowland of pre-existence.

My night-fancies have long ceased to be afflictive. I confess an occasional nightmare, but I do not, as in early youth, keep a stud³⁵ of them. Fiendish faces, with the extinguished taper, will come and look at me – but I know them for mockeries, even while I cannot elude their presence, and I fight and grapple with them. For the credit of my imagination, I am almost ashamed to say how tame and prosaic my dreams are grown. They are never romantic, seldom even rural. They are of architecture and of buildings – cities abroad, which I have never seen, and hardly have hope to see. I have traversed, for the seeming length of a natural day, Rome, Amsterdam, Paris, Lisbon – their churches, palaces, squares, market-places, shops, suburbs, ruins, with an inexpressible sense of delight, a map-like distinctness of trace, and a daylight vividness of vision, that was all but being awake.

I have formerly travelled among the Westmorland fells (my highest Alps),³⁶ but they are objects too mighty for the grasp of my dreaming recognition, and I have again and again awoken with ineffectual struggles of the inner eye, to make out a shape, in any way whatever, of Helvellyn.³⁷ Methought I was in that country, but the mountains were gone. The poverty of my dreams mortifies me. There is Coleridge, at his will can conjure up icy domes and pleasure-houses for Kubla Khan, and Abyssinian maids, and songs of Abara, and caverns ‘Where Alph, the sacred river, runs’, to solace his night solitudes, when I cannot muster a fiddle. Barry Cornwall has his tritons and his nereids gambolling before him in nocturnal visions, and proclaiming sons born to Neptune,³⁸ when my stretch of imaginative activity can hardly, in the night season, raise up the ghost of a fishwife. To set my failures in somewhat a mortifying light, it was after reading the noble ‘Dream’ of this poet that my fancy ran strong upon these marine spectra³⁹ – and the poor plastic⁴⁰ power (such as it is) within me set to work, to humour my folly in a sort of dream that very night. Methought I was upon the ocean billows at some sea nuptials, riding and mounted high, with the customary train⁴¹ sounding their conchs before me (I myself, you may be sure, the leading god), and jollily we went careering over the main, till, just where Ino Leucothea⁴² should have greeted me (I think it was Ino) with a white embrace, the billows, gradually subsiding, fell from a sea-roughness to a sea-calm, and thence to a river-motion, and that river (as happens in the familiarization of dreams) was no other than the gentle Thames – which landed me, in the wafture of a placid wave or two, alone, safe and inglorious, somewhere at the foot of Lambeth Palace.⁴³

The degree of the soul’s creativeness in sleep might furnish no whimsical criterion of the quantum⁴⁴ of poetical faculty resident in the same soul waking. An old gentleman, a friend of mine, and a humorist, used to carry this notion so far that when he saw any stripling of his acquaintance ambitious of becoming a poet, his first question would be, ‘Young man, what sort of dreams have you?’ I have so much faith in my old friend’s theory that when I feel that idle vein returning upon me, I presently subside into my proper element of prose, remembering those eluding nereids, and that inauspicious inland landing.

Perhaps the most important relationship in Hazlitt's life was with his father, William Hazlitt Sr (1737–1820), who wanted his youngest son to follow in his footsteps as a Unitarian minister. When preaching at churches in America, Reverend Hazlitt would take his 6-year-old son to stand at his side in the pulpit as he delivered his sermon; it might perhaps be argued that the young boy always remembered how it felt to stand in front of an audience, and to preach the gospel of the just. The family spent the years 1783–7 in America, while his father struggled, and failed, to find a permanent posting first in Philadelphia, then in Boston, and finally in Maine. He was a determined Socinian of the Priestleyan stripe, uncompromising in his rejection of Trinitarianism. These were early days for the Unitarian faith in America, his ideas were too radical for the Presbyterian congregations he addressed, and he was unwilling to compromise his beliefs. In 1787, having failed to secure a permanent post, he returned to England, settling in the small Shropshire village of Wem, where he continued until retirement.

His son decided against a career in the church during his student days at the Unitarian New College in Hackney, East London, where Joseph Priestley was one of his lecturers. Indeed, it was at that time he became an atheist. His father was devastated. Correspondence testifies to the strains this generated between them, but Hazlitt remained anxious to please his father through his industry and commitment to intellectual matters.

While at the New College, Hazlitt benefited from an exemplary training in classical literature and philosophy. It was no surprise that such an aggressively intelligent young man should have formulated his own philosophical system, and attempted to articulate it. Hazlitt's philosophy of disinterestedness underpins almost everything he wrote. In essence, it postulates that self-love is cognate with love for others. From this premise, Hazlitt deduced that human beings were as capable of acting altruistically as for selfish reasons. The implications of this are more far-reaching than may at first appear. For one thing, it puts Hazlitt at loggerheads with a long tradition of philosophers who believed humanity to be essentially self-interested, and thus given to ill motives. In broad terms, he is aligned with radical philosophers of the 1790s who postulated mankind as a virtuous animal given to good deeds. Out of this Hazlitt constructed an aesthetic theory which understood the artist's role as being that of entering into other worlds, minds or personalities. The ability to do so in a disinterested manner he called 'gusto' – a quality defined in one of his most important essays (pp. 779–82). It would have a powerful influence on Keats's concept of negative capability (see p. 1405).

The most important event of Hazlitt's intellectual development was his first encounter with Samuel Taylor Coleridge, January 1798. Having heard that Coleridge was to preach to the Unitarian congregation in Shrewsbury, he slogged ten miles through the mud and rain in order to hear him. 'I could not have been more delighted if I had heard the music of the spheres', he later recalled. Years later, he was scathing of his former mentor for what he saw as the betrayal of his early radicalism and failure to live up to his promise – and indeed it is true that Coleridge renounced Unitarianism and the optimistic Hartleyan philosophy which he expounded during the 1790s – but 1798 was the perfect moment for Coleridge to initiate him into the literary and intellectual melting-pot out of which would come his own poetry and that of Wordsworth. Indeed, Coleridge invited him to Nether Stowey in the summer, where he heard Wordsworth recite some of the lyrical ballads prior to their publication. It would be hard to overstate the importance of this experience: it turned him into the principal interpreter of the work and lives of the first-generation Romantics – but not immediately. Believing he wanted to pursue a career as an artist Hazlitt visited the Louvre in Paris during the Peace of Amiens in 1802, and the following year went to the Lake District to paint portraits of Wordsworth, Coleridge and Southey. On that occasion Coleridge gave a detailed description of him in a letter to his friend Richard Sharp:

William Hazlitt is a thinking, observant, original man, of great power as a painter of character portraits, and far more in the manner of the old painters than any living artist; but the object must be before him: he has no imaginative memory.... His manners are to 99 in 100 singularly repulsive – brow-hanging, shoe-contemplative, strange ... he is, I verily believe, kindly-natured – is very fond of, attentive to, and patient with, children. But he is jealous, gloomy, and of an irritable pride – and addicted to women as objects of sexual indulgence. With all this, there is much good in him ... and though from habitual shyness and the outside and bearskin at least of misanthropy, he is strangely confused and dark in his conversation and delivers himself of almost all his conceptions with a forceps, yet he says more than any man I ever knew, yourself only excepted, that is his own in a way of his own – and oftentimes when he has warmed his mind, and the synovial juice has come out and spread over his joints he will gallop for half an hour together with real eloquence. (Griggs ii 990–1)

Hazlitt published his philosophical theory as An Essay on the Principles of Human Actions (1805) with Joseph Johnson, the Unitarian who had published his father's sermons in the 1780s and 1790s. It failed to sell. He continued to try to make his way as an artist (see Plate 13), but commissions tailed off and by 1808, when he married his first wife, Sarah Stoddart, he had begun to realize that his future lay elsewhere. In 1812 he tried his hand as a philosophy lecturer, but the series faltered because it failed to make money. In desperation, he asked his friends to approach newspaper editors in the hope of finding a job as a journalist.

Hazlitt began his career at the top, as parliamentary correspondent for the Morning Chronicle. It suited him well. He took to thinking and writing under pressure and loved the company of other journalists such as Peter Finnerty (a former United Irishman), with whom he caroused in the dives off the Strand. Though fearful of criminals and thugs, he began to move in the twilight world of publicans, gamblers, drinkers, prostitutes and bare-knuckle fighters. His wife seldom saw him at their house in Petty France (close to St James's Park), because he was either at work or wandering the city. Yet his brilliance shines out from everything he wrote. Hazlitt's experience as a reporter was to make him one of the finest political commentators of that or any age. His first parliamentary sketch is typical of what was to follow, in its merciless description of the puffed-up but ineloquent Marquis Wellesley 'in the full career of his subject, and never advancing a jot the nearer; seeming to utter volumes in every word, and yet saying nothing; retaining the same unabated vehemence of voice and action without anything to excite it; still keeping alive the promise and the expectation of genius without once satisfying it – soaring into mediocrity with adventurous enthusiasm, harrowed up by some plain matter-of-fact, writing with agony under a truism, and launching a commonplace with all the fury of a thunderbolt!’ (Wu iv 21).

He soon moved into theatrical criticism. He went regularly to the theatre in any case, and it was only natural that he enshrine his opinions for the benefit of his readers. It should be borne in mind that theatre was in those days the principal form of entertainment available to people of all classes. The licensed theatres at Drury Lane and Covent Garden could hold up to 3,000 people (an enormous number) and were often packed to the gills. Hazlitt’s drama reviews were collected in 1818 as A View of the English Stage, the greatest book on contemporary theatre of the period, which provides us with unforgettable glimpses of such stars as Edmund Kean as Iago – ‘Perhaps the accomplished hypocrite was never so finely, so adroitly portrayed – a gay, light-hearted monster, a careless, cordial, comfortable villain’ (Wu iii 20) – and Othello (‘He plays it like a gypsy, and not like a Moor’; Wu iii 171); and of John Philip Kemble’s ‘intensity, in the seizing upon some one feeling or idea, in insisting upon it, in never letting it go, and in working it up, with a certain graceful consistency, and conscious grandeur of conception, to a very high degree of pathos or sublimity’ (Wu iii 213).

By the end of the second decade of the new century, Hazlitt was pre-eminent as a popular essayist on a range of topics – philosophy, the performing arts, politics and literature. He had become an all-round journalist. It was not just that he had a delicious prose style, but that his judgements were sharp, brilliantly expressed, and honest. His father had trained him always to speak as he felt, regardless of consequence, and he did so fearlessly throughout his life. It was to cost him dearly. None of his middle-aged contemporaries enjoyed his reminders of their former radicalism, especially when they accepted sinecures from the Tory government and its supporters. Southey, for instance, cannot have been amused to find Hazlitt saying ‘he has no principles; or he does not himself know what they are’ (Wu iv 85–6), any more than Coleridge can have rejoiced to hear that ‘He belongs to all parties and is of service to none’ (Wu iv 110). These entirely accurate assessments were repeated time and again: Hazlitt reviewed Coleridge’s Lay Sermons not just once, but no less than three times, giving him multiple opportunities to convict his former mentor of betrayal.

For his own part, Hazlitt remained doggedly faithful to his early creed, hero-worshipping Napoleon until the day he died because he saw him as the human embodiment of the principles of the French Revolution. Although such a view may seem absurd to us, Hazlitt’s eye was on the reforms he brought about, and on the effective abolition of monarchy and aristocracy. Such was Hazlitt’s grief at Napoleon’s defeat at Waterloo that he wandered the streets of London drunk and unwashed for weeks after, in the midst of what we would now describe as a nervous breakdown. But he recovered, and the ensuing years would be his most productive: they saw publication of Characters of Shakespeare’s Plays (1817), The Round Table (1817, with Leigh Hunt), Lectures on the English Poets (1818), Lectures on the English Comic Writers (1819), Political Essays (1819), Lectures on the Dramatic Literature of the Age of Elizabeth (1821), Table-Talk (1821–2), Spirit of the Age (1825) and The Plain Speaker (1826). Dependent on writing for his income, he was prolific almost to a fault, yet none of his books could be said to betray the haste with which they were composed.

He ran into trouble in 1823 with Liber Amoris, the confessional memoir of his thwarted infatuation with his landlady’s 19-year-old daughter, Sarah Walker. The affair led him to divorce his wife even though Sarah chose not to marry him – but there was no need for him to compound his misfortunes by publishing a blow-by-blow account, exposing not just Sarah’s flirtatiousness, but his slavish obsession with her. To have done so was typical: he had been trained to observe human behaviour with the disinterestedness of a scientist, and to record what he saw as honestly as he could. In Liber Amoris that clear-sightedness is taken to its apogee. In the pages of one of the most extraordinary books to come out of the Romantic period, Hazlitt was as unsparing of his own weaknesses as he was of his contemporaries’. His honest rendering of male desire was a century ahead of its time, and shocked everyone who saw it. It immediately earned him the contempt of literary London, not least the anonymous reviewer of the Tory newspaper John Bull:

The dirty abominations of the raffs of literature are far below notice, but when to innate stupidity, grossness, vulgarity, and impudence are added the most degraded practical sensuality, the most inveterate ignorance, and the most depraved principle, it becomes necessary to take a double view of their abominable struggles against taste, decency, and morality.¹

The onslaught continued, and soon destroyed his reputation. It led him and his publishers to remove his name from title-pages of his books, for fear it would depress sales. Eight years after his death, Wordsworth noted that ‘the wreck of his morals was the ruin of him’ (LY iii 595). What none of his enemies understood was that Liber Amoris was an experiment in objectivity – an attempt to record as dispassionately as possible the twists and turns of a compulsion. As Hazlitt realized, that was something that could be done only at first hand. He remained in disgrace with the literary world until the early twentieth century, when a new generation of scholars rediscovered his writings and made them available for an audience to whom they spoke more eloquently than ever. Virginia Woolf and Somerset Maugham were among his admirers.

He is represented here by four of his best essays, included here in full: ‘On Gusto’, ‘The Fight’, ‘My First Acquaintance with Poets’ and ‘Mr Coleridge’. The first is central to any discussion of the Romantic imagination. Hazlitt defines gusto as ‘power or passion defining any object’, using the same concepts used by Wordsworth in his note to The Thorn (pp. 518–19). Passion for the Romantics was more than just emotion – it was an intense sympathetic feeling for something external to the self (whether a tree, a flower, a rock, or another human being). It recalls Hazlitt’s philosophical theory of disinterestedness, by which he finds the root of our ability to ‘feel’ for others to be cognate with that to act in our own interests. For him, gusto is indispensable to great art. Titian’s paintings, for instance, are remarkable to Hazlitt for their skin tones, which appear ‘not merely to have the look and texture of flesh, but the feeling in itself’: that is to say, Titian’s depictions seemed capable of physical sensation. And it is not merely that Titian possessed gusto (for how else could he have experienced, and then portrayed, human flesh so vividly?), but that the perceiving mind of the viewer enjoys that same power, in experiencing the ultimate ‘truth’ of the artwork. That conceit, which runs through Hazlitt’s thought, shapes his opinions of literature, painting and theatre. Keats could not have formulated his theory of the chameleon poet without it (see p. 1424).

‘The Fight’ shows Hazlitt’s technique at its best. An amateur sportsman himself, Hazlitt was fascinated, as was Byron, by the art of pugilism – bare-knuckle fighting. There were strict laws against such fights, which meant they were seldom advertised in advance; the news would go round by word of mouth that a certain time and place had been appointed, often outside London. Thousands of people would set out on horseback, in coaches, gigs, carts or on foot, converging on the venue. Sometimes an officer of the law or an alderman would arrive to prohibit the fight from taking place at the spot and the entire show would move on, sometimes for many miles. But that did not happen on this occasion, when Tom Hickman, the 'Gas-man', fought Bill Neate on 11 December 1821, at Hungerford, Berkshire, in front of an audience of 25,000 people. Hazlitt made his way there by a variety of means, including a nine-mile walk on the day of the fight. His essay describes a picaresque journey that brought him into contact with metropolitan characters most of whom are normally excluded from the salubrious confines of the polite essay. These included Jack Randall, the ex-prizefighter who owned the Hole in the Wall tavern in Chancery Lane; John Thurtell, former proprietor of the Black Boy pub in Long Acre, now organizer of 'sporting events' including bear and badger baiting; Joseph Parkes, a friendly lawyer; and a 'tall English yeoman' who kept Hazlitt up all night, chattering endlessly at the Crown Inn at Newbury.

If the essay is concerned partly with prizefighting culture, its centrepiece is Hazlitt's description of the match. At this period, newspaper reports of fights were dry, mechanical and formulaic, giving little idea of what took place. Hazlitt's is a virtuoso display of his art, the like of which had not previously been seen. He even coined a phrase now known to every sports fan in the world: 'In the first round every one thought it was all over' (p. 790). Hazlitt uses his powers of gusto to take us into the boxing ring where we can smell the sawdust, hear the crowd, and feel the impact of the blows as they are landed. Only someone who had studied Titian could have worked out how to do it, for 'The Fight' succeeds in enshrining, like the paintings of the Italian masters, 'passion or power defining any object' – in this case two men slugging it out to the bitter end. The subject of the essay was not only illegal but vulgar, and Hazlitt's editor at first wanted to spike it, describing the entire thing as 'thoroughly blackguard!' ² In the end, though, he was persuaded to run what is now regarded as one of the greatest essays ever written.

'My First Acquaintance with Poets' is probably the most important first-hand testimony to the annus mirabilis of 1797–8, and the aspirations of those involved. Besides providing unique portraits of Wordsworth and Coleridge at the most important moment of their joint creative lives, it describes the effect they had upon young Hazlitt. He was completely seduced by them, and embarked on a week-long walk to where they were resident in Somersetshire in order to get to know them better. The theme of the essay is the enormous promise contained by the young men with which it is concerned, and their implied failure to live up to it. All the same, who could forget the image of Wordsworth with his Cumbrian accent, 'a strong tincture of the northern burr, like the crust on wine', dressed in brown fustian jacket and striped pantaloons? Or the image of Coleridge, running out of an inn, bareheaded, at the sound of thunder, only to be deprived of the rain-shower he so longed for? Those are the images that remind us that the writers in this volume were living, breathing people.

His first acquaintance with Wordsworth and Coleridge was the defining experience of Hazlitt's life. He understood, better than any of his contemporaries, that future ages would look back on the time in which he lived as an extraordinary one – not just for what it achieved, but for what it promised. From the moment he met them it was clear that Wordsworth and Coleridge were the last hope of a revolution derailed by Robespierre and the Terror, their aspirations faithful to those of Condorcet, Rousseau and Voltaire – its intellectual godfathers. Were they to succeed, poetry would no longer be an ornament in the drawing-room but an instrument for political change. Yet by 1823, when Hazlitt composed this brief memoir, it seemed as if those hopes had been abandoned, and as if the oppressive tendencies of the British government had made the emancipation of the poor more remote than ever. And that is why ‘My First Acquaintance’ is as much elegy as celebration.

It was composed in the light of what was widely regarded as Coleridge’s failure to live up to his early promise, something fully explored in ‘Mr Coleridge’ from The Spirit of the Age (1825). One of its arguments is that intellectuals of the time could be categorized as rationalists (Godwin, Malthus) and non-rationalists (Lamb, Southey, Leigh Hunt). Coleridge cuts across such distinctions: he has an unquenchable appetite for philosophy, but is seduced into the interminable vortex of metaphysics. Besides being one of the most poignant of Hazlitt’s essays, ‘Mr Coleridge’ is among his funniest, with its high-speed tour of its subject’s intellectual hobby-horses, designed to suggest that he was a dilettante lacking both sincerity and commitment – ‘the sport of every breath, dancing to every wave’. Its lament is heartfelt: ‘Alas! “Frailty, thy name is Genius!” What has become of all this mighty heap of hope, of thought, of learning, and humanity? It has ended in swallowing doses of oblivion and in writing paragraphs for the Courier. Such, and so little, is the mind of man!’ (p. 813). Coleridge, though endowed with such gifts, has yet achieved little, thanks to opium addiction and a lucrative career as a Tory journalist. Many found that judgement harsh, but it was, in its own way, just. To Hazlitt, Coleridge was born with the potential to change the world for the better, as he had promised when Hazlitt first encountered him in 1798. But he had failed, and that failure was unforgiveable.

Hazlitt placed great hope in his final work, the huge four-volume Life of Napoleon (1826–30). It was largely quarried from the work of others, but those passages by Hazlitt bear traces of his distinctive genius. He died in 1830 having just completed it, destitute, but with his old friend, Charles Lamb, at his side. He was 52.

From The Round Table (1817)

Gusto in art is power or passion defining any object. It is not so difficult to explain this term in what relates to expression (of which it may be said to be the highest degree), as in what relates to things without expression, to the natural appearances of objects, as mere colour or form. In one sense, however, there is hardly any object entirely devoid of expression, without some character of power belonging to it, some precise association with pleasure or pain. And it is in giving this truth of character from the truth of feeling, whether in the highest or the lowest degree (but always in the highest degree of which the subject is capable), that gusto consists.

There is a gusto in the colouring of Titian.² Not only do his heads seem to think, his bodies seem to feel. This is what the Italians mean by the *morbidezza*³ of his flesh colour. It seems sensitive and alive all over – not merely to have the look and texture of flesh, but the feeling in itself. For example, the limbs of his female figures have a luxurious softness and delicacy, which appears conscious of the pleasure of the beholder. As the objects themselves in nature would produce an impression on the sense – distinct from every other object, and having something divine in it which the heart owns and the imagination consecrates – the objects in the picture preserve the same impression, absolute, unimpaired, stamped with all the truth of passion, the pride of the eye, and the charm of beauty. Rubens⁴ makes his flesh colour like flowers; Albani's⁵ is like ivory – Titian's is like flesh, and like nothing else. It is as different from that of other painters, as the skin is from a piece of white or red drapery thrown over it. The blood circulates here and there, the blue veins just appear, the rest is distinguished throughout only by that sort of tingling sensation to the eye, which the body feels within itself. This is gusto.

Van Dyck's⁶ flesh colour, though it has great truth and purity, wants gusto. It has not the internal character, the living principle in it. It is a smooth surface, not a warm, moving mass. It is painted without passion, with indifference. The hand only has been concerned. The impression slides off from the eye, and does not, like the tones of Titian's pencil, leave a sting behind it in the mind of the spectator. The eye does not acquire a taste or appetite for what it sees. In a word, gusto in painting is where the impression made on one sense excites by affinity those of another.

Michelangelo's⁷ forms are full of gusto. They everywhere obtrude⁸ the sense of power upon the eye. His limbs convey an idea of muscular strength, of moral grandeur, and even of intellectual dignity; they are firm, commanding, broad and massy, capable of executing with ease the determined purposes of the will. His faces have no other expression than his figures, conscious power and capacity. They appear only to think what they shall do, and to know that they can do it. This is what is meant by saying that his style is hard and masculine; it is the reverse of Correggio's,⁹ which is effeminate. That is, the gusto of Michelangelo consists in expressing energy of will without proportionable sensibility; Correggio's in expressing exquisite sensibility without energy of will. In Correggio's faces as well as figures we see neither bones nor muscles, but then what a soul is there, full of sweetness and of grace – pure, playful, soft, angelical! There is sentiment enough in a hand painted by Correggio to set up a school of history painters. Whenever we look at the hands of Correggio's women, or of Raphael's,¹⁰ we always wish to touch them.

Again, Titian's landscapes have a prodigious gusto, both in the colouring and forms. We shall never forget one that we saw many years ago in the Orleans Gallery¹¹ of Actaeon hunting.¹² The colour of stone. The winds seemed to sing through the rustling branches of the trees, and already you might hear the twanging of bow^{16, 13} we understand, has this landscape; he will know if this description of it is just.)

The landscape background of the St Peter Martyr¹⁴ is another well-known instance of the power of this great painter to give a romantic interest and an appropriate character to the objects of his pencil, where every circumstance adds to the effect of the scene: the bold trunks of the tall forest trees, the trailing ground plants, with that cold convent spire rising in the distance amidst the blue sapphire mountains and the golden sky.

Claude's¹⁹ landscapes, perfect as they are, want gusto. This is not easy to explain. They are perfect abstractions of the visible images of things; they speak the visible language of nature truly. They resemble a mirror or a microscope. To the eye only they are more perfect than any other landscapes that ever were or will be painted. They give more of nature as cognizable by one sense alone, but they lay an equal stress on all visible impressions; they do not interpret one sense by another; they do not distinguish the character of different objects as we are taught (and can only be taught) to distinguish them by their effect on the different senses. That is, his eye wanted imagination; it did not strongly sympathize with his other faculties. He saw the atmosphere but he did not feel it. He painted the trunk of a tree or a rock in the foreground as smooth, with as complete an abstraction of the gross, tangible impression, as any other part of the picture; his trees are perfectly beautiful, but quite immovable – they have a look of enchantment. In short, his landscapes are unequalled imitations of nature, released from its subjection to the elements – as if all objects were become a delightful fairy vision, and the eye had rarefied and refined away the other senses.

The gusto in the Greek statues is of a very singular kind. The sense of perfect form nearly occupies the whole mind, and hardly suffers it to dwell on any other feeling. It seems enough for them to be, without acting or suffering. Their forms are ideal, spiritual. Their beauty is power. By their beauty they are raised above the frailties of pain or passion; by their beauty they are deified.²⁰

The infinite quantity of dramatic invention in Shakespeare takes from his gusto. The power he delights to show is not intense, but discursive. He never insists on anything as much as he might, except a quibble. Milton has great gusto. He repeats his blow twice, grapples with and exhausts his subject. His imagination has a double relish of its objects, an inveterate attachment to the things he describes, and to the words describing them:

Or where Chineses drive
With sails and wind their cany waggons light...

Wild above rule or art, enormous bliss.²¹
There is a gusto in Pope's compliments, in Dryden's satires, and Prior's tales. And among prose writers, Boccaccio and Rabelais had the most of it. We will only mention one other work which appears to us to be full of gusto, and that is The Beggar's Opera.²² If it is not, we are altogether mistaken in our notions on this delicate subject.

On Gusto

¹ First published in The Examiner, 26 May 1816.

² Titian Tiziano Vecellio (c.1490–1576), Venetian painter whose work Hazlitt greatly admired.

³ morbidezza softness.

⁴ Peter Paul Rubens (1577–1640), Flemish painter whose work Hazlitt also saw in Paris in 1802.

⁵ Francesco Albani (1578–1660), painter of the school of Bologna.

⁷ Michelangelo Buonarroti (1475–1564), Italian painter, sculptor, architect.

⁸ obtrude impose, thrust forth.

⁹ Antonio Allegri da Correggio (1494–1534), eminent Italian painter.

¹⁰ Raffaello Santi (1483–1520), Renaissance artist.

¹¹ Orleans Gallery exhibition of Italian old masters, so called because most of them came from the collection of the Duke of Orléans in Paris, and were placed on sale in Pall Mall, December 1798, remaining there until July 1799. Hazlitt would never forget them.

12 Actaeon hunting Titian's Diana and Actaeon. Actaeon was a hunter who came upon the naked Diana bathing with her train of nymphs on Mount Cithaeron; she turned him into a stag and he was devoured by his own hounds. Hazlitt is referring to Titian's 'Diana and Actaeon', which depicts Actaeon's discovery of Diana and her attendants in the forest, now at the Scottish National Gallery in Edinburgh.

13 Benjamin West (1738–1820), historical painter born in America, who succeeded Reynolds as President of the Royal Academy in 1792.

14 the St Peter Martyr Hazlitt saw this painting at the Louvre, 1802, and again in Venice in 1825. It was painted as an altarpiece for the great Venetian church, Santi Giovanni e Paolo, and was Titian's most famous and widely admired picture until it was destroyed by fire in 1867.

15 Rembrandt van Rijn (1606–69), Dutch painter.

16 burgomaster chief magistrate of a Dutch town, equivalent to a mayor in England.

17 it is of the first water i.e. it is so well painted that you can tell the quality of the stone. 'Water' is the measure of the quality of a diamond.

18 He was not...Arcadians i.e. he didn't like the countryside. 'Raphael not only could not paint a landscape; he could not paint people in a landscape. He could not have painted the heads or the figures, or even the dresses of the St Peter Martyr. His figures have always an indoor look – that is, a set, determined, voluntary, dramatic character, arising from their own passions, or a watchfulness of those of others, and want that wild uncertainty of expression which is connected with the accidents of nature and the changes of the elements. He has nothing romantic about him' (Hazlitt's note).

The Fight

From The New Monthly Magazine (February 1822)

— The fight, the fight’s the thing,

*Wherein I’ll catch the conscience of the king.*¹

Where there’s a will, there’s a way. – I said so to myself, as I walked down Chancery Lane, about half-past six o’clock on Monday the 10th of December, to inquire at Jack Randall’s² where the fight the next day was to be; and I found ‘the proverb’ nothing ‘musty’³ in the present instance. I was determined to see this fight, come what would, and see it I did, in great style. It was my first fight, yet it more than answered my expectations. Ladies! it is to you I dedicate this description; nor let it seem out of character for the fair to notice the exploits of the brave. Courage and modesty are the old English virtues; and may they never look cold and askance on one another! Think, ye fairest of the fair, loveliest of the lovely kind, ye practisers of soft enchantment, how many more ye kill with poisoned baits than ever fell in the ring; and listen with subdued air and without shuddering, to a tale tragic only in appearance, and sacred to the FANCY!⁴

I was going down Chancery Lane, thinking to ask at Jack Randall's where the fight was to be, when looking through the glass door of the Hole in the Wall, I heard a gentleman asking the same question at Mrs Randall, as the author of *Waverley*⁵ would express it. Now Mrs Randall stood answering the gentlemen's question, with the authenticity of the lady of the Champion of the Light Weights. Thinks I, I'll wait till this person comes out, and learn from him how it is. For to say a truth, I was not fond of going into this house to call for heroes and philosophers, ever since the owner of it (for Jack is no gentleman) threatened once upon a time to kick me out of doors for wanting a mutton chop at his hospitable board, when the conqueror in thirteen battles was more full of *blue ruin*⁶ than of good manners. I was the more mortified at this repulse, inasmuch as I had heard Mr James Simpkins, hosier in the Strand, one day when the character of the Hole in the Wall was brought in question, observe, 'The house is a very good house, and the company quite genteel: I have been there myself!'

Remembering this unkind treatment of mine host, to which mine hostess was also a party, and not wishing to put her in unquiet thoughts at a time jubilant like the present, I waited at the door when who should issue forth but my friend Jo. Toms,⁷ and turning suddenly up Chancery Lane with that quick jerk and impatient stride which distinguishes a lover of the FANCY, I said, 'I'll be hanged if that fellow is not going to the fight, and is on his way to get me to go with him.' So it proved in effect, and we agreed to adjourn to my lodgings to discuss measures with that cordiality which makes old friends like new, and new friends like old, on great occasions. We are cold to others only when we are dull in ourselves, and have neither thoughts nor feelings to impart to them. Give a man a topic in his head, a throb of pleasure in his heart, and he will be glad to share it with the first person he meets. Toms and I, though we seldom meet, were an alter idem on this memorable occasion, and had not an idea that we did not candidly impart; and 'so carelessly did we fleet the time',⁸ that I wish no better, when there is another fight, than to have him for a companion on my journey down, and to return with my friend Jack Pigott,⁹ talking of what was to happen or of what did happen, with a noble subject always at hand, and liberty to digress to others whenever they offered. Indeed, on my repeating the lines from Spenser in an involuntary fit of enthusiasm,

What more felicity can fall to creature,

Than to enjoy delight with liberty?¹⁰

my last-named ingenious friend stopped me by saying that this, translated into the vulgate, meant ‘Going to see a fight’.

Jo. Toms and I could not settle about the method of going down. He said there was a caravan, he understood, to start from Tom Belcher’s¹¹ at two, which would go there right out and back again the next day. Now I never travel all night, and said I should get a cast¹² to Newbury by one of the mails. Jo. swore the thing was impossible, and I could only answer that I had made up my mind to it. In short, he seemed to me to waver, said he only came to see if I was going, had letters to write, a cause coming on the day after, and faintly said at parting (for I was bent on setting out that moment) – ‘Well, we meet at Philippi!’¹³ I made the best of my way to Piccadilly. The mail-coach stand was bare. ‘They are all gone’, said I – ‘this is always the way with me – in the instant I lose the future – if I had not stayed to pour out that last cup of tea, I should have been just in time’ – and cursing my folly and ill-luck together, without inquiring at the coach-office whether the mails were gone or not, I walked on in despite, and to punish my own dilatoriness and want of determination. At any rate, I would not turn back: I might get to Hounslow, or perhaps farther, to be on my road the next morning. I passed Hyde Park Corner (my Rubicon), and trusted to fortune.

Suddenly I heard the clattering of a Brentford stage, and the fight rushed full upon my fancy. I argued (not unwisely) that even a Brentford coachman was better company than my own thoughts (such as they were just then), and at his invitation mounted the box with him. I immediately stated my case to him – namely, my quarrel with myself for missing the Bath or Bristol mail, and my determination to get on in consequence as well as I could, without any disparagement or insulting comparison between longer or shorter stages. It is a maxim with me that stage-coaches, and consequently stage-coachmen, are respectable in proportion to the distance they have to travel: so I said nothing on that subject to my

Brentford friend. Any incipient tendency to an abstract proposition, or (as he might have construed it) to a personal reflection of this kind, was however nipped in the bud; for I had no sooner declared indignantly that I had missed the mails, than he flatly denied that they were gone along, and lo! at the instant three of them drove by in rapid, provoking, orderly succession, as if they would devour the ground before them. Here again I seemed in the contradictory situation of the man in Dryden who exclaims,

I follow Fate, which does too hard pursue!¹⁴

If I had stopped to inquire at the White Horse Cellar, which would not have taken me a minute, I should now have been driving down the road in all the dignified unconcern and ideal perfection of mechanical conveyance. The Bath mail I had set my mind upon, and I had missed it, as I missed everything else, by my own absurdity, in putting the will for the deed, and aiming at ends without employing means. ‘Sir’, said he of the Brentford, ‘the Bath mail will be up presently, my brother-in-law drives it, and I will engage to stop him if there is a place empty.’ I almost doubted my good genius; but, sure enough, up it drove like lightning, and stopped directly at the call of the Brentford Jehu.¹⁵ I would not have believed this possible, but the brother-in-law of a mail-coach driver is himself no mean man. I was transferred without loss of time from the top of one coach to that of the other, desired the guard to pay my fare to the Brentford coachman for me as I had no change, was accommodated with a great coat, put up my umbrella to keep off a drizzling mist, and we began to cut through the air like an arrow.

The milestones disappeared one after another, the rain kept off; Tom Turtle, the trainer,¹⁶ sat before me on the coach-box, with whom I exchanged civilities as a gentleman going to the fight; the passion that had transported me an hour before was subdued to pensive regret and conjectural musing on the next day’s battle; I was promised a place inside at Reading, and upon the whole, I thought myself a lucky fellow. Such is the force of imagination! On the outside of any other coach on the 10th of December with a Scotch mist drizzling through the cloudy moonlight air, I should have been cold, comfortless, impatient, and, no doubt, wet through; but seated on the Royal mail, I felt warm and comfortable, the air did me good, the ride did me good, I was pleased with the progress we had made, and confident that all would go well through the journey.

When I got inside at Reading, I found Turtle and a stout valetudinarian, whose costume bespoke him one of the FANCY, and who had risen from a three months' sick-bed to get into the mail to see the fight. They were intimate, and we fell into a lively discourse. My friend the trainer was confined in his topics to fighting-dogs and men, to bears and badgers; beyond this he was 'quite chap-fallen',¹⁷ had not a word to throw at a dog, or indeed very wisely fell asleep, when any other game was started. The whole art of training (I, however, learnt from him) consists in two things, exercise and abstinence, abstinence and exercise, repeated alternately and without end. A yolk of an egg with a spoonful of rum in it is the first thing in a morning, and then a walk of six miles till breakfast. This meal consists of a plentiful supply of tea and toast and beef-steaks. Then another six or seven miles till dinner-time, and another supply of solid beef or mutton with a pint of porter, and perhaps, at the utmost, a couple of glasses of sherry. Martin trains on water,¹⁸ but this increases his infirmity on another very dangerous side. The Gas-man takes now and then a chirping glass (under the rose) to console him, during a six weeks' probation, for the absence of Mrs Hickman – an agreeable woman, with (I understand) a pretty fortune of two hundred pounds.

How matter presses on me! What stubborn things are facts! How inexhaustible is nature and art! 'It is well', as I once heard Mr Richmond observe,¹⁹ 'to see a variety.' He was speaking of cockfighting as an edifying spectacle. I cannot deny but that one learns more of what is (I do not say of what ought to be) in this desultory mode of practical study, than from reading the same book twice over, even though it should be a moral treatise. Where was I? I was sitting at dinner with the candidate for the honours of the ring, 'where good digestion waits on appetite, and health on both'.²⁰ Then follows an hour of social chat and native glee;²¹ and afterwards, to another breathing over heathy hill or dale. Back to supper, and then to bed, and up by six again – Our hero

Follows so the ever-running sun,

With profitable ardour²² –

to the day that brings him victory or defeat in the green fairy circle. Is not this life more sweet than mine?²³ I was going to say; but I will not libel any life by comparing it to mine, which is (at the date of these presents) bitter as coloquintida²⁴ and the dregs of aconitum!

The invalid in the Bath mail soared a pitch above the trainer, and did not sleep so sound, because he had ‘more figures and more fantasies’.²⁵ We talked the hours away merrily. He had faith in surgery,²⁶ for he had had three ribs set right, that had been broken in a turn-up at Belcher’s, but thought physicians old women, for they had no antidote in their catalogue for brandy. An indigestion is an excellent commonplace for two people that never met before. By way of ingratiating myself, I told him the story of my doctor who, on my earnestly representing to him that I thought his regimen had done me harm, assured me that the whole pharmacopeia contained nothing comparable to the prescription he had given me; and, as a proof of his undoubted efficacy, said that ‘he had had one gentleman with my complaint under his hands for the last fifteen years’. This anecdote made my companion shake the rough sides of his three greatcoats with boisterous laughter; and Turtle, starting out of his sleep, swore he knew how the fight would go, for he had had a dream about it. Sure enough, the rascal told us how the three first rounds went off, but ‘his dream’, like others, ‘denoted a foregone conclusion’.²⁷ He knew his men.

The moon now rose in silver state, and I ventured, with some hesitation, to point out this object of placid beauty, with the blue serene beyond, to the man of science, to which his ear he ‘seriously inclined’,²⁸ the more as it gave promise *d’un beau jour*²⁹ for the morrow, and showed the ring undrenched by envious showers, arrayed in sunny smiles. Just then, all going on well, I thought on my friend Toms, whom I had left behind, and said innocently, ‘There was a blockhead of a fellow I left in town, who said there was no possibility of getting down by the mail, and talked of going by a caravan from Belcher’s at two in the morning, after he had written some letters.’ ‘Why’, said he of the lapels, ‘I should not wonder if that was the very person we saw running about like mad from one coach-door to another, and asking if anyone had seen a friend of his, a gentleman going to the fight, whom he had missed stupidly enough by staying to write a note.' 'Pray sir', said my fellow-traveller, 'he had a plaid cloak on?' – 'Why, no', said I, 'not at the time I left him, but he very well might afterwards, for he offered to lend me one.' The plaid cloak and the letter decided the thing. Joe, sure enough, was in the Bristol mail, which preceded us by about fifty yards. This was droll enough.

We had now but a few miles to our place of destination, and the first thing I did on alighting at Newbury, both coaches stopping at the same time, was to call out, 'Pray, is there a gentleman in that mail of the name of Toms?' 'No', said Joe, borrowing something of the vein of Gilpin, 'for I have just got out.' 'Well!' says he, 'this is lucky; but you don't know how vexed I was to miss you; for', added he, lowering his voice, 'do you know when I left you I went to Belcher's to ask about the caravan, and Mrs Belcher said very obligingly, she couldn't tell about that, but there were two gentlemen who had taken places by the mail and were gone on in a landau, and she could frank us. It's a pity I didn't meet with you; we could then have got down for nothing. But mum's the word.' It's the devil for anyone to tell me a secret, for it is sure to come out in print. I do not care so much to gratify a friend, but the public ear is too great a temptation to me.

Our present business was to get beds and a supper at an inn; but this was no easy task. The public houses were full, and where you saw a light at a private house, and people poking their heads out of the casement to see what was going on, they instantly put them in and shut the window, the moment you seemed advancing with a suspicious overture for accommodation. Our guard and coachman thundered away at the outer gate of the Crown for some time without effect – such was the greater noise within; – and when the doors were unbarred, and we got admittance, we found a party assembled in the kitchen round a good hospitable fire, some sleeping, others drinking, others talking on politics and on the fight. A tall English yeoman (something like Matthews in the face,³⁰ and quite as great a wag) – was making such a prodigious noise about rent and taxes, and the price of corn now and formerly, that he had prevented us from being heard at the gate. The first thing I heard him say was to a shuffling fellow who wanted to be off a bet for a shilling glass of brandy and water – ‘Confound it, man, don’t be insipid!’ Thinks I, that is a good phrase. It was a good omen. He kept it up so all night, nor flinched with the approach of morning. He was a fine fellow, with sense, wit, and spirit, a hearty body and a joyous mind, free-spoken, frank, convivial – one of that true English breed that went with Harry the Fifth to the siege of Harfleur – ‘standing like greyhounds on the slips’,³² etc.

We ordered tea and eggs (beds were soon found to be out of the question) and this fellow’s conversation was sauce piquante. It did one’s heart good to see him brandish his oaken towel and to hear him talk. He made mincemeat of a drunken, stupid, red-faced, quarrelsome, frowsy farmer, whose nose ‘he moralised into a thousand similes’,³³ making it out a firebrand like Bardolph’s.³⁴ ‘I’ll tell you what, my friend’, says he, ‘the landlady has only to keep you here to save fire and candle. If one was to touch your nose, it would go off like a piece of charcoal.’ At this the other only grinned like an idiot, the sole variety in his purple face being his little peering grey eyes and yellow teeth; called for another glass, swore he would not stand it; and after many attempts to provoke his humorous antagonist to single combat, which the other turned off (after working him up to a ludicrous pitch of choler) with great adroitness, he fell quietly asleep with a glass of liquor in his hand, which he could not lift to his head. His laughing persecutor made a speech over him, and turning to the opposite side of the room, where they were all sleeping in the midst of this ‘loud and furious fun’,³⁵ said, ‘There’s a scene, by God, for Hogarth to paint. I think he and Shakespeare were our two best men at copying life!’ This confirmed me in my good opinion of him. Hogarth, Shakespeare, and Nature, were just enough for him (indeed for any man) to know. I said, ‘You read Cobbett,³⁶ don’t you? At least’, says I, ‘you talk just as well as he writes.’ He seemed to doubt this. But I said, ‘We have an hour to spare: if you’ll get pen, ink and paper, and keep on talking, I’ll write down what you say; and if it doesn't make a capital Political Register, I'll forfeit my head. You have kept me alive tonight, however. I don't know what I should have done without you.' He did not dislike this view of the thing, nor my asking if he was not about the size of Jem Belcher; and told me soon afterwards, in the confidence of friendship, that 'the circumstance which had given him nearly the greatest concern in his life, was Cribb's beating Jem³⁷ after he had lost his eye by racket-playing.'

The morning dawns; that dim but yet clear light appears, which weighs like solid bars of metal on the sleepless eyelids; the guests drop down from their chambers one by one – but it was too late to think of going to bed now (the clock was on the stroke of seven), we had nothing for it but to find a barber's (the pole that glittered in the morning sun lighted us to his shop), and then a nine miles' march to Hungerford. The day was fine, the sky was blue, the mists were retiring from the marshy ground, the path was tolerably dry, the sitting-up all night had not done us much harm – at least the cause was good; we talked of this and that with amicable difference, roving and sipping of many subjects, but still invariably we returned to the fight. At length, a mile to the left of Hungerford, on a gentle eminence, we saw the ring surrounded by covered carts, gigs, and carriages, of which hundreds had passed us on the road; Toms gave a youthful shout, and we hastened down a narrow lane to the scene of action.

Reader! have you ever seen a fight? If not, you have a pleasure to come, at least if it is a fight like that between the Gas-man and Bill Neate. The crowd was very great when we arrived on the spot; open carriages were coming up, with streamers flying and music playing, and the country-people were pouring in over hedge and ditch in all directions, to see their hero beat or be beaten. The odds were still on Gas, but only about five to four. Gully³⁸ had been down to try Neate, and had backed him considerably, which was a damper to the sanguine confidence of the adverse party. About two hundred thousand pounds were pending. The Gas says, he has lost £3,000 which were promised him by different gentlemen if he had won. He had presumed too much on himself, which had made others presume on him. This spirited and formidable young fellow seems to have taken for his motto the old maxim, that 'there are three things necessary to success in life – *Impudence! Impudence! Impudence!*³⁹ It is so in matters of opinion, but not in the Fancy, which is the most practical of all things, though even here confidence is half the battle, but only half. Our friend had vapoured and swaggered too much, as if he wanted to grin and bully his adversary out of the fight. ‘Alas! the Bristol man was not so tamed!’⁴⁰ – ‘This is the grave digger’ (would Tom Hickman exclaim in the moments of intoxication from gin and success, showing his tremendous right hand), ‘this will send many of them to their long homes; I haven’t done with them yet!’ Why should he – though he had licked four of the best men within the hour, yet why should he threaten to inflict dishonourable chastisement on my old master Richmond, a veteran going off the stage, and who has borne his sable honours meekly? Magnanimity, my dear Tom, and bravery, should be inseparable. Or why should he go up to his antagonist, the first time he ever saw him at the Fives⁴¹ Court, and measuring him from head to foot with a glance of contempt, as Achilles surveyed Hector,⁴² say to him, ‘What, are you Bill Neate? I’ll knock more blood out of that great carcass of thine, this day fortnight, than you ever knock’d out of a bullock’s!’ It was not manly, ’twas not fighter-like. If he was sure of the victory (as he was not), the less said about it the better. Modesty should accompany the Fancy as its shadow. The best men were always the best behaved. Jem Belcher, the Game Chicken⁴³ (before whom the Gas-man could not have lived) were civil, silent men. So is Cribb, so is Tom Belcher, the most elegant of sparrers, and not a man for every one to take by the nose. I enlarged on this topic in the mail (while Turtle was asleep), and said very wisely (as I thought) that impertinence was a part of no profession. A boxer was bound to beat his man, but not to thrust his fist, either actually or by implication, in everyone’s face. Even a highwayman, in the way of trade, may blow out your brains, but if he uses foul language at the same time, I should say he was no gentleman. A boxer, I would infer, need not be a blackguard or a coxcomb, more than another. Perhaps I press this point too much on a fallen man – Mr Thomas Hickman has by this time learnt that first of all lessons, ‘That man was made to mourn’.⁴⁴ He has lost nothing by the late fight but his presumption; and that every man may do as well without! By an over-display of this quality, however, the public has been prejudiced against him, and the knowing-ones were taken in. Few but those who had bet on him wished Gas to win. With my own prepossessions on the subject, the result of the 11th of December appeared to me as fine a piece of poetical justice as I had ever witnessed. The difference of weight between the two combatants (14 stone to 12) was nothing to the sporting men. Great, heavy, clumsy, long-armed Bill Neate kicked the beam in the scale of the Gas-man's vanity. The amateurs were frightened at his big words, and thought that they would make up for the difference of six feet and five feet nine. Truly, the FANCY are not men of imagination. They judge of what has been, and cannot conceive of anything that is to be. The Gas-man had won hitherto; therefore he must beat a man half as big again as himself – and that to a certainty. Besides, there are as many feuds, factions, prejudices, pedantic notions in the FANCY as in the state or in the schools. Mr Gully is almost the only cool, sensible man among them, who exercises an unbiased discretion, and is not a slave to his passions in these matters. But enough of reflections, and to our tale. The day, as I have said, was fine for a December morning. The grass was wet and the ground miry, and ploughed up with multitudinous feet, except that, within the ring itself, there was a spot of virgin-green closed in and unprofaned by vulgar tread, that shone with dazzling brightness in the midday sun. For it was noon now, and we had an hour to wait. This is the trying time. It is then the heart sickens, as you think what the two champions are about, and how short a time will determine their fate. After the first blow is struck, there is no opportunity for nervous apprehensions; you are swallowed up in the immediate interest of the scene – but

Between the acting of a dreadful thing
And the first motion, all the interim is

Like a phantasma, or a hideous dream.⁴⁵

I found it so as I felt the sun's rays clinging to my back, and saw the white wintry clouds sink below the verge of the horizon. So, I thought, my fairest hopes have faded from my side! – so will the Gas-man's glory, or that of his adversary, vanish in an hour.

The swells were parading in their white box-coats, the outer ring was cleared with some bruises on the heads and shins of the rustic assembly

(for the cockneys had been distanced by the sixty-six miles); the time drew near, I had got a good stand; a bustle, a buzz, ran through the crowd, and from the opposite side entered Neate, between his second and bottle-holder. He rolled along, swathed in his loose greatcoat, his knock-knees bending under his huge bulk; and, with a modest cheerful air, threw his hat into the ring. He then just looked round, and began quietly to undress; when from the other side there was a similar rush and an opening made, and the Gas-man came forward with a conscious air of anticipated triumph, too much like the cock-of-the-walk. He strutted about more than became a hero, sucked oranges with a supercilious air, and threw away the skin with a toss of his head, and went up and looked at Neate, which was an act of supererogation. The only sensible thing he did was, as he strode away from the modern Ajax, to fling out his arms, as if he wanted to try whether they would do their work that day. By this time they had stripped, and presented a strong contrast in appearance. If Neate was like Ajax, ‘with Atlantean shoulders, fit to bear’⁴⁶ the pugilistic reputation of all Bristol, Hickman might be compared to Diomed, light, vigorous, elastic, and his back glistened in the sun, as he moved about, like a panther’s hide. There was now a dead pause – attention was awestruck. Who at that moment, big with a great event, did not draw his breath short – did not feel his heart throb? All was ready. They tossed up for the sun, and the Gas-man won. They were lead up to the scratch – shook hands, and went at it.

In the first round everyone thought it was all over. After making play a short time, the Gas-man flew at his adversary like a tiger, struck five blows in as many seconds, three first, and then following him as he staggered back, two more, right and left, and down he fell, a mighty ruin. There was a shout, and I said, ‘There is no standing this.’ Neate seemed like a lifeless lump of flesh and bone, round which the Gas-man’s blows played with the rapidity of electricity or lighting, and you imagined he would only be lifted up to be knocked down again. It was as if Hickman held a sword or a fire in that right hand of his, and directed it against an unarmed body. They met again, and Neate seemed not cowed but particularly cautious. I saw his teeth clenched together and his brows knit close against the sun. He held out both his arms at full length straight before him, like two sledge-hammers, and raised his left an inch or two higher. The Gas-man could not get over this guard – they struck mutually and fell, but without advantage on either side. It was the same in the next round; but the balance of power was thus restored – the fate of the battle was suspended. No one could tell how it would end. This was the only moment in which opinion was divided; for, in the next, the Gas-man aiming a mortal blow at his adversary's neck with his right hand, and failing from the length he had to reach, the other returned it with his left at full swing, planted a tremendous blow on his cheekbone and eyebrow, and made a red ruin of that side of his face. The Gas-man went down, and there was another shout – a roar of triumph as the waves of fortune rolled tumultuously from side to side. This was a settler. Hickman got up and 'grinned horrible a ghastly smile',⁴⁷ yet he was evidently dashed in his opinion of himself; it was the first time he had ever been so punished; all one side of his face was perfect scarlet, and his right eye was closed in dingy blackness, as he advanced to the fight, less confident, but still determined. After one or two rounds, not receiving another such remembrancer, he rallied and went at it with his former impetuosity. But in vain. His strength had been weakened – his blows could not tell at such a distance – he was obliged to fling himself at his adversary, and could not strike from his feet; and almost as regularly as he flew at him with his right hand, Neate warded the blow, or drew back out of its reach, and felled him with the return of his left. There was little cautious sparring – no half-hits – no tapping and trifling, none of the petit-maîtréship of the art – they were almost all knock-down blows: – the fight was a good stand-up fight.

The wonder was the half-minute-time. If there had been a minute or more allowed between each round, it would have been intelligible how they should by degrees recover strength and resolution; but to see two men smashed to the ground, smeared with gore, stunned, senseless, the breath beaten out of their bodies; and then, before you recover from the shock, to see them rise up with new strength and courage, stand steady to inflict or receive mortal offence, and rush upon each other 'like two clouds over the Caspian'⁴⁸ – this is the most astonishing thing of all: – this is the high and heroic state of man!

From this time forward the event became more certain every round; and about the twelfth it seemed as if it must have been over. Hickman

generally stood with his back to me; but in the scuffle he had changed positions, and Neate just then made a tremendous lunge at him, and hit him full in the face. It was doubtful whether he would fall backwards or forwards; he hung suspended for a second or two, and then fell back, throwing his hands in the air, and with his face lifted up to the sky. I never saw anything more terrific than his aspect just before he fell. All traces of life, of natural expression, were gone from him. His face was like a human skull, a death's head, spouting blood. The eyes were filled with blood, the nose streamed with blood, the mouth gaped blood. He was not like an actual man, but like a preternatural, spectral appearance, or like one of the figures in Dante's Inferno. Yet he fought on after this for several rounds, still striking the first desperate blow, and Neate standing on the defensive, and using the same cautious guard to the last, as if he had still all his work to do; and it was not till the Gas-man was so stunned in the seventeenth or eighteenth round, that his senses forsook him, and he could not come to time, that the battle was declared over.⁴⁹ Ye who despise the Fancy, do something to show as much pluck, or as much self-possession as this, before you assume a superiority which you have never given a single proof of by any one action in the whole course of your lives! – When the Gas-man came to himself, the first words he uttered were, ‘Where am I? What is the matter!’ ‘Nothing is the matter, Tom – you have lost the battle, but you are the bravest man alive.’ And Jackson⁵⁰ whispered to him, ‘I am collecting a purse for you, Tom.’ – Vain sounds, and unheard at that moment! Neate instantly went up and shook him cordially by the hand, and seeing some old acquaintance, began to flourish with his fists, calling out, ‘Ah! you always said I couldn't fight – What do you think now?’ But all in good humour, and without any appearance of arrogance; only it was evident Bill Neate was pleased that he had won the fight. When it was over, I asked Cribb if he did not think it was a good one? He said, ‘Pretty well!’ The carrier-pigeons now mounted into the air, and one of them flew with the news of her husband's victory to the bosom of Mrs Neate. Alas, for Mrs Hickman! –

Mais au revoir, as Sir Fopling Flutter says.⁵¹ I went down with Toms; I returned with Jack Pigott, whom I met on the ground. Toms is a rattle-brain; Pigott is a sentimentalist. Now, under favour, I am a sentimentalist too – therefore I say nothing, but that the interest of the excursion did not flag as I came back. Pigott and I marched along the causeway leading from Hungerford to Newbury, now observing the effect of a brilliant sun on the tawny meads or moss-coloured cottages, now exulting in the fight, now digressing to some topic of general and elegant literature. My friend was dressed in character for the occasion, or like one of the FANCY; that is, with a double portion of greatcoats, clogs, and overalls: and just as we had agreed with a couple of country lads to carry his superfluous wearing-apparel to the next town, we were overtaken by a return post-chaise, into which I got, Pigott preferring a seat on the bar. There were two strangers already in the chaise, and on their observing they supposed I had been to the fight, I said I had, and concluded they had done the same. They appeared, however, a little shy and sore on the subject; and it was not till after several hints dropped, and questions put, that it turned out that they had missed it. One of these friends had undertaken to drive the other there in his gig: they had set out, to make sure work, the day before at three in the afternoon. The owner of the one-horse vehicle scorned to ask his way, and drove right on to Bagshot, instead of turning off at Hounslow: there they stopped all night, and set off the next day across the country to Reading, from whence they took coach, and got down within a mile or two of Hungerford, just half an hour after the fight was over. This might be safely set down as one of the miseries of human life.

We parted with these two gentlemen who had been to see the fight, but had returned as they went, at Wolhampton, where we were promised beds (an irresistible temptation, for Pigott had passed the preceding night at Hungerford as we had done at Newbury), and we turned into an old bow-windowed parlour with a carpet and a snug fire; and after devouring a quantity of tea, toast, and eggs, sat down to consider, during an hour of philosophic leisure, what we should have for supper. In the midst of an Epicurean deliberation between a roasted fowl and mutton-chops with mashed potatoes, we were interrupted by an inroad of Goths and Vandals – *O procul este profani*⁵² – not real flash-men, but interlopers, noisy pretenders, butchers from Tothill-fields, brokers from Whitechapel, who called immediately for pipes and tobacco, hoping it would not be disagreeable to the gentlemen, and began to insist that it was a cross.

Pigott withdrew from the smoke and noise into another room, and left me to dispute the point with them for a couple of hours sans intermission by the dial.⁵³

The next morning we rose refreshed; and on observing that Jack had a pocket volume in his hand, in which he read in the intervals of our discourse, I inquired what it was, and learned to my particular satisfaction that it was a volume of the New Eloise. Ladies, after this, will you contend that a love for the FANCY is incompatible with the cultivation of sentiment? – We jogged on as before, my friend setting me up in a genteel drab greatcoat and green silk handkerchief (which I must say became me exceedingly), and after stretching our legs for a few miles, and seeing Jack Randall, Ned Turner, and Scroggins, pass on the top of one of the Bath coaches, we engaged with the driver of the second to take us to London for the usual fee. I got inside, and found three other passengers. One of them was an old gentleman with an aquiline nose, powdered hair, and a pigtail, and who looked as if he had played many a rubber at the Bath rooms. I said to myself, he is very like Mr Windham;⁵⁴ I wish he would enter into conversation, that I might hear what fine observations would come from those finely-turned features. However, nothing passed till, stopping to dine at Reading, some inquiry was made by the company about the fight, and I gave (as the reader may believe) an eloquent and animated description of it. When we got into the coach again, the old gentleman, after a graceful exordium, said he had, when a boy, been to a fight between the famous Broughton and George Stevenson,⁵⁵ who was called the Fighting Coachman, in the year 1770, with the late Mr Windham. This beginning flattered the spirit of prophecy within me, and he riveted my attention. He went on – ‘George Stevenson was coachman to a friend of my father’s. He was an old man when I saw him some years afterwards. He took hold of his own arm and said, “There was muscle here once, but now it is no more than this young gentleman’s.” He added, “Well, no matter; I have been here long, I am willing to go hence, and hope I have done no more harm than another man.” Once’, said my unknown companion, ‘I asked him if he had ever beat Broughton? He said Yes; that he had fought with him three times, and the last time he fairly beat him, though the world did not allow it. “I’ll tell you how it was, master. When the seconds lifted us up in the last round, we were so exhausted that neither of us could stand, and we fell upon one another, and as Master Broughton fell uppermost, the mob gave it in his favour, and he was said to have won the battle. But,” says he, “the fact was, that as his second (John Cuthbert) lifted him up, he said to him, ‘I’ll fight no more, I’ve had enough’; which”, says Stevenson, “you know gave me the victory. And to prove to you that this was the case, when John Cuthbert was on his deathbed, and they asked him if there was anything on his mind which he wished to confess, he answered, ‘Yes, that there was one thing he wished to set right, for that certainly Master Stevenson won that last fight with Master Broughton; for he whispered him as he lifted him up in the last round of all, that he had had enough.’ ” This,’ said the Bath gentleman, ‘was a bit of human nature;’ and I have written this account of the fight on purpose that it might not be lost to the world. He also stated as a proof of the candour of mind in this class of men, that Stevenson acknowledged that Broughton could have beat him in his best day; but that he (Broughton) was getting old in their last rencounter. When we stopped in Piccadilly, I wanted to ask the gentleman some questions about the late Mr Windham, but had not courage. I got out, resigned my coat and green silk handkerchief to Pigott (loath to part with these ornaments of life), and walked home in high spirits.

P.S. Toms called upon me the next day, to ask me if I did not think the fight was a complete thing? I said I thought it was. I hope he will relish my account of it.

PHANTASTES

The Fight

1 The fight ... the conscience of the king adapted from Hamlet II ii 604–5.

2 Jack Randall’s ‘The Hole in the Wall’ in Chancery Lane, kept by Jack Randall, the pugilist.

3 the proverb ... musty from Hamlet II ii 343–4.

4 the FANCY boxing aficionados.

5 the author of Waverley Walter Scott.

6 blue ruin low-grade gin.

7 Joe Toms Joseph Parkes (1796–1865), one of Hazlitt's sporting and social acquaintances. He was one of the young men who surrounded Jeremy Bentham, and at this date was articled to a London solicitor. Hazlitt calls him both 'Jo.' and 'Joe'.

8 so carelessly did we fleet the time from As You Like It I i 118.

9 Jack Pigott in reality, P. G. Patmore (1786–1855), journalist; friend of Hazlitt and Lamb.

10 What more felicity ... delight with liberty? from Spenser, Muiopotmos 209–10.

11 to start from Tom Belcher's Tom Belcher (1783–1854), a younger brother of the better-known prize-fighter, James Belcher, kept the Castle tavern in Holborn.

12 cast lift, ride.

13 Well, we meet at Philippi! from Julius Caesar IV iii 286.

14 I follow Fate, which does too hard pursue from Dryden, The Indian Emperor IV iii 3–5:

As if the cares of Humane Life were few

We seek out new:

And follow Fate which would too fast pursue.

15 the Brentford Jehu a mock-heroic reference to the fast and furious driver of the Brentford stage-coach.

16 Tom Turtle, the trainer John Thurtell (1794–1824), the trainer and organizer of sporting events, who also owned a tavern, the Black Boy in Long Acre. Here Thurtell kept a mistress and entertained so many rough, brawling companions that he eventually lost his licence. By 1821, his reputation was distinctly shady. He was known for declining invitations to fight the likes of Tom Belcher, and made his living by gambling, fraud, hazard, billiards and arranging crooked fights. He was tried and executed for the murder of William Weare, one of his gambling companions, an ex-waiter, billiards sharp and expert gamester, on 9 January 1824. In the MS, Hazlitt at one point describes him as ‘my friend Thirtle’.

17 quite chap-fallen from Hamlet V i 192.

18 Martin trains on water Jack Martin, a baker by trade – hence, in sporting parlance, ‘The Master of the Rolls’.

19 I once heard Mr Richmond observe Born in 1763, Bill Richmond was, according to Pierce Egan, ‘a man of colour, and a native of America’. He came to England in 1777 with the Duke of Northumberland, and beat Tom Cribb in 1805. According to Egan, writing in 1812, he ‘has given instructions to some hundreds, not only in various parts of the kingdom, but in the very zenith of competition – LONDON.’ One of his pupils was Hazlitt.

20 where good digestion ... and health on both from Macbeth, III iv 37–8.

21 social chat and native glee an echo of Burns, Address to the Unco Guid 33: ‘See Social-life and Glee sit down’.

22 Follows so... With profitable ardour from Henry V IV i 276–7:

And follows so the ever-running year

With profitable labor to his grave.

Still fought upon his stumps.' (Hazlitt's note)

Jack Scroggins was a well-known prize-fighter. In May 1817 he fought Ned Turner (1791–1826) in a field near Hayes before a crowd of 30,000. Hazlitt quotes from The Ancient Ballad of Chevy-Chase 119–22.

50 Jackson 'Gentleman' John Jackson (1769–1845) succeeded Daniel Mendoza as champion of the sport in 1795. He set up rooms at 13 Bond Street with the aim of coaching noblemen; Byron was one of his pupils. He founded the Pugilistic Club in his rooms in 1814, and retired in 1824.

54 William Windham (1750–1810), politician, Secretary for War under Pitt (1794–1801) and Grenville (1806–7).

55 the famous Broughton and George Stevenson Jack Broughton (1704–1789) fought George Stevenson, ‘The Coachman’, in 1741. Their fight lasted forty minutes, and Broughton was victorious.

My First Acquaintance with Poets¹

From The Liberal (April 1823)

My father was a Dissenting minister² at Wem in Shropshire, and in the year 1798 (the figures that compose that date are to me like the ‘dreaded name of Demogorgon’),³ Mr Coleridge came to Shrewsbury to succeed Mr Rowe in the spiritual charge of a Unitarian congregation there.

He did not come till late on the Saturday afternoon before he was to preach, and Mr Rowe, who himself went down to the coach in a state of anxiety and expectation to look for the arrival of his successor, could find no one at all answering the description but a round-faced man in a short black coat, like a shooting jacket, which hardly seemed to have been made for him, but who seemed to be talking at a great rate to his fellow-passengers. Mr Rowe had scarce returned to give an account of his disappointment, when the round-faced man in black entered, and dissipated all doubts on the subject by beginning to talk. He did not cease while he stayed – nor has he since, that I know of. He held the good town of Shrewsbury in delightful suspense for three weeks that he remained there, ‘fluttering the proud Salopians like an eagle in a dovecot’,⁴ and the Welsh mountains that skirt the horizon with their tempestuous confusion agree to have heard no such mystic sounds since the days of ‘High-born Hoel’s harp or soft Llewellyn’s lay!’⁵

As we passed along between Wem and Shrewsbury, and I eyed their blue tops seen through the wintry branches, or the red rustling leaves of the sturdy oak-trees by the roadside, a sound was in my ears as of a siren's song. I was stunned, startled with it, as from deep sleep, but I had no notion then that I should ever be able to express my admiration to others in motley imagery or quaint allusion, till the light of his genius shone into my soul, like the sun's rays glittering in the puddles of the road. I was at that time dumb, inarticulate, helpless, like a worm by the wayside,⁶ crushed, bleeding, lifeless – but now, bursting from the deadly bands that 'bound them,/With Styx nine times round them',⁷ my ideas float on winged words, and as they expand their plumes, catch the golden light of other years. My soul has indeed remained in its original bondage, dark, obscure, with longings infinite⁸ and unsatisfied; my heart, shut up in the prison-house of this rude clay, has never found (nor will it ever find) a heart to speak to – but that my understanding also did not remain dumb and brutish, or at length found a language to express itself, I owe to Coleridge. But this is not to my purpose.

My father lived ten miles from Shrewsbury and was in the habit of exchanging visits with Mr Rowe and with Mr Jenkins of Whitchurch (nine miles farther on), according to the custom of Dissenting ministers in each other's neighbourhood. A line of communication is thus established, by which the flame of civil and religious liberty is kept alive, and nourishes its smouldering fire unquenchable, like the fires in the Agamemnon of Aeschylus, placed at different stations, that waited for ten long years to announce with their blazing pyramids the destruction of Troy.

Coleridge had agreed to come over to see my father, according to the courtesy of the country, as Mr Rowe's probable successor, but in the meantime I had gone to hear him preach the Sunday after his arrival. A poet and a philosopher getting up into a Unitarian pulpit to preach the gospel was a romance in these degenerate days, a sort of revival of the primitive spirit of Christianity, which was not to be resisted.

It was in January 1798 that I rose one morning before daylight, to walk ten miles in the mud, to hear this celebrated person preach. Never, the longest day I have to live, shall I have such another walk as this cold, raw, comfortless one in the winter of the year 1798. *Il y a des impressions que ni le tems ni les circonstances peuvent effacer. Dusse-je vivre des siècles entiers, le doux tems de ma jeunesse ne peut renaitre pour moi, ni s'effacer jamais dans ma mémoire.*⁹

When I got there the organ was playing the 100th Psalm, and, when it was done, Mr Coleridge rose and gave out his text: 'And he went up into the mountain to pray, HIMSELF, ALONE.'¹⁰ As he gave out this text, his voice 'rose like a steam of rich distilled perfumes',¹¹ and when he came to the two last words, which he pronounced loud, deep, and distinct, it seemed to me, who was then young, as if the sounds had echoed from the bottom of the human heart, and as if that prayer might have floated in solemn silence through the universe. The idea of St John came into mind, 'of one crying in the wilderness, who had his loins girt about, and whose food was locusts and wild honey'.¹²

The preacher then launched into his subject like an eagle dallying with the wind. The sermon was upon peace and war,¹³ upon church and state (not their alliance, but their separation), on the spirit of the world and the spirit of Christianity – not as the same, but as opposed to one another. He talked of those who had 'inscribed the cross of Christ on banners dripping with human gore.' He made a poetical and pastoral excursion, and, to show the fatal effects of war, drew a striking contrast between the simple shepherd boy driving his team afield, or sitting under the hawthorn piping to his flock 'as though he should never be old', and the same poor country lad, crimped,¹⁴ kidnapped, brought into town, made drunk at an alehouse, turned into a wretched drummer-boy, with his hair sticking on end with powder and pomatum,¹⁵ a long cue¹⁶ at his back, and tricked out in the loathsome finery of the profession of blood – 'Such were the notes our once-loved poet sung.'¹⁷

And for myself I could not have been more delighted if I had heard the music of the spheres. Poetry and philosophy had met together, truth and genius had embraced under the eye and with the sanction of religion. This was even beyond my hopes. I returned home well-satisfied. The sun that was still labouring pale and wan through the sky, obscured by thick mists, seemed an emblem of the good cause, and the cold dank drops of dew that hung half-melted on the beard of the thistle had something genial and refreshing in them – for there was a spirit of hope and youth in all nature, that turned everything into good. The face of nature had not then the brand of *jus divinum*¹⁸ on it, ‘Like to that sanguine flower inscribed with woe.’¹⁹

On the Tuesday following the half-inspired speaker came. I was called down into the room where he was, and went half-hoping, half-afraid. He received me very graciously, and I listened for a long time without uttering a word. I did not suffer in his opinion by my silence. ‘For those two hours’, he afterwards was pleased to say, ‘he was conversing with W.H.’s forehead’. His appearance was different from what I had anticipated from seeing him before. At a distance, and in the dim light of the chapel, there was to me a strange wildness in his aspect, a dusky obscurity, and I thought him pitted with the smallpox. His complexion was at that time clear, and even bright, ‘As are the children of yon azure sheen’.²⁰ His forehead was broad and high; light, as if built of ivory, with large projecting eyebrows, and his eyes rolling beneath them like a sea with darkened lustre. ‘A certain tender bloom his face o’erspread’,²¹ a purple tinge as we see it in the pale thoughtful complexions of the Spanish portrait-painters, Murillo and Velasquez. His mouth was gross, voluptuous, open, eloquent; his chin good-humoured and round; but his nose, the rudder of the face, the index of the will, was small, feeble, nothing – like what he has done.²² It might seem that the genius²³ of his face, as from a height, surveyed and projected him (with sufficient capacity and huge aspiration) into the world unknown of thought and imagination, with nothing to support or guide his veering purpose, as if Columbus had launched his adventurous course for the New World in a scallop, without oars or compass. So at least I comment on it after the event.

Coleridge in his person was rather above the common size, inclining to the corpulent, or like Lord Hamlet, ‘somewhat fat and pursy’.²⁴ His hair (now, alas, grey) was then black and glossy as the raven’s, and fell in smooth masses over his forehead. This long pendulous hair is peculiar to enthusiasts,²⁵ to those whose minds tend heavenward, and is traditionally inseparable (though of a different colour) from the pictures of Christ. It ought to belong, as a character, to all who preach Christ crucified, and Coleridge was at that time one of those.

It was curious to observe the contrast between him and my father, who was a veteran in the cause,²⁶ and then declining into the vale of years.²⁷ He had been a poor Irish lad, carefully brought up by his parents, and sent to the University of Glasgow, where he studied under Adam Smith,²⁸ to prepare him for his future destination. It was his mother's proudest wish to see her son a Dissenting minister. So if we look back to past generations as far as eye can reach, we see the same hopes, fears, wishes, followed by the same disappointments, throbbing in the human heart – and so we may see them, if we look forward, rising up forever, and disappearing, like vapourish bubbles, in the human breast. After being tossed about from congregation to congregation in the heats of the Unitarian controversy and squabbles about the American War,²⁹ he had been relegated to an obscure village where he was to spend the last thirty years of his life³⁰ far from the only converse that he loved – the talk about disputed texts of scripture, and the cause of civil and religious liberty. Here he passed his days, repining but resigned, in the study of the Bible and the perusal of the commentators³¹ – huge folios not easily got through, one of which would outlast a winter. Why did he pore on these from morn to night (with the exception of a walk in the fields or a turn in the garden to gather broccoli plants or kidney beans of his own rearing, with no small degree of pride and pleasure)? Here were 'no figures nor no fantasies',³² neither poetry nor philosophy, nothing to dazzle, nothing to excite modern curiosity – but to his lacklustre eyes there appeared, within the pages of the ponderous, unwieldy, neglected tomes, the sacred name of JEHOVAH in Hebrew capitals: pressed down by the weight of the style, worn to the last fading thinness of the understanding, there were glimpses, glimmering notions of the patriarchal wanderings, with palm-trees hovering in the horizon, and processions of camels at the distance of three thousand years; there was Moses with the burning bush, the number of the Twelve Tribes, types, shadows, glosses on the law and the prophets; there were discussions (dull enough) on the age of Methuselah³³ (a mighty speculation!); there were outlines, rude guesses at the shape of Noah's Ark and of the riches of Solomon's Temple; questions as to the date of the creation, predictions of the end of all things; the great lapses of time, the strange mutations of the globe were unfolded with the voluminous leaf, as it turned over; and though the soul might slumber with an hieroglyphic veil of inscrutable mysteries drawn over it, yet it was in a slumber ill-exchanged for all the sharpened realities of sense, wit, fancy, or reason. My father's life was comparatively a dream, but it was a dream of infinity and eternity, of death, the resurrection, and a judgement to come.

No two individuals were ever more unlike than were the host and his guest. A poet was to my father a sort of nondescript, yet whatever added grace to the Unitarian cause was to him welcome. He could hardly have been more surprised or pleased if our visitor had worn wings. Indeed, his thoughts had wings, and as the silken sounds rustled round our little wainscoted parlour, my father threw back his spectacles over his forehead, his white hairs mixing with its sanguine hue, and a smile of delight beamed across his rugged cordial face, to think that Truth had found a new ally in Fancy! Besides, Coleridge seemed to take considerable notice of me, and that of itself was enough. He talked very familiarly, but agreeably, and glanced over a variety of subjects.

At dinnertime he grew more animated, and dilated in a very edifying manner on Mary Wollstonecraft and Mackintosh.³⁴ The last he said he considered (on my father's speaking of his Vindiciae Gallicae as a capital performance) as a clever scholastic man, a master of the topics – or as the ready warehouseman of letters, who knew exactly where to lay his hand on what he wanted, though the goods were not his own. He thought him no match for Burke,³⁵ either in style or matter. Burke was a metaphysician, Mackintosh a mere logician. Burke was an orator (almost a poet) who reasoned in figures because he had an eye for nature; Mackintosh, on the other hand, was a rhetorician who had only an eye to commonplaces. On this I ventured to say that I had always entertained a great opinion of Burke, and that (as far as I could find) the speaking of him with contempt might be made the test of a vulgar democratical mind. This was the first observation I ever made to Coleridge, and he said it was a very just and striking one. I remember the leg of Welsh mutton and the turnips on the table that day had the finest flavour imaginable. Coleridge added that Mackintosh and Tom Wedgwood³⁶ (of whom, however, he spoke highly) had expressed a very indifferent opinion of his friend Mr Wordsworth, on which he remarked to them: ‘He strides on so far before you that he dwindles in the distance!’

Godwin³⁷ had once boasted to him of having carried on an argument with Mackintosh for three hours with dubious success; Coleridge told him, ‘If there had been a man of genius in the room, he would have settled the question in five minutes.’ He asked me if I had ever seen Mary Wollstonecraft, and I said I had once for a few moments,³⁸ and that she seemed to me to turn off³⁹ Godwin’s objections to something she advanced with quite a playful, easy air. He replied that ‘This was only one instance of the ascendancy which people of imagination exercised over those of mere intellect’. He did not rate Godwin very high⁴⁰ (this was caprice or prejudice, real or affected), but he had a great idea of Mrs Wollstonecraft’s powers of conversation, none at all of her talent for book-making.⁴¹ We talked a little about Holcroft.⁴² He had been asked if he was not much struck with him, and he said he thought himself in more danger of being struck by him. I complained that he would not let me get on at all, for he required a definition of every the commonest word, exclaiming, ‘What do you mean by a sensation, sir? What do you mean by an idea?’ This, Coleridge said, was barricading the road to truth; it was setting up a turnpike-gate at every step we took.⁴³

I forget a great number of things (many more than I remember), but the day passed off pleasantly, and the next morning Mr Coleridge was to return to Shrewsbury. When I came down to breakfast I found that he had just received a letter from his friend, T. Wedgwood, making him an offer of £150 a year if he chose to waive his present pursuit and devote himself entirely to the study of poetry and philosophy. Coleridge seemed to make up his mind to close with this proposal in the act of tying on one of his shoes. It threw an additional damp on his departure. It took the wayward enthusiast quite from us to cast him into Deva's winding vales⁴⁴ or by the shores of old romance. Instead of living at ten miles' distance, of being the pastor of a Dissenting congregation at Shrewsbury, he was henceforth to inhabit the hill of Parnassus,⁴⁵ to be a shepherd on the Delectable Mountains.⁴⁶ Alas, I knew not the way thither, and felt very little gratitude for Mr Wedgwood's bounty! I was presently relieved from this dilemma, for Mr Coleridge, asking for a pen and ink, and going to a table to write something on a bit of card, advanced towards me with undulating step and, giving me the precious document, said that that was his address – 'Mr Coleridge, Nether Stowey, Somersetshire' – and that he should be glad to see me there in a few weeks' time, and, if I chose, would come halfway to meet me. I was not less surprised than the shepherd boy (this simile is to be found in Cassandra)⁴⁷ when he sees a thunderbolt fall close at his feet. I stammered out my acknowledgements and acceptance of this offer (I thought Mr Wedgwood's annuity a trifle to it) as well as I could, and, this mighty business being settled, the poet-preacher took leave, and I accompanied him six miles on the road.

It was a fine morning in the middle of winter, and he talked the whole way. The scholar in Chaucer is described as going 'Sounding on his way';⁴⁸ so Coleridge went on his. In digressing, in dilating, in passing from subject to subject, he appeared to me to float in air, to slide on ice. He told me in confidence (going along) that he should have preached two sermons before he accepted the situation at Shrewsbury, one on infant baptism, the other on the Lord's Supper, showing that he could not administer either, which would have effectually disqualified him for the object in view. I observed that he continually crossed me on the way by shifting from one side of the footpath to the other. This struck me as an odd movement, but I did not at that time connect it with any instability of purpose or involuntary change of principle, as I have done since. He seemed unable to keep on in a straight line.

He spoke slightly of Hume,⁴⁹ whose 'Essay on Miracles' he said was stolen from an objection started in one of South's⁵⁰ sermons – Credat

*Judaeus Apella!*⁵¹ I was not very much pleased at this account of Hume, for I had just been reading, with infinite relish, that completest of all metaphysical choke-pears,⁵² his Treatise on Human Nature, to which the Essays, in point of scholastic subtlety and close reasoning, are mere elegant trifling, light summer reading. Coleridge even denied the excellence of Hume's general style, which I think betrayed a want of taste or candour.

He however made me amends by the manner in which he spoke of Berkeley. He dwelt particularly on his Essay on Vision as a masterpiece of analytical reasoning – so it undoubtedly is.⁵³ He was exceedingly angry with Dr Johnson for striking the stone with his foot, in allusion to this author's theory of matter and spirit, and saying, 'Thus I confute him, sir!'⁵⁴ Coleridge drew a parallel (I don't know how he brought about the connection) between Bishop Berkeley and Tom Paine.⁵⁵ He said the one was an instance of a subtle, the other of an acute mind, than which no two things could be more distinct. The one was a shopboy's quality, the other the characteristic of a philosopher. He considered Bishop Butler⁵⁶ as a true philosopher, a profound and conscientious thinker, a genuine reader of nature and of his own mind. He did not speak of his Analogy but of his Sermons at the Rolls Chapel, of which I had never heard. Coleridge somehow always contrived to prefer the unknown to the known; in this instance he was right. The Analogy is a tissue of sophistry, of wire-drawn,⁵⁷ theological special pleading; the Sermons (with the Preface to them) are in a fine vein of deep, matured reflection, a candid appeal to our observation of human nature, without pedantry and without bias.

I told Coleridge I had written a few remarks, and was sometimes foolish enough to believe that I had made a discovery on the same subject ('The Natural Disinterestedness of the Human Mind'),⁵⁸ and I tried to explain my view of it to Coleridge, who listened with great willingness, but I did not succeed in making myself understood. I sat down to the task shortly afterwards for the twentieth time, got new pens and paper, determined to make clear work of it, wrote a few meagre sentences in the skeleton style of a mathematical demonstration, stopped halfway down the second page, and, after trying in vain to pump up any words, images, notions, apprehensions, facts or observations from that gulf of abstraction in which I had plunged myself for four or five years preceding, gave up the attempt as labour in vain, and shed tears of helpless despondency on the blank unfinished paper. I can write fast enough now. Am I better than I was then? Oh no! One truth discovered, one pang of regret at not being able to express it, is better than all the fluency and flippancy in the world. Would that I could go back to what I then was! Why can we not revive past times as we can revisit old places? If I had the quaint⁵⁹ muse of Sir Philip Sidney to assist me, I would write a 'Sonnet to the Road between Wem and Shrewsbury', and immortalize every step of it by some fond enigmatical conceit. I would swear that the very milestones had ears, and that Harmer Hill stooped with all its pines to listen to a poet as he passed!

I remember but one other topic of discourse in this walk. He mentioned Paley,⁶⁰ praised the naturalness and clearness of his style, but condemned his sentiments, thought him a mere time-serving casuist, and said that 'the fact of his work on Moral and Political Philosophy being made a textbook in our universities was a disgrace to the national character'.

We parted at the six-milestone and I returned homeward, pensive but much pleased. I had met with unexpected notice from a person whom I believed to have been prejudiced against me: 'Kind and affable to me had been his condescension, and should be honoured ever with suitable regard'.⁶¹ He was the first poet I had known, and he certainly answered to that inspired name. I had heard a great deal of his powers of conversation and was not disappointed. In fact, I never met with anything at all like them, either before or since. I could easily credit the accounts which were circulated of his holding forth to a large party of ladies and gentlemen, an evening or two, before on the Berkeleian theory, when he made the whole material universe look like a transparency of fine words;⁶² and another story (which I believe he has somewhere told himself) of his being asked to a party at Birmingham, of his smoking tobacco and going to sleep after dinner on a sofa, where the company found him to their no small surprise, which was increased to wonder when he started up of a sudden and, rubbing his eyes, looked about him, and launched into a three hours'

description of the third heaven, of which he had had a dream, very different from Mr Southey's Vision of Judgement, and also from that other Vision of Judgement which Mr. Murray, the Secretary of the Bridge Street junto,⁶³ has taken into his especial keeping.⁶⁴

On my way back I had a sound in my ears; it was the voice of fancy – I had a light before me: it was the face of Poetry. The one still lingers there, the other has not quitted my side! Coleridge in truth met me halfway on the ground of philosophy, or I should not have been won over to his imaginative creed. I had an uneasy, pleasurable sensation all the time till I was to visit him. During those months the chill breath of winter gave me a welcoming; the vernal air was balm and inspiration to me. The golden sunsets, the silver star of evening, lighted me on my way to new hopes and prospects. I was to visit Coleridge in the spring. This circumstance was never absent from my thoughts, and mingled with all my feelings. I wrote to him at the time proposed and received an answer postponing my intended visit for a week or two, but very cordially urging me to complete my promise then. This delay did not damp, but rather increased my ardour. In the meantime I went to Llangollen Vale by way of initiating myself in the mysteries of natural scenery, and I must say I was enchanted with it. I had been reading Coleridge's description of England in his fine Ode on the Departing Year,⁶⁵ and I applied it *con amore*⁶⁶ to the objects before me. That valley was to me, in a manner, the cradle of a new existence: in the river that winds through it, my spirit was baptized in the waters of Helicon!⁶⁷

I returned home and soon after set out on my journey with unworn heart and untired feet. My way lay through Worcester and Gloucester and by Upton – where I thought of Tom Jones and the adventure of the muff.⁶⁸ I remember getting completely wet through one day and stopping at an inn (I think it was at Tewkesbury) where I sat up all night to read Paul and Virginia.⁶⁹ Sweet were the showers in early youth that drenched my body, and sweet the drops of pity that fell upon the books I read! I recollect a remark of Coleridge's upon this very book, that nothing could show the gross indelicacy of French manners and the entire corruption of their imagination more strongly than the behaviour of the heroine in the last fatal scene, who turns away from a person on board the sinking vessel that offers to save her life, because he has thrown off his clothes to assist him in swimming. Was this a time to think of such a circumstance? I once hinted to Wordsworth,⁷⁰ as we were sailing in his boat on Grasmere lake, that I thought he had borrowed the idea of his 'Poems on the Naming of Places' from the local inscriptions of the same kind in Paul and Virginia. He did not own the obligation, and stated some distinction without a difference in defence of his claim to originality. Any the slightest variation would be sufficient for this purpose in his mind, for whatever he added or omitted would inevitably be worth all that anyone else had done, and contain the marrow of the sentiment.

I was still two days before the time fixed for my arrival, for I had taken care to set out early enough. I stopped these two days at Bridgwater, and when I was tired of sauntering on the banks of its muddy river, returned to the inn and read Camilla.⁷¹ So have I loitered my life away, reading books, looking at pictures, going to plays, hearing, thinking, writing on what pleased me best. I have wanted only one thing to make me happy – but wanting that, have wanted everything.

I arrived, and was well-received. The country about Nether Stowey is beautiful, green and hilly, and near the seashore. I saw it but the other day⁷² after an interval of twenty years from a hill near Taunton. How was the map of my life spread out before me, as the map of the country lay at my feet! In the afternoon, Coleridge took me over to Alfoxden, a romantic old family mansion of the St Aubins, where Wordsworth lived. It was then in the possession of a friend of the poet's who gave him the free use of it.⁷³ Somehow that period (the time just after the French Revolution) was not a time when nothing was given for nothing. The mind opened, and a softness might be perceived coming over the heart of individuals beneath 'the scales that fence' our self-interest.

Wordsworth himself was from home, but his sister kept house, and set before us a frugal repast – and we had free access to her brother's poems, the Lyrical Ballads, which were still in manuscript, or in the form of sibylline leaves.⁷⁴ I dipped into a few of these with great satisfaction, and with the faith of a novice. I slept that night in an old room with blue hangings and covered with the round-faced family portraits of the age of George I and II, and from the wooded declivity of the adjoining park that overlooked my window, at the dawn of day, could 'hear the loud stag speak'.⁷⁵

In the outset of life (and particularly at this time I felt it so) our imagination has a body to it. We are in a state between sleeping and waking, and have indistinct but glorious glimpses of strange shapes, and there is always something to come better than what we see. As in our dreams the fullness of the blood gives warmth and reality to the coinage of the brain, so in youth our ideas are clothed and fed and pampered with our good spirits; we breathe thick with thoughtless happiness, the weight of future years presses on the strong pulses of the heart, and we repose with undisturbed faith in truth and good. As we advance, we exhaust our fund of enjoyment and of hope. We are no longer wrapped in lamb's wool, lulled in Elysium. As we taste the pleasures of life, their spirit evaporates, the sense palls, and nothing is left but the phantoms, the lifeless shadows of what has been.

That morning, as soon as breakfast was over, we strolled out into the park and, seating ourselves on the trunk of an old ash-tree that stretched along the ground, Coleridge read aloud with a sonorous and musical voice the ballad of Betty Foy.⁷⁶ I was not critically or sceptically inclined. I saw touches of truth and nature, and took the rest for granted. But in 'The Thorn', 'The Mad Mother', and 'The Complaint of a Poor Indian Woman', I felt that deeper power and pathos which have been since acknowledged, 'In spite of pride, in erring reason's spite',⁷⁷ as the characteristics of this author; and the sense of a new style and a new spirit in poetry came over me. It had to me something of the effect that arises from the turning up of the fresh soil, or of the first welcome breath of spring 'While yet the trembling year is unconfirmed'.⁷⁸

Coleridge and myself walked back to Stowey that evening, and his voice sounded high

Of Providence, foreknowledge, will and fate,
Fixed fate, free will, foreknowledge absolute,⁷⁹

as we passed through echoing grove, by fairy stream or waterfall gleaming in the summer moonlight. He lamented that Wordsworth was not prone enough to belief in the traditional superstitions of the place, and that there was a something corporeal, a matter-of-factness, a clinging to the palpable, or often to the petty, in his poetry, in consequence. His genius was not a spirit that descended to him through the air; it sprung out of the ground like a flower, or unfolded itself from a green spray on which the goldfinch sang. He said, however (if I remember right), that this objection must be confined to his descriptive pieces, that his philosophic poetry had a grand and comprehensive spirit in it, so that his soul seemed to inhabit the universe like a palace, and to discover truth by intuition rather than by deduction.

The next day Wordsworth arrived from Bristol at Coleridge's cottage. I think I see him now. He answered in some degree to his friend's description of him, but was more gaunt and Don Quixote-like. He was quaintly dressed, according to the costume of that unconstrained period, in a brown fustian jacket and striped pantaloons.⁸⁰ There was something of a roll, a lounge in his gait, not unlike his own Peter Bell.⁸¹

There was a severe, worn pressure of thought about his temples; a fire in his eye, as if he saw something in objects more than the outward appearance; an intense, high, narrow forehead; a Roman nose; cheeks furrowed by strong purpose and feeling, and a convulsive inclination to laughter about the mouth, a good deal at variance with the solemn, stately expression of the rest of his face. Chantrey's bust⁸² wants⁸³ the marking⁸⁴ traits, but he was teased into making it regular and heavy; Haydon's head of him, introduced into the 'Entrance of Christ into Jerusalem',⁸⁵ is the most like his drooping weight of thought and expression.

He sat down and talked very naturally and freely, with a mixture of clear gushing accents in his voice, a deep guttural intonation, and a strong tincture of the northern burr, like the crust on wine. He instantly began to make havoc of the half of a Cheshire cheese on the table, and said triumphantly that 'his marriage with experience had not been so unproductive as Mr Southey's in teaching him a knowledge of the good things of this life'. He had been to see The Castle Spectre by Monk Lewis,⁸⁶ while at Bristol, and described it very well. He said 'it fitted the taste of the audience like a glove'. This *ad captandum*⁸⁷ merit was however by no means a recommendation of it according to the severe principles of the new school, which reject rather than court popular effect.

Wordsworth, looking out of the low, latticed window, said, 'How beautifully the sun sets on that yellow bank!' I thought within myself, 'With what eyes these poets see nature!' And ever after, when I saw the sunset stream upon the objects facing it, conceived I had made a discovery, or thanked Mr Wordsworth for having made one for me.

We went over to Alfoxden again the day following and Wordsworth read us the story of Peter Bell in the open air, and the comment made upon it by his face and voice was very different from that of some later critics. Whatever might be thought of the poem, 'his face was as a book where men might read strange matters',⁸⁸ and he announced the fate of his hero in prophetic tones. There is a chaunt in the recitation both of Coleridge and Wordsworth which acts as a spell upon the hearer, and disarms the judgement. Perhaps they have deceived themselves by making habitual use of this ambiguous accompaniment. Coleridge's manner is more full, animated, and varied; Wordsworth's more equable, sustained, and internal. The one might be termed more dramatic, the other more lyrical. Coleridge has told me that he himself liked to compose in walking over uneven ground, or breaking through the straggling branches of a copsewood, whereas Wordsworth always wrote (if he could) walking up and down a straight gravel-walk, or in some spot where the continuity of his verse met with no collateral⁸⁹ interruption.

Returning that same evening, I got into a metaphysical argument with Wordsworth while Coleridge was explaining the different notes of the nightingale to his sister, in which we neither of us succeeded in making ourselves perfectly clear and intelligible.⁹⁰ Thus I passed three weeks at Nether Stowey and in the neighbourhood generally devoting the afternoons to a delightful chat in an arbour made of bark by the poet's friend Tom Poole, sitting under two fine elm-trees, and listening to the bees humming round us while we quaffed our flip.⁹¹ It was agreed, among other things, that we should make a jaunt down the Bristol Channel as far as Lynton.⁹² We set off together on foot, Coleridge, John Chester⁹³ and I. This Chester was a native of Nether Stowey, one of those who were attracted to Coleridge's discourse as flies are to honey, or bees in swarming-time to the sound of a brass pan. He 'followed in the chase like a dog who hunts, not like one that made up the cry'.⁹⁴ He had on a brown cloth coat, boots, and corduroy breeches, was low in stature, bow-legged, had a drag in his walk like a drover, which he assisted by a hazel switch,⁹⁵ and kept on a sort of trot by the side of Coleridge, like a running footman by a state coach, that he might not lose a syllable or sound that fell from Coleridge's lips. He told me his private opinion that Coleridge was a wonderful man. He scarcely opened his lips, much less offered an opinion the whole way – yet, of the three, had I to choose during that journey, I would be John Chester. He afterwards followed Coleridge into Germany, where the Kantian philosophers were puzzled how to bring him under any of their categories. When he sat down at table with his idol, John's felicity was complete; Sir Walter Scott's, or Mr Blackwood's, when they sat down at the same table with the King, was not more so.⁹⁶

We passed Dunster on our right, a small town between the brow of a hill and the sea. I remember eyeing it wistfully as it lay below us; contrasted with the woody scene around, it looked as clear, as pure, as embrowned and ideal as any landscape I have seen since, of Gaspar Poussin's or Domenichino's.⁹⁷ We had a long day's march (our feet kept time to the echoes of Coleridge's tongue) through Minehead and by the Blue Anchor and on to Lynton, which we did not reach till near midnight, and where we had some difficulty in making a lodgement.⁹⁸ We however knocked the people of the house up at last, and we were repaid for our apprehensions and fatigue by some excellent rashers of fried bacon and eggs. The view in coming along had been splendid. We walked for miles and miles on dark brown heaths overlooking the Channel,⁹⁹ with the Welsh hills beyond, and at times descended into little sheltered valleys close by the seaside, with a smuggler's face scowling by us, and then had to ascend conical hills with a path winding up through a coppice to a barren top, like a monk's shaven crown, from one of which I pointed out to Coleridge's notice the bare masts of a vessel on the very edge of the horizon and within the red-orbed disk of the setting sun, like his own spectre-ship in 'The Ancient Mariner'.

At Lynton the character of the sea-coast becomes more marked and rugged. There is a place called the Valley of Rocks (I suspect this was only the poetical name for it) bedded among precipices overhanging the sea, with rocky caverns beneath, into which the waves dash, and where the seagull forever wheels its screaming flight. On the tops of these are huge stones thrown transverse, as if an earthquake had tossed them there, and behind these is a fretwork of perpendicular rocks, something like the Giant's Causeway.¹⁰⁰

A thunderstorm came on while we were at the inn, and Coleridge was running out bareheaded to enjoy the commotion of the elements in the Valley of Rocks, but, as if in spite, the clouds only muttered a few angry sounds, and let fall a few refreshing drops. Coleridge told me that he and Wordsworth were to have made this place the scene of a prose tale which was to have been in the manner of, but far superior to, The Death of Abel,¹⁰¹ but they had relinquished the design.

In the morning of the second day, we breakfasted luxuriously in an old-fashioned parlour on tea, toast, eggs, and honey, in the very sight of the beehives from which it had been taken, and a garden full of thyme and wild-flowers that had produced it. On this occasion Coleridge spoke of Virgil's Georgics, but not well. I do not think he had much feeling for the classical or elegant. It was in this room that we found a little worn-out copy of The Seasons lying in a window-seat, on which Coleridge exclaimed, 'That is true fame!' He said Thomson was a great poet rather than a good one; his style was as meretricious as his thoughts were natural. He spoke of Cowper as the best modern poet. He said the Lyrical Ballads were an experiment about to be tried by him and Wordsworth, to see how far the public taste would endure poetry written in a more natural and simple style than had hitherto been attempted – totally discarding the artifices of poetical diction, and making use only of such words as had probably been common in the most ordinary language since the days of Henry II.¹⁰²

Some comparison was introduced between Shakespeare and Milton. He said he hardly knew which to prefer. Shakespeare seemed to him a mere stripling in the art; he was as tall and as strong, with infinitely more activity, than Milton, but he never appeared to have come to man's estate – or if he had, he would not have been a man, but a monster. He spoke with contempt of Gray and with intolerance of Pope. He did not like the versification of the latter. He observed that 'the ears of these couplet-writers might be charged with having short memories, that could not retain the harmony of whole passages'. He thought little of Junius¹⁰³ as a writer, he had a dislike of Dr Johnson, and a much higher opinion of Burke as an orator and politician, than of Fox or Pitt.¹⁰⁴ He however thought him very inferior in richness of style and imagery to some of our elder prose writers, particularly Jeremy Taylor.¹⁰⁵ He liked Richardson but not Fielding, nor could I get him to enter into the merits of Caleb Williams.¹⁰⁶ In short, he was profound and discriminating with respect to those authors whom he liked, and where he gave his judgement fair play; capricious, perverse, and prejudiced in his antipathies and distastes.

We loitered on the 'ribbed sea-sands'¹⁰⁷ in such talk as this a whole morning, and I recollect met with a curious seaweed of which John Chester told us the country name. A fisherman gave Coleridge an account of a boy that had been drowned the day before, and that they had tried to save him at the risk of their own lives. He said he 'did not know how it was that they ventured, but, sir, we have a nature towards one another.' This expression, Coleridge remarked to me, was a fine illustration of that theory of disinterestedness which I (in common with Butler)¹⁰⁸ had adopted. I broached to him an argument of mine to prove that likeness was not mere association of ideas. I said that the mark in the sand put one in mind of a man's foot not because it was part of a former impression of a man's foot (for it was quite new), but because it was like the shape of a man's foot. He assented to the justness of this distinction (which I have explained at length elsewhere¹⁰⁹ for the benefit of the curious), and John Chester listened not from any interest in the subject, but because he was astonished that I should be able to suggest anything to Coleridge that he did not already know. We returned on the third morning, and Coleridge remarked the silent cottage-smoke curling up the valleys where, a few evenings before, we had seen the lights gleaming through the dark.

In a day or two after we arrived at Stowey, we set out, I on my return home and he for Germany. It was a Sunday morning and he was to preach that day for Dr Toulmin of Taunton. I asked him if he had prepared anything for the occasion. He said he had not even thought of the text, but should as soon as we parted. I did not go to hear him (this was a fault) but we met in the evening at Bridgwater. The next day we had a long day's walk to Bristol, and sat down, I recollect, by a well-side on the road, to cool ourselves and satisfy our thirst, when Coleridge repeated to me some descriptive lines from his tragedy of Remorse, which I must say became his mouth and that occasion better than they, some years after, did Mr Elliston's¹¹⁰ and the Drury Lane boards:

Oh memory, shield me from the world's poor strife

And give those scenes thine everlasting life.¹¹¹

I saw no more of him for a year or two, during which period he had been wandering in the Hartz Forest in Germany,¹¹² and his return was cometary, meteorous (unlike his setting-out). It was not till some time after that I knew his friends Lamb¹¹³ and Southey. The last always appears to me as I first saw him, with a commonplace book under his arm;¹¹⁴ and the first with a bon mot in his mouth. It was at Godwin's that I met him with Holcroft and Coleridge, where they were disputing fiercely which was the best – man as he was, or man as he is to be. 'Give me', says Lamb, 'man as he is not to be.' This saying was the beginning of a friendship between us which I believe still continues. Enough of this for the present.

But there is matter for another rhyme,

And I to this may add a second tale.¹¹⁵

My First Acquaintance with Poets

² My father...minister William Hazlitt Sr was a Unitarian minister (see headnote).

⁴ fluttering the proud Salopians like an eagle in a dovecot An allusion to Coriolanus V vi 114–15.

⁵ High-born Hoel’s harp or soft Llewellyn’s lay! from Gray, The Bard 28.

⁶ like a worm by the wayside cf. Chaucer, The Clerk’s Tale 879–80: ‘wherfore I yow preye, / Lat me nat lyk a worm go by the weye.’

⁷ bound them...round them from Pope, Ode on St Cecilia’s Day 90–1.

⁸ with longings infinite cf. Wordsworth, ‘The Affliction of Margaret’ 63: ‘With love and longings infinite.’

⁹ ‘There are impressions which neither time nor circumstance is able to efface. Were I to live entire centuries, the sweet time of my youth could never be reborn for me – nor could it ever be erased from my memory.’ Hazlitt has adapted Rousseau, Julie, ou la Nouvelle Héloïse (6 vols, Amsterdam, 1761), vi 55–6.

¹⁰ Matthew 14:23 and John 6:15.

¹¹ rose like a steam of rich distilled perfumes from Milton, Comus 556.

12 Matthew 3:3–4 and Mark 1:3.

13 peace and war Coleridge was at this time much preoccupied with the war with France, which had been in progress since 1793. Given Hazlitt's remarks here, it is evident that Coleridge's reservations about the war, fully expressed in France: An Ode, were brewing in January 1798.

14 crimped forced into the army.

15 pomatum pomade, a scented ointment.

16 cue pigtail.

17 Such were the notes our once-loved poet sung from Pope, 'Epistle to Robert, Earl of Oxford' 1.

18 jus divinum 'The divine right' of kings.

19 that flower...woe the hyacinth; see Lycidas 106.

20 As are the children of yon azure sheen from Thomson, The Castle of Indolence ii 295.

21 A certain tender bloom his face o'erspread from Thomson, The Castle of Indolence i 507: 'A certain tender gloom o'erspread his face.'

22 his nose...like what he has done Cf. Coleridge's description of himself two years earlier, p. 630. When this essay first appeared in The Liberal a number of reviewers thought that Hazlitt's comments on Coleridge's nose were in bad taste. The Literary Register (3 May 1823) described the essay as 'disgusting', and concluded by asking

What does Mr HAZLITT mean by Coleridge's nose being feeble? – What does he mean by its being nothing? Does he mean to say that Coleridge has no nose – no rudder – no cutwater? We believe he does.... Now, really, is this endurable? except to laugh at for which purpose it is, as we said before, well worth the money. Is it bearable that a fool, like this HAZLITT, should make a fool of a person so amiable as Coleridge; or that a man's personal peculiarities are served up in this manner to raise money? It is as shameful and contemptible as it is improper and absurd. (p. 275)

23 genius tutelary deity.

24 somewhat fat and puffy from Hamlet III iv 153.

25 enthusiasts fanatics.

26 the cause i.e. of Unitarianism.

27 declining into the vale of years an allusion to Cowper, Task ii 725–6: 'But Discipline, a faithful servant long,/Declined at length into the vale of years.' William Hazlitt Sr was 60 in January 1798.

28 Adam Smith (1723–90), distinguished Scottish economist and man of letters, author, most notably, of The Wealth of Nations (1776).

29 squabbles about the American War Like other Unitarian ministers, Hazlitt's father had been a close associate of Benjamin Franklin during his second English agency, and was a staunch supporter of the American cause during the war with Britain. Typically, he and his family were on the first boat to sail to America after the war ended in 1783.

30 an obscure village...last thirty years of his life Not quite true. The 'obscure village' is Wem, where Hazlitt's father served as pastor of the Dissenting congregation from 1787 to 1813, when he retired to Addlestone, Surrey, before moving to Bath and then Crediton, Devonshire, where he died on 16 July 1820 at the age of 83.

Mr Coleridge

From The Spirit of the Age (1825)

The present is an age of talkers, and not of doers – and the reason is that the world is growing old. We are so far advanced in the arts and sciences, that we live in retrospect and dote on past achievements. The accumulation of knowledge has been so great that we are lost in wonder at the height it has reached, instead of attempting to climb or add to it; while the variety of objects distracts and dazzles the looker-on.

What niche remains unoccupied? What path untried? What is the use of doing anything unless we could do better than all those who have gone before us? What hope is there of this? We are like those who have been to see some noble monument of art, who are content to admire without thinking of rivalling it – or, like guests after a feast, who praise the hospitality of the donor ‘and thank the bounteous Pan’,¹ perhaps carrying away some trifling fragments – or, like the spectators of a mighty battle, who still hear its sound afar off, and the clashing of armour and the neighing of the warhorse and the shout of victory is in their ears, like the rushing of innumerable waters!

Mr. Coleridge has ‘a mind reflecting ages past’.² His voice is like the echo of the congregated roar of the ‘dark rearward and abyss’³ of thought. He who has seen a mouldering tower by the side of a crystal lake, hid by the mist but glittering in the wave below, may conceive the dim, gleaming, uncertain intelligence of his eye; he who has marked the evening clouds uprolled (a world of vapours) has seen the picture of his mind – unearthly, unsubstantial, with gorgeous tints and ever-varying forms:

That which was now a horse, even with a thought
The rack dislimns, and makes it indistinct
As water is in water.⁴

Our author’s mind is (as he himself might express it) tangential. There is no subject on which he has not touched, none on which he has rested. With an understanding fertile, subtle, expansive, ‘quick, forgetive,⁵ apprehensive’⁶ beyond all living precedent, few traces of it will perhaps remain. He lends himself to all impressions alike; he gives up his mind and liberty of thought to none. He is a general lover of art and science, and wedded to no one in particular. He pursues knowledge as a mistress, with outstretched hands and winged speed, but as he is about to embrace her, his Daphne turns – alas, not to a laurel!⁷ Hardly a speculation has been left on record from the earliest time, but it is loosely folded up in Mr Coleridge’s memory, like a rich but somewhat tattered piece of tapestry.

We might add (with more seeming than real extravagance) that scarce a thought can pass through the mind of man, but its sound has at some time or other passed over his head with rustling pinions.

On whatever question or author you speak, he is prepared to take up the theme with advantage – from Peter Abelard⁸ down to Thomas Moore,⁹ from the subtlest metaphysics to the politics of The Courier.¹⁰ There is no man of genius in whose praise he descants,¹¹ but the critic seems to stand above the author, and ‘what in him is weak, to strengthen; what is low, to raise and support’.¹² Nor is there any work of genius that does not come out of his hands like an illuminated missal,¹³ sparkling even in its defects.

If Mr Coleridge had not been the most impressive talker of his age, he would probably have been the finest writer – but he lays down his pen to make sure of an auditor, and mortgages the admiration of posterity for the stare of an idler. If he had not been a poet, he would have been a powerful logician; if he had not dipped his wing in the Unitarian controversy, he might have soared to the very summit of fancy. But in writing verse, he is trying to subject the muse to transcendental theories; in his abstract reasoning, he misses his way by strewing it with flowers. All that he has done of moment, he had done twenty years ago; since then he may be said to have lived on the sounds of his own voice. Mr Coleridge is too rich in intellectual wealth to need to task himself to any drudgery – he has only to draw the sliders¹⁴ of his imagination, and a thousand subjects expand before him, startling him with their brilliancy, or losing themselves in endless obscurity,

And by the force of blear illusion,¹⁵

They draw him on to his confusion.¹⁶

What is the little he could add to the stock, compared with the countless stores that lie about him, that he should stoop to pick up a name, or to polish an idle fancy? He walks abroad in the majesty of an universal understanding, eyeing the ‘rich strand’,¹⁷ or golden sky above him, and ‘goes sounding on his way’,¹⁸ in eloquent accents, uncompelled and free!

Persons of the greatest capacity are often those who, for this reason, do the least – for, surveying themselves from the highest point of view amidst the infinite variety of the universe, their own share in it seems trifling and scarce worth a thought, and they prefer the contemplation of all that is, or has been, or can be, to the making a coil¹⁹ about doing what (when done) is no better than vanity. It is hard to concentrate all our attention and efforts on one pursuit, except from ignorance of others, and, without this concentration of our faculties, no great progress can be made in any one thing. It is not merely that the mind is not capable of the effort; it does not think the effort worth making. Action is one, but thought is manifold. He whose restless eye glances through the wide compass of nature and art will not consent to have ‘his own nothings monstered’,²⁰ but he must do this before he can give his whole soul to them. The mind, after ‘letting contemplation have its fill’,²¹ or sinks down on the ground, breathless, exhausted, powerless, inactive, or, if it must have some vent to its feelings, seeks the most easy and obvious – is soothed by friendly flattery, lulled by the murmur of immediate applause, thinks as it were aloud, and babbles in its dreams! A scholar (so to speak) is a more disinterested and abstracted character than a mere author: the first looks at the numberless volumes of a library, and says, ‘All these are mine’; the other points to a single volume (perhaps it may be an immortal one) and says, ‘My name is written on the back of it’. This is a puny and grovelling ambition beneath the lofty amplitude of Mr Coleridge’s mind. No, he revolves in his wayward soul, or utters to the passing wind, or discourses to his own shadow things mightier and more various! Let us draw the curtain and unlock the shrine.

Sailing with supreme dominion

Learning rocked him in his cradle, and, while yet a child, ‘He lisped in numbers, for the numbers came’.²³ At sixteen he wrote his ‘Ode on Chatterton’,²⁴ and he still reverts to that period with delight, not so much as it relates to himself (for that string of his own early promise of fame rather jars than otherwise), but as exemplifying the youth of a poet. Mr

Coleridge talks of himself without being an egotist, for in him the individual is always merged in the abstract and general. He distinguished himself at school and at the University²⁵ by his knowledge of the classics, and gained several prizes for Greek epigrams.²⁶ (How many men are there – great scholars, celebrated names in literature – who, having done the same thing in their youth, have no other idea all the rest of their lives but of this achievement, of a fellowship and dinner, and who, installed in academic honours, would look down on our author as a mere strolling bard!) At Christ’s Hospital where he was brought up, he was the idol of those among his schoolfellows who mingled with their bookish studies the music of thought and of humanity, and he was usually attended round the cloisters by a group of these (inspiring and inspired) whose hearts, even then, burnt within them as he talked, and where the sounds yet linger to mock Elia²⁷ on his way, still turning pensive to the past!²⁸

One of the finest and rarest parts of Mr Coleridge’s conversation is when he expatiates²⁹ on the Greek tragedians (not that he is not well-acquainted, when he pleases, with the epic poets, or the philosophers, or orators, or historians of antiquity) – on the subtle reasonings and melting pathos of Euripides; on the harmonious gracefulness of Sophocles, tuning his love-laboured song like sweetest warblings from a sacred grove; on the high-wrought trumpet-tongued eloquence of Aeschylus, whose Prometheus, above all, is like an Ode to Fate and a pleading with Providence, his thoughts being let loose as his body is chained on his solitary rock,³⁰ and his afflicted will (the emblem of mortality) ‘Struggling in vain with ruthless destiny’.³¹ As the impassioned critic speaks and rises in his theme, you would think you heard the voice of the man hated by the gods contending with the wild winds as they roar, and his eye glitters with the spirit of antiquity!

Next he was engaged with Hartley’s tribes of mind, ‘ethereal braid, thought-woven’,³² and he busied himself for a year or two with vibrations and vibratiuncles and the great law of association that binds all things in its mystic chain, and the doctrine of necessity (the mild teacher of charity) and the millennium, anticipative of a life to come;³³ and he plunged deep into the controversy on matter and spirit, and, as an escape from Dr Priestley's materialism³⁴ (where he felt himself imprisoned by the logician's spell like Ariel in the cloven pine-tree),³⁵ he became suddenly enamoured of Bishop Berkeley's fairy-world,³⁶ and used in all companies to build the universe (like a brave poetical fiction) of fine words; and he was deep-read in Malebranche,³⁷ and in Cudworth's *Intellectual System*³⁸ (a huge pile of learning – unwieldy, enormous), and in Lord Brook's hieroglyphic theories,³⁹ and in Bishop Butler's Sermons,⁴⁰ and in the Duchess of Newcastle's fantastic folios,⁴¹ and in Clarke and South and Tillotson,⁴² and all the fine thinkers and masculine reasoners of that age – and Leibniz's *Pre-established Harmony*⁴³ reared its arch above his head, like the rainbow in the cloud, covenanting with the hopes of man; and then he fell plump ten thousand fathoms down (but his wings saved him harmless) into the hortus siccus of Dissent,⁴⁴ where he pared religion down to the standard of reason and stripped faith of mystery, and preached Christ crucified and the Unity of the Godhead, and so dwelt for a while in the spirit with John Huss and Jerome of Prague and Socinus and old John Zisca,⁴⁵ and ran through Neal's History of the Puritans, and Calamy's *Non-Conformists' Memorial*⁴⁶ (having like thoughts and passions with them); but then Spinoza⁴⁷ became his god and he took up the vast chain of being in his hand, and the round world became the centre and the soul of all things in some shadowy sense forlorn of meaning, and around him he beheld the living traces and the sky-pointing proportions of the mighty Pan; but poetry redeemed him from this spectral philosophy,⁴⁸ and he bathed his heart in beauty, and gazed at the golden light of heaven, and drank of the spirit of the universe, and wandered at eve by fairy-stream or fountain,

When he saw nought but beauty,
When he heard the voice of that Almighty One
In every breeze that blew, or wave that murmured,⁴⁹

and wedded with truth in Plato's shade, and in the writings of Proclus and Plotinus⁵⁰ saw the ideas of things in the eternal mind, and unfolded all mysteries with the schoolmen,⁵¹ and fathomed the depths of Duns Scotus and Thomas Aquinas, and entered the third heaven with Jacob Behmen, and walked hand in hand with Swedenborg⁵² through the pavilions of the New Jerusalem, and sung his faith in the promise and in the word in his *Religious Musings*⁵³ – and lowering himself from that dizzy height, poised himself on Milton's wings, and spread out his thoughts in charity with the glad prose of Jeremy Taylor,⁵⁴ and wept over Bowles' sonnets,⁵⁵ and studied Cowper's blank verse,⁵⁶ and betook himself to Thomson's Castle of Indolence,⁵⁷ and sported with the wits of Charles the Second's days⁵⁸ and of Queen Anne,⁵⁹ and relished Swift's style and that of the John Bull (Arbuthnot's we mean – not Mr Croker's),⁶⁰ and dallied with the British Essayists and Novelists,⁶¹ and knew all qualities of more modern writers with a learned spirit, Johnson and Goldsmith and Junius⁶² and Burke and Godwin, and the Sorrows of Werter,⁶³ and Jean Jacques Rousseau and Voltaire and Marivaux and Crebillon,⁶⁴ and thousands more; now 'laughed with Rabelais in his easy chair'⁶⁵ or pointed to Hogarth, or afterwards dwelt on Claude's classic scenes or spoke with rapture of Raphael,⁶⁶ and compared the women at Rome⁶⁷ to figures that had walked out of his pictures, or visited the Oratory of Pisa,⁶⁸ and described the works of Giotto and Ghirlandaio and Massaccio, and gave the moral of the picture of the Triumph of Death⁶⁹ (where the beggars and the wretched invoke his dreadful dart but the rich and mighty of the earth quail and shrink before it); and in that land of siren sights and sounds saw a dance of peasant girls, and was charmed with lutes and gondolas; or wandered into Germany and lost himself in the labyrinths of the Hartz Forest⁷⁰ and of the Kantean philosophy, and amongst the cabalistic⁷¹ names of Fichte and Schelling and Lessing⁷² and God knows who – this was long after, but all the former while he had nerved his heart and filled his eyes with tears, as he hailed the rising orb of liberty (since quenched in darkness and in blood), and had kindled his affections at the blaze of the French Revolution, and sang for joy⁷³ when the towers of the Bastille and the proud places of the insolent and the oppressor fell,⁷⁴ and would have floated his bark, freighted with fondest fancies, across the Atlantic wave with Southey and others⁷⁵ to seek for peace and freedom, ‘In Philharmonia’s⁷⁶ undivided dale!’⁷⁷

Alas! ‘Frailty, thy name is Genius!’⁷⁸ What is become of all this mighty heap of hope, of thought, of learning, and humanity? It has ended in swallowing doses of oblivion⁷⁹ and in writing paragraphs in the Courier. Such, and so little, is the mind of man!

It was not to be supposed that Mr Coleridge could keep on at the rate he set off; he could not realize all he knew or thought, and less could not fix his desultory ambition. Other stimulants supplied the place, and kept up the intoxicating dream, the fever and the madness of his early impressions. Liberty (the philosopher’s and the poet’s bride) had fallen a victim, meanwhile, to the murderous practices of the hag Legitimacy. Proscribed by court-hirelings, too romantic for the herd of vulgar politicians, our enthusiast stood at bay, and at last turned on the pivot of a subtle casuistry to the unclean side – but his discursive reason would not let him trammel himself into a Poet Laureate or stamp-distributor,⁸⁰ and he stopped, ere he had quite passed that well-known ‘bourne from whence no traveller returns’,⁸¹ and so has sunk into torpid, uneasy repose, tantalized by useless resources, haunted by vain imaginings, his lips idly moving but his heart forever still, or, as the shattered chords vibrate of themselves, making melancholy music to the ear of memory!

Such is the fate of genius in an age when, in the unequal contest with sovereign wrong, every man is ground to powder who is not either a born slave, or who does not willingly and at once offer up the yearnings of humanity and the dictates of reason as a welcome sacrifice to besotted prejudice and loathsome power.

Of all Mr Coleridge’s productions, The Ancient Mariner is the only one that we could with confidence put into any person’s hands, on whom we wished to impress a favourable idea of his extraordinary powers. Let whatever other objections be made to it, it is unquestionably a work of genius – of wild, irregular, overwhelming imagination, and has that rich, varied movement in the verse which gives a distant idea of the lofty or changeful tones of Mr Coleridge's voice. In the Christabel, there is one splendid passage on divided friendship. The translation of Schiller's *Wallenstein*⁸² is also a masterly production in its kind, faithful and spirited. Among his smaller pieces there are occasional bursts of pathos and fancy equal to what we might expect from him, but these form the exception and not the rule; such, for instance, is his affecting sonnet to the author of The Robbers:⁸³

Schiller! that hour I would have wished to die,
If through the shudd'ring midnight I had sent
From the dark dungeon of the tower time-rent
That fearful voice, a famished father's cry,
That in no after-moment aught less vast
Might stamp me mortal! A triumphant shout
Black horror screamed, and all her goblin rout
From the more with'ring scene diminished passed.
Ah, bard tremendous in sublimity!
Could I behold thee in thy loftier mood,
Wand'ring at eve, with finely frenzied eye,
Beneath some vast old tempest-swinging wood –
Awhile, with mute awe gazing, I would brood,
Then weep aloud in a wild ecstasy.

His tragedy entitled *Remorse*⁸⁴ is full of beautiful and striking passages, but it does not place the author in the first rank of dramatic writers. But if Mr Coleridge's works do not place him in that rank, they injure instead of conveying a just idea of the man, for he himself is certainly in the first class of general intellect.

If our author's poetry is inferior to his conversation, his prose is utterly abortive. Hardly a gleam is to be found in it of the brilliancy and richness of those stores of thought and language that he pours out incessantly, when they are lost like drops of water in the ground. The principal work in which he has attempted to embody his general views of things is The Friend,⁸⁵ of which, though it contains some noble passages and fine trains of thought, prolixity and obscurity are the most frequent characteristics.

No two persons can be conceived more opposite in character or genius than the subject of the present and of the preceding sketch. Mr Godwin, with less natural capacity and with fewer acquired advantages, by concentrating his mind on some given object and doing what he had to do with all his might, has accomplished much and will leave more than one monument of a powerful intellect behind him; Mr Coleridge, by dissipating his and dallying with every subject by turns, has done little or nothing to justify to the world or to posterity the high opinion which all who have ever heard him converse, or known him intimately, with one accord entertain of him. Mr Godwin's faculties have kept house and plied their task in the workshop of the brain, diligently and effectually; Mr Coleridge's have gossiped away their time and gadded about from house to house, as if life's business were⁸⁶ to melt the hours in listless talk. Mr Godwin is intent on a subject only as it concerns himself and his reputation; he works it out as a matter of duty, and discards from his mind whatever does not forward his main object as impertinent and vain. Mr Coleridge, on the other hand, delights in nothing but episodes and digressions, neglects whatever he undertakes to perform, and can act only on spontaneous impulses, without object or method: 'He cannot be constrained by mastery.'⁸⁷ While he should be occupied with a given pursuit, he is thinking of a thousand other things; a thousand tastes, a thousand objects tempt him and distract his mind, which keeps open house and entertains all comers and, after being fatigued and amused with morning calls from idle visitors, finds the day consumed and its business unconcluded. Mr Godwin, on the contrary, is somewhat exclusive and unsocial in his habits of mind, entertains no company but what he gives his whole time and attention to, and wisely writes over the doors of his understanding, his fancy, and his senses, 'No admittance except on business'. He has none of that fastidious refinement and false delicacy which might lead him to balance between the endless variety of modern attainments. He does not throw away his life (nor a single half-hour of it) in adjusting the claims of different accomplishments, and in choosing between them or making himself master of them all. He sets about his task, whatever it may be, and goes through it with spirit and fortitude. He has the happiness to think an author the greatest character in the world, and himself the greatest author in it. Mr Coleridge, in writing an harmonious stanza, would stop to consider whether there was not more grace and beauty in a pas de trois,⁸⁸ and would not proceed till he had resolved this question by a chain of metaphysical reasoning without end. Not so Mr Godwin. That is best to him which he can do best. He does not waste himself in vain aspirations and effeminate sympathies. He is blind, deaf, insensible to all but the trump of fame. Plays, operas, painting, music, ballrooms, wealth, fashion, titles, lords, ladies, touch him not: all these are no more to him than to the anchorite in his cell, and he writes on to the end of the chapter through good report and evil report. *Pingo in eternitatem*⁸⁹ is his motto. He neither envies nor admires what others are, but is contented to be what he is, and strives to do the utmost he can. Mr Coleridge has flirted with the muses as with a set of mistresses; Mr Godwin has been married twice – to Reason and to Fancy – and has to boast no short-lived progeny by each. So to speak, he has valves belonging to his mind to regulate the quantity of gas admitted into it, so that, like the bare, unsightly, but well-compacted steam-vessel, it cuts its liquid way, and arrives at its promised end; while Mr Coleridge's bark, 'taught with the little nautilus to sail',⁹⁰ the sport of every breath, dancing to every wave, 'Youth at its prow, and Pleasure at its helm',⁹¹ flutters its gaudy pennons in the air, glitters in the sun, but we wait in vain to hear of its arrival in the destined harbour. Mr Godwin, with less variety and vividness, with less subtlety and susceptibility both of thought and feeling, has had firmer nerves, a more determined purpose, a more comprehensive grasp of his subject, and the results are as we find them. Each has met with his reward – for justice has, after all, been done to the pretensions of each, and we must in all cases use means to ends!

James Henry Leigh Hunt (1784–1859)

Leigh Hunt was born on 19 October 1784 to Isaac and Mary Hunt, American Loyalists whose allegiance to George III led them to move to England shortly before their son's birth. He was educated as a charity boy at Christ's Hospital (1791–9) where he emerged as a precocious poet, publishing his youthful verse as Juvenilia in 1801. In 1808, with his brother John (1775–1848), he set up The Examiner – a reforming weekly newspaper that gained immediate popularity. Also, from 1810 to 1811 he edited The Reflector, which contained some of Lamb's early writings.

Hunt enjoyed his role of thorn in the government's side. There was much to criticize. A seemingly endless war against Napoleon was draining the country's resources – human and economic – and from 1811 it was waged by a government led by the Prince Regent, a byword for gluttony, indolence and self-indulgence. (His factotum, Sir William Knighton, called him 'The Great Beast'.) In his leading article in The Examiner for 22 March 1812, entitled 'The Prince on St Patrick's Day', Hunt began: 'The Prince Regent is still in everybody's mouth, and unless he is as insensible to biting as to bantering, a delicious time he has of it in that remorseless ubiquity!' Such double entendres were bad enough, but what really upset the Regent was the observation that:

this Exciter of Desire ... this Adonis in Loveliness, was a corpulent gentleman of fifty! In short, that this delightful, blissful, wise, pleasurable, honourable, virtuous, true, and immortal PRINCE was a violater of his word, a libertine over head and ears in debt and disgrace, a despiser of domestic ties, the companion of gamblers and demireps, a man who has just closed half a century without one single claim on the gratitude of his country or the respect of posterity!

The Regent did not take kindly to this, and the Hunts were successfully prosecuted for libel, fined £500 each (£16,500/US$31,000 today), and imprisoned for two years. This made them martyrs to a cause regarded as just, and despite an uneasy start to Hunt's prison term, the governor of the Surrey Gaol soon realized that he had to make life comfortable for his new inmate. Hunt's family was allowed to move in; he wrote and edited The Examiner from his cell, and was permitted to receive visitors until 10 o'clock at night. Rose-trellised wallpaper adorned his cell walls along with a pianoforte, a lute, busts of the great poets and bookcases filled with the poetry of Chaucer, Spenser, Milton and Dryden. Charles Lamb declared that 'there was no other such room except in a fairy tale'. Besides Lamb and his sister, visitors included Byron, Hazlitt and Haydon.

After release in February 1815 Hunt moved to the Vale of Health, Hampstead, where in 1816 he completed The Story of Rimini, dedicated to Byron (who had given advice during composition), now regarded as the most ambitious of his poems. Its story is taken from Dante's Inferno. Engaged to be married to Lanciotto da Rimini against her will, Francesca falls in love with his younger brother, Paulo. When their adultery is discovered they are murdered. Hunt's reworking of the tale enjoyed considerable success, especially among his friends. 'I have read, and re-read your exquisite pathetic tale', Haydon told him, 'till my soul is cut in two – and every nerve about me pierced with trembling needles ... it is the sweetest thing of the time.'

Hunt's notoriety as a freethinker was bound to generate controversy, and criticism of Rimini began in earnest with publication of the essays 'On the Cockney School of Poetry' by John Gibson Lockhart in Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine. Lockhart styled Hunt the 'chief Doctor and Professor' of the Cockney School (so-called after those born within the sound of Bow Bells in the City of London), which he defined by its irreligion (Hunt was an atheist), 'sour Jacobinism' and 'extreme moral depravity'. On this last matter, Lockhart was particularly scathing: alluding to Francesca in Rimini, he observed that, as far as Hunt was concerned, 'Every woman is useful only as a breeding machine, unless she is fond of reading Launcelot of the Lake, in an antique summer-house.'¹ Lockhart's attacks were spread across a number of essays written between 1817 and 1819, and alongside Hunt he would include Shelley, Byron, Hazlitt and Keats as fellow Cockneys (all of whom contributed to The Examiner).²

One of Hunt's chief tenets was that poetry was the vehicle of pleasure, and to that end he devised the concept of 'luxuries' – lush, verbally rich formulations equated with feelings of physical delight. This, as much as the subject matter of the poem, led Lockhart to accuse him of indecency and vulgarity. The extract from Canto III of the poem, presented here, was one of those which most upset him. It begins with a description of Francesca's summerhouse, continues with a vivid catalogue of Huntian luxuries, and culminates with a summary of 'Launcelot of the Lake, a bright romance', which she is reading, followed by her first kiss with Paulo. Lockhart was incensed:

The scene is in a little antique temple adorned by sculpture, and had Mr Hunt filled his friezes with funeral processions, or with the agonies of Orestes, or the despair of Oedipus, we might indeed have acknowledged that there was some propriety in his fancy. But as he has made of his temple a bagnio, so is its furniture conceived in the very spirit of the place.³

Lockhart then quoted lines 470–85 of the passage to illustrate his point (see pp. 822–3 below), concluding 'that we think that poet deserving of chastisement, who prostitutes his talents in a manner that is likely to corrupt milliners and apprentice-boys, no less than him who flies at noble game, and spreads his corruption among princes'.⁴ Hazlitt, by contrast, in The Spirit of the Age (1825), remarked that 'We will venture to oppose his Third Canto of the Story of Rimini for classic elegance and natural feeling to any equal number of lines from Mr Southey's Epics or from Mr Moore's Lalla Rookh' (Wu vii 228) – that is to say, poems that had attracted critical praise and sold many copies.

When Keats met Hunt in October 1816 he realized he had found a mentor when he most needed one. Hunt provided constructive criticism of his verse, and even kept a bed for him at his house in Hampstead, where Keats composed 'Sleep and Poetry'. But Keats was as aware as anyone of Hunt's vanity: 'There is no greater sin after the seven deadly than to flatter oneself into an idea of being a great poet', he wrote, after a visit to Hampstead (Rollins i 143). And by October 1817 he had come to regard Hunt's revisions to Endymion as 'corrections and amputations' that would give him the 'reputation of Hunt's élève' (or pupil) (Rollins i 170). He was right: when Lockhart published the fourth of his articles on the Cockney School in 1818, his principal target was Keats. Their respective abilities as poets can be gauged by a comparison of their sonnets on the grasshopper and the cricket, products of a competition in December 1816 umpired by their mutual friend, Charles Cowden Clarke. The poems appeared side by side in The Examiner, 21 September 1817; Keats's is on p. 1398 of this volume.

Foliage was published in 1818, and is one of Hunt's most important collections of poetry. It contains a cluster of sonnets addressed to other members of the Cockney School, including Shelley and Keats.⁵ Now resident in leafy Hampstead (which at that time was in the countryside, though near London), the Hunt of Foliage is a bucolic writer in the Hellenic manner. 'I write to enjoy myself,' he says in its preface. 'The main features of the book are a love of sociality, of the country, and of the fine imagination of the Greeks.'

Hunt was best known in his time as a prose writer, and the bulk of his literary output consisted of essays. He was Hazlitt's partner for The Round Table, a collection published first in The Examiner and then as a volume in 1817. 'A Now, Descriptive of a Hot Day' was written for The Indicator, another of Hunt's journals, which ran from 1819 to 1821. Hunt's Autobiography recalls that of all his essays it was Keats's favourite: 'He was with me while I was writing and reading it to him, and contributed one or two of the passages.'⁶ Like the poetry, it is a catalogue of luxuries, exemplifying the view that literature is a vehicle of 'pleasure'.

In later years Hunt published, besides other works, Leigh Hunt's London Journal (1834–5), Imagination and Fancy (1844), Men, Women, and Books (1847), his Autobiography (1850) and Table Talk (1851). Like many professional writers, he was often in financial difficulty, but much assisted by the award of a Civil List pension in 1847. He died in Putney and was buried at Kensal Green cemetery, where his grave is still to be seen.

To Hampstead (composed 7 May 1815)¹

From The Examiner (14 May 1815)

As one who after long and far-spent years
Comes on his mistress in an hour of sleep,
And half-surprised that he can silence keep
Stands smiling o'er her through a flash of tears,
To see how sweet and self-same she appears; 5
Till at his touch, with little moving creep
Of joy, she wakes from out her calmness deep,
And then his heart finds voice, and dances round her ears –
So I, first coming on my haunts again,²
In pause and stillness of the early prime,³ 10
Stood thinking of the past and present time
With earnest eyesight, scarcely crossed with pain;
Till the fresh moving leaves, and startling birds,
Loosened my long-suspended breath in words.

To Hampstead

¹ Hunt wrote a series of sonnets in praise of Hampstead, which he published in The Examiner.

² first coming on my haunts again this was Hunt's first visit to Hampstead Heath since incarceration in the Surrey Gaol, 1813–15 (see headnote, p. 816).

Canto III. The Fatal Passion (extract)

From The Story of Rimini, A Poem (1816)¹

At times like these the princess tried to shun
The face of Paulo as too kind a one;
And shutting up her tears with resolute sigh,
Would walk into the air, and see the sky,
And feel about her all the garden green, 380
And hear the birds that shot the covert boughs between.

A noble range it was, of many a rood,²
Walled round with trees, and ending in a wood:
Indeed the whole was leafy; and it had
A winding stream about it, clear and glad, 385
That danced from shade to shade, and on its way
Seemed smiling with delight to feel the day.
There was the pouting rose, both red and white,
The flamy heart's-ease, flushed with purple light,
Blush-hiding strawberry, sunny-coloured box, 390
Hyacinth, handsome with his clustering locks,
The lady lily, looking gently down,
Pure lavender, to lay in bridal gown,
The daisy, lovely on both sides – in short,
All the sweet cups to which the bees resort, 395
With plots of grass, and perfumed walks between
Of citron, honeysuckle, and jessamine,³
With orange, whose warm leaves so finely suit,
And look as if they'd shade a golden fruit;

And midst the flowers, turfed round beneath a shade 400
Of circling pines, a babbling fountain played,
And 'twixt their shafts you saw the water bright,
Which through the darksome tops glimmered with showering light.
So now you walked beside an odorous bed
Of gorgeous hues, white, azure, golden red, 405
And now turned off into a leafy walk
Close and continuous, fit for lovers' talk;
And now pursued the stream, and as you trod
Onward and onward o'er the velvet sod,
Felt on your face an air, watery and sweet, 410
And a new sense in your soft-lighting feet;
And then perhaps you entered upon shades
Pillowed with dells and uplands 'twixt the glades,
Through which the distant palace, now and then,
Looked lordly forth with many-windowed ken; 415
A land of trees, which reaching round about,
In shady blessing stretched their old arms out,
With spots of sunny opening, and with nooks
To lie and read in, sloping into brooks,
Where at her drink you started the slim deer, 420
Retreating lightly with a lovely fear.
And all about, the birds kept leafy house,
And sung and sparkled in and out the boughs;
And all about, a lovely sky of blue
Clearly was felt, or down the leaves laughed through; 425
And here and there, in every part, were seats,
Some in the open walks, some in retreats,
With bowering leaves o'erhead, to which the eye
Looked up half sweetly and half awfully –
Places of nestling green for poets made, 430
Where when the sunshine struck a yellow shade,
The slender trunks, to inward-peeping sight,
Thronged in dark pillars up the gold green light.
But 'twixt the wood and flowery walks, halfway,

And formed of both, the loveliest portion lay, 435
A spot, that struck you like enchanted ground:
It was a shallow dell, set in a mound
Of sloping shrubs, that mounted by degrees,
The birch and poplar mixed with heavier trees;
From under which, sent through a marble spout, 440
Betwixt the dark wet green, a rill gushed out,
Whose low sweet talking seemed as if it said
Something eternal to that happy shade.
The ground within was lawn, with plots of flowers
Heaped towards the centre, and with citron bowers; 445
And in the midst of all, clustered about
With bay and myrtle, and just gleaming out,
Lurked a pavilion, a delicious sight,
Small, marble, well-proportioned, mellowy white,
With yellow vine-leaves sprinkled – but no more – 450
And a young orange either side the door.
The door was to the wood, forward and square,
The rest was domed at top, and circular;
And through the dome the only light came in,
Tinged, as it entered, with the vine-leaves thin. 455
It was a beauteous piece of ancient skill,
Spared from the rage of war, and perfect still;
By some supposed the work of fairy hands,
Famed for luxurious taste, and choice of lands –
Alcina or Morgana, who from fights 460
And errant fame inveigled amorous knights,
And lived with them in a long round of blisses,
Feasts, concerts, baths, and bower-enshaded kisses.
But 'twas a temple, as its sculpture told,
Built to the nymphs that haunted there of old; 465
For o'er the door was carved a sacrifice
By girls and shepherds brought, with reverent eyes,
Of sylvan drinks and foods, simple and sweet,
And goats with struggling horns and planted feet:
And on a line with this ran round about 470

A like relief, touched exquisitely out,
 That showed, in various scenes, the nymphs themselves;
 Some by the water side on bowery shelves
 Leaning at will – some in the water sporting
 With sides half swelling forth, and looks of courting;⁵ 475
 Some in a flowery dell, hearing a swain
 Play on his pipe, till the hills ring again;
 Some tying up their long moist hair; some sleeping
 Under the trees, with fauns and satyrs peeping,
 Or, sidelong-eyed, pretending not to see, 480
 The latter in the brakes come creepingly,
 While their forgotten urns, lying about
 In the green herbage, let the water out.
 Never, be sure, before or since was seen
 A summer-house so fine in such a nest of green.⁶ 485
 All the green garden, flowerbed, shade and plot
 Francesca loved, but most of all this spot.
 Whenever she walked forth, wherever went
 About the grounds, to this at last she bent:
 Here she had brought a lute and a few books; 490
 Here would she lie for hours, with grateful looks,
 Thanking at heart the sunshine and the leaves,
 The summer raindrops counting from the eaves,
 And all that promising, calm smile we see
 In nature's face, when we look patiently. 495
 Then would she think of heaven; and you might hear
 Sometimes, when everything was hushed and clear,
 Her gentle voice from out those shades emerging,
 Singing the evening anthem to the Virgin.
 The gardeners and the rest, who served the place, 500
 And blest whenever they beheld her face,
 Knelt when they heard it, bowing and uncovered,
 And felt as if in air some sainted beauty hovered.
 One day, 'twas on a summer afternoon
 When airs and gurgling brooks are best in tune, 505

And grasshoppers are loud, and day-work done,
And shades have heavy outlines in the sun,
The princess came to her accustomed bower
To get her, if she could, a soothing hour,
Trying, as she was used, to leave her cares 510
Without, and slumberously enjoy the airs,
And the low-talking leaves, and that cool light
The vines let in, and all that hushing sight
Of closing wood seen through the opening door,
And distant plash of waters tumbling o'er, 515
And smell of citron blooms, and fifty luxuries more.
She tried, as usual, for the trial's sake,
For even that diminished her heart-ache;
And never yet, how ill soe'er at ease,
Came she for nothing midst the flowers and trees. 520
Yet somehow or another, on that day
She seemed to feel too lightly borne away,
Too much relieved, too much inclined to draw
A careless joy from everything she saw,
And looking round her with a new-born eye, 525
As if some tree of knowledge⁷ had been nigh,
To taste of nature, primitive and free,
And bask at ease in her heart's liberty.
Painfully clear those rising thoughts appeared,
With something dark at bottom that she feared; 530
And snatching from the fields her thoughtful look,
She reached o'er-head, and took her down a book,
And fell to reading with as fixed an air,
As though she had been wrapt since morning there.
'Twas Launcelot of the Lake, a bright romance, 535
That like a trumpet made young pulses dance,
Yet had a softer note that shook still more;
She had begun it but the day before,
And read with a full heart, half sweet, half sad,
How old King Ban was spoiled of all he had 540

But one fair castle: how one summer's day
With his fair queen and child he went away
To ask the great King Arthur for assistance;
How reaching by himself a hill at distance
He turned to give his castle a last look, 545
And saw its far white face: and how a smoke,
As he was looking, burst in volumes forth,
And good King Ban saw all that he was worth,
And his fair castle, burning to the ground,
So that his wearied pulse felt over-wound, 550
And he lay down, and said a prayer apart
For those he loved, and broke his poor old heart.
Then read she of the queen with her young child,
How she came up, and nearly had gone wild,
And how in journeying on in her despair, 555
She reached a lake and met a lady there,
Who pitied her, and took the baby sweet
Into her arms, when lo, with closing feet
She sprang up all at once, like bird from brake,
And vanished with him underneath the lake. 560
The mother's feelings we as well may pass:
The fairy of the place that lady was,
And Launcelot (so the boy was called) became
Her inmate, till in search of knightly fame
He went to Arthur's court, and played his part 565
So rarely, and displayed so frank a heart,
That what with all his charms of look and limb,
The Queen Geneura fell in love with him:
And here, with growing interest in her reading,
The Princess, doubly fixed, was now proceeding. 570
Ready she sat with one hand to turn o'er
The leaf, to which her thoughts ran on before,
The other propping her white brow, and throwing
Its ringlets out, under the skylight glowing.
So sat she fixed; and so observed was she 575
Of one, who at the door stood tenderly –

Paulo, who from a window seeing her
 Go straight across the lawn, and guessing where,
 Had thought she was in tears, and found, that day,
 His usual efforts vain to keep away. 580
 ‘May I come in?’ said he (it made her start,
 That smiling voice); she coloured, pressed her heart
 A moment, as for breath, and then with free
 And usual tone said, ‘Oh yes, certainly.’
 There’s wont to be, at conscious times like these, 585
 An affectation of a bright-eyed ease,
 An air of something quite serene and sure,
 As if to seem so, was to be, secure:
 With this the lovers met, with this they spoke,
 With this they sat down to the self-same book, 590
 And Paulo, by degrees, gently embraced
 With one permitted arm her lovely waist;
 And both their cheeks, like peaches on a tree,
 Leaned with a touch together, thrillingly;
 And o’er the book they hung, and nothing said, 595
 And every lingering page grew longer as they read.
 As thus they sat, and felt with leaps of heart
 Their colour change, they came upon the part
 Where fond Geneura, with her flame long nursed,
 Smiled upon Launcelot when he kissed her first: 600
 That touch, at last, through every fibre slid;
 And Paulo turned, scarce knowing what he did,
 Only he felt he could no more dissemble,
 And kissed her, mouth to mouth, all in a tremble.
 Sad were those hearts, and sweet was that long kiss: 605
 Sacred be love from sight, whate’er it is.
 The world was all forgot,⁸ the struggle o’er,⁹
 Desperate the joy. That day they read no more.¹⁰

From The Story of Rimini

1 Rimini was Hunt's most important poetical work, largely written during his imprisonment in the Surrey Gaol (see headnote). This extract describes Francesca da Rimini's garden and culminates with her first kiss with Paulo, with whom she is to have an illicit affair.

2 rood a measure of between 6 and 8 yards.

3 jessamine jasmine. Throughout this passage Hunt alludes to Adam and Eve's 'blissful bower' which is planted with 'Iris all hues, roses, and jessamine' (Paradise Lost iv 698).

4 ken view. This word is used in the same sense in Keats's 'On First Looking into Chapman's Homer' see pp. I396–7 below.

5 the nymphs themselves...courting Lockhart was particularly offended by this: 'The indecent attitudes of the nymphs on the cornice can only be equalled by the blasphemous allusion to the history of our first parents.'

6 A summer-house...green Lockhart described this is a 'bagnio' (see headnote p. 818).

7 tree of knowledge a reference to the story of Adam and Eve.

8 The world was all forgot Nicholas Roe suggests an echo of the casting-out of Adam and Eve from Eden: 'The world was all before them' (Paradise Lost xii 646).

9 the struggle o'er Nicholas Roe suggests 'a semi-blasphemous allusion to Christ's crucifixion, refiguring his martyrdom at a climax of all too human passion'; see John Keats and the Culture of Dissent (Oxford, 1997), p. 121.

10 That day they read no more This translates the famous line in Dante, Inferno v I38.

*On the Grasshopper and Cricket*¹

From The Examiner (21 September 1817)

Green little vaulter in the sunny grass,
Catching your heart up at the feel of June,
Sole voice left stirring midst the lazy noon,
When ev'n the bees lag at the summoning brass;
And you, warm little housekeeper, who class 5
With those who think the candles come too soon,
Loving the fire, and with your tricksome tune
Nick the glad silent moments as they pass; –
Oh sweet and tiny cousins, that belong
One to the fields, the other to the hearth, 10
Both have your sunshine; both though small are strong
At your clear hearts; and both were sent on earth
To ring in thoughtful ears this natural song,
In doors and out, summer and winter – Mirth.
December 30, 1816.

On the Grasshopper and Cricket

¹ This was the product of a sonnet-writing competition with Keats. Hunt published both poems side by side in The Examiner. For Keats's sonnet, see p. 1398.

What wonder, Percy, that with jealous rage
Men should defame the kindly and the wise,²
When in the midst of the all-beauteous skies,
And all this lovely world, that should engage
Their mutual search for the old golden age, 5
They seat a phantom,³ swelled into grim size
Out of their own passions and bigotries,
And then, for fear, proclaim it meek and sage!
And this they call a light and a revealing!
Wise as the clown⁴ who, plodding home at night 10
In autumn, turns at call of fancied elf,
And sees upon the fog, with ghastly feeling,
A giant shadow in its imminent might,

Which his own lanthorn⁵ throws up from himself.

To Percy Shelley

¹ This poem and the one that follows should be read in the light of Shelley's comments on Hunt's atheism, 8 May 1811: 'he is a Deist despising Jesus Christ, etc., etc., yet having a high veneration for the Deity ... with him God is neither omnipotent, omnipresent, nor identical ... he says that God is comprehensible, not doubting but an adequate exertion of reason ... would lead us from a contemplation of his works to a definite knowledge of his attributes, which are by no means limited' (Jones i 77).

² the kindly and the wise presumably themselves (i.e. Hunt and Shelley). Shelley had been expelled from Oxford for publishing a pamphlet on 'The Necessity of Atheism'.

³ a phantom i.e. conventional notions of God.

⁴ clown untutored peasant.

⁵ lanthorn lantern.

From Foliage (1818)

Yet, Percy, not for this, should he whose eye
Sees loveliness, and the unselfish joy
Of justice, turn him, like a peevish boy,
At hindrances and thwartings, and deny
Wisdom's divinest privilege, constancy – 5
That which most proves him free from the alloy
Of useless earth, least prone to the decoy¹
That clamours down weak pinions from the sky.
The Spirit of Beauty,² though by solemn choirs
Hourly blasphemed, stoops not from its calm end, 10
And forward breathing love, but ever on
Rolls the round day, and calls the starry fires
To their glad watch. Therefore, high-hearted friend,
Be still with thine own task in unison.

To the Same

¹ decoy bird trained to lure others into the hunter's trap.

² The Spirit of Beauty an allusion to Shelley's 'Hymn to Intellectual Beauty', published by Hunt in The Examiner for 19 January 1817 (see p. 1101), which features an address to the 'Spirit of Beauty' in stanzas 2–4.

To John Keats (composed 1 December 1816)¹

From Foliage (1818)

'Tis well you think me truly one of those
Whose sense discerns the loveliness of things;
For surely as I feel the bird that sings
Behind the leaves, or dawn as it up grows,
Or the rich bee rejoicing as he goes, 5
Or the glad issue of emerging springs,
Or overhead the glide of a dove's wings,
Or turf, or trees, or, midst of all, repose;
And surely as I feel things lovelier still,
The human look, and the harmonious form 10
Containing woman, and the smile in ill,
And such a heart as Charles',² wise and warm –
As surely as all this, I see, ev'n now,
Young Keats, a flowering laurel on your brow.

To John Keats

¹ This sonnet was written on the day Hunt published his article, 'Young Poets', in The Examiner, which praised Keats alongside Shelley and published 'On First Looking into Chapman's Homer' for the first time.

A Now, Descriptive of a Hot Day¹

From The Indicator (1820)

Now the rosy- (and lazy-) fingered Aurora, issuing from her saffron house,² calls up the moist vapours to surround her, and goes veiled with them as long as she can; till Phoebus,³ coming forth in his power, looks everything out of the sky, and holds sharp uninterrupted empire from his throne of beams. Now the mower begins to make his sweeping cuts more slowly, and resorts oftener to the beer. Now the carter sleeps atop of his load of hay, or plods with double slouch of shoulder, looking out with eyes winking under his shading hat, and with a hitch upward of one side of his mouth. Now the little girl at her grandmother's cottage-door watches the coaches that go by, with her hand held up over her sunny forehead. Now labourers look well, resting in their white shirts at the doors of rural alehouses. Now an elm is fine there, with a seat under it; and horses drink out of the trough, stretching their yearning necks with loosened collars; and the traveller calls for his glass of ale, having been without one for more than ten minutes; and his horse stands wincing at the flies, giving sharp shivers of his skin, and moving to and fro his ineffectual docked tail; and now Miss Betty Wilson, the host's daughter, comes streaming forth in a flowered gown and earrings, carrying with four of her beautiful fingers the foaming glass, for which, after the traveller has drank it, she receives with an indifferent eye, looking another way, the lawful two pence: that is to say, unless the traveller, nodding his ruddy face, pays some gallant compliment to her before he drinks – such as, 'I'd rather kiss you, my dear, than the tumbler', or, 'I'll wait for you, my love, if you'll marry me' – upon which, if the man is good-looking, and the lady in good humour, she smiles and bites her lips, and says, 'Ah, men can talk fast enough', upon which the old stagecoachman, who is buckling something near her before he sets off, says in a hoarse voice, 'So can women too for that matter', and John Boots grins through his ragged red locks, and dotes on the repartee all the day after. Now grasshoppers 'fry', as Dryden says.⁴ Now cattle stand in water and ducks are envied. Now boots and shoes and trees by the roadside are thick with dust; and dogs, rolling in it, after issuing out of the water into which they have been thrown to fetch sticks, come scattering horror among the legs of the spectators. Now a fellow who finds he has three miles further to go in a pair of tight shoes is in a pretty situation.⁵ Now rooms with the sun upon them become intolerable; and the apothecary's apprentice,⁶ with a bitterness beyond aloes,⁷ thinks of the pond he used to bathe in at school. Now men with powdered heads (especially if thick) envy those that are unpowdered, and stop to wipe them uphill, with countenances that seem to expostulate with destiny. Now boys assemble round the village pump with a ladle to it, and delight to make a forbidden splash and get wet through the shoes. Now also they make suckers of leather,⁸ and bathe all day long in rivers and ponds, and follow the fish into their cool corners, and say millions of ‘My eyes!’ at tittle-bats.⁹ Now the bee, as he hums along, seems to be talking heavily of the heat. Now doors and brick walls are burning to the hand; and a walled lane, with dust and broken bottles in it, near a brick-field,¹⁰ is a thing not to be thought of. Now a green lane, on the contrary, thick-set with hedgerow elms, and having the noise of a brook ‘rumbling in pebble-stone’,¹¹ is one of the pleasantest things in the world. Now youths and damsels walk through hayfields by chance; and if the latter say, ‘Ha’ done then, William’, and the overseer¹² in the next field calls out to ‘Let thic thear hay thear bide’, the girls persist, merely to plague ‘such a frumpish¹³ old fellow’.

Now, in town, gossips talk more than ever to one another, in rooms, in doorways, and out of window, always beginning the conversation with saying that the heat is overpowering. Now blinds are let down and doors thrown open and flannel waistcoats left off, and cold meat preferred to hot, and wonder expressed why tea continues so refreshing, and people delight to sliver lettuces into bowls, and apprentices water doorways with tin canisters that lay several atoms of dust. Now the water-cart, jumbling along the middle of the street, and jolting the showers out of its box of water, really does something. Now boys delight to have a water-pipe let out, and see it bubbling away in a tall and frothy volume. Now fruiterers’ shops and dairies look pleasant, and ices are the only things to those who can get them. Now ladies loiter in baths; and people make presents of flowers; and wine is put into ice; and the after-dinner lounge recreates¹⁴ his head with applications of perfumed water out of long-necked bottles. Now the lounge, who cannot resist riding his new horse, feels his boots burn him. Now buckskins¹⁵ are not the lawn¹⁶ of Cos. Now jockeys, walking in greatcoats to lose flesh, curse inwardly. Now five fat people in a stagecoach hate the sixth fat one who is coming in, and think he has no right to be so large. Now clerks in offices do nothing but drink soda-water and spruce beer,¹⁷ and read the newspaper. Now the old-clothes-man¹⁸ drops his solitary cry more deeply into the areas on the hot and forsaken side of the street; and bakers look vicious; and cooks are aggravated; and the steam of a tavern-kitchen catches hold of one like the breath of Tartarus.¹⁹ Now delicate skins are beset with gnats; and boys make their sleeping companion start up with playing a burning-glass²⁰ on his hand; and blacksmiths are super-carbonated;²¹ and cobblers in their stalls almost feel a wish to be transplanted; and butter is too easy to spread; and the dragoons wonder whether the Romans liked their helmets; and old ladies, with their lappets²² unpinned, walk along in a state of dilapidation; and the servant-maids are afraid they look vulgarly hot; and the author, who has a plate of strawberries brought him, finds that he has come to the end of his writing.

² Now the...house an elaborate way of saying that dawn sky (Aurora) is filled with orange-yellow (saffron) light; ‘rosy-fingered dawn’ is a stock phrase from Homer, Odyssey ii I.

³ Phoebus i.e. the sun.

⁴ Hunt recalls Dryden, Virgil’s Georgics iii 510–II, although the word ‘fry’ is not used.

⁵ pretty situation ironic; he’s in a terrible situation.

⁶ the apothecary’s apprentice Keats trained as an apothecary.

⁷ aloes a drug of nauseous odour, bitter taste, and purgative qualities, procured from the juice of the aloe plant.

8 suckers of leather a toy, consisting of a round piece of leather with a string attached at the centre, which, laid wet upon a solid surface and drawn up by the string, adheres by reason of the vacuum created.

9 tittlebats sticklebats.

10 brick-field yard where bricks are made.

11 Spenser, 'Virgil's Gnat' I63: 'caerule streame, rombling in pible stone.'

12 overseer supervisor.

13 frumpish ill-tempered.

14 recreates revives, refreshes.

15 buckskins breeches made of buckskin (too warm in the summer).

16 lawn fine linen, such as that made of the island of Cos in the Aegean.

17 spruce beer beer made from leaves and branches of the spruce fir.

18 old-clothes-man dealer in old or second-hand clothes.

19 Tartarus in classical literature, the walled and dark underworld prison reserved for the punishment of the wicked.

20 burning-glass lens through which the rays of the sun are concentrated so as to burn.

21 super-carbonated so hot that they are completely reduced to carbon.

22 lappets flaps of their dress which would normally be fastened down.

Thomas De Quincey (1785–1859)

He was born Thomas Penson Quincey in Manchester on 15 August 1785, the fourth of seven children born to Thomas Quincey, a linen merchant, and Elizabeth Penson Quincey, then resident in central Manchester. In November 1790 his father purchased three acres of land close to Moss Side, in the countryside beyond the city boundaries, where his wife designed the house in which their children were to grow up, called Greenhay. They moved into it in 1791.

De Quincey hardly knew his father, who worked in Manchester and travelled increasingly to the West Indies, where he had business interests. He died of tuberculosis at the age of 40 in 1793. By that time De Quincey had lost his elder sister, Elizabeth, who was only 9. Her death, from meningitis, was a terrible blow, partly because a lack of affection between him and his mother led him to depend emotionally on Elizabeth. It was with her that he read books and played games in the nursery, and between them there developed a love that would overshadow all subsequent relationships with women. His tribute to her is one of the key recollections of Suspiria De Profundis (see pp. 850–5). He wanted to see her after a post-mortem had been performed, but fortunately for him the door of her room was locked and he was unable to enter.

Elizabeth's death caused him intense grief at an early age, for which he later remembered being teased, probably by his elder brother William:

And when I was told insultingly to cease 'my girlish tears', that word girlish had no sting for me, except as a verbal echo to the one eternal thought in my heart – that girl was the sweetest thing I, in my short life, had known – that a girl it was who had crowned the earth with beauty, and had opened to my thirst fountains of pure celestial love, from which, in this world, I was to drink no more. (Lindop xv 148)

Such were his feelings that he had visions of sick and dying children as he gazed at the stained-glass windows in church.

De Quincey was tutored privately for the next three years and distinguished himself in the study of Latin and Greek. In 1796 the family sold Greenhay and moved to the fashionable North Parade in Bath; there he visited the mysterious maze in Sydney Gardens, where he played on his own. His academic progress at the Grammar School was excellent and he was soon the star pupil, capable of haranguing an Athenian mob. How perverse, then, that his mother decided, on a whim, to remove him: he protested, as did the headmaster, but she was adamant. Instead she sent him to the small Winkfield School in Wiltshire, where the comparatively unchallenging regime left him bored.

At this time the family changed its name to De Quincey on the dubious basis that they were descended from the De Quincis who came over with William the Conqueror – typical of the kind of social climbing his mother went in for. One day in 1799, while at Bath, Thomas came across a manuscript copy of 'We Are Seven', published in the first edition of Lyrical Ballads the year before (see p. 380). (The poem was composed not far from Bath, at Alfoxden in Somerset.) After an eventful summer holiday in 1800, during which he met George III, he enrolled at Manchester Grammar School. One of the few consolations of his first year was the acquisition of a copy of the newly published Lyrical Ballads (second edition, 1800). It was a revelation. Wordsworth and Coleridge kept their names off the title-page, but he soon found out their identities (well known in literary circles), and from that time onwards was determined to meet them. Continuing unhappiness at school during his second year led him to run away in July 1802, his copy of Lyrical Ballads in his coat pocket. His mother became aware of his plans through his uncle, but it was eventually agreed that he be allowed to continue on his way provided he remained in touch.

He walked through north Wales – sometimes sleeping rough, sometimes staying at inns along the road. At some point he decided to break off contact with his family and go to London, where he arrived in late November. He was to remain there throughout a harsh winter, living on the breadline. We do not know for sure whether ‘Ann of Oxford Street’ was a real person; if so, it was at this time that he came to know her. She was one of many prostitutes he came to know well during the course of his life.

In March 1803 he was reconciled with his family. Wordsworth was his literary idol, and in May he sent him a fan letter. ‘Your name is with me forever linked to the lovely scenes of nature’, he told him:

you will never find anyone more zealously attached to you – more full of admiration for your mental excellence and of reverential love for your moral character – more ready (I speak from my heart!) to sacrifice even his life – whenever it could have a chance of promoting your interest and happiness – than he who now bends the knee before you. And I will add that to no man on earth except yourself and one other (a friend of yours)¹ would I thus lowly and suppliantly prostrate myself.²

At a time when his poetry was an acquired taste, Wordsworth must have found such words welcome, even though he suspected such hero-worship might not endure, and perhaps turn sour. He wrote a gracious but cautious response, declaring ‘it will give me great pleasure to see you at Grasmere if you should ever come this way.’³

In December 1803 De Quincey went up to Worcester College, Oxford, as a commoner. He was unhappy there, declining to take part in either social or educational activities, and pursued a course of private study of his own devising, concentrated on German and philosophy. In need of money, he was soon journeying to London to visit a moneylender. On one such trip in October 1804 he tried opium, to soothe ‘rheumatic pains’ in his head which stemmed from toothache. It was, he later recalled, an ‘abyss of divine enjoyment’, ‘the secret of happiness’ and ‘a panacea ... for all human woes’. His addiction had begun. From now on, his life would be a round of depression, euphoria and opium reveries. Indeed, he became something of a hedonist, sometimes committing what he called ‘a debauch of opium’⁴ before a visit to the opera, where the music would be enhanced by the drug, ‘its passions exalted, spiritualized, and sublimed’.⁵

He made three abortive attempts to visit Wordsworth in Grasmere, each time turning back out of anxiety. Instead, he went to Nether Stowey to meet his other hero, Coleridge, to whom he became a friend. He got on well with Coleridge’s children, and escorted Mrs Coleridge and the family to the Lake District, where they were to settle with Southey at Greta Hall in Keswick. On arrival in Cumbria they headed for Dove Cottage in Grasmere and there, finally, De Quincey met Wordsworth. He gradually gained the trust of both him and his sister, who was the more approachable. For her part, Dorothy was delighted with him, as she told her friend, Lady Beaumont:

He is a remarkable and very interesting young man; very diminutive in person, which to strangers makes him appear insignificant; and so modest, and so very shy that even now I wonder how he ever had the courage to address himself to my brother by letter. I think of this young man with extraordinary pleasure, as he is a remarkable instance of the power of my brother's poems over a lonely and contemplative mind, unwarped by any established laws of taste – a pure and innocent mind!⁶

De Quincey had to return to Oxford to take his final examinations: the first day went well, but for some reason he panicked on the second and ran off, never to return. He went straight to London where he continued to meet with Coleridge, and in autumn 1808 returned to Grasmere, where the Wordsworths had moved to Allan Bank, a large house that overlooked the valley. Wordsworth was exercised by the plight of the Spanish freedom-fighters, struggling to repel Napoleon's army despite the treacherous tactics of the Allies. He wrote a pamphlet in their support, entitled The Convention of Cintra, and entrusted De Quincey with the task of seeing it through the press. This was a bit of a disaster, as De Quincey failed to ensure that potentially libellous remarks (some of them about the Duke of Wellington) were suppressed, and was responsible for a system of punctuation of which Wordsworth disapproved. It sold badly, and Wordsworth blamed De Quincey for its failure.

In October 1809 De Quincey became the new tenant of Dove Cottage, where the Wordsworths had spent some of their happiest and most productive years. Part of the attraction of this arrangement was that they could visit and enjoy the garden, in which they had invested so much loving care – and to begin with, they went over almost every day. Not surprisingly then, they took umbrage when De Quincey chopped down Wordsworth's beloved trees in the back garden, and demolished the 'moss-hut' which he had painstakingly constructed in order to provide a view across the valley. Before lasting strains developed in the relationship, De Quincey became one of the few people to read The Prelude – in manuscript, as it would not be published until after Wordsworth's death in 1850, four decades later. De Quincey was highly impressed, in particular by the 'spots of time', which he adapted for his theory of involutes (see p. 851). For someone in love with opium, the concept was a gift. De Quincey made it his own, endowing it with the inscrutable, nightmarish quality of his opium reveries: 'I was kissed with cancerous kisses by crocodiles, and laid confounded with all unutterable slimy things amongst reeds and Nilotic mud' (p. 843). It was for such inspired fantasias, bordering on the obscene, that De Quincey would, decades hence, attract the admiration of Edgar Allen Poe, Baudelaire, William S. Burroughs and Jorge Luis Borges. He takes the concept of the involute to its extreme in 'Savannah-la-Mar' and 'The Palimpsest of the Human Brain' (pp. 855–80).

Catharine (Kate) Wordsworth was a mere infant when she first met De Quincey, but he took to her immediately and was appointed by her father as her sole tutor. She was a very special child. Wordsworth called her his 'little Chinese maiden', and Dorothy described her face as 'perfectly comic'. Kate was as attached to De Quincey (whom she called 'Kinsey') as he was to her; when he went away she searched every room in the cottage for him, even pulling the sheets from the bed to see if he was hiding beneath them. One morning in 1810, she had a fit that left her paralysed down her right side. She made a partial recovery, but the convulsions returned in June 1812 and killed her. She was in her fourth year. 'Oh that I could have died for her or with her!' De Quincey told Dorothy. 'Willingly dear friend I would have done this.' For two months after her death he slept on her grave and claimed to have visions of her walking the fells.

If that wasn't enough to distance him from the Wordsworth family, his opium addiction was. By 1816 he was consuming 320 grains a day – a sizeable dose, signalling that he was a confirmed addict. And the Wordsworths disapproved of his affair with Margaret Simpson, a local serving girl ten years his junior (she was 17). They thought she was beneath him in social standing, and Dorothy uncharitably described her as 'a stupid heavy girl ... a dunce at Grasmere School'. Such was Wordsworth's feeling on the matter that he wrote to De Quincey's mother to warn her what was afoot. De Quincey found such interference hard either to forgive or to understand, and temporarily broke off contact with the Wordsworths, leading him to become depressed, on account of which he prescribed himself more opium. Margaret gave birth to a son, William Penson, in 1816, and married De Quincey the following year.

De Quincey would re-establish relations with Wordsworth, but there was little warmth left in the association. The outgrowing of his mentor proved a liberation, and his journalistic career took off when in 1818 he became editor of the Westmorland Gazette. Though sacked for inefficiency within the year, he drove himself hard, and under his editorship the paper began to show a profit, which it would not do again for years. Most importantly, it revealed to him his future path.

De Quincey was not out of work for long. He was almost immediately invited by John Wilson to write for Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine. He fell out with the editors by failing to submit his work on time, but he travelled to London and began submitting essays to the London Magazine. He found himself writing a series of articles under the shameless title 'Confessions of an English Opium-Eater'. They were an instant hit, helping to increase circulation of the London, and when in 1821 he collected them in a book it became a popular success, which has remained in print ever since. Perhaps because he was a fellow sufferer, De Quincey's former mentor, Coleridge, was less impressed. In 1833 he would speak of the Confessions 'with absolute abhorrence', calling it 'a wicked book, a monstrous exaggeration', attacking De Quincey for 'laying open his nakedness to the world'.⁷ What shocked Coleridge, more than De Quincey's association with prostitutes, was his recreational use of drugs. 'I'm a hedonist', De Quincey declared, 'and if you must know why I take opium, that's the reason.'

The series of false starts and failures that characterized his early life were due to the influence of the drug, and it set a trend against which he would battle for the remainder of his life. He was expected to produce a third instalment of the Confessions for the London Magazine, but never did so; he returned to Grasmere with an advance for a novel, but never wrote it. All the same, despite his addiction, he wrote a vast quantity of material for a wide variety of newspapers and periodicals, including the London Magazine, John Stoddart's The New Times, Blackwood's, the Edinburgh Saturday Post, Edinburgh Literary Gazette and Tait's Edinburgh Magazine.

Foremost among his journalism is his article 'On the Knocking at the Gate in Macbeth' (pp. 845–8) – a brilliant discussion of Macduff's knocking after the murder of King Duncan. De Quincey described it as 'psychological criticism', a way of thinking learnt partly from Wordsworth and Coleridge. In order to appreciate its achievement, it is important to bear in mind that the academic discipline of psychology did not yet exist. He had learnt from conversations with Wordsworth and his own close reading of The Prelude that literary works operated on our emotions by describing psychological processes we recognize as true to our own experience. In 'On the Knocking at the Gate in Macbeth' he reveals just one of those processes, analysing it in close detail, and in doing so reveals both what he had learnt from Wordsworth, and how perceptive a critic he had become. It is typical of his best work, in that it begins with an emotional effect, and shows us how that effect is obtained. The same razor-sharp observation of the human mind works is the central feature of his comment 'On Wordsworth's "There was a boy"' (see pp. 848–50).

His 'Recollections of the Lake Poets' (1839–40) are among the most important of his later works, giving us intimate accounts of Southey, Wordsworth and Coleridge as he had known them. They are entertaining, memorable, and in various respects wrong. He had known both men well, but hero-worship had turned to resentment, and he could not help portraying them in a bad light. Wordsworth, he commented, was 'not a well-made man', he had 'a crooked walk', his manners were imperfect, he was 'slovenly' and did not read much. Dorothy had a stammer; Mary Wordsworth was plain. Not surprisingly, Wordsworth was infuriated. 'I have never read a word of his infamous production, nor ever shall', he remarked:

My acquaintance with him was the result of a letter of his own volunteered to me. He was 7 months an inmate of my house; and by what breach of the laws of hospitality that kindness was repaid, his performance, if rightly represented to me, sufficiently shows. A man who can set such an example, I hold to be a pest in society, and one of the most worthless of mankind.⁸

One reason why De Quincey so ruthlessly exploited his acquaintance with Wordsworth was the fact that he was in dire need of money to fuel his consumption of alcohol and drugs, not to mention his wife and children. He suffered throughout his life from financial troubles; in 1829 he was forced to raise a second mortgage on Nab Cottage in Rydal, where he lived; he was imprisoned for debt in 1831, was twice prosecuted two years later (when he took refuge in the debtors' sanctuary at Holyrood Palace), and thrice prosecuted in 1837. He described the extent of his indigence in May 1840:

Having in a moment of pinching difficulty for my children about ten months since pawned every article of my dress which could produce a shilling, I have since that time had no stockings, no shoes, no neck-handkerchief, coat, waistcoat, or hat.... But the painful result from the whole is that I am about £100 worse than I was when I began. This is terrific.⁹

During these years he continued to write journalism on a variety of subjects, including German metaphysics, politics, economics, classical scholarship and the opium wars. He developed a reputation as a strident conservative commentator. He supported the Peterloo Massacre, opposed Catholic Emancipation, attacked the slave-trade campaigner Thomas Clarkson, and wrote articles describing the Chinese in terms we would regard as racist. In his view, British colonial rule was inherently just: the Indian Mutiny was the fault of 'princes and rajahs', while the sepoy were 'infatuated savages'. As for events at home, the Chartists and Corn Law activists, he believed, wanted 'to put an end to our whole polity and civil existence' and deserved to be locked up. Even in De Quincey's day, there were few politicians of any party who would have cared to espouse anything as extreme as that. Add to this his fascination for child prostitutes, and one begins to feel some sympathy for Wordsworth's observation that De Quincey 'is quite mad with pride'. It is hard to know how else to explain De Quincey's unprovoked hostility towards a mother who supported him, financially and emotionally; his childhood precocity, arrogance and general uppitiness, especially when dealing with adults; his belief that serial killers were 'solitary artists'; his love-hate relationship with the demented Scottish journalist John Wilson and no less sociopathic colleague William Blackwood; his casual disregard for his children's education; his public back-stabbing of former friends (most obviously Coleridge and the Wordsworths), and his apparent indifference to news of the death of his son, Horace.

De Quincey seems constantly to have been pursued by unsavoury debt collectors and wrote a stream of begging letters to anyone who could help fund his habit. Financial pressure eased when in 1840 his eldest daughter Margaret (aged 22) took control of his accounts, but it was not until 1846, when his mother died, leaving him an estate of £200 a year (£11,000/US$20,000 today), that his finances became manageable.

In July 1844 he began work on Suspiria de Profundis, serialized in Blackwood's, March-June 1845. This was the last of his great works, a final monument to his incredible powers, subtitled 'a Sequel to the Confessions of an English Opium-Eater'. It was designed as a series of interconnected prose poems, exploratory of the relation between dream and reality. This selection contains three extracts – 'The Affliction of Childhood', 'The Palimpsest' and 'Savannah-la-Mar', the last of which is presented here in its entirety.

In spite of health problems (largely self-inflicted), he came from a long-lived family and by mid-century was sufficiently venerated to merit a collected works, initiated by an American publisher – Ticknor, Reed, and Fields of Boston. Publication of De Quincey's Writings commenced in 1850; it ran to twenty volumes, and was completed six years later. And in 1853 the Edinburgh publisher James Hogg began publication of De Quincey's Selections Grave and Gay from Writings Published and Unpublished, which ran to fourteen volumes, completed in 1860. De Quincey revised and substantially enlarged the Confessions for Hogg's edition. It was in this form that the Confessions was enjoyed by generations of readers until well into the twentieth century. Its author died at 42 Lothian Street, Edinburgh, on 7 December 1859.

It is one of the ironies of literary history that although De Quincey has remained an enduringly popular writer since his death, both for his 'Recollections of the Lake Poets' and Confessions, his work has come down to us in texts that have not always been reliable. Only in recent years has an authoritative text of his complete works been published under Grevel Lindop's general editorship. It is a remarkable achievement, and a fitting memorial to De Quincey's art, which serious students of his writings are advised to consult.

From Confessions of an English Opium-Eater* (1822)

Being myself at that time of necessity a peripatetic (or a walker of the streets), I naturally fell in more frequently with those female peripatetics who are technically called street-walkers.² Many of these women had occasionally taken my part against watchmen who wished to drive me off the steps of houses where I was sitting. But one amongst them, the one on whose account I have at all introduced this subject – yet no! let me not class thee, oh noble-minded Ann, with that order of women! Let me find, if it be possible, some gentler name to designate the condition of her to whose bounty and compassion, ministering to my necessities when all the world had forsaken me, I owe it that I am at this time alive.

For many weeks I had walked at nights with this poor friendless girl up and down Oxford Street,³ or had rested with her on steps and under the shelter of porticos.⁴ She could not be so old as myself; she told me, indeed, that she had not completed her sixteenth year. By such questions as my interest about her prompted, I had gradually drawn forth her simple history. Hers was a case of ordinary occurrence (as I have since had reason to think), and one in which, if London beneficence had better adapted its arrangements to meet it, the power of the law might oftener be interposed to protect and to avenge. But the stream of London charity flows in a channel which, though deep and mighty, is yet noiseless and underground, not obvious or readily accessible to poor houseless wanderers⁵ – and it cannot be denied that the outside air and framework of London society is harsh, cruel, and repulsive. In any case, however, I saw that part of her injuries might easily have been redressed, and I urged her often and earnestly to lay her complaint before a magistrate; friendless as she was, I assured her that she would meet with immediate attention, and that English justice, which was no respecter of persons, would speedily and amply avenge her on the brutal ruffian who had plundered her little property. She promised me often that she would, but she delayed taking the steps I pointed out from time to time, for she was timid and dejected to a degree which showed how deeply sorrow had taken hold of her young heart, and perhaps she thought justly that the most upright judge and the most righteous tribunals could do nothing to repair her heaviest wrongs. Something, however, would perhaps have been done, for it had been settled between us at length (but unhappily on the very last time but one that I was ever to see her) that in a day or two we should go together before a magistrate, and that I should speak on her behalf. This little service it was destined, however, that I should never realize.

Meantime, that which she rendered to me, and which was greater than I could ever had repaid her, was this. One night, when we were pacing slowly along Oxford Street, and after a day when I had felt more than usually ill and faint, I requested her to turn off with me into Soho Square.⁶ Thither we went, and we sat down on the steps of a house which to this hour I never pass without a pang of grief and an inner act of homage to the spirit of that unhappy girl, in memory of the noble action which she there performed. Suddenly, as we sat, I grew much worse: I had been leaning my head against her bosom, and all at once I sank from her arms and fell backwards on the steps. From the sensations I then had, I felt an inner conviction of the liveliest kind that without some powerful and reviving stimulus I should either have died on the spot or should at least have sunk to a point of exhaustion from which all re-ascent under my friendless circumstances would soon have become hopeless.

Then it was, at this crisis of my fate, that my poor orphan companion – who had herself met with little but injuries in this world – stretched out a saving hand to me. Uttering a cry of terror, but without a moment's delay, she ran off into Oxford Street and in less time than could be imagined returned to me with a glass of port wine and spices, that acted upon my empty stomach (which at that time would have rejected all solid food) with an instantaneous power of restoration – and for this glass the generous girl without a murmur paid out of her own humble purse at a time (be it remembered) when she had scarcely wherewithal to purchase the bare necessities of life, and when she could have no reason to expect that I should ever be able to reimburse her.

Oh youthful benefactress! How often, in succeeding years, standing in solitary places and thinking of thee with grief of heart and perfect love – how often have I wished that, as in ancient times the curse of a father was believed to have a supernatural power, and to pursue its object with a fatal necessity of self-fulfilment, even so, the benediction of a heart oppressed with gratitude might have a like prerogative,⁷ might have power given to it from above to chase, to haunt, to waylay, to overtake, to pursue thee into the central darkness of a London brothel, or (if it were possible) into the darkness of the grave, there to awaken thee with an authentic message of peace and forgiveness, and of final reconciliation!

I do not often weep, for not only do my thoughts on subjects connected with the chief interests of man daily, nay hourly, descend a thousand fathoms 'too deep for tears';⁸ not only does the sternness of my habits of thought present an antagonism⁹ to the feelings which prompt tears (wanting of necessity to those who, being protected usually by their levity from any tendency to meditative sorrow, would by that same levity be made incapable of resisting it on any casual access of such feelings) – but also I believe that all minds which have contemplated such objects as deeply as I have done, must for their own protection from utter despondency have early encouraged and cherished some tranquillizing belief as to the future balances¹⁰ and the hieroglyphic¹¹ meanings of human sufferings. On these accounts, I am cheerful to this hour, and, as I have said, I do not often weep. Yet some feelings, though not deeper or more passionate, are more tender than others, and often, when I walk at this time in Oxford Street by dreamy lamplight, and hear those airs played on a barrel-organ which years ago solaced me and my dear companion (as I must always call her), I shed tears, and muse with myself at the mysterious dispensation¹² which so suddenly and so critically separated us for ever.

Ann of Oxford Street

¹ De Quincey recalls the period, 1802–3, when he ran away from school, aged 17, and lived rough in London; see headnote, p. 830.

² street-walkers i.e. prostitutes.

³ Oxford Street central thoroughfare in the west end of London, running from St Giles' Circus to Park Lane. In 1802 its properties were mainly residential.

⁴ porticos porchways, some of which in Oxford Street would have been quite grand.

⁵ wanderers vagrants.

⁶ Soho Square square of buildings just off the south side of the eastern end of Oxford Street. In 1802 its properties were the residences of professionals – doctors, lawyers, dentists and architects.

⁷ prerogative privilege.

⁸ too deep for tears from Wordsworth, 'Ode' 206: 'Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears.'

⁹ antagonism opposition.

¹⁰ balances i.e. the belief that all suffering is balanced with an equal amount of happiness.

¹¹ hieroglyphic symbolic, emblematic. De Quincey is comforted by the thought that suffering is not meaningless – that it has some kind of higher significance in the making of the soul.

¹² dispensation ordering agency (implicitly, of God).

[The Malay]

From Confessions of an English Opium-Eater (1822)

One day a Malay knocked at my door.¹ What business a Malay could have to transact amongst English mountains I cannot conjecture, but possibly he was on his road to a seaport about forty miles distant.²

The servant who opened the door to him was a young girl born and bred amongst the mountains, who had never seen an Asiatic dress of any sort – his turban, therefore, confounded her not a little – and as it turned out that his attainments in English were exactly of the same extent as hers in the Malay, there seemed to be an impassable gulf fixed between all communication of ideas (if either party had happened to possess any). In this dilemma, the girl, recollecting the reputed learning of her master (and doubtless giving me credit for a knowledge of all the languages of the earth, besides, perhaps, a few of the lunar ones), came and gave me to understand that there was a sort of demon below, whom she clearly imagined that my art could exorcise from the house.

I did not immediately go down, but when I did, the group which presented itself – arranged as it was by accident, though not very elaborate, took hold of my fancy and my eye in a way that none of the statuesque attitudes exhibited in the ballets at the Opera House, though so ostentatiously complex, had ever done. In a cottage kitchen, but panelled on the wall with dark wood that from age and rubbing resembled oak, and looking more like a rustic hall of entrance than a kitchen, stood the Malay, his turban and loose trousers of dingy white relieved upon³ the dark panelling. He had placed himself nearer to the girl than she seemed to relish, though her native spirit of mountain intrepidity contended with the feeling of simple awe which her countenance expressed as she gazed upon the tiger-cat before her. And a more striking picture there could not be imagined, than the beautiful English face of the girl, and its exquisite fairness, together with her erect and independent attitude, contrasted with the sallow and bilious⁴ skin of the Malay, enamelled or veneered with mahogany, by marine air, his small fierce restless eyes, thin lips, slavish gestures and adorations.⁵ Half-hidden by the ferocious-looking Malay was a little child from a neighbouring cottage who had crept in after him and was now in the act of reverting its head, and gazing upwards at the turban and the fiery eyes beneath it, whilst with one hand he caught at the dress of the young woman for protection.

My knowledge of the oriental tongues is not remarkably extensive, being indeed confined to two words: the Arabic word for barley, and the Turkish for opium (madjoon), which I have learnt from Anastasius.⁶ And as I had neither a Malay dictionary, nor even Adelung's Mithridates,⁷ which might have helped me to a few words, I addressed him in some lines from the Iliad, considering that, of such languages as I possessed, Greek, in point of longitude, came geographically nearest to an oriental one. He worshipped me in a most devout manner, and replied in what I suppose was Malay. In this way I saved my reputation with my neighbours, for the Malay had no means of betraying the secret. He lay down upon the floor for about an hour, and then pursued his journey.

On his departure, I presented him with a piece of opium. To him, as an orientalist, I concluded that opium must be familiar, and the expression of his face convinced me that it was. Nevertheless, I was struck with some little consternation when I saw him suddenly raise his hand to his mouth and (in the schoolboy phrase) bolt⁸ the whole, divided into three pieces, at one mouthful. The quantity was enough to kill three dragoons and their horses, and I felt some alarm for the poor creature – but what could be done? I had given him the opium in compassion for his solitary life, on recollecting that, if he had travelled on foot from London, it must be nearly three weeks since he could have exchanged a thought with any human being. I could not think of violating the laws of hospitality by having him seized and drenched⁹ with an emetic, and thus frightening him into a notion that we were going to sacrifice him to some English idol. No – there was clearly no help for it. He took his leave, and for some days I felt anxious; but as I never heard of any Malay being found dead, I became convinced that he was used to opium, and that I must have done him the service I designed, by giving him one night of respite from the pains of wandering.

This incident I have digressed to mention because this Malay (partly from the picturesque exhibition he assisted to frame, partly from the anxiety I connected with his image for some days) fastened afterwards upon my dreams,¹⁰ and brought other Malays with him worse than himself, that ran amuck at me,¹¹ and led me into a world of troubles.

[The Pains of Opium]

From Confessions of an English Opium-Eater (1822)

I now pass to what is the main subject of these latter confessions – to the history and journal of what took place in my dreams, for these were the immediate and proximate cause of my acutest suffering.

The first notice I had of any important change going on in this part of my physical economy, was from the reawakening of a state of eye generally incident¹ to childhood or exalted states of irritability.² I know not whether my reader is aware that many children – perhaps most – have a power of painting, as it were, upon the darkness, all sorts of phantoms. In some, that power is simply a mechanic affection³ of the eye; others have a voluntary or a semi-voluntary power to dismiss or to summon them – or, as a child once said to me when I questioned him on this matter, ‘I can tell them to go and they go, but sometimes they come when I don’t tell them to come.’ Whereupon I told him that he had almost as unlimited a command over apparitions as a Roman centurion over his soldiers.⁴

In the middle of 1817, I think it was, that this faculty became positively distressing to me. At night, when I lay awake in bed, vast processions passed along in mournful pomp,⁵ friezes of never-ending stories that to my feelings were as sad and solemn as if they were stories drawn from times before Oedipus or Priam⁶ – before Tyre, before Memphis.⁷ And at the same time a corresponding change took place in my dreams; a theatre seemed suddenly opened and lighted up within my brain, which presented nightly spectacles of more than earthly splendour. And the four following facts may be mentioned as noticeable at this time:

1. That, as the creative state of the eye increased, a sympathy seemed to arise between the waking and the dreaming states of the brain in one point – that whatsoever I happened to call up and to trace by a voluntary act upon the darkness was very apt to transfer itself to my dreams, so that I feared to exercise this faculty, for, as Midas turned all things to gold⁸ that yet baffled his hopes and defrauded his human desires, so whatsoever things capable of being visually represented I did but think of in the darkness, immediately shaped themselves into phantoms of the eye, and, by a process apparently no less inevitable, when thus once traced in faint and visionary colours, like writings in sympathetic ink, they were drawn out by the fierce chemistry of my dreams into insufferable splendour that fretted⁹ my heart.

2. For this and all other changes in my dreams were accompanied by deep-seated anxiety and gloomy melancholy, such as are wholly incommunicable by words. I seemed every night to descend – not metaphorically, but literally to descend, into chasms and sunless abysses, depths below depths, from which it seemed hopeless that I could ever reascend. Nor did I, by waking, feel that I had reascended. This I do not dwell upon, because the state of gloom which attended these gorgeous spectacles, amounting at least to utter darkness, as of some suicidal despondency, cannot be approached by words.

3. The sense of space and, in the end, the sense of time, were both powerfully affected. Buildings, landscapes, etc., were exhibited in proportions so vast as the bodily eye is not fitted to receive. Space swelled and was amplified to an extent of unutterable infinity. This however did not disturb me so much as the vast expansion of time: I sometimes seemed to have lived for 70 or 100 years in one night – nay, sometimes had feelings representative of a millennium¹⁰ passed in that time, or, however, of a duration far beyond the limits of any human experience.

4. The minutest incidents of childhood, or forgotten scenes of later years, were often revived. I could not be said to recollect them, for if I had been told of them when waking, I should not have been able to acknowledge them as parts of my past experience. But placed as they were before me, in dreams like intuitions, and clothed in all their evanescent circumstances and accompanying feelings, I recognized them instantaneously. I was once told by a near relative of mine¹¹ that, having in her childhood fallen into a river, and being on the very verge of death but for the critical assistance which reached her, she saw in a moment her whole life, in its minutest incidents, arrayed before her simultaneously as in a mirror, and she had a faculty developed as suddenly for comprehending the whole and every part. This, from some opium experiences of mine, I can believe; I have indeed seen the same thing asserted twice in modern books,¹² and accompanied by a remark which I am convinced is true – viz. that the dread book of account¹³ which the scriptures speak of is, in fact, the mind itself of each individual. Of this at least I feel assured: that there is no such thing as forgetting possible to the mind; a thousand accidents may and will interpose a veil between our present consciousness and the secret inscriptions on the mind¹⁴ – accidents of the same sort will also rend away this veil. But alike, whether veiled or unveiled, the inscription remains for ever, just as the stars seem to withdraw before the common light of day, whereas in fact we all know that it is the light which is drawn over them as a veil, and that they are waiting to be revealed when the obscuring daylight shall have withdrawn...

² irritability excitement, rather than annoyance.

3 mechanic affection involuntary property.

4 as a Roman centurion ... soldiers a recollection of Matthew 8:9.

5 At night ... pomp De Quincey is recalling a fragment composed by Wordsworth at the same time as the Two-Part Prelude, ‘When in my bed I lay’:

When in my bed I lay
Alone in darkness, I have seen the gloom
Peopled with shapes arrayed in hues more bright
Than flowers or gems or than the evening sky:
Processions ... (ll. 1–5)

6 Oedipus or Priam Oedipus was the King of Thebes, whose remarkable story is told in Oedipus Rex and Oedipus Coloneus; Priam, King of Troy, oversaw the Trojan Wars, which were started when his son, Paris, abducted Helen.

7 Tyre was a Phoenician seaport founded c.400 BCE; the Egyptian city of Memphis dates from 3000 BCE.

8 as Midas ... gold mythical King of Phrygia, who asked that whatever he touched be turned to gold. He realized he had made an error when his food turned into gold, and he was cured by bathing in the River Pactolus.

9 fretted tormented.

10 a millennium 1,000 years.

11 a near relative of mine his mother, Elizabeth Penson Quincey, who at this time was 65.

12 modern books probably Swedenborg’s Arcana Coelestia and Coleridge’s Biographia Literaria.

¹³ the dread book of account mentioned Revelation 13:8: ‘And all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world.’

¹⁴ secret inscriptions on the mind memories impressed indelibly on the mind. De Quincey is thinking in Wordsworthian terms; cf. Pedlar 30–4.

From Confessions of an English Opium-Eater* (1822)

Many years ago, when I was looking over Piranesi’s Antiquities of Rome, Mr Coleridge,² who was standing by, described to me a set of plates by that artist called his ‘Dreams’, and which record the scenery of his own visions during the delirium of a fever. Some of them (I describe only from memory of Mr Coleridge’s account) represented vast Gothic halls: on the floor of which stood all sorts of engines and machinery, wheels, cables, pulleys, levers, catapults, etc., etc. expressive of enormous power put forth, and resistance overcome. Creeping along the sides of the walls, you perceived a staircase, and upon it, groping his way upwards, was Piranesi himself. Follow the stairs a little further, and you perceive it come to a sudden abrupt termination, without any balustrade, and allowing no step onwards to him who had reached the extremity, except into the depths below. Whatever is to become of poor Piranesi, you suppose, at least, that his labours must in some way terminate here. But raise your eyes, and behold a second flight of stairs still higher: on which again Piranesi is perceived, but this time standing on the very brink of the abyss. Again elevate your eye, and a still more aerial flight of stairs is beheld: and again is poor Piranesi busy on his aspiring labours: and so on, until the unfinished stairs and Piranesi both are lost in the upper gloom of the hall.

With the same power of endless growth and self-reproduction did my architecture proceed in dreams. In the early stage of my malady, the splendours of my dreams were indeed chiefly architectural: and I beheld such pomp of cities and palaces as was never yet beheld by the waking eye, unless in the clouds.

The Pains of Opium: Visions of Piranesi

² Mr Coleridge Coleridge sent a box 'containing the Piranesi Folios for William' (i.e. Wordsworth) to Grasmere in 1808. De Quincey probably saw them, and may have seen others in Coleridge's possession in London.

[Oriental Dreams]

May 1818

The Malay has been a fearful enemy for months. I have been every night, through his means, transported into Asiatic scenes. I know not whether others share in my feelings on this point, but I have often thought that if I were compelled to forego England and to live in China and among Chinese manners and modes of life and scenery, I should go mad.

The causes of my horror lie deep, and some of them must be common to others. Southern Asia, in general, is the seat of awful images and associations. As the cradle of the human race, it would alone have a dim and reverential feeling connected with it. But there are other reasons. No man can pretend that the wild, barbarous, and capricious superstitions of Africa, or of savage tribes elsewhere, affect him in the way that he is affected by the ancient, monumental, cruel, and elaborate religions of Indostan,¹ etc. The mere antiquity of Asiatic things, of their institutions, histories, modes of faith, etc., is so impressive, that to me the vast age of the race and name overpowers the sense of youth in the individual. A young Chinese seems to me an antediluvian man² renewed. Even Englishmen, though not bred in any knowledge of such institutions, cannot but shudder at the mystic sublimity of castes that have flowed apart and refused to mix, through such immemorial tracts of time – nor can any man fail to be awed by the names of the Ganges or the Euphrates.

It contributes much to these feelings that southern Asia is, and has been for thousands of years, the part of the earth most swarming with human life – the great officina gentium.³ Man is a weed in those regions. The vast empires also, into which the enormous population of Asia has always been cast, give a further sublimity to the feelings associated with all oriental names or images. In China, over and above what it has in common with the rest of southern Asia, I am terrified by the modes of life, by the manners, and the barrier of utter abhorrence and want of sympathy placed between us by feelings deeper than I can analyze. I could sooner live with lunatics or brute animals.⁴ All this, and much more than I can say or have time to say, the reader must enter into before he can comprehend the unimaginable horror which these dreams of oriental imagery and mythological tortures impressed upon me.

Under the connecting feeling of tropical heat and vertical sunlights, I brought together all creatures, birds, beasts, reptiles, all trees and plants, usages⁵ and appearances that are found in all tropical regions, and assembled them together in China or Indostan. From kindred feelings I soon brought Egypt and all her gods under the same law. I was stared at, hooted at, grinned at, chattered at, by monkeys, by parakeets, by cockatoos. I ran into pagodas and was fixed for centuries at the summit, or in secret rooms. I was the idol, I was the priest, I was worshipped, I was sacrificed. I fled from the wrath of Brahma⁶ through all the forests of Asia. Vishnu hated me. Siva laid wait for me.⁷ I came suddenly upon Isis and Osiris.⁸ I had done a deed, they said, which the ibis⁹ and the crocodile trembled at. I was buried for a thousand years in stone coffins, with mummies and sphinxes, in narrow chambers at the heart of eternal pyramids. I was kissed with cancerous kisses by crocodiles, and laid confounded with all unutterable slimy things amongst reeds and Nilotic mud.

I thus give the reader some slight abstraction of¹⁰ my oriental dreams, which always filled me with such amazement at the monstrous¹¹ scenery, that horror seemed absorbed for a while in sheer astonishment. Sooner or later came a reflux¹² of feeling that swallowed up the astonishment, and left me not so much in terror as in hatred and abomination of what I saw. Over every form, and threat, and punishment, and dim sightless incarceration, brooded a sense of eternity and infinity that drove me into an oppression as of madness. Into these dreams only it was (with one or two slight exceptions) that any circumstances of physical horror entered. All before had been moral and spiritual terrors, but here the main agents were ugly birds, or snakes, or crocodiles – especially the last. The cursed crocodile became to me the object of more horror than almost all the rest. I was compelled to live with him, and (as was always the case almost in my dreams) for centuries. I escaped sometimes, and found myself in Chinese houses with cane tables, etc. All the feet of the tables, sofas, etc., soon became instinct¹³ with life. The abominable head of the crocodile, and his leering eyes, looked out at me, multiplied into a thousand repetitions – and I stood loathing and fascinated. And so often did this hideous reptile haunt my dreams, that many times the very same dream was broken up in the very same way: I heard gentle voices speaking to me (I hear everything when I am sleeping), and instantly I awoke.

It was broad noon, and my children were standing, hand in hand, at my bedside, come to show me their coloured shoes or new frocks, or to let me see them dressed for going out. I protest that so awful was the transition from the damned crocodile and the other unutterable monsters and abortions of my dreams to the sight of innocent human natures and of infancy, that, in the mighty and sudden revulsion of mind, I wept, and could not forbear it, as I kissed their faces.¹⁴

1 Indostan India.

2 antediluvian man man before the great flood.

3 officina gentium workshop of peoples.

4 I am terrified ... animals De Quincey wrote a number of anti-Chinese articles inspired by the opium wars in 1839. It should be remembered that racist opinions were so common in his day as to be unremarkable – so common that the very concept of racism was unknown (the OED's first usage is dated 1907).

5 usages customs.

6 Brahma supreme God of Hindu myth.

7 Vishnu and Siva are Hindu deities.

8 Isis and Osiris Egyptian deities.

9 ibis The Sacred Ibis of Egypt (Ibis religiosa), with white and black plumage, was an object of veneration among the ancient Egyptians.

10 slight abstraction of brief extract from.

11 monstrous unnatural.

12 reflux return.

13 instinct animated.

[Easter Sunday]

From Confessions of an English Opium-Eater (1822)

June 1819

I have had occasion to remark, at various periods of my life, that the deaths of those whom we love – and indeed the contemplation of death generally – is, caeteris paribus,¹ more affecting in summer than in any other season of the year. And the reasons are these three, I think:

First, that the visible heavens in summer appear far higher, more distant, and (if such a solecism may be excused) more infinite; the clouds, by which chiefly the eye expounds² the distance of the blue pavilion stretched over our heads, are in summer more voluminous, massed, and accumulated in far grander and more towering piles; secondly, the light and the appearances of the declining and the setting sun are much more fitted to be types and characters of the Infinite;³ and thirdly (which is the main reason), the exuberant and riotous prodigality⁴ of life naturally forces the mind more powerfully upon the antagonist⁵ thought of death and the wintry sterility of the grave – for it may be observed generally that wherever two thoughts stand related to each other by a law of antagonism, and exist, as it were, by mutual repulsion, they are apt to suggest each other.

On these accounts it is that I find it impossible to banish the thought of death when I am walking alone in the endless days of summer, and any particular death, if not more affecting, at least haunts my mind more obstinately and besiegingly in that season. Perhaps this cause, and a slight incident which I omit, might have been the immediate occasions of the following dream – to which, however, a predisposition must always have existed in my mind. But having been once roused, it never left me, and split into a thousand fantastic varieties, which often suddenly reunited and composed again the original dream.

I thought that it was a Sunday morning in May, that it was Easter Sunday, and as yet very early in the morning. I was standing, as it seemed to me, at the door of my own cottage.⁶ Right before me lay the very scene which could really be commanded from that situation, but exalted (as was usual) and solemnized by the power of dreams. There were the same mountains and the same lovely valley at their feet, but the mountains were raised to more than Alpine height, and there was interspace⁷ far larger between them of meadows and forest lawns. The hedges were rich with white roses, and no living creature was to be seen, excepting that in the green churchyard there were cattle tranquilly reposing upon the verdant graves, and particularly round about the grave of a child⁸ whom I had tenderly loved, just as I had really beheld them, a little before sunrise in the same summer, when that child died. I gazed upon the well-known scene, and I said aloud (as I thought) to myself, ‘It yet wants much of sunrise; and it is Easter Sunday, and that is the day on which they celebrate the first fruits of resurrection. I will walk abroad. Old griefs shall be forgotten today, for the air is cool and still, and the hills are high, and stretch away to heaven, and the forest-glades are as quiet as the churchyard; and, with the dew, I can wash the fever from my forehead, and then I shall be unhappy no longer.’

And I turned as if to open my garden gate – and immediately I saw upon the left a scene far different, but which yet the power of dreams had reconciled into harmony with the other. The scene was an oriental one, and there also it was Easter Sunday and very early in the morning. And at a vast distance were visible, as a stain upon the horizon, the domes and cupolas of a great city – an image or faint abstraction caught perhaps in childhood from some picture of Jerusalem. And not a bowshot⁹ from me, upon a stone and shaded by Judean palms, there sat a woman – and I looked – and it was – Ann! She fixed her eyes upon me earnestly, and I said to her at length, ‘So then I have found you at last.’ I waited, but she answered me not a word. Her face was the same as when I saw it last, and yet again how different! Seventeen years ago, when the lamplight fell upon her face, as for the last time I kissed her lips (lips, Ann, that to me were not polluted), her eyes were streaming with tears; the tears were now wiped away. She seemed more beautiful than she was at that time, but in all other points the same, and not older. Her looks were tranquil, but with unusual solemnity of expression, and I now gazed upon her with some awe.

But suddenly her countenance grew dim, and, turning to the mountains, I perceived vapours rolling between us. In a moment all had vanished; thick darkness came on, and, in the twinkling of an eye, I was far away from mountains, and by lamplight in Oxford Street, walking again with Ann – just as we walked seventeen years before when we were both children.¹⁰

On the Knocking at the Gate in Macbeth(first published under the pseudonym, 'X.Y.Z.')

From London Magazine (October 1823)

From my boyish days I had always felt a great perplexity on one point in Macbeth. It was this: the knocking at the gate which succeeds to the murder of Duncan² produced to my feelings an effect for which I never could account. The effect was that it reflected back upon the murder a peculiar awfulness³ and a depth of solemnity. Yet however obstinately I endeavoured with my understanding to comprehend this, for many years I never could see why it should produce such an effect.⁴

Here I pause for one moment to exhort the reader never to pay any attention to his understanding when it stands in opposition to any other faculty of his mind. The mere understanding, however useful and indispensable, is the meanest faculty in the human mind and the most to be distrusted – and yet the great majority of people trust to nothing else, which may do for ordinary life, but not for philosophic purposes. Of this, out of ten thousand instances that I might produce, I will cite one. Ask of any person whatsoever, who is not previously prepared for the demand by a knowledge of perspective, to draw in the rudest way the commonest appearance which depends upon the laws of that science⁵ – as for instance, to represent the effect of two walls standing at right angles to each other, or the appearance of the houses on each side of a street, as seen by a person looking down the street from one extremity. Now in all cases, unless the person has happened to observe in pictures how it is that artists produce these effects, he will be utterly unable to make the smallest approximation to it. Yet why? For he has actually seen the effect every day of his life. The reason is that he allows his understanding to overrule his eyes. His understanding, which includes no intuitive⁶ knowledge of the laws of vision, can furnish him with no reason why a line which is known and can be proved to be a horizontal line, should not appear a horizontal line; a line that made any angle with the perpendicular less than a right angle would seem to him to indicate that his houses were all tumbling down together. Accordingly he makes the line of his houses a horizontal line and fails of course to produce the effect demanded.

Here then is one instance out of many in which not only the understanding is allowed to overrule the eyes, but where the understanding is positively allowed to obliterate the eyes as it were. For not only does the man believe the evidence of his understanding in opposition to that of his eyes, but (which is monstrous!) the idiot is not aware that his eyes ever gave such evidence. He does not know that he has seen (and therefore *quoad*⁷ his consciousness has not seen) that which he has seen every day of his life.

But to return from this digression. My understanding could furnish no reason why the knocking at the gate in Macbeth should produce any effect direct or reflected;⁸ in fact, my understanding said positively that it could not produce any effect. But I knew better.⁹ I felt that it did, and I waited and clung to the problem until further knowledge should enable me to solve it. At length, in 1812, Mr Williams made his début on the stage of Ratcliffe Highway,¹⁰ and executed those unparalleled murders which have procured for him such a brilliant and undying reputation.

On which murders, by the way, I must observe that in one respect they have had an ill effect, by making the connoisseur in murder very fastidious in his taste and dissatisfied with anything that has been since done in that line. All other murders look pale by the deep crimson of his – and, as an amateur once said to me in a querulous tone, ‘There has been absolutely nothing doing since his time, or nothing that’s worth speaking of.’ But this is wrong, for it is unreasonable to expect all men to be great artists, and born with the genius of Mr Williams.

Now it will be remembered that in the first of these murders (that of the Marrs) the same incident (of a knocking at the door soon after the work of extermination was complete) did actually occur which the genius of Shakespeare had invented – and all good judges and the most eminent dilettanti¹¹ acknowledged the felicity of Shakespeare's suggestion as soon as it was actually realized. Here then was a fresh proof that I had been right in relying on my own feeling in opposition to my understanding, and again I set myself to study the problem. At length I solved it to my own satisfaction, and my solution is this. Murder in ordinary cases, where the sympathy is wholly directed to the case of the murdered person, is an incident of coarse and vulgar horror, and for this reason – that it flings the interest exclusively upon the natural but ignoble instinct by which we cleave to life (an instinct which, as being indispensable to the primal law of self-preservation, is the same in kind, though different in degree, amongst all living creatures) – this instinct therefore, because it annihilates all distinctions and degrades the greatest of men to the level of 'the poor beetle that we tread on',¹² exhibits human nature in its most abject and humiliating attitude.

Such an attitude would little suit the purposes of the poet. What then must he do? He must throw the interest on the murderer: our sympathy must be with him (of course I mean a sympathy of comprehension, a sympathy by which we enter into his feelings and are made to understand them – not a sympathy of pity or approbation). In the murdered person all strife of thought, all flux and reflux of passion and of purpose, are crushed by one overwhelming panic: the fear of instant death smites him 'with its petrific mace'.¹³ But in the murderer, such a murderer as a poet will condescend to, there must be raging some great storm of passion – jealousy, ambition, vengeance, hatred – which will create a hell within him, and into this hell we are to look. In Macbeth, for the sake of gratifying his own enormous and teeming faculty of creation, Shakespeare has introduced two murderers,¹⁴ and, as usual in his hands, they are remarkably discriminated. But though in Macbeth the strife of mind is greater than in his wife, the tiger-spirit not so awake, and his feelings caught chiefly by contagion from her – yet, as both were finally involved in the guilt of murder, the murderous mind of necessity is finally to be presumed in both. This was to be expressed; and on its own account, as well as to make it a more proportionable antagonist to the unoffending nature of their victim, ‘the gracious Duncan’,¹⁵ and adequately to expound ‘the deep damnation of his taking off’,¹⁶ this was to be expressed with peculiar energy. We were to be made to feel that the human nature (i.e. the divine nature of love and mercy, spread through the hearts of all creatures, and seldom utterly withdrawn from man) was gone, vanished, extinct – and that the fiendish nature had taken its place. And as this effect is marvellously accomplished in the dialogues and soliloquies themselves, so it is finally consummated¹⁷ by the expedient under consideration¹⁸ – and it is to this that I now solicit the reader’s attention.

If the reader has ever witnessed a wife, daughter or sister in a fainting fit, he may chance to have observed that the most affecting moment in such a spectacle is that in which a sigh and a stirring announce the recommencement of suspended life. Or if the reader has ever been present in a vast metropolis on the day when some great national idol was carried in funeral pomp to his grave, and chancing to walk near to the course through which it passed, has felt powerfully, in the silence and desertion of the streets, and in the stagnation of ordinary business, the deep interest which at that moment was possessing the heart of man; if all at once he should hear the deathlike stillness broken up by the sound of wheels rattling away from the scene, and making known that the transitory vision was dissolved, he will be aware that at no moment was his sense of the complete suspension and pause in ordinary human concerns so full and affecting as at that moment when the suspension ceases, and the goings-on of human life are suddenly resumed. All action in any direction is best expounded, measured, and made apprehensible, by reaction.

Now apply this to the case in Macbeth. Here, as I have said, the retiring of the human heart and the entrance of the fiendish heart was to be expressed and made sensible.¹⁹ Another world has stepped in, and the murderers are taken out of the region of human things, human purposes, human desires. They are transfigured: Lady Macbeth is ‘unsexed’,²⁰ Macbeth has forgot that he was born of woman,²¹ both are conformed to the image of devils, and the world of devils is suddenly revealed. But how shall this be conveyed and made palpable? In order that a new world may step in, this world must for a time disappear. The murderers and the murder must be insulated, cut off by an immeasurable gulf from the ordinary tide and succession of human affairs, locked up and sequestered in some deep recess; we must be made sensible that the world of ordinary life is suddenly arrested, laid asleep,²² tranced, racked into a dread armistice;²³ time must be annihilated, relation to things without²⁴ abolished, and all must pass self-withdrawn into a deep syncope²⁵ and suspension of earthly passion.

Hence it is that, when the deed is done, when the work of darkness is perfect, then the world of darkness passes away like a pageantry in the clouds. The knocking at the gate is heard, and it makes known audibly that the reaction has commenced – the human has made its reflux upon the fiendish, the pulses of life are beginning to beat again, and the re-establishment of the goings-on of the world in which we live first makes us profoundly sensible of the awful parenthesis²⁶ that had suspended them.

Oh mighty poet!²⁷ Thy works are not as those of other men, simply and merely great works of art, but are also like the phenomena of nature, like the sun and the sea, the stars and the flowers, like frost and snow, rain and dew, hailstorm and thunder – which are to be studied with entire submission of our own faculties, and in the perfect faith that in them there can be no too much or too little, nothing useless or inert, but that the further we press in our discoveries, the more we shall see proofs of design and self-supporting arrangement where the careless eye had seen nothing but accident.

N.B. In the above specimen of psychological criticism, I have purposely omitted to notice another use of the knocking at the gate (viz. the opposition and contrast which it produces in the porter's comments²⁸ to the scenes immediately preceding) because this use is tolerably obvious to all who are accustomed to reflect on what they read. A third use also, subservient to the scenical illusion, has been lately noticed by a critic in the London Magazine.²⁹ I fully agree with him, but it did not fall in my way to insist on this.

On the Knocking at the Gate in Macbeth

² the murder of Duncan Macbeth, a general in the army, kills King Duncan as a first step to taking the throne.

³ awfulness feeling of awe.

⁴ De Quincey is pointing out the disparity between a trivial, apparently insignificant stage direction, 'Knock within', and his response (awe and solemnity).

⁵ that science i.e. the laws of perspective.

⁶ intuitive Behind this lies the distinction, followed by Coleridge and Wordsworth, between discursive (belonging to man) and intuitive understanding (belonging to angels), as stated in Paradise Lost v 486–90. See also Thirteen-Book Prelude xiii 113.

⁷ quoad with respect to.

⁸ reflected i.e. indirect.

⁹ But I knew better Discursive reason tells him that his response is nonsensical; intuitive reason tells him that it is justified.

¹⁰ Mr Williams...Highway John Williams (1784–1811) was presumed to have committed a series of murders that began on 7 December 1811. He was apprehended on Christmas Day and tried two days later, but was later found dead in his prison cell. A servant-girl sent out on an errand returned and knocked at the door while Williams, who had murdered the entire family, was still inside the house with the bodies of his victims: Timothy Marr, linen-draper; Celia Marr, his wife; Timothy Marr Jr, their infant son; and James Gowen, Marr's apprentice.

[On Wordsworth’s ‘There was a boy’] 1

From Tait’s Edinburgh Magazine (February 1839)

There is amongst the poems of Wordsworth one most ludicrously misconstrued by his critics, which offers a philosophical hint upon this subject, of great instruction. I will preface it with the little incident which first led Wordsworth into a commentary upon his own meaning.

One night, as often enough happened, during the Peninsular War, 2 he and I walked up Dunmail Raise from Grasmere, 3 about midnight, in order to meet the carrier who brought the London newspapers by a circuitous course from Keswick. The case was this. Coleridge, for many years, received a copy of The Courier 4 as a mark of esteem, and in acknowledgement of his many contributions to it, from one of the proprietors, Mr Daniel Stuart. This went up in any case, let Coleridge be where he might, 5 to Mrs Coleridge. 6 For a single day it stayed at Keswick for the use of Southey, and on the next it came on to Wordsworth by the slow conveyance of a carrier, plying with a long train of carts between Whitehaven and Kendal. 7 Many a time the force of storms or floods would compel the carrier to stop on his route, five miles short of Grasmere at Wythburn, or even eight miles short at Legberthwaite. But as there was always hope until one or two o’clock in the morning, often and often it would happen that, in the deadly⁸ impatience for earlier intelligence, Wordsworth and I would walk off to meet him about midnight, to a distance of three or four miles.

Upon one of these occasions, when some great crisis in Spain was daily apprehended, we had waited for an hour or more, sitting upon one of the many huge blocks of stone which lie scattered over that narrow field of battle on the desolate frontier of Cumberland and Westmorland, where King Dunmail with all his peerage fell more than a thousand years ago.⁹ The time had arrived, at length, that all hope for that night had left us. No sound came up through the winding valleys that stretched to the north, and the few cottage lights, gleaming at wide distances from recesses amidst the rocky hills, had long been extinct. At intervals, Wordsworth had stretched himself at length on the high road, applying his ear to the ground so as to catch any sound of wheels that might be groaning along at a distance.

Once, when he was slowly rising from this effort, his eye caught a bright star that was glittering between the brow of Seat Sandal and of the mighty Helvellyn. He gazed upon it for a minute or so, and then, upon turning away to descend into Grasmere, he made the following explanation:

‘I have remarked from my earliest days that if, under any circumstances, the attention is energetically braced up to an act of steady observation or of steady expectation, then, if this intense condition of vigilance should suddenly relax, at that moment any beautiful, any impressive visual object, or collection of objects, falling upon the eye, is carried to the heart with a power not known under other circumstances. Just now, my ear was placed upon the stretch in order to catch any sound of wheels that might come down upon the lake of Wythburn from the Keswick road; at the very instant when I raised my head from the ground in final abandonment of hope for this night, at the very instant when the organs of attention were all at once relaxing from their tension, the bright star hanging in the air above those outlines of massy blackness fell suddenly upon my eye, and penetrated my capacity of apprehension with a pathos and a sense of the infinite that would not have arrested me under other circumstances.’

He then went on to illustrate the same psychological principle from another instance. It was an instance derived from that exquisite poem¹⁰ in which he describes a mountain boy planting himself at twilight on the margin of some solitary bay of Windermere, and provoking the owls to a contest with himself by ‘mimic hootings’ blown through his hands – which of itself becomes an impressive scene to anyone able to realize to his fancy the various elements of the solitary woods and waters, the solemn vesper hour,¹¹ the solitary bird, the solitary boy. Afterwards, the poem goes on to describe the boy as waiting amidst ‘the pauses of his skill’ for the answers of the birds, waiting with intensity of expectation. And then at length when, after waiting to no purpose, his attention began to relax – that is, in other words, under the giving way of one exclusive direction of his senses, began suddenly to allow an admission to other objects – then, in that instant, the scene actually before him, the visible scene, would enter unawares, ‘With all its solemn imagery’. This complex scenery was – what?

Was carried far into his heart
With all its pomp, and that uncertain heav’n received
Into the bosom of the steady lake.¹²

This very expression, ‘far’, by which space and its infinities are attributed to the human heart, and to its capacities of re-echoing the sublimities of nature, has always struck me as with a flash of sublime revelation.

On Wordsworth’s ‘There was a boy’

² the Peninsular War (see p. 849) war in the Spanish and Portuguese peninsula, 1808–14, between the French and the English, Spanish and Portuguese. Wordsworth’s fascination with the campaign, and sympathy with the Spanish freedom fighters, led him to write The Convention of Cintra, which De Quincey saw through the press in 1809 (see headnote, p. 832).

³ from Grasmere The Wordsworths were then living at Allan Bank, De Quincey at Dove Cottage. Dunmail Raise is on the main road leading northwards out of Grasmere to Keswick.

⁶ Mrs Coleridge Sara (née Fricker), resident, with Southey and his family, at Greta Hall in Keswick.

⁷ Whitehaven is a seaport on the far northwestern coast of Cumbria, Kendal a market town in the south.

⁸ deadly excessive.

⁹ Dunmail, King of Cumberland, was defeated by the Saxon King Edmund in the decisive battle at Dunmail Raise. Dunmail was buried under a pile of stones which may still be seen on the Raise today.

¹⁰ that exquisite poem ‘There was a boy’, published in Lyrical Ballads (1800); see p. 484. De Quincey would have known (though his readers would not) that it had been incorporated into Thirteen-Book Prelude v 389–422.

¹¹ vesper hour time at which Venus (Vesper), the evening star, and the brightest, emerges in the evening sky.

¹² De Quincey is recollecting ‘There was a boy’ 20–5.

Suspiria de Profundis: The Affliction of Childhood (extract) ¹

From Blackwood’s Edinburgh Magazine (March 1845)

It was upon a Sunday evening (or so people fancied) that the spark of fatal fire fell upon that train of predispositions to a brain complaint² which had hitherto slumbered within her. She had been permitted to drink tea at the house of a labouring man, the father of an old female servant. The sun had set when she returned in the company of this servant through meadows reeking with exhalations after a fervent day. From that time she sickened. Happily a child in such circumstances feels no anxieties. Looking upon medical men as people whose natural commission it is to heal diseases, since it is their natural function to profess it, knowing them only as *ex officio*³ privileged to make war upon pain and sickness, I never had a misgiving about the result. I grieved indeed that my sister should lie in bed; I grieved still more sometimes to hear her moan. But all this appeared to me no more than a night of trouble on which the dawn would soon arise.

Oh moment of darkness and delirium when a nurse awakened me from that delusion, and launched God’s thunderbolt at my heart in the assurance that my sister must die! Rightly it is said of utter, utter misery, that it ‘cannot be remembered’;⁴ itself, as a rememberable thing, is swallowed up in its own chaos. Mere anarchy and confusion of mind fell upon me. Deaf and blind I was as I reeled under the revelation. I wish not to recall the circumstances of that time, when my agony was at its height, and hers in another sense was approaching. Enough to say that all was soon over, and the morning of that day had at last arrived which looked down upon her innocent face, sleeping the sleep from which there is no awaking, and upon me sorrowing the sorrow for which there is no consolation.

On the day after my sister's death, whilst the sweet temple of her brain was yet unviolated by human scrutiny,⁵ I formed my own scheme for seeing her once more. Not for the world would I have made this known, nor have suffered a witness to accompany me. I had never heard of feelings that take the name of 'sentimental', nor dreamed of such a possibility. But grief even in a child hates the light, and shrinks from human eyes. The house was large; there were two staircases, and by one of these I knew that about noon, when all would be quiet, I could steal up into her chamber. I imagine that it was exactly high noon when I reached the chamber door. It was locked, but the key was not taken away. Entering, I closed the door so softly that, although it opened upon a hall which ascended through all the stories, no echo ran along the silent walls. Then turning round, I sought my sister's face. But the bed had been moved, and the back was now turned. Nothing met my eyes but one large window wide open, through which the sun of midsummer at noonday was showering down torrents of splendour. The weather was dry, the sky was cloudless, the blue depths seemed the express types of infinity,⁶ and it was not possible for eye to behold or for heart to conceive any symbols more pathetic⁷ of life and the glory of life.

Let me pause for one instant in approaching a remembrance so affecting and revolutionary for my own mind, and one which (if any earthly remembrance) will survive for me in the hour of death, to remind some readers and to inform others that in the original *Opium Confessions*⁸ I endeavoured to explain the reason why death, caeteris paribus,⁹ is more profoundly affecting in summer than in other parts of the year – so far at least as it is liable to any modification at all from accidents of scenery or season.¹⁰ The reason, as I there suggested, lies in the antagonism between the tropical redundancy of life in summer and the dark sterilities of the grave. The summer we see, the grave we haunt with our thoughts; the glory is around us, the darkness is within us. And, the two coming into collision, each exalts the other into stronger relief. But in my case there was even a subtler reason why the summer had this intense power of vivifying¹¹ the spectacle or the thoughts of death. And, recollecting it, often I have been struck with the important truth that far more of our deepest thoughts and feelings pass to us through perplexed combinations of concrete objects, pass to us as *involute*s (if I may coin that word) in compound¹² experiences incapable of being disentangled, than ever reach us directly, and in their own abstract shapes.

It had happened that amongst our nursery collection of books was the Bible illustrated with many pictures. And in long dark evenings, as my three sisters with myself sat by the firelight round the guard¹³ of our nursery, no book was so much in request amongst us. It ruled us and swayed us as mysteriously as music. One young nurse whom we all loved, before any candle was lighted, would often strain her eyes to read it for us – and sometimes, according to her simple powers, would endeavour to explain what we found obscure. We, the children, were all constitutionally touched with pensiveness. The fitful gloom and sudden lambencies¹⁴ of the room by firelight suited our evening state of feelings, and they suited also the divine revelations of power and mysterious beauty which awed us. Above all, the story of a just man¹⁵ – man and yet not man, real above all things and yet shadowy above all things, who had suffered the passion of death in Palestine, slept upon our minds like early dawn upon the waters. The nurse knew and explained to us the chief differences in oriental climates, and all these differences (as it happens) express themselves in the great varieties of summer. The cloudless sunlights of Syria – those seemed to argue everlasting summer; the disciples plucking the ears of corn¹⁶ – that must be summer; but above all the very name of Palm Sunday¹⁷ (a festival in the English church) troubled me like an anthem. ‘Sunday?’ What was that? That was the day of peace which masked another peace deeper than the heart of man can comprehend. ‘Palms?’ What were they? That was an equivocal word: ‘palms’ in the sense of ‘trophies’ expressed the pomps of life; ‘palms’ as a product of nature expressed the pomps of summer. Yet still even this explanation does not suffice: it was not merely by the peace and by the summer, by the deep sound of rest below all rest and of ascending glory, that I had been haunted. It was also because Jerusalem stood near to those deep images both in time and in place. The great event of Jerusalem was at hand when

Palm Sunday came, and the scene of that Sunday was near in place to Jerusalem. Yet what then was Jerusalem? Did I fancy it to be the omphalos (navel) of the earth? That pretension had once been made for Jerusalem, and once for Delphi¹⁸ – and both pretensions had become ridiculous, as the figure¹⁹ of the planet became known. Yes – but if not of the earth, for earth's tenant Jerusalem was the omphalos of mortality. Yet how? There on the contrary it was, as we infants understood, that mortality had been trampled underfoot.²⁰ True, but for that very reason there it was that mortality had opened its very gloomiest crater. There it was indeed that the human had risen on wings from the grave. But for that reason there also it was that the divine had been swallowed up by the abyss; the lesser star could not rise before the greater would submit to eclipse. Summer, therefore, had connected itself with death not merely as a mode of antagonism, but also through intricate relations to scriptural scenery and events.

Out of this digression, which was almost necessary for the purpose of showing how inextricably my feelings and images of death were entangled with those of summer, I return to the bedchamber of my sister. From the gorgeous sunlight I turned round to the corpse. There lay the sweet childish figure, there the angel face – and, as people usually fancy, it was said in the house that no features had suffered any change. Had they not? The forehead indeed, the serene and noble forehead – that might be the same. But the frozen eyelids, the darkness that seemed to steal from beneath them, the marble lips, the stiffening hands laid palm to palm as if repeating the supplications of closing anguish – could these be mistaken for life? Had it been so, wherefore did I not spring to those heavenly lips with tears and never-ending kisses? But so it was not.

I stood checked for a moment – awe, not fear, fell upon me – and whilst I stood, a solemn wind began to blow, the most mournful that ear ever heard. Mournful! That is saying nothing. It was a wind that had swept the fields of mortality for a hundred centuries. Many times since, upon a summer day, when the sun is about the hottest, I have remarked the same wind arising and uttering the same hollow, solemn, Memnonian,²¹ but saintly swell; it is in this world the one sole audible symbol of eternity.

And three times in my life I have happened to hear the same sound in the same circumstances, viz. when standing between an open window and a dead body on a summer day.

Instantly, when my ear caught this vast Aeolian intonation,²² when my eye filled with the golden fullness of life, the pomps and glory of the heavens outside, and turning when it settled upon the frost²³ which overspread my sister's face, instantly a trance fell upon me. A vault seemed to open in the zenith of the far blue sky, a shaft which ran up for ever. I in spirit rose as if on billows that also ran up the shaft for ever, and the billows seemed to pursue the throne of God – but that also ran before us and fled away continually. The flight and the pursuit seemed to go on for ever and ever. Frost, gathering frost, some sarsar²⁴ wind of death, seemed to repel me. I slept, for how long I cannot say; slowly I recovered my self-possession, and found myself standing as before, close to my sister's bed.

Oh flight of the solitary child to the solitary God²⁵ – flight from the ruined corpse to the throne that could not be ruined! How rich wert thou in truth for after-years! Rapture of grief that, being too mighty for a child to sustain, foundest a happy oblivion in a heaven-born sleep, and within that sleep didst conceal a dream whose meanings in after-years, when slowly I deciphered, suddenly there flashed upon me new light – and even by the grief of a child, as I will show you reader hereafter, were confounded the falsehoods of philosophers.²⁶

In the Opium Confessions I touched a little upon the extraordinary power connected with opium (after long use) of amplifying the dimensions of time.²⁷ Space also it amplifies by degrees that are sometimes terrific.²⁸ But time it is upon which the exalting and multiplying power of opium chiefly spends its operation. Time becomes infinitely elastic, stretching out to such immeasurable and vanishing termini that it seems ridiculous to compute the sense of it on waking by expressions commensurate to human life. As in starry fields one computes by diameters of the earth's orbit, or of Jupiter's, so in valuing the virtual time lived during some dreams, the measurement by generations is ridiculous, by millennia is ridiculous – by aeons, I should say (if aeons were more determinate), would be also ridiculous. On this single occasion, however, in my life, the very inverse phenomenon occurred. But why speak of it in connection with opium? Could a child of six years old have been under that influence? No, but simply because it so exactly reversed the operation of opium. Instead of a short interval expanding into a vast one, upon this occasion a long one had contracted into a minute. I have reason to believe that a very long one had elapsed during this wandering or suspension of my perfect mind. When I returned to myself, there was a foot (or I fancied so) on the stairs. I was alarmed. For I believed that, if anybody should detect me, means would be taken to prevent my coming again. Hastily, therefore, I kissed the lips that I should kiss no more, and slunk like a guilty thing²⁹ with stealthy steps from the room. Thus perished the vision, loveliest amongst all the shows which earth has revealed to me; thus mutilated was the parting which should have lasted for ever; thus tainted with fear was the farewell sacred to love and grief, to perfect love and perfect grief.

Oh Ahasuerus, everlasting Jew!³⁰ Fable or not a fable, thou when first starting on thy endless pilgrimage of woe, thou when first flying through the gates of Jerusalem and vainly yearning to leave the pursuing curse behind thee, couldst not more certainly have read thy doom of sorrow in the misgivings of thy troubled brain than I when passing for ever from my sister's room. The worm was at my heart – and, confining myself to that stage of life, I may say, the worm that could not die. For if, when standing upon the threshold of manhood, I had ceased to feel its perpetual gnawings, that was because a vast expansion of intellect, it was because new hopes, new necessities, and the frenzy of youthful blood, had translated me into a new creature. Man is doubtless one by some subtle nexus³¹ that we cannot perceive, extending from the new-born infant to the superannuated dotard; but as regards many affections and passions incident to his nature at different stages, he is not one – the unity of man in this respect is coextensive³² only with the particular stage to which the passion belongs. Some passions, as that of sexual love, are celestial by one half of their origin, animal and earthy by the other half. These will not survive their own appropriate stage. But love which is altogether holy, like that between two children, will revisit undoubtedly by glimpses the silence and the darkness of old age – and I repeat my belief that, unless bodily torment should forbid it, that final experience in my sister’s bedroom, or some other in which her innocence was concerned, will rise again for me to illuminate the hour of death.

On the day following this which I have recorded, came a body of medical men to examine the brain, and the particular nature of the complaint, for in some of its symptoms it had shown perplexing anomalies. Such is the sanctity of death (and especially of death alighting on an innocent child), that even gossiping people do not gossip on such a subject. Consequently I knew nothing of the purpose which drew together these surgeons, nor suspected anything of the cruel changes which might have been wrought in my sister’s head. Long after this I saw a similar case; I surveyed the corpse (it was that of a beautiful boy eighteen years old,³³ who had died of the same complaint) one hour after the surgeons had laid the skull in ruins – but the dishonours of this scrutiny were hidden by bandages, and had not disturbed the repose of the countenance. So it might have been here, but if it were not so, then I was happy in being spared the shock, from having that marble image of peace, icy and rigid as it was, unsettled by disfiguring images. Some hours after the strangers had withdrawn, I crept again to the room, but the door was now locked, the key was taken away, and I was shut out for ever.

² a brain complaint Elizabeth Quincey died of meningitis in 1792, at the age of 9. De Quincey was 6. See headnote, pp. 829–30, above.

³ ex officio by virtue of their office.

⁴ cannot be remembered De Quincey is quoting Alhadra, having seen her murdered husband, from Coleridge’s Remorse (1813): ‘I stood in unimaginable trance / And agony that cannot be remembered' (IV iii 53–4). He probably knew the original version of the play, Osorio (1797).

5 whilst the sweet temple ... scrutiny The usual procedure would have been to perform an autopsy as soon as possible to confirm the cause of death.

20 mortality...underfoot i.e. by Christ's resurrection.

21 Memnonian i.e. sensitive to sunlight. The Romantics believed that the statue of Memnon, King of Ethiopia, which was believed to have been holding a lute, produced music when struck by the rising or setting sun.

22 Aeolian intonation De Quincey probably has in mind the other-worldly sound of an Aeolian harp.

26 ‘The thoughts referred to will be given in final notes, as at this point they seemed too much to interrupt the course of the narrative’ (De Quincey’s note). These ‘notes’ were never published, and may never have been written.

Suspiria de Profundis: The Palimpsest(extract) 1

From Blackwood’s Edinburgh Magazine (June 1845)

What else than a natural and mighty palimpsest is the human brain? Such a palimpsest is my brain; such a palimpsest, oh reader! is yours. Everlasting layers of ideas, images, feelings, have fallen upon your brain softly as light. Each succession has seemed to bury all that went before, and yet in reality not one has been extinguished. And if, in the vellum palimpsest, lying amongst the other diplomata2 of human archives or libraries, there is anything fantastic or which moves to laughter – as oftentimes there is in the grotesque collisions of those successive themes, having no natural connection, which by pure accident have consecutively occupied the roll – yet in our own heaven-created palimpsest, the deep memorial palimpsest of the brain, there are not and cannot be such incoherencies. The fleeting accidents of a man's life and its external shows may indeed be irrelate and incongruous, but the organizing principles which fuse into harmony and gather about fixed predetermined centres, whatever heterogeneous elements life may have accumulated from without, will not permit the grandeur of human unity greatly to be violated, or its ultimate repose to be troubled in the retrospect from dying moments or from other great convulsions.

Such a convulsion is the struggle of gradual suffocation, as in drowning – and in the original Opium Confessions I mentioned a case of that nature communicated to me by a lady from her own childish experience.³ The lady is still living, though now of unusually great age.⁴ And I may mention that amongst her faults never was numbered any levity⁵ of principle, or carelessness of the most scrupulous veracity⁶ – but, on the contrary, such faults as arise from austerity, too harsh perhaps, and gloomy, indulgent neither to others nor herself. And at the time of relating this incident, when already very old, she had become religious to asceticism.

According to my present belief, she had completed her ninth year when, playing by the side of a solitary brook, she fell into one of its deepest pools. Eventually (but after what lapse of time nobody ever knew) she was saved from death by a farmer who, riding in some distant lane, had seen her rise to the surface – but not until she had descended within the abyss of death, and looked into its secrets as far, perhaps, as ever human eye can have looked that had permission to return. At a certain stage of this descent, a blow seemed to strike her, phosphoric radiance sprang forth from her eyeballs, and immediately a mighty theatre expanded within her brain. In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, every act, every design of her past life lived again – arraying themselves not as a succession but as parts of a coexistence. Such a light fell upon the whole path of her life backwards into the shades of infancy, as the light perhaps which wrapped the destined apostle on his road to Damascus.⁷ Yet that light blinded for a season, but hers poured celestial vision upon the brain, so that her consciousness became omnipresent at one moment to every feature in the infinite review.

This anecdote was treated sceptically at the time by some critics. But besides that it has since been confirmed by other experiences essentially the same, reported by other parties in the same circumstances who had never heard of each other. The true point for astonishment is not the simultaneity of arrangement under which the past events of life – though in fact successive – had formed their dread line of revelation; this was but a secondary phenomenon. The deeper lay in the resurrection itself, and the possibility of resurrection for what had so long slept in the dust. A pall deep as oblivion had been thrown by life over every trace of these experiences, and yet suddenly, at a silent command, at the signal of a blazing rocket sent up from the brain, the pall draws up and the whole depths of the theatre are exposed. Here was the greater mystery: now this mystery is liable to no doubt, for it is repeated, and ten thousand times repeated by opium, for those who are its martyrs.

Yes, reader, countless are the mysterious handwritings of grief or joy which have inscribed themselves successively upon the palimpsest of your brain – and like the annual leaves of aboriginal forests,⁸ or the undissolving snows on the Himalaya, or light falling upon light, the endless strata have covered up each other in forgetfulness. But by the hour of death, but by fever, but by the searchings of opium, all these can revive in strength. They are not dead, but sleeping. In the illustration imagined by myself, from the case of some individual palimpsest, the Grecian tragedy had seemed to be displaced, but was not displaced, by the monkish legend – and the monkish legend had seemed to be displaced, but was not displaced, by the knightly romance. In some potent convulsion of the system, all wheels back into its earliest elementary stage. The bewildering romance, light tarnished with darkness, the semi-fabulous legend, truth celestial mixed with human falsehoods, these fade even of themselves as life advances. The romance has perished that the young man adored. The legend has gone that deluded the boy. But the deep, deep tragedies of infancy, as when the child's hands were unlinked for ever from his mother's neck, or his lips for ever from his sister's kisses,⁹ these remain lurking below all, and these lurk to the last. Alchemy there is none of passion or disease that can scorch away these immortal impresses.

Suspiria de Profundis: The Palimpsest

¹ This is an extract from the final part of Suspiria, which compares the human mind to a ‘palimpsest’ or parchment, in this case of vellum (sheepskin), written upon twice, the original writing having been erased or rubbed out to make place for the second. It is a remarkable essay, in which he expounds his theory concerning the way in which the conscious, subconscious and unconscious minds are interconnected. Coleridge had noted observations about this in his notebooks, and Wordsworth had speculated on it, particularly in The Prelude, but De Quincey was the first to refer to the subconscious in print.

Suspiria de Profundis: Finale to Part I. *Savannah-la-Mar*¹

From Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine (July 1845)

God smote Savannah-la-Mar, and in one night, by earthquake, removed her, with all her towers standing and population sleeping, from the steadfast foundations of the shore to the coral floors of ocean. And God said, 'Pompeii did I bury and conceal from men through seventeen centuries:² this city I will bury, but not conceal. She shall be a monument to men of my mysterious anger, set in azure light through generations to come – for I will enshrine her in a crystal dome of my tropic seas.'

This city, therefore, like a mighty galleon with all her apparel³ mounted, streamers flying and tackling perfect, seems floating along the noiseless depths of ocean. And oftentimes in glassy calms, through the translucent⁴ atmosphere of water that now stretches like an air-woven awning above the silent encampment, mariners from every clime look down into her courts and terraces, count her gates, and number the spires of her churches. She is one ample cemetery and has been for many a year, but in the mighty calms that brood for weeks over tropic latitudes, she fascinates the eye with a *fata Morgana*⁵ revelation, as of human life still subsisting in submarine asylums sacred from the storms that torment our upper air.⁶

Thither lured by the loveliness of cerulean depths, by the peace of human dwellings privileged from molestation, by the gleam of marble altars sleeping in everlasting sanctity, oftentimes in dreams did I and the Dark Interpreter⁷ cleave the watery veil that divided us from her streets. We looked into the belfries where the pendulous bells were waiting in vain for the summons which should awaken their marriage peals; together we touched the mighty organ keys that sang no *jubilates*⁸ for the ear of Heaven, that sang no requiems for the ear of human sorrow; together we searched the silent nurseries where the children were all asleep – and had been asleep through five generations.

‘They are waiting for the heavenly dawn’, whispered the Interpreter to himself, ‘and when that comes, the bells and the organs will utter a jubilate repeated by the echoes of paradise.’ Then, turning to me, he said, ‘This is sad, this is piteous, but less would not have sufficed for the purposes of God. Look here – put into a Roman clepsydra⁹ one hundred drops of water. Let these run out as the sands in an hourglass, every drop measuring the hundredth part of a second, so that each shall represent but the three-hundred-and-sixty-thousandth part of an hour. Now count the drops as they race along, and, when the fiftieth of the hundred is passing, behold! Forty-nine are not because already they have perished, and fifty are not because they are yet to come. You see, therefore, how narrow, how incalculably narrow, is the true and actual present.

Of that time which we call the present, hardly a hundredth part but belongs either to a past which has fled, or to a future which is still on the wing. It has perished, or it is not born. It was, or it is not. Yet even this approximation to the truth is infinitely false. For again subdivide that solitary drop which only was found to represent the present into a lower series of similar fractions, and the actual present which you arrest measures now but the thirty-sixth millionth of an hour. And so by infinite declensions the true and very present in which only we live and enjoy, will vanish into a mote of a mote, distinguishable only by a heavenly vision. Therefore the present, which only man possesses, offers less capacity for his footing than the slenderest film that ever spider twisted from her womb. Therefore, also, even this incalculable shadow from the narrowest pencil of moonlight is more transitory than geometry can measure or thought of angel can overtake. The time which is contracts into a mathematic point, and even that point perishes a thousand times before we can utter its birth. All is finite in the present, and even that finite is infinite in its velocity of flight towards death. But in God there is nothing finite; but in God there is nothing transitory; but in God there can be nothing that tends to death. Therefore it follows that for God there can be no present. The future is the present of God, and to the future it is that he sacrifices the human present. Therefore it is that he works by earthquake. Therefore it is that he works by grief. Oh deep is the ploughing of earthquake! Oh deep' – and his voice swelled like a *sanctus*¹⁰ rising from the choir of a cathedral – 'Oh deep is the ploughing of grief! But oftentimes less would not suffice for the agriculture of God. Upon a night of earthquake he builds a thousand years of pleasant habitations for man. Upon the sorrow of an infant, he raises oftentimes from human intellects glorious vintages that could not else have been. Less than these fierce ploughshares would not have stirred the stubborn soil. The one is needed for earth, our planet – for earth itself as the dwelling-place of man. But the other is needed yet oftener for God's mightiest instrument; yes,' (and he looked solemnly at myself) 'is needed for the mysterious children of the earth!'

Haydon was born at Plymouth on 25 January 1786. His artistic talent emerged quickly: at school he taught other pupils. Frustrated by seven years' apprenticeship to his father, a bookseller, he broke his indentures and left for London to study at the Royal Academy schools. Despite having talent and ambition, he was never successful as an artist, and suffered frequent bouts of poverty. But the patronage of the likes of Lord Mulgrave and Sir George and Lady Beaumont led to occasional commissions. In 1811 he began to keep a diary, the 'secret history of my mind', which eventually ran to over a million words. Though in many ways a difficult, prickly man, he enjoyed consorting with his contemporaries and by the end of 1812 his circle included Hazlitt, Lamb and Leigh Hunt.

One of his most important paintings, Christ's Entry into Jerusalem (now at St Mary's Seminary, Ohio), was begun in 1814, and was present on the evening of the 'immortal dinner'. It was to occupy him for the next six years, and included portraits of Keats, Wordsworth, Hazlitt and Newton. He met Keats at Leigh Hunt's Hampstead cottage in October 1816, and by the time of the dinner Keats practically worshipped him, having included him as one of the three 'Great spirits' on earth in 'Addressed to Haydon' (see p. 1397). They fell out partly because Keats was disturbed by Haydon's quarrels with Leigh Hunt, and partly because of Haydon's refusal to repay a loan of £30.

On 28 December 1817 he held the 'immortal dinner' at his lodgings and studio, 22 Lisson Grove North, Paddington. Haydon's diary account of the evening is one of the most vivid portraits we have of the Romantics at play. It appeals to us not just for the social comedy of Lamb's drunkenness, or the discomfort of Wordsworth when confronted with his boss from the Stamp Office, John Kingston, but because it offers us the sense of an artistic fraternity that understood that as Romantics they were different from the generation that had preceded them; as Haydon puts it: 'I never passed a more delightful day, and I am convinced that nothing in Boswell is equal to what came out from these poets. Indeed there were no such poets in his time.'

Keats, who was among Haydon's guests, described it briefly in a letter to George and Tom Keats, written just over a week after the event:

I forget whether I had written my last before my Sunday evening at Haydon's – no, I did not or I should have told you, Tom, of a young man you met at Paris at Scott's of the name of Richer,¹ I think. He is going to Fezzan² in Africa there to proceed if possible like Mungo Park. He was very polite to me and enquired very particularly after you. Then there was Wordsworth, Lamb, Monkhouse, Landseer, Kingston and your humble sarvant. Lamb got tipsy and blew up Kingston, proceeding so far as to take the candle across the room, hold it to his face, and show us wh-a-at-sort-fellow he-waas. I astonished Kingston at supper with a pertinacity in favour of drinking, keeping my two glasses at work in a knowing way. (Rollins i 198)

Like many of the Romantics, Haydon was not appreciated in his own day, and financial difficulties led to his imprisonment for debt in 1828. For much of his career he was compelled to paint genre scenes and portraits just to make ends meet, although he did produce such exceptional pictures as Marcus Curtius Leaping into the Gulf (1836–42) and Wordsworth on Helvellyn (1842) – the subject of a sonnet by Elizabeth Barrett (p. 1537), and an icon of the period. All the same, he felt himself to have been a failure even as he hung the final exhibition of his works at the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly, in April 1846. It closed after six weeks, losing him more than £111. Pressured by debt, persuaded of the uselessness of his life, on 22 June he first attempted unsuccessfully to shoot himself, and then slit his own throat. ‘Stretch me no longer on this rough world,’ he had written on the last page of his diary.

[The Immortal Dinner]

28 December 1817. Wordsworth dined with me; Keats and Lamb with a friend made up the dinner party, and a very pleasant party we had. Wordsworth was in fine and powerful cue.¹ We had a glorious set-to on Homer, Shakespeare, Milton and Virgil. Lamb got excessively merry and witty, and his fun in the intervals of Wordsworth’s deep and solemn intonations of oratory was the fun and wit of the fool in the intervals of Lear’s passion.² Lamb soon gets tipsy, and tipsy he got very shortly, to our infinite amusement.

‘Now, you rascally Lake Poet’, said Lamb, ‘you call Voltaire³ a dull fellow.’⁴ We all agreed there was a state of mind when he would appear so – and ‘Well let us drink his health’, said Lamb. ‘Here’s Voltaire, the Messiah of the French nation, and a very fit one!’

He then attacked me for putting in Newton,⁵ ‘a fellow who believed nothing unless it was as clear as the three sides of a triangle!’ And then he and Keats agreed he had destroyed all the poetry of the rainbow by reducing it to a prism. It was impossible to resist them, and we drank ‘Newton’s health, and confusion to mathematics!’ It was delightful to see the good humour of Wordsworth in giving in to all our frolics without affectation⁶ and laughing as heartily as the best of us.

By this time other visitors began to drop in, and a Mr Ritchie,⁷ who is going to penetrate into the interior of Africa. I introduced him to Wordsworth as such, and the conversation got into a new train. After some time, Lamb, who had seemingly paid no attention to anyone, suddenly opened his eyes and said, alluding to the dangers of penetrating into the interior of Africa, ‘And pray, who is the gentleman we are going to lose?’ Here was a roar of laughter, the victim Ritchie joining with us.

We now retired to tea, and, among other friends, a gentleman⁸ who was Comptroller of the Stamp Office came. He had been peculiarly anxious to know and see Wordsworth. The moment he was introduced he let Wordsworth know who he officially was.⁹ This was an exquisite touch of human nature. Though Wordsworth of course would not have suffered him to speak indecently or impiously without reproof, yet he had a visible effect on Wordsworth. I felt pain at the slavery of office. In command men are despotic, and those who are dependent on others who have despotic control must and do feel affected by their presence. The Comptroller was a very mild and nice fellow, but rather weak and very fond of talking. He got into conversation with Wordsworth on poetry, and just after he had been putting forth some of his silly stuff, Lamb, who had been dozing as usual, suddenly opened his mouth and said, ‘What did you say, sir?’

‘Why, sir’, said the Comptroller, in his milk and water insipidity, ‘I was saying...’, etc., etc., etc.

‘Do you say so, sir?’ ‘Yes sir’, was the reply. ‘Why then, sir, I say (hiccup) you are – you are a silly fellow!’ This operated like thunder. The Comptroller knew nothing of his previous tipsiness and looked at him like a man bewildered. The venerable anxiety of Wordsworth to prevent the Comptroller being angry, and his expostulations with Lamb, who had sunk back again into his doze, as insensible to the confusion he had produced as a being above it; the astonishment of Landseer the engraver,¹⁰ who was totally deaf, and with his hand to his ear and his eye was trying to catch the meaning of the gestures he saw; and the agonizing attempts of Keats, Ritchie, and I to suppress our laughter; and the smiling struggle of the Comptroller to take all in good part without losing his dignity, made up a story of comic expressions totally unrivalled in nature. I felt pain that such a poet as Wordsworth should be under the supervision of such a being as this Comptroller. The people of England have a horror of office, an instinct against it. They are right. A man's liberty is gone the moment he becomes official; he is the slave of superiors, and makes others slaves to him. The Comptroller went on making his profound remarks, and when anything very deep came forth,¹¹ Lamb roared out,

Diddle iddle don
My son John
Went to bed with his breeches on,
One stocking off and one stocking on,
My son John.

The Comptroller laughed as if he marked it, and went on; every remark Lamb chorused with

Went to bed with his breeches on Diddle iddle on.

There is no describing this scene adequately. There was not the restraint of refined company, nor the vulgar freedom of low, but a frank natural license such as one sees in an act of Shakespeare, every man expressing his natural emotions without fear. Into this company, a little heated with wine, a Comptroller of the Stamp Office walked, frilled, dressed, and official, with a due awe of the powers above him and a due contempt for those beneath him. His astonishment at finding where he was come cannot be conceived, and in the midst of his mild namby-pamby¹² opinions, Lamb's address deadened his views. When they separated, Wordsworth softened his feelings, but Lamb kept saying in the Painting Room, 'Who is that fellow? Let me go and hold the candle once more to his face –

My son John
Went to bed with his breeches on!'

And these were the last words of C. Lamb. The door was closed upon him. There was something interesting in seeing Wordsworth sitting, and Keats and Lamb, and my picture of Christ's entry towering up behind them, occasionally brightened by the gleams of flame that sparkled from the fire, and hearing the voice of Wordsworth repeating Milton with an intonation like the funeral bell of St Paul's¹³ and the music of Handel mingled, and then Lamb's wit came sparkling in between, and Keats' rich fancy of satyrs and fauns and doves and white clouds wound up the stream of conversation. I never passed a more delightful day, and I am convinced that nothing in Boswell¹⁴ is equal to what came out from these poets. Indeed there were no such poets in his time.¹⁵ It was an evening worthy of the Elizabethan age, and will long flash upon 'that inward eye which is the bliss of solitude.'¹⁶ Hail and farewell!

George Gordon Byron, 6th Baron Byron (1788–1824)

George Gordon, Lord Byron, that most seductively attractive of poets (and one of the biggest-selling of his day), was born 22 January 1788, to Catherine Gordon and Captain John ‘Mad Jack’ Byron, in poor lodgings in London. He had a deformed right foot from birth and, despite several failed operations, was lame for the rest of his life. Abandoned by her husband (who, having spent his wife’s inheritance, died in mysterious circumstances in France in 1791), his mother took her son to Aberdeen in her native Scotland, where she brought him up as best she could, but in considerable poverty. Here he came to love the Scottish countryside – and, at the age of 7, his cousin, Mary Duff, the first of many females who would fascinate him.

He was only 10 years old when, on the death of his great-uncle in 1798, he succeeded to the barony, becoming sixth Lord Byron. At that point he and his mother moved to Newstead Abbey in Nottinghamshire, and he began to receive private tuition in preparation for entrance to a public school. At this period, his nurse May Gray beat and sexually abused him. This went on for about two years before it was discovered and she was dismissed.

At home, he fell in love with another cousin, Margaret Parker, who inspired Byron’s ‘first dash into poetry’. He entered Harrow School in 1801. Among his contemporaries were a future marquess, two actual and five future earls and viscounts, four other lords, four baronets, two future Prime Ministers (Lord Palmerston and Robert Peel), and the Duke of Dorset, who became Byron’s ‘fag’ (or servant). At the age of 15 he fell in love with yet another cousin, Mary Chaworth, refusing to go back to Harrow on account of his feelings for her. This gave way to an intense friendship with the 23-year-old Lord Grey de Ruthyn, who had taken a lease on Newstead Abbey until Byron’s coming of age five years hence. Their association came to an abrupt halt in January 1804 when Grey seduced Byron, who returned to Harrow soon after.

He fell in love with other boys in his remaining year and a half there; Lady Caroline Lamb later claimed that he slept with three of them. In spite of his obvious brilliance, he was never a diligent student but read voraciously, noting at the age of 19 that he had digested ‘about four thousand novels, including the works of Cervantes, Fielding, Smollett, Richardson, Mackenzie, Sterne, Rabelais and Rousseau’. In 1805 he led a rebellion against the new headmaster, the Reverend Dr George Butler, whom he found affected, ingratiating, overbearing, boastful, pedantic and (worst of all) socially inadequate. He organized the dragging of Butler’s desk into the middle of the School House where it was set on fire, and composed scurrilous verses about him. Other triumphs included his performance of King Lear’s address to the storm at the 1805 Speech Day, followed by the scoring of eighteen runs in the Eton–Harrow cricket match – no mean feat for someone with a club foot.

He left having incurred numerous debts, and took every opportunity, after going up to Trinity College, Cambridge, in October 1805, to increase them, living high on the highest of hogs. By January 1808 his debts amounted to over £5,000 – £210,000/US$378,400 today. Cambridge brought out his lordliness: the keeping of dogs being prohibited, he kept a tame bear in a turret at the top of a staircase. He struck up a passionate friendship with the choirboy John Edleston, ‘the only being I esteem’, who provided the inspiration for the ‘Thyrza’ poems (see pp. 872–4). In 1806 he gathered his juvenile poetry as Fugitive Pieces but suppressed the book at the last moment; in January 1807 he privately printed his juvenilia as Poems on Various Occasions; and in the summer of 1807 published a third volume, Hours of Idleness. It drew damning criticism from Henry Brougham (anonymously) in the Edinburgh Review for January 1808, whose opening remarks set the tone for what was to come: ‘His effusions are spread over a dead flat, and can no more get above or below the level, than if they were so much stagnant water.’ Byron was mortified. He downed three bottles of claret after dinner and contemplated suicide.

The following day he decided to take revenge with a vigorous satire on literary life, English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809), the chief butt of which was Francis Jeffrey (see pp. 734–5), editor of the Edinburgh, whom he held responsible for the review. He laboured over it for more than a year before it was published anonymously, by which time it had grown to the point at which it lambasted virtually every notable in the literary world – the ‘dunces’, as he put it, which included his guardian, the Earl of Carlisle, who nurtured the ambition of being a verse-dramatist: ‘No muse will cheer, with renovating smile, / The paralytic puking of Carlisle.’

The only writers of whom he had anything good to say were Thomas Campbell, Thomas Moore, Samuel Rogers and William Gifford. He saw them as faithful to the ‘correct’ Augustan tradition of Pope, Dryden and Swift, which had been rejected by Wordsworth, Coleridge and Southey in exchange for misguided poetic and philosophical systems. That was why he sniffed at Wordsworth’s Poems in Two Volumes when he reviewed it in 1807, dismissing its author’s ‘namby-pamby’ weakness for ‘the most commonplace ideas’. Even his own poetry failed sufficiently to conform to the Augustan tradition, as he noted in correspondence with his publisher, John Murray, in September 1817:

With regard to poetry in general I am convinced, the more I think of it, that he [Thomas Moore] and all of us – Scott, Southey, Wordsworth, Moore, Campbell, I – are all in the wrong, one as much as another – that we are upon a wrong revolutionary poetical system (or systems) not worth a damn in itself – and from which none but Rogers and Crabbe are free – and that the present and next generations will finally be of this opinion. I am the more confirmed in this by having lately gone over some of our classics, particularly Pope, whom I tried¹ in this way: I took Moore’s poems and my own and some others, and went over them side by side with Pope’s, and I was really astonished (I ought not to have been so) and mortified at the ineffable distance in point of sense, harmony, effect, and even Imagination, passion, and invention, between the little Queen Anne’s man [Pope] and us of the lower Empire.²

This was the position from which Byron attacked his contemporaries throughout his life, and which was to inform his criticism of the Lake poets in Don Juan. Whatever the rights and wrongs of that, English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, a satire written in Popean couplets, enjoyed huge popularity, going through numerous editions, and attracting favourable press coverage.

Having graduated from Cambridge in July 1808, he became a man about town, known liaisons including his adolescent page, Robert Rushton; Caroline Cameron, a 16-year-old Brighton prostitute who dressed as his pageboy; ‘a famous French “Entremetteuse” who assisted young gentlemen in their youthful pastimes’; and at least three regular mistresses. It was as a supporter of Napoleon (who now, as Emperor, ruled most of Europe) that he took his seat in the House of Lords on 13 March 1809 on the Whig side, in opposition to the government. In July, more than £12,000 in debt (£460,000/US$850,000 today), he eluded his creditors by embarking with his Cambridge friend John Cam Hobhouse on a tour of Portugal, Spain, Gibraltar, Malta, Albania and Greece. In these countries homosexuality was less frowned upon than in England, and that may explain why he chose them. In the course of his travels he met the former robber baron Ali Pasha (the Turkish despot of Albania and western Greece), swam the Hellespont, saved the life of a Turkish girl condemned to death for sexual impropriety, and met the young woman he would celebrate in verse as the ‘Maid of Athens’.

After two years and twelve days abroad, he landed at Sheerness in Kent on 14 July 1811, bringing with him the manuscript of Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, a semi-autobiographical poem about his travels. It was published by John Murray in March 1812 and was an instant success. All five hundred copies of the first edition sold out within three days of publication, and Byron became a celebrity. As Samuel Rogers recalled: ‘The genius which the poem exhibited, the youth, the rank of the author, his romantic wanderings in Greece, – these combined to make the world stark mad about Childe Harold and Byron.’ In a favourable notice in the Edinburgh Review, Francis Jeffrey described the poem as follows:

Childe Harold is a sated epicure – sickened with the very fullness of prosperity – oppressed with ennui, and stung by occasional remorse; – his heart hardened by a long course of sensual indulgence, and his opinion of mankind degraded by his acquaintance with the baser part of them. In this state he wanders over the fairest and most interesting parts of Europe, in the vain hope of stimulating his palsied sensibility by novelty, or at least of occasionally forgetting his mental anguish in the toils and perils of his journey.

The identification of Byron with his protagonist fuelled interest in the poem and its author. Female admirers wrote him fan mail, enclosing their own verses, requesting signed copies of his works, samples of his handwriting and locks of his hair – a trend that continued unabated until his death. From this point onwards virtually everything he published would sell in thousands, making him one of the bestselling writers of the day.

He delivered his maiden speech in the House of Lords on 27 February 1812 on behalf of the stocking-weavers of Nottingham (the Luddites), in response to a vicious piece of legislation, the Tory Frame Work Bill, which proposed the death penalty as punishment for destruction of the new ‘frames’ that mechanized production. For all his lordliness, Byron sympathized with working people, and acted as their spokesman in Parliament:

How will you carry the bill into effect? Can you commit a whole county to their own prisons? Will you erect a gibbet in every field to hang up men like scarecrows? Or will you proceed ... by decimation, place the country under martial law, depopulate and lay waste all around you, and restore Sherwood forest as an acceptable gift to the crown in its former condition of a royal chase and an asylum for outlaws? Are these the remedies for a starving and desperate populace?³

Byron would never cease to feel incensed by the iniquities of his homeland, but was probably too much of a freethinker to have made a successful career within the constraints of the party system. Though welcomed into Whig circles at the highest levels, he seems not to have gained the trust of such grandees as Henry Richard Fox, third Lord Holland, who may have suspected the relish with which Byron castigated authority figures. 'I was born for opposition', Byron later wrote.⁴

In any case, Childe Harold put an end to his political ambitions, but confirmed him as a writer – and with the tsunami of female admirers came Lady Caroline Lamb, married to the Hon. William Lamb since 1805. In February 1812, she was handed the manuscript of Childe Harold by Rogers, who told her to read it with the words: 'You should know the new poet.' As Lamb recalled,

I read it, and that was enough. Rogers said, 'He has a club-foot, and bites his nails.' I said, 'If he was ugly as Aesop I must know him.' I was one night at Lady Westmoreland's; the women were all throwing their heads at him. Lady Westmoreland led me up to him. I looked earnestly at him, and turned on my heel. My opinion, in my journal was, 'mad – bad – and dangerous to know'. A day or two passed; I was sitting with Lord and Lady Holland, when he was announced. Lady Holland said, 'I must present Lord Byron to you'. Lord Byron said, 'That offer was made to you before; may I ask why you rejected it?' He begged permission to come and see me. He did so the next day. Rogers and Moore were standing by me: I was on the sofa. I had just come in from riding. I was filthy and heated. When Lord Byron was announced, I flew out of the room to wash myself. When I returned, Rogers said, 'Lord Byron, you are a happy man. Lady Caroline has been sitting here in all her dirt with us, but when you were announced, she flew to beautify herself.' Lord Byron wished to come and see me at eight o'clock, when I was alone; that was my dinner-hour. I said he might. From that moment, for more than nine months, he almost lived at Melbourne House. It was then the centre of all gaiety, at least in appearance.⁵

Her husband knew of the affair, but turned a blind eye. Perhaps he knew it would not go on for long: it began in March and ended in November – a comparatively long time for Byron, who was easily bored by women. Caroline kept him interested by being volatile and unpredictable – she was a 'volcano'. He outfitted her in pageboy gear, the thrill of seeing a woman cross-dress being a perpetual source of excitement. But the sword was bound to outwear its sheath, and he brought the relationship to a sudden end with a letter bearing the seal of his new conquest, Lady Oxford. Lady Caroline was not easily to be cast aside, however, and became what we would now describe as a 'stalker', following him wherever he went, loitering in the street when he was attending parties. 'You talked to me about keeping her out', Byron told Lady Melbourne in June 1814; 'it is impossible – she comes at all times – at any time – and the moment the door is open in she walks – I can't throw her out of the window.'⁶ Her revenge would take the form of a novel, Glenarvon (1816), which portrayed Byron as the evil and depraved Earl of Glenarvon, and reprinted, word for word, the letter with which he ended their affair.

Byron consolidated his success with Oriental romances that reworked the successful formula of Childe Harold, in which the dark, brooding hero found himself in exotic locations: The Giaour (1813), The Bride of Abydos (1813), The Corsair (1814) and Lara (1814). Enormously popular, they were literary fantasies for an audience eager for escape – diverting enough for both author and reader, but hardly the great poetry for which he was destined. All the same, his stock was on the rise. By 1816 he had sufficient clout to order Murray to publish Coleridge's Christabel; Kubla Khan: A Vision; The Pains of Sleep for the first time. Murray knew it was unlikely to sell, but Byron was too important an author to displease.

During these years he became very close to Augusta Leigh, his half-sister, the child of his father's first marriage. Her mother had died only two days after her birth, and she had been brought up by a grandmother and various relatives. She did not meet Byron as a child; they first met when he was at Harrow, and began to correspond in 1804. In 1807 she married a cousin, Colonel George Leigh, and over the next six years gave birth to three daughters. In the summer of 1813 Byron visited the Leighs near Newmarket, fell passionately in love with her, and took her back to London, showing her off as his consort. A physical relationship developed, and it was thanks only to the counsel of Lady Melbourne that he was dissuaded from the plan of eloping with Augusta to the Continent. Generally speaking, Byron preferred men to women, but this was the great romance of his life; no one would ever mean so much to him as his half-sister, and no physical relationship ever promised so much. Yet he knew he was in danger of ruining her reputation, and that it had to end. Augusta was to become the subject of his most heartfelt love poems, the Stanzas and Epistle that bear her name (see pp. 914–19), and their relationship is memorialized in Childe Harold's Pilgrimage Canto III (stanza 55): 'That love was pure ...'.

Desperate that the bisexual half-brother with whom she had been involved should attain some measure of respectability, Augusta urged him to court the affections of Annabella Milbanke, a society heiress, whom he married on 2 January 1815. The decision was made in haste, and they turned out to be disastrously ill-matched (though it is not easy to imagine what kind of woman would have been happy with him). Annabella was the opposite of her volatile husband, her skill at mathematics bespeaking a temperament that had little in common with his. Byron called her the Princess of Parallelograms. (The character of Don Juan's mother, Donna Inez, whose 'favourite science was the mathematical', is based partly on her.) Their daughter, Augusta Ada, was born on 10 December, by which time their marriage was seriously on the rocks and debt-collectors once more on the doorstep.

They separated in February 1816 amidst accusations of infidelity and outright insanity. Caroline Lamb whipped Annabella into a frenzy by revealing details of Byron's homosexual liaisons, and in a short time London was buzzing with talk of his private life. Ostracized from society, besieged by creditors, Byron decided again to leave England – this time for ever. He ordered his coach-maker to manufacture a replica of Napoleon's carriage and on 25 April 1816 set out with Hobhouse and his personal physician, John Polidori, on a whirlwind tour that took in Bruges, Antwerp, Brussels and Waterloo (already a tourist destination thanks to the decisive battle the previous year).

The Byron ménage arrived at the Hotel Angleterre in Sécheron near Geneva on 25 May, where he amused himself by putting his age down in the hotel register as 100. Two days later on the hotel jetty he met Shelley, who had arrived ten days before with Mary Godwin and her half-sister Claire Clairmont (with whom Byron had had an affair in London). Geneva remained his base until the end of September, and during that summer he and Shelley saw a great deal of each other. It was an important moment in literary history, not unlike the annus mirabilis of 1797–8 when Wordsworth and Coleridge inspired each other to ever greater heights of poetic achievement. Shelley's influence had an immediate effect: from this time onwards one senses a seriousness and commitment in Byron's poetry that was not there before.

The Shelleys soon moved to Maison Chappuis, a small house on the far side of the lake at Montalègre, while Byron moved into Villa Diodati at Cologny, high on the bank above them. Diodati had pleasant associations because Milton stayed there with his friend Charles Diodati in 1639. Each day Byron and Shelley would sail across the lake and talk. Towards the end of June they set out on a week-long expedition round Lac Léman in a new boat Byron had purchased, taking with them an English translation of Rousseau's Julie, ou La Nouvelle Héloïse from which Shelley read aloud. In the evenings they read each other ghost stories. This led Byron to suggest the story-writing competition that inspired Mary Godwin's Frankenstein. Byron began, but did not finish, a fragment of a novel about an aristocratic vampire, Augustus Darvell; Polidori stole the idea and wrote his own story, The Vampyre, featuring the evil Lord Ruthven, who bore more than a passing resemblance to his employer.

This was a creative period. During the summer Byron composed much of Manfred, Prometheus, Darkness and Childe Harold Canto III; Shelley wrote two of his most important poems, Hymn to Intellectual Beauty and Mont Blanc (see pp. 1101–7). Complete texts of Childe Harold Canto III and Manfred are presented here. Both, in their different ways, are extraordinary; both are influenced by Wordsworth. Though for most of his life contemptuous of Wordsworth (for his rejection of Pope), Byron during the summer of 1816 listened to Shelley's recitals of Wordsworth's Poems (1815) and The Excursion (1814) – as he later remarked, Shelley 'used to dose me with Wordsworth physic even to nausea'.⁷ The medicine, however bitter it was to Byron's taste, was to influence his account of the Alpine landscape by which he was surrounded, especially in Childe Harold Canto III, and the effects were observed by Wordsworth when he remarked that Byron's 'poetical obligations to me' consisted 'not so much in particular expressions, though there is no want of these, as in the tone (assumed rather than natural) of enthusiastic admiration of nature, and a sensibility to her influences'.⁸ Wordsworth was right. When Byron says 'High mountains are a feeling, but the hum / Of human cities torture' (ll. 682–3), he is at his least persuasive. He enjoyed London for the delights it had to offer, just as he did Venice and Rome; the pose he strikes is modelled on Wordsworth's reference to 'the din / Of towns and cities' in 'Tintern Abbey' (p. 416).

Childe Harold Canto III ranges across Europe, taking the same route as that followed by Byron in April–May 1816, visiting Waterloo (for melancholy reflections on war), travelling up the Rhine (for further reflections of a similar kind), into Switzerland, and arrival at Geneva, where Harold memorializes Rousseau and Voltaire. Perhaps the most impressive stanzas are those about Napoleon:

There sunk the greatest, nor the worst of men,
Whose spirit antithetically mixed

One moment of the mightiest, and again
On little objects with like firmness fixed,
Extreme in all things!

(ll. 316–20)

There is provocation in this: back home, Napoleon was public enemy number one, and Byron knew such comments would scandalize his readers. All the same, his admiration was genuine. To be ‘a god unto thyself’ was a principal Byronic ambition, and as Napoleon had achieved precisely that, it was natural that he should have regarded him as a kindred spirit. In exile Byron may have identified with him more than ever; both had been hurled from their former eminences – Byron by disgrace, Napoleon by fortune. He goes on to cast Napoleon as a type of overreacher, possessing ‘a fever at the core, / Fatal to him who bears, to all who ever bore’ (ll. 377–8): a tragic hero condemned by circumstance and the injustice of his time.⁹

You can’t hold views like this and claim to subscribe to the central tenets of Christian theism, and neither Byron nor Shelley believed in God in anything like the conventional sense. In Canto III Byron goes out of his way to declare that ‘I have not loved the world ... Nor coined my cheek to smiles, nor cried aloud / In worship of an echo’ (ll. 1049, 1052–3). If he believes in anything, it is his own god-like potential. Even at his most credulous, Byron is willing to admit only the bare possibility of ‘the Power which gave’ (l.156) – and, even then, makes the point that it is responsible for having permitted the appalling carnage of Waterloo.

If the plight of the Byronic overreacher is that of Childe Harold, so too is it that of Manfred. Manfred was inspired partly by Matthew G. Lewis’s readings to Byron of Goethe’s Faust. (Lewis had written a popular Gothic novel, The Monk.) But Manfred is distinguished from other versions of the Faust character by defiance of the spirits he invokes, and passion for his dead sister, Astarte (an idealized version of Augusta Leigh). It is one of Byron’s most serious works, in which the eponymous hero embodies his creator’s frustration at the human condition, and contempt for institutionalized religion. Although a drama, Byron claimed to have ‘rendered it quite impossible for the stage – for which my intercourse with Drury Lane had given me the greatest contempt.’¹⁰

He left Switzerland at the end of August and travelled south, arriving in Venice in November. Although he would continue to tour Italy, he was to be based, for the next three years, in Venice. Here, in 1818, he composed the fourth and final Canto of Childe Harold, and discovered ottava rima. It was a turning point in his poetic development, as he realized immediately that it was much better suited to his purposes than the Spenserian stanza he had used up to now. Why? Because the Italian form was geared to feminine rhymes and a rapid metre – ideal for comedy. He experimented with it in Beppo and the Epistle to Augusta (pp. 915–19), and then, in 1818, began his masterpiece: Don Juan. This was originally to have been a single poem no longer than Canto I, but as he reached its end he saw that the central character had more potential than he had first thought. He immediately set about a second Canto. Cantos I and II were the first to appear in print, and are presented here in their entirety with the Dedication, as Byron intended. The Dedication was written for the first edition of 1819, but in the event it was cancelled, not to be published until 1832, well after Byron’s death. Why? The principal reason was its forthright attack on the Lake Poets, especially Southey. Byron detested them for having forsaken the radical creed they had espoused as young men: Wordsworth’s patron was a

Tory landowner, Southey had become a Tory journalist, and Coleridge had disappeared into the vortex of his own metaphysics. They had failed their promise, and in Byron's view Southey was the worst: 'A tinkering slavemaker who mends old chains' (l.111).

Byron declared, 'I have no plan – I had no plan – but I had or have materials',¹¹ and the manner in which Don Juan is written is just as important as the story; as he observed, 'I mean it for a poetical Tristram Shandy.'¹² It is sufficiently relaxed to contain all the waywardness, unpredictability and accumulated detritus of life as it is lived. 'Almost all Don Juan is real life', Byron declared, 'either my own, or from people I know.'¹³ He worked on it for his remaining years, leaving it unfinished at the time of his death. It would run to sixteen Cantos, and fourteen stanzas of a seventeenth. It is his masterpiece.

Anxious about the content of the poem, John Murray issued Cantos I and II on 15 July 1819, omitting both his name and Byron's from the title-page. All the same, everyone knew who was the author, and despite (or perhaps because of) its risqué subject matter, it sold incredibly well. That it was widely regarded as indecent, fit only for degraded and perverted old scoundrels like its author, was the subtext of the outraged condemnation of the shipwreck scene which appeared in the British Critic:

In the scenes of confusion and agony attending a shipwreck, in the struggles for self-preservation, in the loss of so many souls, perhaps but too unprepared for their great account, in tracing the protracted sufferings of those whose lot is still to linger on in desperation drearier than death, in viewing a company of fellow-creatures on the wide ocean, devouring their last morsel, in witnessing hunger and thirst increasing upon them, the cannibal passions beginning to rise, the casting of lots for destruction, the self-immolation, the feast upon human blood, the frantic feeling of satiety – surely in bringing all these things home to our hearts, we can ill endure a full-born jest. Much less can we tolerate the mixing up of these fearful events with low doggerel and vapid absurdity.

In one sense, the reviewer was right. Don Juan was a calculated affront to public taste. You could hardly argue that the shipwreck was not intended to be realistic – it was, and Byron took care to base it on first-hand accounts.¹⁴ But what really upset the reviewer (though he was too shocked to put it in this way) was the pleasure Byron took in undermining human virtue and religious faith, exposing the animalistic urges that underlie almost all social behaviour. Another poet might have had the inhabitants of the lifeboat pray for salvation and receive sustenance, but Byron ensures it is Pedrillo, Juan's tutor, licensed to carry out religious rites, who is the first to be eaten. It is not long before those who have dined on him foam at the mouth 'with strange convulsions racked', proof that spiritual belief is like a mental illness passed from one person to the next.

In Don Juan, nothing is sacred; everything is reduced to the same materialistic level, everything is profaned. Take for instance the moment in the cave when, frying eggs for the emaciated Juan, Zoe notes that 'the best feelings must have victual'¹⁵ – love is dependent on the state of one's stomach. Not very surprisingly, perhaps, Wordsworth did not see the joke; in late January 1820, he told Henry Crabb Robinson: 'I am persuaded that Don Juan will do more harm to the English character than anything of our time.'¹⁶ That copious absence of respect for things sacred, besides being funny, has been the secret of the poem's popularity, which came only in the twentieth century.

It was one of Byron's more appalling boasts that, during his time in Venice, he made love to over two hundred women. True or not, a degree of stability entered his private life when, in the year of Juan's appearance, he became cavaliere servente (lover of a married woman) to Contessa Teresa Guiccioli, whom he encountered at a conversazione at the Palazzo Benzoni in Venice. Their first assignation took place the day after, and the 'essential part of the business' occupied them, according to Byron, 'four continuous days'. Their love affair would sustain him until the end of his life. He followed the Guicciolis to their home in Ravenna, then to their palace in Bologna. It was while on that journey that he composed one of his most successful love poems, 'To the Po' (p. 1064).

In 1821 he moved to Pisa to be near Shelley who, with him and Leigh Hunt, wished to set up a new periodical entitled The Liberal. Unfortunately, before it could begin publishing, Shelley went sailing in his new boat, the Ariel, and drowned on 8 July. Shelley's corpse was washed up several days later, and cremated on the beach at Viareggio on 16 July, with Byron in attendance. According to Trelawny, Shelley's heart 'would not take the flame', and in due course it would pass, as a relic, into the possession of Shelley's descendants. The Liberal struggled on for four numbers, attracting terrible reviews, until it was discontinued and Hunt returned with his family to England.

Byron prided himself on consistency in politics, and it was characteristic of him to join the fight for Greek independence. The massacre of Chios in spring 1822, in which 25,000 Greeks were slaughtered by the Turks, led to an outpouring of support for their plight. He was an eager recruit to the London Greek Committee, formed in January 1823. It was not merely the cause that drew him, but identification with the Suliotes, the exiled military caste of Orthodox Christian Albanians whom he thought of as similar to a Scottish clan. He decided he would not only donate funds, but form an elite private army to fight on the Greek side, which he would command. He parted with Teresa Guiccioli at Genoa and sailed for Cephalonia. By the time he landed at Missolonghi on 5 January 1824 he was in charge of up to a thousand Suliote warriors. But he would never reach the battlefield. He contracted a fever in early April and, weakened by repeated bleeding (the usual treatment for fever was to apply leeches to the forehead and arms), died on 19 April. He was in his thirty-seventh year.

He was already one of the most mythologized writers who had ever lived, thanks to his own poetry, and an early death consolidated his popularity. When his body was shipped back to England, it lay in state for two days at 20 Great George Street in London. So grief-stricken were those who came to view it that barriers had to be erected to hold them back. When the body was taken on the long journey to Hucknall Torkard churchyard in Nottinghamshire, crowds lined the streets, weeping openly as it passed. Most were working people, who had not forgotten his defence of them in Parliament years before.

This was only the beginning. In no time at all Byron was a cult figure, a trend fuelled in part by publication of his conversations (always lively) by such associates as Leigh Hunt, Thomas Medwin and Lady Blessington. His correspondence and journals began to trickle into print in 1826, with the first attempt at a collected edition by Thomas Moore in 1830. It was an international bestseller, and the more recent edition (1973–93) by Leslie A. Marchand remains one of the great scholarly achievements (and one of the most entertaining) of our own time. For a while it was fashionable for artists to paint Byron during his final illness – The Death of Byron by Joseph-Denis von Odevaere and Lord Byron on his Deathbed by R. C. Moore are two of the most notable depictions. His poetry attracted some of the most skilled illustrators of the day, including Thomas Stothard, Richard Westall, J. M. W. Turner, and George and I. R. Cruikshank; Ford Madox Brown produced some remarkable full-scale paintings based on Manfred, Sardanapalus and The Prisoner of Chillon. He was more famous still on the Continent, where Delacroix depicted scenes from The Corsair, Lara, Mazeppa and The Prisoner of Chillon, while Berlioz composed music based on Manfred and Childe Harold Cantos III and IV. In Greece he remains a national hero, with streets and town squares named after him. He is the most popular personality of the Romantic period, exemplifying the myth of the poet who lived life to the full and died in his prime. (See Plate 14.)

I am grateful to Dr Peter Cochran for invaluable advice on editorial conundrums in Byron's texts.

c. January 1812)¹

From Childe Harold's Pilgrimage: A Romaunt (1812)²

I

Dear object of defeated care!
Though now of love and thee bereft,
To reconcile me with despair
Thine image and my tears are left.

'Tis said with sorrow time can cope, 5
But this I feel can ne'er be true;
For by the death-blow of my hope
My memory immortal grew.

Written Beneath a Picture

¹ This poem was probably written to John Edleston, the boy chorister to whom Byron was passionately attached while at Cambridge, 1805–7. Edleston died in May 1811; Byron heard about this in October, and immediately found relief for his feelings in a series of poems about ‘Thyrza’. By using a woman’s name he could write freely about the relationship.

² Childe Harold’s Pilgrimage (1812) contained a number of shorter poems besides the one that made his name (see headnote, p. 864).

*Heu quanto minus est cum reliquis versari quam tui meminisse!*¹

I

And thou art dead, as young and fair
 As aught of mortal birth;
And form so soft, and charms so rare,
 Too soon returned to earth!
Though earth received them in her bed, 5
And o’er the spot the crowd may tread
 In carelessness or mirth,
There is an eye which could not brook
A moment on that grave to look.

I will not ask where thou liest low, 10
Nor gaze upon the spot;
There flowers or weeds at will may grow,
So I behold them not;
It is enough for me to prove
That what I loved and long must love 15
Like common earth can rot –
To me there needs no stone to tell
'Tis nothing that I loved so well.

Yet did I love thee to the last
As fervently as thou, 20
Who didst not change through all the past,
And canst not alter now.
The love where death has set his seal
Nor age can chill, nor rival steal,
Nor falsehood disavow; 25
And, what were worse, thou canst not see
Or wrong, or change, or fault in me.

The better days of life were ours,
The worst can be but mine;
The sun that cheers, the storm that lours, 30
Shall never more be thine.
The silence of that dreamless sleep
I envy now too much to weep;
Nor need I to repine
That all those charms have passed away 35
I might have watched through long decay.

The flower in ripened bloom unmatched
Must fall the earliest prey,
Though by no hand untimely snatched,
The leaves must drop away; 40
And yet it were a greater grief
To watch it withering leaf by leaf
Than see it plucked today –
Since earthly eye but ill can bear
To trace the change to foul from fair. 45

I know not if I could have borne
To see thy beauties fade;
The night that followed such a morn
Had worn a deeper shade;
Thy day without a cloud hath passed, 50
And thou wert lovely to the last,
Extinguished, not decayed –
As stars that shoot along the sky
Shine brightest as they fall from high.

As once I wept, if I could weep, 55
My tears might well be shed,
To think I was not near to keep
One vigil o'er thy bed,
To gaze, how fondly, on thy face,
To fold thee in a faint embrace, 60
Uphold thy drooping head;
And show that love, however vain,
Nor thou nor I can feel again.

Yet how much less it were to gain
 (Though thou hast left me free) 65
The loveliest things that still remain,
 Than thus remember thee!
The all of thine that cannot die
Through dark and dread eternity
 Returns again to me, 70
And more thy buried love endears
Than aught, except its living years.

Stanzas

¹ Shenstone's epitaph to his cousin, Mary Dolman: 'Alas, how much less it is to move among those left behind than to remember thee.'

She Walks in Beauty (composed c.12 June 1814)¹

From Hebrew Melodies (1815)

I

She walks in beauty like the night
 Of cloudless climes and starry skies,
And all that's best of dark and bright
 Meet in her aspect and her eyes,
Thus mellowed to that tender light 5
 Which heaven to gaudy day denies.

II

One shade the more, one ray the less
 Had half-impaired the nameless grace

Which waves in every raven tress
Or softly lightens o'er her face – 10
Where thoughts serenely sweet express
How pure, how dear their dwelling place.

III

And on that cheek and o'er that brow,
So soft, so calm, yet eloquent,
The smiles that win, the tints that glow, 15
But tell of days in goodness spent,
A mind at peace with all below,
A heart whose love is innocent.

She Walks in Beauty

¹ A MS version of the poem is entitled, 'Lines written by Lord Byron after seeing Mrs Wilmot at Lansdowne House'.

Byron met Anne Wilmot (1784–1871) on 11 June 1814; she was the wife of his first cousin, Robert John Wilmot.

When we two parted (composed August or September 1815)¹

When we two parted
In silence and tears,
Half broken-hearted,
To sever for years,

Pale grew thy cheek and cold, 5
Colder thy kiss –
Truly that hour foretold
Sorrow to this.

The dew of the morning
Sunk chill on my brow – 10
It felt like the warning
Of what I feel now.
Thy vows are all broken,
And light is thy fame;
I hear thy name spoken, 15
And share in its shame.

They name thee before me –
A knell to mine ear;
A shudder comes o'er me –
Why wert thou so dear? 20
They know not I knew thee,
Who knew thee too well;
Long, long shall I rue thee,
Too deeply to tell.²

In secret we met, 25
In silence I grieve
That thy heart could forget,
Thy spirit deceive.
If I should meet thee
After long years, 30

How should I greet thee?
With silence and tears.

When we two parted

¹ The subject of the poem is Lady Frances Wedderburn Webster, with whom Byron had a brief, 'platonic' affair late in 1813; its immediate occasion was gossip about her affair with the Duke of Wellington in Paris in 1815.

² Byron's original draft contains an extra stanza at this point, which refers explicitly to Lady Frances:

Then fare thee well, Fanny,
Now doubly undone,
To prove false unto many
As faithless to one.
Thou art past all recalling
Even would I recall,
For the woman once falling
Forever must fall.

Fare Thee Well!* (composed 18 March 1816)¹

From Poems (1816)

*Alas! they had been friends in youth;
But whispering tongues can poison truth;
And constancy lives in realms above:
And life is thorny; and youth is vain:
And to be wroth with one we love,
Doth work like madness in the brain....
But never either found another*

*To free the hollow heart from paining –
They stood aloof, the scars remaining,
Like cliffs which had been rent asunder;
A dreary sea now flows between,
But neither heat, nor frost, nor thunder
Shall wholly do away, I ween,
The marks of that which once hath been.*²

Fare thee well! and if for ever –
Still for ever, fare thee well! –
Even though unforgiving, never
’Gainst thee shall my heart rebel.
Would that breast were bared before thee 5
Where thy head so oft hath lain,
While that placid sleep came o’er thee
Which thou ne’er canst know again;
Would that breast by thee glanced over,
Every inmost thought could show! 10
Then thou wouldst at last discover
’Twas not well to spurn it so.
Though the world for this commend thee
Though it smile upon the blow,
Even its praises must offend thee, 15
Founded on another’s woe;
Though my many faults defaced me,
Could no other arm be found
Than the one which once embraced me
To inflict a cureless wound? 20
Yet, oh yet, thyself deceive not:
Love may sink by slow decay;
But by sudden wrench, believe not,
Hearts can thus be torn away.
Still thine own its life retaineth – 25
Still must mine, though bleeding, beat,
And the undying thought which paineth
Is – that we no more may meet.

These are words of deeper sorrow
Than the wail above the dead; 30
Both shall live, but every morrow
Wake us from a widowed bed.
And when thou wouldst solace gather
When our child's³ first accents flow
Wilt thou teach her to say 'Father!' 35
Though his care she must forgo?
When her little hands shall press thee,
When her lip to thine is pressed,
Think of him whose prayer shall bless thee,
Think of him thy love had blessed. 40
Should her lineaments resemble
Those thou never more may'st see⁴
Then thy heart will softly tremble
With a pulse yet true to me.
All my faults (perchance thou knowest), 45
All my madness⁵ – none can know;
All my hopes, where'er thou goest,
Wither – yet with thee they go.
Every feeling hath been shaken,
Pride (which not a world could bow) 50
Bows to thee – by thee forsaken
Even my soul forsakes me now.
But 'tis done, all words are idle –
Words from me are vainer still;
But the thoughts we cannot bridle 55
Force their way without the will.
Fare thee well! – thus disunited,
Torn from every nearer tie,
Seared in my heart – and lone – and blighted –
More than this, I scarce can die. 60

Fare Thee Well!

² The epigraph is from Coleridge's Christabel 396–414. Byron was responsible for the first publication of Christabel in 1816.

³ Ada Augusta Byron, born 10 December 1815. After his departure from England in 1816, Byron never saw her again. Knowledge of her father was kept from her as she grew up, but her husband, Lord King, eventually weaned her from her mother's influence, and she came to revere her father's poetry and his memory. She died at the age of 35.

⁴ Those thou...see i.e. Byron's.

⁵ madness Annabella accused Byron of madness prior to their separation.

Childe Harold's Pilgrimage

Canto the Third (composed 25 April–4 July 1816; published 18 November 1816)¹

Afin que cette application vous forçât à penser à autre chose. Il n'y a en vérité de remède que celui-là et le temps.

*Lettre du Roi de Prusse à D'Alembert, Sept. 7, 1776*²

I

Is thy face like thy mother's, my fair child,³
Ada, sole daughter of my house and heart?

When last I saw thy young blue eyes, they smiled;
And then we parted – not as now we part,
But with a hope.

Awaking with a start, 5

The waters heave around me, and on high
The winds lift up their voices. I depart
Whither I know not, but the hour's gone by

When Albion's lessening shores could grieve or glad mine eye.⁴

Once more upon the waters, yet once more!⁵ 10

And the waves bound beneath me as a steed
That knows his rider – welcome to their roar!
Swift be their guidance, wheresoe'er it lead!
Though the strained mast should quiver as a reed
And the rent canvas fluttering strew the gale, 15
Still must I on – for I am as a weed
Flung from the rock on ocean's foam, to sail
Where'er the surge may sweep, the tempest's breath prevail.

In my youth's summer I did sing of one,⁶
The wandering outlaw of his own dark mind; 20

Again I seize the theme then but begun,
And bear it with me as the rushing wind
Bears the cloud onwards. In that tale I find
The furrows of long thought, and dried-up tears
Which, ebbing, leave a sterile track behind, 25
O'er which all heavily the journeying years
Plod the last sands of life, where not a flower appears.

Since my young days of passion⁷ (joy or pain),
Perchance my heart and harp have lost a string
And both may jar; it may be that in vain 30

I would essay,⁸ as I have sung, to sing.

Yet, though a dreary⁹ strain, to this I cling,
So that it wean me from the weary dream

Of selfish grief or gladness; so it fling
Forgetfulness around me. It shall seem 35

To me (though to none else) a not ungrateful theme.

He, who grown aged in this world of woe
(In deeds not years), piercing the depths of life
So that no wonder waits him; nor below
Can love or sorrow, fame, ambition, strife, 40

Cut to his heart again with the keen knife
Of silent sharp endurance – he can tell

Why thought seeks refuge in lone caves yet¹⁰ rife

With airy images,¹¹ and shapes which dwell
Still unimpaired, though old, in the soul's haunted cell. 45

'Tis to create, and in creating live
A being more intense, that we endow
With form our fancy, gaining as we give
The life we image – even as I do now.
What am I? Nothing. But not so art thou, 50

Soul of my thought,¹² with whom I traverse earth,
Invisible but gazing, as I glow

Mixed with thy spirit, blended with thy birth,
And feeling still with thee in my crushed feelings' dearth.

Yet must I think less wildly. I have thought 55
Too long and darkly till my brain became,
In its own eddy, boiling and o'erwrought,
A whirling gulf of fantasy and flame;
And thus, untaught in youth my heart to tame,
My springs of life were poisoned. 'Tis too late! 60
Yet am I changed, though still enough the same
In strength to bear what time cannot abate,
And feed on bitter fruits without accusing fate.

Something too much of this: 13 but now 'tis past,
And the spell closes with its silent seal. 65
Long absent Harold 14 reappears at last;
He of the breast which fain no more would feel,
Wrung with the wounds which kill not, but ne'er heal;
Yet Time, who changes all, had altered him
In soul and aspect as in age: years steal 70
Fire from the mind as vigour from the limb;
And Life's enchanted cup but sparkles near the brim.

His had been quaffed too quickly, and he found
The dregs were wormwood; 15 but he filled again,
And from a purer fount, 16 on holier ground, 75
And deemed its spring perpetual – but in vain!
Still round him clung invisibly a chain
Which galled for ever, fettering though unseen,
And heavy though it clanked not; worn with pain,
Which pined although it spoke not, and grew keen, 80
Entering with every step he took, through many a scene.

I0

Secure in guarded coldness, he had mixed
Again in fancied safety with his kind,
And deemed his spirit now so firmly fixed
And sheathed with an invulnerable mind, 85
That, if no joy, no sorrow lurked behind;
And he, as one, might midst the many stand
Unheeded, searching through the crowd to find
Fit speculation – such as in strange land
He found in wonder-works of God and Nature's hand. 90

II

But who can view the ripened rose, nor seek
To wear it? Who can curiously behold
The smoothness and the sheen of Beauty's cheek,
Nor feel the heart can never all grow old?
Who can contemplate fame through clouds unfold 95
The star which rises o'er her steep, nor climb?
Harold, once more within the vortex, rolled
On with the giddy circle, chasing Time,
Yet with a nobler aim than in his Youth's fond prime.

I2

But soon he knew himself the most unfit 100
Of men to herd with man,¹⁷ with whom he held
Little in common; untaught to submit
His thoughts to others, though his soul was quelled
In youth by his own thoughts; still uncompelled,
He would not yield dominion of his mind 105
To spirits against whom his own rebelled,
Proud though in desolation – which could find
A life within itself, to breathe without mankind.

I3

Where rose the mountains, there to him were friends;
Where rolled the ocean, thereon was his home; 110
Where a blue sky, and glowing clime, extends,
He had the passion and the power to roam;
The desert, forest, cavern, breaker's foam,
Were unto him companionship; they spake
A mutual language, clearer than the tome 115
Of his land's tongue, which he would oft forsake
For nature's pages glassed by sunbeams on the lake.

I4

Like the Chaldean,¹⁸ he could watch the stars
Till he had peopled them with beings bright
As their own beams; and earth, and earth-born jars,¹⁹ 120
And human frailties, were forgotten quite:
Could he have kept his spirit to that flight
He had been happy; but this clay will sink
Its spark immortal, envying it the light
To which it mounts, as if to break the link 125
That keeps us from yon heaven which woos us to its brink.

I5

But in Man's dwellings he became a thing
Restless and worn, and stern and wearisome,
Drooped as a wild-born falcon with clipped wing,
To whom the boundless air alone were home: 130
Then came his fit again, which to o'ercome,
As eagerly the barred-up bird will beat
His breast and beak against his wiry dome
Till the blood tinge his plumage – so the heat
Of his impeded soul would through his bosom eat. 135

I6

Self-exiled Harold wanders forth again,
With nought of hope left, but with less of gloom;
The very knowledge that he lived in vain,
That all was over on this side the tomb,²⁰
Had made Despair a smilingness²¹ assume, 140
Which, though 'twere wild (as on the plundered wreck
When mariners would madly meet their doom
With draughts intemperate on the sinking deck),
Did yet inspire a cheer, which he forbore to check.

I7

Stop! For thy tread is on an Empire's dust! 145
An earthquake's spoil is sepulchred below!²²
Is the spot marked with no colossal bust?
Nor column trophied for triumphal show?
None; but the moral's truth tells simpler so.
As the ground was before, thus let it be; 150
How that red rain²³ hath made the harvest grow!
And is this all the world has gained by thee,
Thou first and last of fields, king-making Victory?²⁴

I8

And Harold stands upon this place of skulls,
The grave of France, the deadly Waterloo! 155
How in an hour the Power which gave²⁵ annuls
Its gifts, transferring fame as fleeting too!
In 'pride of place'²⁶ here last the eagle flew,
Then tore with bloody talon the rent plain,
Pierced by the shaft²⁷ of banded nations through; 160

Ambition's life and labours all were vain;
He wears the shattered links of the world's broken chain.

I9

Fit retribution! Gaul²⁸ may champ the bit
And foam in fetters – but is earth more free?
Did nations combat to make *one*²⁹ submit? 165
Or league³⁰ to teach all kings true sovereignty?
What? Shall reviving thraldom³¹ again be
The patched-up idol of enlightened days?
Shall we, who struck the lion down, shall we Pay the wolf homage? Proffering lowly gaze 170
And servile knees to thrones? No! Prove³² before ye praise!

20

If not, o'er one fallen despot boast no more!
In vain fair cheeks were furrowed with hot tears
For Europe's flowers long rooted up before
The trampler of her vineyards; in vain, years 175
Of death, depopulation, bondage, fears,
Have all been borne, and broken by the accord
Of roused-up millions: all that most endears
Glory, is when the myrtle wreathes a sword,
Such as Harmodius drew on Athens' tyrant lord.³³ 180

2I

There was a sound of revelry by night,³⁴
And Belgium's capital had gathered then
Her beauty and her chivalry – and bright
The lamps shone o'er fair women and brave men;
A thousand hearts beat happily; and when 185

Music arose with its voluptuous swell,
Soft eyes looked love to eyes which spake again,
And all went merry as a marriage bell;
But hush! hark! a deep sound strikes like a rising knell!

Did ye not hear it? No, 'twas but the wind, 190
Or the car rattling o'er the stony street;
On with the dance! Let joy be unconfined;
No sleep till morn, when Youth and Pleasure meet
To chase the glowing Hours with flying feet –
But hark! that heavy sound breaks in once more, 195
As if the clouds its echo would repeat;
And nearer – clearer – deadlier than before!
Arm! Arm! It is – it is – the cannon's opening roar!³⁵

23

Within a windowed niche of that high hall
Sate Brunswick's fated chieftain;³⁶ he did hear 200
That sound the first amidst the festival,
And caught its tone with Death's prophetic ear;
And when they smiled because he deemed it near,
His heart more truly knew that peal too well
Which stretched his father on a bloody bier, 205
And roused the vengeance blood alone could quell;
He rushed into the field, and, foremost fighting, fell.

24

Ah! then and there was hurrying to and fro,
And gathering tears, and tremblings of distress,
And cheeks all pale, which but an hour ago 210
Blushed at the praise of their own loveliness –

And there were sudden partings, such as press
The life from out young hearts, and choking sighs
Which ne'er might be repeated; who could guess
If ever more should meet those mutual eyes, 215
Since upon nights so sweet such awful morn could rise?

25

And there was mounting in hot haste: the steed,
The mustering squadron, and the clattering car,
Went pouring forward with impetuous speed,
And swiftly forming in the ranks of war; 220
And the deep thunder peal on peal afar;
And near, the beat of the alarming drum³⁷
Roused up the soldier ere the morning star;
While thronged the citizens with terror dumb,
Or whispering, with white lips, 'The foe! They come! They come!' 225

26

And wild and high the 'Cameron's gathering'³⁸ rose!
The war-note of Lochiel,³⁹ which Albyn's⁴⁰ hills
Have heard, and, heard, too, have her Saxon foes:
How in the noon of night that pibroch⁴¹ thrills,
Savage and shrill! But with the breath which fills 230
Their mountain-pipe, so fill the mountaineers
With the fierce native daring which instils
The stirring memory of a thousand years,
And Evan's, Donald's fame rings in each clansman's ears!⁴²

27

And Ardennes⁴³ waves above them her green leaves, 235
Dewy with nature's tear-drops, as they pass,
Grieving, if aught inanimate e'er grieves,
Over the unreturning brave – alas!
Ere evening to be trodden like the grass
Which now beneath them, but above shall grow 240
In its next verdure, when this fiery mass
Of living valour, rolling on the foe
And burning with high hope, shall moulder cold and low.

28

Last noon beheld them full of lusty life,
Last eve in Beauty's circle proudly gay, 245
The midnight brought the signal-sound of strife,
The morn the marshalling in arms, the day
Battle's magnificently-stern array!
The thunder-clouds close o'er it, which when rent
The earth is covered thick with other clay,⁴⁴ 250
Which her own clay shall cover, heaped and pent,
Rider and horse, friend, foe, in one red burial blent!⁴⁵

29

Their praise is hymned by loftier harps than mine;⁴⁶
Yet one I would select from that proud throng,
Partly because they blend me with his line,⁴⁷ 255
And partly that I did his sire some wrong,
And partly that bright names will hallow song;
And his was of the bravest, and when showered
The death-bolts deadliest the thinned files along,
Even where the thickest of war's tempest loured, 260
They reached no nobler breast than thine – young, gallant Howard!⁴⁸

30

There have been tears and breaking hearts for thee,
And mine were nothing, had I such to give;
But when I stood beneath the fresh green tree,
Which living waves where thou didst cease to live,⁴⁹ 265
And saw around me the wide field revive
With fruits and fertile promise, and the spring
Come forth her work of gladness to contrive,
With all her reckless⁵⁰ birds upon the wing,
I turned from all she brought to those she could not bring.⁵¹ 270

31

I turned to thee, to thousands, of whom each
And one as all a ghastly gap did make
In his own kind and kindred, whom to teach
Forgetfulness were mercy for their sake;
The Archangel's trump, not Glory's, must awake 275
Those whom they thirst for; though the sound of Fame
May for a moment soothe, it cannot slake
The fever of vain longing, and the name
So honoured but assumes a stronger, bitterer claim.

32

They mourn, but smile at length – and, smiling, mourn: 280
The tree will wither long before it fall;
The hull drives on, though mast and sail be torn;
The roof-tree sinks, but moulders on the hall
In massy hoariness; the ruined wall
Stands when its wind-worn battlements are gone; 285
The bars survive the captive they enthrall;⁵²
The day drags through though storms keep out the sun;
And thus the heart will break, yet brokenly live on:

33

Even as a broken mirror, which the glass
In every fragment multiplies; and makes 290
A thousand images of one that was,
The same, and still the more, the more it breaks;
And thus the heart will do which not forsakes,
Living in shattered guise; and still, and cold,
And bloodless, with its sleepless sorrow aches, 295
Yet withers on till all without is old,
Showing no visible sign, for such things are untold.

34

There is a very life in our despair,
Vitality of poison – a quick⁵³ root
Which feeds these deadly branches; for it were 300
As nothing did we die; but Life will suit
Itself to Sorrow's most detested fruit,
Like to the apples on the Dead Sea's shore,
All ashes to the taste.⁵⁴ Did man compute
Existence by enjoyment, and count o'er 305
Such hours 'gainst years of life, say, would he name threescore?

35

The Psalmist numbered out the years of man:⁵⁵
They are enough; and if thy tale⁵⁰ be true,
Thou, who didst grudge him even that fleeting span,
More than enough, thou fatal Waterloo! 310
Millions of tongues record thee, and anew
Their children's lips shall echo them, and say,
'Here, where the sword united nations drew,
Our countrymen were warring on that day!'
And this is much, and all which will not pass away. 315

36

There sunk the greatest, nor the worst of men,⁵⁷
Whose spirit antithetically mixed
One moment of the mightiest, and again
On little objects with like firmness fixed,
Extreme in all things! Hadst thou been betwixt,⁵⁸ 320
Thy throne⁵⁹ had still been thine, or never been;
For daring made thy rise as fall: thou seek'st
Even now to reassume the imperial mien,⁶⁰
And shake again the world, the Thunderer of the scene!

37

Conqueror and captive of the earth art thou! 325
She trembles at thee still, and thy wild name
Was ne'er more bruited⁶¹ in men's minds than now
That thou art nothing, save the jest of Fame,
Who wooed thee once, thy vassal, and became
The flatterer of thy fierceness – till thou wert 330
A god unto thyself; nor less the same
To the astounded kingdoms all inert,
Who deemed thee for a time whate'er thou didst assert.

38

Oh, more or less than man – in high or low,
Battling with nations, flying from the field; 335
Now making monarchs' necks thy footstool, now
More than thy meanest soldier taught to yield;⁶²
An empire thou couldst crush, command, rebuild,
But govern not thy pettiest passion, nor,
However deeply in men's spirits skilled, 340

Look through thine own,⁶³ nor curb the lust of war,
Nor learn that tempted Fate will leave the loftiest star.

Yet well thy soul hath brooked⁶⁴ the turning tide
With that untaught innate philosophy,
Which, be it wisdom, coldness, or deep pride, 345
Is gall and wormwood⁶⁵ to an enemy.
When the whole host of hatred stood hard by
To watch and mock thee shrinking, thou hast smiled
With a sedate and all-enduring eye;
When Fortune fled her spoiled and favourite child, 350
He stood unbowed beneath the ills upon him piled.

40

Sager than in thy fortunes; for in them
Ambition steeled thee on too far to show
That just habitual scorn, which could contemn
Men and their thoughts; 'twas wise to feel, not so 355
To wear it ever on thy lip and brow,
And spurn the instruments⁶⁶ thou wert to use
Till they were turned unto thine overthrow:
'Tis but a worthless world to win or lose;
So hath it proved to thee, and all such lot who choose. 360

41

If, like a tower upon a headlong rock,
Thou⁶⁷ hadst been made to stand or fall alone,
Such scorn of man had helped to brave the shock;
But men's thoughts were the steps which paved thy throne,
Their admiration thy best weapon shone; 365

The part of Philip's son⁶⁸ was thine, not then (Unless aside thy purple⁶⁹ had been thrown)
Like stern Diogenes⁷⁰ to mock at men:
For sceptred cynics earth were far too wide a den.⁷¹

42

But quiet to quick⁷² bosoms is a hell, 370
And there hath been thy bane: there is a fire
And motion of the soul which will not dwell
In its own narrow being, but aspire
Beyond the fitting medium of desire,
And, but once kindled, quenchless evermore, 375
Preys upon high adventure, nor can tire
Of aught but rest – a fever at the core,
Fatal to him who bears, to all who ever bore.⁷³

43

This makes the madmen who have made men mad
By their contagion: conquerors and kings, 380
Founders of sects and systems, to whom add
Sophists, bards, statesmen, all unquiet things
Which stir too strongly the soul's secret springs,
And are themselves the fools to those they fool –
Envied, yet how unenviable! What stings 385
Are theirs! One breast laid open were a school
Which would unteach mankind the lust to shine or rule:

44

Their breath is agitation, and their life
A storm whereon they ride, to sink at last;
And yet so nursed and bigoted to strife, 390

That, should their days (surviving perils passed)
Melt to calm twilight, they feel overcast
With sorrow and supineness, and so die;
Even as a flame unfed, which runs to waste
With its own flickering, or a sword laid by 395
Which eats into itself, and rusts ingloriously.

45

He who ascends to mountain-tops shall find
The loftiest peaks most wrapped in clouds and snow;
He who surpasses or subdues mankind
Must look down on the hate of those below. 400
Though high above the sun of glory glow
And far beneath the earth and ocean spread,
Round him are icy rocks, and loudly blow
Contending tempests on his naked head,
And thus reward the toils which to those summits led. 405

46

Away with these! True wisdom's world will be
Within its own creation, or in thine,
Maternal Nature!⁷⁴ For who teems like thee,
Thus on the banks of thy majestic Rhine?⁷⁵
There Harold gazes on a work divine, 410
A blending of all beauties; streams and dells,
Fruit, foliage, crag, wood, cornfield, mountain, vine,
And chiefless castles breathing stern farewells
From gray but leafy walls, where Ruin greenly dwells.

And there they⁷⁶ stand, as stands a lofty mind, 415
Worn, but unstooping to the baser crowd,

All tenantless, save to the crannying⁷⁷ wind,
Or holding dark communion with the cloud.
There was a day when they were young and proud;
Banners on high, and battles⁷⁸ passed below; 420
But they who fought are in a bloody shroud,
And those which waved⁷⁹ are shredless dust ere now,
And the bleak battlements shall bear no future blow.

48

Beneath these battlements, within those walls,
Power dwelt amidst her passions; in proud state 425
Each robber-chief upheld his armed halls,
Doing his evil will, nor less elate⁸⁰
Than mightier heroes of a longer date.
What want these outlaws conquerors should have⁸¹
But history's purchased page to call them great?⁸² 430
A wider space? An ornamented grave?
Their hopes were not less warm, their souls were full as brave.

49

In their baronial feuds and single fields,
What deeds of prowess unrecorded died!
And Love, which lent a blazon⁸³ to their shields, 435
With emblems well devised by amorous pride,
Through all the mail of iron hearts would glide;
But still their flame was fierceness, and drew on
Keen contest and destruction near allied,
And many a tower for some fair mischief won, 440
Saw the discoloured⁸⁴ Rhine beneath its ruin run.

50

But thou, exulting and abounding river!
Making thy waves a blessing as they flow
Through banks whose beauty would endure for ever
Could man but leave thy bright creation so, 445
Nor its fair promise from the surface mow
With the sharp scythe of conflict – then to see
Thy valley of sweet waters, were to know
Earth paved like heaven, and to seem such to me,
Even now what wants thy stream? – that it should Lethe⁸⁵ be. 450

51

A thousand battles have assailed thy banks,
But these and half their fame have passed away,
And Slaughter heaped on high his weltering ranks:
Their very graves are gone, and what are they?
Thy tide washed down the blood of yesterday, 455
And all was stainless, and on thy clear stream
Glassed, with its dancing light, the sunny ray;
But o'er the blackened memory's blighting dream
Thy waves would vainly roll, all sweeping as they seem.

Thus Harold inly said,⁸⁶ and passed along, 460
Yet not insensible⁸⁷ to all which here
Awoke the jocund birds to early song
In glens which might have made even exile⁸⁸ dear:
Though on his brow were graven lines austere,
And tranquil sternness, which had ta'en the place 465
Of feelings fierier far but less severe,
Joy was not always absent from his face,
But o'er it in such scenes would steal with transient trace.

53

Nor was all love shut from him, though his days
Of passion had consumed themselves to dust. 470
It is in vain that we would coldly gaze
On such as smile upon us; the heart must
Leap kindly back to kindness, though disgust
Hath weaned it from all worldlings: thus he felt,
For there was soft remembrance, and sweet trust 475
In one fond breast,⁸⁹ to which his own would melt,
And in its tenderer hour on that his bosom dwelt.

54

And he had learned to love – I know not why,
For this in such as him seems strange of mood,
The helpless looks of blooming infancy, 480
Even in its earliest nurture; what subdued,
To change like this, a mind so far imbued
With scorn of man, it little boots to know –
But thus it was; and though in solitude
Small power the nipped affections have to grow, 485
In him this glowed when all beside had ceased to glow.

55

And there was one soft breast, as hath been said,
Which unto his was bound by stronger ties
Than the church links withal; and, though unwed,
That love was pure, and, far above disguise, 490
Had stood the test of mortal enmities
Still undivided, and cemented more
By peril, dreaded most in female eyes;
But this was firm, and from a foreign shore
Well to that heart might his these absent greetings pour! 495

I

The castled crag of Drachenfels⁹⁰
Frowns o'er the wide and winding Rhine,
Whose breast of waters broadly swells
Between the banks which bear the vine,
And hills all rich with blossomed trees, 500
And fields which promise corn and wine,
And scattered cities crowning these,
Whose far white walls along them shine,
Have strewed a scene, which I should see
With double joy wert thou with me. 505

And peasant girls, with deep blue eyes,
And hands which offer early flowers,
Walk smiling o'er this Paradise;
Above, the frequent feudal towers
Through green leaves lift their walls of gray; 510
And many a rock which steeply lours,
And noble arch in proud decay,
Look o'er this vale of vintage-bowers;
But one thing want these banks of Rhine –
Thy gentle hand to clasp in mine! 515

I send the lilies given to me;
Though long before thy hand they touch,
I know that they must withered be,
But yet reject them not as such;
For I have cherished them as dear, 520
Because they yet may meet thine eye,
And guide thy soul to mine even here,
When thou behold'st them drooping nigh,

And know'st them gathered by the Rhine,
And offered from my heart to thine! 525

The river nobly foams and flows,
The charm of this enchanted ground,
And all its thousand turns disclose
Some fresher beauty varying round;
The haughtiest breast its wish might bound 530
Through life to dwell delighted here;
Nor could on earth a spot be found
To nature and to me so dear,
Could thy dear eyes in following mine
Still sweeten more these banks of Rhine! 535

56

By Coblenz, on a rise of gentle ground,
There is a small and simple pyramid,⁹¹
Crowning the summit of the verdant mound;
Beneath its base are heroes' ashes hid –
Our enemy's⁹² – but let not that forbid 540
Honour to Marceau!⁹³ o'er whose early tomb
Tears, big tears, gushed from the rough soldier's lid,⁹⁴
Lamenting and yet envying such a doom,⁹⁵
Falling for France, whose rights he battled to resume.⁹⁶

57

Brief, brave, and glorious was his young career, 545
His mourners were two hosts,⁹⁷ his friends and foes;
And fitly may the stranger lingering here
Pray for his gallant spirit's bright repose;

For he was Freedom's champion, one of those,
The few in number, who had not o'erstepped 550
The charter to chastise⁹⁸ which she bestows
On such as wield her weapons; he had kept
The whiteness of his soul – and thus men o'er him wept.⁹⁹

58

Here Ehrenbreitstein,¹⁰⁰ with her shattered wall
Black with the miner's blast,¹⁰¹ upon her height 555
Yet shows of what she was, when shell and ball
Rebounding idly on her strength did light;
A tower of victory! from whence the flight
Of baffled foes was watched along the plain:
But peace destroyed what war could never blight, 560
And laid those proud roofs bare to Summer's rain –
On which the iron shower¹⁰² for years had poured in vain.

59

Adieu to thee, fair Rhine! How long delighted
The stranger fain would linger on his way!
Thine is a scene alike where souls united 565
Or lonely Contemplation thus might stray;
And could the ceaseless vultures cease to prey
On self-condemning bosoms,¹⁰³ it were here,
Where nature, nor too sombre nor too gay,
Wild but not rude, awful yet not austere, 570
Is to the mellow earth as autumn to the year.

60

Adieu to thee again! A vain adieu!
There can be no farewell to scene like thine;

The mind is coloured by thy every hue;
And if reluctantly the eyes resign 575
Their cherished gaze upon thee, lovely Rhine,
'Tis with the thankful glance of parting praise;
More mighty spots may rise – more glaring shine,
But none unite in one attaching maze
The brilliant, fair, and soft – the glories of old days, 580

61

The negligently grand, the fruitful bloom
Of coming ripeness, the white city's sheen,
The rolling stream, the precipice's gloom,
The forest's growth, and gothic walls between,
The wild rocks shaped, as they had turrets been 104 585
In mockery of man's art; and these withal
A race of faces happy as the scene,
Whose fertile bounties here extend to all,
Still springing o'er thy banks, though empires near them fall.

But these recede. Above me are the Alps, 590
The palaces of nature, whose vast walls
Have pinnacled in clouds their snowy scalps,
And throned Eternity in icy halls
Of cold sublimity, where forms and falls
The avalanche – the thunderbolt of snow! 595
All that expands the spirit, yet appals,
Gather around these summits, as to show
How earth may pierce to heaven, yet leave vain man below.

63

But ere these matchless heights I dare to scan,
There is a spot should not be passed in vain – 600

Morat,105 the proud, the patriot field! where man
May gaze on ghastly trophies of the slain,
Nor blush for those who conquered on that plain;
Here Burgundy bequeathed his tombless host,
A bony heap, through ages to remain, 605
Themselves their monument; the Stygian coast
Unsepulchred they roamed, and shrieked each wandering ghost.106

64

While Waterloo with Cannae's carnage vies,
Morat and Marathon twin names shall stand;107
They were true Glory's stainless victories 610
Won by the unambitious heart and hand
Of a proud, brotherly, and civic band,
All unbought champions in no princely cause
Of vice-entailed Corruption;108 they no land
Doomed to bewail the blasphemy of laws 615
Making kings' rights divine, by some Draconic109 clause.110

65

By a lone wall a lonelier column rears
A gray and grief-worn aspect of old days;
'Tis the last remnant of the wreck of years,
And looks as with the wild-bewildered gaze 620
Of one to stone converted by amaze,
Yet still with consciousness; and there it stands
Making a marvel that it not decays,
When the coeval pride of human hands,
Levelled Aventicum,111 hath strewed her subject lands. 625

66

And there – oh, sweet and sacred be the name! –
Julia – the daughter, the devoted – gave
Her youth to heaven; her heart, beneath a claim
Nearest to heaven's, broke o'er a father's grave.
Justice is sworn 'gainst tears, and hers would crave 630
The life she lived in; but the judge was just,
And then she died on him she could not save.
Their tomb was simple, and without a bust,
And held within their urn one mind, one heart, one dust. 112

67

But these are deeds which should not pass away, 635
And names that must not wither, though the earth
Forgets her empires with a just decay,
The enslavers and the enslaved, their death and birth;
The high, the mountain-majesty of worth
Should be, and shall, survivor of its woe, 640
And from its immortality look forth
In the sun's face, like yonder Alpine snow,
Imperishably pure beyond all things below.

68

Lake Lemman 113 woos me with its crystal face,
The mirror where the stars and mountains view 645
The stillness of their aspect in each trace
Its clear depth yields of their far height and hue:
There is too much of man here to look through,
With a fit mind, the might which I behold;
But soon in me shall loneliness renew 650
Thoughts hid, but not less cherished than of old,
Ere mingling with the herd had penned me in their fold.

69

To fly from, need not be to hate, mankind;
All are not fit with them to stir and toil,
Nor is it discontent to keep the mind 655
Deep in its fountain, lest it overboil
In the hot throng, where we become the spoil¹¹⁴
Of our infection, till too late and long
We may deplore and struggle with the coil¹¹⁵
In wretched interchange of wrong for wrong 660
Midst a contentious world, striving where none are strong.

70

There in a moment we may plunge our years
In fatal penitence, and in the blight
Of our own soul turn all our blood to tears,
And colour things to come with hues of night; 665
The race of life becomes a hopeless flight
To those that walk in darkness: on the sea
The boldest steer but where their ports invite,
But there are wanderers o'er eternity
Whose bark drives on and on, and anchored ne'er shall be. 670

71

Is it not better, then, to be alone,
And love earth only for its earthly sake?
By the blue rushing of the arrowy Rhone¹¹⁶
Or the pure bosom of its nursing lake,
Which feeds it as a mother who doth make 675
A fair but froward¹¹⁷ infant her own care,
Kissing its cries away as these awake?
Is it not better thus our lives to wear
Than join the crushing crowd, doomed to inflict or bear?

72

I live not in myself, but I become 680
Portion of that around me; and to me
High mountains are a feeling, but the hum
Of human cities torture. 118 I can see
Nothing to loathe in nature, save to be
A link reluctant in a fleshly chain, 685
Classed among creatures, when the soul can flee,
And with the sky, the peak, the heaving plain
Of ocean, or the stars, mingle, and not in vain.

73

And thus I am absorbed, and this is life.
I look upon the peopled desert past 690
As on a place of agony and strife
Where for some sin to sorrow I was cast
To act and suffer, but remount at last
With a fresh pinion, which I feel to spring
(Though young, yet waxing vigorous as the blast 695
Which it would cope with) on delighted wing,
Spurning the clay-cold bonds which round our being cling. 119

74

And when at length the mind shall be all free
From what it hates in this degraded form, 120
Reft of its carnal life, save what shall be 700
Existent happier in the fly and worm;
When elements to elements conform
And dust is as it should be, shall I not
Feel all I see – less dazzling, but more warm?
The bodiless thought? The spirit of each spot – 705
Of which, even now, I share at times the immortal lot?

75

Are not the mountains, waves and skies a part
Of me and of my soul, as I of them?
Is not the love of these deep in my heart
With a pure passion? Should I not condemn 710
All objects if compared with these, and stem
A tide of suffering, rather than forego
Such feelings for the hard and worldly phlegm¹²¹
Of those whose eyes are only turned below,
Gazing upon the ground, with thoughts which dare not glow? 715

76

But this is not my theme, and I return
To that which is immediate – and require
Those who find contemplation in the urn
To look on one¹²² whose dust was once all fire,
A native of the land where I respire¹²⁰ 720
The clear air for a while, a passing guest
Where he became a being whose desire
Was to be glorious ('twas a foolish quest,
The which to gain and keep, he sacrificed all rest).

77

Here the self-torturing sophist,¹²⁴ wild Rousseau, 725
The apostle of affliction, he who threw
Enchantment over passion, and from woe
Wrung overwhelming eloquence – first drew
The breath which made him wretched; yet he knew
How to make madness beautiful, and cast 730
O'er erring deeds and thoughts a heavenly hue
Of words like sunbeams, dazzling as they passed
The eyes, which o'er them shed tears feelingly and fast.

78

His love was passion's essence, as a tree
On fire by lightning; 125 with ethereal flame 126 735
Kindled he was, and blasted – for to be
Thus, and enamoured, were in him the same.

But his was not the love of living dame,
Nor of the dead who rise upon our dreams, 127
But of ideal beauty, 128 which became 740
In him existence, and o'erflowing teems
Along his burning page, distempered though it seems.

79

This breathed itself to life in Julie, 129 this Invested her with all that's wild and sweet;
This hallowed, too, the memorable kiss 745
Which every morn his fevered lip would greet
From hers 130 who, but with friendship, his would meet:
But to that gentle touch, through brain and breast
Flashed the thrilled spirit's love-devouring heat –
In that absorbing sigh, perchance more blessed 750
Than vulgar minds may be with all they seek possessed. 131

80

His life was one long war with self-sought foes
Or friends by him self-banished, 132 for his mind
Had grown suspicion's sanctuary, and chose,
For its own cruel sacrifice, the kind, 755
'Gainst whom he raged with fury strange and blind.
But he was frenzied – wherefore, who may know,
Since cause might be which skill could never find?

But he was frenzied by disease or woe
To that worst pitch of all, which wears a reasoning show. 760

81

For then he was inspired, and from him came,
As from the Pythian's mystic cave of yore,133
Those oracles134 which set the world in flame,
Nor ceased to burn till kingdoms were no more.
Did he not this for France, which lay before 765
Bowed to the inborn tyranny of years?
Broken and trembling to the yoke she bore,
Till by the voice of him and his compeers
Roused up to too much wrath, which follows o'ergrown fears?

82

They made themselves a fearful monument! 770
The wreck of old opinions, things which grew
Breathed from the birth of time: the veil they rent,135
And what behind it lay, all earth shall view.
But good with ill they also overthrew,
Leaving but ruins, wherewith to rebuild 775
Upon the same foundation, and renew
Dungeons136 and thrones,137 which the same hour refilled
As heretofore, because ambition was self-willed.

83

But this will not endure, nor be endured!
Mankind have felt their strength and made it felt.138 780
They might have used it better, but, allured
By their new vigour, sternly have they dealt
On one another; pity ceased to melt

With her once-natural charities. But they
Who in oppression's darkness caved had dwelt, 785
They were not eagles, nourished with the day;
What marvel then, at times, if they mistook their prey?

84

What deep wounds ever closed without a scar?
The heart's 139 bleed longest, and but heal to wear
That which disfigures it; and they who war 790
With their own hopes, and have been vanquished, bear
Silence but not submission. In his lair
Fixed Passion holds his breath until the hour
Which shall atone for years – none need despair:
It came, it cometh, and will come, the power 795
To punish or forgive; in one we shall be slower.

85

Clear placid Leman! thy contrasted lake,
With the wild world I dwelt in, is a thing
Which warns me, with its stillness, to forsake
Earth's troubled waters for a purer spring. 800
This quiet sail is as a noiseless wing
To waft me from distraction; once I loved
Torn ocean's roar, but thy soft murmuring
Sounds sweet as if a sister's voice reproved
That I with stern 140 delights should e'er have been so moved. 805

86

It is the hush of night, and all between
Thy margin and the mountains, dusk – yet clear,
Mellowed and mingling, yet distinctly seen
(Save darkened Jura, whose capped heights appear

Precipitously steep); and, drawing near, 810
There breathes a living fragrance from the shore
Of flowers yet fresh with childhood; on the ear
Drops the light drip of the suspended oar, 141
Or chirps the grasshopper one goodnight carol more

87

(He is an evening reveller who makes 815
His life an infancy, and sings his fill);
At intervals, some bird from out the brakes 142
Starts into voice a moment, then is still.
There seems a floating whisper on the hill,
But that is fancy, for the starlight dews 820
All silently their tears of love instil,
Weeping themselves away, till they infuse
Deep into nature's breast the spirit of her hues.

88

Ye stars which are the poetry of heaven!
If in your bright leaves we would read the fate 825
Of men and empires, 'tis to be forgiven
That in our aspirations to be great,
Our destinies o'erleap their mortal state,
And claim a kindred with you – for ye are
A beauty and a mystery, and create 830
In us such love and reverence from afar
That fortune, fame, power, life, have named themselves a star. 143

89

All heaven and earth are still – though not in sleep,
But breathless (as we grow when feeling most)
And silent (as we stand in thoughts too deep); 144 835

All heaven and earth are still: from the high host
Of stars to the lulled lake and mountain-coast,
All is concentrated in a life intense
Where not a beam, nor air, nor leaf is lost,
But hath a part of being, 145 and a sense 840
Of that which is of all creator and defence.

90

Then stirs the feeling infinite, so felt
In solitude, where we are least alone –
A truth which through our being then doth melt
And purifies from self; it is a tone, 845
The soul and source of music, which makes known
Eternal harmony, and sheds a charm
Like to the fabled Cytherea's zone, 146
Binding all things with beauty – 'twould disarm
The spectre death, had he substantial power to harm. 850

Not vainly did the early Persian make
His altar the high places and the peak
Of earth-o'ergazing mountains, 147 and thus take
A fit and unwalled temple, there to seek
The spirit in whose honour shrines are weak, 855
Upreared of human hands. Come and compare
Columns and idol-dwellings, Goth 148 or Greek,
With nature's realms of worship, earth and air, 149
Nor fix on fond 150 abodes to circumscribe thy prayer!

The sky is changed, and such a change!151 Oh night 860
And storm and darkness, ye are wondrous strong,
Yet lovely in your strength, as is the light
Of a dark eye in woman! Far along
From peak to peak, the rattling crags among,
Leaps the live thunder – not from one lone cloud 865
But every mountain now hath found a tongue,
And Jura answers through her misty shroud
Back to the joyous Alps, who call to her aloud!

93

And this is in the night – most glorious night,
Thou wert not sent for slumber! Let me be 870
A sharer in thy fierce and far delight,
A portion of the tempest and of thee!
How the lit lake shines, a phosphoric sea,
And the big rain comes dancing to the earth!
And now again 'tis black, and now the glee 875
Of the loud hills shakes with its mountain-mirth,
As if they did rejoice o'er a young earthquake's birth.152

94

Now where the swift Rhone cleaves his way between Heights which appear as lovers who have parted
In hate, whose mining depths so intervene 880
That they can meet no more, though broken-hearted,
Though in their souls (which thus each other thwarted)
Love was the very root of the fond rage
Which blighted their life's bloom, and then departed –
Itself expired, but leaving them an age 885
Of years all winters, war within themselves to wage;

95

Now where the quick Rhone thus hath cleft his way,
The mightiest of the storms hath ta'en his stand:
For here not one but many make their play,
And fling their thunderbolts from hand to hand, 890
Flashing and cast around; of all the band
The brightest through these parted hills hath forked
His lightnings, as if he did understand
That in such gaps as desolation worked,
There the hot shaft¹⁵³ should blast whatever therein lurked. 895

96

Sky, mountains, river, winds, lake, lightnings – ye
With night and clouds and thunder, and a soul
To make these felt and feeling, well may be
Things that have made me watchful; the far roll
Of your departing voices is the knoll¹⁵⁴ 900
Of what in me is sleepless – if I rest.
But where of ye, oh tempests, is the goal?
Are ye like those within the human breast?
Or do ye find, at length, like eagles, some high nest?

Could I embody and unbosom now 905
That which is most within me! Could I wreak¹⁵⁵
My thoughts upon expression, and thus throw
Soul, heart, mind, passions, feelings (strong or weak),
All that I would have sought and all I seek,
Bear, know, feel, and yet breathe – into one word, 910
And that one word were lightning, I would speak!
But as it is, I live and die unheard
With a most voiceless thought, sheathing it as a sword.

98

The morn is up again, the dewy morn
With breath all incense, and with cheek all bloom, 915
Laughing the clouds away with playful scorn
And living as if earth contained no tomb,
And glowing into day: we may resume
The march of our existence. And thus I,
Still on thy shores, fair Leman, may find room 920
And food for meditation, nor pass by
Much that may give us pause, if pondered fittingly.

Clarens!¹⁵⁶ Sweet Clarens, birthplace of deep Love!
Thine air is the young breath of passionate thought;
Thy trees take root in Love; the snows above, 925
The very glaciers have his colours caught,
And sunset into rose hues¹⁵⁷ sees them wrought
By rays which sleep there lovingly: the rocks,
The permanent crags, tell here of Love, who sought
In them a refuge from the worldly shocks, 930
Which stir and sting the soul with hope that woos, then mocks.

100

Clarens! By heavenly feet thy paths are trod –
Undying Love's, who here ascends a throne
To which the steps are mountains;¹⁵⁸ where the god
Is a pervading life and light – so shown 935
Not on those summits solely, nor alone
In the still cave and forest; o'er the flower
His eye is sparkling, and his breath hath blown,
His soft and summer breath, whose tender power
Passes the strength of storms in their most desolate hour. 940

101

All things are here of him,¹⁵⁹ from the black pines,
Which are his shade on high, and the loud roar
Of torrents, where he listeneth, to the vines
Which slope his green path downward to the shore,
Where the bowed waters meet him, and adore, 945
Kissing his feet with murmurs; and the wood,
The covert of old trees, with trunks all hoar,
But light leaves, young as joy, stands where it stood,
Offering to him, and his, a populous solitude,

102

A populous solitude of bees and birds, 950
And fairy-formed and many-coloured things,
Who worship him with notes more sweet than words,
And innocently open their glad wings,
Fearless and full of life: the gush of springs,
And fall of lofty fountains, and the bend 955
Of stirring branches, and the bud which brings
The swiftest thought of beauty, here extend
Mingling, and made by Love, unto one mighty end.

103

He who hath loved not, here would learn that lore,
And make his heart a spirit; he who knows 960
That tender mystery, will love the more,
For this is Love's recess, where vain men's woes,
And the world's waste, have driven him far from those,
For 'tis his nature to advance or die;
He stands not still, but or decays, or grows 965
Into a boundless blessing, which may vie
With the immortal lights, in its eternity!

104

'Twas not for fiction chose Rousseau this spot,
Peopling it with affections; but he found
It was the scene which passion must allot 970
To the mind's purified beings; 'twas the ground
Where early Love his Psyche's zone unbound, 160
And hallowed it with loveliness: 'tis lone,
And wonderful, and deep, and hath a sound,
And sense, and sight of sweetness; here the Rhone 975
Hath spread himself a couch, the Alps have reared a throne. 161

105

Lausanne, and Ferney! Ye have been the abodes
Of names 162 which unto you bequeathed a name;
Mortals who sought and found, by dangerous roads,
A path to perpetuity of fame: 980
They were gigantic minds, and their steep aim
Was, Titan-like, on daring doubts to pile 163
Thoughts which should call down thunder, and the flame
Of heaven again assailed – if heaven the while
On man, and man's research, could deign do more than smile. 985

106

The one 164 was fire and fickleness, a child
Most mutable in wishes, but in mind
A wit as various – gay, grave, sage, or wild –
Historian, bard, philosopher, combined;
He multiplied himself among mankind, 990
The Proteus 165 of their talents: but his own
Breathed most in ridicule – which, as the wind,
Blew where it listed, 166 laying all things prone –
Now to o'erthrow a fool, and now to shake a throne. 167

The other, 168 deep and slow, exhausting thought, 995
And hiving 169 wisdom with each studious year,
In meditation dwelt, with learning wrought, 170
And shaped his weapon with an edge severe,
Sapping a solemn creed with solemn sneer;
The lord of irony – that master-spell 1000
Which stung his foes to wrath, which grew from fear,
And doomed him to the zealot's ready hell,
Which answers to all doubts so eloquently well. 171

108

Yet peace be with their ashes – for by them,
If merited, the penalty is paid; 1005
It is not ours to judge, far less condemn;
The hour must come when such things shall be made
Known unto all – or hope and dread allayed
By slumber, on one pillow, in the dust,
Which, thus much we are sure, must lie decayed; 1010
And when it shall revive, as is our trust,
'Twill be to be forgiven, or suffer what is just.

109

But let me quit man's works, again to read
His maker's, 172 spread around me, and suspend
This page, which from my reveries 173 I feed, 1015
Until it seems prolonging without end.
The clouds above me to the white Alps tend,
And I must pierce them, and survey whate'er
May be permitted, as my steps I bend

To their most great and growing region, where 1020
The earth to her embrace compels the powers of air.

110

Italia too, Italia! Looking on thee,
Full flashes on the soul the light of ages,
Since the fierce Carthaginian¹⁷⁴ almost won thee,
To the last halo of the chiefs and sages 1025
Who glorify thy consecrated pages;
Thou wert the throne and grave of empires;¹⁷⁵ still,
The fount at which the panting mind assuages
Her thirst of knowledge, quaffing there her fill,
Flows from the eternal source of Rome's imperial hill.¹⁷⁶ 1030

111

Thus far have I proceeded in a theme
Renewed with no kind auspices¹⁷⁷ – to feel
We are not what we have been, and to deem
We are not what we should be; and to steel
The heart against itself; and to conceal, 1035
With a proud caution, love, or hate, or aught
(Passion or feeling, purpose, grief or zeal)
Which is the tyrant spirit of our thought,
Is a stern task of soul. No matter, it is taught.

112

And for these words, thus woven into song, 1040
It may be that they are a harmless wile,
The colouring of the scenes which fleet along,
Which I would seize, in passing, to beguile
My breast, or that of others, for a while.
Fame is the thirst of youth – but I am not 1045

So young as to regard men's frown or smile
As loss or guerdon¹⁷⁸ of a glorious lot;
I stood and stand alone, remembered or forgot.

113

I have not loved the world, nor the world me;
I have not flattered its rank breath, nor bowed 1050
To its idolatries a patient knee,
Nor coined¹⁷⁹ my cheek to smiles, nor cried aloud
In worship of an echo;¹⁸⁰ in the crowd
They could not deem me one of such.¹⁸¹ I stood
Among them, but not of them, in a shroud 1055
Of thoughts which were not their thoughts, and still could,
Had I not filed¹⁸² my mind,¹⁸⁰ which thus itself subdued.

114

I have not loved the world, nor the world me,
But let us part fair foes; I do believe,
Though I have found them not, that there may be 1060
Words which are things, hopes which will not deceive,
And virtues which are merciful, nor weave
Snares for the failing. I would also deem
O'er others' griefs that some sincerely grieve,¹⁸⁴
That two, or one, are almost what they seem, 1065
That goodness is no name, and happiness no dream.

115

My daughter! with thy name this song begun!
My daughter! with thy name thus much shall end!
I see thee not – I hear thee not – but none
Can be so wrapped in thee; thou art the friend 1070

To whom the shadows of far years extend:
Albeit my brow thou never should'st behold,
My voice shall with thy future visions blend
And reach into thy heart – when mine is cold –
A token and a tone, even from thy father's mould. 185 1075

116

To aid thy mind's development, to watch
Thy dawn of little joys, to sit and see
Almost thy very growth, to view thee catch
Knowledge of objects (wonders yet to thee!),
To hold thee lightly on a gentle knee, 1080
And print on thy soft cheek a parent's kiss –
This, it should seem, was not reserved for me,
Yet this was in my nature. As it is,
I know not what is there, yet something like to this.

117

Yet though dull hate as duty should be taught, 1085
I know that thou wilt love me, though my name
Should be shut from thee, as a spell still fraught 186
With desolation, and a broken claim.
Though the grave closed between us, 'twere the same,
I know that thou wilt love me, though to drain 1090
My blood from out thy being were an aim
And an attainment, all would be in vain:
Still thou would'st love me, still that more than life retain.

118

The child of love, though born in bitterness
And nurtured in convulsion, 187 of thy sire 1095
These were the elements – and thine no less.

As yet such are around thee, but thy fire
Shall be more tempered, and thy hope far higher.
Sweet be thy cradled slumbers! O'er the sea
And from the mountains where I now respire, 1100
Fain would I waft such blessing upon thee,
As, with a sigh, I deem thou might'st have been to me!

Childe Harold's Pilgrimage

1 For a general introduction to this poem see headnote, p. 864.

2 'So that this work will force you to think of something else. Truly, that and time are the only remedies.'

3 my fair child Byron's only legitimate daughter Ada Augusta, born 10 December 1815. After Lady Byron left him five weeks later, he never saw Ada again.

4 the hour's gone by...mine eye Byron began writing this Canto while at sea, 25 April 1816. He felt hounded out of England by the bad publicity whipped up by his wife.

5 Once more...once more Byron echoes Henry V III i 1: 'Once more unto the breach, dear friends, once more.'

6 In my youth's summer...one i.e. Childe Harold. Byron began Canto I on 31 October 1809, when he was 21.

7 Since my young days of passion Byron was 28 at the time of writing.

8 essay attempt.

9 dreary melancholy.

10 yet still.

11 airy images Byron is probably recalling A Midsummer Night's Dream V i 14–17:

And as imagination bodies forth
The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen
Turns them to shapes, and gives to aery nothing
A local habitation and a name.

12 Soul of my thought Byron is still thinking of his daughter.

13 Something too much of this borrowed from Hamlet III ii 74.

14 Harold A late entrance for the hero of the poem, whose character was Byron's alter ego, embodying the deepest anxieties and preoccupations of his creator.

15 wormwood plant known for its bitter taste.

16 a purer fount Greece, where Harold had gone in Canto II.

17 man i.e. mankind.

18 Chaldean the Chaldeans were renowned astronomers.

19 jars quarrels.

20 That all was over...tomb i.e. that there was no afterlife.

21 a smilingness a smiling expression.

22 Stop!...below Byron visited the battlefield at Waterloo on Saturday 4 May 1816. The 'earthquake's spoil' consists of thousands of people killed in battle.

23 red rain blood shed on the fields in the battle.

24 king-making Victory The Bourbon restoration of April–May 1814 strengthened monarchical power throughout Europe. In a letter written soon after his visit to Waterloo, Byron commented on the battle: ‘I detest the cause and the victors – and the victory – including Blucher and the Bourbons’ (Marchand v 76).

25 the Power which gave Rather than say ‘God’, Byron uses the term employed by Shelley in Hymn to Intellectual Beauty and Mont Blanc.

26 ‘ “Pride of place” is a term of falconry, and means the highest pitch of flight. See Macbeth, etc.’ (Byron’s note). Byron refers to Macbeth II iv 12: ‘A falcon, tow’ring in her pride of place.’

27 shaft arrow.

28 Gaul France.

29 one Napoleon.

30 league band together. The Battle of Waterloo was fought by an alliance of the British, the Dutch, the Austrians, the Swedes and the Prussians.

31 thraldom slavery. Byron was no friend to monarchy.

32 Prove i.e. establish the true value of the victory.

33 Such as Harmodius...tyrant lord Byron alludes to Harmodius and Aristogeiton, their daggers wreathed in myrtle branches, who in 514 BCE attempted to kill Hippias and Hipparchus, tyrannical rulers of Athens. The sword wreathed in myrtle leaves is an emblem of the freedom fighter.

34 There was a sound...night The stanza recalls the famous ball given by the Duchess of Richmond in Brussels on 15 June 1815, the night prior to the inconclusive Battle of Quatre-Bras; Waterloo was fought three days later.

35 the cannon's opening roar! Wellington discovered the approach of Napoleon not from the sound of cannon but from dispatches sent by the Prussian commander, Blücher.

36 Brunswick's fated chieftain Frederick, Duke of Brunswick (1771–1815), nephew of George III, killed at Quatre-Bras. His father, Charles William Ferdinand, was killed in 1806 at Auerstädt.

37 the alarming drum The drum sounds an alarm to the soldiers.

38 Cameron's gathering rallying-cry of the Cameron clan.

39 Lochiel title of the chief of the Camerons.

41 pibroch series of martial variations for the bagpipe, on a theme called the 'urlar'.

42 And Evan's...ears Sir Evan or Ewen Cameron (1629–1719) resisted Cromwell 1652–8 and fought at Killiecrankie for James II in 1689. His grandson Donald Cameron (1695–1748) fought to restore the Stuarts in 1745 and was wounded at Culloden the following year. Byron spent his formative years in Scotland.

43 Ardennes 'The woods of Soignies is supposed to be a remnant of the "forest of Ardennes", famous in Boiardo's Orlando, and immortal in Shakespeare's As You Like It. It is also celebrated in Tacitus as being the spot of successful defence by the Germans against the Roman encroachments. I have ventured to adopt the name connected with more noble associations than those of mere slaughter' (Byron's note). A note full of errors: Soignies is between Waterloo and Brussels, Ardennes is in Luxembourg, and Arden is English.

44 other clay corpses.

45 blent blended.

46 loftier harps than mine Scott's, in The Field of Waterloo (Edinburgh, 1815).

47 line i.e. of descent.

48 young, gallant Howard! The Hon. Frederick Howard (1785–1815), Byron's cousin, son of his guardian, the Earl of Carlisle, whom he had criticized in English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809) for his ambitions as a verse-dramatist: 'So dull in youth, so drivelling in his age, / His scenes alone had damned our sinking stage' (ll. 733–4).

49 didst cease to live i.e. died.

50 reckless carefree.

51 'My guide from Mont St Jean over the field seemed intelligent and accurate. The place where Major Howard fell was not far from two tall and solitary trees (there was a third cut down, or shivered in the battle) which stand a few yards from each other at a pathway's side. Beneath these he died and was buried. The body has since been removed to England. A small hollow for the present marks where it lay, but will probably soon be effaced; the plough has been upon it, and the grain is.

After pointing out the different spots where Picton and other gallant men had perished, the guide said, "Here Major Howard lay; I was near him when wounded." I told him my relationship, and he seemed then still more anxious to point out the particular spot and circumstances. The place is one of the most marked in the field from the peculiarity of the two trees above mentioned.

I went on horseback twice over the field, comparing it with my recollection of similar scenes. As a plain, Waterloo seems marked out for the scene of some great action, though this may be mere imagination: I have viewed with attention those of Platea, Troy, Mantinea, Leuctra, Chaeronea, and Marathon; and the field around Mont St Jean and Hougoumont appears to want little but a better cause, and that undefinable but impressive halo which the lapse of ages throws around a celebrated spot, to vie in interest with any or all of these, except perhaps the last mentioned' (Byron's note).

52 enthrall imprison.

53 quick living.

54 'The (fabled) apples on the brink of the Lake Asphaltes were said to be fair without, and within ashes. – Vide Tacitus, Historia [Book 5, sec.7]' (Byron's note).

55 The Psalmist...years of man Byron refers to Psalm 90:10: 'The days of our years are threescore years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labour and sorrow; for it is soon cut off, and we fly away.'

56 tale a pun, meaning both 'story' and 'counting'.

57 There sunk...men Napoleon. Byron thought Napoleon had been no worse than the despots who had taken his place.

58 betwixt i.e. between the mightiest and the meanest.

59 Thy throne Napoleon crowned himself Emperor in December 1804.

60 thou seek'st...mien Napoleon was at this time in exile on St Helena.

61 bruted celebrated.

62 now / More than thy meanest soldier...yield Napoleon has been taught to humble himself even more than the lowest of his soldiers.

63 thine own i.e. spirit.

64 brooked endured.

65 gall and wormwood i.e. very bitter.

66 the instruments i.e. other men.

67 Thou Napoleon, at the time of writing imprisoned on St Helena in the wake of his final defeat at Waterloo.

68 Philip's son Alexander the Great, son of Philip of Macedonia, who also conquered an empire.

69 thy purple the colour worn by emperors. Napoleon crowned himself Emperor in 1804.

70 stern Diogenes Greek, Cynic, philosopher of the fourth century BCE, known for austere habits, and choosing to live in the open.

71 'The great error of Napoleon, "if we have writ our annals true", was a continued obtrusion on mankind of his want of all community of feeling for or with them; perhaps more offensive to human vanity than the active cruelty of more trembling and suspicious tyranny.

Such were his speeches to public assemblies as well as individuals: and the single expression which he is said to have used on returning to Paris after the Russian winter had destroyed his army, rubbing his hands over a fire, "This is pleasanter than Moscow", would probably alienate more favour from his cause than the destruction and reverses which led to the remark' (Byron's note).

72 quick vital, hasty.

73 Napoleon is styled here as a type of the Byronic overreacher, not unlike Manfred.

74 Maternal Nature! Byron's celebration of nature was uncharacteristic, and owes much to the temporary influence of Wordsworth, whose poetry Shelley read to him in Geneva in the summer of 1816, when this poem was composed.

75 thy majestic Rhine? Byron travelled up the Rhine via Bonn, Koblenz and Mannheim, 10–16 May 1816.

76 they i.e. ruined castles.

77 cranny The wind is so strong it penetrates into nooks and crannies of the ruin.

78 battles a pun, meaning both battalions and military engagements.

79 those which waved flags.

80 elate proud.

81 ‘ “What wants that knave / That a king should have?” was King James' question on meeting Johnny Armstrong and his followers in full accoutrements. See the ballad' (Byron's note). Johnnie Armstrong, Laird of Gilnockie, surrendered to James V in such fine attire that the king hanged him for his insolence. Byron knew the ballad of Johnie Armstrang from Scott's Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border (1802–3).

82 What want...great i.e. if they have conquerors, what else do these outlaws need, except for a historian to write up their story and call them great?

83 a blazon the device of a bleeding heart.

84 discoloured i.e. with blood.

85 Lethe river of forgetfulness in Hades, from which souls drank in order to forget their previous lives.

86 Thus Harold inly said Stanzas 47–51 comprise Harold’s inner thoughts.

87 insensible unaware.

88 exile Byron exiled himself from England permanently after separating from his wife in spring 1816 (see headnote).

89 one fond breast Augusta Leigh, Byron’s half-sister, to whom he was passionately attached, the subject of his ‘Stanzas’ and ‘Epistle’ (pp. 914–19).

90 ‘The castle of Drachenfels stands on the highest summit of “the Seven Mountains”, over the Rhine banks; it is in ruins, and connected with some singular traditions. It is the first in view on the road from Bonn, but on the opposite side of the river; on this bank, nearly facing it, are the remains of another called the Jew’s castle, and a large cross commemorative of the murder of a chief by his brother. The number of castles and cities along the course of the Rhine on both sides is very great, and their situations remarkably beautiful’ (Byron’s note).

91 pyramid i.e. a memorial.

92 Our enemy’s i.e. those of French heroes.

93 Marceau François Sévérin Desgravins Marceau (1769–96) died in a battle with the forces of the Archduke Charles of Austria.

94 lid eyelid.

95 doom fate.

96 resume take back.

97 hosts armies. Marceau was mourned by both forces: the French, retreating from Altenkirchen, had to leave him behind, and the Austrians buried him.

98 chastise i.e. teach tyrants (enemies of Freedom) a lesson.

99 ‘The monument of the young and lamented General Marceau (killed by a rifle-ball at Altenkirchen on the last day of the fourth year of the French republic) still remains as described.

The inscriptions on his monument are rather too long, and not required; his name was enough. France adored, and her enemies admired; both wept over him. His funeral was attended by the generals and detachments from both armies. In the same grave General Hoche is interred, a gallant man also in every sense of the word, but though he distinguished himself greatly in battle, he had not the good fortune to die there; his death was attended by suspicions of poison.

A separate monument (not over his body, which is buried by Marceau’s) is raised for him near Andernach, opposite to which one of his most memorable exploits was performed, in throwing a bridge to an island on the Rhine. The shape and style are different from that of Marceau’s, and the inscription more simple and pleasing.

The Army of the Sambre and Meuse to its Commander in Chief

Hoche

This is all, and as it should be. Hoche was esteemed among the first of France’s earlier generals before Bonaparte monopolized her triumphs. He was the destined commander of the invading army of Ireland’ (Byron’s note). Lazare Hoche (1768–97) died of consumption, but the rapid deterioration of his health led to speculation that he had been poisoned.

100 ‘Ehrenbreitstein (i.e. “the broad stone of honour”), one of the strongest fortresses in Europe, was dismantled and blown up by the French at the Truce of Leoben. It had been and could only be reduced by famine or treachery. It yielded to the former, aided by surprise. After having seen the fortifications of Gibraltar and Malta, it did not much strike by comparison, but the situation is commanding. General Marceau besieged it in vain for some time, and I slept in a room where I was shown a window at which he is said to have been standing observing the progress of the siege by moonlight, when a ball struck immediately below it' (Byron's note). Marceau unsuccessfully besieged Ehrenbreitstein in 1795–6. It was finally taken, after a long siege, in 1799. It was blown up not after the Treaty of Leoben (1797), but after the Treaty of Lunéville (1801). Byron visited the ruins in mid-May 1816.

101 the miner's blast The miner would dig tunnels under the walls of the fortresses, for the detonation of explosives – to 'undermine' the building.

102 the iron shower i.e. artillery fire directed against the fortress.

103 ceaseless vultures...bosoms Jupiter had Prometheus nailed to a rock for 30,000 years, with an eagle devouring his liver.

104 as they had turrets been as if they had been turrets.

105 Morat The Battle of Morat was the bloodiest of three battles fought by the Swiss against the French (under Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy) in 1476.

106 'The chapel is destroyed, and the pyramid of bones diminished to a small number by the Burgundian legion in the service of France, who anxiously effaced this record of their ancestors' less successful invasions. A few still remain notwithstanding the pains taken by the Burgundians for ages (all who passed that way removing a bone to their own country) and the less justifiable larcenies of the Swiss postillions, who carried them off to sell for knife-handles, a purpose for which the whiteness imbibed by the bleaching of years had rendered them in great request. Of these relics I ventured to bring away as much as may have made the quarter of a hero, for which the sole excuse is, that if I had not, the next passer-by might have perverted them to worse uses than the careful preservation which I intend for them' (Byron's note).

107 Morat and Marathon (490 BCE) were victories of men fighting for their freedom; Waterloo and Cannae (216 BCE) were battles between countries seeking power over each other.

108 vice-entailed Corruption i.e. corruption is inseparable from vice.

109 Draconic harsh, cruel; after Draco, author of the notoriously severe penal code for Athens (621 BCE).

110 Like many radicals of the day, Byron disagreed heartily with the divine right of kings. 'Draco, the author of the first red book on record, was an Athenian special pleader in great business. Hippias, the Athenian Bourbon, was in the Battle of Marathon, and did not keep at the respectful distance from danger of the Ghent refugees – but the English and Prussians resembled the Medes and Persians as little as Blucher and the British General did Datis and Artaphernes and Bonaparte was still more remote in cause and character from Miltiades – and a parallel "after the manner of Plutarch" might have still existed in the fortunes of the sons of Pisistratus and the reigning doctors of right-divinity' (Byron's note). Byron offers an ironic comparison between the principals at Waterloo and those at Marathon. The sons of Pisistratus, Hippias, and Hipparchus died inglorious.

111 'Aventicum (near Morat) was the Roman capital of Helvetia, where Avenches now stands' (Byron's note).

112 'Julia Alpinula, a young Aventian priestess, died soon after a vain endeavour to save her father, condemned to death as a traitor by Aulus Caecina. Her epitaph was discovered many years ago; it is thus –

Julia Alpinula
Hic jaceo
Infelicis patris, infelix proles

Deae Aventiae Sacerdos;
Exorare patris necem non potui
Male mori in fatis ille erat.
Vixi annos XXIII.

I know of no human composition so affecting as this, nor a history of deeper interest. These are the names and actions which ought not to perish, and to which we turn with a true and healthy tenderness, from the wretched and glittering detail of a confused mass of conquests and battles, with which the mind is roused for a time to a false and feverish sympathy, from whence it recurs at length with all the nausea consequent on such intoxication' (Byron's note).

113 Lake Lemman Lake Geneva.

114 spoil prey.

115 coil mortal coil; bustle of life.

116 'The colour of the Rhone at Geneva is blue, to a depth of tint which I have never seen equalled in water, salt or fresh, except in the Mediterranean and Archipelago' (Byron's note). The 'Archipelago' is the Aegean, in which he swam in May 1810.

117 froward refractory.

118 Here and in succeeding lines Byron repeats attitudes he had encountered in Wordsworth's 'Tintern Abbey'.

119 Spurning...cling the attitude of the Byronic overreacher; cf. Manfred I ii 39–41: 'we / Half-dust, half-deity, alike unfit / To sink or soar.'

120 this degraded form The human body is inherently degraded as far as Byron is concerned.

121 phlegm coldness, lack of passion.

122 one Jean-Jacques Rousseau, born in Geneva 1712 (d. 1778), whose political, fictional and philosophical writings strongly influenced the outbreak of revolution at the end of the eighteenth century.

123 respire inhale.

124 sophist learned man.

125 a tree / On fire by lightning an image used also by Shelley and Mary Shelley.

126 ethereal flame fire from heaven.

127 But his...dreams The comparison is with Dante's Beatrice and Petrarch's Laura.

128 ideal beauty cf. Shelley's Hymn to Intellectual Beauty, which Byron would have known in manuscript as it was not yet published.

129 Julie heroine of Rousseau's Julie, ou la Nouvelle Héloïse (1761), which Shelley and Byron read in 1816, and deals with the illicit love of Julie and her tutor Saint-Preux.

130 hers Rousseau describes his unrequited love of the Comtesse d'Houdetot in his Confessions.

131 'This refers to the account in his Confessions of his passion for the Comtesse d'Houdetot (the mistress of St Lambert) and his long walk every morning for the sake of the single kiss which was the common salutation of French acquaintance. Rousseau's description of his feelings on this occasion may be considered as the most passionate, yet not impure description and expression of love that ever kindled into words; which after all must be felt, from their very force, to be inadequate to the delineation: a painting can give no sufficient idea of the ocean' (Byron's note).

132 self-sought foes...self-banished including Madame de Warens, Madame d'Epainay, Diderot, Grimm, Voltaire, Hume and St Lambert.

133 the Pythian's mystic cave of yore The Pythian was the priestess of the oracle at Delphi; she gave utterance in a state of frenzy and sat on a three-legged stool.

134 oracles The Discours of 1750 and 1753 and Le Contrat social (1762) helped inspire the French Revolution.

135 the veil they rent cf. the moment of Christ's death: 'And, behold, the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom' (Matthew 27:51).

136 Dungeons The Bastille prison in Paris, symbol of the ancien régime, was demolished soon after 14 July 1789 during the Revolution; it was not rebuilt.

137 thrones Ferdinand VII of Spain and Louis XVIII of France were restored to their respective thrones in 1814 – not something that gave Byron much cheer.

138 Mankind have felt their strength and made it felt this stanza picks up a subject that preoccupied all defenders of revolution: the necessity for violence in the cause of liberty.

139 The heart's i.e. the heart's wounds.

140 stern uncompromising.

141 Drops the light...oar an echo of Wordsworth's Lines Written near Richmond: 'Remembrance! as we glide along, / For him suspend the dashing oar' (ll. 33–4).

142 brakes fern, bracken.

143 have named themselves a star cf. Manfred's affinity with the stars, Manfred III iv 1–7.

144 thoughts too deep Byron echoes Wordsworth, 'Ode' 206: 'Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears.'

145 Where not a beam...part of being The sentiment is virtually identical to the pantheism of Wordsworth's Tintern Abbey 96–103.

146 Cytherea's zone Aphrodite's girdle ('zone') brought love to those wearing it.

147 'It is to be recollected that the most beautiful and impressive doctrines of the founder of Christianity were delivered not in the Temple, but on the mount.

To waive the question of devotion, and turn to human eloquence – the most effectual and splendid specimens were not pronounced within walls. Demosthenes addressed the public and popular assemblies. Cicero spoke in the forum. That this added to their effect on the mind of both orator and hearers, may be conceived from the difference between what we read of the emotions then and there produced, and those we ourselves experience in the perusal in the closet. It is one thing to read the Iliad at Sigaeum and on the tumuli, or by the springs with Mount Ida above, and the plain and rivers and Archipelago around you, and another to trim your taper over it in a snug library – this I know.

Were the early and rapid progress of what is called Methodism to be attributed to any cause beyond the enthusiasm excited by its vehement faith and doctrines (the truth or error of which I presume neither to canvas nor to question) I should venture to ascribe it to the practice of preaching in the fields, and the unstudied and extemporaneous effusions of its teachers.

The Musselmans, whose erroneous devotion (at least in the lower orders) is most sincere, and therefore impressive, are accustomed to repeat their prescribed orisons and prayers wherever they may be at the stated hours – of course frequently in the open air, kneeling upon a light mat (which they carry for the purpose of a bed or cushion as required); the ceremony lasts some minutes, during which they are totally absorbed, and only living in their supplication. Nothing can disturb them. On me the simple and entire sincerity of these men, and the spirit which appeared to be within and upon them, made a far greater impression than any general rite which was ever performed in places of worship, of which I have seen those of almost every persuasion under the sun: including most of our own sectaries, and the Greek, the Catholic, the Armenian, the Lutheran, the Jewish, and the Mahometan. Many of the negroes, of whom there are numbers in the Turkish empire, are idolators, and have free exercise of their belief and its rites. Some of these I had a distant view of at Patras, and from what I could make out of them, they appeared to be of a truly pagan description, and not very agreeable to a spectator’ (Byron’s note).

148 Goth one of a Germanic tribe, who, in the third, fourth and fifth centuries, invaded both the Eastern and Western empires, and founded kingdoms in Italy, France and Spain.

149 earth and air Once again, Byron is thinking of the pantheistic statement of faith in Tintern Abbey, in which Wordsworth seeks ‘a sense sublime’ in ‘the round ocean, and the living air,/And the blue sky, and in the mind of man’ (ll. 96–100).

150 fond foolish.

151 ‘The thunder-storms to which these lines refer occurred on 13 June 1816 at midnight. I have seen among the Acroceraunian mountains of Chimari several more terrible, but none more beautiful’ (Byron’s note).

152 a young earthquake’s birth Byron is probably echoing Shelley, ‘Mont Blanc’ 72–3.

153 the hot shaft i.e. of lightning.

154 knoll summit.

155 wreak vent.

156 Clarens! Byron and Shelley sailed to Clarens, visiting the Castle of Chillon, on 26 June 1816. Shelley had just been reading La Nouvelle Héloïse; Byron had read it many times before.

157 ‘Rousseau’s Héloïse, Letter 17, part 4, note. “Ces montagnes sont si hautes qu’une demi-heure après le soleil couché, leurs sommets sont encore éclairés de ses rayons; dont le rouge forme sur ces cimes blanches une belle couleur de rose qu’on aperçoit de fort loin.”

This applies more particularly to the heights over Meillerie. “J’allai à Vévay loger à la Clef, et pendant deux jours que j’y restai sans voir personne, je pris pour cette ville un amour qui m’a suivi dans tous mes voyages, et qui m’y a fait établir enfin les héros de mon roman. Je dirois volontiers à ceux qui ont du goût et qui sont sensibles: allez à Vévay – visitez le pays, examinez les sites, promenez-vous sur le lac, et dites si la Nature n’a pas fait ce beau pays pour une Julie, pour une Claire et pour un St Preux; mais ne les y cherchez pas.” Les Confessions, livre iv. Page 306. Lyons ed. 1796.

In July 1816, I made a voyage round the Lake of Geneva; and, as far as my own observations have led me in a not uninterested nor inattentive survey of all the scenes most celebrated by Rousseau in his Héloïse, I can safely say, that in this there is no exaggeration. It would be difficult to see Clarens (with the scenes around it, Vevay, Chillon, Bôveret, St Gingo, Meillerie, Evian, and the entrances of the Rhone), without being forcibly struck with its peculiar adaptation to the persons and events with which it has been peopled. But this is not all; the feeling with which all around Clarens, and the opposite rocks of Meillerie is invested, is of a still higher and more comprehensive order than the mere sympathy with individual passion; it is a sense of the existence of love in its most extended and sublime capacity, and of our own participation of its good and of its glory: it is the great principle of the universe, which is there more condensed, but not less manifested; and of which, though knowing ourselves a part, we lose our individuality, and mingle in the beauty of the whole.

If Rousseau had never written, nor lived, the same associations would not less have belonged to such scenes. He has added to the interest of his works by their adoption; he has shown his sense of their beauty by the selection; but they have done that for him which no human being could do for them.

I had the fortune (good or evil as it might be) to sail from Meillerie (where we landed for some time), to St Gingo during a lake storm, which added to the magnificence of all around, although occasionally accompanied by danger to the boat, which was small and overloaded. It was over this very part of the lake that Rousseau has driven the boat of St Preux and Madame Wolmar to Meillerie for shelter during a tempest.

On gaining the shore at St Gingo, I found that the wind had been sufficiently strong to blow down some fine old chestnut trees on the lower part of the mountains. On the opposite height of Clarens is a chateau.

The hills are covered with vineyards, and interspersed with some small but beautiful woods; one of these was named the "Bosquet de Julie", and it is remarkable that, though long ago cut down by the brutal selfishness of the monks of St Bernard (to whom the land appertained), that the ground might be enclosed into a vineyard for the miserable drones of an execrable superstition, the inhabitants of Clarens still point out the spot where its trees stood, calling it by the name which consecrated and survived them.

Rousseau has not been particularly fortunate in the preservation of the "local habitations" he has given to "airy nothings". The Prior of Great St Bernard has cut down some of his woods for the sake of a few casks of wine, and Bonaparte has levelled part of the rocks of Meillerie in improving the road to the Simplon. The road is an excellent one, but I cannot quite agree with a remark which I heard made, that “La route vaut mieux que les souvenirs” ’ (Byron’s note).

158 a throne...mountains This image is reworked at Manfred I i 60–2, and may be borrowed from Shelley, Mont Blanc 15–17.

159 him i.e. Love.

160 Where early Love his Psyche’s zone unbound In Apuleius, Metamorphoses, Love undid Psyche’s girdle when he made love to her, disobeying the orders of Venus, who was jealous of Psyche’s beauty. Byron’s point is that Rousseau chose Clarens for setting his novel’s love-scenes because he wanted to project, through the novel, his own feelings for Madame d’Houdetot (one of the mind’s ‘purified beings’).

161 throne in Mont Blanc, Shelley describes the mountain as the ‘secret throne’ of Power (l. 17).

162 names ‘Voltaire and Gibbon’ (Byron’s note). Edward Gibbon (1737–94), author of The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, lived at Lausanne 1783–93. Voltaire resided at his estate at Ferney 1758–77. Both were freethinkers.

163 Titan-like...pile The Titans and Giants piled Pelion upon Ossa in an attempt to gain heaven and overthrow Jupiter.

164 The one i.e. Voltaire.

165 Proteus sea-god with the ability to change his shape; Voltaire mastered different forms of intellectual endeavour.

166 listed wanted.

167 now to shake a throne Voltaire’s writings helped bring about the French Revolution.

168 The other i.e. Gibbon.

169 hiving hoarding.

170 wrought created (i.e. his history of the Roman Empire).

171 Gibbon's work was controversial in its day, because it effectively demolished the traditional, religiously slanted views of the later Roman period. He said that his history recorded the triumph of superstition and barbarism over culture and civilization.

172 His maker's i.e. nature.

173 reveries i.e. his sublime experiences in the midst of natural things (which inspire him).

174 the fierce Carthaginian Hannibal, Carthaginian general who attempted to conquer Italy in the third century BCE, won many battles against the Romans, but finally failed.

175 Thou wert the throne and grave of empires Rome conquered the Etruscan and Carthaginian civilizations, and incorporated the Greek and Persian empires.

176 Flows...hill a reference to the founding of the Roman Empire.

177 auspices i.e. prospect of success.

178 guerdon reward.

179 coined counterfeited.

180 In worship of an echo To Byron, God is no more than an echo.

181 such i.e. a worshipper of God.

182 filed debased.

183 Had I not filed my mind Byron notes the allusion to Macbeth III i 63–4: ‘If’t be so, / For Banquo’s issue have I filed my mind.’

184 ‘It is said by Rochfoucault that “there is always something in the misfortunes of men’s best friends not displeasing to them” ’ (Byron’s note).

185 mould body.

186 fraught loaded.

187 convulsion i.e. Byron’s rancorous separation from his wife.

Prometheus (composed July or early August 1816)¹

From The Prisoner of Chillon and Other Poems (1816)

I

Titan!² to whose immortal eye
The sufferings of mortality
Seen in their sad reality,
Were not as things that gods despise –
What was thy pity’s recompense? 5
A silent suffering, and intense;
The rock, the vulture, and the chain,
All that the proud can feel of pain,
The agony they do not show,
The suffocating sense of woe 10

Which speaks but in its loneliness,
And then is jealous lest the sky
Should have a listener, nor will sigh
Until its voice is echoless.

II

Titan! to thee the strife was given 15
Between the suffering and the will,
Which torture where they cannot kill;
And the inexorable heaven,
And the deaf tyranny of fate,
The ruling principle of hate 20
Which for its pleasure doth create
The things it may annihilate,
Refused thee even the boon to die:
The wretched gift eternity
Was thine – and thou hast borne it well. 25
All that the thunderer³ wrung from thee
Was but the menace which flung back
On him the torments of thy rack;¹
The fate thou didst so well foresee
But would not to appease him tell; 30
And in thy silence was his sentence,
And in his soul a vain repentance,
And evil dread so ill dissembled
That in his hand the lightnings trembled.

III

Thy godlike crime was to be kind, 35
To render with thy precepts less
The sum of human wretchedness,
And strengthen man with his own mind;
But baffled⁵ as thou wert from high,

Still in thy patient energy, 40
In the endurance and repulse
Of thine impenetrable spirit,
Which earth and heaven could not convulse,
A mighty lesson we inherit:
Thou art a symbol and a sign 45
To mortals of their fate and force;
Like thee, man is in part divine,
A troubled stream from a pure source;
And man in portions can foresee
His own funereal destiny; 50
His wretchedness and his resistance,
And his sad unallied existence:
To which his spirit may oppose
Itself – an equal to all woes,
And a firm will, and a deep sense, 55
Which even in torture can descry
Its own concentrated recompense,
Triumphant where it dares defy,
And making death a victory.

Prometheus

1 When Jupiter took fire away from earth, Prometheus stole replacement fire from the chariot of the sun. In revenge, Jupiter had Prometheus nailed to a rock for 30,000 years, with an eagle incessantly devouring his liver. He was eventually freed, and the bird killed, by Hercules. Byron uses the story to reprise his concept of the overreacher. Prometheus was much on the minds of Shelley, Mary Godwin and Byron in the summer of 1816. He helped inspire Mary's Frankenstein; or, the Modern Prometheus (1818), and would be the subject of Shelley's Prometheus Unbound several years later (p. 1138).

2 Titan! In classical literature, the Titans were the children of Uranus (heaven) and Ge (earth).

³ the thunderer Jupiter, who was responsible for Prometheus' punishment, used the thunderbolt as his instrument of war.

⁴ rack suffering.

⁵ baffled obstructed, prevented.

Stanzas to Augusta (composed 24 July 1816)¹

From The Prisoner of Chillon and Other Poems (1816)

Though the day of my destiny's over,
And the star of my fate hath declined,
Thy soft heart refused to discover
The faults which so many could find;
Though thy soul with my grief was acquainted, 5
It shrunk not to share it with me,
And the love which my spirit hath painted
It never hath found but in thee.

Then when nature around me is smiling
The last smile which answers to mine, 10
I do not believe it beguiling
Because it reminds me of thine;
And when winds are at war with the ocean,
As the breasts I believed in with me,

If their billows excite an emotion 15
It is that they bear me from thee.

Though the rock of my last hope is shivered²
And its fragments are sunk in the wave,
Though I feel that my soul is delivered
To pain – it shall not be its slave. 20
There is many a pang to pursue me –
They may crush, but they shall not contemn;
They may torture, but shall not subdue me –
'Tis of thee that I think, not of them.³

Though human, thou didst not deceive me; 25
Though woman, thou didst not forsake;
Though loved, thou forborest to grieve me;
Though slandered, thou never couldst shake;
Though trusted, thou didst not betray⁴ me;
Though parted, it was not to fly; 30
Though watchful, 'twas not to defame me,
Nor, mute, that the world might belie.

Yet I blame not the world, nor despise it,
Nor the war of the many with one –
If my soul was not fitted to prize it 35
'Twas folly not sooner to shun:
And if dearly that error hath cost me,
And more than I once could foresee,
I have found that, whatever it lost me,
It could not deprive me of thee. 40

From the wreck of the past, which hath perished,
Thus much I at least may recall,
It hath taught me that what I most cherished
Deserved to be dearest of all:
In the desert a fountain is springing,⁵ 45
In the wide waste there still is a tree,
And a bird in the solitude singing,
Which speaks to my spirit of thee.

Stanzas to Augusta

¹ Originally published as Stanzas to ————. The relationship he had with Augusta Leigh, his half-sister, was always to be one of the most highly valued in Byron's life; for more on which, see p. 866.

² shivered shattered.

³ At this period Byron felt persecuted by the unfavourable publicity arising from his separation from his wife; as he told Thomas Moore on 29 February 1816: 'I am at war "with all the world and his wife"; or, rather, "all the world and my wife" are at war with me, and have not yet crushed me – whatever they may do. I don't know that in the course of a hair-breadth existence I was ever, at home or abroad, in a situation so completely uprooting of present pleasure, or rational hope for the future, as this same' (Marchand v 35).

⁴ betray All printed texts until McGann's Clarendon Press edition (1980–93) have 'disclaim'. McGann's emendation reinstates a reading attributable to Byron rather than his publisher.

⁵ In the desert a fountain is springing the ultimate source is biblical (Judges 15:19), but Byron is probably recalling Milton, Samson

Agonistes 581–2: ‘But God who caused a fountain at thy prayer / From the dry ground to spring...’

Epistle to Augusta (composed August 1816; edited from MS)¹

My sister, my sweet sister – if a name
Dearer and purer were, it should be thine.
Mountains and seas divide us,² but I claim
No tears, but tenderness to answer mine:
Go where I will, to me thou art the same – 5
A loved regret which I would not resign;
There yet are two things in my destiny:
A world to roam through,³ and a home with thee.

The first were nothing – had I still the last
It were the haven of my happiness; 10
But other claims and other ties thou hast,⁴
And mine is not the wish to make them less.
A strange doom⁵ was thy father’s son’s,⁶ and past
Recalling, as it lies beyond redress,
Reversed for him our grandsire’s fate of yore⁷ – 15
He had no rest at sea, nor I on shore.

If my inheritance of storms hath been
In other elements, and on the rocks

Of perils overlooked or unforeseen,
I have sustained my share of worldly shocks; 20
The fault was mine – nor do I seek to screen
My errors with defensive paradox:
I have been cunning in mine overthrow,⁸
The careful pilot of my proper woe.

Mine were my faults, and mine be their reward; 25
My whole life was a contest, since the day
That gave me being gave me that which marred
The gift – a fate or will that walked astray –
And I at times have found the struggle hard,
And thought of shaking off my bonds of clay;⁹ 30
But now I fain would for a time survive,
If but to see what next can well arrive.

Kingdoms and empires in my little day
I have outlived and yet I am not old;
And when I look on this, the petty spray 35
Of my own years of trouble, which have rolled
Like a wild bay of breakers, melts away:
Something (I know not what) does still uphold
A spirit of slight patience; not in vain,
Even for its own sake, do we purchase pain. 40

Perhaps the workings of defiance stir
Within me, or perhaps a cold despair
Brought on when ills habitually recur;
Perhaps a harder clime or purer air –

For to all such may change of soul refer, 45
And with light armour we may learn to bear –
Have taught me a strange quiet which was not
The chief companion of a calmer lot.

I feel almost at times as I have felt
In happy childhood¹⁰ – trees and flowers and brooks, 50
Which do remember me of where I dwelt
Ere my young mind was sacrificed to books,
Come as of yore upon me, and can melt
My heart with recognition of their looks –
And even at moments I could think I see 55
Some living things to love – but none like thee.

Here are the Alpine landscapes, which create
A fund for contemplation – to admire
Is a brief feeling of a trivial date –
But something worthier do such scenes inspire: 60
Here to be lonely is not desolate,
For much I view which I could most desire,
And above all a lake I can behold –
Lovelier, not dearer, than our own of old.¹¹

Oh that thou wert but with me! – but I grow 65
The fool of my own wishes, and forget;
The solitude which I have vaunted so
Has lost its praise in this but one regret –
There may be others which I less may show;
I am not of the plaintive mood – and yet 70

I feel an ebb in my philosophy
And the tide rising in my altered eye.

10

I did remind thee of our own dear lake

By the old Hall which may be mine no more;¹²
Leman's is fair, but think not I forsake 75

The sweet remembrance of a dearer shore:
Sad havoc time must with my memory make
Ere that or thou can fade these eyes before –
Though like all things which I have loved, they¹³ are Resigned¹⁴ for ever, or divided far. 80

11

The world is all before me¹⁵ – I but ask
Of Nature that with which she will comply:
It is but in her summer's sun to bask,
To mingle in the quiet of her sky,¹
To see her gentle face without a mask 85
And never gaze on it with apathy.
She was my early friend, and now shall be
My sister – till I look again on thee.

12

I can reduce all feelings but this one,
And that I would not – for at length I see 90
Such scenes as those wherein my life begun –
The earliest – were the only paths for me.
Had I but sooner known the crowd to shun,
I had been better than I now can be;

The passions which have torn me would have slept – 95
I had not suffered, and thou hadst not wept.

13

With false ambition what had I to do?
Little with love, and least of all with fame!
And yet they came unsought and with me grew,
And made me all which they can make – a name. 100
Yet this was not the end I did pursue –
Surely I once beheld a nobler aim.
But all is over – I am one the more
To baffled millions which have gone before.

14

And for the future – this world's future may 105
From me demand but little from my care;
I have outlived myself by many a day,
Having survived so many things that were;
My years have been no slumber – but the prey
Of ceaseless vigils; for I had the share 110
Of life which might have filled a century
Before its fourth in time had passed me by.

15

And for the remnants which may be to come
I am content – and for the past I feel
Not thankless, for within the crowded sum 115
Of struggles happiness at times would steal;
And for the present, I would not benumb
My feelings farther – nor shall I conceal
That with all this I still can look around
And worship nature with a thought profound. 120

For thee, my own sweet sister, in thy heart
 I know myself secure – as thou in mine
 We were and are – I am – even as thou art –
 Beings who ne'er each other can resign,
 It is the same together or apart: 125
 From life's commencement to its slow decline
 We are entwined – let death come slow or fast,
 The tie¹⁷ which bound the first endures the last.

Epistle to Augusta

¹Originally published 1830, posthumously; this is Byron's first sustained composition in ottava rima.

²Byron was resident at the Villa Diodati on the shores of Lake Geneva (Lake Lemán at l. 75).

⁴*But other claims...hast* Augusta married Colonel George Leigh in 1807, and had by now given birth to three daughters.

⁵*doom* fate.

⁶*thy father's son's* i.e. Byron. They had the same father, Captain John (Mad Jack) Byron.

⁷The rough draft of the poem contains the following note in Byron's hand: 'Admiral Byron was remarkable for never making a voyage without a tempest: "But, though it were tempest-tossed, / Still his bark could not be lost." He returned safely from the wreck of the Wager (in Anson's voyage) and subsequently circumnavigated the world many years after, as commander of a similar expedition.' The quotation reworks Macbeth I iii 24–5.

8 overthrow ruin; somewhat self-dramatizing, but Byron saw himself as having been ruined, at least in social terms, by his wife's campaign against him.

9 my bonds of clay For the Byronic overreacher, who longs to fulfil his divine aspirations, the human body is a form of imprisonment; cf. Childe Harold, who spurns 'the clay-cold bonds which round our being cling' (Childe Harold's Pilgrimage iii 697).

10 In happy childhood Byron did not know Augusta as a child, when he was brought up by his mother in the Scottish countryside.

11 than our own of old Byron refers to the lake at Newstead Abbey, where he had frolicked with Augusta in January and late August 1814.

12 Byron had to sell Newstead Abbey to pay off his debts. At the time of writing, however, it was still on his hands; it was sold in late 1817 to his Harrow schoolfriend Major Thomas Wildman for £94,500.

13 they i.e. the lake at Newstead and Augusta.

14 Resigned surrendered.

15 A sardonic echo of the more optimistic context of Adam and Eve leaving Eden, Paradise Lost xii 646.

16 the quiet of her sky a deliberate echo of Wordsworth, Tintern Abbey 8.

17 tie Byron implicitly compares his blood tie to Augusta with the marriage tie to Annabella.

Darkness (composed between 21 July and 25 August 1816)¹

From The Prisoner of Chillon and Other Poems (1816)

I had a dream, which was not all a dream.
The bright sun was extinguished, and the stars
Did wander darkling² in the eternal space,
Rayless, and pathless,³ and the icy earth
Swung blind and blackening in the moonless air; 5
Morn came, and went – and came, and brought no day,
And men forgot their passions in the dread
Of this their desolation; and all hearts
Were chilled into a selfish prayer for light:
And they did live by watchfires – and the thrones, 10
The palaces of crowned kings – the huts,
The habitations of all things which dwell,
Were burnt for beacons;⁴ cities were consumed,
And men were gathered round their blazing homes
To look once more into each other's face; 15
Happy were those who dwelt within the eye
Of the volcanoes, and their mountain-torch:
A fearful hope was all the world contained;
Forests were set on fire – but hour by hour
They fell and faded – and the crackling trunks 20
Extinguished with a crash – and all was black.
The brows of men by the despairing light
Wore an unearthly aspect, as by fits
The flashes fell upon them; some lay down
And hid their eyes and wept; and some did rest 25
Their chins upon their clenched hands, and smiled;
And others hurried to and fro, and fed

Their funeral piles with fuel, and looked up
With mad disquietude on the dull sky,
The pall of a past world; and then again 30
With curses cast them down upon the dust,
And gnashed their teeth and howled. The wild birds shrieked,
And, terrified, did flutter on the ground, 5
And flap their useless wings; the wildest brutes
Came tame and tremulous; 6 and vipers crawled 35
And twined themselves among the multitude,
Hissing, but stingless – they were slain for food:
And War, which for a moment was no more,
Did glut himself again; a meal was bought
With blood, and each sat sullenly apart 40
Gorging himself in gloom. No love was left;
All earth was but one thought – and that was death,
Immediate and inglorious; and the pang
Of famine fed upon all entrails – men
Died, and their bones were tombless as their flesh; 45
The meagre by the meagre were devoured,
Even dogs assailed their masters, all save one,
And he was faithful to a corpse, and kept
The birds and beasts and famished men at bay,
Till hunger clung 7 them, or the dropping dead 50
Lured their lank jaws; himself sought out no food,
But with a piteous and perpetual moan
And a quick desolate cry, licking the hand
Which answered not with a caress – he died.
The crowd was famished by degrees, but two 55
Of an enormous city did survive,
And they were enemies; they met beside
The dying embers of an altar-place
Where had been heaped a mass of holy things
For an unholy usage; they raked up, 60
And shivering scraped with their cold skeleton hands
The feeble ashes, and their feeble breath

Blew for a little life, and made a flame
Which was a mockery; then they lifted up
Their eyes as it grew lighter, and beheld 65
Each other's aspects – saw, and shrieked, and died –
Even of their mutual hideousness they died,
Unknowing who he was upon whose brow
Famine had written Fiend. The world was void,
The populous and the powerful – was a lump, 70
Seasonless, herbless, treeless, manless, lifeless –
A lump of death – a chaos of hard clay.
The rivers, lakes, and ocean all stood still,
And nothing stirred within their silent depths;
Ships sailorless lay rotting on the sea, 75
And their masts fell down piecemeal; as they dropped
They slept on the abyss without a surge –
The waves were dead; the tides were in their grave,
The moon their mistress had expired before;
The winds were withered in the stagnant air, 80
And the clouds perished; Darkness had no need
Of aid from them – she was the universe.

Darkness

¹ The end of the world was one of the topics discussed with Shelley and Mary Godwin in summer 1816; it is also the theme of Mary's novel The Last Man (1826). But the most obvious source for this poem is the weather system that prevailed across Europe in summer 1816. A series of disturbances, including the eruption of the Tambora volcano in Indonesia, caused an unusual incidence of mists, fogs and rains in Geneva. Byron is also indebted to various apocalyptic passages in the Bible, notably Jeremiah 4, Ezekiel 32 and 38, Joel 2:31, Matthew 25 and Revelation 6:12.

² darkling in the dark.

³ the stars...pathless as McGann notes, there is an echo here of Milton's Il Penseroso (appropriately, as the poem was written at the Villa Diodati, where Milton once resided), where the moon is compared with 'one that had been led astray / Through the heaven's wide pathless way' (ll. 69–70).

⁴ beacons signals – of continuing life.

⁵ The wild birds...on the ground a recollection of Coleridge's Christabel, where the sweet bird in Bracy's dream 'lay fluttering on the ground' (l. 532).

⁶ The wildest brutes...tremulous an allusion to the famous apocalyptic prophecy, when 'The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them' (Isaiah 11:6).

⁷ clung shrivelled, as at Macbeth V v 39: 'Till famine cling thee.'

Manfred, A Dramatic Poem (composed September 1816–15, February 1817; published 1817)¹

There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio,

Than are dreamt of in your philosophy.²

Dramatis Personae

Manfred

Chamois Hunter

Abbot of St Maurice

Manuel

Herman

Witch of the Alps

Arimanes

Nemesis
The Destinies
Spirits, etc.

The scene of the drama is amongst the higher Alps – partly in the Castle of Manfred, and partly in the mountains.

Manfred, A Dramatic Poem

² Hamlet I v 166–7. The epigraph underlines Byron's belief in the supernatural and metaphysical – of which he was, to put it mildly, highly sceptical by the time he published Don Juan, two years later.

ACT I, SCENE I¹

*Manfred alone. Scene: a Gothic gallery.*² Time: midnight.

MANFRED. The lamp must be replenished, but even then
It will not burn so long as I must watch;
My slumbers (if I slumber) are not sleep
But a continuance of enduring thought,
Which then I can resist not. In my heart 5
There is a vigil, and these eyes but close
To look within – and yet I live, and bear
The aspect and the form of breathing men.
But grief should be the instructor of the wise –
Sorrow is knowledge;¹ they who know the most 10
Must mourn the deepest o'er the fatal truth:
The tree of knowledge is not that of life.
Philosophy and science,⁴ and the springs
Of wonder, and the wisdom of the world
I have essayed,⁵ and in my mind there is 15
A power to make these subject to itself,

But they avail not. I have done men good,
And I have met with good even among men –
But this availed not. I have had my foes
And none have baffled,⁶ many fallen before me – 20
But this availed not. Good or evil, life,
Powers, passions, all I see in other beings
Have been to me as rain unto the sands
Since that all-nameless hour. I have no dread,
And feel the curse to have no natural fear, 25
Nor fluttering throb that beats with hopes or wishes
Or lurking love of something on the earth.
Now to my task.

Mysterious agency!⁷

Ye spirits of the unbounded universe
Whom I have sought in darkness and in light; 30
Ye who do compass earth about, and dwell
In subtler⁸ essence; ye to whom the tops
Of mountains inaccessible are haunts,
And earth's and ocean's caves familiar things –
I call upon ye by the written charm 35
Which gives me power upon you: rise, appear!

(a pause)

They come not yet. Now by the voice of him
Who is the first among you; by this sign
Which makes you tremble; by the claims of him
Who is undying⁹ – rise, appear! Appear! 40

(a pause)

If it be so. Spirits of earth and air,
Ye shall not thus elude me: by a power
Deeper than all yet urged, a tyrant-spell
Which had its birthplace in a star condemned,
The burning wreck of a demolished world, 45
A wandering hell in the eternal space;
By the strong curse which is upon my soul,

The thought which is within me and around me,
I do compel ye to my will. Appear!

A star is seen at the darker end of the gallery. It is stationary, and a voice is heard singing.

*First Spirit*¹⁰

Mortal,¹¹ to thy bidding bowed 50
From my mansion in the cloud
Which the breath of twilight builds
And the summer's sunset gilds
With the azure and vermilion
Which is mixed for my pavilion, 55
Though thy quest may be forbidden,
On a starbeam I have ridden,
To thine adjuration¹² bowed;
Mortal – be thy wish avowed!

*Voice of the Second Spirit*¹³

Mont Blanc¹⁴ is the monarch of mountains, 60
They crowned him long ago
On a throne of rocks,¹⁵ in a robe of clouds
With a diadem of snow.
Around his waist are forests braced,
The avalanche in his hand; 65
But ere it fall that thundering ball¹⁶
Must pause for my command.
The glacier's cold and restless mass
Moves onward day by day,¹⁷
But I am he who bids it pass 70
Or with its ice delay.
I am the spirit of the place,
Could make the mountain bow
And quiver to his caverned base –
And what with me wouldst thou? 75

*Voice of the Third Spirit*¹⁸

In the blue depth of the waters
Where the wave hath no strife,
Where the wind is a stranger
And the sea-snake hath life,
Where the mermaid is decking¹⁹ 80
Her green hair with shells,
Like the storm on the surface
Came the sound of thy spells;
O'er my calm hall of coral
The deep echo rolled – 85
To the spirit of ocean
Thy wishes unfold!

*Fourth Spirit*²⁰

Where the slumbering earthquake
Lies pillowed on fire,
And the lakes of bitumen 90
Rise boilingly higher;
Where the roots of the Andes
Strike deep in the earth,
As their summits to heaven
Shoot soaringly forth; 95
I have quitted my birthplace,
Thy bidding to bide –
Thy spell hath subdued me,
Thy will be my guide!

Fifth Spirit

I am the rider of the wind, 100
The stirrer of the storm;
The hurricane I left behind
Is yet with lightning warm;
To speed to thee, o'er shore and sea
I swept upon the blast; 105

The fleet I met sailed well and yet
'Twill sink ere night be passed.

Sixth Spirit

My dwelling is the shadow of the night,
Why doth thy magic torture me with light?

Seventh Spirit

The star which rules thy destiny 110
Was ruled, ere earth began, by me;
It was a world as fresh and fair
As e'er revolved round sun in air;
Its course was free and regular,
Space bosomed not a lovelier star. 115
The hour arrived, and it became
A wandering mass of shapeless flame,
A pathless comet and a curse –
The menace of the universe.
Still rolling on with innate force, 120
Without a sphere, without a course,
A bright deformity on high,
The monster²¹ of the upper sky!
And thou beneath its influence born,
Thou worm whom I obey and scorn! 125
Forced by a power (which is not thine,
And lent thee but to make thee mine)
For this brief moment to descend,
Where these weak spirits round thee bend
And parley with a thing like thee – 130
What wouldst thou, child of clay, with me?

The Seven Spirits

Earth, ocean, air, night, mountains, winds, thy star,
Are at thy beck and bidding, child of clay!
Before thee at thy quest their spirits are –
What wouldst thou with us, son of mortals? Say! 135

MANFRED. Forgetfulness –

FIRST SPIRIT. Of what, of whom, and why?

MANFRED. Of that which is within me; read it there –

Ye know it, and I cannot utter it.

SPIRIT. We can but give thee that which we possess.

Ask of us subjects, sovereignty, the power 140

O'er earth, the whole or portion, or a sign

Which shall control the elements whereof

We are the dominators, each and all –

These shall be thine.

MANFRED. Oblivion, self-oblivion –

Can ye not wring from out the hidden realms 145

Ye offer so profusely what I ask?

SPIRIT. It is not in our essence, in our skill;

But – thou mayst die.

MANFRED. Will death bestow it on me?

SPIRIT. We are immortal and do not forget;

We are eternal and to us the past 150

Is, as the future, present. Art thou answered?

MANFRED. Ye mock me – but the power which brought ye here

Hath made you mine. Slaves, scoff not at my will!

The mind, the spirit, the Promethean spark,

The lightning of my being, is as bright, 155

Pervading, and far-darting as your own –

And shall not yield to yours, though cooped in clay!

Answer, or I will teach ye what I am.

SPIRIT. We answer as we answered; our reply

Is even in thine own words.

MANFRED. Why say ye so? 160

SPIRIT. If, as thou say'st, thine essence be as ours,

We have replied in telling thee, the thing

Mortals call death hath nought to do with us.

MANFRED. I then have called ye from your realms in vain;

Ye cannot, or ye will not, aid me.

SPIRIT. Say; 165

What we possess we offer, it is thine.

Bethink ere thou dismiss us, ask again;
Kingdom, and sway, and strength, and length of days –
MANFRED. Accursed! What have I to do with days?
They are too long already. Hence! Begone! 170
SPIRIT. Yet pause. Being here, our will would do thee service;
Bethink thee, is there then no other gift
Which we can make not worthless in thine eyes?
MANFRED. No, none – yet stay one moment ere we part,
I would behold ye face to face.²² I hear 175
Your voices, sweet and melancholy sounds,
As music on the waters, and I see
The steady aspect of a clear large star –
But nothing more. Approach me as ye are,
Or one, or all, in your accustomed forms. 180
SPIRIT. We have no forms beyond the elements
Of which we are the mind and principle.
But choose a form – in that we will appear.
MANFRED. I have no choice; there is no form on earth
Hideous or beautiful to me. Let him 185
Who is most powerful of ye, take such aspect
As unto him may seem most fitting. Come!

SEVENTH SPIRIT (appearing in the shape of a beautiful female figure).²³

Behold!
MANFRED. Oh God! If it be thus, and thou
Art not a madness and a mockery,
I yet might be most happy. I will clasp thee, 190
And we again will be – (the figure vanishes)
My heart is crushed!

Manfred falls senseless. A voice is heard in the incantation²⁴ which follows.

When the moon is on the wave
And the glow-worm in the grass,
And the meteor on the grave

And the wisp on the morass,²⁵ 195
When the falling stars are shooting
And the answered owls are hooting,
And the silent leaves are still
In the shadow of the hill,
Shall my soul be upon thine 200
With a power and with a sign.

Though thy slumber may be deep
Yet thy spirit shall not sleep;
There are shades which will not vanish,
There are thoughts thou canst not banish; 205
By a power to thee unknown
Thou canst never be alone;
Thou art wrapped as with a shroud,
Thou art gathered in a cloud –
And forever shalt thou dwell 210
In the spirit of this spell.

Though thou seest me not pass by,
Thou shalt feel me with thine eye
As a thing that, though unseen,
Must be near thee, and hath been; 215
And when in that secret dread
Thou hast turned around thy head,
Thou shalt marvel I am not
As thy shadow on the spot,
And the power which thou dost feel 220
Shall be what thou must conceal.

And a magic voice and verse
Hath baptized thee with a curse;
And a spirit of the air
Hath begirt thee with a snare; 225
In the wind there is a voice

Shall forbid thee to rejoice;
And to thee shall night deny
All the quiet of her sky;
And the day shall have a sun 230
Which shall make thee wish it done.

From thy false tears I did distill
An essence which hath strength to kill;
From thy own heart I then did wring
The black mood in its blackest spring; 235
From thy own smile I snatched the snake,
For there it coiled as in a brake;26
From thy own lip I drew the charm
Which gave all these their chiefest harm;
In proving every poison known, 240
I found the strongest was thine own.

By thy cold breast and serpent smile,
By thy unfathomed gulfs of guile,
By that most seeming virtuous eye,
By thy shut soul's hypocrisy, 245
By the perfection of thine art
Which passed for human thine own heart,
By thy delight in others' pain,
And by thy brotherhood of Cain,27
I call upon thee, and compel 250
Thyself to be thy proper28 hell!

And on thy head I pour the vial
Which doth devote29 thee to this trial;
Nor to slumber, nor to die,
Shall be in thy destiny; 255
Though thy death shall still seem near
To thy wish, but as a fear;

Lo! the spell now works around thee
And the clankless chain hath bound thee;
O'er thy heart and brain together 260
Hath the word been passed: now wither!

Act I, Scene I

1The first scene of the play betrays its source in Goethe's Faust, which M. G. Lewis (author of The Monk (1796)) translated for Byron, aloud, in August 1816. Goethe recognized the debt, and when he read Manfred declared it 'a wonderful phenomenon'.

2*a Gothic gallery* Byron means a covered balcony designed in the Gothic manner.

3*But grief...knowledge* Ecclesiastes 1:18: 'For in much wisdom is much grief: and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow.'

4*science* knowledge, although it includes subjects which today would be described as 'science' (physics, chemistry, and so forth).

5*essayed* attempted.

6*baffled* confounded.

7*Mysterious agency!* Significantly, Byron avoids the use of the word 'God'.

8*subtler* i.e. more refined than human flesh.

9*him / Who is undying* deliberately ambiguous – calculated to permit a reference to Satan as well as God.

10 The Spirit of the air.

11 Mortal The spirit puts Manfred in his place from the start.

12 adjuration appeal.

13 The Spirit of earth.

14 Byron visited Mont Blanc with Hobhouse in late August–September 1816.

15 throne of rocks an image stemming back to Childe Harold iii 932–4, and picked up by Shelley in Mont Blanc 15–17.

16 that thundering ball i.e. the rock which starts the avalanche.

17 The glacier's...day by day an observation made by Shelley on his visit to Mont Blanc and Chamounix; see p. 1101.

18 The Spirit of water.

19 decking adorning.

20 The Spirit of fire.

21 monster in the sense of an unnatural and extraordinary phenomenon.

22 face to face Exodus 33:11: ‘And the Lord spake unto Moses face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend.’

23 The Spirit appears in the form of Astarte, but, as McGann observes, ll. 232–51 were written with Lady Byron in mind.

24 The incantation (ll. 192–261) was one of the earliest parts of Manfred to be composed, certainly by 14 August 1816, when Byron was resident at Villa Diodati in Geneva. Most of the remainder of the play was composed during Byron’s tour of the Bernese Alps the following month, and during his residence in Venice, winter 1816–17.

25 morass bog, marsh. The ‘wisp’ is a phosphorescent light seen hovering or flitting over marshy ground, supposed to be due to the spontaneous combustion of an inflammable gas (phosphuretted hydrogen) derived from decaying organic matter; popularly called Will-o’-the-wisp.

26 brake bracken.

27 Cain murdered his brother Abel, and was cast out, a fugitive and vagabond; Genesis 4:8–12. Manfred has been cursed in a similar manner to Cain. Byron was preoccupied with Cain’s story too, and dramatized it in 1821.

28 proper own.

29 devote condemn.

ACT I, SCENE II¹

*The mountain of the Jungfrau.*² Time: morning. Manfred alone upon the cliffs.

MANFRED. The spirits I have raised abandon me,
The spells which I have studied baffle me,
The remedy I recked³ of tortured me;
I lean no more on superhuman aid,
It hath no power upon the past, and for 5
The future, till the past be gulfed in darkness,
It is not of my search. My mother earth,
And thou fresh-breaking day, and you, ye mountains –
Why are ye beautiful? I cannot love ye.
And thou, the bright eye of the universe 10
That openest over all, and unto all
Art a delight – thou shin'st not on my heart.
And you, ye crags upon whose extreme edge
I stand, and on the torrent's brink beneath
Behold the tall pines dwindled as to shrubs 15
In dizziness of distance, when a leap,
A stir, a motion, even a breath would bring
My breast upon its rocky bosom's bed
To rest for ever – wherefore do I pause?
I feel the impulse, yet I do not plunge; 20
I see the peril, yet do not recede;
And my brain reels, and yet my foot is firm.
There is a power upon me which withholds
And makes it my fatality to live⁴ –
If it be life to wear within myself 25
This barrenness of spirit, and to be
My own soul's sepulchre,⁵ for I have ceased
To justify my deeds unto myself
(The last infirmity of evil).⁶ (an eagle passes) Aye,

Thou winged and cloud-cleaving minister, 30
Whose happy flight is highest into heaven,
Well may'st thou swoop so near me – I should be
Thy prey, and gorge thine eaglets. Thou art gone
Where the eye cannot follow thee, but thine
Yet pierces downward, onward, or above 35
With a pervading vision. Beautiful!
How beautiful is all this visible world,
How glorious in its action and itself!
But we who name ourselves its sovereigns, we
Half-dust, half-deity, alike unfit 40
To sink or soar,⁷ with our mixed essence make
A conflict of its elements, and breathe
The breath of degradation and of pride,
Contending with low wants and lofty will
Till our mortality predominates – 45
And men are what they name not to themselves,
And trust not to each other. (The shepherd's pipe in the distance is heard.)

Hark! the note,
The natural music of the mountain reed
(For here the patriarchal days are not
A pastoral fable) pipes in the liberal⁸ air, 50
Mixed with the sweet bells of the sauntering herd!
My soul would drink those echoes. Oh that I were
The viewless spirit of a lovely sound,
A living voice, a breathing harmony,
A bodiless enjoyment, born and dying 55
With the blessed tone which made me!

Enter from below a Chamois Hunter

CHAMOIS HUNTER. Even so
This way the chamois⁹ leapt. Her nimble feet
Have baffled me; my gains today will scarce
Repay my breakneck travail. What is here

Who seems not of my trade, and yet hath reached 60
A height which none even of our mountaineers,
Save our best hunters, may attain? His garb
Is goodly, his mien manly, and his air
Proud as a freeborn peasant's, at this distance.
I will approach him nearer.

MANFRED (not perceiving the other). To be thus; 65
Grey-haired with anguish like these blasted pines,
Wrecks of a single winter, barkless, branchless,
A blighted trunk upon a cursed root,
Which but supplies a feeling to decay –
And to be thus, eternally but thus, 70
Having been otherwise! Now furrowed o'er
With wrinkles; ploughed by moments, not by years;
And hours all tortured into ages – hours
Which I outlive! Ye toppling crags of ice,
Ye avalanches whom a breath draws down 75
In mountainous o'erwhelming, come and crush me!
I hear ye momentarily above, beneath,
Crash with a frequent conflict, but ye pass
And only fall on things which still would live –
On the young flourishing forest, or the hut 80
And hamlet of the harmless villager.

CHAMOIS HUNTER. The mists begin to rise from up the valley;
I'll warn him to descend, or he may chance
To lose at once his way and life together.

MANFRED. The mists boil up around the glaciers; clouds 85
Rise curling fast beneath me, white and sulphury
Like foam from the roused ocean of deep hell
Whose every wave breaks on a living shore,
Heaped with the damned like pebbles. 10 I am giddy.

CHAMOIS HUNTER. I must approach him cautiously; if near, 90
A sudden step will startle him, and he Seems tottering already.

MANFRED. Mountains have fallen,

Leaving a gap in the clouds, and with the shock
Rocking their Alpine brethren, filling up
The ripe green valleys with destruction's splinters, 95
Damming the rivers with a sudden dash
Which crushed the waters into mist and made
Their fountains find another channel – thus,
Thus in its old age, did Mount Rosenberg;¹¹
Why stood I not beneath it?

CHAMOIS HUNTER. Friend, have a care, 100

Your next step may be fatal! For the love
Of him who made you, stand not on that brink!

MANFRED (not hearing him). Such would have been for me a fitting tomb;

My bones had then been quiet in their depth;
They had not then been strewn upon the rocks 105
For the wind's pastime, as thus – thus they shall be,
In this one plunge. Farewell, ye opening heavens!
Look not upon me thus reproachfully,
Ye were not meant for me. Earth, take these atoms!

As Manfred is in act to spring from the cliff, the Chamois Hunter seizes and retains him with a sudden grasp.

CHAMOIS HUNTER. Hold, madman! Though weary of thy life, 110

Stain not our pure vales with thy guilty¹² blood!
Away with me – I will not quit my hold.

MANFRED. I am most sick at heart – nay, grasp me not,
I am all feebleness; the mountains whirl
Spinning around me – I grow blind. What art thou? 115

CHAMOIS HUNTER. I'll answer that anon. Away with me;

The clouds grow thicker – there, now lean on me;
Place your foot here – here, take this staff, and cling
A moment to that shrub. Now give me your hand
And hold fast by my girdle¹³ – softly, well. 120
The chalet will be gained within an hour;
Come on, we'll quickly find a surer footing

And something like a pathway, which the torrent
Hath washed since winter. Come, 'tis bravely done –
You should have been a hunter! Follow me. 125
As they descend the rocks with difficulty, the scene closes.

Act I, Scene II

1As McGann notes, this scene reworks that of Prometheus bound on the rock of the Caucasus in Aeschylus' Prometheus Bound.

2Byron first saw the mountain of the Jungfrau 23 September 1816 (Marchand v 101–2).

3*recked* thought.

4*my fatality to live* a clever paradox that echoes Hamlet, who mentions the 'calamity of so long life' (Hamlet III i 68).

5*My own soul's sepulchre* cf. Milton's Samson Agonistes 102: 'Myself, my sepulchre, a moving grave.'

6*The last infirmity of evil* an echo of Lycidas 71, in which fame is 'That last infirmity of noble mind'.

7*How beautiful...sink or soar* There is a general recollection here of Hamlet's famous speech, Hamlet II ii 293–310.

8*liberal* abundant.

9*chamois* antelope found in the highest parts of the Alps.

10 The mists...pebbles Typically, Manfred sees everything in terms that reflect his sense of his own damnation.

11 On 2 September 1806 part of Mt Rossberg fell and buried four villages.

12 guilty i.e. guilty of suicide; but there is an irony, because Manfred is guilty of other sins of which the Chamois Hunter knows nothing.

13 girdle belt.

ACT II, SCENE I

A cottage amongst the Bernese Alps. 1 Manfred and the Chamois Hunter.

CHAMOIS HUNTER. No, no – yet pause, thou must not yet go forth;
Thy mind and body are alike unfit
To trust each other for some hours, at least.
When thou art better, I will be thy guide –
But whither?

MANFRED. It imports not. I do know
My route full well, and need no further guidance.

CHAMOIS HUNTER. Thy garb and gait bespeak thee of high lineage –
One of the many chiefs, whose castled crags
Look o'er the lower valleys. Which of these
May call thee lord? I only know their portals; 2 10
My way of life leads me but rarely down
To bask by the huge hearths of those old halls,
Carousing with the vassals; but the paths
Which step from out our mountains to their doors
I know from childhood – which of these is thine? 15

MANFRED. No matter.

CHAMOIS HUNTER. Well sir, pardon me the question,
And be of better cheer. Come taste my wine,
'Tis of an ancient vintage – many a day
'T has thawed my veins among our glaciers; now
Let it do thus for thine. Come, pledge 3 me fairly. 20

MANFRED. Away, away! There's blood upon the brim!
Will it then never, never sink in the earth?

CHAMOIS HUNTER. What dost thou mean? Thy senses wander from thee.

MANFRED. I say 'tis blood – my blood! The pure warm stream

Which ran in the veins of my fathers, and in ours 25
When we were in our youth, and had one heart,
And loved each other as we should not love,
And this was shed.⁴ But still it rises up,
Colouring the clouds that shut me out from heaven,
Where thou art not, and I shall never be. 30

CHAMOIS HUNTER. Man of strange words and some half-maddening sin

Which makes thee people vacancy, whate'er
Thy dread and sufferance be, there's comfort yet –
The aid of holy men, and heavenly patience –

MANFRED. Patience and patience hence! That word was made 35
For brutes of burden, not for birds of prey;
Preach it to mortals of a dust like thine,
I am not of thine order.

CHAMOIS HUNTER. Thanks to heaven!
I would not be of thine for the free fame
Of William Tell! But whatsoe'er thine ill, 40
It must be borne, and these wild starts are useless.

MANFRED. Do I not bear it? Look on me – I live.

CHAMOIS HUNTER. This is convulsion, and no healthful life.

MANFRED. I tell thee, man! I have lived many years,
Many long years, but they are nothing now 45
To those which I must number: ages, ages,
Space and eternity – and consciousness
With the fierce thirst of death – and still unslaked!

CHAMOIS HUNTER. Why, on thy brow the seal of middle age
Hath scarce been set; I am thine elder far. 50

MANFRED. Think'st thou existence doth depend on time?
It doth, but actions are our epochs. Mine
Have made my days and nights imperishable,
Endless, and all alike as sands on the shore,
Innumerable atoms, and one desert, 55
Barren and cold, on which the wild waves break
But nothing rests save carcasses and wrecks,

Rocks, and salt-surf weeds of bitterness.

CHAMOIS HUNTER. Alas, he's mad – but yet I must not leave him.

MANFRED. I would I were, for then the things I see 60

Would be but a distempered dream.

CHAMOIS HUNTER. What is it

That thou dost see, or think thou look'st upon?

MANFRED. Myself and thee, a peasant of the Alps;

Thy humble virtues, hospitable home

And spirit patient, pious, proud and free; 65

Thy self-respect, grafted on innocent thoughts;

Thy days of health and nights of sleep; thy toils

By danger dignified, yet guiltless; hopes

Of cheerful old age and a quiet grave

With cross and garland over its green turf, 70

And thy grandchildren's love for epitaph –

This do I see, and then I look within –

It matters not; my soul was scorched already.

CHAMOIS HUNTER. And would'st thou then exchange thy lot for mine?

MANFRED. No, friend! I would not wrong thee, nor exchange 75

My lot with living being. I can bear –

However wretchedly, 'tis still to bear –

In life what others could not brook⁵ to dream,

But perish in their slumber.

CHAMOIS HUNTER. And with this,

This cautious feeling for another's pain, 80

Canst thou be black with evil? Say not so.

Can one of gentle thoughts have wreaked revenge

Upon his enemies?

MANFRED. Oh no, no, no!

My injuries came down on those who loved me,

On those whom I best loved. I never quelled 85

An enemy, save in my just defence,

My wrongs were all on those I should have cherished,

But my embrace was fatal.

CHAMOIS HUNTER. Heaven give thee rest,
And penitence restore thee to thyself;
My prayers shall be for thee.

MANFRED. I need them not, 90
But can endure thy pity. I depart;
'Tis time, farewell! Here's gold, and thanks for thee –
No words, it is thy due. Follow me not.
I know my path, the mountain peril's past –
And once again I charge thee, follow not! 95
Exit Manfred.

Act II, Scene I

1 Byron toured the Bernese Alps with Hobhouse, 17–29 September 1816.

2 portals gateways.

3 pledge toast.

4 The pure warm stream...shed The archetypal model of Manfred's sins is again Cain, who killed his brother Abel.

5 brook endure.

ACT II, SCENE II

A lower valley in the Alps. A cataract. Enter Manfred.

It is not noon. The sunbow's rays still arch
The torrent with the many hues of heaven,1
And roll the sheeted silver's waving column
O'er the crag's headlong perpendicular,
And fling its lines of foaming light along, 5
And to and fro, like the pale courser's tail,
The giant steed to be bestrode by death,

As told in the Apocalypse.² No eyes
But mine now drink this sight of loveliness;

I should be sole³ in this sweet solitude, 10
And with the spirit of the place divide

The homage of these waters. I will call her.⁴

Manfred takes some of the water into the palm of his hand, and flings it in the air, muttering the adjuration. After a pause, the Witch of the Alps rises beneath the arch of the sunbow of the torrent.

Beautiful spirit, with thy hair of light
And dazzling eyes of glory, in whose form
The charms of earth's least mortal daughters grow 15

To an unearthly stature in an essence
Of purer elements, while the hues of youth –
Carnationed like a sleeping infant's cheek,
Rocked by the beating of her mother's heart,
Or the rose tints, which summer's twilight leaves 20

Upon the lofty glacier's virgin snow,
The blush of earth embracing with her heaven –
Tinge thy celestial aspect, and make tame
The beauties of the sunbow which bends o'er thee;
Beautiful spirit, in thy calm clear brow 25

Wherein is glassed⁵ serenity of soul,
Which of itself shows immortality,
I read that thou wilt pardon to a son

Of earth, whom the abstruser⁶ powers permit
At times to commune with them, if that he 30
Avail him of his spells, to call thee thus
And gaze on thee a moment.

WITCH. Son of earth!

I know thee and the powers which give thee power;
I know thee for a man of many thoughts
And deeds of good and ill (extreme in both), 35
Fatal and fated in thy sufferings.

I have expected this – what wouldst thou with me?
MANFRED. To look upon thy beauty, nothing further.
The face of the earth hath maddened me, and I
Take refuge in her mysteries, and pierce 40
To the abodes of those who govern her,
But they can nothing aid me. I have sought
From them what they could not bestow, and now
I search no further.

WITCH. What could be the quest
Which is not in the power of the most powerful, 45
The rulers of the invisible?

MANFRED. A boon –

But why should I repeat it? 'Twere in vain.

WITCH. I know not that; let thy lips utter it.

MANFRED. Well, though it torture me, 'tis but the same;
My pang shall find a voice. From my youth upwards 50
My spirit walked not with the souls of men,
Nor looked upon the earth with human eyes;
The thirst of their ambition was not mine,
The aim of their existence was not mine;
My joys, my griefs, my passions and my powers 55
Made me a stranger; though I wore the form,
I had no sympathy with breathing flesh,
Nor midst the creatures of clay that girded me
Was there but one⁷ who – but of her anon.
I said, with men, and with the thoughts of men 60
I held but slight communion, but instead
My joy was in the wilderness – to breathe
The difficult air of the iced mountain's top
Where the birds dare not build, nor insect's wing
Flit o'er the herbless granite; or to plunge 65
Into the torrent, and to roll along
On the swift whirl of the new-breaking wave
Of river-stream or ocean in their flow.
In these my early strength exulted – or

To follow through the night the moving moon,⁸ 70
The stars and their development; or catch
The dazzling lightnings till my eyes grew dim;
Or to look, list'ning, on the scattered leaves
While autumn winds were at their evening song.
These were my pastimes, and to be alone; 75
For if the beings of whom I was one
(Hating to be so) crossed me in my path,
I felt myself degraded back to them
And was all clay again. And then I dived
In my lone wanderings to the caves of death, 80
Searching its cause in its effect, and drew
From withered bones and skulls and heaped-up dust
Conclusions most forbidden.⁹ Then I passed
The nights of years in sciences untaught,
Save in the old time, and with time and toil 85
And terrible ordeal, and such penance
As in itself hath power upon the air,
And spirits that do compass air and earth,
Space and the peopled infinite, I made
Mine eyes familiar with eternity, 90
Such as, before me, did the Magi¹⁰ and
He¹¹ who from out their fountain dwellings raised
Eros and Anteros at Gadara,
As I do thee. And with my knowledge grew
The thirst of knowledge, and the power and joy 95
Of this most bright intelligence, until –

WITCH. Proceed.

MANFRED. Oh, I but thus prolonged my words,
Boasting these idle attributes,¹² because,
As I approach the core of my heart's grief –
But to my task. I have not named to thee 100
Father or mother, mistress, friend or being
With whom I wore the chain of human ties;

If I had such, they seemed not such to me.

Yet there was one¹³ –

WITCH. Spare not thyself; proceed.

MANFRED. She was like me in lineaments – her eyes, 105

Her hair, her features, all, to the very tone
Even of her voice, they said were like to mine,
But softened all and tempered into beauty.
She had the same lone thoughts and wanderings,
The quest of hidden knowledge, and a mind 110
To comprehend the universe – nor these
Alone, but with them gentler powers than mine:
Pity and smiles and tears (which I had not)
And tenderness (but that I had for her),
Humility (and that I never had). 115
Her faults were mine; her virtues were her own –
I loved her, and destroyed her!

WITCH. With thy hand?

MANFRED. Not with my hand, but heart – which broke her heart:

It gazed on mine and withered. I have shed
Blood, but not hers, and yet her blood was shed – 120
I saw and could not staunch it.

WITCH. And for this,

A being of the race thou dost despise,
The order which thine own would rise above,
Mingling with us and ours, thou dost forego
The gifts of our great knowledge, and shrink'st back 125
To recreant mortality? Away!

MANFRED. Daughter of air, I tell thee, since that hour –

But words are breath; look on me in my sleep
Or watch my watchings – come and sit by me!
My solitude is solitude no more, 130

But peopled with the Furies;¹⁴ I have gnashed
My teeth in darkness till returning morn,
Then cursed myself till sunset; I have prayed
For madness as a blessing – 'tis denied me;

I have affronted death, but in the war 135
Of elements the waters shrunk from me,
And fatal things passed harmless – the cold hand
Of an all-pitiless demon held me back,
Back by a single hair which would not break.
In fantasy, imagination, all 140
The affluence of my soul (which one day was
A Croesus in creation),¹⁵ I plunged deep,
But like an ebbing wave, it dashed me back
Into the gulf of my unfathomed thought.
I plunged amidst mankind; forgetfulness 145
I sought in all save where 'tis to be found,
And that I have to learn; my sciences,
My long-pursued and superhuman art
Is mortal here. I dwell in my despair
And live – and live for ever.

WITCH. It may be 150
That I can aid thee.

MANFRED. To do this thy power
Must wake the dead, or lay me low with them.
Do so, in any shape, in any hour,
With any torture – so it be the last.

WITCH. That is not in my province, but if thou 155
Wilt swear obedience to my will and do
My bidding, it may help thee to thy wishes.

MANFRED. I will not swear!¹⁶ Obey? And whom? The spirits
Whose presence I command – and be the slave
Of those who served me? Never!

WITCH. Is this all? 160
Hast thou no gentler answer? Yet bethink thee,
And pause ere thou rejectest.

MANFRED. I have said it.

WITCH. Enough! I may retire then – say!

MANFRED. Retire!

The Witch disappears.

MANFRED (alone). We are the fools of time and terror. Days
Steal on us and steal from us, yet we live, 165
Loathing our life, and dreading still to die.
In all the days of this detested yoke
(This heaving burden, this accursed breath,
This vital weight upon the struggling heart
Which sinks with sorrow or beats quick with pain, 170
Or joy that ends in agony or faintness);
In all the days of past and future – for
In life there is no present – we can number
How few, how less than few, wherein the soul
Forbears to pant for death and yet draws back 175
As from a stream in winter, though the chill
Be but a moment's. I have one resource
Still in my science; I can call the dead
And ask them what it is we dread to be.
The sternest answer can but be the grave, 180
And that is nothing; if they answer not...
The buried prophet answered to the hag
Of Endor,¹⁷ and the Spartan monarch drew
From the Byzantine maid's unsleeping spirit
An answer and his destiny – he slew 185
That which he loved, unknowing what he slew,
And died unpardoned, though he called in aid
The Phyxian Jove, and in Phigalia roused
The Arcadian evocators¹⁸ to compel
The indignant shadow¹⁹ to depose²⁰ her wrath 190
Or fix her term of vengeance; she replied
In words of dubious import, but fulfilled.²¹
If I had never lived, that which I love
Had still been living; had I never loved,
That which I loved would still be beautiful, 195
Happy and giving happiness. What is she,
What is she now? A sufferer for my sins,

A thing I dare not think upon – or nothing.
Within few hours I shall not call in vain,
Yet in this hour I dread the thing I dare. 200
Until this hour I never shrunk to gaze
On spirit, good or evil; now I tremble
And feel a strange cold thaw upon my heart.
But I can act even what I most abhor
And champion human fears. The night approaches. 205

Exit

Act II, Scene II

¹‘This iris is formed by the rays of the sun over the lower part of the Alpine torrents. It is exactly like a rainbow come down to pay a visit, and so close that you may walk into it. This effect lasts until noon’ (Byron’s note). Byron described the effect in his journal sent to Augusta Leigh, 23 September 1816: ‘Before ascending the mountain went to the torrent ... again – the sun upon it forming a rainbow of the lower part of all colours – but principally purple and gold’ (Marchand v 101).

²*the Apocalypse* i.e. the Book of Revelation of St John the Divine 6:8. Lines 3–8 versify remarks made by Byron in the journal for Augusta Leigh, 22 September 1816: ‘the torrent is in shape curving over the rock – like the tail of a white horse streaming in the wind – such as it might be conceived would be that of the “pale horse” on which Death is mounted in the Apocalypse’ (Marchand v 101).

³*sole* single, alone.

⁴*her* i.e. the spirit of the place, the Witch of the Alps.

⁵*glassed* reflected.

⁶*abstruser* hidden, concealed; i.e. not perceptible to the senses.

⁷*one* i.e. Astarte, his sister.

8 the moving moon borrowed from Coleridge, The Ancient Mariner (1817) 263: ‘The moving moon went up the sky.’

9 And then I dived...forbidden Manfred’s dabbling among corpses has much in common with the researches of Victor Frankenstein in Mary Godwin’s novel, conceived at the same time as Byron’s poem, summer 1816, though not published until 1818. Byron is probably thinking, however, of Shelley’s Alastor, who ‘made my bed / In charnels and on coffins’ (ll. 23–4).

10 the Magi the ancient Persian priestly caste.

11 He ‘The philosopher Iamblicus. The story of the raising of Eros and Anteros may be found in his life, by Eunapius. It is well-told’ (Byron’s note). Iamblicus (died c.330 CE) summoned by magic Love and its opposite from fountains in Syria.

12 attributes achievements.

13 one Astarte.

14 Furies avenging agents of the gods.

15 A Croesus in creation i.e. endlessly creative. Croesus was the last king of Lydia, of fabulous wealth; Byron may be recalling the legend that when Croesus met Solon, Solon distinguished between the imagined happiness of being Croesus and the genuine happiness of being dead.

16 Manfred’s defiance of the supernatural powers is a distinctively Byronic departure from the Faust legend.

17 Samuel was raised from the dead by the Witch of Endor, 1 Samuel 28:7.

18 evocators those who invoke spirits.

19 shadow ghost.

20 depose lay aside.

21 ‘The story of Pausanias, King of Sparta (who commanded the Greeks in the Battle of Plataea, and afterwards perished for an attempt to betray the Lacedemonians), and Cleonice, is told in Plutarch’s life of Cimon, and in the Laconics of Pausanias the Sophist, in his description of Greece’ (Byron’s note).

ACT II, SCENE III

The summit of the Jungfrau mountain. Enter First Destiny.

The moon is rising broad and round and bright,
And here on snows where never human foot
Of common mortal trod,¹ we nightly tread
And leave no traces. O’er the savage sea,
The glassy ocean of the mountain ice, 5
We skim its rugged breakers, which put on
The aspect of a tumbling tempest’s foam,
Frozen in a moment – a dead whirlpool’s image;
And this most steep fantastic pinnacle,
The fretwork² of some earthquake where the clouds 10
Pause to repose themselves in passing by,
Is sacred to our revels or our vigils.
Here do I wait my sisters, on our way
To the Hall of Arimanes, for tonight
Is our great festival. ’Tis strange they come not. 15

A VOICE WITHOUT, SINGING

The captive usurper³
Hurl’d down from the throne,⁴
Lay buried in torpor,
Forgotten and lone;
I broke through his slumbers, 20

I shivered⁵ his chain,
I leagued him with numbers⁶ –
He's tyrant again!⁷
With the blood of a million he'll answer my care,
With a nation's destruction, his flight and despair. 25

SECOND VOICE WITHOUT

The ship sailed on, the ship sailed fast,
But I left not a sail, and I left not a mast;
There is not a plank of the hull or the deck,
And there is not a wretch to lament o'er his wreck,
Save one whom I held, as he swam, by the hair, 30
And he was a subject well worthy my care –
A traitor on land and a pirate at sea –
But I saved him to wreak further havoc for me!

FIRST DESTINY (answering)

The city lies sleeping;
The morn, to deplore it, 35
May dawn on it weeping;
Sullenly, slowly,
The black plague flew o'er it –
Thousands lie lowly;
Tens of thousands shall perish; 40
The living shall fly from
The sick they should cherish,
But nothing can vanquish
The touch that they die from.
Sorrow and anguish 45
And evil and dread
Envelop a nation;
The blessed are the dead
Who see not the sight
Of their own desolation. 50
This work of a night,

This wreck of a realm, this deed of my doing –
For ages I've done and shall still be renewing!

Enter the Second and Third Destinies

THE THREE

Our hands contain the hearts of men,
Our footsteps are their graves; 55
We only give to take again
The spirits of our slaves!

FIRST DESTINY. Welcome! Where's Nemesis?

SECOND DESTINY. At some great work,
But what I know not, for my hands were full.

THIRD DESTINY. Behold, she cometh.

Enter Nemesis

FIRST DESTINY. Say, where hast thou been? 60
My sisters and myself are slow tonight.

NEMESIS. I was detained repairing shattered thrones,⁸

Marrying fools,⁹ restoring dynasties,
Avenging men upon their enemies,
And making them repent their own revenge; 65
Goading the wise to madness, from the dull

Shaping out oracles¹⁰ to rule the world

Afresh – for they were waxing¹¹ out of date
And mortals dared to ponder for themselves,

To weigh kings in the balance,¹² and to speak 70

Of freedom, the forbidden fruit.¹³ Away!

We have outstayed the hour; mount we our clouds!

Exeunt

Act II, Scene III

¹The Jungfrau had been scaled in 1811.

²*fretwork* figurative; usually refers to carved, decorative woodwork.

3 The captive usurper Napoleon Bonaparte who, at the time of writing, was in exile on St Helena. These lines should be read in the light of Byron's meditation on Napoleon, Childe Harold iii, stanzas 36–42.

4 Hurled down from the throne Napoleon crowned himself Emperor in 1804, and abdicated in 1814. He was 'hurled down' when the combined might of the allies defeated him at Waterloo, 1815.

5 shivered shattered.

6 numbers i.e. of soldiers.

7 The Spirit prophesies the return of Napoleon from St Helena. It was not to happen.

8 I was detained repairing shattered thrones Byron has in mind the Treaty of Vienna in 1815, following the restoration to power of the monarchies of Spain and France.

9 Marrying fools perhaps a sardonic reference to Byron's own marriage to Annabella Milbanke, which had resulted in acrimonious separation and Byron's exile from England.

10 oracles effectively, prophets and priests, empowered to utter the will of God. Byron may have in mind Joanna Southcott (1750–1814), who claimed to be pregnant by the Holy Ghost, with Shiloh, the saviour of the world. After her death the 'pregnancy' was diagnosed as dropsy.

11 waxing growing.

12 To weigh kings in the balance Daniel 5:27: 'Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting.'

13 Nemesis is effectively an anti-Revolutionary force.

ACT II, SCENE IV

The Hall of Arimanes,¹ Arimanes on his throne, a globe of fire, surrounded by the spirits Hymn of the Spirits

Hail to our master, Prince of earth and air!
Who walks the clouds and waters – in his hand
The sceptre of the elements, which tear
Themselves to chaos at his high command!
He breatheth, and a tempest shakes the sea; 5
He speaketh, and the clouds reply in thunder;
He gazeth – from his glance the sunbeams flee;
He moveth – earthquakes rend the world asunder.
Beneath his footsteps the volcanoes rise;
His shadow is the pestilence, his path 10
The comets herald through the crackling skies,
And planets turn to ashes at his wrath.
To him war offers daily sacrifice,
To him death pays his tribute; life is his,
With all its infinite of agonies, 15
And his the spirit of whatever is!

Enter the Destinies and Nemesis

FIRST DESTINY. Glory to Arimanes! On the earth
His power increaseth; both my sisters did
His bidding, nor did I neglect my duty.
SECOND DESTINY. Glory to Arimanes! We who bow 20
The necks of men, bow down before his throne.
THIRD DESTINY. Glory to Arimanes! We await
His nod.
NEMESIS. Sovereign of Sovereigns! We are thine,
And all that liveth, more or less, is ours,
And most things wholly so; still to increase 25
Our power increasing thine, demands our care,
And we are vigilant. Thy late commands
Have been fulfilled to the utmost.

Enter Manfred

A SPIRIT What is here?

A mortal? Thou most rash and fatal wretch,
Bow down and worship!

SECOND SPIRIT. I do know the man, 30

A Magian² of great power and fearful skill.

THIRD SPIRIT. Bow down and worship, slave! What, know'st thou not Thine and our sovereign? Tremble, and obey!

ALL THE SPIRITS. Prostrate thyself and thy condemned clay,
Child of the earth, or dread the worst!

MANFRED. I know it, 35

And yet ye see I kneel not.

FOURTH SPIRIT. 'Twill be taught thee.

MANFRED. 'Tis taught already; many a night on the earth,
On the bare ground have I bowed down my face

And strewed my head with ashes.³ I have known

The fullness of humiliation, for 40

I sunk before my vain despair, and knelt

To my own desolation.

FIFTH SPIRIT. Dost thou dare

Refuse to Arimanes on his throne

What the whole earth accords, beholding not

The terror of his glory? Crouch, I say! 45

MANFRED. Bid him bow down to that which is above him,

The overruling Infinite, the Maker

Who made him not for worship; let him kneel,

And we will kneel together.

THE SPIRITS. Crush the worm!

Tear him in pieces!

FIRST DESTINY. Hence! Avaunt! He's mine. 50

Prince of the powers invisible! This man

Is of no common order, as his port⁴

And presence here denote. His sufferings

Have been of an immortal nature like

Our own; his knowledge and his powers and will, 55

As far as is compatible with clay

(Which clogs the ethereal essence), have been such
As clay hath seldom borne; his aspirations
Have been beyond the dwellers of the earth,
And they have only taught him what we know – 60
That knowledge is not happiness, and science
But an exchange of ignorance for that
Which is another kind of ignorance.
This is not all. The passions, attributes
Of earth and heaven, from which no power nor being 65
Nor breath from the worm upwards is exempt,
Have pierced his heart, and in their consequence
Made him a thing which I, who pity not,
Yet pardon those who pity. He is mine,
And thine, it may be; be it so or not, 70
No other spirit in this region hath
A soul like his – or power upon his soul.

NEMESIS. What doth he here then?

FIRST DESTINY. Let him answer that.

MANFRED. Ye know what I have known, and without power
I could not be amongst ye; but there are 75
Powers deeper still beyond. I come in quest
Of such, to answer unto what I seek.

NEMESIS. What wouldst thou?

MANFRED. Thou canst not reply to me.

Call up the dead – my question is for them.

NEMESIS. Great Arimanes, doth thy will avouch 80
The wishes of this mortal?

ARIMANES. Yea.

NEMESIS. Whom would'st thou
Uncharnel? ⁵

MANFRED. One without a tomb. Call up
Astarte.

NEMESIS.

Shadow or spirit,

Whatever thou art, 85

Which still doth inherit
The whole or a part
Of the form of thy birth,
Of the mould of thy clay
Which returned to the earth, 90
Reappear to the day!
Bear what thou borest,
The heart and the form,
And the aspect thou worest
Redeem from the worm. 95
Appear! Appear! Appear!
Who sent thee there requires thee here!

The phantom of Astarte rises and stands in the midst.

MANFRED. Can this be death? There's bloom upon her cheek,
But now I see it is no living hue
But a strange hectic,⁶ like the unnatural red 100
Which autumn plants upon the perished leaf.
It is the same! Oh God, that I should dread
To look upon the same – Astarte! No,
I cannot speak to her; but bid her speak –
Forgive me or condemn me. 105

NEMESIS.

By the power which hath broken
The grave which enthralled⁷ thee,
Speak to him who hath spoken,
Or those who have called thee!

MANFRED. She is silent, 110

And in that silence I am more than answered.

NEMESIS. My power extends no further. Prince of air!

It rests with thee alone; command her voice.

ARIMANES. Spirit – obey this sceptre!

NEMESIS. Silent still!

She is not of our order, but belongs 115

To the other powers. Mortal, thy quest is vain,

And we are baffled⁸ also.

MANFRED. Hear me, hear me –
Astarte, my beloved, speak to me!
I have so much endured, so much endure –
Look on me! The grave hath not changed thee more 120
Than I am changed for thee. Thou lovedst me
Too much, as I loved thee; we were not made
To torture thus each other, though it were
The deadliest sin to love as we have loved.
Say that thou loath'st me not, that I do bear 125
This punishment for both, that thou wilt be
One of the blessed, and that I shall die,
For hitherto all hateful things conspire
To bind me in existence, in a life
Which makes me shrink from immortality – 130
A future like the past. I cannot rest.
I know not what I ask nor what I seek;
I feel but what thou art and what I am,
And I would hear yet once before I perish
The voice which was my music: speak to me! 135
For I have called on thee in the still night,
Startled the slumbering birds from the hushed boughs,
And woke the mountain wolves, and made the caves
Acquainted with thy vainly-echoed name,
Which answered me – many things answered me, 140
Spirits and men, but thou wert silent all.
Yet speak to me! I have outwatched the stars
And gazed o'er heaven in vain in search of thee.
Speak to me! I have wandered o'er the earth
And never found thy likeness – speak to me! 145
Look on the fiends around; they feel for me.
I fear them not, and feel for thee alone –
Speak to me, though it be in wrath, but say –
I reckon⁹ not what – but let me hear thee once –
This once – once more!

PHANTOM OF ASTARTE. Manfred!

MANFRED. Say on, say on; 150

I live but in the sound – it is thy voice!

PHANTOM OF ASTARTE. Manfred! Tomorrow ends thine earthly ills.
Farewell!

MANFRED. Yet one word more: am I forgiven?

PHANTOM OF ASTARTE. Farewell!

MANFRED. Say, shall we meet again?

PHANTOM OF ASTARTE. Farewell!

MANFRED. One word for mercy; say thou lovest me. 155

PHANTOM OF ASTARTE. Manfred!

The spirit of Astarte disappears.

NEMESIS. She's gone and will not be recalled;

Her words will be fulfilled. Return to the earth.

A SPIRIT. He is convulsed; this is to be a mortal

And seek the things beyond mortality.

ANOTHER SPIRIT. Yet see, he mastereth himself and makes 160

His torture tributary to his will;

Had he been one of us, he would have made

An awful ¹⁰ spirit.

NEMESIS. Hast thou further question

Of our great sovereign or his worshippers?

MANFRED. None.

NEMESIS. Then for a time farewell.

MANFRED. We meet then – 165

Where? On the earth?

NEMESIS. That will be seen hereafter.

MANFRED. Even as thou wilt; and for the grace accorded

I now depart a debtor. Fare ye well!

Exit Manfred.

Act II, Scene IV

1Arimanes derives his name from Ahriman, the principle of darkness and evil in Persian dualism.

2*Magian* magician, wizard.

3*strewed my head with ashes* an expression of grief and repentance.

4*port* bearing, deportment.

5*Uncharnel* i.e. raise from the dead. A charnel is a cemetery.

6*hectic* a flush or heightened colour on the cheek, often a symptom of fever.

7*enthralled* imprisoned.

8*baffled* defeated.

9*reck* care.

10 awful awe-inspiring.

ACT III, SCENE I

A hall in the castle of Manfred. Manfred and Herman.

MANFRED. What is the hour?

HERMAN. It wants but one till sunset,
And promises a lovely twilight.

MANFRED. Say,

Are all things so disposed of 2 in the tower
As I directed?

HERMAN. All, my lord, are ready;
Here is the key and casket.

MANFRED. It is well; 5
Thou mayst retire.

Exit Herman.

MANFRED (alone). There is a calm upon me –
Inexplicable stillness, which till now
Did not belong to what I knew of life.
If that I did not know philosophy
To be of all our vanities the motliest,³ 10
The merest⁴ word that ever fooled the ear
From out the schoolman's⁵ jargon, I should deem
The golden secret, the sought kalon,⁶ found
And seated in my soul. It will not last,
But it is well to have known it, though but once; 15
It hath enlarged my thoughts with a new sense,
And I within my tablets⁷ would note down
That there is such a feeling. Who is there?

Re-enter Herman.

HERMAN. My lord, the Abbot of St Maurice craves
To greet your presence.

Enter the Abbot of St. Maurice.

ABBOT. Peace be with Count Manfred!⁸ 20

MANFRED. Thanks, holy father; welcome to these walls!
Thy presence honours them, and blesseth those
Who dwell within them.

ABBOT. Would it were so, Count;
But I would fain confer with thee alone.

MANFRED. Herman, retire. (Exit Herman.) What would my reverend guest? 25

ABBOT. Thus, without prelude. Age and zeal, my office,
And good intent, must plead my privilege;
Our near, though not acquainted neighbourhood
May also be my herald. Rumours strange
And of unholy nature are abroad 30
And busy with thy name – a noble name
For centuries. May he who bears it now⁹
Transmit it unimpaired!

MANFRED. Proceed, I listen.

ABBOT. 'Tis said thou holdest converse with the things

Which are forbidden to the search of man; 35

That with the dwellers of the dark¹⁰ abodes,

The many evil and unheavenly spirits

Which walk the valley of the shade of death,¹¹

Thou communest. I know that with mankind,

Thy fellows in creation, thou dost rarely 40

Exchange thy thoughts, and that thy solitude

Is as an anchorite's, were it but holy.

MANFRED. And what are they who do avouch these things?

ABBOT. My pious brethren, the scared peasantry –

Even thy own vassals, who do look on thee 45

With most unquiet eyes. Thy life's in peril.

MANFRED. Take it.

ABBOT. I come to save, and not destroy.¹²

I would not pry into thy secret soul,

But if these things be sooth,¹³ there still is time

For penitence and pity: reconcile thee 50

With the true church, and through the church to heaven.

MANFRED. I hear thee. This is my reply: whate'er

I may have been, or am, doth rest between

Heaven and myself. I shall not choose a mortal

To be my mediator. Have I sinned 55

Against your ordinances?¹⁴ Prove and punish!

ABBOT. My son, I did not speak of punishment,

But penitence and pardon; with thyself

The choice of such remains. And for the last,

Our institutions and our strong belief 60

Have given me power to smooth the path from sin

To higher hope and better thoughts; the first

I leave to heaven – 'Vengeance is mine alone!'¹⁵

So saith the Lord, and with all humbleness

His servant echoes back the awful word. 65

MANFRED. Old man! There is no power in holy men,
Nor charm in prayer, nor purifying form
Of penitence, nor outward look, nor fast,
Nor agony – nor, greater than all these,
The innate tortures of that deep despair 70
Which is remorse without the fear of hell
But all in all sufficient to itself
Would make a hell of heaven, can exorcise
From out the unbounded spirit the quick¹⁶ sense
Of its own sins, wrongs, sufferance, and revenge 75
Upon itself. There is no future pang
Can deal that justice on the self-condemned
He deals on his own soul.

ABBOT. All this is well –
For this will pass away, and be succeeded
By an auspicious hope which shall look up 80
With calm assurance to that blessed place¹⁷
Which all who seek may win, whatever be
Their earthly errors, so they be atoned;¹⁸
And the commencement of atonement is
The sense of its necessity. Say on, 85
And all our church can teach thee shall be taught,
And all we can absolve thee shall be pardoned.

MANFRED. When Rome's sixth Emperor¹⁹ was near his last,
The victim of a self-inflicted wound,
To shun the torments of a public death 90
From senates once his slaves, a certain soldier,
With show of loyal pity, would have staunch'd
The gushing throat with his officious²⁰ robe;
The dying Roman thrust him back and said
(Some empire²¹ still in his expiring glance), 95
'It is too late – is this fidelity?'

ABBOT. And what of this?

MANFRED. I answer with the Roman,

'It is too late!'

ABBOT. It never can be so,
To reconcile thyself with thy own soul,
And thy own soul with heaven. Hast thou no hope? 100
'Tis strange; even those who do despair above
Yet shape themselves some fantasy on earth
To which frail twig they cling like drowning men.

MANFRED. Aye, father! I have had those earthly visions
And noble aspirations in my youth – 105
To make my own the mind of other men,
The enlightener²² of nations, and to rise
I knew not whither; it might be to fall,
But fall even as the mountain-cataract
Which, having leaped from its more dazzling height, 110
Even in the foaming strength of its abyss
(Which casts up misty columns that become Clouds raining from the reascended skies)
Lies low but mighty still. But this is passed;
My thoughts mistook themselves.

ABBOT. And wherefore so? 115

MANFRED. I could not tame my nature down; for he Must serve who fain would sway, and soothe, and sue,²³
And watch all time, and pry into all place –
And be a living lie, who would become
A mighty thing amongst the mean (and such 120
The mass are). I disdained to mingle with
A herd, though to be leader – and of wolves.
The lion is alone, and so am I.

ABBOT. And why not live and act with other men?

MANFRED. Because my nature was averse from life, 125
And yet not cruel – for I would not make,
But find a desolation. Like the wind,
The red-hot breath of the most lone simoom,²⁴
Which dwells but in the desert, and sweeps o'er
The barren sands which bear no shrubs to blast, 130

And revels o'er their wild and arid waves
And seeketh not, so that it is not sought,
But being met is deadly; such hath been
The course of my existence. But there came
Things in my path which are no more.

ABBOT. Alas, 135

I 'gin to fear that thou art past all aid
From me and from my calling; yet so young,
I still would –

MANFRED. Look on me! There is an order
Of mortals on the earth, who do become
Old in their youth, and die ere middle age 140
Without the violence of warlike death –
Some perishing of pleasure, some of study,
Some worn with toil, some of mere weariness,
Some of disease, and some insanity,
And some of withered or of broken hearts; 145
For this last is a malady which slays
More than are numbered in the lists of fate,
Taking all shapes, and bearing many names.
Look upon me! For even of all these things
Have I partaken, and of all these things 150
One were enough; then wonder not that I
Am what I am, but that I ever was,
Or, having been, that I am still on earth.

ABBOT. Yet hear me still –

MANFRED. Old man! I do respect
Thine order, and revere thine years; I deem 155
Thy purpose pious, but it is in vain.
Think me not churlish; ²⁵ I would spare thyself
Far more than me, in shunning at this time
All further colloquy ²⁶ – and so farewell.

Exit Manfred

ABBOT. This should have been a noble creature; he 160
Hath all the energy which would have made

A goodly frame of glorious elements,²⁷
Had they been wisely mingled. As it is,
It is an awful²⁸ chaos – light and darkness,
And mind and dust, and passions and pure thoughts, 165
Mixed and contending without end or order,
All dormant or destructive: he will perish,
And yet he must not. I will try once more,
For such are worth redemption, and my duty
Is to dare all things for a righteous end. 170
I'll follow him – but cautiously, though surely.
Exit Abbot

Act III, Scene I

¹This scene reworks Faust's meeting with an Old Man in Faust V i.

²*disposed of* arranged, prepared.

³*motliest* most foolish.

⁴*merest* most insignificant.

⁵*schoolman's* scholar's.

⁶*kalon* the ideal good, the morally beautiful.

⁷*tablets* research documents.

⁸An ironic greeting, given the circumstances.

⁹*he who bears it now* i.e. Manfred himself.

¹⁰*dark* means both 'lacking in light' and 'evil'.

11 the valley of the shade of death Psalm 23:4: ‘Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil.’

12 I come to save, and not destroy cf. Christ’s words at Matthew 5:17: ‘Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil.’

13 sooth true.

14 ordinances laws.

15 See Romans 12:19.

16 quick living, vital.

17 that blessed place i.e. heaven.

18 atoned reconciled (with God).

19 According to Suetonius, the sixth Roman emperor was Nero. Manfred’s use of his words is ironic because Nero’s deeds (the burning of Rome and the first major persecution of Christians) overshadow the circumstances of his death. The line quoted here was spoken to a former soldier who had turned against him.

20 officious dutiful.

21 empire i.e. some sense of his emperorship.

22 enlightener guide, teacher.

23 sue follow.

24 simoom a hot, dry, suffocating sand-wind which sweeps across the African deserts at intervals during the spring and summer.

25 churlish ungracious.

26 colloquy conversation.

27 A goodly frame of glorious elements The Abbot echoes Hamlet's description of the earth as 'this goodly frame' (II ii 298), and there is a general recollection of Hamlet's comments on man's innate nobility, II ii 303–10.

28 awful awesome.

ACT III, SCENE II

Another chamber. Manfred and Herman.

HERMAN. My Lord, you bade me wait on you at sunset:

He¹ sinks behind the mountain.

MANFRED. Doth he so?

I will look on him.

Manfred advances to the window of the hall.

Glorious orb!² The idol
Of early nature, and the vigorous race
Of undiseased mankind, the giant sons 5
Of the embrace of angels, with a sex
More beautiful than they, which did draw down
The erring spirits who can ne'er return;³
Most glorious orb, that wert a worship ere
The mystery of thy making was revealed! 10
Thou earliest minister of the Almighty,
Which gladdened on their mountain-tops the hearts
Of the Chaldean shepherds,⁴ till they poured
Themselves in orisons!⁵ Thou material god
And representative of the unknown, 15
Who chose thee for his shadow! Thou chief star,
Centre of many stars, which mak'st our earth

Endurable, and temperest the hues
And hearts of all who walk within thy rays!
Sire of the seasons! Monarch of the climes 20
And those who dwell in them (for near or far,
Our inborn spirits have a tint of thee,
Even as our outward aspects), thou dost rise
And shine and set in glory – fare thee well,
I ne'er shall see thee more! As my first glance 25
Of love and wonder was for thee, then take
My latest look: thou wilt not beam on one
To whom the gifts of life and warmth have been
Of a more fatal nature. He is gone;
I follow. 30
Exit Manfred

Act III, Scene II

1 He the sun.

2 This is a pagan address to the sun.

3 See Genesis 6:1–4.

4 the Chaldean shepherds renowned astronomers; see Childe Harold iii 118.

5 Compare Childe Harold's Pilgrimage iii stanza 91, above. orisons prayers.

ACT III, SCENE III

The mountains. The castle of Manfred at some distance. A terrace before a tower. Time: twilight. Herman, Manuel, and other dependants of Manfred.

HERMAN. 'Tis strange enough; night after night for years
He hath pursued long vigils in this tower
Without a witness. I have been within it –

So have we all been oft-times; but from it,
Or its contents, it were impossible 5
To draw conclusions absolute of aught
His studies tend to. To be sure, there is
One chamber where none enter; I would give
The fee of what I have to come these three years¹
To pore upon its mysteries.

MANUEL. 'Twere dangerous; 10

Content thyself with what thou knowest already.

HERMAN. Ah, Manuel! Thou art elderly and wise,
And could'st say much; thou hast dwelt within the castle –
How many years is't?

MANUEL. Ere Count Manfred's birth

I served his father, whom he nought resembles. 15

HERMAN. There be more sons in like predicament.

But wherein do they differ?

MANUEL. I speak not

Of features or of form, but mind and habits:
Count Sigismund was proud, but gay and free,
A warrior and a reveller; he dwelt not 20
With books and solitude, nor made the night
A gloomy vigil, but a festal time,
Merrier than day; he did not walk the rocks
And forests like a wolf, nor turn aside
From men and their delights.

HERMAN. Beshrew the hour, 25

But those were jocund times! I would that such
Would visit the old walls again; they look
As if they had forgotten them.

MANUEL. These walls

Must change their chieftain first – oh, I have seen
Some strange things in them, Herman!

HERMAN. Come, be friendly, 30

Relate me some to while away our watch;
I've heard thee darkly speak of an event

Which happened hereabouts, by this same tower.
MANUEL. That was a night indeed. I do remember
'Twas twilight, as it may be now, and such 35
Another evening; yon red cloud, which rests
On Eiger's pinnacle,² so rested then,
So like that it might be the same; the wind
Was faint and gusty, and the mountain snows
Began to glitter with the climbing moon. 40
Count Manfred was, as now, within his tower,
How occupied we knew not, but with him
The sole companion of his wanderings
And watchings – her, whom of all earthly things
That lived, the only thing he seemed to love, 45
As he indeed by blood was bound to do,
The lady Astarte, his³ –
Hush! Who comes here?

Enter the Abbot

ABBOT. Where is your master?

HERMAN. Yonder, in the tower.

ABBOT. I must speak with him.

MANUEL. 'Tis impossible.

He is most private, and must not be thus 50
Intruded on.

ABBOT. Upon myself I take

The forfeit of my fault, if fault there be;

But I must see him.

HERMAN. Thou hast seen him once

This eve already.

ABBOT. Sirrah, I command thee

Knock and apprise the Count of my approach! 55

HERMAN. We dare not.

ABBOT. Then it seems I must be herald

Of my own purpose.

MANUEL. Reverend father, stop,

I pray you pause.
ABBOT. Why so?
MANUEL. But step this way,
And I will tell you further.
Exeunt

Act III, Scene III

1 The fee of what I have to come these three years i.e. his next three years' salary.

2 Eiger's pinnacle The Eiger is a mountain, east of the Jungfrau, which Byron first saw on 22 September 1816.

3 his – This is the closest anyone in the play gets to saying that Astarte is Manfred's sister.

ACT III, SCENE IV

Interior of the tower. Manfred alone.

MANFRED. The stars are forth, the moon above the tops
Of the snow-shining mountains – beautiful!
I linger yet with nature, for the night
Hath been to me a more familiar face
Than that of man, and in her starry shade 5
Of dim and solitary loveliness
I learned the language of another world.
I do remember me that in my youth
When I was wandering, upon such a night¹
I stood within the Colosseum's wall 10
Midst the chief relics of almighty Rome;²
The trees which grew along the broken arches
Waved dark in the blue midnight, and the stars
Shone through the rents of ruin; from afar
The watchdog bayed beyond the Tiber, and 15

More near from out the Caesars' palace came
The owl's long cry, and, interruptedly,
Of distant sentinels the fitful song
Begun and died upon the gentle wind.

Some cypresses beyond the time-worn breach³ 20
Appeared to skirt the horizon, yet they stood
Within a bowshot,⁴ where the Caesars dwelt,
And dwell the tuneless birds of night; amidst
A grove which springs through levelled battlements,
And twines its roots with the imperial hearths, 25
Ivy usurps the laurel's place of growth;⁵
But the gladiators' bloody circus⁶ stands,
A noble wreck in ruinous perfection,⁷
While Caesar's chambers and the Augustan halls
Grovel on earth in indistinct decay. 30
And thou didst shine, thou rolling moon, upon
All this, and cast a wide and tender light
Which softened down the hoar austerity
Of rugged desolation, and filled up,
As 'twere, anew, the gaps of centuries, 35
Leaving that beautiful which still was so,
And making that which was not, till the place
Became religion, and the heart ran o'er
With silent worship of the great of old⁸ –
The dead but sceptred sovereigns who still rule 40
Our spirits from their urns.
'Twas such a night!
'Tis strange that I recall it at this time,
But I have found our thoughts take wildest flight
Even at the moment when they should array⁹
Themselves in pensive¹⁰ order.

Enter the Abbot

ABBOT. My good Lord! 45

I crave a second grace for this approach,
But yet let not my humble zeal offend
By its abruptness; all it hath of ill
Recoils on me. Its good in the effect
May light upon your head – could I say heart, 50
Could I touch that, with words or prayers, I should Recall a noble spirit which hath wandered
But is not yet all lost.

MANFRED. Thou know'st me not;
My days are numbered and my deeds recorded.
Retire, or 'twill be dangerous – away! 55

ABBOT. Thou dost not mean to menace me?

MANFRED. Not I;
I simply tell thee peril is at hand
And would preserve thee.

ABBOT. What dost mean?

MANFRED. Look there –
What dost thou see?

ABBOT. Nothing.

MANFRED. Look there, I say,
And steadfastly; now tell me what thou seest? 60

ABBOT. That which should shake me, but I fear it not;
I see a dusk and awful figure rise
Like an infernal god from out the earth,
His face wrapped in a mantle, and his form
Robed as with angry clouds. He stands between 65
Thyself and me, but I do fear him not.

MANFRED. Thou hast no cause; he shall not harm thee, but
His sight may shock thine old limbs into palsy. 11

I say to thee, retire!

ABBOT. And I reply
Never, till I have battled with this fiend. 70
What doth he here?

MANFRED. Why, aye, what doth he here?

I did not send for him, he is unbidden.

ABBOT. Alas, lost mortal! What with guests like these Hast thou to do? I tremble for thy sake;
Why doth he gaze on thee, and thou on him? 75
Ah! he unveils his aspect: on his brow
The thunder-scars are graven; from his eye
Glares forth the immortality of hell –
Avaunt!

MANFRED. Pronounce – what is thy mission?

SPIRIT. Come!

ABBOT. What art thou, unknown being? Answer! Speak! 80

SPIRIT. The genius¹² of this mortal. Come, 'tis time!

MANFRED. I am prepared for all things, but deny

The power which summons me. Who sent thee here?

SPIRIT. Thou'lt know anon; come, come!

MANFRED. I have commanded

Things of an essence greater far than thine, 85

And striven with thy masters. Get thee hence!

SPIRIT. Mortal, thine hour is come. Away, I say!

MANFRED. I knew, and know my hour is come, but not

To render up my soul to such as thee;

Away! I'll die as I have lived – alone. 90

SPIRIT. Then I must summon up my brethren. Rise!

Other spirits rise up

ABBOT. Avaunt, ye evil ones! Avaunt I say!

Ye have no power where piety hath power,

And I do charge ye in the name –

SPIRIT. Old man!

We know ourselves, our mission, and thine order; 95

Waste not thy holy words on idle uses,

It were in vain – this man is forfeited.

Once more I summon him: away, away!

MANFRED. I do defy ye, though I feel my soul

Is ebbing from me, yet I do defy ye; 100

Nor will I hence, while I have earthly breath

To breathe my scorn upon ye, earthly strength
To wrestle (though with spirits): what ye take
Shall be ta'en limb by limb.

SPIRIT. Reluctant mortal!

Is this the Magian who would so pervade 105
The world invisible, and make himself
Almost our equal? Can it be that thou
Art thus in love with life – the very life
Which made thee wretched?

MANFRED. Thou false fiend, thou liest!

My life is in its last hour – that I know, 110
Nor would redeem a moment of that hour;
I do not combat against death, but thee
And thy surrounding angels; my past power
Was purchased by no compact with thy crew,
But by superior science, penance, daring, 115
And length of watching, strength of mind, and skill
In knowledge of our fathers – when the earth
Saw men and spirits walking side by side,
And gave ye no supremacy. I stand
Upon my strength: I do defy, deny, 120
Spurn back, and scorn ye!

SPIRIT. But thy many crimes

Have made thee –

MANFRED. What are they to such as thee?

Must crimes be punished but by other crimes
And greater criminals? Back to thy hell!
Thou hast no power upon me, that I feel; 125
Thou never shalt possess me, that I know.
What I have done is done; I bear within
A torture which could nothing gain from thine.
The mind which is immortal makes itself
Requital for its good or evil thoughts, 13 130
Is its own origin of ill and end,
And its own place and time; its innate sense,

When stripped of this mortality, derives
No colour from the fleeting things without,
But is absorbed in sufferance or in joy, 135
Born from the knowledge of its own desert.
Thou didst not tempt me, and thou couldst not tempt me,
I have not been thy dupe nor am thy prey –
But was my own destroyer, and will be
My own hereafter. Back, ye baffled fiends, 140
The hand of death is on me – but not yours!

The demons disappear

ABBOT. Alas, how pale thou art! Thy lips are white

And thy breast heaves, and in thy gasping throat
The accents rattle; give thy prayers to heaven;
Pray, albeit but in thought – but die not thus. 145

MANFRED. 'Tis over; my dull eyes can fix thee not,
But all things swim around me, and the earth
Heaves as it were beneath me. Fare thee well;
Give me thy hand.

ABBOT. Cold, cold, even to the heart;
But yet one prayer – alas, how fares it with thee? 150

MANFRED. Old man! 'Tis not so difficult to die.

Manfred expires

ABBOT. He's gone; his soul hath ta'en its earthless flight –
Whither, I dread to think – but he is gone.

Act III, Scene IV

¹*upon such a night* There is a general recollection, throughout this speech, of the exchange between Jessica and Lorenzo, Merchant of Venice V i 1–22, which uses the repeated tag, 'In such a night ...'

²Byron first visited Rome in April 1817. This passage may have been inspired partly by Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire; Gibbon is celebrated as a freethinker at the conclusion of Childe Harold iii.

3 breach break in the old city walls.

4 Within a bowshot i.e. within about 300 yards.

5 Ivy...place of growth Ivy (a plant of death) has taken over where the laurel (a plant of victory) once grew.

6 circus oval arena.

7 A noble wreck in ruinous perfection Manfred is effectively describing himself.

8 till the place...great of old These lines prove that, even at this late stage, Manfred might still be redeemed to the cause of orthodox religion.

9 array arrange.

10 pensive meditative, reflective.

11 palsy paralysis.

12 genius guardian spirit.

13 The mind...thoughts cf. Paradise Lost i 254–5: ‘The mind is its own place, and in itself / Can make a heaven of hell, a hell of heaven.’

Letter from Lord Byron to Thomas Moore, 28 February 1817 (extract) (including ‘So we’ll go no more a-roving’)¹

I feel anxious to hear from you, even more than usual, because your last indicated that you were unwell. At present, I am on the invalid regimen myself. The Carnival – that is, the latter part of it – and sitting up late o’ nights, had knocked me up a little. But it is over, and it is now Lent, with all its abstinence and Sacred Music.

The mumming² closed with a masked ball at the Fenice,³ where I went, as also to most of the ridottos,⁴ etc., etc. And, though I did not dissipate much upon the whole, yet I find ‘the sword wearing out the scabbard’, though I have but just turned the corner of twenty-nine.

So we'll go no more a-roving
So late into the night,
Though the heart be still as loving,
And the moon be still as bright.

For the sword outwears its sheath, 5
And the soul wears out the breast,
And the heart must pause to breathe,
And love itself have rest.

Though the night was made for loving,
And the day returns too soon, 10
Yet we'll go no more a-roving
By the light of the moon.

Letter from Lord Byron to Thomas Moore

¹ This important letter was written from Venice, and presents Byron's famous poem, ‘So we'll go no more a-roving’, in the context in which it was first composed. For Moore see p. 961 n. 23.

² mumming revelries conducted behind masks.

³ the Fenice Venetian opera theatre, principal venue for the carnival, which closed on the evening of 18 February. It was destroyed by fire in summer 1996.

⁴ ridottos entertainment or social assembly consisting of music and dancing.

Don Juan (first published 1819; edited from MS)¹

Dedication (composed 3 July–6 September 1818; first published 1832)

Bob Southey! You're a poet – Poet Laureate,²
And representative of all the race;³
Although 'tis true you turned out a Tory at
Last, yours has lately been a common case;
And now, my epic renegade, what are ye at, 5
With all the Lakers⁴ in and out of place?
A nest of tuneful persons, to my eye
Like 'four and twenty blackbirds in a pie,

Which pie⁵ being opened, they began to sing'
(This old song and new simile holds good), 10
'A dainty dish to set before the King'
Or Regent,⁶ who admires such kind of food.
And Coleridge⁷ too has lately taken wing,
But like a hawk encumbered with his hood,
Explaining metaphysics to the nation;⁸ 15
I wish he would explain his explanation.

You, Bob, are rather insolent, you know,
At being disappointed in your wish
To supersede all warblers here below,
And be the only blackbird in the dish; 20
And then you overstrain yourself, or so,
And tumble downward like the flying fish
Gasping on deck, because you soar too high, Bob,
And fall for lack of moisture, quite a dry-bob!⁹

And Wordsworth, in a rather long Excursion 25
(I think the quarto holds five hundred pages),¹⁰
Has given a sample from the vasty¹¹ version
Of his new system to perplex the sages;
'Tis poetry (at least by his assertion),
And may appear so when the dog-star rages;¹² 30
And he who understands it would be able
To add a story¹³ to the Tower of Babel.¹⁴

You gentlemen, by dint of long seclusion
From better company, have kept your own
At Keswick,¹⁵ and, through still-continued fusion 35
Of one another's minds, at last have grown
To deem as a most logical conclusion
That poesy has wreaths for you alone;
There is a narrowness in such a notion
Which makes me wish you'd change your lakes for ocean. 40

I would not imitate the petty thought,
Nor coin¹⁶ my self-love to so base a vice,
For all the glory your conversion¹⁷ brought,
Since gold alone should not have been its price.
You have your salary – was't for that you wrought?¹⁸ 45
And Wordsworth has his place in the Excise.¹⁹
You're shabby fellows, true – but poets still,
And duly seated on the immortal hill.²⁰

Your bays²¹ may hide the baldness of your brows,
Perhaps some virtuous blushes (let them go); 50
To you I envy neither fruit nor boughs,
And for the fame you would engross²² below
The field is universal, and allows
Scope to all such as feel the inherent glow –
Scott, Rogers, Campbell, Moore and Crabbe²³ will try 55
'Gainst you the question with posterity.

For me who, wandering with pedestrian²⁴ muses,
Contend not with you on the winged steed,
I wish your fate may yield ye, when she chooses,
The fame you envy²⁵ and the skill you need;²⁶ 60
And recollect a poet nothing loses
In giving to his brethren their full meed
Of merit, and complaint of present days
Is not the certain path to future praise.²⁷

He that reserves his laurels for posterity 65
(Who does not often claim the bright reversion?)²⁸
Has generally no great crop²⁹ to spare it, he
Being only injured by his own assertion;
And although here and there some glorious rarity
Arise like Titan from the sea's immersion,³⁰ 70
The major part of such appellants ³¹ go
To God knows where – for no one else can know.

10

If, fallen in evil days on evil tongues,³²
Milton appealed to the avenger, Time;
If Time, the avenger, execrates his wrongs, 75
And makes the word 'Miltonic' mean 'sublime',
He deigned not to belie his soul in songs,
Nor turn his very talent to a crime;
He did not loathe the sire to laud the son,³³
But closed the tyrant-hater he begun.³⁴ 80

11

Think'st thou, could he, the blind old man,³⁵ arise
Like Samuel from the grave,³⁶ to freeze once more
The blood of monarchs with his prophecies,
Or be alive again, again all hoar
With time and trials, and those helpless eyes 85
And heartless daughters,³⁷ worn and pale and poor –
Would he adore a sultan? – he obey
The intellectual eunuch Castlereagh?³⁸

12

Cold-blooded, smooth-faced, placid miscreant!

Dabbling its sleek young hands in Erin's³⁹ gore, 90
And thus for wider carnage taught to pant,
Transferred to gorge upon a sister-shore;
The vulgarest tool that tyranny could want,
With just enough of talent, and no more,
To lengthen fetters by another fixed, 95
And offer poison long already mixed.

13

An orator of such set trash of phrase ⁴⁰
Ineffably, legitimately vile,
That even its grossest flatterers dare not praise,
Nor foes (all nations) condescend to smile; 100
Not even a sprightly blunder's spark can blaze
From that Ixion grindstone's ⁴¹ ceaseless toil,
That turns and turns, to give the world a notion
Of endless torments and perpetual motion.

14

A bungler even in its disgusting trade, 105
And botching, patching, leaving still behind
Something of which its masters are afraid,
States to be curbed⁴² and thoughts to be confined,
Conspiracy or congress⁴³ to be made,
Cobbling at manacles for all mankind – 110
A tinkering slavemaker who mends old chains,
With God and man's abhorrence for its gains.

15

If we may judge of matter by the mind,
Emasculated to the marrow, It
Hath but two objects: how to serve and bind, 115
Deeming the chain it wears even men may fit;
Eutropius⁴⁴ of its many masters – blind
To worth as freedom, wisdom as to wit –
Fearless, because no feeling dwells in ice,
Its very courage stagnates to a vice. 120

16

Where shall I turn me not to view its bonds
(For I will never feel them)? Italy,
Thy late-reviving Roman soul desponds
Beneath the lie this state-thing⁴⁵ breathed o'er thee;
Thy clanking chain and Erin's yet green wounds 125
Have voices, tongues to cry aloud for me.
Europe has slaves, allies, kings, armies still –
And Southey lives to sing them very ill.⁴⁶

17

Meantime, Sir Laureate,⁴⁷ I proceed to dedicate,
In honest, simple verse, this song to you, 130
And if in flattering strains I do not predicate,⁴⁸
'Tis that I still retain my 'buff and blue'⁴⁹
(My politics, as yet, are all to educate);
Apostasy's so fashionable too,
To keep one creed's a task grown quite herculean – 135
Is it not so, my Tory ultra-Julian?⁵⁰

Don Juan

²Southey was Poet Laureate 1813–43, a post that entailed the composition of occasional poems in honour of the King. For Byron and Shelley, this was conclusive proof, were any needed, that Southey had abandoned his early radicalism. In an unpublished Preface to Don Juan, Byron wrote that the Dedication 'may be further supposed to be produced by someone who may have a cause of aversion from the said Southey – for some personal reason – perhaps a gross calumny invented or circulated by this Pantisocratic apostle of apostasy, who is sometimes as unguarded in his assertions as atrocious in his conjectures, and feeds the cravings of his wretched vanity – disappointed in its nobler hopes, and reduced to prey upon such snatches of fame as his contributions to the Quarterly Review'. Byron's animus towards him was indeed personal: as he told Hobhouse on 11 November 1818, 'The son of a bitch on his return from Switzerland two years ago, said that Shelley and I "had formed a league of incest and practised our precepts with etc." He lied like a rascal, for they were not sisters – one being Godwin's daughter by Mary Wollstonecraft, and the other the daughter of the present Mrs Godwin by a former husband. The attack contains no allusion to the cause, but some good verses, and all political and poetical. He lied in another sense, for there was no promiscuous intercourse, my commerce being limited to the carnal knowledge of the Miss Clairmont' (Marchand vi 76). Having heard Byron read the Dedication, Shelley said of Southey that 'The poor wretch will writhe under the lash' (Jones ii 42).

³*all the race* i.e. of poets.

⁴*Lakers* i.e. Southey, Wordsworth and Coleridge, who were first lumped together as the 'Lake School' by Jeffrey (see p. 734). By this time Coleridge was resident in London rather than Cumbria.

5*pie* There may be a pun on the name of Henry James Pye (1745–1813), arch poetaster and Laureate prior to Southey.

6*Regent* George, Prince of Wales, governed as Prince Regent 1811–20, during his father’s insanity.

7As recently as 1816, Byron had given Coleridge £100 to help him through a bad patch; enmity developed because, as Byron told Murray, ‘Coleridge went about repeating Southey’s lie with pleasure’ (Marchand v 83). The lie is, of course, the rumour about the league of incest (see note 2 above).

8*Explaining metaphysics to the nation* Byron is thinking of Coleridge’s recent prose discourses, The Statesman’s Manual (1816), Biographia Literaria and Lay Sermon (1817) and The Friend (1818).

9*a dry-bob!* sex without ejaculation.

10 five hundred pages Jeffrey criticized The Excursion (1814) for its length; see p. 736 above.

11 vasty vast, enormous.

12 when the dog-star rages The star Sirius, in the constellation of the Greater Dog, the brightest of the fixed stars, has been alleged to have all kinds of bad effects when its influence rises with the sun; the joke here is that it will distort everyone’s judgement so much as to make The Excursion appear to be poetry. Cf. Pope, Epistle to Dr Arbuthnot 3–4: ‘The dog-star rages! Nay ’tis past a doubt, / All Bedlam, or Parnassus, is let out.’

13 story floor, level.

14 the Tower of Babel the cause of God’s decision to confound the language of men; Genesis 11:1–9.

15 At Keswick Only Southey lived at Keswick (as Byron well knew); Coleridge lived in London, and Wordsworth in Grasmere.

16 coin ‘fashion’, effectively, ‘convert’. The implication is that Southey’s vanity has led him to relinquish his ideals for the pittance he is paid as Laureate.

17 conversion a pun, meaning: (i) conversion of vanity to the gold Southey is paid as Laureate, and (ii) conversion from radical to Tory.

18 wrought i.e. composed poetry.

19 An unpublished note appears in the proofs: ‘Wordsworth’s place may be in the Customs; it is, I think, in that of the Excise – besides another at Lord Lonsdale’s table, where this poetical charlatan and political parasite picks up the crumbs with a hardened alacrity, the converted Jacobin having long subsided into the clownish sycophant of the worst prejudices of aristocracy.’ William Lowther, 1st Earl of Lonsdale, was Wordsworth’s patron; he procured Wordsworth’s job as Distributor of Stamps and was the dedicatee of The Excursion.

20 the immortal hill Parnassus, a mountain of Phocis (northwest of Athens), sacred to the muses.

21 bays The leaves of the bay-tree or bay-laurel were, in classical times, the symbol of poetic excellence.

22 engross monopolize. Byron was quite famous himself.

23 Scott, Rogers, Campbell, Moore and Crabbe Walter Scott, Samuel Rogers, Thomas Campbell, Thomas Moore and George Crabbe were well-known and respected poets in their day. Byron saw them as working, broadly speaking, within the neoclassical tradition stemming from Pope; as such, they were vastly preferable to the Lakers; for more on this see pp. 863–4 above.

24 pedestrian by implication, less metaphysical and more down to earth.

25 The fame you envy In the Proem to Carmen Nuptiale (1816), Southey had written: ‘There was a time when all my youthful thought / Was of the muse; and of the poet’s fame’ (ll. 1–2).

26 need i.e. lack.

27 And recollect...praise In the Proem to Carmen Nuptiale (1816), Southey wrote that Fancy had told him to walk ‘Far from the vain, the vicious, and the proud’ (l.27). Byron seems to have taken this as a reference to himself.

28 the bright reversion the right of succession (i.e. to posthumous fame).

29 no great crop i.e. of praise for other poets.

30 Arise like Titan from the sea’s immersion Byron has in mind Helios, son of Hyperion, god of the sun.

31 appellants challengers, i.e. those who reserve their laurels for posterity.

32 Paradise Lost vii 25–6.

33 He did not loathe...son Charles I and II. Byron’s point is that Southey (a former republican) hated George III (in his radical youth) but praised his son (the Prince Regent); by contrast, Milton remained a republican throughout his life.

34 But closed the tyrant-hater he begun As far as Byron was concerned, both George III and the Prince Regent were tyrants. At that time, the monarch (an inherited post) had enormous political power.

35 the blind old man Milton.

36 Like Samuel from the grave Samuel was raised from the grave by the Witch of Endor; 1 Samuel 28:13–14.

37 heartless daughters said to have robbed Milton of his books.

38 Robert Stewart, Viscount Castlereagh (1769–1822), Foreign Secretary 1812–22. As Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1797–1801), he had been responsible for imprisoning the leaders of the United Irish rebellion.

39 Erin's Ireland's.

40 such set trash of phrase Castlereagh was renowned as an incompetent speaker.

41 Ixion grindstone's Ixion, King of Thessaly, was banished from heaven and sentenced to be tied to a burning and spinning wheel in Hades.

42 States to be curbed i.e. France under Napoleon; Castlereagh helped negotiate the alliance with Russia, Austria and Prussia that led to Napoleon's defeat.

43 congress As Foreign Secretary, Castlereagh was instrumental in the Treaty of Paris (May 1814), which restored the Bourbon monarchy after Napoleon's abdication, and the Congress of Vienna (1814–15), which reorganized Europe after the Napoleonic Wars.

44 Eutropius Roman eunuch raised to high office; see Gibbon, Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, chapter 32.

45 this state-thing The Congress of Vienna ('this state-thing') restored papal power.

46 This stanza provides an overview of Castlereagh's misdeeds. In 1798 he had helped to defeat the Irish insurrection and establish the Union of 1801; as a chief negotiator of the Treaty of Vienna, 1814–15, he had been responsible for suppressing the revival of free Italian cities, instead placing Italy under Austrian rule. Southey celebrated his deeds in Carmen Triumphale (1814) and The Poet's Pilgrimage to Waterloo (1816).

47 Sir Laureate Southey.

48 predicate extol, commend (i.e. Southey and his poetry).

49 buff and blue colours of the Whig Club. The comparison is with Southey, who has relinquished all his liberal credentials.

50 'I allude not to our friend Landor's hero, the traitor Count Julian, but to Gibbon's hero, vulgarly yclept "The Apostate" ' (Byron's note). Julian was brought up as a Christian, but secretly worshipped Roman gods before he became Emperor in 361 CE. During his brief reign he attempted to restore pagan worship (he died 363).

Canto I

I want a hero¹ – an uncommon want
When every year and month sends forth a new one,
Till after cloying the gazettes with cant,
The age discovers he is not the true one;
Of such as these I should not care to vaunt, 5
I'll therefore take our ancient friend Don Juan;²
We all have seen him in the pantomime³
Sent to the devil,⁴ somewhat ere his time.

Vernon, the butcher Cumberland, Wolfe, Hawke,
Prince Ferdinand, Granby, Burgoyne, Keppel, Howe,⁵ 10
Evil and good, have had their tithe of talk,
And filled their signposts then, like Wellesley now;⁶
Each in their turn like Banquo's monarchs stalk,⁷
Followers of fame, 'nine farrow' of that sow;⁸
France, too, had Buonaparté and Dumourier,⁹ 15
Recorded in the Moniteur and Courier.¹⁰

Barnave, Brissot, Condorcet, Mirabeau,
Petion, Cloutz, Danton, Marat, La Fayette
Were French, and famous people as we know;
And there were others, scarce forgotten yet – 20
Joubert, Hoche, Marceau, Lannes, Dessaix, Moreau,¹¹

With many of the military set,
Exceedingly remarkable at times,
But not at all adapted to my rhymes.

Nelson¹² was once Britannia's god of war, 25
And still should be so, but the tide is turned;
There's no more to be said of Trafalgar –
'Tis with our hero quietly inurned
Because the army's grown more popular,¹³
At which the naval people are concerned; 30
Besides, the Prince is all for the land-service,
Forgetting Duncan, Nelson, Howe, and Jervis.¹⁴

Brave men were living before Agamemnon¹⁵
And since, exceeding valorous and sage –
A good deal like him too, though quite the same none; 35
But then they shone not on the poet's page,
And so have been forgotten. I condemn none,
But can't find any in the present age
Fit for my poem (that is, for my new one),
So as I said, I'll take my friend Don Juan. 40

Most epic poets plunge *in medias res*¹⁶
(Horace makes this the heroic turnpike road),¹⁷
And then your hero tells, whene'er you please,
What went before by way of episode,
While seated after dinner at his ease 45
Beside his mistress in some soft abode –

Palace or garden, paradise or cavern,
Which serves the happy couple for a tavern.

That is the usual method, but not mine;
My way is to begin with the beginning. 50
The regularity of my design
Forbids all wandering as the worst of sinning,
And therefore I shall open with a line
(Although it cost me half an hour in spinning)
Narrating somewhat of Don Juan's father 55
And also of his mother, if you'd rather.

In Seville was he born, a pleasant city
Famous for oranges and women; he
Who has not seen it will be much to pity,
So says the proverb – and I quite agree:¹⁸ 60
Of all the Spanish towns is none more pretty (Cadiz perhaps,¹⁹ but that you soon may see).
Don Juan's parents lived beside the river,
A noble stream, and called the Guadalquivir.

His father's name was J6se (Don, of course) – 65
A true hidalgo,²⁰ free from every stain
Of Moor or Hebrew blood, he traced his source
Through the most Gothic gentlemen of Spain;
A better cavalier ne'er mounted horse
(Or, being mounted, e'er got down again) 70
Than J6se, who begot our hero, who
Begot – but that's to come. Well, to renew:

10

His mother was a learned lady famed
For every branch of every science known,²¹
In every Christian language ever named, 75
With virtues equalled by her wit alone;
She made the cleverest people quite ashamed,
And even the good with inward envy groan,
Finding themselves so very much exceeded
In their own way by all the things that she did. 80

11

Her memory was a mine – she knew by heart
All Calderon and greater part of Lopé,²²
So that if any actor missed his part
She could have served him for the prompter's copy;
For her Feinagle's²³ were an useless art, 85
And he himself obliged to shut up shop – he Could never make a memory so fine as
That which adorned the brain of Donna Inez.

12

Her favourite science was the mathematical,²⁴
Her noblest virtue was her magnanimity, 90
Her wit (she sometimes tried at wit) was Attic²⁵ all,
Her serious sayings darkened to sublimity;
In short, in all things she was fairly what I call
A prodigy – her morning dress was dimity,²⁶
Her evening silk or, in the summer, muslin 95
(And other stuffs with which I won't stay puzzling).

13

She knew the Latin – that is, the Lord’s prayer,
And Greek – the alphabet, I’m nearly sure;
She read some French romances here and there,
Although her mode of speaking was not pure; 100
For native Spanish she had no great care
(At least her conversation was obscure);
Her thoughts were theorems, her words a problem,
As if she deemed that mystery would ennoble ’em.

14

She liked the English and the Hebrew tongue, 105
And said there was analogy between ’em;
She proved it somehow out of sacred song,
But I must leave the proofs to those who’ve seen ’em;
But this I heard her say, and can’t be wrong,
And all may think which way their judgments lean ’em, 110
‘’Tis strange; the Hebrew noun which means “I am”,
The English always use to govern damn.’27

15

Some women use their tongues; she looked a lecture,
Each eye a sermon, and her brow a homily,
An all-in-all-sufficient self-director 115
Like the lamented late Sir Samuel Romilly,28
The law’s expounder and the state’s corrector29
Whose suicide was almost an anomaly –
One sad example more that ‘All is vanity’;30
The jury brought their verdict in: insanity. 120

16

In short, she was a walking calculation,
Miss Edgeworth's³¹ novels stepping from their covers,
Or Mrs Trimmer's books on education,³²
Or 'Coeleb's Wife' set out in search of lovers,³³
Morality's prim personification 125
In which not envy's self a flaw discovers:
To others' share let 'female errors fall',³⁴
For she had not even one – the worst of all.

17

Oh she was perfect past all parallel
Of any modern female saint's comparison; 130
So far beyond the cunning powers of hell,
Her guardian angel had given up his garrison;
Even her minutest motions went as well
As those of the best timepiece made by Harrison;³⁵
In virtues nothing earthly could surpass her, 135
Save thine 'incomparable oil', Macassar!³⁶

18

Perfect she was, but as perfection is
Insipid in this naughty world of ours,
Where our first parents³⁷ never learned to kiss
Till they were exiled from their earlier bowers,³⁸ 140
Where all was peace and innocence and bliss
(I wonder how they got through the twelve hours) –
Don José, like a lineal son of Eve,
Went plucking various fruit without her leave.

19

He was a mortal of the careless kind 145
 With no great love for learning or the learned,
Who chose to go where'er he had a mind,
 And never dreamed his lady was concerned;
The world, as usual, wickedly inclined
 To see a kingdom or a house o'erturned, 150
Whispered he had a mistress, some said two –
But for domestic quarrels one will do.

20

Now Donna Inez had, with all her merit,
 A great opinion of her own good qualities;
Neglect, indeed, requires a saint to bear it – 155
 And so indeed, she was in her moralities;
But then she had a devil of a spirit,
 And sometimes mixed up fancies with realities,
And let few opportunities escape
Of getting her liege-lord into a scrape. 160

21

This was an easy matter with a man
 Oft in the wrong and never on his guard;
And even the wisest, do the best they can,
 Have moments, hours, and days, so unprepared
That you might 'brain them with their lady's fan', ³⁹ 165
 And sometimes ladies hit exceeding hard,
And fans turn into falchions⁴⁰ in fair hands,
And why and wherefore no one understands.

22

'Tis pity learned virgins ever wed
 With persons of no sort of education, 170

Or gentlemen who, though well-born and bred,
Grow tired of scientific conversation.
I don't choose to say much upon this head;
I'm a plain man and in a single station,
But oh, ye lords of ladies intellectual,⁴¹ 175
Inform us truly, have they not hen-pecked you all?

23

Don José and his lady quarrelled – why
Not any of the many could divine,
Though several thousand people chose to try,
'Twas surely no concern of theirs nor mine; 180
I loathe that low vice curiosity,
But if there's anything in which I shine,
'Tis in arranging all my friends' affairs –
Not having, of my own, domestic cares.

24

And so I interfered, and with the best 185
Intentions, but their treatment was not kind;
I think the foolish people were possessed,
For neither of them could I ever find,
Although their porter afterwards confessed –
But that's no matter, and the worst's behind, 190
For little Juan o'er me threw, downstairs,
A pail of housemaid's water, unawares.

25

A little curly-headed, good-for-nothing,
And mischief-making monkey from his birth;
His parents ne'er agreed except in doting 195
Upon the most unquiet imp on earth;
Instead of quarrelling, had they been but both in

Their senses, they'd have sent young master forth
To school, or had him soundly whipped at home
To teach him manners for the time to come. 200

26

Don José and the Donna Inez led
For some time an unhappy sort of life,
Wishing each other not divorced but dead;
They lived respectably as man and wife,
Their conduct was exceedingly well-bred, 205
And gave no outward signs of inward strife –
Until at length the smothered fire broke out,
And put the business past all kind of doubt.

27

For Inez called some druggists and physicians⁴²
And tried to prove her loving lord was mad,⁴³ 210
But as he had some lucid intermissions,
She next decided he was only bad;
Yet when they asked her for her depositions,⁴⁴
No sort of explanation could be had,
Save that her duty both to man and God 215
Required this conduct (which seemed very odd).

28

She kept a journal where his faults were noted
And opened certain trunks of books and letters –
All which might, if occasion served, be quoted;
And then she had all Seville for abettors, 220
Besides her good old grandmother (who doted);
The hearers of her case became repeaters,

Then advocates, inquisitors, and judges –
Some for amusement, others for old grudges.45

29

And then this best and meekest woman bore 225
 With such serenity her husband's woes,
Just as the Spartan ladies did of yore
 Who saw their spouses killed, and nobly chose
Never to say a word about them more;
 Calmly she heard each calumny that rose, 230
And saw his agonies with such sublimity
That all the world exclaimed 'What magnanimity!'

30

No doubt this patience, when the world is damning us,
 Is philosophic in our former friends;
'Tis also pleasant to be deemed magnanimous 235
 (The more so in obtaining our own ends);
And what the lawyers call a malus animus,46
 Conduct like this by no means comprehends:47
Revenge in person's certainly no virtue,
But then 'tis not my fault, if others hurt you. 240

31

And if our quarrels should rip up old stories
 And help them with a lie or two additional,
I'm not to blame, as you well know, no more is Anyone else – they were become traditional;
Besides, their resurrection aids our glories 245
 By contrast, which is what we just were wishing all:
And science profits by this resurrection –
Dead scandals form good subjects for dissection.

32

Their friends⁴⁸ had tried at reconciliation,
Then their relations⁴⁹ who made matters worse 250
(’Twere hard to say upon a like occasion
To whom it may be best to have recourse;
I can’t say much for friend or yet relation);
The lawyers did their utmost for divorce
But scarce a fee was paid on either side 255
Before, unluckily, Don José died.

33

He died – and most unluckily, because,
According to all hints I could collect
From counsel⁵⁰ learned in those kinds of laws
(Although their talk’s obscure and circumspect), 260
His death contrived to spoil a charming cause:
A thousand pities also with respect
To public feeling, which on this occasion
Was manifested in a great sensation.

34

But ah, he died – and buried with him lay 265
The public feeling and the lawyers’ fees;
His house was sold, his servants sent away,
A Jew took one of his two mistresses,
A priest the other (at least so they say).
I asked the doctors after his disease: 270
He died of the slow fever called the tertian⁵¹
And left his widow to her own aversion.

35

Yes, José was an honourable man⁵² –
That I must say, who knew him very well;
Therefore his frailties I'll no further scan 275
(Indeed there were not many more to tell),
And if his passions now and then outran
Discretion, and were not so peaceable
As Numa's (who was also named Pompilius),⁵³
He had been ill brought up, and was born bilious.⁵⁴ 280

36

Whate'er might be his worthlessness or worth,
Poor fellow, he had many things to wound him,
Let's own, since it can do no good on earth;
It was a trying moment that which found him
Standing alone beside his desolate hearth 285
Where all his household gods lay shivered⁵⁵ round him;
No choice was left his feelings or his pride
Save death or Doctors' Commons⁵⁶ – so he died.

37

Dying intestate, Juan was sole heir
To a chancery-suit⁵⁷ and messuages⁵⁸ and lands 290
Which, with a long minority and care,
Promised to turn out well in proper hands;
Inez became sole guardian (which was fair)
And answered but to nature's just demands;
An only son left with an only mother 295
Is brought up much more wisely than another.

38

Sagest of women, even of widows, she
Resolved that Juan should be quite a paragon
And worthy of the noblest pedigree
(His sire was of Castile, his dam from Aragon). 300
Then for accomplishments of chivalry,
In case our lord the king should go to war again,
He learned the arts of riding, fencing, gunnery,
And how to scale a fortress – or a nunnery.

39

But that which Donna Inez most desired, 305
And saw into herself each day before all
The learned tutors whom for him she hired,
Was that his breeding should be strictly moral;
Much into all his studies she enquired,
And so they were submitted first to her, all, 310
Arts, sciences – no branch was made a mystery
To Juan’s eyes, excepting natural history.

40

The languages (especially the dead),⁵⁹
The sciences (and most of all the abstruse),
The arts (at least all such as could be said 315
To be the most remote from common use) –
In all these he was much and deeply read;
But not a page of anything that’s loose⁶⁰
Or hints continuation of the species
Was ever suffered, lest he should grow vicious.⁶¹ 320

41

His classic studies made a little puzzle
Because of filthy loves of gods and goddesses

Who in the earlier ages made a bustle,
But never put on pantaloons or bodices;
His reverend tutors had at times a tussle, 325
And for their Aeneids, Iliads, and Odysseys,
Were forced to make an odd sort of apology –
For Donna Inez dreaded the mythology.

42

Ovid's a rake, as half his verses show him,
Anacreon's morals are a still worse sample, 330
Catullus scarcely has a decent poem,
I don't think Sappho's 'Ode' a good example,
Although Longinus tells us there is no hymn
Where the sublime soars forth on wings more ample;
But Virgil's songs are pure, except that horrid one 335
Beginning with Formosum pastor Corydon.62

43

Lucretius' irreligion63 is too strong
For early stomachs, to prove wholesome food;
I can't help thinking Juvenal was wrong
(Although no doubt his real intent was good) 340
For speaking out so plainly in his song –
So much indeed as to be downright rude;64
And then what proper person can be partial
To all those nauseous epigrams of Martial?65

44

Juan was taught from out the best edition, 345
Expurgated by learned men who place
Judiciously, from out the schoolboy's vision,
The grosser parts; but fearful to deface

Too much their modest bard by this omission,
And pitying sore his mutilated case, 350
They only add them all in an appendix⁶⁶ –
Which saves, in fact, the trouble of an index;

45

For there we have them all at one fell swoop,
Instead of being scattered through the pages;
They stand forth marshalled in a handsome troop 355
To meet the ingenuous youth of future ages,
Till some less rigid editor shall stoop
To call them back into their separate cages,
Instead of standing staring altogether
Like garden gods – and not so decent either. 360

46

The missal⁶⁷ too (it was the family missal)
Was ornamented in a sort of way
Which ancient mass-books often are, and this all Kinds of grotesques illumined; and how they,
Who saw those figures on the margin kiss all, 365
Could turn their optics⁶⁸ to the text and pray
Is more than I know – but Don Juan's mother
Kept this herself, and gave her son another.

47

Sermons he read and lectures he endured,
And homilies and lives of all the saints; 370
To Jerome and to Chrysostom⁶⁹ inured,
He did not take such studies for restraints;
But how faith is acquired and then insured,
So well not one of the aforesaid paints

As St Augustine in his fine Confessions – 375
Which make the reader envy his transgressions. 70

48

This too was a sealed book to little Juan –
I can't but say that his mamma was right,
If such an education was the true one.
She scarcely trusted him from out her sight; 380
Her maids were old, and if she took a new one
You might be sure she was a perfect fright;
She did this during even her husband's life –
I recommend as much to every wife.

49

Young Juan waxed 71 in goodliness and grace; 385
At six a charming child, and at eleven
With all the promise of as fine a face
As e'er to man's maturer growth was given.
He studied steadily and grew apace
And seemed, at least, in the right road to heaven – 390
For half his days were passed at church, the other
Between his tutors, confessor, and mother.

50

At six, I said, he was a charming child,
At twelve he was a fine but quiet boy;
Although in infancy a little wild, 395
They tamed him down amongst them; to destroy
His natural spirit not in vain they toiled
(At least it seemed so); and his mother's joy
Was to declare how sage and still and steady
Her young philosopher was grown already. 400

51

I had my doubts – perhaps I have them still,
But what I say is neither here nor there;
I knew his father well, and have some skill
In character, but it would not be fair
From sire to son to augur good or ill; 405
He and his wife were an ill-sorted pair –
But scandal's my aversion, I protest
Against all evil speaking, even in jest.

52

For my part I say nothing – nothing – but
This I will say (my reasons are my own): 410
That if I had an only son to put
To school (as God be praised that I have none),
'Tis not with Donna Inez I would shut
Him up to learn his catechism alone –
No, no; I'd send him out betimes to college, 415
For there it was I picked up my own knowledge.

53

For there one learns – 'tis not for me to boast,
Though I acquired – but I pass over that,
As well as all the Greek I since have lost;
I say that there's the place – but Verbum sat; 72 420
I think I picked up too, as well as most,
Knowledge of matters – but no matter what –
I never married – but I think, I know,
That sons should not be educated so.

54

Young Juan now was sixteen years of age – 425
Tall, handsome, slender, but well-knit; he seemed
Active, though not so sprightly, as a page,
And everybody but his mother deemed
Him almost man. But she flew in a rage
And bit her lips (for else she might have screamed) 430
If any said so – for to be precocious
Was in her eyes a thing the most atrocious.

55

Amongst her numerous acquaintance, all
Selected for discretion and devotion,
There was the Donna Julia, whom to call 435
Pretty were but to give a feeble notion
Of many charms in her as natural
As sweetness to the flower, or salt to ocean,
Her zone to Venus,⁷³ or his bow to Cupid
(But this last simile is trite and stupid). 440

56

The darkness of her oriental eye
Accorded with her Moorish origin
(Her blood was not all Spanish, by the by –
In Spain, you know, this is a sort of sin);
When proud Granada fell and, forced to fly, 445
Boabdil wept,⁷⁴ of Donna Julia's kin
Some went to Africa, some stayed in Spain;
Her great-great-grandmamma chose to remain.

57

She married (I forget the pedigree)
With an hidalgo, who transmitted down 450

His blood less noble than such blood should be;
At such alliances his sires would frown,
In that point so precise in each degree
That they bred in and in, as might be shown,
Marrying their cousins – nay, their aunts and nieces, 455
Which always spoils the breed, if it increases.

58

This heathenish cross restored the breed again,
Ruined its blood, but much improved its flesh;
For from a root the ugliest in old Spain
Sprung up a branch as beautiful as fresh – 460
The sons no more were short, the daughters plain
(But there's a rumour which I fain would hush:
'Tis said that Donna Julia's grandmamma
Produced her Don more heirs at love than law).

59

However this might be, the race⁷⁵ went on 465
Improving still through every generation
Until it centred in an only son
Who left an only daughter; my narration
May have suggested that this single one
Could be but Julia (whom on this occasion 470
I shall have much to speak about), and she
Was married, charming, chaste, and twenty-three.

60

Her eye (I'm very fond of handsome eyes)
Was large and dark, suppressing half its fire
Until she spoke, then through its soft disguise 475
Flashed an expression more of pride than ire,
And love than either; and there would arise

A something in them which was not desire,
But would have been, perhaps – but for the soul
Which struggled through and chastened down the whole. 480

61

Her glossy hair was clustered o'er a brow
Bright with intelligence, and fair and smooth;
Her eyebrow's shape was like the aerial bow,⁷⁶
Her cheek all purple with the beam of youth
Mounting, at times, to a transparent glow 485
As if her veins ran lightning; she, in sooth,
Possessed an air and grace by no means common,
Her stature tall – I hate a dumpy woman.

62

Wedded she was some years, and to a man
Of fifty – and such husbands are in plenty; 490
And yet, I think, instead of such a ONE
'Twere better to have TWO of five and twenty,
Especially in countries near the sun;
And now I think on't, 'mi vien in mente',⁷⁷
Ladies even of the most uneasy virtue 495
Prefer a spouse whose age is short of thirty.

63

'Tis a sad thing, I cannot choose but say,
And all the fault of that indecent sun
Who cannot leave alone our helpless clay,⁷⁸
But will keep baking, broiling, burning on, 500
That howsoever people fast and pray
The flesh is frail,⁷⁹ and so the soul undone;

What men call gallantry, and gods adultery,
Is much more common where the climate's sultry.

64

Happy the nations of the moral north! 505

Where all is virtue, and the winter season
Sends sin, without a rag on, shivering forth

('Twas snow that brought St Francis back to reason);⁸⁰
Where juries cast up what a wife is worth

By laying whate'er sum, in mulct,⁸¹ they please on 510
The lover, who must pay a handsome price,
Because it is a marketable vice.

65

Alfonso was the name of Julia's lord –

A man well looking for his years and who
Was neither much beloved nor yet abhorred; 515

They lived together as most people do,
Suffering each other's foibles by accord,

And not exactly either one or two;
Yet he was jealous, though he did not show it,
For jealousy dislikes the world to know it. 520

66

Julia was (yet I never could see why)

With Donna Inez quite a favourite friend;
Between their tastes there was small sympathy,

For not a line had Julia ever penned;
Some people whisper (but no doubt they lie, 525

For malice still imputes some private end)
That Inez had, ere Don Alfonso's marriage,
Forgot with him her very prudent carriage,⁸²

67

And that still keeping up the old connection,
Which time had lately rendered much more chaste, 530
She took his lady also in affection,
And certainly this course was much the best.
She flattered Julia with her sage protection
And complimented Don Alfonso's taste,
And if she could not (who can?) silence scandal, 535
At least she left it a more slender handle.

68

I can't tell whether Julia saw the affair
With other people's eyes, or if her own
Discoveries made, but none could be aware
Of this; at least no symptom e'er was shown. 540
Perhaps she did not know, or did not care,
Indifferent from the first, or callous grown;
I'm really puzzled what to think or say –
She kept her counsel in so close a way.

69

Juan she saw and, as a pretty child, 545
Caressed him often – such a thing might be
Quite innocently done, and harmless styled,
When she had twenty years and thirteen he;
But I am not so sure I should have smiled
When he was sixteen, Julia twenty-three 550
(These few short years make wondrous alterations, Particularly amongst sunburnt nations).

Whate'er the cause might be, they had become
 Changed; for the dame grew distant, the youth shy,
Their looks cast down, their greetings almost dumb, 555
 And much embarrassment in either eye.
There surely will be little doubt with some
 That Donna Julia knew the reason why;
But as for Juan, he had no more notion
Than he who never saw the sea of ocean. 560

71

Yet Julia's very coldness still was kind,
 And tremulously gentle her small hand
Withdrew itself from his, but left behind
 A little pressure, thrilling, and so bland⁸³
And slight, so very slight, that to the mind 565
 'Twas but a doubt – but ne'er magician's wand
Wrought change with all Armida's⁸⁴ fairy art
Like what this light touch left on Juan's heart.

72

And if she met him, though she smiled no more,
 She looked a sadness sweeter than her smile, 570
As if her heart had deeper thoughts in store
 She must not own, but cherished more the while,
For that compression in its burning core;
 Even innocence itself has many a wile
And will not dare to trust itself with truth – 575
And love is taught hypocrisy from youth.

73

But passion most dissembles yet betrays
 Even by its darkness; as the blackest sky

Foretells the heaviest tempest, it displays
Its workings through the vainly guarded eye, 580
And in whatever aspect it arrays
Itself, 'tis still the same hypocrisy;
Coldness or anger, even disdain or hate
Are masks it often wears, and still too late.

74

Then there were sighs, the deeper for suppression, 585
And stolen glances, sweeter for the theft,
And burning blushes, though for no transgression,
Tremblings when met, and restlessness when left;
All these are little preludes to possession
Of which young passion cannot be bereft, 590
And merely tend to show how greatly love is Embarrassed at first starting with a novice.

75

Poor Julia's heart was in an awkward state –
She felt it going, and resolved to make
The noblest efforts for herself and mate, 595
For honour's, pride's, religion's, virtue's sake;
Her resolutions were most truly great
And almost might have made a Tarquin quake;⁸⁵
She prayed the Virgin Mary for her grace,
As being the best judge of a lady's case. 600

76

She vowed she never would see Juan more
And next day paid a visit to his mother,
And looked extremely at the opening door
Which, by the Virgin's grace, let in another;
Grateful she was, and yet a little sore; 605

Again it opens, it can be no other,
'Tis surely Juan now – no! I'm afraid
That night the Virgin was no further prayed.

77

She now determined that a virtuous woman
Should rather face and overcome temptation, 610
That flight was base and dastardly, and no man
Should ever give her heart the least sensation –
That is to say, a thought beyond the common
Preference, that we must feel upon occasion
For people who are pleasanter than others, 615
But then they only seem so many brothers.

78

And even if by chance (and who can tell?
The Devil's so very sly) she should discover
That all within was not so very well,
And if still free, that such or such a lover 620
Might please perhaps, a virtuous wife can quell
Such thoughts and be the better when they're over;
And if the man should ask, 'tis but denial:
I recommend young ladies to make trial.

79

And then there are things such as love divine, 625
Bright and immaculate, unmixed and pure,
Such as the angels think so very fine,
And matrons who would be no less secure,
Platonic, perfect, 'just such love as mine',
Thus Julia said, and thought so, to be sure – 630
And so I'd have her think, were I the man
On whom her reveries celestial ran.

80

Such love is innocent, and may exist
Between young persons without any danger;
A hand may first, and then a lip be kissed – 635
For my part, to such doings I'm a stranger,
But hear these freedoms form the utmost list⁸⁶
Of all o'er which such love may be a ranger;
If people go beyond, 'tis quite a crime
But not my fault – I tell them all in time. 640

81

Love then, but love within its proper limits
Was Julia's innocent determination
In young Don Juan's favour, and to him its Exertion might be useful on occasion;
And lighted at too pure a shrine to dim its 645
Ethereal lustre, with what sweet persuasion
He might be taught by love and her together –
I really don't know what, nor Julia either.

82

Fraught with this fine intention, and well-fenced⁸⁷
In mail of proof⁸⁸ – her purity of soul, 650
She, for the future of her strength convinced,
And that her honour was a rock, or mole,⁸⁹
Exceeding sagely from that hour dispensed
With any kind of troublesome control;
But whether Julia to the task was equal 655
Is that which must be mentioned in the sequel.⁹⁰

83

Her plan she deemed both innocent and feasible,
And surely with a stripling of sixteen
Not scandal's fangs could fix on much that's seizable,
Or if they did so, satisfied to mean 660
Nothing but what was good, her breast was peaceable –
A quiet conscience makes one so serene!
Christians have burnt each other, quite persuaded
That all the Apostles would have done as they did.

84

And if in the meantime her husband died – 665
But heaven forbid that such a thought should cross
Her brain, though in a dream! And then she sighed;
Never could she survive that common loss,
But just suppose that moment should betide –
I only say suppose it, *inter nos*⁹¹ 670
(This should be entre nous, for Julia thought
In French, but then the rhyme would go for nought),

85

I only say suppose this supposition:
Juan being then grown up to man's estate⁹²
Would fully suit a widow of condition⁹³ – 675
Even seven years hence it would not be too late;
And in the interim (to pursue this vision)
The mischief, after all, could not be great,
For he would learn the rudiments of love
(I mean the seraph⁹⁴ way of those above). 680

86

So much for Julia. Now we'll turn to Juan –
Poor little fellow, he had no idea

Of his own case, and never hit the true one;
In feelings quick as Ovid's Miss Medea,⁹⁵
He puzzled over what he found a new one, 685
But not as yet imagined it could be a
Thing quite in course, and not at all alarming
Which, with a little patience, might grow charming.

87

Silent and pensive, idle, restless, slow,
His home deserted for the lonely wood, 690
Tormented with a wound he could not know,
His, like all deep grief, plunged in solitude;
I'm fond myself of solitude or so,
But then I beg it may be understood –
By solitude I mean a sultan's, not 695
A hermit's, with a harem for a grot.

88

'Oh love, in such a wilderness as this,
Where transport and security entwine,
Here is the empire of thy perfect bliss,
And here thou art a god indeed divine!'⁹⁶ 700
The bard I quote from does not sing amiss,
With the exception of the second line –
For that same twining 'transport and security'
Are twisted to a phrase of some obscurity.

89

The poet meant, no doubt (and thus appeals 705
To the good sense and senses of mankind),
The very thing which everybody feels,
As all have found on trial, or may find –

That no one likes to be disturbed at meals
Or love. I won't say more about 'entwined' 710
Or 'transport', as we knew all that before,
But beg 'security' will bolt the door.

90

Young Juan wandered by the glassy brooks
Thinking unutterable things; he threw
Himself at length within the leafy nooks 715
Where the wild branch of the cork forest grew;
There poets find materials for their books,
And every now and then we read them through
So that⁹⁷ their plan and prosody are eligible –
Unless, like Wordsworth, they prove unintelligible.⁹⁸ 720

91

He, Juan (and not Wordsworth),⁹⁹ so pursued
His self-communion with his own high soul,
Until his mighty heart¹⁰⁰ in its great mood
Had mitigated part (though not the whole)
Of its disease; he did the best he could 725
With things not very subject to control,
And turned, without perceiving his condition,
Like Coleridge, into a metaphysician.

92

He thought about himself, and the whole earth,
Of man the wonderful, and of the stars, 730
And how the deuce they ever could have birth;
And then he thought of earthquakes and of wars,
How many miles the moon might have in girth,

Of air-balloons,101 and of the many bars102
To perfect knowledge of the boundless skies – 735
And then he thought of Donna Julia's eyes.

93

In thoughts like these true wisdom may discern
Longings sublime and aspirations high,
Which some are born with, but the most part learn
To plague themselves withal, they know not why; 740
'Twas strange that one so young should thus concern
His brain about the action of the sky:
If you think 'twas philosophy that this did,
I can't help thinking puberty assisted.

94

He pored upon the leaves and on the flowers, 745
And heard a voice in all the winds; and then
He thought of wood-nymphs and immortal bowers,
And how the goddesses came down to men:
He missed the pathway, he forgot the hours,
And when he looked upon his watch again, 750
He found how much old Time had been a winner –
He also found that he had lost his dinner.

95

Sometimes he turned to gaze upon his book,
Boscan or Garcilasso;103 by the wind
Even as the page is rustled while we look, 755
So by the poesy of his own mind
Over the mystic leaf his soul was shook,
As if 'twere one whereon magicians bind

Their spells, and give them to the passing gale,
According to some good old woman's tale. 760

96

Thus would he while his lonely hours away
Dissatisfied, nor knowing what he wanted;
Nor 104 glowing reverie, nor poet's lay
Could yield his spirit that for which it panted,
A bosom whereon he his head might lay, 765
And hear the heart beat with the love it granted,
With – several other things which I forget,
Or which, at least, I need not mention yet.

97

Those lonely walks and lengthening reveries
Could not escape the gentle Julia's eyes; 770
She saw that Juan was not at his ease;
But that which chiefly may, and must surprise
Is that the Donna Inez did not tease
Her only son with question or surmise –
Whether it was she did not see or would not, 775
Or like all very clever people, could not.

98

This may seem strange, but yet 'tis very common;
For instance, gentlemen, whose ladies take
Leave to o'erstep the written rights of woman,
And break the – which commandment is't they break? 105 780
I have forgot the number, and think no man
Should rashly quote, for fear of a mistake.
I say, when these same gentlemen are jealous,
They make some blunder which their ladies tell us.

99

A real husband always is suspicious, 785
But still no less suspects in the wrong place,
Jealous of someone who had no such wishes,106
Or pandering blindly to his own disgrace
By harbouring some dear friend extremely vicious107 –
The last indeed's infallibly the case, 790
And when the spouse and friend are gone off wholly,108
He wonders at their vice, and not his folly.

100

Thus parents also are at times short-sighted;
Though watchful as the lynx, they ne'er discover
(The while the wicked world beholds delighted) 795
Young Hopeful's mistress or Miss Fanny's lover,
Till some confounded escapade has blighted
The plan of twenty years, and all is over;
And then the mother cries, the father swears,
And wonders why the devil he got109 heirs. 800

101

But Inez was so anxious and so clear
Of sight, that I must think on this occasion
She had some other motive much more near
For leaving Juan to this new temptation;
But what that motive was I shan't say here – 805
Perhaps to finish Juan's education,
Perhaps to open Don Alfonso's eyes
In case he thought his wife too great a prize.

102

It was upon a day, a summer's day –
 Summer's indeed a very dangerous season, 810
And so is spring about the end of May;
 The sun, no doubt, is the prevailing reason;
But whatsoe'er the cause is, one may say
 (And stand convicted of more truth than treason),
That there are months which nature grows more merry in; 815
March has its hares, and May must have its heroine.

103

'Twas on a summer's day, the sixth of June –
 I like to be particular in dates,
Not only of the age and year, but moon;
 They are a sort of post-house¹¹⁰ where the Fates¹¹¹ 820
Change horses, making history change its tune,
 Then spur away o'er empires and o'er states,
Leaving at last not much besides chronology,
Excepting the post-obits¹¹² of theology.

104

'Twas on the sixth of June, about the hour 825
 Of half-past six – perhaps still nearer seven,
When Julia sat within as pretty a bower
 As e'er held houri¹¹³ in that heathenish heaven
Described by Mahomet and 'Anacreon' Moore¹¹⁴ –
 To whom the lyre and laurels have been given 830
With all the trophies of triumphant song;
He won them well, and may he wear them long!

105

She sat, but not alone; I know not well
 How this same interview had taken place,

And even if I knew, I should not tell – 835
People should hold their tongues in any case;
No matter how or why the thing befell,
But there were she and Juan, face to face –
When two such faces are so, 'twould be wise
(But very difficult) to shut their eyes. 840

106

How beautiful she looked! Her conscious heart
Glowed in her cheek, and yet she felt no wrong.
Oh love, how perfect is thy mystic art,
Strengthening the weak, and trampling on the strong;
How self-deceitful is the sagest part 845
Of mortals whom thy lure hath led along;
The precipice she stood on was immense –
So was her creed 115 in her own innocence.

107

She thought of her own strength, 116 and Juan's youth,
And of the folly of all prudish fears, 850
Victorious virtue and domestic truth –
And then of Don Alfonso's fifty years:
I wish these last had not occurred, in sooth,
Because that number rarely much endears,
And through all climes, the snowy and the sunny, 855
Sounds ill in love, whate'er it may in money.

108

When people say, 'I've told you fifty times',
They mean to scold, and very often do;
When poets say, 'I've written fifty rhymes',
They make you dread that they'll recite them too; 860

In gangs of fifty, thieves commit their crimes;
At fifty love for love is rare, 'tis true –
But then, no doubt, it equally as true is,
A good deal may be bought for fifty louis. 117

109

Julia had honour, virtue, truth and love 865
For Don Alfonso, and she inly swore
By all the vows below to powers above
She never would disgrace the ring she wore,
Nor leave a wish which wisdom might reprove;
And while she pondered this, besides much more, 870
One hand on Juan's carelessly was thrown
Quite by mistake – she thought it was her own;

110

Unconsciously she leaned upon the other
Which played within the tangles of her hair; 118
And to contend with thoughts she could not smother, 875
She seemed by the distraction of her air.
'Twas surely very wrong in Juan's mother
To leave together this imprudent pair,
She who for many years had watched her son so –
I'm very certain mine would not have done so. 880

111

The hand which still held Juan's, by degrees
Gently but palpably confirmed its grasp,
As if it said 'detain me, if you please';
Yet there's no doubt she only meant to clasp
His fingers with a pure Platonic squeeze; 885
She would have shrunk as from a toad or asp

Had she imagined such a thing could rouse
A feeling dangerous to a prudent spouse.

112

I cannot know what Juan thought of this,
 But what he did is much what you would do; 890
His young lip thanked it with a grateful kiss,
 And then, abashed at its own joy, withdrew
In deep despair lest he had done amiss –
 Love is so very timid when 'tis new;
She blushed and frowned not, but she strove to speak 895
And held her tongue, her voice was grown so weak.

113

The sun set and uprose the yellow moon –
 The devil's in the moon for mischief; they
Who called her chaste, methinks began too soon
 Their nomenclature; 119 there is not a day, 900
The longest, not the twenty-first of June,
 Sees half the business in a wicked way
On which three single hours of moonshine smile –
And then she looks so modest all the while.

114

There is a dangerous silence in that hour,
 A stillness which leaves room for the full soul
To open all itself, without the power
 Of calling wholly back its self-control;
The silver light which, hallowing tree and tower,
 Sheds beauty and deep softness o'er the whole, 910
Breathes also to the heart, and o'er it throws
A loving languor which is not repose.

115

And Julia sat with Juan, half-embraced
And half-retiring from the glowing arm,
Which trembled like the bosom where 'twas placed; 915
Yet still she must have thought there was no harm,
Or else 'twere easy to withdraw her waist;
But then the situation had its charm,
And then – God knows what next – I can't go on;
I'm almost sorry that I e'er begun. 920

116

Oh Plato, Plato! You have paved the way,
With your confounded fantasies, to more
Immoral conduct by the fancied sway
Your system feigns o'er the controlless core
Of human hearts, than all the long array 925
Of poets and romancers – you're a bore,
A charlatan, a coxcomb, and have been
At best no better than a go-between.

117

And Julia's voice was lost except in sighs,
Until too late for useful conversation; 930
The tears were gushing from her gentle eyes –
I wish, indeed, they had not had occasion,
But who, alas, can love, and then be wise?
Not that remorse did not oppose temptation,
A little still she strove, and much repented, 935
And whispering 'I will ne'er consent' – consented.

118

'Tis said that Xerxes¹²⁰ offered a reward
To those who could invent him a new pleasure –
Methinks the requisition's rather hard
And must have cost his majesty a treasure; 940
For my part, I'm a moderate-minded bard,
Fond of a little love (which I call leisure);
I care not for new pleasures, as the old
Are quite enough for me, so they but hold.

119

Oh pleasure, you're indeed a pleasant thing, 945
Although one must be damned for you, no doubt;
I make a resolution every spring
Of reformation, ere the year run out;
But somehow, this my vestal vow¹²¹ takes wing,
Yet still, I trust, it may be kept throughout: 950
I'm very sorry, very much ashamed,
And mean, next winter, to be quite reclaimed.

120

Here my chaste muse a liberty must take –
Start not, still chaster reader! She'll be nice hence-
Forward, and there is no great cause to quake; 955
This liberty is a poetic licence,
Which some irregularity may make
In the design, and as I have a high sense
Of Aristotle and the rules,¹²² 'tis fit
To beg his pardon when I err a bit. 960

121

This licence is to hope the reader will Suppose from June the sixth (the fatal day

Without whose epoch my poetic skill
For want of facts would all be thrown away),
But keeping Julia and Don Juan still 965
In sight, that several months have passed; we'll say
'Twas in November, but I'm not so sure
About the day – the era's more obscure.

122

We'll talk of that anon. 'Tis sweet to hear
At midnight on the blue and moonlit deep 970
The song and oar of Adria's¹²³ gondolier
By distance mellowed, o'er the waters sweep;
'Tis sweet to see the evening star appear;
'Tis sweet to listen as the nightwinds creep
From leaf to leaf; 'tis sweet to view on high 975
The rainbow, based on ocean, span the sky;

123

'Tis sweet to hear the watchdog's honest bark
Bay deep-mouthed welcome as we draw near home;
'Tis sweet to know there is an eye will mark
Our coming, and look brighter when we come; 980
'Tis sweet to be awakened by the lark
Or lulled by falling waters; sweet the hum
Of bees, the voice of girls, the song of birds,
The lisp of children and their earliest words;

124

Sweet is the vintage, when the showering grapes 985
In Bacchanal profusion¹²⁴ reel to earth
Purple and gushing; sweet are our escapes
From civic revelry to rural mirth;

Sweet to the miser are his glittering heaps;
Sweet to the father is his first-born's birth; 990
Sweet is revenge – especially to women;
Pillage to soldiers, prize-money¹²⁵ to seamen;

125

Sweet is a legacy, and passing sweet
The unexpected death of some old lady
Or gentleman of seventy years complete, 995
Who've made 'us youth'¹²⁶ wait too too long already
For an estate or cash or country-seat,
Still breaking, but with stamina so steady,
That all the Israelites¹²⁷ are fit to mob its Next owner for their double-damned post-obits.¹²⁸ 1000

126

'Tis sweet to win (no matter how) one's laurels
By blood or ink; 'tis sweet to put an end
To strife; 'tis sometimes sweet to have our quarrels,
Particularly with a tiresome friend;
Sweet is old wine in bottles, ale in barrels; 1005
Dear is the helpless creature we defend
Against the world; and dear the schoolboy spot
We ne'er forget, though there we are forgot.

127

But sweeter still than this, than these, than all,
Is first and passionate love – it stands alone 1010
Like Adam's recollection of his fall;
The tree of knowledge has been plucked, all's known,
And life yields nothing further to recall

Worthy of this ambrosial¹²⁹ sin, so shown
No doubt in fable, as the unforgiven 1015
Fire which Prometheus filched for us from heaven.

128

Man's a strange animal, and makes strange use
Of his own nature and the various arts,¹³⁰
And likes particularly to produce
Some new experiment to show his parts;¹³¹ 1020
This is the age of oddities let loose,
Where different talents find their different marts;
You'd best begin with truth, and when you've lost your
Labour, there's a sure market for imposture.

129

What opposite discoveries we have seen 1025
(Signs of true genius, and of empty pockets)!
One makes new noses, one a guillotine,
One breaks your bones, one sets them in their sockets;
But vaccination certainly has been
A kind antithesis to Congreve's rockets, 1030
With which the doctor paid off an old pox
By borrowing a new one from an ox.¹³²

130

Bread has been made (indifferent) from potatoes,
And galvanism has set some corpses grinning,
But has not answered like the apparatus 1035
Of the Humane Society's beginning,
By which men are unsuffocated gratis;
What wondrous new machines have late been spinning!¹³³

I said the smallpox has gone out of late,
Perhaps it may be followed by the great.134 1040

131

'Tis said the great came from America,
Perhaps it may set out on its return;
The population there so spreads, they say,
'Tis grown high time to thin it in its turn
With war or plague or famine, any way, 1045
So that civilization they may learn,
And which in ravage the more loathsome evil is:
Their real lues,135 or our pseudo-syphilis?

132

This is the patent-age of new inventions
For killing bodies and for saving souls,136 1050
All propagated with the best intentions:
Sir Humphry Davy's lantern,137 by which coals
Are safely mined for in the mode he mentions;
Tombuctoo travels, voyages to the Poles
Are ways to benefit mankind, as true, 1055
Perhaps, as shooting them at Waterloo.

133

Man's a phenomenon, one knows not what,
And wonderful beyond all wondrous measure;
'Tis pity though, in this sublime world, that
Pleasure's a sin, and sometimes sin's a pleasure; 1060
Few mortals know what end138 they would be at,
But whether glory, power, or love or treasure,

The path is through perplexing ways, and when
The goal is gained, we die, you know – and then –

134

What then? I do not know, no more do you – 1065
And so goodnight. Return we to our story:
'Twas in November when fine days are few,
And the far mountains wax 139 a little hoary
And clap a white cape on their mantles blue;
And the sea dashes round the promontory, 1070
And the loud breaker boils against the rock,
And sober suns must set at five o'clock.

135

'Twas, as the watchmen say, a cloudy night;
No moon, no stars, the wind was low or loud
By gusts, and many a sparkling hearth was bright 1075
With the piled wood round which the family crowd;
There's something cheerful in that sort of light,
Even as a summer sky's without a cloud –
I'm fond of fire and crickets, and all that,
A lobster-salad, and champagne, and chat. 1080

136

'Twas midnight; Donna Julia was in bed –
Sleeping, most probably – when at her door
Arose a clatter might awake the dead 140
(If they had never been awoke before,
And that they have been so we all have read, 1085
And are to be so, at the least, once more);
The door was fastened, but with voice and fist
First knocks were heard, then 'Madam, madam – hist!

137

For God's sake, madam – madam, here's my master
With more than half the city at his back; 1090
Was ever heard of such a cursed disaster!
'Tis not my fault, I kept good watch – alack!
Do pray undo the bolt a little faster;
They're on the stair just now, and in a crack¹⁴¹
Will all be here – perhaps he yet may fly; 1095
Surely the window's not so very high!'

138

By this time Don Alfonso was arrived
With torches, friends and servants in great number;
The major part of them had long been wived,
And therefore paused not¹⁴² to disturb the slumber 1100
Of any wicked woman who contrived
By stealth her husband's temples to encumber;¹⁴³
Examples of this kind are so contagious,
Were one not punished, all would be outrageous.

139

I can't tell how or why or what suspicion 1105
Could enter into Don Alfonso's head,
But for a cavalier of his condition¹⁴⁴
It surely was exceedingly ill-bred,
Without a word of previous admonition,
To hold a levee¹⁴⁵ round his lady's bed 1110
And summon lackeys armed with fire and sword,
To prove himself the thing he most abhorred.¹⁴⁶

140

Poor Donna Julia! Starting as from sleep
 (Mind that I do not say she had not slept)
Began at once to scream and yawn and weep; 1115
 Her maid Antonia, who was an adept,
Contrived to fling the bedclothes in a heap,
 As if she had just now from out them crept –
I can't tell why she should take all this trouble
To prove her mistress had been sleeping double. 1120

141

But Julia mistress, and Antonia maid,
 Appeared like two poor harmless women who
Of goblins, but still more of men afraid,
 Had thought one man might be deterred by two,
And therefore side by side were gently laid 1125
 Until the hours of absence should run through,
And truant husband should return and say,
'My dear, I was the first who came away.'

142

Now Julia found at length a voice, and cried,
 'In Heaven's name, Don Alfonso, what d'ye mean? 1130
Has madness seized you? Would that I had died
 Ere such a monster's victim I had been!
What may this midnight violence betide?
 A sudden fit of drunkenness or spleen?
Dare you suspect me, whom the thought would kill? 1135
Search then the room!' Alfonso said, 'I will.'

143

He searched, they searched, and rummaged everywhere,
 Closet and clothes-press, chest and window-seat,
And found much linen, lace, and several pair

Of stockings, slippers, brushes, combs, complete 1140
With other articles of ladies fair,
To keep them beautiful or leave them neat;
Arras they pricked, 147 and curtains with their swords,
And wounded several shutters and some boards.

144

Under the bed they searched, and there they found – 1145
No matter what, it was not that they sought;
They opened windows, gazing if the ground
Had signs or footmarks, but the earth said nought;
And then they stared each others' faces round:
'Tis odd not one of all these seekers thought 1150
(And seems to me almost a sort of blunder)
Of looking in the bed as well as under.

145

During this inquisition Julia's tongue
Was not asleep: 'Yes, search and search', she cried,
'Insult on insult heap, and wrong on wrong! 1155
It was for this that I became a bride!
For this in silence I have suffered long
A husband like Alfonso at my side;
But now I'll bear no more, nor here remain,
If there be law or lawyers in all Spain. 1160

146

Yes, Don Alfonso, husband now no more
(If ever you indeed deserved the name)!
Is't worthy of your years? You have threescore,
Fifty or sixty (it is all the same),
Is't wise or fitting causeless to explore 1165
For facts against a virtuous woman's fame?

Ungrateful, perjured, barbarous Don Alfonso –
How dare you think your lady would go on so?

147

Is it for this I have disdained to hold
The common privileges of my sex?148 – 1170
That I have chosen a confessor so old
And deaf, that any other it would vex,
And never once he has had cause to scold,
But found my very innocence perplex
So much, he always doubted I was married? 1175
How sorry you will be when I've miscarried!149

148

Was it for this that no cortejo ere
I yet have chosen from out the youth of Seville?
Is it for this I scarce went anywhere
Except to bullfights, mass, play, rout150 and revel? 1180
Is it for this, whate'er my suitors were,
I favoured none – nay, was almost uncivil?
Is it for this that General Count O'Reilly,
Who took Algiers,151 declares I used him vilely?

149

Did not the Italian musico Cazzani152 1185
Sing at my heart six months at least in vain?
Did not his countryman, Count Corniani,153
Call me the only virtuous wife in Spain?
Were there not also Russians, English, many?
The Count Strongstroganoff154 I put in pain, 1190

And Lord Mount Coffeehouse, the Irish peer, 155
Who killed himself for love (with wine) last year.

150

Have I not had two bishops at my feet,
The Duke of Ichar, and Don Fernan Nunez?
And is it thus a faithful wife you treat? 1195
I wonder in what quarter now the moon is; 156
I praise your vast forbearance not to beat
Me also, since the time so opportune is –
Oh valiant man, with sword drawn and cocked trigger,
Now tell me, don't you cut a pretty figure? 1200

151

Was it for this you took your sudden journey
Under pretence of business indispensable
With that sublime of rascals, your attorney,
Whom I see standing there, and looking sensible 157
Of having played the fool? Though both I spurn, he 1205
Deserves the worst, his conduct's less defensible,
Because, no doubt, 'twas for his dirty fee,
And not from any love to you nor me.

152

If he comes here to take a deposition, 158
By all means let the gentleman proceed – 1210
You've made the apartment in a fit condition!
There's pen and ink for you, sir, when you need;
Let everything be noted with precision
(I would not you for nothing should be feed); 159

But as my maid's undressed, pray turn your spies out.' 1215
'Oh!' sobbed Antonia, 'I could tear their eyes out!'

153

'There is the closet,¹⁶⁰ there the toilet,¹⁶¹ there
The antechamber¹⁶² – search them under, over;
There is the sofa, there the great armchair,
The chimney (which would really hold a lover). 1220
I wish to sleep, and beg you will take care
And make no further noise, till you discover
The secret cavern of this lurking treasure –
And when 'tis found, let me, too, have that pleasure.

154

And now, hidalgo, now that you have thrown 1225
Doubt upon me, confusion over all,¹⁶³
Pray have the courtesy to make it known
Who is the man you search for? How d'ye call
Him? What's his lineage? Let him but be shown;
I hope he's young and handsome – is he tall? 1230
Tell me, and be assured that since you stain
My honour thus, it shall not be in vain.

155

At least, perhaps, he has not sixty years –
At that age he would be too old for slaughter
Or for so young a husband's jealous fears! 1235
Antonia, let me have a glass of water;
I am ashamed of having shed these tears,
They are unworthy of my father's daughter;
My mother dreamed not in my natal hour¹⁶⁴
That I should fall into a monster's power. 1240

156

Perhaps 'tis of Antonia you are jealous –
You saw that she was sleeping by my side
When you broke in upon us with your fellows;
Look where you please, we've nothing, sir, to hide;
Only another time, I trust, you'll tell us, 1245
Or for the sake of decency abide
A moment at the door, that we may be
Dressed to receive so much good company.

157

And now, sir, I have done, and say no more;
The little I have said may serve to show 1250
The guileless heart in silence may grieve o'er
The wrongs to whose exposure it is slow;
I leave you to your conscience as before –
'Twill one day ask you why you used me so?
God grant you feel not then the bitterest grief! 1255
Antonia, where's my pocket-handkerchief?

158

She ceased, and turned upon her pillow; pale
She lay, her dark eyes flashing through their tears
Like skies that rain and lighten; as a veil,
Waved and o'ershading her wan cheek, appears 1260
Her streaming hair; the black curls strive but fail
To hide the glossy shoulder, which uprears
Its snow through all; her soft lips lie apart,
And louder than her breathing beats her heart.

159

The señor Don Alfonso stood confused; 1265
 Antonia bustled round the ransacked room
And, turning up her nose, with looks abused
 Not one, except the attorney, was amused;
Her master and his myrmidons, 165 of whom
 He, like Achates, 166 faithful to the tomb, 1270
 So 167 there were quarrels, cared not for the cause,
Knowing they must be settled by the laws.

160

With prying snubnose and small eyes he stood,
 Following Antonia's motions here and there
With much suspicion in his attitude; 1275
 For reputations he had little care,
So that a suit or action were made good;
 Small pity had he for the young and fair,
And ne'er believed in negatives, till these
Were proved by competent false witnesses. 1280

161

But Don Alfonso stood with downcast looks,
 And, truth to say, he made a foolish figure –
When after searching in five hundred nooks,
 And treating a young wife with so much rigour,
He gained no point except some self-rebukes, 1285
 Added to those his lady with such vigour
Had poured upon him for the last half-hour,
Quick, thick, and heavy, as a thunder-shower.

162

At first he tried to hammer an excuse
 To which the sole reply were tears and sobs 1290

And indications of hysterics, whose
Prologue is always certain throes and throbs,
Gasps and whatever else the owners choose;
Alfonso saw his wife and thought of Job's; 168
He saw too, in perspective, 169 her relations, 1295
And then he tried to muster all his patience.

163

He stood in act to speak, or rather stammer,
But sage Antonia cut him short before
The anvil of his speech received the hammer,
With, 'Pray sir, leave the room, and say no more, 1300
Or madam dies.' Alfonso muttered, 'Damn her!'
But nothing else – the time of words was o'er;
He cast a rueful look or two, and did
(He knew not wherefore) that which he was bid.

164

With him retired his posse comitatus 170 – 1305
The attorney last, who lingered near the door
Reluctantly, still tarrying there as late as
Antonia let him, not a little sore
At this most strange and unexplained hiatus 171
In Don Alfonso's facts, which just now wore 1310
An awkward look; as he resolved the case
The door was fastened in his legal face.

165

No sooner was it bolted than – oh shame!
Oh sin! Oh sorrow! And oh womankind!
How can you do such things and keep your fame, 1315
Unless this world (and t'other too) be blind?

Nothing so dear as an unfilched good name!172
But to proceed, for there is more behind;
With much heartfelt reluctance be it said,
Young Juan slipped, half-smothered, from the bed. 1320

166

He had been hid – I don't pretend to say
How, nor can I indeed describe the where;
Young, slender, and packed easily, he lay
No doubt, in little compass, round or square;
But pity him I neither must nor may 1325
His suffocation by that pretty pair;
'Twere better, sure, to die so, than be shut
With maudlin Clarence in his Malmsey butt.173

167

And secondly, I pity not, because
He had no business to commit a sin 1330
Forbid by heavenly, fined by human laws
(At least 'twas rather early to begin);
But at sixteen the conscience rarely gnaws
So much as when we call our old debts in
At sixty years, and draw the accompts of evil, 1335
And find a deuced balance with the Devil.

168

Of his position I can give no notion;
'Tis written in the Hebrew chronicle
How the physicians, leaving pill and potion,
Prescribed by way of blister, a young belle, 1340
When old King David's blood grew dull in motion,
And that the medicine answered very well;174

Perhaps 'twas in a different way applied,
For David lived, but Juan nearly died.

169

What's to be done? Alfonso will be back 1345
The moment he has sent his fools away.
Antonia's skill was put upon the rack,
But no device could be brought into play –
And how to parry the renewed attack?
Besides, it wanted but few hours of day; 1350
Antonia puzzled, Julia did not speak
But pressed her bloodless lip to Juan's cheek.

170

He turned his lip to hers, and with his hand
Called back the tangles of her wandering hair;
Even then their love they could not all command, 1355
And half forgot their danger and despair.
Antonia's patience now was at a stand¹⁷⁵ –
'Come, come, 'tis no time now for fooling there',
She whispered in great wrath, 'I must deposit
This pretty gentleman within the closet: 1360

171

Pray keep your nonsense for some luckier night –
Who can have put my master in this mood?
What will become on't? I'm in such a fright,
The Devil's in the urchin, and no good –
Is this a time for giggling? this a plight? 1365
Why, don't you know that it may end in blood?
You'll lose your life, and I shall lose my place,¹⁷⁶
My mistress, all, for that half-girlish face.

172

Had it but been for a stout cavalier
Of twenty-five or thirty (come, make haste!) – 1370
But for a child, what piece of work is here! 177
I really, madam, wonder at your taste –
Come sir, get in; my master must be near.
There for the present, at the least he's fast,
And if we can but till the morning keep
Our counsel – Juan, mind, you must not sleep!' 1375

173

Now Don Alfonso entering, but alone,
Closed the oration of the trusty maid;
She loitered, and he told her to be gone –
An order somewhat sullenly obeyed; 1380
However, present remedy was none,
And no great good seemed answered if she stayed;
Regarding both with slow and sidelong view,
She snuffed the candle, curtsied and withdrew.

174

Alfonso paused a minute, then begun 1385
Some strange excuses for his late proceeding;
He would not justify what he had done –
To say the best, it was extreme ill-breeding;
But there were ample reasons for it, none
Of which he specified in this his pleading: 1390
His speech was a fine sample, on the whole,
Of rhetoric which the learned call rigmarole.

175

Julia said nought, though all the while there rose
A ready answer – which at once enables
A matron (who her husband’s foible knows) 1395
By a few timely words to turn the tables,
Which, if it does not silence, still must pose,
Even if it should comprise a pack of fables;
'Tis to retort with firmness, and when he
Suspects with one, do you reproach with three. 1400

176

Julia in fact had tolerable grounds:
Alfonso’s loves with Inez were well-known;
But whether ’twas that one’s own guilt confounds –
But that can’t be, as has been often shown,
A lady with apologies abounds; 1405
It might be that her silence sprang alone
From delicacy to Don Juan’s ear,
To whom she knew his mother’s fame was dear.

177

There might be one more motive (which makes two):
Alfonso ne’er to Juan had alluded – 1410
Mentioned his jealousy, but never who
Had been the happy lover he concluded
Concealed amongst his premises; ’tis true
His mind the more o’er this its mystery brooded;
To speak of Inez now were, one may say, 1415
Like throwing Juan in Alfonso’s way.

178

A hint, in tender cases, is enough;
Silence is best – besides there is a *tact*¹⁷⁸
(That modern phrase appears to me sad stuff,

But it will serve to keep my verse compact) 1420
Which keeps, when pushed by questions rather rough,
A lady always distant from the fact –
The charming creatures lie with such a grace,
There's nothing so becoming to the face.

179

They blush, and we believe them – at least I 1425
Have always done so; 'tis of no great use
In any case attempting a reply,
For then their eloquence grows quite profuse;
And when at length they're out of breath, they sigh
And cast their languid eyes down, and let loose 1430
A tear or two, and then we make it up,
And then – and then – and then – sit down and sup.

180

Alfonso closed his speech and begged her pardon,
Which Julia half-withheld, and then half-granted,
And laid conditions, he thought, very hard on, 1435
Denying several little things he wanted;
He stood like Adam lingering near his garden, 179
With useless penitence perplexed and haunted,
Beseeching she no further would refuse –
When lo! he stumbled o'er a pair of shoes. 1440

181

A pair of shoes! What then? Not much, if they
Are such as fit with lady's feet, but these
(No one can tell how much I grieve to say)
Were masculine: to see them and to seize
Was but a moment's act – ah wel-a-day! 180 1445

My teeth begin to chatter, my veins freeze;
Alfonso first examined well their fashion,
And then flew out into another passion.

182

He left the room for his relinquished sword
And Julia instant to the closet flew, 1450
'Fly, Juan, fly! For Heaven's sake, not a word –
The door is open, you may yet slip through
The passage you so often have explored;
Here is the garden-key – fly – fly – adieu!
Haste, haste! I hear Alfonso's hurrying feet – 1455
Day has not broke; there's no one in the street.'

183

None can say that this was not good advice,
The only mischief was it came too late;
Of all experience 'tis the usual price,
A sort of income tax 181 laid on by fate: 1460
Juan had reached the room-door in a trice
And might have done so by the garden-gate,
But met Alfonso in his dressing-gown,
Who threatened death – so Juan knocked him down.

184

Dire was the scuffle, and out went the light, 1465
Antonia cried out 'Rape!' and Julia, 'Fire!'
But not a servant stirred to aid the fight.
Alfonso, pommelled to his heart's desire,
Swore lustily he'd be revenged this night;
And Juan too blasphemed an octave higher, 1470

His blood was up – though young, he was a Tartar, 182
And not at all disposed to prove a martyr.

185

Alfonso's sword had dropped ere he could draw it,
And they continued battling hand to hand,
For Juan very luckily ne'er saw it; 1475
His temper not being under great command,
If at that moment he had chanced to claw it,
Alfonso's days had not been in the land
Much longer. Think of husbands', lovers', lives,
And how ye may be doubly widows, wives! 1480

186

Alfonso grappled to detain the foe
And Juan throttled him to get away,
And blood ('twas from the nose) began to flow;
At last, as they more faintly wrestling lay,
Juan contrived to give an awkward blow, 1485
And then his only garment quite gave way;
He fled, like Joseph, 183 leaving it – but there,
I doubt, all likeness ends between the pair.

187

Lights came at length, and men and maids who found
An awkward spectacle their eyes before: 1490
Antonia in hysterics, Julia swooned,
Alfonso leaning breathless by the door;
Some half-torn drapery scattered on the ground,
Some blood and several footsteps, but no more –
Juan the gate gained, turned the key about, 1495
And liking not the inside, locked the out.

188

Here ends this canto. Need I sing, or say,
How Juan, naked, favoured by the night
(Who favours what she should not), found his way,
And reached his home in an unseemly plight? 1500
The pleasant scandal which arose next day,
The nine days' wonder which was brought to light,
And how Alfonso sued for a divorce,
Were in the English newspapers, of course.

189

If you would like to see the whole proceedings, 1505
The depositions, and the cause at full,
The names of all the witnesses, the pleadings
Of counsel to nonsuit or to annul, 184
There's more than one edition, and the readings
Are various, but they none of them are dull; 1510
The best is that in shorthand ta'en by Gurney, 185
Who to Madrid on purpose made a journey.

190

But Donna Inez, to divert the train 186
Of one of the most circulating scandals
That had for centuries been known in Spain 1515
Since Roderic's Goths or older Genseric's Vandals, 187
First vowed (and never had she vowed in vain)
To Virgin Mary several pounds of candles;
And then by the advice of some old ladies,
She sent her son to be embarked 188 at Cadiz. 1520

191

She had resolved that he should travel through
All European climes by land or sea
To mend his former morals, or get new,
Especially in France and Italy –
At least this is the thing most people do. 1525
Julia was sent into a nunnery,
And there perhaps her feelings may be better
Shown in the following copy of her letter:

192

'They tell me 'tis decided – you depart.
'Tis wise, 'tis well, but not the less a pain; 1530
I have no further claim on your young heart –
Mine was the victim, and would be again;
To love too much has been the only art
I used; I write in haste, and if a stain
Be on this sheet, 'tis not what it appears – 1535
My eyeballs burn and throb, but have no tears.

193

I loved, I love you, for that love have lost
State, station, heaven, mankind's, my own esteem,
And yet cannot regret what it hath cost,
So dear is still the memory of that dream; 1540
Yet if I name my guilt, 'tis not to boast –
None can deem harshlier of me than I deem:
I trace this scrawl because I cannot rest,
I've nothing to reproach, nor to request.

194

Man's love is of his life a thing apart, 1545
'Tis woman's whole existence; man may range
The court, camp, church, the vessel and the mart,

Sword, gown, gain, glory, offer in exchange
Pride, fame, ambition, to fill up his heart,
And few there are whom these cannot estrange; 1550
Man has all these resources, we but one –
To love again, and be again undone.

195

My breast has been all weakness, is so yet;
I struggle, but cannot collect my mind;
My blood still rushes where my spirit's set 1555
As roll the waves before the settled wind;
My brain is feminine, nor can forget –
To all, except your image, madly blind;
As turns the needle trembling to the pole
It ne'er can reach, so turns to you, my soul. 1560

196

You will proceed in beauty and in pride,
Beloved and loving many; all is o'er
For me on earth, except some years to hide
My shame and sorrow deep in my heart's core;
These I could bear, but cannot cast aside 1565
The passion which still rends it as before,
And so farewell; forgive me, love me – no,
That word is idle now, but let it go.

197

I have no more to say, but linger still,
And dare not set my seal upon this sheet, 1570
And yet I may as well the task fulfil –
My misery can scarce be more complete;
I had not lived till now, could sorrow kill;
Death flies the wretch who fain the blow would meet,

And I must even survive this last adieu, 1575
And bear with life, to love and pray for you!’

198

This note was written upon gilt-edged paper
With a neat crow-quill – rather hard, but new;
Her small white fingers scarce could reach the taper
But trembled as magnetic needles do, 1580
And yet she did not let one tear escape her;
The seal a sunflower, ‘Elle vous suit partout’189
The motto, cut upon a white cornelian;190
The wax was superfine, its hue vermilion.

199

This was Don Juan’s earliest scrape – but whether 1585
I shall proceed with his adventures is Dependent on the public altogether;
We’ll see, however, what they say to this;
Their favour in an author’s cap’s a feather,
And no great mischief’s done by their caprice; 1590
And if their approbation we experience,
Perhaps they’ll have some more about a year hence.

200

My poem’s epic, and is meant to be Divided in twelve books, each book containing,
With love and war, a heavy gale at sea, 1595
A list of ships and captains, and kings reigning,
New characters; the episodes are three:
A panorama view of hell’s in training191
After the style of Virgil and of Homer,
So that my name of epic’s no misnomer. 1600

201

All these things will be specified in time
With strict regard to Aristotle's rules,
The vade-mecum¹⁹² of the true sublime
Which makes so many poets, and some fools;
Prose poets like blank verse, I'm fond of rhyme – 1605
Good workmen never quarrel with their tools;
I've got new mythological machinery
And very handsome supernatural scenery.

202

There's only one slight difference between
Me and my epic brethren gone before, 1610
And here the advantage is my own, I ween¹⁹³
(Not that I have no several merits more,
But this will more peculiarly be seen) –
They so embellish that 'tis quite a bore
Their labyrinth of fables to thread through, 1615
Whereas this story's actually true.

203

If any person doubt it, I appeal
To history, tradition, and to facts,
To newspapers (whose truth all know and feel),
To plays in five, and operas in three acts – 1620
All these confirm my statement a good deal,
But that which more completely faith exacts
Is that myself, and several now in Seville,
Saw Juan's last elopement with the Devil.¹⁹⁴

204

If ever I should condescend to prose, 1625
I'll write poetical commandments¹⁹⁵ which Shall supersede beyond all doubt all those
That went before; in these I shall enrich
My text with many things that no one knows,
And carry precept to the highest pitch: 1630
I'll call the work 'Longinus o'er a bottle,
Or, Every poet his own Aristotle'.

205

Thou shalt believe in Milton, Dryden, Pope;
Thou shalt not set up Wordsworth, Coleridge, Southey,
Because the first is crazed beyond all hope, 1635
The second drunk,¹⁹⁶ the third so quaint and mouthy;¹⁹⁷
With Crabbe it may be difficult to cope,
And Campbell's Hippocrene¹⁹⁸ is somewhat drouthy;¹⁹⁹
Thou shalt not steal from Samuel Rogers, nor Commit... flirtation with the muse of Moore.²⁰⁰ 1640

206

Thou shalt not covet Mr Sotheby's²⁰¹ muse,
His Pegasus,²⁰² nor anything that's his;
Thou shalt not bear false witness like the Blues²⁰³
(There's one, at least, is very fond of this);
Thou shalt not write, in short, but what I choose: 1645
This is true criticism, and you may kiss
Exactly as you please, or not, the rod –
But if you don't, I'll lay it on, by God!

207

If any person should presume to assert
 This story is not moral, first I pray 1650
That they will not cry out before they're hurt,
 Then that they'll read it o'er again, and say
(But, doubtless, nobody will be so pert)
 That this is not a moral tale, though gay;
Besides, in Canto Twelfth I mean to show 1655
The very place where wicked people go.

208

If, after all, there should be some so blind
 To their own good this warning to despise,
Led by some tortuosity²⁰⁴ of mind
 Not to believe my verse and their own eyes, 1660
And cry that they 'the moral cannot find',
 I tell him, if a clergyman, he lies;
Should captains the remark or critics make,
They also lie too – under a mistake.

209

The public approbation I expect, 1665
 And beg they'll take my word about the moral,
Which I with their amusement will connect
 (So children cutting teeth receive a coral);
Meantime, they'll doubtless please to recollect
 My epical pretensions to the laurel: 1670
For fear some prudish readers should grow skittish
I've bribed my grandmother's review – the British.²⁰⁵

210

I sent it in a letter to the editor
 Who thanked me duly by return of post –

I'm for a handsome article his creditor; 1675
 Yet if my gentle muse he please to roast,
And break a promise after having made it her,
 Denying the receipt of what it cost
And smear his page with gall²⁰⁶ instead of honey,
All I can say is – that he had the money. 1680

211

I think that with this holy new alliance
 I may ensure the public, and defy
All other magazines of art or science –
 Daily or monthly or three-monthly; I
Have not essayed²⁰⁷ to multiply their clients 1685
 Because they tell me 'twere in vain to try,
And that the Edinburgh Review and Quarterly
Treat a dissenting author very martyrly.

212

'Non ego hoc ferrem calida juventa
 Consule Planco',²⁰⁸ Horace said, and so 1690
Say I; by which quotation there is meant a
 Hint that some six or seven good years ago
(Long ere I dreamt of dating from the Brenta)²⁰⁹
 I was most ready to return a blow,
And would not brook at all this sort of thing 1695
In my hot youth – when George the third was King.

213

But now at thirty years my hair is gray
 (I wonder what it will be like at forty?
I thought of a peruke²¹⁰ the other day),

My heart is not much greener, and, in short, I 1700
Have squandered my whole summer while 'twas May,
And feel no more the spirit to retort; I
Have spent my life, both interest and principal,
And deem not what I deemed, my soul invincible.

214

No more, no more – oh never more on me 1705
The freshness of the heart can fall like dew,
Which out of all the lovely things we see
Extracts emotions beautiful and new,
Hived²¹¹ in our bosoms like the bag o' the bee:
Think'st thou the honey with those objects grew? 1710
Alas, 'twas not in them, but in thy power
To double even the sweetness of a flower.

215

No more, no more – oh never more, my heart,
Canst thou be my sole world, my universe!
Once all in all, but now a thing apart, 1715
Thou canst not be my blessing or my curse;
The illusion's gone forever, and thou art
Insensible, I trust, but none the worse,
And in thy stead I've got a deal of judgement –
Though heaven knows how it ever found a lodgement. 1720

216

My days of love are over, me no more
The charms of maid, wife, and still less of widow,
Can make the fool of which they made before;
In short, I must not lead the life I did do;
The credulous hope of mutual minds is o'er, 1725
The copious use of claret is forbid too –

So, for a good old gentlemanly vice,
I think I must take up with avarice.

217

Ambition was my idol, which was broken
Before the shrines of sorrow and of pleasure; 1730
And the two last have left me many a token
O'er which reflection may be made at leisure;
Now like Friar Bacon's brazen²¹² head I've spoken,
'Time is, time was, time's past';²¹³ a chemic²¹⁴ treasure
Is glittering youth, which I have spent betimes – 1735
My heart in passion, and my head on rhymes.

218

What is the end of fame?²¹⁵ 'Tis but to fill
A certain portion of uncertain paper;
Some liken it to climbing up a hill
Whose summit, like all hills', is lost in vapour; 1740
For this men write, speak, preach, and heroes kill,
And bards burn what they call their 'midnight taper' –
To have, when the original is dust,
A name, a wretched picture, and worse bust.²¹⁶

219

What are the hopes of man? Old Egypt's King 1745
Cheops erected the first pyramid
And largest, thinking it was just the thing
To keep his memory whole, and mummy hid;
But somebody or other rummaging,
Burglariously broke his coffin's lid: 1750
Let not a monument give you or me hopes,
Since not a pinch of dust remains of Cheops.

220

But I, being fond of true philosophy,
Say very often to myself, 'Alas!
All things that have been born were born to die, 1755
And flesh (which death mows down to hay) is grass;217
You've passed your youth not so unpleasantly,
And if you had it o'er again, 'twould pass;
So thank your stars that matters are no worse
And read your Bible, sir, and mind your purse.' 1760

221

But for the present, gentle reader and
Still gentler purchaser, the bard (that's I)
Must with permission shake you by the hand;
And so your humble servant, and goodbye!
We meet again, if we should understand 1765
Each other – and if not, I shall not try
Your patience further than by this short sample
('Twere well if others followed my example).

222

'Go, little book, from this my solitude!
I cast thee on the waters, go thy ways! 1770
And if, as I believe, thy vein be good,
The world will find thee after many days.'218
When Southey's read, and Wordsworth understood,
I can't help putting in my claim to praise;
The four first rhymes are Southey's every line – 1775
For God's sake, reader, take them not for mine!

Canto I

1 I want a hero Byron's lack of a hero is a witty variation on Virgil's epic opening, 'Of arms and the man I sing ...'

2 Juan pronounced with a hard 'J', to rhyme with 'new one' and 'true one'.

3 pantomime musical drama without words. In London, only Drury Lane and Covent Garden were allowed to perform 'spoken drama'; other theatres were confined to plays without words. Byron may well have seen Don Juan portrayed in Italian

4 Sent to the devil by contrast, Byron's poem will humanize Juan, and redeem him from the accusations commonly levelled against him.

5 Vernon...Howe celebrated eighteenth-century military and naval commanders.

6 And filled their signposts then, like Wellesley now Wellington Street and Waterloo Bridge were opened and dedicated on the anniversary of Waterloo in 1817.

7 like Banquo's monarchs stalk an allusion to the vision granted Macbeth at Macbeth IV ii 112–24.

8 'nine farrow' of that sow an allusion to the witches' spell in Macbeth IV i 64–5: 'Pour in sow's blood, that hath eaten / Her nine farrow.'

9 Charles Dumouriez (1729–1823) defeated the Austrian army in 1792 at Jemappes.

10 the Moniteur and Courier French official newspapers: Gazette Nationale; ou le moniteur universel and Courier Républicain.

11 These are politicians and military leaders involved with the French Revolution.

12Horatio, Lord Nelson (1758–1805), killed at the Battle of Trafalgar, with Napoleon's forces, 21 October 1805.

13*Because the army's grown more popular* i.e. since Waterloo.

14These are all distinguished admirals.

15Agamemnon commanded the Greeks in the Trojan wars.

16*in medias res* into the middle of things; i.e. start in mid-story. This is the recommendation of Horace, Ars Poetica 148.

17*the heroic turnpike road* i.e. the initial step in the writing of an epic poem. A 'turnpike road' is one on which turnpikes are or were erected for the collection of tolls; hence, a main road or highway.

18*and I quite agree* Byron was in Seville, 25–29 July 1809. The 'proverb' runs: 'Quien no ha visto Sevilla / No ha visto maravilla' ('Whoever has not seen Seville has not seen a marvel').

19Byron was in Cadiz, 29 July–3 August 1809.

20*hidalgo* a gentleman by birth, one of the lower nobility.

21*His mother...known* Byron always denied that Donna Inez was supposed to be a caricature of his wife, but friends recognized the similarities, and advised him not to publish the poem on that account. Lady Byron was renowned for her expertise at mathematics, classical literature and philosophy.

22*All Calderon...Lopé* Pedro Calderón de la Barca (1600–81) and Lopé de Vega (1562–1635) were Spanish playwrights.

23Gregor von Feinagle (1765–1819) devised a system of mnemonics, on which he lectured in England and Scotland in 1811.

24*Her favourite science...mathematical* Byron used to call his wife the Princess of Parallelograms.

25Attic wit is refined, delicate, and piquant.

26*dimity* stout cotton fabric; said by Thomas Moore to have been Lady Byron's favourite dress material.

27*'Tis strange...damn* 'damn' was spelt 'd-n' in the first edition. Yahweh ('I am' in Hebrew) indicates God; see Exodus 3:13–14.

28*the lamented late Sir Samuel Romilly* bitterly ironic. Romilly (1757–1818) sided with Lady Byron when she separated from her husband, earning Byron's lasting hatred. After Romilly's suicide, Byron commented: 'I still loathe him as much as we can hate dust – but that is nothing' (Marchand vi 150).

29*the state's corrector* Romilly had been MP for Westminster.

30*All is vanity* Ecclesiastes 1:2: 'Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher, vanity of vanities; all is vanity.'

31Maria Edgeworth (1767–1849) wrote educational volumes for children, including The Parent's Assistant (1796) and Practical Education (co-authored with her father, Richard Lovell Edgeworth) (1798). She was also a distinguished novelist.

32Sarah Trimmer (1741–1810) wrote a number of exemplary tales and moral lessons for children, including An Easy Introduction to the Knowledge of Nature (1790) and Instructive Tales (1810).

33Hannah More was famous in 1819 as the author of a monstrously successful didactic novel, Coelebs in Search of a Wife (1808), which had gone to a twelfth edition by the end of 1809.

34*female errors fall* an allusion to Pope, The Rape of the Lock ii 17–18: ‘If to her share some female errors fall, / Look on her face, and you’ll forget ’em all.’

35John Harrison (1693–1776), eminent horologist of the day.

36*thine ‘incomparable oil’, Macassar* Macassar oil was a tonic for the follicles advertised in hyperbolic terms that gave Byron and his cronies much amusement; see, for example, the front page of The Courier, 2 January 1809: ‘Macassar oil, for the growth of HAIR. The virtues of this oil, extracted from a tree in the island of Macassar, are proudly pre-eminent to anything ever produced in this or any other country, for improving and accelerating the growth of hair, preventing it falling off, or turning grey, giving it an incomparable gloss, and producing wonderful effects on children’s hair. Its virtues need only the test of experience to evince its extraordinary effects.’ Byron was using Macassar oil as he composed Don Juan (Marchand vi 137).

37*our first parents* Adam and Eve.

38Adam and Eve had children only after being cast out of Paradise.

39*brain them with their lady’s fan* Hotspur’s comment at 1 Henry IV II iii 22–3: ‘Zounds, and I were now by this rascal, I could brain him with his lady’s fan.’

40*falchions* broad swords.

41*ladies intellectual* a reference to Bluestocking circles of Byron’s day, which included Lady Caroline Lamb, Lady Oxford and Annabella Milbanke.

42*druggists and physicians* chemists and doctors.

43*And tried to prove...was mad* Byron believed his wife had tried to prove him mad.

44*depositions* statements, testimony (that he was mad).

45This is a description of the whispering campaign conducted against Byron by his wife.

46*malus animus* bad intent.

47*comprehends* comprises.

48*friends* in Byron's case, Hobhouse, Rogers and Madame de Staël.

49*relations* in Byron's case, his sister Augusta, and cousin George Anson Byron (who ended up supporting Lady Byron).

50*counsel* body of legal advisers.

51*the slow fever called the tertian* tertian fever progresses slowly because it strikes only every other day.

52*an honourable man* an echo of Antony's attack on Brutus and the assassins of Caesar, Julius Caesar III ii 82–3.

53The 43-year reign of Numa, second king of Rome, was known for its peaceability.

54*bilious* ill-tempered.

55*shivered* shattered.

56*Doctors' Commons* divorce courts.

57*chancery-suit* legal claim for property.

58*messuages* dwelling-place with adjoining lands.

59*The languages (especially the dead)* i.e. Latin and Greek.

60*loose* wanton, immoral.

61*vicious* immoral, depraved.

62*Ovid's a rake... Corydon* Byron lists erotic poets and poems, including Sappho's 'Ode to Aphrodite', Ovid's Amores and Ars Amatoria, the love-songs of Anacreon and Catullus, and Virgil's Eclogue ii (dealing with pederastic love).

63*Lucretius' irreligion* In De rerum natura, Lucretius attempted to show that the course of world history had taken place without divine intervention.

64*downright rude* Juvenal portrayed the vices and depravities of Roman society.

65*Martial* Roman epigrammatist, witty and indecent.

66'Fact. There is, or was, such an edition, with all the obnoxious epigrams of Martial placed by themselves at the end' (Byron's note).

67*missal* Roman Catholic prayer book containing masses for each day of the year.

68*optics* eyes.

69Jerome and Chrysostom were early Christian theologians.

70*his transgressions* i.e. as committed in his early life.

71*waxed* grew. There seems to be an echo of Christ: 'And the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom: and the grace of God was upon him' (Luke 2:40).

72*Verbum sat* 'a word [to the wise] is enough'.

73Venus' girdle ('zone') would make the wearer fall in love.

74*Boabdil wept* Mohamed XI, last Moorish king of Granada, wept when the city was besieged and surrendered to Spain, 1492.

75*race* family.

76*the aerial bow* rainbow.

77*mi vien in mente* 'it comes into my mind that...'.
77

78*clay* i.e. flesh.

79*The flesh is frail* Matthew 26:41: 'the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak.'

80St Francis had a 'wife of snow', according to Jacobus de Voragine's Golden Legend, containing the 'Life of St Francis'.

81*mulct* penalty.

82*carriage* social behaviour, conduct.

83*bland* soothing.

84Armida is the sorceress in Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered, who ensnares the hero, Rinaldo.

85*Her resolutions...quake* The comparison is with Lucretia, legendary heroine of ancient Rome, the beautiful and virtuous wife of the nobleman Lucius Tarquinius Collatinus. She was raped by Sextus Tarquinius, and later stabbed herself to death.

86*list* territory.

87*well-fenced* well-protected.

88 mail of proof good-quality chain mail; but the usage is metaphorical.

89 mole great immovable mass.

90 the sequel i.e. what follows.

91 inter nos between us.

92 man's estate i.e. manhood.

93 of condition of quality.

94 Seraphs are angels whose purpose is to adore God.

95 Ovid's Miss Medea Medea felt a sudden, overpowering love for Jason, leader of the famous Argonauts, in Ovid, Metamorphoses vii 9–10.

96 Campbell, Gertrude of Wyoming iii 1–4. Campbell was one of the few poets of his time that Byron admired (see headnote pp. 863–4).

97 So that so long as.

98 Unlike...unintelligible another gibe at The Excursion (1814), mocked for incomprehensibility in the Dedication, stanza 4, above.

99 and not Wordsworth somewhat disingenuous, as Byron is using Juan's love-sickness to burlesque Wordsworthian responses to nature.

100 mighty heart The phrase is borrowed from Wordsworth, Composed upon Westminster Bridge, 3 September 1802 14: 'And all that mighty heart is lying still.'

101 air-balloons Hot-air balloons were the invention of Joseph Michel Montgolfier, 1783. They were all the rage across Europe at this time.

102 bars barriers.

103 Boscan or Garcilasso Juan Boscán Almogáver (d. c.1543) and Garcilaso de la Vega, sixteenth-century Spanish poets who introduced Italian features into their literature through their imitations of Petrarch.

104 Nor neither.

105 which commandment is't they break 'Thou shalt not commit adultery' (Exodus 20:14).

106 no such wishes i.e. to commit adultery.

107 vicious immoral. The husband makes the mistake of unwittingly welcoming a friend who is having an affair with his wife.

108 are gone off wholly i.e. have run away together.

109 got conceived.

110 post-house inn where horses are kept for the use of travellers.

111 In Greek myth, the Fates were three goddesses who determined the course of human life.

112 post-obits legacies.

113 hourī nymph of the Muslim heaven.

114 'Anacreon' Moore Thomas Moore translated a set of 'anacreontic' poems (first printed in 1554) of unknown origin. It was one of his most successful publications.

115 creed belief.

116 strength i.e. moral strength.

117 louis gold coin issued in the reign of Louis XIII and subsequently till that of Louis XVI.

118 Which played...hair Byron is recalling Lycidas 68–9: ‘To sport with Amaryllis in the shade, / Or with the tangles of Neaera’s hair?’

119 nomenclature act of naming things.

120 Xerxes I, king who fought in the Persian Wars, 485–79 BCE. Montaigne wrote that he was ‘wrapped in all human pleasures ... [and] offered a prize to anyone who would find him others’ (‘Of Experience’).

121 vestal vow i.e. of chastity.

122 the rules Byron is thinking of the Poetics (the ‘unities’), as suggested by stanza 121.

123 Adria Venice.

124 Bacchanal profusion Bacchus was the Roman name for the god of wine. The individual grapes are, by implication, like drunken revellers.

125 prize-money proceeds from the sale of a captured ship, distributed among the captors.

126 us youth ‘They hate us youth’; Falstaff, I Henry IV II ii 93.

127 Israelites i.e. money-lenders.

128 post-obits in this case, money owed to them by the deceased, for which the heir is liable.

129 ambrosial divine; Prometheus was a demigod.

130 arts skills, abilities.

131 parts as McGann notes, an obscene pun.

132 This stanza is a catalogue of recent scientific developments. The American quack doctor Benjamin Charles Perkins made new noses; Sir William Congreve (1772–1828) invented an artillery shell, first used against the French in the Battle of Leipzig (1813); Edward Jenner (1749–1823) first vaccinated against smallpox in 1796.

133 Luigi Galvani used electricity to attempt to restore corpses to life (an inspiration for Mary Shelley's Frankenstein), as well as for therapeutic purposes (first described 1792); the Humane Society was founded 1774, for the rescue of drowning persons (the 'apparatus' is a resuscitator); the spinning-jenny was patented by James Hargreaves, 1770.

134 the great syphilis.

135 lues syphilis.

136 saving souls probably a reference to the British and Foreign Bible Society, founded 1804, which published and distributed cheap Bibles around the world. It is still going strong.

137 Davy (1778–1829), friend of Wordsworth, Coleridge, Scott and Byron, not only wrote poetry but invented the miner's safety-lamp, 1815.

138 end an obscene pun.

139 wax become.

140 awake the dead a reference to 1 Corinthians 15:51–2, which prophesies that 'the dead shall be raised incorruptible.'

141 in a crack immediately.

142 paused not did not hesitate.

143 her husband's temples to encumber Horns sprout on the foreheads of cuckolded husbands.

144 a cavalier of his condition a gentleman of his rank.

145 levee a social meeting held immediately on rising from bed; Don Alfonso has not even allowed his wife the opportunity to get up.

146 the thing he most abhorred i.e. a cuckold.

147 Arras they pricked i.e. they poked the hanging tapestry with their swords.

148 The common privileges of my sex i.e. to take a lover (or 'cortejo').

149 when I've miscarried i.e. when you've lost me.

150 rout party.

151 'Donna Julia here made a mistake. Count O'Reilly did not take Algiers – but Algiers very nearly took him. He and his army and fleet retreated with great loss, and not much credit, from before that city in the year 1775' (Byron's note). The Irish-born Spanish general Alexander O'Reilly (?1722–94) was governor of Madrid and later Cadiz. The unsuccessful assault on Algiers was mounted in 1775.

152 musico musician. Cazzani is an obscene pun on 'cazzo' (penis).

153 Corniani derives from 'cornuto' (horned, cuckolded).

154 Count Strongstroganoff Count Alexander Stroganov was a fellow-reveller of Byron's in Venice.

155 This is a disdainful reference to the peerages created by the Act of Union between Ireland and England in 1801, for which Byron's bête noire, Castlereagh, had been largely responsible. The Mount was a coffeehouse near Grosvenor Square, London.

156 I wonder in what quarter now the moon is i.e. because a full moon would explain why Don Alfonso is behaving like a lunatic.

157 sensible aware.

158 deposition statement for use as evidence.

159 I would not you for nothing should be feed I would not want you to be paid ('feed') for doing nothing.

160 closet private apartment.

161 toilet table on which toilet articles are placed.

162 antechamber waiting-room.

163 confusion over all an echo of the final line of Pope's Dunciad: 'And universal darkness buries all.'

164 my natal hour hour of my birth.

165 myrmidons base unscrupulous henchmen.

166 Achates was Aeneas' proverbially faithful companion.

167 So if.

168 Job's wife berated him: 'Dost thou still retain thine integrity? Curse God, and die' (Job 2:9).

169 in perspective i.e. stretching into the distance.

170 posse comitatus ‘the force of the county’; armed posse.

171 hiatus i.e. missing piece of evidence.

172 Nothing so dear as an unfilched good name a lighthearted echo of Othello III iii 159: ‘But he that filches from me my good name ...’

173 George, Duke of Clarence, brother of Richard III, is drowned in a barrel of malmsey wine in Shakespeare’s play (Richard III I iv 270).

174 ’Tis written...very well see 1 Kings 1:1–3. King David was revived by ‘a young virgin’.

175 at a stand i.e. at an end.

176 place job.

177 what piece of work is here! an ironic reworking of Hamlet II ii 303–4: ‘What a piece of work is a man ...’

178 tact a keen faculty of perception or discrimination likened to the sense of touch.

179 Adam lingering near his garden While being cast out of Eden in Milton’s poem, Adam and Eve lingered near the eastern gate (Paradise Lost xii 636–9).

180 ah wel-a-day cf. Coleridge, ‘Christabel’ 252.

181 income tax introduced in England as a war tax in 1799.

182 a Tartar i.e. a young savage.

183 like Joseph When Joseph refused to commit adultery with Potiphar’s wife, she claimed that he had tried to rape her, and that,

‘when he heard that I lifted up my voice and cried, that he left his garment with me, and fled, and got him out’ (Genesis 39:14).

184 to nonsuit or to annul i.e. to bring the case to an end through lack of sufficient evidence.

185 William Brodie Gurney (1777–1855), shorthand clerk in Parliament, famous for transcripts of trials and speeches of the day.

186 train progress.

187 Don Roderick was the last of Spain’s Gothic kings, and ruled in the eighth century. In the year 455 the Vandal King Genseric led a marauding expedition against Rome, which he took and completely sacked.

188 embarked put on board ship.

189 ‘She follows you everywhere.’ Byron owned a seal bearing this motto.

190 cornelian stone used for making seals (for letters).

191 training preparation.

192 vade-mecum handbook.

193 ween believe.

194 When in Seville in 1809, Byron saw a performance of El Burlador de Sevilla o el Convidado de Piedra (‘The Trickster of Seville, or the Guest Made of Stone’), by Tirso de Molina (1583–1648).

195 poetical commandments The parody of the ten commandments in the following stanzas caused uproar in England when Don Juan was first published.

196 drunk stupefied by opium.

197 quaint and mouthy affected and bombastic (in language).

198 Hippocrene fountain of Mt Helicon, sacred to the muses.

199 drouthy dry.

200 Byron thought of George Crabbe, Samuel Rogers, Thomas Moore and Thomas Campbell as among the few decent poets of his own time. Byron's comment about Campbell refers to the fact that he had recently given up poetry for the writing of prose criticism.

201 William Sotheby (1757–1833), most famous for his translation of Wieland's Oberon (1798), and for his plays, The Death of Darnley (1814) and Ivan (1816).

202 Pegasus was the winged horse who created Hippocrene, the fountain of Mt Helicon, with his hoof; he is generally referred to as a symbol of poetic inspiration.

203 the Blues i.e. the Bluestockings, many of whom were acquainted with Byron (Lady Blessington, Lady Oxford, Lady Caroline Lamb).

204 tortuosity crookedness.

205 The British Review was outraged by Don Juan, and particularly this line; its editor, William Roberts, in his review of the poem, solemnly denied the 'accusation', provoking Byron's 'Letter to the Editor of my Grandmother's Review' in the Liberal (1822).

206 gall i.e. bitterness.

207 essayed attempted.

208 Non ego...Consule Planco from Horace, Odes III xiv 27–8; translated (roughly) at lines 1695–6.

209 the Brenta The Brenta Riviera is several kilometres from Venice.

210 peruke wig.

212 brazen brass.

213 Time is, time was, time's past the words of the brass head in Robert Greene's play, Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay (1594), IV i 1584, 1595, 1604.

214 chemic i.e. transforming; alchemists attempted to convert base metals into gold.

215 What is the end of fame? Byron was disdainful of literary fame; see for instance his remarks about Southey, Dedication, l. 60.

216 and worse bust Bertel Thorwaldsen, the Danish sculptor, made a bust of Byron during his stay in Rome, summer 1817. Byron found it embarrassing, and commented that 'It is not at all like me; my expression is more unhappy.'

217 And flesh...is grass cf. Isaiah 40:6.

218 Go, little book...many days a cheeky recycling of Southey, 'L'Envoy', Carmen Nuptiale (1816).

Canto II (composed 13 December 1818–mid January 1819)

Oh ye who teach the ingenuous youth of nations –
Holland, France, England, Germany, or Spain –
I pray ye flog them upon all occasions:
It mends their morals, never mind the pain!
The best of mothers and of educations 5
In Juan's case were but employed in vain,
Since, in a way that's rather of the oddest, he Became divested of his native modesty.¹

Had he but been placed at a public school,²
In the third form, or even in the fourth, 10
His daily task had kept his fancy cool,
At least, had he been nurtured in the north;
Spain may prove an exception to the rule,
But then exceptions always prove its worth –
A lad of sixteen causing a divorce 15
Puzzled his tutors very much, of course.

I can't say that it puzzles me at all,
If all things be considered: first there was
His lady-mother, mathematical,
A – never mind; his tutor, an old ass; 20
A pretty woman (that's quite natural,
Or else the thing had hardly come to pass);

A husband rather old, not much in unity
With his young wife; a time, and opportunity.

Well – well, the world must turn upon its axis, 25
 And all mankind turn with it, heads or tails,
And live and die, make love and pay our taxes,
 And, as the veering wind shifts, shift our sails;
The king commands us, and the doctor quacks us, 3
 The priest instructs, and so our life exhales 30
A little breath, love, wine, ambition, fame,
Fighting, devotion, dust, perhaps a name.

I said that Juan had been sent to Cadiz –
 A pretty town, I recollect it well –
'Tis there the mart of the colonial trade is 35
 (Or was, before Peru learned to rebel); 4
And such sweet girls – I mean, such graceful ladies,
 Their very walk would make your bosom swell;
I can't describe it, though so much it strike,
Nor liken it – I never saw the like: 40

An Arab horse, a stately stag, a barb 5
 New broke, a cameleopard, 6 a gazelle –
No, none of these will do – and then their garb,
 Their veil and petticoat! (Alas, to dwell
Upon such things would very near absorb 45
 A canto!) Then their feet and ankles – well,
Thank heaven I've got no metaphor quite ready
(And so, my sober muse, come, let's be steady,

Chaste Muse! – Well, if you must, you must); the veil
 Thrown back a moment with the glancing hand, 50
 While the o'erpowering eye that turns you pale
 Flashes into the heart. All sunny land
 Of love, when I forget you, may I fail
 To – say my prayers; but never was there planned
 A dress through which the eyes give such a volley, 55
 Excepting the Venetian fazzioli.⁷

But to our tale: the Donna Inez sent
 Her son to Cadiz only to embark;
 To stay there had not answered her intent,
 But why? We leave the reader in the dark – 60
 'Twas for a voyage that the young man was meant,
 As if a Spanish ship were Noah's ark,
 To wean him from the wickedness of earth
 And send him like a dove of promise forth.

Don Juan bade his valet pack his things 65
 According to direction, then received
 A lecture and some money: for four springs
 He was to travel, and though Inez grieved
 (As every kind of parting has its stings),
 She hoped he would improve – perhaps believed: 70
 A letter, too, she gave (he never read it)
 Of good advice – and two or three of credit.

10

In the meantime, to pass her hours away,
Brave Inez now set up a Sunday school
For naughty children, who would rather play 75
(Like truant rogues) the devil or the fool;
Infants of three years old were taught that day,
Dunces were whipped, or set upon a stool:
The great success of Juan's education⁸
Spurred her to teach another generation. 80

11

Juan embarked, the ship got under way,
The wind was fair, the water passing rough;
A devil of a sea rolls in that bay,
As I, who've crossed it oft,⁹ know well enough;
And, standing upon deck, the dashing spray 85
Flies in one's face, and makes it weather-tough:
And there he stood to take, and take again,
His first, perhaps his last, farewell of Spain.

12

I can't but say it is an awkward sight
To see one's native land receding through 90
The growing waters;¹⁰ it unmans one quite,
Especially when life is rather new.
I recollect Great Britain's coast looks white,
But almost every other country's blue,
When gazing on them, mystified by distance, 95
We enter on our nautical existence.

13

So Juan stood, bewildered, on the deck:
The wind sung, cordage¹¹ strained, and sailors swore,

And the ship creaked, the town became a speck,
From which away so fair and fast they bore. 100
The best of remedies is a beefsteak
Against seasickness; try it, sir, before
You sneer, and I assure you this is true,
For I have found it answer – so may you.

14

Don Juan stood and, gazing from the stern, 105
Beheld his native Spain receding far.
First partings form a lesson hard to learn,
Even nations feel this when they go to war;
There is a sort of unexpressed concern,
A kind of shock that sets one's heart ajar: 12 110
At leaving even the most unpleasant people
And places, one keeps looking at the steeple.

15

But Juan had got many things to leave,
His mother, and a mistress, and no wife,
So that he had much better cause to grieve 115
Than many persons more advanced in life;
And if we now and then a sigh must heave
At quitting even those we quit in strife,
No doubt we weep for those the heart endears –
That is, till deeper griefs congeal our tears. 120

16

So Juan wept, as wept the captive Jews
By Babel's waters, still remembering Zion: 13
I'd weep, but mine is not a weeping muse,
And such light griefs are not a thing to die on;

Young men should travel, if but to amuse 125
 Themselves – and the next time their servants tie on Behind their carriages their new portmanteau,¹⁴
Perhaps it may be lined with this my canto.

17

And Juan wept, and much he sighed and thought,
 While his salt tears dropped into the salt sea, 130
‘Sweets to the sweet’¹⁵ (I like so much to quote;
 You must excuse this extract – ’tis where she,
The Queen of Denmark, for Ophelia brought Flowers to the grave), and, sobbing often, he
Reflected on his present situation, 135
And seriously resolved on reformation.

18

‘Farewell, my Spain, a long farewell!’ he cried,
 ‘Perhaps I may revisit thee no more,
But die, as many an exiled heart hath died,
 Of its own thirst to see again thy shore; 140
Farewell, where Guadalquivir’s waters glide!
 Farewell, my mother! And, since all is o’er,
Farewell, too dearest Julia!’ (Here he drew
Her letter out again, and read it through.)

19

‘And oh, if e’er I should forget, I swear – 145
 But that’s impossible, and cannot be –
Sooner shall this blue ocean melt to air,
 Sooner shall earth resolve itself to sea,
Than I resign thine image, oh my fair!
 Or think of anything excepting thee; 150

A mind diseased no remedy can physic¹⁶ –’
(Here the ship gave a lurch, and he grew seasick.)

20

‘Sooner shall heaven kiss earth –’ (Here he fell sicker)
‘Oh Julia, what is every other woe?
(For God’s sake let me have a glass of liquor, 155
Pedro, Battista,¹⁷ help me down below!)
Julia, my love! – you rascal, Pedro, quicker –
Oh Julia! – this cursed vessel pitches so –
Beloved Julia, hear me still beseeching!’
(Here he grew inarticulate with reaching.)¹⁸ 160

21

He felt that chilling heaviness of heart,
Or rather stomach – which, alas, attends,
Beyond the best apothecary’s¹⁹ art,
The loss of love, the treachery of friends,
Or death of those we dote on, when a part 165
Of us dies with them as each fond hope ends:
No doubt he would have been much more pathetic,
But the sea acted as a strong emetic.²⁰

22

Love’s a capricious power; I’ve known it hold
Out through a fever caused by its own heat, 170
But be much puzzled by a cough and cold,
And find a quinsy²¹ very hard to treat;
Against all noble maladies he’s bold,
But vulgar illnesses don’t like to meet –

Nor that a sneeze should interrupt his sigh, 175
Nor inflammations redden his blind eye.

23

But worst of all is nausea, or a pain
About the lower region of the bowels;
Love, who heroically breathes a vein,²²
Shrinks from the application of hot towels, 180
And purgatives are dangerous to his reign,
Seasickness death: his love was perfect, how else
Could Juan's passion, while the billows roar,
Resist his stomach, ne'er at sea before?

24

The ship, called the most holy Trinidad, 185
Was steering duly for the port Leghorn,
For there the Spanish family Moncada²³
Were settled long ere Juan's sire was born:
They were relations, and for them he had a
Letter of introduction, which the morn 190
Of his departure had been sent him by
His Spanish friends for those in Italy.

25

His suite consisted of three servants and
A tutor – the licentiate²⁴ Pedrillo,
Who several languages did understand, 195
But now lay sick and speechless on his pillow,
And, rocking in his hammock, longed for land,
His headache being increased by every billow;
And the waves oozing through the porthole made
His berth a little damp, and him afraid. 200

26

'Twas not without some reason, for the wind
Increased at night until it blew a gale;
And though 'twas not much to a naval mind,
Some landsmen would have looked a little pale –
For sailors are, in fact, a different kind. 205
At sunset they began to take in sail,
For the sky showed it would come on to blow,
And carry away, perhaps, a mast or so.

27

At one o'clock the wind with sudden shift
Threw the ship right into the trough of the sea,²⁵ 210
Which struck her aft, and made an awkward rift,
Started the stern-post,²⁶ also shattered the Whole of her stern-frame, and ere she could lift
Herself from out her present jeopardy
The rudder tore away: 'twas time to sound²⁷ 215
The pumps, and there were four feet water found.

28

One gang of people instantly was put
Upon the pumps, and the remainder set
To get up part of the cargo, and what-not,
But they could not come at the leak as yet; 220
At last they did get at it really, but Still their salvation was an even bet.
The water rushed through in a way quite puzzling,
While they thrust sheets, shirts, jackets, bales of muslin

29

Into the opening – but all such ingredients 225
 Would have been vain, and they must have gone down,
Despite of all their efforts and expedients,
 But for the pumps: I'm glad to make them known
To all the brother tars who may have need hence,
 For fifty tons of water were upthrown 230
By them per hour, and they had all been undone
But for their maker, Mr Mann, of London.28

30

As day advanced the weather seemed to abate,
 And then the leak they reckoned to reduce,
And keep the ship afloat, though three feet yet 235
 Kept two hand- and one chain-pump29 still in use.
The wind blew fresh again: as it grew late
 A squall came on, and while some guns broke loose,
A gust, which all descriptive power transcends,
Laid with one blast the ship on her beam-ends.30 240

31

There she lay, motionless, and seemed upset;
 The water left the hold, and washed the decks,
And made a scene men do not soon forget;
 For they remember battles, fires, and wrecks,
Or any other thing that brings regret, 245
 Or breaks their hopes, or hearts, or heads, or necks:
Thus drownings are much talked of by the divers
And swimmers who may chance to be survivors.

32

Immediately the masts were cut away,
 Both main and mizen; first the mizen went, 250

The mainmast followed. But the ship still lay
Like a mere log, and baffled our intent.
Foremast and bowsprit were cut down, and they Eased her at last (although we never meant
To part with all till every hope was blighted), 255
And then with violence the old ship righted.

33

It may be easily supposed, while this
Was going on, some people were unquiet,
That passengers would find it much amiss
To lose their lives as well as spoil their diet; 260
That even the able seaman, deeming his
Days nearly o'er, might be disposed to riot,
As upon such occasions tars will ask
For grog, and sometimes drink rum from the cask.

34

There's nought, no doubt, so much the spirit calms 265
As rum and true religion; thus it was
Some plundered, some drank spirits, some sung psalms,
The high wind made the treble, and as bass
The hoarse harsh waves kept time; fright cured the qualms
Of all the luckless landmen's seasick maws: 270
Strange sounds of wailing, blasphemy, devotion,
Clamoured in chorus to the roaring ocean.

35

Perhaps more mischief had been done, but for
Our Juan who, with sense beyond his years,
Got to the spirit-room, 31 and stood before 275
It with a pair of pistols; and their fears,
As if Death were more dreadful by his door

Of fire than water, spite of oaths and tears,
Kept still aloof the crew who, ere they sunk,
Thought it would be becoming to die drunk. 280

36

‘Give us more grog’, they cried, ‘for it will be
All one an hour hence.’ Juan answered, ‘No!
’Tis true that death awaits both you and me,
But let us die like men, not sink below
Like brutes.’ And thus his dangerous post kept he, 285
And none liked to anticipate the blow;
And even Pedrillo, his most reverend tutor,
Was for some rum a disappointed suitor.

37

The good old gentleman was quite aghast
And made a loud and a pious lamentation, 290
Repented all his sins, and made a last
Irrevocable vow of reformation;
Nothing should tempt him more (this peril past)
To quit his academic occupation
In cloisters of the classic Salamanca,³² 295
To follow Juan’s wake like Sancho Panza.³³

38

But now there came a flash of hope once more:
Day broke, and the wind lulled – the masts were gone,
The leak increased; shoals round her, but no shore,
The vessel swam, yet still she held her own. 300
They tried the pumps again, and though before
Their desperate efforts seemed all useless grown,

A glimpse of sunshine set some hands to bale –
The stronger pumped, the weaker thrummed a sail. 34

39

Under the vessel's keel the sail was past, 305
 And for the moment it had some effect;
But with a leak, and not a stick of mast,
 Nor rag of canvas, what could they expect?
But still 'tis best to struggle to the last,
'Tis never too late to be wholly wrecked – 310
And though 'tis true that man can only die once,
'Tis not so pleasant in the Gulf of Lyons.

40

There winds and waves had hurled them, and from thence,
 Without their will, they carried them away;
For they were forced with steering to dispense, 315
 And never had as yet a quiet day
On which they might repose, or even commence
 A jury-mast 35 or rudder, or could say
The ship would swim an hour, which, by good luck,
Still swam – though not exactly like a duck. 320

41

The wind, in fact, perhaps, was rather less,
 But the ship laboured so, they scarce could hope
To weather out much longer; the distress
 Was also great with which they had to cope
For want of water, and their solid mess 325
 Was scant enough: in vain the telescope
Was used – nor sail nor shore appeared in sight,
Nought but the heavy sea, and coming night.

42

Again the weather threatened; again blew
A gale, and in the fore- and after-hold 330
Water appeared – yet, though the people knew
All this, the most were patient, and some bold,
Until the chains and leathers were worn through
Of all our pumps: a wreck complete she rolled
At mercy of the waves, whose mercies are 335
Like human beings during civil war.

43

Then came the carpenter at last, with tears
In his rough eyes, and told the captain he Could do no more; he was a man in years,
And long had voyaged through many a stormy sea, 340
And if he wept at length, they were not fears
That made his eyelids as a woman's be,
But he, poor fellow, had a wife and children,
Two things for dying people quite bewildering.

44

The ship was evidently settling now 345
Fast by the head; 36 and, all distinction gone,
Some went to prayers again, and made a vow
Of candles to their saints – but there were none
To pay them with; and some looked o'er the bow;
Some hoisted out the boats; and there was one 350
That begged Pedrillo for an absolution,
Who told him to be damned – in his confusion.

45

Some lashed them in their hammocks, some put on
Their best clothes, as if going to a fair;
Some cursed the day on which they saw the sun,³⁷ 355
And gnashed their teeth and, howling, tore their hair;
And others went on as they had begun,
Getting the boats out, being well aware
That a tight boat will live in a rough sea,
Unless with breakers close beneath her lee.³⁸ 360

46

The worst of all was that, in their condition,
Having been several days in great distress,
'Twas difficult to get out such provision
As now might render their long suffering less –
Men, even when dying, dislike inanition. 365
Their stock was damaged by the weather's stress:
Two casks of biscuit and a keg of butter
Were all that could be thrown into the cutter.³⁹

47

But in the longboat they contrived to stow
Some pounds of bread, though injured by the wet; 370
Water, a twenty gallon cask or so;
Six flasks of wine; and they contrived to get
A portion of their beef up from below,
And with a piece of pork, moreover, met,
But scarce enough to serve them for a luncheon – 375
Then there was rum, eight gallons in a puncheon.⁴⁰

48

The other boats, the yawl and pinnace, had
 Been stove⁴¹ in the beginning of the gale;
And the longboat's condition was but bad,
 As there were but two blankets for a sail 380
And one oar for a mast, which a young lad
 Threw in by good luck over the ship's rail –
And two boats could not hold, far less be stored,
To save one half the people then on board.

49

'Twas twilight, and the sunless day went down 385
 Over the waste of waters, like a veil
Which, if withdrawn, would but disclose the frown
 Of one whose hate is masked but to assail;
Thus to their hopeless eyes the night was shown
 And grimly darkled o'er their faces pale, 390
And the dim desolate deep; twelve days had Fear
Been their familiar, and now Death was here.

50

Some trial had been making at a raft
 With little hope in such a rolling sea –
A sort of thing at which one would have laughed, 395
 If any laughter at such times could be,
Unless with people who too much have quaffed,
 And have a kind of wild and horrid glee,
Half-epileptical, and half-hysterical:
Their preservation would have been a miracle. 400

51

At half-past eight o'clock, booms, hencoops, spars,
 And all things, for a chance, had been cast loose,
That still could keep afloat the struggling tars –

For yet⁴² they strove, although of no great use.
There was no light in heaven but a few stars, 405
The boats put off o'ercrowded with their crews;
She gave a heel, and then a lurch to port,
And, going down head foremost – sunk, in short.

52

Then rose from sea to sky the wild farewell,
Then shrieked the timid, and stood still the brave, 410
Then some leaped overboard with dreadful yell,
As eager to anticipate their grave;
And the sea yawned around her like a hell,
And down she sucked with her the whirling wave,
Like one who grapples with his enemy, 415
And strives to strangle him before he die.

53

And first one universal shriek there rushed,
Louder than the loud ocean, like a crash
Of echoing thunder; and then all was hushed
Save the wild wind and the remorseless dash 420
Of billows; but at intervals there gushed,
Accompanied with a convulsive splash,
A solitary shriek, the bubbling cry
Of some strong swimmer in his agony.

54

The boats, as stated, had got off before, 425
And in them crowded several of the crew;
And yet their present hope was hardly more
Than what it had been, for so strong it blew
There was slight chance of reaching any shore;
And then they were too many, though so few – 430

Nine in the cutter, thirty in the boat
Were counted in them when they got afloat.

55

All the rest perished; near two hundred souls
Had left their bodies – and, what’s worse, alas!
When over Catholics the ocean rolls, 435
They must wait several weeks before a mass
Takes off one peck⁴³ of purgatorial coals,
Because, till people know what’s come to pass,
They won’t lay out their money on the dead:
It costs three francs for every mass that’s said. 440

56

Juan got into the longboat, and there
Contrived to help Pedrillo to a place;
It seemed as if they had exchanged their care,
For Juan wore the magisterial face 445
Which courage gives, while poor Pedrillo’s pair
Of eyes were crying for their owner’s case:
Battista, though (a name called shortly Tita),
Was lost by getting at some aqua vita.⁴⁴

57

Pedro, his valet, too, he tried to save,
But the same cause, conducive to his loss, 450
Left him so drunk, he jumped into the wave
As o’er the cutter’s edge he tried to cross,
And so he found a wine-and-watery grave;
They could not rescue him although so close,
Because the sea ran higher every minute, 455
And for the boat – the crew kept crowding in it.

58

A small old spaniel which had been Don José's,
His father's, whom he loved, as ye may think
(For on such things the memory reposes
With tenderness), stood howling on the brink, 460
Knowing (dogs have such intellectual noses!),
No doubt, the vessel was about to sink;
And Juan caught him up, and ere he stepped
Off, threw him in, then after him he leapt.

59

He also stuffed his money where he could 465
About his person, and Pedrillo's too –
Who let him do, in fact, whate'er he would,
Not knowing what himself to say or do,
As every rising wave his dread renewed;
But Juan, trusting they might still get through, 470
And deeming there were remedies for any ill,
Thus re-embarked⁴⁵ his tutor and his spaniel.

60

'Twas a rough night, and blew so stiffly yet,
That the sail was becalmed between the seas,
Though on the wave's high top too much to set, 475
They dared not take it in for all the breeze;
Each sea curled o'er the stern, and kept them wet,
And made them bale without a moment's ease,
So that themselves as well as hopes were damped,
And the poor little cutter quickly swamped. 480

61

Nine souls more went in her: the longboat still
Kept above water, with an oar for mast;
Two blankets stitched together, answering ill
Instead of sail, were to the oar made fast –
Though every wave rolled menacing to fill, 485
And present peril all before surpassed,
They grieved for those who perished with the cutter,
And also for the biscuit casks and butter.

62

The sun rose red and fiery, a sure sign
Of the continuance of the gale: to run 490
Before the sea, until it should grow fine,
Was all that for the present could be done.
A few teaspoonfuls of their rum and wine
Was served out to the people, who begun
To faint, and damaged bread wet through the bags, 495
And most of them had little clothes but rags.

63

They counted thirty, crowded in a space
Which left scarce room for motion or exertion.
They did their best to modify their case:
One half sat up, though numbed with the immersion, 500
While t'other half were laid down in their place
At watch and watch; thus, shivering like the tertian
Ague⁴⁶ in its cold fit, they filled their boat,
With nothing but the sky for a greatcoat.

64

'Tis very certain the desire of life 505
Prolongs it; this is obvious to physicians
When patients, neither plagued with friends nor wife,

Survive through very desperate conditions,
Because they still can hope, nor shines the knife
Nor shears of Atropos⁴⁷ before their visions: 510
Despair of all recovery spoils longevity,
And makes men's miseries of alarming brevity.

65

'Tis said that persons living on annuities
Are longer lived than others – God knows why,
Unless to plague the grantors;⁴⁸ yet so true it is, 515
That some, I really think, do never die.
Of any creditors the worst a Jew it is,
And that's their mode of furnishing supply:
In my young days they lent me cash that way,
Which I found very troublesome to pay.⁴⁹ 520

66

'Tis thus with people in an open boat,
They live upon the love of life, and bear
More than can be believed, or even thought,
And stand like rocks the tempest's wear and tear;
And hardship still has been the sailor's lot 525
Since Noah's ark went cruising here and there;
She had a curious crew as well as cargo,
Like the first old Greek privateer, the Argo.⁵⁰

67

But man is a carnivorous production
And must have meals, at least one meal a day; 530
He cannot live, like woodcocks, upon suction,⁵¹
But, like the shark and tiger, must have prey –

Although his anatomical construction
Bears vegetables in a grumbling way,
Your labouring people think beyond all question 535
Beef, veal, and mutton, better for digestion.

68

And thus it was with this our hapless crew,
For on the third day there came on a calm,
And though at first their strength it might renew,
And lying on their weariness like balm, 540
Lulled them like turtles sleeping on the blue
Of ocean, when they woke they felt a qualm,
And fell all ravenously on their provision,
Instead of hoarding it with due precision.

69

The consequence was easily foreseen: 545
They ate up all they had, and drank their wine
In spite of all remonstrances, and then –
On what, in fact, next day were they to dine?
They hoped the wind would rise, these foolish men,
And carry them to shore! These hopes were fine, 550
But as they had but one oar, and that brittle,
It would have been more wise to save their victual. 52

70

The fourth day came, but not a breath of air,
And ocean slumbered like an unweaned child;
The fifth day, and their boat lay floating there, 555
The sea and sky were blue, and clear, and mild –
With their one oar (I wish they had had a pair)
What could they do? And hunger's rage grew wild;

So Juan's spaniel, spite of his entreating,
Was killed, and portioned out for present eating. 560

71

On the sixth day they fed upon his hide,
And Juan, who had still refused, because
The creature was his father's dog that died,
Now feeling all the vulture⁵³ in his jaws,
With some remorse received (though first denied) 565
As a great favour one of the forepaws,
Which he divided with Pedrillo, who
Devoured it, longing for the other too.

72

The seventh day, and no wind; the burning sun
Blistered and scorched, and, stagnant on the sea, 570
They lay like carcasses; and hope was none,
Save in the breeze that came not. Savagely
They glared upon each other – all was done,
Water, and wine, and food; and you might see
The longings of the cannibal arise 575
(Although they spoke not) in their wolfish eyes.

73

At length one whispered his companion, who
Whispered another, and thus it went round,
And then into a hoarser murmur grew –
An ominous, and wild, and desperate sound; 580
And when his comrade's thought each sufferer knew,
'Twas but his own, suppressed till now, he found.
And out they spoke of lots for flesh and blood,
And who should die to be his fellow's food.

74

But ere they came to this, they that day shared 585
 Some leathern caps, and what remained of shoes;
And then they looked around them and despaired,
 And none to be the sacrifice would choose;
At length the lots were torn up and prepared,
 But of materials that much shock the muse – 590
Having no paper, for the want of better,
They took by force from Juan Julia's letter.

75

The lots were made, and marked, and mixed and handed
 In silent horror, and their distribution
Lulled even the savage hunger which demanded, 595
 Like the Promethean vulture, 54 this pollution; 55
None in particular had sought or planned it,
 'Twas nature gnawed them to this resolution
By which none were permitted to be neuter 56 –
And the lot fell on Juan's luckless tutor. 600

76

He but requested to be bled to death:
 The surgeon had his instruments, and bled
Pedrillo, and so gently ebb'd his breath,
 You hardly could perceive when he was dead.
He died as born, a Catholic in faith, 605
 Like most in the belief in which they're bred,
And first a little crucifix he kissed,
And then held out his jugular and wrist.

77

The surgeon, as there was no other fee,
Had his first choice of morsels for his pains; 610
But being thirstiest at the moment, he
Preferred a draught from the fast-flowing veins:
Part was divided, part thrown in the sea,
And such things as the entrails and the brains
Regaled two sharks, who followed o'er the billow – 615
The sailors ate the rest of poor Pedrillo.

78

The sailors ate him, all save three or four
Who were not quite so fond of animal food;
To these was added Juan who, before
Refusing his own spaniel, hardly could 620
Feel now his appetite increased much more;
'Twas not to be expected that he should,
Even in extremity of their disaster,
Dine with them on his pastor and his master.

79

'Twas better that he did not, for, in fact, 625
The consequence was awful in the extreme;
For they who were most ravenous in the act
Went raging mad – Lord, how they did blaspheme,
And foam and roll, with strange convulsions racked,
Drinking salt-water like a mountain-stream, 630
Tearing and grinning, howling, screeching, swearing,
And, with hyena laughter, died despairing.

80

Their numbers were much thinned by this infliction,
And all the rest were thin enough, Heaven knows;
And some of them had lost their recollection, 635

Happier than they who still perceived their woes;
But others pondered on a new dissection,
As if not warned sufficiently by those
Who had already perished, suffering madly,
For having used their appetites so sadly. 640

81

And next they thought upon the master's mate
As fattest – but he saved himself because,
Besides being much averse from such a fate,
There were some other reasons: the first was
He had been rather indisposed of late; 645
And that which chiefly proved his saving clause
Was a small present made to him at Cadiz,
By general subscription of the ladies.57

82

Of poor Pedrillo something still remained,
But was used sparingly – some were afraid, 650
And others still their appetites constrained,
Or but at times a little supper made;
All except Juan, who throughout abstained,
Chewing a piece of bamboo, and some lead:
At length they caught two boobies and a noddy,58 655
And then they left off eating the dead body.

83

And if Pedrillo's fate should shocking be,
Remember Ugolino condescends
To eat the head of his arch-enemy
The moment after he politely ends 660
His tale;59 if foes be food in hell, at sea

'Tis surely fair to dine upon our friends
When shipwreck's short allowance grows too scanty,
Without being much more horrible than Dante.

84

And the same night there fell a shower of rain 665
For which their mouths gaped, like the cracks of earth
When dried to summer dust; till taught by pain,
Men really know not what good water's worth:
If you had been in Turkey or in Spain,
Or with a famished boat's-crew had your berth, 670
Or in the desert heard the camel's bell,
You'd wish yourself where Truth is – in a well.

85

It poured down torrents, but they were no richer
Until they found a ragged piece of sheet
Which served them as a sort of spongy pitcher, 675
And when they deemed its moisture was complete,
They wrung it out, and though a thirsty ditcher⁶⁰
Might not have thought the scanty draught so sweet
As a full pot of porter, to their thinking
They ne'er till now had known the joys of drinking. 680

86

And their baked lips,⁶¹ with many a bloody crack,
Sucked in the moisture, which like nectar streamed;
Their throats were ovens, their swoln tongues were black
As the rich man's in hell,⁶² who vainly screamed
To beg the beggar, who could not rain back 685
A drop of dew, when every drop had seemed

To taste of heaven (if this be true, indeed,
Some Christians have a comfortable creed).

87

There were two fathers in this ghastly crew,
And with them their two sons, of whom the one 690
Was more robust and hardy to the view,
But he died early; and when he was gone,
His nearest messmate⁶³ told his sire, who threw
One glance on him, and said, 'Heaven's will be done!
I can do nothing', and he saw him thrown 695
Into the deep without a tear or groan.

88

The other father had a weaklier child,
Of a soft cheek, and aspect delicate;
But the boy bore up long, and with a mild
And patient spirit held aloof his fate; 700
Little he said, and now and then he smiled,
As if to win a part from off the weight
He saw increasing on his father's heart,
With the deep deadly thought that they must part.

89

And o'er him bent his sire, and never raised 705
His eyes from off his face, but wiped the foam
From his pale lips, and ever on him gazed,
And when the wished-for shower at length was come,
And the boy's eyes, which the dull film half glazed,
Brightened, and for a moment seemed to roam, 710
He squeezed from out a rag some drops of rain
Into his dying child's mouth – but in vain.

90

The boy expired; the father held the clay,⁶⁴
And looked upon it long, and when at last
Death left no doubt, and the dead burden lay 715
Stiff on his heart, and pulse and hope were past,
He watched it wistfully, until away
'Twas borne by the rude wave wherein 'twas cast.
Then he himself sunk down all dumb and shivering,
And gave no sign of life, save his limbs quivering. 720

91

Now overhead a rainbow, bursting through
The scattering clouds, shone, spanning the dark sea,
Resting its bright base on the quivering blue;
And all within its arch appeared to be
Clearer than that without, and its wide hue 725
Waxed⁶⁵ broad and waving, like a banner free,
Then changed like to a bow that's bent, and then
Forsook the dim eyes of these shipwrecked men.

92

It changed, of course; a heavenly chameleon,
The airy child of vapour and the sun, 730
Brought forth in purple, cradled in vermilion,
Baptized in molten gold, and swathed in dun,⁶⁶
Glittering like crescents o'er a Turk's pavilion,
And blending every colour into one,
Just like a black eye in a recent scuffle⁶⁷ 735
(For sometimes we must box without the muffle).⁶⁸

93

Our shipwrecked seamen thought it a good omen –
It is as well to think so, now and then;
'Twas an old custom of the Greek and Roman,
And may become of great advantage when 740
Folks are discouraged; and most surely no men
Had greater need to nerve themselves again
Than these, and so this rainbow looked like hope –
Quite a celestial kaleidoscope.69

94

About this time a beautiful white bird, 745
Webfooted, not unlike a dove in size
And plumage (probably it might have erred
Upon its course), passed oft before their eyes
And tried to perch, although it saw and heard
The men within the boat, and in this guise 750
It came and went, and fluttered round them till
Night fell – this seemed a better omen still.

95

But in this case I also must remark
'Twas well this bird of promise did not perch,
Because the tackle of our shattered bark 755
Was not so safe for roosting as a church;
And had it been the dove from Noah's ark,
Returning there from her successful search,
Which in their way that moment chanced to fall,
They would have eat70 her, olive-branch and all.71 760

96

With twilight it again came on to blow,
But not with violence; the stars shone out,

The boat made way; yet now they were so low,
They knew not where nor what they were about;
Some fancied they saw land, and some said 'No!' 765
The frequent fog-banks gave them cause to doubt –
Some swore that they heard breakers,⁷² others guns,
And all mistook about the latter once.

97

As morning broke the light wind died away,
When he who had the watch sung out and swore 770
If 'twas not land that rose with the sun's ray,
He wished that land he never might see more;
And the rest rubbed their eyes, and saw a bay,
Or thought they saw, and shaped their course for shore –
For shore it was,⁷³ and gradually grew 775
Distinct, and high, and palpable to view.

98

And then of these some part burst into tears,
And others, looking with a stupid stare,
Could not yet separate their hopes from fears,
And seemed as if they had no further care; 780
While a few prayed (the first time for some years),
And at the bottom of the boat three were
Asleep; they shook them by the hand and head,
And tried to awaken them, but found them dead.

99

The day before, fast sleeping on the water, 785
They found a turtle of the hawk's-bill kind,
And by good fortune gliding softly, caught her,
Which yielded a day's life, and to their mind

Proved even still a more nutritious matter
Because it left encouragement behind: 790
They thought that in such perils, more than chance
Had sent them this for their deliverance.

100

The land appeared a high and rocky coast,
And higher grew the mountains as they drew,
Set by a current, toward it: they were lost 795
In various conjectures, for none knew
To what part of the earth they had been tossed,
So changeable had been the winds that blew;
Some thought it was Mount Etna, some the highlands
Of Candia,⁷⁴ Cyprus, Rhodes, or other islands. 800

101

Meantime the current, with a rising gale,
Still set them onwards to the welcome shore
Like Charon's bark of spectres,⁷⁵ dull and pale.
Their living freight was now reduced to four,
And three dead, whom their strength could not avail 805
To heave into the deep with those before –
Though the two sharks still followed them, and dashed
The spray into their faces as they splashed.

102

Famine, despair, cold, thirst and heat, had done
Their work on them by turns, and thinned them to 810
Such things a mother had not known her son
Amidst the skeletons of that gaunt crew;
By night chilled, by day scorched – thus one by one
They perished, until withered to these few,

But chiefly by a species of self-slaughter, 815
In washing down Pedrillo with salt water.

103

As they drew nigh the land, which now was seen
Unequal in its aspect here and there,
They felt the freshness of its growing green
That waved in forest-tops and smoothed the air, 820
And fell upon their glazed eyes like a screen
From glistening waves, and skies so hot and bare –
Lovely seemed any object that should sweep
Away the vast, salt, dread, eternal deep.

104

The shore looked wild, without a trace of man, 825
And girt by formidable waves; but they
Were mad for land, and thus their course they ran,
Though right ahead the roaring breakers lay:
A reef between them also now began
To show its boiling surf and bounding spray – 830
But finding no place for their landing better,
They ran the boat for shore, and overset⁷⁶ her.

105

But in his native stream, the Guadalquivir,
Juan to lave his youthful limbs was wont;
And having learnt to swim in that sweet river, 835
Had often turned the art to some account:
A better swimmer you could scarce see ever,
He could, perhaps, have passed the Hellespont,
As once (a feat on which ourselves we prided)
Leander, Mr Ekenhead, and I did.⁷⁷ 840

106

So here, though faint, emaciated, and stark,
He buoyed his boyish limbs, and strove to ply
With the quick wave, and gain, ere it was dark,
The beach which lay before him, high and dry:
The greatest danger here was from a shark 845
That carried off his neighbour by the thigh;
As for the other two they could not swim,
So nobody arrived on shore but him.

107

Nor yet had he arrived but for the oar,
Which, providentially for him, was washed 850
Just as his feeble arms could strike no more,
And the hard wave o'erwhelmed him as 'twas dashed
Within his grasp; he clung to it, and sore
The waters beat while he thereto was lashed;
At last, with swimming, wading, scrambling, he 855
Rolled on the beach, half-senseless, from the sea.

108

There, breathless, with his digging nails he clung
Fast to the sand, lest the returning wave,
From whose reluctant⁷⁸ roar his life he wrung,
Should suck him back to her insatiate grave: 860
And there he lay, full-length, where he was flung,
Before the entrance of a cliff-worn cave,
With just enough of life to feel its pain,
And deem that it was saved, perhaps, in vain.

109

With slow and staggering effort he arose, 865
 But sunk again upon his bleeding knee
And quivering hand; and then he looked for those
 Who long had been his mates upon the sea,
But none of them appeared to share his woes
 Save one, a corpse from out the famished three, 870
Who died two days before, and now had found
An unknown barren beach for burial ground.

110

And as he gazed, his dizzy brain spun fast,
 And down he sunk; and as he sunk, the sand
Swam round and round, and all his senses passed: 875
 He fell upon his side, and his stretched hand
Drooped dripping on the oar (their jury-mast),⁷⁹
 And, like a withered lily, on the land
His slender frame and pallid aspect lay,
As fair a thing as e'er was formed of clay.⁸⁰ 880

111

How long in his damp trance young Juan lay⁸¹
 He knew not, for the earth was gone for him,
And Time had nothing more of night nor day
 For his congealing blood, and senses dim;
And how this heavy faintness passed away 885
 He knew not, till each painful pulse and limb
And tingling vein seemed throbbing back to life –
For Death, though vanquished, still retired with strife.

112

His eyes he opened, shut, again unclosed,
 For all was doubt and dizziness; methought 890

He still was in the boat, and had but dozed,
And felt again with his despair o'erwrought,
And wished it death in which he had reposed,
And then once more his feelings back were brought;
And slowly by his swimming eyes was seen 895
A lovely female face of seventeen.

113

'Twas bending close o'er his, and the small mouth
Seemed almost prying into his for breath;
And chafing him, the soft warm hand of youth
Recalled his answering spirits back from death; 900
And, bathing his chill temples, tried to soothe
Each pulse to animation, till beneath
Its gentle touch and trembling care, a sigh
To these kind efforts made a low reply.

114

Then was the cordial poured, and mantle flung 905
Around his scarce-clad limbs; and the fair arm
Raised higher the faint head which o'er it hung;
And her transparent cheek, all pure and warm,
Pillowed his death-like forehead; then she wrung
His dewy curls, long drenched by every storm; 910
And watched with eagerness each throb that drew
A sigh from his heaved bosom – and hers too.

115

And lifting him with care into the cave,
The gentle girl, and her attendant – one
Young, yet her elder, and of brow less grave, 915
And more robust of figure – then begun
To kindle fire, and as the new flames gave

Light to the rocks that roofed them, which the sun
Had never seen, the maid, or whatsoe'er
She was, appeared distinct, and tall, and fair. 920

116

Her brow was overhung with coins of gold
That sparkled o'er the auburn of her hair,
Her clustering hair, whose longer locks were rolled
In braids behind, and though her stature were
Even of the highest for a female mould, 925
They nearly reached her heel; and in her air
There was a something which bespoke command,
As one who was a lady in the land.

117

Her hair, I said, was auburn; but her eyes
Were black as death, their lashes the same hue, 930
Of downcast length, in whose silk shadow lies
Deepest attraction – for when to the view
Forth from its raven fringe the full glance flies,
Ne'er with such force the swiftest arrow flew;
'Tis as the snake late coiled, who pours his length, 935
And hurls at once his venom and his strength.

118

Her brow was white and low, her cheek's pure dye
Like twilight rosy still with the set sun;
Short upper lip, sweet lips! – that make us sigh
Ever to have seen such, for she was one 940
Fit for the model of a statuary
(A race of mere impostors, when all's done;
I've seen much finer women, ripe and real,
Than all the nonsense of their stone⁸² ideal).

119

I'll tell you why I say so, for 'tis just 945
One should not rail without a decent cause:
There was an Irish lady,⁸³ to whose bust
I ne'er saw justice done, and yet she was
A frequent model; and if e'er she must
Yield to stern Time and Nature's wrinkling laws, 950
They will destroy a face which mortal thought
Ne'er compassed, nor less mortal chisel wrought.

120

And such was she, the lady of the cave:
Her dress was very different from the Spanish –
Simpler, and yet of colours not so grave; 955
For, as you know, the Spanish women banish
Bright hues when out of doors, and yet, while wave
Around them (what I hope will never vanish)
The basquiña⁸⁴ and the mantilla,⁸⁵ they Seem at the same time mystical⁸⁶ and gay. 960

121

But with our damsel this was not the case:
Her dress was many-coloured, finely spun;
Her locks curled negligently round her face,
But through them gold and gems profusely shone;
Her girdle sparkled, and the richest lace 965
Flowed in her veil, and many a precious stone
Flashed on her little hand; but, what was shocking,
Her small snow feet had slippers, but no stocking.

122

The other female's dress was not unlike,
But of inferior materials; she 970
Had not so many ornaments to strike⁸⁷ –
Her hair had silver only, bound to be
Her dowry; and her veil, in form alike,
Was coarser; and her air, though firm, less free;
Her hair was thicker, but less long; her eyes 975
As black, but quicker, and of smaller size.

123

And these two tended him, and cheered him both
With food and raiment, and those soft attentions
Which are (as I must own) of female growth,
And have ten thousand delicate inventions: 980
They made a most superior mess of broth,
A thing which poesy but seldom mentions,
But the best dish that e'er was cooked since Homer's
Achilles ordered dinner for newcomers.⁸⁸

124

I'll tell you who they were, this female pair, 985
Lest they should seem princesses in disguise;
Besides, I hate all mystery, and that air
Of claptrap, which your recent poets prize;
And so, in short, the girls they really were
They shall appear before your curious eyes – 990
Mistress and maid; the first was only daughter
Of an old man, who lived upon the water.

125

A fisherman he had been in his youth,
And still a sort of fisherman was he;

But other speculations were, in sooth, 995
 Added to his connection with the sea –
Perhaps not so respectable, in truth:
 A little smuggling, and some piracy
Left him, at last, the sole of many masters
Of an ill-gotten million of piastres.⁸⁹ 1000

126

A fisher, therefore, was he – though of men,
 Like Peter the Apostle⁹⁰ – and he fished
For wandering merchant vessels, now and then,
 And sometimes caught as many as he wished;
The cargoes he confiscated, and gain 1005
 He sought in the slave-market too, and dished
Full many a morsel for that Turkish trade,
By which, no doubt, a good deal may be made.

127

He was a Greek, and on his isle had built
 (One of the wild and smaller Cyclades)⁹¹ 1010
A very handsome house from out his guilt,
 And there he lived exceedingly at ease;
Heaven knows what cash he got, or blood he spilt –
 A sad⁹² old fellow was he, if you please,
But this I know: it was a spacious building, 1015
Full of barbaric carving, paint, and gilding.

128

He had an only daughter called Haidee,⁹³
 The greatest heiress of the Eastern Isles;
Besides, so very beautiful was she,

Her dowry was as nothing to her smiles: 1020
Still in her teens, and like a lovely tree
She grew to womanhood, and between whiles
Rejected several suitors, just to learn
How to accept a better in his turn.

129

And walking out upon the beach below 1025
The cliff, towards sunset, on that day she found,
Insensible – not dead, but nearly so –
Don Juan, almost famished, and half-drowned;
But being naked, she was shocked, you know,
Yet deemed herself in common pity bound, 1030
As far as in her lay, ‘to take him in,
A stranger’, 94 dying, with so white a skin.

130

But taking him into her father’s house
Was not exactly the best way to save,
But like conveying to the cat the mouse, 1035
Or people in a trance into their grave;
Because the good old man had so much voice, 95
Unlike the honest Arab thieves so brave,
He would have hospitably cured the stranger,
And sold him instantly when out of danger. 1040

131

And therefore, with her maid, she thought it best
(A virgin always on her maid relies)
To place him in the cave for present rest;
And when, at last, he opened his black eyes,
Their charity increased about their guest, 1045

And their compassion grew to such a size,
It opened half the turnpike-gates to heaven
(St Paul says 'tis the toll which must be given).⁹⁶

132

They made a fire, but such a fire as they
Upon the moment could contrive with such 1050
Materials as were cast up round the bay –
Some broken planks, and oars, that to the touch
Were nearly tinder, since so long they lay,
A mast was almost crumbled to a crutch;
But, by God's grace, here wrecks were in such plenty, 1055
That there was fuel to have furnished twenty.

133

He had a bed of furs, and a pelisse,⁹⁷
For Haidee stripped her sables off to make
His couch; and, that he might be more at ease
And warm, in case by chance he should awake, 1060
They also gave a petticoat apiece,
She and her maid, and promised by daybreak
To pay him a fresh visit, with a dish
For breakfast, of eggs, coffee, bread, and fish.

134

And thus they left him to his lone repose. 1065
Juan slept like a top,⁹⁸ or like the dead
Who sleep at last, perhaps (God only knows),
Just for the present; and in his lulled head
Not even a vision of his former woes
Throbbled in accursed dreams, which sometimes spread 1070

Unwelcome visions of our former years,
Till the eye, cheated, opens thick with tears.

135

Young Juan slept all dreamless, but the maid
Who smoothed his pillow as she left the den
Looked back upon him, and a moment stayed, 1075
And turned, believing that he called again.
He slumbered; yet she thought, at least she said
(The heart will slip even as the tongue and pen),
He had pronounced her name – but she forgot
That at this moment Juan knew it not. 1080

136

And pensive to her father's house she went,
Enjoining silence strict to Zoe,⁹⁹ who
Better than her knew what, in fact, she meant,
She being wiser by a year or two:
A year or two's an age when rightly spent, 1085
And Zoe spent hers, as most women do,
In gaining all that useful sort of knowledge
Which is acquired in nature's good old college.

137

The morn broke, and found Juan slumbering still
Fast in his cave, and nothing clashed upon 1090
His rest; the rushing of the neighbouring rill
And the young beams of the excluded sun
Troubled him not, and he might sleep his fill;
And need he had of slumber yet, for none
Had suffered more – his hardships were comparative 1095
To those related in my granddad's Narrative.¹⁰⁰

138

Not so Haidee: she sadly tossed and tumbled,
And started from her sleep, and, turning o'er,
Dreamed of a thousand wrecks o'er which she stumbled,
And handsome corpses strewed upon the shore; 1100
And woke her maid so early that she grumbled,
And called her father's old slaves up, who swore
In several oaths – Armenian, Turk, and Greek;
They knew not what to think of such a freak. 101

139

But up she got, and up she made them get 1105
With some pretence about the sun, that makes
Sweet skies just when he rises, or is set;
And 'tis, no doubt, a sight to see when breaks
Bright Phoebus, while the mountains still are wet
With mist, and every bird with him awakes, 1110
And night is flung off like a mourning suit
Worn for a husband, or some other brute.

140

I say, the sun is a most glorious sight;
I've seen him rise full oft, indeed of late
I have sat up on purpose all the night, 1115
Which hastens, as physicians say, one's fate –
And so all ye, who would be in the right
In health and purse, begin your day to date
From daybreak, and when coffined at fourscore, 102
Engrave upon the plate, you rose at four. 1120

141

And Haidee met the morning face to face;
Her own was freshest, though a feverish flush
Had dyed it with the headlong blood, whose race
From heart to cheek is curbed into a blush,
Like to a torrent which a mountain's base, 1125
That overpowers some alpine river's rush,
Checks to a lake, whose waves in circles spread,
Or the Red Sea – but the sea is not red.

142

And down the cliff the island virgin came,
And near the cave her quick light footsteps drew, 1130
While the sun smiled on her with his first flame,
And young Aurora¹⁰³ kissed her lips with dew,
Taking her for a sister; just the same
Mistake you would have made on seeing the two,
Although the mortal, quite as fresh and fair, 1135
Had all the advantage too of not being air.

143

And when into the cavern Haidee stepped
All timidly, yet rapidly, she saw
That like an infant Juan sweetly slept;
And then she stopped, and stood as if in awe 1140
(For sleep is awful),¹⁰⁴ and on tiptoe crept
And wrapped him closer, lest the air, too raw,
Should reach his blood, then o'er him still as death
Bent, with hushed lips, that drank his scarce-drawn breath.

144

And thus like to an angel o'er the dying 1145
Who die in righteousness,¹⁰⁵ she leaned; and there

All tranquilly the shipwrecked boy was lying,
As o'er him lay the calm and stirless air.
But Zoe the meantime some eggs was frying,
Since, after all, no doubt the youthful pair 1150
Must breakfast, and betimes; lest they should ask it,
She drew out her provision from the basket.

145

She knew that the best feelings must have victual
And that a shipwrecked youth would hungry be;
Besides, being less in love, she yawned a little, 1155
And felt her veins chilled by the neighbouring sea.
And so she cooked their breakfast to a tittle; 106
I can't say that she gave them any tea,
But there were eggs, fruit, coffee, bread, fish, honey,
With Scio 107 wine – and all for love, not money. 1160

146

And Zoe, when the eggs were ready, and
The coffee made, would fain have wakened Juan,
But Haidee stopped her with her quick small hand,
And without a word, a sign her finger drew on
Her lip, which Zoe needs must understand; 1165
And, the first breakfast spoilt, prepared a new one,
Because her mistress would not let her break
That sleep which seemed as it would ne'er awake.

147

For still he lay, and on his thin worn cheek
A purple hectic 108 played like dying day 1170
On the snow-tops of distant hills; the streak
Of sufferance yet upon his forehead lay,

Where the blue veins looked shadowy, shrunk, and weak;
And his black curls were dewy with the spray
Which weighed upon them yet, all damp and salt, 1175
Mixed with the stony vapours of the vault.

148

And she bent o'er him, and he lay beneath,
Hushed as the babe upon its mother's breast,
Drooped as the willow when no winds can breathe,
Lulled like the depth of ocean when at rest, 1180
Fair as the crowning rose of the whole wreath,
Soft as the callow cygnet¹⁰⁹ in its nest;
In short, he was a very pretty fellow,
Although his woes had turned him rather yellow.

149

He woke and gazed, and would have slept again, 1185
But the fair face which met his eyes forbade
Those eyes to close, though weariness and pain
Had further sleep a further pleasure made;
For woman's face was never formed in vain
For Juan, so that, even when he prayed, 1190
He turned from grisly saints and martyrs hairy
To the sweet portraits of the Virgin Mary.

150

And thus upon his elbow he arose,
And looked upon the lady, in whose cheek
The pale contended with the purple rose, 1195
As with an effort she began to speak;
Her eyes were eloquent, her words would pose,¹¹⁰
Although she told him, in good modern Greek,

With an Ionian accent, low and sweet,
That he was faint, and must not talk, but eat. 1200

151

Now Juan could not understand a word,
 Being no Grecian; but he had an ear,
And her voice was the warble of a bird,
 So soft, so sweet, so delicately clear,
That finer, simpler music ne'er was heard; 1205
 The sort of sound we echo with a tear
Without knowing why – an overpowering tone
Whence melody descends as from a throne.

152

And Juan gazed as one who is awoke
 By a distant organ, doubting if he be 1210
Not yet a dreamer, till the spell is broke
 By the watchman, or some such reality,
Or by one's early valet's cursed knock –
 At least it is a heavy sound to me
Who like a morning slumber, for the night 1215
Shows stars and women in a better light.

153

And Juan, too, was helped out from his dream
 Or sleep, or whatso'er it was, by feeling
A most prodigious appetite: the steam
 Of Zoe's cookery no doubt was stealing 1220
Upon his senses, and the kindling beam
 Of the new fire, which Zoe kept up, kneeling,
To stir her viands, made him quite awake
And long for food, but chiefly a beefsteak.

154

But beef is rare within these oxless isles; 1225
Goat's flesh there is, no doubt, and kid, and mutton;
And, when a holiday upon them smiles,
A joint upon their barbarous spits they put on:
But this occurs but seldom, between whiles,
For some of these are rocks with scarce a hut on; 1230
Others are fair and fertile, among which
This, though not large, was one of the most rich.

155

I say that beef is rare, and can't help thinking
That the old fable of the Minotaur –
From which our modern morals, rightly shrinking, 1235
Condemn the royal lady's taste who wore
A cow's shape for a mask – was only (sinking
The allegory) a mere type, no more;
That Pasiphae promoted breeding cattle
To make the Cretans bloodier in battle. 111 1240

156

For we all know that English people are Fed upon beef (I won't say much of beer
Because 'tis liquor only, and being far
From this my subject, has no business here);
We know, too, they are very fond of war, 1245
A pleasure (like all pleasures) rather dear;
So were the Cretans – from which I infer
That beef and battles both were owing to her. 112

157

But to resume. The languid Juan raised
His head upon his elbow, and he saw 1250
A sight on which he had not lately gazed,
As all his latter meals had been quite raw –
Three or four things, for which the Lord he praised,
And, feeling still the famished vulture gnaw,
He fell upon whate'er was offered, like 1255
A priest, a shark, an alderman, 113 or pike.

158

He ate, and he was well supplied; and she
Who watched him like a mother, would have fed
Him past all bounds, because she smiled to see
Such an appetite in one she had deemed dead: 1260
But Zoe, being older than Haidee,
Knew (by tradition, for she ne'er had read)
That famished people must be slowly nursed,
And fed by spoonfuls, else they always burst.

159

And so she took the liberty to state, 1265
Rather by deeds than words, because the case
Was urgent, that the gentleman whose fate
Had made her mistress quit her bed to trace 114
The seashore at this hour, must leave his plate
Unless he wished to die upon the place – 1270
She snatched it and refused another morsel,
Saying he had gorged enough to make a horse ill.

160

Next they – he being naked, save a tattered
Pair of scarce decent trousers – went to work,

And in the fire his recent rags they scattered 1275
And dressed him, for the present, like a Turk
Or Greek; that is (although it not much mattered),
Omitting turban, slippers, pistols, dirk, 115
They furnished him, entire except some stitches,
With a clean shirt and very spacious breeches. 1280

161

And then fair Haidee tried her tongue at speaking,
But not a word could Juan comprehend,
Although he listened so that the young Greek in
Her earnestness would ne'er have made an end;
And, as he interrupted not, went ekeing 1285
Her speech out to her protégé and friend,
Till pausing at the last her breath to take,
She saw he did not understand Romaic. 116

162

And then she had recourse to nods and signs,
And smiles, and sparkles of the speaking eye, 1290
And read (the only book she could) the lines
Of his fair face, and found, by sympathy,
The answer eloquent, where the soul shines
And darts in one quick glance a long reply;
And thus in every look she saw expressed 1295
A world of words, and things at which she guessed.

163

And now, by dint of fingers and of eyes,
And words repeated after her, he took
A lesson in her tongue – but by surmise,
No doubt, less of her language than her look; 1300

As he who studies fervently the skies
Turns oftener to the stars than to his book,
Thus Juan learned his alpha beta better
From Haidee's glance than any graven letter.

164

'Tis pleasing to be schooled in a strange tongue 1305
By female lips and eyes; 117 that is, I mean,
When both the teacher and the taught are young,
As was the case, at least, where I have been;
They smile so when one's right, and when one's wrong
They smile still more, and then there intervene 1310
Pressure of hands, perhaps even a chaste kiss;
I learned the little that I know by this –

165

That is, some words of Spanish, Turk, and Greek,
Italian not at all, having no teachers;
Much English I cannot pretend to speak, 1315
Learning that language chiefly from its preachers,
Barrow, South, Tillotson, whom every week
I study, also Blair 118 – the highest reachers
Of eloquence in piety and prose;
I hate your poets, so read none of those. 119 1320

166

As for the ladies, I have nought to say,
A wanderer from the British world of fashion, 120
Where I, like other 'dogs, have had my day'; 121
Like other men too, may have had my passion –
But that, like other things, has passed away, 1325

And all her fools whom I could lay the lash on:
Foes, friends, men, women, now are nought to me
But dreams of what has been, no more to be.

167

Return we to Don Juan. He begun
To hear new words, and to repeat them, but 1330
Some feelings, universal as the sun,
Were such as could not in his breast be shut
More than within the bosom of a nun;
He was in love – as you would be, no doubt,
With a young benefactress; so was she, 1335
Just in the way we very often see.

168

And every day by daybreak – rather early
For Juan, who was somewhat fond of rest,
She came into the cave, but it was merely
To see her bird reposing in his nest; 1340
And she would softly stir his locks so curly,
Without disturbing her yet-slumbering guest,
Breathing all gently o'er his cheek and mouth,
As o'er a bed of roses the sweet south. 122

169

And every morn his colour freshlier came, 1345
And every day helped on his convalescence;
'Twas well, because health in the human frame
Is pleasant, besides being true love's essence;
For health and idleness to passion's flame
Are oil and gunpowder, and some good lessons 1350

Are also learnt from Ceres and from Bacchus, 123
Without whom Venus will not long attack us. 124

170

While Venus fills the heart (without heart really Love, though good always, is not quite so good),
Ceres presents a plate of vermicelli; 125 1355
For love must be sustained like flesh and blood,
While Bacchus pours out wine, or hands a jelly. 126
Eggs, oysters too, are amatory food; 127
But who is their purveyor from above
Heaven knows – it may be Neptune, Pan, or Jove. 1360

171

When Juan woke he found some good things ready;
A bath, a breakfast, and the finest eyes
That ever made a youthful heart less steady,
Besides her maid's, as pretty for their size –
But I have spoken of all this already, 1365
And repetition's tiresome and unwise;
Well, Juan, after bathing in the sea,
Came always back to coffee and Haidee.

172

Both were so young, and one so innocent,
That bathing passed for nothing; Juan seemed 1370
To her, as 'twere, the kind of being sent,
Of whom these two years she had nightly dreamed:
A something to be loved, a creature meant
To be her happiness, and whom she deemed

To render happy; all who joy would win 1375
Must share it – Happiness was born a twin.

173

It was such pleasure to behold him, such
 Enlargement of existence to partake
Nature with him, to thrill beneath his touch,
 To watch him slumbering, and to see him wake: 1380
To live with him for ever were too much,
 But then the thought of parting made her quake;
He was her own, her ocean-treasure, cast
Like a rich wreck – her first love, and her last. 128

174

And thus a moon rolled on, and fair Haidee 1385
 Paid daily visits to her boy, and took
Such plentiful precautions, that still he Remained unknown within his craggy nook;
At last her father's prows put out to sea,
 For certain merchantmen upon the look, 1390
Not as of yore to carry off an Io, 129
But three Ragusan 130 vessels, bound for Scio.

175

Then came her freedom, for she had no mother,
 So that, her father being at sea, she was
Free as a married woman, or such other 1395
 Female, as where she likes may freely pass,
Without even the encumbrance of a brother –
 The freest she that ever gazed on glass
(I speak of Christian lands in this comparison,
Where wives, at least, are seldom kept in garrison). 1400

176

Now she prolonged her visits and her talk
 (For they must talk), and he had learnt to say
So much as to propose to take a walk –
 For little had he wandered since the day
On which, like a young flower snapped from the stalk, 1405
 Drooping and dewy on the beach he lay;
And thus they walked out in the afternoon,
And saw the sun set opposite the moon.

177

It was a wild and breaker-beaten coast,
 With cliffs above, and a broad sandy shore 1410
Guarded by shoals and rocks as by an host, 131
 With here and there a creek whose aspect wore
A better welcome to the tempest-tossed;
 And rarely ceased the haughty billow's roar,
Save on the dead long summer days, which make 1415
The outstretched ocean glitter like a lake.

178

And the small ripple spilt upon the beach
 Scarcely o'erpassed the cream of your champagne,
When o'er the brim the sparkling bumpers reach,
 That spring-dew of the spirit, the heart's rain! 1420
Few things surpass old wine – and they may preach
 Who please (the more because they preach in vain) –
Let us have wine and woman, mirth and laughter,
Sermons and soda-water the day after.

179

Man, being reasonable, must get drunk; 1425
 The best of life is but intoxication:
Glory, the grape, love, gold – in these are sunk
 The hopes of all men, and of every nation;
Without their sap, how branchless were the trunk
 Of life's strange tree, so fruitful on occasion. 1430
But to return; get very drunk, and when
You wake with headache, you shall see what then.

180

Ring for your valet, bid him quickly bring
 Some hock¹³² and soda-water¹³³ – then you'll know
A pleasure worthy Xerxes the great king;¹³⁴ 1435
 For not the blessed sherbet, sublimed¹³⁵ with snow,
Nor the first sparkle of the desert-spring,
 Nor Burgundy in all its sunset glow,
After long travel, ennui,¹³⁶ love, or slaughter,
Vie with that draught of hock and soda-water. 1440

181

The coast (I think it was the coast that I
 Was just describing; yes, it was the coast)
Lay at this period quiet as the sky,
 The sands untumbled, the blue waves untossed,
And all was stillness save the sea-bird's cry 1445
 And dolphin's leap, and little billow crossed
By some low rock or shelf, that made it fret¹³⁷
Against the boundary it scarcely wet.

182

And forth they wandered, her sire being gone,
As I have said, upon an expedition; 1450
And mother, brother, guardian, she had none,
Save Zoe, who, although with due precision
She waited on her lady with the sun,
Thought daily service was her only mission,
Bringing warm water, wreathing her long tresses, 1455
And asking now and then for cast-off dresses.

183

It was the cooling hour, just when the rounded
Red sun sinks down behind the azure hill,
Which then seems as if the whole earth it bounded,
Circling all nature, hushed, and dim, and still, 1460
With the far mountain-crescent half surrounded
On one side, and the deep sea calm and chill
Upon the other, and the rosy sky,
With one star sparkling through it like an eye.

184

And thus they wandered forth, and, hand in hand, 1465
Over the shining pebbles and the shells
Glided along the smooth and hardened sand,
And in the worn and wild receptacles
Worked by the storms, yet worked as it were planned,
In hollow halls, with sparry 138 roofs and cells, 1470
They turned to rest; and, each clasped by an arm,
Yielded to the deep twilight's purple charm.

185

They looked up to the sky, whose floating glow
Spread like a rosy ocean, vast and bright;
They gazed upon the glittering sea below, 1475

Whence the broad moon rose circling into sight;
They heard the wave's splash, and the wind so low,
And saw each other's dark eyes darting light
Into each other; and, beholding this,
Their lips drew near, and clung into a kiss – 1480

186

A long, long kiss, a kiss of youth and love
And beauty, all concentrating like rays
Into one focus, kindled from above;
Such kisses as belong to early days
Where heart and soul and sense in concert¹³⁹ move, 1485
And the blood's lava, and the pulse ablaze,
Each kiss a heartquake – for a kiss's strength,
I think, it must be reckoned by its length.

187

By length I mean duration; theirs endured
Heaven knows how long – no doubt they never reckoned, 1490
And if they had, they could not have secured
The sum of their sensations to a second:
They had not spoken, but they felt allured
As if their souls and lips each other beckoned,
Which, being joined, like swarming bees they clung, 1495
Their hearts the flowers from whence the honey sprung.

188

They were alone, but not alone as they
Who shut in chambers think it loneliness;
The silent ocean, and the starlight bay,
The twilight glow, which momentarily grew less, 1500
The voiceless sands, and dropping caves that lay
Around them, made them to each other press,

As if there were no life beneath the sky
Save theirs, and that their life could never die.

189

They feared no eyes nor ears on that lone beach, 1505
 They felt no terrors from the night, 140 they were
All in all to each other; though their speech
 Was broken words, they thought a language there,
And all the burning tongues the passions teach
 Found in one sigh the best interpreter 1510
Of nature's oracle – first love, that all
Which Eve has left her daughters since her fall.

190

Haidee spoke not of scruples, asked no vows,
 Nor offered any; she had never heard
Of plight and promises to be a spouse, 1515
 Or perils by a loving maid incurred;
She was all which pure ignorance allows,
 And flew to her young mate like a young bird;
And, never having dreamt of falsehood, she
Had not one word to say of constancy. 1520

191

She loved, and was beloved; she adored,
 And she was worshipped; after nature's fashion,
Their intense souls, into each other poured,
 If souls could die, had perished in that passion;
But by degrees their senses were restored, 1525
 Again to be o'ercome, again to dash on;
And, beating 'gainst his bosom, Haidee's heart
Felt as if never more to beat apart.

192

Alas, they were so young, so beautiful,
So lonely, loving, helpless, and the hour 1530
Was that in which the heart is always full,
And, having o'er itself no further power,
Prompts deeds eternity cannot annul,
But pays off moments in an endless shower
Of hellfire – all prepared for people giving 1535
Pleasure or pain to one another living.

193

Alas for Juan and Haidee! They were
So loving and so lovely – till then never,
Excepting our first parents, such a pair
Had run the risk of being damned for ever; 1540
And Haidee, being devout as well as fair,
Had doubtless heard about the Stygian river, 141
And hell and purgatory – but forgot
Just in the very crisis she should not.

194

They look upon each other, and their eyes 1545
Gleam in the moonlight; and her white arm clasps
Round Juan's head, and his around hers lies
Half-buried in the tresses which it grasps;
She sits upon his knee, and drinks his sighs,
He hers, until they end in broken gasps; 1550
And thus they form a group that's quite antique –
Half-naked, loving, natural, and Greek.

195

And when those deep and burning moments passed,
And Juan sunk to sleep within her arms,
She slept not, but all tenderly, though fast, 1555
Sustained his head upon her bosom's charms;
And now and then her eye to heaven is cast,
And then on the pale cheek her breast now warms,
Pillowed on her o'erflowing heart, which pants
With all it granted, and with all it grants. 1560

196

An infant when it gazes on a light,
A child the moment when it drains the breast,
A devotee when soars the Host 142 in sight,
An Arab with a stranger for a guest,
A sailor when the prize has struck in fight, 143 1565
A miser filling his most hoarded chest,
Feel rapture; but not such true joy are reaping
As they who watch o'er what they love while sleeping.

197

For there it lies so tranquil, so beloved,
All that it hath of life with us is living; 1570
So gentle, stirless, helpless, and unmoved,
And all unconscious of the joy 'tis giving;
All it hath felt, inflicted, passed, and proved,
Hushed into depths beyond the watcher's diving;
There lies the thing we love with all its errors 1575
And all its charms, like death without its terrors.

198

The lady watched her lover, and that hour
Of love's, and night's, and ocean's solitude

O'erflowed her soul with their united power;
Amidst the barren sand and rocks so rude 1580
She and her wave-worn love had made their bower
Where nought upon their passion could intrude,
And all the stars that crowded the blue space
Saw nothing happier than her glowing face.

199

Alas, the love of women! It is known 1585
To be a lovely and a fearful thing;
For all of theirs upon that die¹⁴⁴ is thrown,
And if 'tis lost, life hath no more to bring
To them but mockeries of the past alone,
And their revenge is as the tiger's spring, 1590
Deadly, and quick, and crushing; yet as real
Torture is theirs – what they inflict they feel.

200

They are right; for man, to man so oft unjust,
Is always so to women; one sole bond
Awaits them, treachery is all their trust; 1595
Taught to conceal, their bursting hearts despond
Over their idol, till some wealthier lust
Buys them in marriage – and what rests beyond?
A thankless husband, next a faithless lover,
Then dressing, nursing, praying, and all's over. 1600

201

Some take a lover, some take drams¹⁴⁵ or prayers,
Some mind their household, others dissipation,
Some run away and but exchange their cares,
Losing the advantage of a virtuous station;

Few changes e'er can better their affairs, 1605
Theirs being an unnatural situation
From the dull palace to the dirty hovel:
Some play the devil, and then write a novel. 146

202

Haidee was Nature's bride, and knew not this; 147
Haidee was Passion's child, born where the sun 1610
Showers triple light, and scorches even the kiss
Of his gazelle-eyed daughters; she was one
Made but to love, to feel that she was his
Who was her chosen: what was said or done
Elsewhere was nothing – she had nought to fear, 1615
Hope, care, nor love beyond, her heart beat here.

203

And oh, that quickening of the heart, that beat!
How much it costs us! Yet each rising throb
Is in its cause as its effect so sweet,
That Wisdom, ever on the watch to rob 1620
Joy of its alchemy, 148 and to repeat
Fine truths, even Conscience, too, has a tough job
To make us understand each good old maxim,
So good – I wonder Castlereagh don't tax 'em.

204

And now 'twas done – on the lone shore were plighted 1625
Their hearts; the stars, their nuptial torches, shed
Beauty upon the beautiful they lighted;
Ocean their witness, and the cave their bed,
By their own feelings hallowed and united,
Their priest was Solitude, and they were wed: 1630

And they were happy, for to their young eyes
Each was an angel, and earth paradise.

205

Oh love, of whom great Caesar was the suitor,
Titus the master, Antony the slave,149
Horace, Catullus scholars, Ovid tutor,150 1635
Sappho the sage bluestocking, in whose grave
All those may leap who rather would be neuter
(Leucadia's rock still overlooks the wave);151
Oh love, thou art the very god of evil –
For, after all, we cannot call thee devil. 1640

206

Thou mak'st the chaste connubial152 state precarious,
And jestest with the brows of mightiest men:
Caesar and Pompey, Mahomet, Belisarius,153
Have much employed the muse of history's pen;
Their lives and fortunes were extremely various, 1645
Such worthies Time will never see again;
Yet to these four in three things the same luck holds –
They all were heroes, conquerors, and cuckolds.

207

Thou mak'st philosophers; there's Epicurus
And Aristippus,154 a material crew! 1650
Who to immoral courses would allure us
By theories quite practicable too;
If only from the devil they would insure us,
How pleasant were the maxim (not quite new),

‘Eat, drink, and love, what can the rest avail us?’ – 1655
So said the royal sage Sardanapalus. 155

208

But Juan! Had he quite forgotten Julia?
And should he have forgotten her so soon?
I can’t but say it seems to me most truly a
Perplexing question; but, no doubt, the moon 1660
Does these things for us, and whenever newly a
Strong palpitation rises, ’tis her boon;
Else how the devil is it that fresh features
Have such a charm for us poor human creatures?

209

I hate inconstancy – I loathe, detest, 1665
Abhor, condemn, abjure the mortal made
Of such quicksilver 156 clay that in his breast
No permanent foundation can be laid;
Love, constant love, has been my constant guest,
And yet last night, being at a masquerade, 1670
I saw the prettiest creature, fresh from Milan,
Which gave me some sensations like a villain.

210

But soon Philosophy came to my aid
And whispered, ‘Think of every sacred tie!’
‘I will, my dear Philosophy!’ I said, 1675
‘But then her teeth, and then, oh heaven, her eye!
I’ll just enquire if she be wife or maid,
Or neither, out of curiosity.’
‘Stop!’ cried Philosophy, with air so Grecian
(Though she was masked then as a fair Venetian). 1680

211

'Stop!' So I stopped. But to return: that which Men call inconstancy is nothing more
Than admiration due where nature's rich
Profusion with young beauty covers o'er
Some favoured object; and as in the niche 1685
A lovely statue we almost adore,
This sort of adoration of the real
Is but a heightening of the beau-ideal.157

212

'Tis the perception of the beautiful,
A fine extension of the faculties, 1690
Platonic, universal, wonderful,
Drawn from the stars, and filtered through the skies,
Without which life would be extremely dull;
In short, it is the use of our own eyes,
With one or two small senses added, just 1695
To hint that flesh is formed of fiery dust.

213

Yet 'tis a painful feeling, and unwilling,
For surely if we always could perceive
In the same object graces quite as killing158
As when she rose upon us like an Eve, 1700
'Twould save us many a heartache, many a shilling159
(For we must get them anyhow, or grieve),
Whereas if one sole lady pleased for ever,
How pleasant for the heart, as well as liver!160

214

The heart is like the sky, a part of heaven, 1705
But changes night and day too, like the sky;
Now o'er it clouds and thunder must be driven,
And darkness and destruction as on high:
But when it hath been scorched, and pierced, and riven,
Its storms expire in water-drops; the eye 1710
Pours forth at last the heart's-blood turned to tears,
Which make the English climate of our years.

215

The liver is the lazaret¹⁶¹ of bile,¹⁶²
But very rarely executes its function,
For the first passion stays there such a while, 1715
That all the rest creep in and form a junction
Like knots of vipers on a dunghill's soil –
Rage, fear, hate, jealousy, revenge, compunction –
So that all mischiefs spring up from this entrail¹⁶³
Like earthquakes from the hidden fire called 'central'. 1720

216

In the meantime, without proceeding more
In this anatomy, I've finished now
Two hundred and odd stanzas as before,
That being about the number I'll allow
Each canto of the twelve, or twenty-four; 1725
And laying down my pen, I make my bow,
Leaving Don Juan and Haidee to plead
For them and theirs with all who deign to read.

Canto II

¹*native modesty* i.e. the modesty he was born with.

2*a public school* in England, one of the old-established fee-paying schools, such as Eton or Harrow (where Byron was educated).

3*quacks us* administers quack medicines to us.

4*before Peru learned to rebel* The Peruvian struggle for independence had begun in 1813, and after many obstacles was won in 1824, under Bolivar's leadership.

5*barb* a horse from the Barbary coast.

6*cameleopard* giraffe.

7*fazzioli* white kerchiefs used as a veil by the lower ranks.

8*The great success of Juan's education* ironic, of course. His education has been a complete failure.

9*As I, who've crossed it oft* Byron sailed from Cadiz on 3 August 1809, travelling to Gibraltar.

10*I can't but say...waters* Byron draws on his own experience of self-exile.

11*cordage* the ship's rigging.

12*ajar* out of harmony.

13*By Babel's waters...Zion* Byron alludes to Psalm 137:1: 'By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down, yea, we wept, when we remembered Zion.'

14*portmanteau* travelling bag.

15*Sweets to the sweet* from Hamlet V i 243.

16*physic* cure. The line recalls Macbeth V iii 40: ‘Canst thou not minister to a mind diseased ...?’

17Byron’s own servant was a former gondolier called Giovanni Battista Lusieri (1798–1874). He remained with him until his death at Missolonghi.

18*reaching* retching.

19*apothecary* one who prepared and sold drugs for medicinal purposes – the business now (since about 1800) conducted by a chemist.

20*emetic* medicine designed to induce vomiting.

21*a quinsy* tonsillitis.

22*breathes a vein* Lancing the veins was in Byron’s day a frequently used method of treatment.

23*Moncada* A family of this name lived next door to Byron at La Mira, Venice, in 1818.

24*licentiate* Pedrillo was licensed in one or both of two ways: either he held a degree from the University of Salamanca (stanza 37) or he was authorized to teach and perform religious rites.

25*the trough of the sea* the hollow between waves.

26*Started the stern-post* displaced or loosened the upright beam at the stern of the ship, which supported the rudder.

27*sound* i.e. use the pumps to find out how much water the ship had taken in.

28*Mr Mann, of London* This detail derives from Byron’s source, Sir John Graham Dalyell’s Shipwrecks and Disasters at Sea (3 vols, 1812).

29*chain-pump* machine for raising water by means of an endless chain.

30*Laid...beam-ends* when the ends of a ship's beams touch the water, the vessel lies on its side, in imminent danger of capsizing.

31*spirit-room* cabin where alcohol was stored.

32*the classic Salamanca* Spanish university founded in the thirteenth century.

33Sancho Panza was Don Quixote's sidekick in Cervantes's famous novel.

34*thrummed a sail* They fastened bunches of rope-yarn over a sail so as to produce a shaggy surface, suitable to stop the leak.

35*jury-mast* temporary replacement mast.

36*head* the fore-part of the ship, the bow.

37*Some cursed...the sun* as at Jeremiah 20:14: 'Cursed be the day wherein I was born.'

38*lee* side of the boat sheltered from the wind. The line means 'unless the boat could be driven by the wind against breakers to the lee-side'.

39*cutter* lifeboat.

40*puncheon* large cask.

41*had / Been stove* had a hole made in the side.

42*yet* still.

43*peck* small quantity (technically, the fourth part of a bushel, or two gallons).

44*aqua vita* spirits (probably brandy).

45*re-embarked* again put on board a boat.

46*the tertian / Ague* a fever that recurs every other day.

47*shears of Atropos* Atropos, eldest of the three Fates, is represented blind, with a pair of scissors with which she cuts the thread of life.

48*the grantors* those who set up the annuity.

49*In my young days...to pay* By 1816, when he left England, Byron had amassed £30,000 in debts.

50*Argo* the ship (named after the city of Argos) which carried Jason and his companions to capture the golden fleece.

51*like woodcocks, upon suction* Woodcocks appear to be sucking as they probe with their long bills in the turf.

52*victual* food (pronounced 'vittle').

53*feeling all the vulture* i.e. feeling as hungry as a vulture.

54*the Promethean vulture* Prometheus was nailed to the rock of the Caucasus for 3,000 years while an eagle (in some versions a vulture) feasted on his liver.

55*pollution* defilement (of Julia's love-letter). Nothing is sacred in the face of starvation.

56*neuter* exempt.

57*a small present...ladies* i.e. he was suffering from syphilis.

58*boobies...noddy* species of sea-bird.

59Remember Ugolino...His tale In his Inferno, Dante relates how Count Ugolino was imprisoned with his two sons and two grandsons and starved to death with them. In Hell, Ugolino is seen chewing on the skull of the man responsible for the atrocity (Inferno xxxiii 76–8).

60ditcher one who makes and repairs ditches.

61baked lips apparently an echo of Coleridge, Ancient Mariner (1817) 157: ‘With throat unslaked, with black lips baked.’

62As the rich man’s in hell an allusion to the parable of Dives and Lazarus, Luke 16:19–26.

63messmate companion at mealtimes; a sardonic joke.

64clay body.

65Waxed became.

66dun dull brown.

67Byron is deliberately profaning the image celebrated in Wordsworth’s The Rainbow (p. 539).

68muffle boxing-glove. Bare-knuckle boxing was fashionable in the early nineteenth century; Byron himself trained with ‘Gentleman’ Jackson.

69kaleidoscope invented as recently as 1817 by Sir David Brewster; Byron was sent one by John Murray in November 1818.

70eat pronounced ‘ett’ by Byron.

71See Genesis 8:6–11. In a useful note, Peter Cochran suggests that Byron has in mind a narrative of the shipwreck of the Medusa; see ‘Byron’s Don Juan, Canto II, Stanza 95: A Previously Unnoted Source in the Medusa Narrative’, N&Q NS 39 (1992) 172–3.

72*breakers* waves breaking against the shore.

73*For shore it was* that of one of the smaller Cyclades (l. 1010); as the Trinidad went down near the Golfe du Lion, that would mean that the survivors had drifted an improbable 2,000 kilometres.

74*Candia* Crete.

75*Like Charon’s bark of spectres* The grim ferryman Charon took the ghosts of the dead across the rivers of the underworld.

76*overset* capsized.

77A MS note by Byron reads: ‘Mr Ekenhead, Lieutenant of Marines on board of the Salsette (then commanded by Capt Bathurst) swam across the Dardanelles May 10th (I think) 1810. See the account in Hobhouse’s travels.’ Byron actually swam the Hellespont on 3 May 1810, and it was described in detail in ‘Extract from Lord Byron’s Journal’, London Magazine 1 (1820) 295–6.

78*reluctant* opposing; Byron is also punning on the Latin root, reluctari, ‘to struggle against’.

79*jury-mast* replacement mast.

80*clay* flesh.

81*How long in his damp trance young Juan lay* an echo of Coleridge, Ancient Mariner (1817) 393–4: ‘How long in that same fit I lay, / I have not to declare.’

82*stone* an early MS reading is ‘damned’.

83*an Irish lady* probably, as commentators have noted, Lady Adelaide Forbes (1789–1858); ‘The Apollo Belvidere is the image of Lady Adelaide Forbes’, he told Moore, 12 May 1817 (Marchand v 227).

84*basquiña* an outer skirt placed over indoor dress when going out.

85*mantilla* light cloak.

86*mystical* solemn.

87*strike* remove, take off.

88*But the best dish...newcomers* Homer describes in the Iliad ix how Patroclus, Achilles and Automedon ate a sheep, a goat and a pig.

89*piastres* small Turkish coins.

90*though of men...Apostle* see Matthew 4:18–19.

91*Cyclades* group of islands in the Aegean between the Peloponnese and the Dodecanese.

92*sad* appallingly bad.

93*Haidee* ‘a caress’ or ‘the caressed one’; Byron would have encountered the name in popular Greek songs of the time.

94Matthew 25:35.

95νοῦς pronounced ‘nouse’ (rhyme with ‘mouse’); sense, intelligence.

96‘And above all these things put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness’ (Colossians 3:14).

97*pelisse* long cloak reaching the ankles, with sleeves or armholes.

98 Juan slept like a top a reference to the apparent stillness of a spinning top when its axis of rotation is vertical.

99 Zoe 'life'.

100 my granddad's Narrative i.e. A Narrative of the Hon. John Byron, containing an account of the great distress suffered by himself and his companions on the coast of Patagonia, from the year 1740, till their arrival in England, 1746 (1768) – a popular volume which went through eleven editions before 1825, reprinted intermittently until 1925.

101 a freak i.e. freakish behaviour.

102 fourscore eighty.

103 Aurora goddess of dawn and morning.

104 awful awe-inspiring.

105 the dying...righteousness a profane reference to Matthew 25:46.

106 to a tittle with minute exactness.

107 Scio Italian form of Chios (island off the Ionian coast between Lesbos and Samos, known for the high quality of its wines).

108 purple hectic purple flush.

109 cygnet young swan.

110 pose puzzle, confuse.

111 Minos of Crete challenged Poseidon, god of the sea, to produce a bull from the ocean. So beautiful was it, that he could not sacrifice it, and substituted another, incurring Poseidon's wrath. After Minos' marriage to Pasiphaë, Poseidon made her fall in love with the bull, with which she had intercourse, giving birth to the Minotaur – half bull, half man. It became a scourge, devouring the Cretans, until Daedalus built a labyrinth to contain it.

112 her Pasiphaë. As a result of the imprisonment of the Minotaur in the labyrinth, Minos waged war on Athens; having defeated it, he fed the Minotaur a yearly tribute of seven young men and seven maidens.

113 alderman in London, the chief officer of a ward. They were a byword for greed in their levying of fines.

114 trace tread.

115 dirk dagger.

116 Romaic modern Greek vernacular, some of which Byron learnt on his visit to Athens in 1810–11.

117 'Tis pleasing...eyes Byron learned Spanish in Seville from a female tutor, Greek from Teresa Macri in Athens, and Italian from Marianna Segati in Venice.

118 Isaac Barrow (1630–77), Robert South (1634–1716), John Tillotson (1630–94) and Hugh Blair (1718–1800), distinguished sermonists.

119 I hate your poets, so read none of those an overstatement designed to emphasize Byron's dislike of the Lake poets and admiration of Pope.

120 the British world of fashion in which Byron had been a very big fish, 1812–16.

121 Hamlet V i 292: 'The cat will mew, and dog will have his day.'

122 the sweet south i.e. the warm south wind.

123 Ceres...Bacchus corn (bread) and wine. Ceres is the goddess of corn and harvest; Bacchus the god of wine.

124 Are also learnt...attack us a reworking of Terence, Eunuchus iv 5,6: ‘sine Cerere et Libero friget Venus’ (without Ceres and Bacchus, Venus freezes).

125 vermicelli pasta is made of wheat.

126 a jelly partly made of wine.

127 amatory food aphrodisiacs (containing protein).

128 her first love, and her last a claim Byron himself made in a letter to Countess Teresa Guiccioli on 22 April 1819: ‘You who are my only and last love, who are my only joy.’

129 Io Io, a priestess at Argos, was kidnapped by Phoenicians (Herodotus I i 4–5).

130 Ragusa was in Byron’s day the name for Dubrovnik, an ancient seaport still flourishing on the Adriatic coast of Croatia.

131 host army.

132 hock white German wine.

133 hock and soda-water cf. the stanza used as a headpiece to the poem in editions from 1832 onwards. Byron never intended it as a headpiece, and in fact scribbled it in MS and then deleted it:

I would to Heaven that I were so much clay –
As I am blood – bone – marrow, passion – feeling –
Because at least the past were past away –
And for the future (but I write this reeling,
Having got drunk exceedingly today
So that I seem to stand upon the ceiling)

I say, the future is a serious matter –
And so, for godsake, hock and soda-water.

134 Xerxes I, Persian king who in 480 BCE assembled a great navy and army to avenge his father Darius for the loss of the Battle of Marathon in 490 BCE. He was eventually defeated at Salamis.

135 sublimed chilled.

136 ennui feeling of mental weariness and dissatisfaction produced by want of occupation.

137 fret chafe.

138 spar an opaque crystalline mineral, which is embedded in the roofs and cells of the rocks.

139 concert unison.

140 They felt no terrors from the night a profane allusion to Psalm 91:5, where the godly are told: ‘Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night.’

141 the Stygian river The River Styx circled Hades nine times; those seeking to enter Hades had to be ferried across it by Charon.

142 Host eucharistic wafer. The word ‘soars’ is distinctly comic.

143 when the prize has struck in fight i.e. when the prize-ship (being attacked) has surrendered (‘struck’). At this point it and its contents became booty, to be divided among the crew.

144 die dice.

145 drams A dram is a measure – in this case, of alcohol.

146 Some play the devil, and then write a novel Lady Caroline Lamb, unceremoniously dumped by Byron after an affair of several months in 1812, took her revenge by fictionalizing their relationship in Glenarvon (1816). See headnote, pp. 865–6.

147 this i.e. the sufferings of the woman of the world, related in the previous three stanzas.

148 alchemy magic.

149 Julius Caesar was Cleopatra's suitor; Mark Antony was her slave. Titus 'mastered' his love of Berenice and sent her away.

150 Horace, Catullus and Ovid wrote about love. Ovid's Ars Amatoria is a textbook of lovemaking.

151 Sappho was said to have thrown herself off the Leucadian rock into the sea when her love for Phaon was unrequited.

152 connubial married.

153 Caesar and Pompey, Mahomet, Belisarius famous cuckolds: Caesar was cuckolded by his first wife, Pompeia; Pompey by his wife Mucia (who 'played the wanton' with Caesar); Mahomet by his wife Ayesha; and Belisarius (famous Byzantine general) by his wife Antonina (who seduced their adopted son).

154 Aristippus (c.370 BCE) founded a hedonistic philosophy that offered pleasure as the goal of life; he lived luxuriously. River that rollest by the ancient walls
Where dwells the lady of my love,² when she Walks by thy brink and there perchance recalls
A faint and fleeting memory of me –
What if thy deep and ample stream should be 5
A mirror of my heart, where she may read

The thousand thoughts I now betray³ to thee,
Wild as thy wave and headlong as thy speed?
What do I say? 'A mirror of my heart'?
Are not thy waters sweeping, dark and strong? 10
Such as my feelings were and are, thou art,
And such as thou art were my passions long;
Time may have somewhat tamed them – not forever
Thou overflow'st thy banks, and not for aye
The bosom overboils, congenial river! 15
Thy floods subside, and mine have sunk away,
But left long wrecks behind us; yet again
Borne on our old career unchanged we move,
Thou tendest wildly to the wilder main
And I to loving one I should not love. 20
The current I behold will sweep beneath
Her palace walls, and murmur at her feet,
Her eyes will look on thee when she shall breathe
The twilight air unchained from summer's heat.
She will look on thee; I have looked on thee 25
Full of that thought, and from this moment ne'er
Thy waters could I name, hear named, or see
Without the inseparable sigh for her.
Her bright eyes will be imaged in thy stream –
Yes, they will meet the wave I gaze on now, 30
But mine cannot even witness in a dream
That happy wave repass me in its flow;
The wave that bears my tear returns no more –
Will she return by whom that wave shall sweep?
Both tread thy bank, both wander by thy shore, 35
I near thy source,⁴ and she by the blue deep;
But that which keepeth us apart is not
Distance, nor depth of wave, nor space of earth,
But the distractions of a various lot –
Ah, various as the climates of our birth! 40
A stranger loves a lady of the land

Born far beyond the mountains, but his blood
Is all meridian,⁵ as if never fanned
By the bleak wind that chills the polar flood.
My heart is all meridian; were it not, 45
I had not suffered now, nor should I be,
Despite of tortures ne'er to be forgot,
The slave again, oh love, at least of thee!
'Tis vain to struggle – I have struggled long
To love again no more as once I loved. 50
Oh time, why leave this earliest passion strong? –
To tear a heart which pants to be unmoved?

As to Don Juan, confess – confess, you dog (and be candid), that it is the sublime of that there sort of writing. It may be bawdy, but is it not good English? It may be profligate, but is it not life, is it not the thing? Could any man have written it who has not lived in the world? – and tooled in a post-chaise? In a hackney coach? In a gondola? Against a wall? In a court carriage? In a vis-à-vis?¹ On a table – and under it? I have written about a hundred stanzas of a third Canto, but it is damned modest – the outcry has frightened me.² I had such projects for the Don, but the cant is so much stronger than cunt nowadays, that the benefit of experience in a man who had well weighed the worth of both monosyllables must be lost to despairing posterity.³

’Tis time this heart should be unmoved,
Since others it hath ceased to move;
Yet though I cannot be beloved,
Still let me love.

My days are in the yellow leaf, 5
The flowers and fruits of love are gone,
The worm, the canker and the grief
Are mine alone.

The fire that on my bosom preys
Is lone as some volcanic isle, 10
No torch is kindled at its blaze –
A funeral pile!

The hope, the fear, the jealous care,
The exalted portion of the pain,
And power of love I cannot share 15
But wear the chain.

But 'tis not thus, and 'tis not here
Such thoughts should shake my soul, nor now
Where glory decks the hero's bier
Or binds his brow. 20

The sword, the banner, and the field,
Glory and Greece about us see –
The Spartan borne upon his shield¹
Was not more free!

Awake (not Greece – she is awake),² 25
Awake my spirit – think through whom
Thy life-blood tracks its parent lake
And then strike home!

8

Tread those reviving passions down,
Unworthy manhood; unto thee 30
Indifferent should the smile or frown
Of beauty be.

If thou regret'st thy youth, why live?
The land of honourable death
Is here: up to the field, and give 35
Away thy breath!

10

Seek out (less often sought than found)
A soldier's grave, for thee the best,
Then look around and choose thy ground
And take thy rest.

Richard Woodhouse, Jr (1788–1834)

Woodhouse was neither a poet, a playwright nor a novelist. He was, in fact, the legal adviser to Keats's publishers, Taylor and Hessey, and one of the most far-sighted and perceptive of Keats's friends.

He was born in Bath, 11 December 1788, the eldest in a family of fourteen children. After being educated at Eton, he went to Spain and Portugal; when he returned, he decided not to go to university (although he was capable of doing so), instead turning to the law. He met the publishers John Taylor and James Augustus Hessey in March 1811 while working as a conveyancer, and quickly entered their intellectual circle. Taylor regarded him at this time as erudite, hard-working, self-effacing and strictly religious.

Woodhouse met Keats at 93 Fleet Street soon after Keats himself had been introduced to Taylor and Hessey by John Hamilton Reynolds. He realized that there were faults in Keats's diction, but at the same time regarded him as potentially a great poet: 'Such a genius, I very much believe, has not appeared since Shakespeare and Milton.'¹ With equal shrewdness he realized that one day all 'Keatsiana' (a term he himself uses at least twice) would be invaluable. Thus, he copied every Keats manuscript, poem and letter on which he could lay his hands, with the result that today a number of texts are known only through his transcriptions. The letters below reveal Woodhouse's skill as an interpreter and critic of Keats. The first outlines Keats's concept of the poetical character and negative capability; the second discusses his revision of 'The Eve of St Agnes'.

After Keats's death, Woodhouse increased his efforts to gather materials that would be of use to scholars and biographers. He sought out acquaintances of the poet and spoke to them, jotting down detailed accounts of their conversations; he encouraged John Taylor to write a biography; he commissioned a portrait of the poet by Hilton, and a medallion by Giuseppe Girometti.

In due course, Woodhouse developed tuberculosis, the disease that had killed Keats. Like the poet, he went south in search of improved health, visiting Madeira in 1829–30 and Italy two years later. Back in London, his health declined rapidly, and he died on 3 September 1834.

Letter from Richard Woodhouse to John Taylor, c.27 October 1818 (extract)

I believe him to be right with regard to his own poetical character, and I perceive clearly the distinction he draws between himself and those of the Wordsworth school.¹

There are gradations in poetry and in poets. One is purely descriptive, confining himself to external nature and visible objects; another describes, in addition, the effects of the thoughts of which he is conscious, and which others are affected by. Another will soar so far into the regions of imagination as to conceive of beings and substances in situations different from what he has ever seen them, but still such as either have actually occurred or may possibly occur. Another will reason in poetry; another be witty; another will imagine things that never did nor probably ever will occur, or such as cannot in nature occur, and yet he will describe them so that you recognize nothing very unnatural in the descriptions when certain principles or powers or conditions are admitted. Another will throw himself into various characters and make them speak as the passions would naturally incite them to do.

The highest order of poet will not only possess all the above powers but will have as high an imagination that he will be able to throw his own soul into any object he sees or imagines, so as to see, feel, be sensible of, and express all that the object itself would see, feel, be sensible of, or express – and he will speak out of that object, so that his own self will, with the exception of the mechanical part, be ‘annihilated’.² And it is the excess of this power that I suppose Keats to speak, when he says he has no identity. As a poet, and when the fit is upon him, this is true. And it is a fact that he does by the power of his imagination create ideal personages, substances, and powers – that he lives for a time in their souls or essences or ideas – and that occasionally so intensely as to lose consciousness of what is round him. We all do the same in a degree, when we fall into a reverie.³

If, then, his imagination has such power, and he is continually cultivating it and giving it play, it will acquire strength by the indulgence and exercise. This in excess is the case of mad persons. And this may be carried to that extent that he may lose sight of his identity so far as to give him a habit of speaking generally in an assumed character. So that what he says shall be tinged with the sentiments proper to the character which, at the time, has possessed itself of his imagination.

This being his idea of the poetical character, he may well say that a poet has no identity. As a man he must have identity, but as a poet he need not.

And in this sense a poet is ‘the most unpoetical of God’s creatures’,⁴ for his soul has no distinctive characteristic – it cannot be itself made the subject of poetry that is another person’s soul, cannot be thrown into the poet’s, for there is no identity (separatedness, distinctiveness) or personal impulse to be acted upon.

Shakespeare was a poet of the kind above mentioned, and he was perhaps the only one besides Keats who possessed this power in an extraordinary degree, so as to be a feature in his works. He gives a description of his idea of a poet:

The poet’s eye, in a fine frenzy rolling,
Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven;
And as imagination bodies forth
The forms of things unknown, the poet’s pen
Turns them to shapes, and gives to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name.⁵

Lord Byron does not come up to this character. He can certainly conceive and describe a dark accomplished villain in love, and a female tender and kind who loves him; or a sated and palled sensualist, misanthrope, and deist⁶ – but here his power ends. The true poet cannot only conceive this, but can assume any character, essence, idea, or substance at pleasure. And he has this imaginative faculty not in a limited manner, but in full universality.

Let us pursue speculation on these matters, and we shall soon be brought to believe in the truth of every syllable of Keats’ letter, taken as a description of himself and his own ideas and feelings.

Letter from Richard Woodhouse to John Taylor

¹ For Keats’s comments on Wordsworth, see pp. 1406–7.

² annihilated Woodhouse is discussing negative capability; for Keats’s account see pp. 1405, 1424–5.

³ ‘The power of his imagination is apparent in every page of his Endymion. And he has affirmed that he can conceive of a billiard ball – that it may have a sense of delight from its own roundness, smoothness, volubility, and the rapidity of its motion’ (Woodhouse’s note).

⁴ Woodhouse is quoting from a letter Keats had sent him that day; see p. 1425.

⁵ A Midsummer Night’s Dream V i 12–17.

⁶ Woodhouse has in mind a range of works by Byron. The hit of the moment was Beppo, published in the summer of 1818. Woodhouse seems also to be referring to Manfred (1816) and Childe Harold’s Pilgrimage, the final Canto of which was published in April 1818.

Letter from Richard Woodhouse to John Taylor, 19 September 1819 (extract)

He had ‘The Eve of St Agnes’ copied fair.¹ He has made trifling alterations, inserted an additional stanza early in the poem to make the legend more intelligible,² and correspondent³ with what afterwards takes place, particularly with respect to the supper and the playing on the lute. He retains the name of Porphyro, has altered the last three lines to leave on the reader a sense of pettish disgust, by bringing Old Angela in (only) dead, stiff and ugly.⁴ He says he likes that the poem should leave off with this change of sentiment – it was what he aimed at, and was glad to find from my objections to it that he had succeeded. I apprehend he had a fancy for trying his hand at an attempt to play with his reader, and fling him off ⁵ at last. I should have thought he affected the ‘Don Juan’⁶ style of mingling up sentiment and sneering, but that he had before asked Hessey⁷ if he could procure him a sight of that work, as he had not met with it – and if ‘The Eve of St Agnes’ had not, in all probability, been altered before his Lordship⁸ had thus flown in the face of the public.

There was another alteration, which I abused for ‘a full hour by the Temple clock’.⁹ You know, if a thing has a decent side, I generally look no further. As the poem was originally written, we innocent ones (ladies and myself) might very well have supposed that Porphyro, when acquainted with Madeline’s love for him, and when ‘he arose, / Ethereal, flushed’¹⁰ etc. etc. (turn to it), set himself at once to persuade her to go off with him, and succeeded and went over the ‘Dartmoor black’ (now changed for some other place)¹¹ to be married, in right honest, chaste, and sober wise.¹² But as it is now altered, as soon as Madeline has confessed her love, Porphyro winds by degrees his arm round her, presses breast to breast, and acts all the acts of a bona fide husband, while she fancies she is only playing the part of a wife in a dream.¹³

This alteration is of about three stanzas, and though there are no improper expressions, but all is left to inference; and though, profanely speaking, the interest on the reader’s imagination is greatly heightened – yet I do apprehend it will render the poem unfit for ladies, and indeed scarcely to be mentioned to them among the ‘things that are’.¹⁴ He says he does not want ladies to read his poetry; that he writes for men,¹⁵ and that if in the former poem there was an opening for doubt what took place, it was his fault for not writing clearly and comprehensibly; that he should despise a man who would be such an eunuch in sentiment as to leave a maid, with that character about her, in such a situation;¹⁶ and should despise himself to write about it, etc., etc., etc. – and all this sort of Keats-like rodomontade.¹⁷

Percy Bysshe Shelley(1792–1822)

According to Hazlitt, Percy Bysshe Shelley

has a fire in his eye, a fever in his blood, a maggot in his brain, a hectic flutter in his speech, which mark out the philosophic fanatic. He is sanguine complexioned, and shrill-voiced. ... He is clogged by no dull system of realities, no earth-bound feelings, no rooted prejudices, by nothing that belongs to the mighty trunk and hard husk of nature and habit, but is drawn up by irresistible levity to the regions of mere speculation and fancy, to the sphere of air and fire, where his delighted spirit floats in 'seas of pearl and clouds of amber'. (Howe viii 148–9)

Some of Shelley's friends, such as Leigh Hunt, thought this too near the knuckle for comfort, and reproached Hazlitt for writing it. But it was all too true. Few descriptions are more evocative of the visionary, proselytizing energies of one of the greatest Romantic poets.

Shelley was born on 4 August 1792 at Field Place, near Horsham in Sussex, the eldest child and only son of a baronet and Whig Member of Parliament. After two years at Syon House Academy in London, where he met his lifelong friend Thomas Medwin, he went to Eton, 1804–10. There he received a thorough grounding in the classics, became interested in science and radical politics, and wrote two Gothic novels – Zastrozzi and St Irvyne (both published in 1810).

Such promise was expected to blossom at University College, Oxford, where he matriculated in October 1810 – and, in a sense, it did. His formal education came to an abrupt halt when he was expelled in March 1811 for refusing to answer questions concerning a pamphlet, The Necessity of Atheism, which he had written with his friend, Thomas Jefferson Hogg. It argued that God's existence could be proved only by reference to the senses, reason, and testimony of others. Having denied their validity, it concluded: 'Truth has always been found to promote the best interests of mankind. Every reflecting mind must allow that there is no proof of the existence of a Deity. Q.E.D.'¹

A contemporary, C. J. Ridley, who witnessed their sending down, recorded: 'The aforesaid two had made themselves as conspicuous as possible by great singularity of dress, and by walking up and down the centre of the quadrangle, as if proud of their anticipated fate. I believe no one regretted their departure, for there are but few, if any, who are not afraid of Shelley's strange and fantastic pranks, and the still stranger opinions he was known to entertain.'²

Shelley's father, Sir Timothy, was disgusted, not least by the probability of legal action for blasphemous libel. He began communicating with his son through his solicitor in order 'to guard my character and honour in case of any prosecutions in the courts'. Shelley reacted by requesting that he be disinherited – the first step in the process of self-exile that dominated the rest of his life.

In the meantime he became involved with the 16-year-old Harriet Westbrook, daughter of a retired merchant and coffee-house proprietor, with whom in August 1811

he eloped to Edinburgh, where they married before settling for a while in Keswick in the Lake District. Shelley hoped to meet Wordsworth and Coleridge there but instead met Southey. Southey was 37, Shelley 19. They got on well, Shelley going so far as to describe the older poet as 'an advocate of liberty and equality', a deist and 'a great man'.³ After one of their conversations, he noted that 'Southey says I am not an atheist but a pantheist.'⁴ But he became disillusioned with Southey when he realized how conservative he was in his politics. Shelley's time in Keswick culminated with an attempted housebreaking and robbery in which he was physically attacked. This kind of thing would happen again.

In February 1812 he and Harriet sailed to Ireland, where he wanted to start a revolution. On arrival in Dublin he published and distributed his Address to the Irish People, arguing for Catholic emancipation and repeal of the Act of Union. He distributed all 1,500 copies, mailing some to such prominent liberals as John Philpot Curran; he instructed his servant to give copies out at public houses, while he threw others into passing carriages and open windows, or gave them to beggars, drunks and prostitutes. 'Are you slaves, or are you men?' the pamphlet asked its readers, 'a real man is free.'⁵

Invited to speak at the Fishamble Street Theatre by the Catholic Committee, Shelley came to the attention of Home Office spies, just as Wordsworth and Coleridge had done in Somerset in 1797–8. But the most important thing Shelley was to learn from his visit to Ireland was that revolution was unlikely to come from the oppressed majority. 'The poor of Dublin are assuredly the meanest and most miserable of all', he told the philosopher and man of letters William Godwin, 'In their narrow streets thousands seem huddled together – one mass of animated filth!... These were the persons to whom in my fancy I had addressed myself.'⁶

By now Godwin was his hero. Godwin's philosophy, first articulated in Political Justice (1793), envisaged a society governed by reason. Human property and corrupt institutions such as 'government' and 'marriage' would wither away, leaving human beings free to do as they pleased, governed only by innate rationality. Such theories had an undeniable attraction for young radicals (in the early 1790s Wordsworth had been drawn to them) and by the time he arrived in Ireland Shelley was in correspondence with their architect.

After returning to Wales in April, Shelley moved from one place to the next until settling in Lynmouth in Devon, where he founded a sort of commune consisting of females – Harriet, her sister Eliza, and his friend Elizabeth Hitchener. He extended an invitation to Fanny Imlay (Mary Wollstonecraft's daughter by the traveller Gilbert Imlay), but her stepfather, William Godwin, would not allow it. From Lynmouth Shelley distributed revolutionary propaganda, putting messages in bottles and floating them out to sea, or sending them up in miniature hot-air balloons. This led the Home Office, under Viscount Sidmouth, to step up surveillance of him, as he looked suspiciously like a French spy; on 19 August, his servant was caught pasting subversive handbills up in Barnstaple and arrested. It was time for Shelley to move on.

After a visit to London in early October 1812, where Shelley finally met the 56-year-old William Godwin, he settled at Tremadoc in Wales, where he continued to distribute revolutionary propaganda. There, on 26 February 1813, he was assaulted late in the evening by an 'assassin'. Shots were fired. A henchman returned early in the morning and a further skirmish took place. Though Shelley survived both attacks, the experience changed him: from now on he would no longer be an activist for revolution – instead, he would be a mouthpiece for it.

Back in London in July 1813, Shelley published his first major poem, Queen Mab (1813), which denounced the monarchy and religion while arguing for free love: ‘Love is free: to promise for ever to love the same woman is not less absurd than to promise to believe the same creed: such a vow in both cases excludes us from all enquiry.’⁷ Perhaps not surprisingly, relations with Harriet were deteriorating, and Shelley separated from her in April 1814. ‘I felt as if a dead and living body had been linked together in loathsome and horrible communion’,⁸ he later told Hogg.

He met the 16-year-old Mary Godwin in May or June 1814, subsequently arranging clandestine meetings with her and her step-sister Jane at Mary Wollstonecraft’s grave in St Pancras churchyard. ‘I am thine, exclusively thine’, Mary wrote in a copy of Queen Mab, ‘I have pledged myself to thee and sacred is the gift.’⁹ When Godwin found out he banned further meetings. Shelley threatened suicide, brandishing a small pistol and a bottle of laudanum. ‘His eyes were bloodshot, his hair and dress disordered’, recalled his friend Thomas Love Peacock. ‘He caught up a bottle of laudanum, and said: “I never part from this.”’¹⁰

On 28 July he eloped with Mary and Jane to the Continent. Typically, he wrote to Harriet from France, inviting her to join them in Switzerland. She didn’t – and, after a whirlwind tour of France, Switzerland and Germany, a shortage of funds compelled the runaways to return to England in September.

On their return the ménage à trois settled in St Pancras, close to what is now Euston Road in central London, where they set off fireworks in the fields, discussed a further Irish trip, and devised a plan to kidnap Shelley’s two younger sisters from their school in Hackney. In following months Jane changed her name to Claire (thus becoming Claire Clairmont), and Wordsworth’s The Excursion was published. Wordsworth was one of Shelley’s favourite poets, but though Shelley continued to admire his spiritual aspirations, it was clear from this latest publication, dedicated to the Tory Lord Lowther, that he had abandoned his earlier radicalism. ‘He is a slave’, Mary wrote in her journal on 14 September 1814, adding that they were ‘much disappointed’ with The Excursion.¹¹ Shelley may not have composed his sonnet ‘To Wordsworth’ as early as this (a more likely date being September–October 1815), but it marks the point at which he grew disillusioned with the Lake Poets generally.

In August 1815, after giving birth to a premature baby who died soon after, Mary moved with Shelley to Bishopsgate, Old Windsor. Shelley’s first major poem, Alastor, was composed there after a lengthy expedition up the Thames, and the river is a constant presence in the poem. It seems to be driving him on, just as the Poet is driven by the spirit of solitude which Shelley thought dangerously self-involving, leading the Poet to his death. That visionary spirit, conjured up by the Poet from within, compels him to reject the Arab maiden and instead to feast on her visionary counterpart, the ‘veiled maid’ (l. 151), who dances through his dreams. Shelley’s preoccupation with the Poet’s unhealthy state of mind derives partly from his reading of Wordsworth’s ‘Lines left upon a Seat in a Yew-Tree’ (see p. 359), also in blank verse.

Publication of Alastor coincided roughly with the birth of a second child, William, in January 1816. Shortly after, Claire Clairmont had an affair with Byron in April and, pregnant by him, joined Percy and Mary for a second foray to the Continent in the summer. Journeying through Switzerland, Shelley amused himself by writing the word 'atheist' after his name in at least four hotel registers, thus fuelling the outrage of such tourists as Southey, who would go home with tales about Shelley's 'league of incest' with Mary and her step-sister.¹²

In truth, Percy's attitude to God was more complex than the word 'atheist' suggests. It is hardly surprising that the concept appealed to someone opposed to an established church implicated in the social and political oppression by which England was blighted. On the other hand, he was tremendously attracted to the pantheist life-force of Tintern Abbey:

A motion and a spirit that impels
All thinking things, all objects of all thought,
And rolls through all things.

(Tintern Abbey 101–3)

Rather than reject the concept of a deity, Shelley argues for the existence of a 'Power' similar to Wordsworth's motion and spirit – at times identified with the tyrannical Jupiter in Prometheus Unbound, at others, closer to Demogorgon. Writing approvingly of Leigh Hunt's spiritual beliefs in 1811, Shelley noted his conviction in a God 'by no means perfect, but composed of good and evil like man' (Jones i 77). From time to time this is what Shelley thought, but he could also contemplate the possibility of a universe without a creator. If any phrase were to encapsulate his position, it might be 'awful doubt'¹³ – awe for the natural world, mixed with scepticism as to the existence of a divinity in the Christian sense.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

[The following Ode, originally announced under the signature of the Elfin Knight, we have since found to be from the pen of the author, whose name was mentioned among others a week or two back in an article entitled "Young Poets." The reader will think with us, that it is alone sufficient to justify what was there observed;—but we shall say more on this subject in a review of the book we mentioned:—]

HYMN TO INTELLECTUAL BEAUTY.

THE awful shadow of some unseen Power
Floats thro' unseen amongst us,—visiting
This various world with as inconstant wing
As summer winds that creep from flower to flower.—
Like moonbeams that behind some piny mountain shower,
It visits with inconstant glance
Each human heart and countenance;
Like hues and harmonies of evening,—
Like clouds in starlight widely spread,—
Like memory of music fled,—
Like aught that for its grace may be
Dear, and yet dearer for its mystery.

2.

Spirit of BEAUTY, that doth consecrate
With thine own hues all thou dost shine upon
Of human thought or form,—where art thou gone?

Shelley met Byron for the first time on the jetty of the Hotel d'Angleterre on the shore of Lake Geneva, 27 May 1816. It was the start of a stimulating and productive summer, reminiscent of the annus mirabilis of 1797–8, when Wordsworth, Dorothy and Coleridge had enjoyed a year of intellectual and creative collaboration. During its course, Shelley remained an enthusiastic, if critical, reader of Wordsworth, devouring his collected Poems of 1815, especially Tintern Abbey and the Ode.¹⁴ Byron later told Thomas Medwin that Shelley 'used to dose me with Wordsworth physic even to nausea'.¹⁵ As a result, Byron composed most of Childe Harold's Pilgrimage Canto III, affecting (not always convincingly) a Wordsworthian enthusiasm for nature, and would go on, towards the end of the summer, to write Manfred, which also shows Wordsworth's influence.

As for Shelley, he composed two of his most important shorter poems in response to Tintern Abbey – Mont Blanc and the Hymn to Intellectual Beauty. He liked Wordsworth's refusal to subscribe to conventional notions of the deity: the 'sense sublime / Of something far more deeply interfused'¹⁶ flows straight into his poetry. Mont Blanc may be Shelley's masterpiece. It is an attempt to explain the function of poetry, where it comes from, and how it relates to the cosmos. It questions not just his vocation, but his entire belief-system. Its argument is that the poet is inspired by the same forces that produced the precipitous, violent landscape before him; they move him to speak ultimate truths capable of repealing 'Large codes of fraud and woe' – the casual injustices of repressive governments such as those who had recently defeated Napoleon at Waterloo.

The weather was disappointingly wet, and the Shelleys were often confined indoors for days. In order to pass the time, they read ghost stories, having obtained J. B. B. Eyriès' Fantasmagoriana (1812). In the evenings they shared these tales with Byron at his lodging, the villa Diodati, giving him the idea that they should all try their hand at writing one. Shelley attempted one based on his childhood experience; Byron's personal physician, Dr Polidori, proposed a story about a lady punished for looking through a keyhole; and Mary Godwin would write Frankenstein. They were sitting in the long room at Diodati on 18 June when Byron recited Coleridge's description of Geraldine from Christabel (recently published by John Murray): 'Behold! her bosom and half her side – Hideous, deformed, and pale of hue'. After a short silence, Shelley started shrieking, put his hands to his head, and ran out of the room with a candle. He later said that the sight of Mary put him in mind of a woman 'who had eyes instead of nipples, which taking hold of his mind, horrified him'.

Four days later, Shelley and Byron set out on a boating expedition across Lake Lemano, heading eastwards towards Evian. They visited places associated with Rousseau and Gibbon, freethinkers they admired, as Byron mentions in Childe Harold's Pilgrimage Canto III, on which he was then working. They were nearly drowned when caught in a squall off the rocks of St Gingoux; by contrast with Byron, Shelley could not swim and sat tight in the boat until they were safe.

The summer with Byron came to an end and, having agreed to meet him again in Italy, Shelley returned to London with Mary and Claire. There followed two suicides – first that of Mary's half-sister Fanny Imlay, who may have recently discovered that her parents had not been married, followed by that of Shelley's wife Harriet in November. Believing they would be able to assume custody of his two children by Harriet, Shelley married Mary Godwin on 30 December. Much to his distress, it would make no difference. Harriet's family disputed his suitability as a parent on the grounds of his being a revolutionary and an atheist, and the children were farmed out to foster-parents. The outcome was a disastrous one for Shelley, who would never again see his children by Harriet.

At this period Shelley and Mary socialized with other writers in London, particularly Leigh Hunt, Hazlitt, Haydon, Keats, and Charles and Mary Lamb. Meeting Shelley in January 1817, Haydon recorded that he could not bear the inhumanity of Wordsworth in talking about the beauty of the shining trout as they lay after being caught, that he had such a horror of torturing animals it was impossible to express it. Ah, thought I, you have more horror at putting a hook into a fish's mouth than giving a pang to a mother's bosom. He had seduced Mary Wollstonecraft's daughter and enticed away Mrs Godwin's own daughter, to her great misery.¹⁷

Keats was wary of him too, and declined an invitation to visit him at Marlow in Buckinghamshire, where the Shelleys were now resident. With the failure of his longest and most ambitious poem to date, The Revolt of Islam, he decided to travel to Italy. Passing through London, he engaged in a last sonnet-writing competition with Keats and Leigh Hunt, and, after a visit to the British Museum with the stockbroker poet Horace Smith, wrote Ozymandias (see p. 1108).

In March 1818 he set out across the Continent with Mary, William, Clara (their son and daughter), Claire, Allegra (Claire's daughter by Byron), their Swiss maid Elise and Milly Shields, their servant-girl from Marlow. They lived a nomadic life, travelling from Milan to Livorno, Venice, Rome, Naples, Livorno again, Florence and Pisa. Shelley was reunited with Byron in Venice in August 1818, where he was treated to a recitation of Childe Harold Canto IV. Just over a month later he was seriously ill with dysentery and his daughter Clara died, partly through his own negligence. 'Stanzas written in Dejection, near Naples' and 'Lines written among the Euganean Hills' (pp. 1110–20) speak powerfully of his mood at the time.

They arrived in Rome on 5 March 1819 and took rooms on the Corso. Each day Shelley visited the Baths of Caracalla, majestic ruins that in their heyday housed 1,500 people, and continued work on Prometheus Unbound (p. 1138), begun in Venice the previous year. It was finished in Rome in early April. (Joseph Severn's painting of Shelley writing at the Baths, now at the Keats–Shelley Memorial House in Rome, is one of the icons of the Romantic period.)

The Prometheus figure reverberates through the writings of Shelley and Byron partly because they saw him as symbolic of political defiance. According to classical sources, Prometheus was the son of Iapetus and Asia, renowned for his cunning. When Jupiter took fire away from the earth, Prometheus stole replacement fire from the chariot of the sun. Enraged, Jupiter nailed him to the rock of the Caucasus for three thousand years, an eagle incessantly devouring his liver. He was freed, and the bird slaughtered, by Hercules.

Byron once recalled how, at Harrow, he had read Aeschylus' Prometheus Bound, commenting that 'The Prometheus – if not exactly in my plan – has always been so much in my head – that I can easily conceive its influence over all or anything that I have written.'¹⁸ Prometheus was a topic of discussion when Shelley met Byron at Geneva in 1816; one of Byron's poems of that moment was Prometheus (see p. 912), and Frankenstein reinvents the myth (its subtitle being 'The Modern Prometheus'). In 1817, Shelley had translated parts of Aeschylus' play from the Greek. With his sequel to the drama, Shelley gives it a twist of his own. His Prometheus is a recognizable reworking of the poet-figure who in turn is an echo of Christ. The rebirth predicted in the Ode to the West Wind is also much in evidence here, a logical consequence of Prometheus' Christ-like speech to Jupiter: 'Disdain? Ah no, I pity thee' (I 53). Shelley's Prometheus redeems the world from post-lapsarian hostilities, leading to the 'diviner day' of the millennium:

Beyond the glassy gulfs we flee
Of shadow-peopled Infancy,
Through death and birth to a diviner day –
A paradise of vaulted bowers
Lit by downward-gazing flowers.

(II v 101–5)

He called Prometheus Unbound ‘the most perfect of my productions’ (Jones ii 127). Its most percipient and helpful critic was his wife, who encapsulated its central theme when she said that ‘The prominent feature of Shelley’s theory of the destiny of the human species was that evil is not inherent in the system of the creation, but an accident that might be expelled’ (see p. 1509).

By now he was a controversial and despised figure among the English, and one day at the post office in Rome a man, hearing his name, approached him exclaiming, ‘What, are you that damned atheist Shelley?’ before striking him to the ground. In June the Shelleys prepared to head northwards to Livorno, but before their departure their beloved son William, 4 years old, died. He was buried in the Protestant Cemetery in Rome where, two years later, he would be joined by Keats.

Shelley had been travelling for a year in Italy when a political event in England provoked a burst of intense creative activity. On 16 August 1819, at St Peter’s Field, on the outskirts of Manchester, 60,000 working men and women met to listen to the orator Henry Hunt declare the need for universal suffrage, liberty and political rights; all came from a region of fifty miles’ radius in orderly groups. The response of the local magistrates was to send in the Manchester and Salford yeomanry to arrest Hunt as he addressed the crowd. As they did so, they knocked down a woman and trampled her child to death. When the crowd surged, mounted hussars charged, sabres drawn. There was mass panic as people ran in all directions. In what became known as the Peterloo Massacre, eleven people were killed and over four hundred seriously injured, including over a hundred women and children, either wounded by sabres or trampled by horses. For decades, the atrocity was symbolic of everything unjust in British government. Lord Sidmouth, Lord Liverpool (the Prime Minister) and the Prince Regent publicly endorsed the action. The news reached Shelley within the week. A fortnight later he told his publisher, Charles Ollier, that ‘the torrent of my indignation has not yet done boiling in my veins. I wait anxiously to hear how the country will express its sense of this bloody murderous oppression of its destroyers’ (Jones ii 117).

Within twelve days he had composed the greatest poem of political protest in the language. The Mask of Anarchy begins as satire, depicting the ministers of Lord Liverpool’s government riding the horses which trample the crowd; then, from stanzas 34 to 63, a maid who has risen up to halt Anarchy (the idol of both the government and the people) addresses the crowd, telling them of false freedom and then of true freedom; and in the concluding section she tells them to stand up for their rights using passive, non-violent demonstration:

Rise like lions after slumber
In unvanquishable number;
Shake your chains to earth like dew
Which in sleep had fallen on you –
Ye are many, they are few.

(ll. 368–72)

The poem warns against Anarchy – it recognizes the appetite of the people for revenge, but warns them that were they to take it, the government would use it as the excuse for even more violent suppression.

Shelley sent the poem to Leigh Hunt for inclusion in The Examiner but, after much thought, Hunt chose not to publish. Instead he held on to it until 1832, well after Shelley's death, when he brought it out to coincide with the passing of the first Parliamentary Reform Bill. Had it been published in 1819, it could have made Shelley's name: the poem was designed for mass consumption, and would have had immediate impact. But it would also have led to Hunt's imprisonment for sedition, there being over seventy-five such prosecutions that year – and Hunt had no wish to return to prison (where he had been sent for libelling the Prince Regent in 1813 – see p. 816). He was also less radical in his views than Shelley, and genuinely thought this a bad time to inflame the populace.

This was bad luck for Shelley, and typical of the fate of his best writing during his lifetime. Absence from England meant he was unlikely to get his work into print in the form he wished, if at all. He could not speak to publishers to argue his case, and on the rare occasions when it was published, it was ridiculed and attacked, often for political reasons. Shortly after completing The Mask of Anarchy he happened to read a review of The Revolt of Islam (1818) in the Tory Quarterly Review, which characterized him as someone who 'would overthrow the constitution ... he would pull down our churches, level our Establishment, and burn our bibles ... marriage he cannot endure.' It went on to attack him on personal grounds and to mock his poem.

This kind of criticism must have hurt, but it further clarified his response to the Peterloo Massacre. He began to understand better his poetical aims and ambitions, and in order to articulate that renewed sense of purpose he composed Ode to the West Wind (in terza rima) around 25 October 1819. Like the Mask, it is a statement of faith in the ability of human beings to resist the oppression of church and state, and realize their power of self-determination; thus, the 'Pestilence-stricken multitudes' are bidden to participate in the millennial vision of 'a new birth'. But the poem goes further than that. It insists on the primacy of the poet as the central agency, the saviour-like prophet, 'tameless, and swift, and proud', who will awaken the masses to their potential: 'Drive my dead thoughts over the universe / Like withered leaves to quicken a new birth!' (ll. 63–4).

In the essay 'On Love' he observed, 'I have found my language misunderstood like one in a distant and savage land' (see p. 1108), and in a letter of April 1819 he expressed his cynicism as to the reviewers' opinion of Rosalind and Helen (1819): 'As to the reviews, I suppose there is nothing but abuse' (Jones ii 94). It is moving to consider that a poet who during his lifetime was compelled to accept failure should have continued to believe in the power of his words to change the world for the better. What he could not know was that, for decades after his death, working-class people across the world would take inspiration from his poems in the struggle for their rights.

Mary Shelley's fourth child was born in November 1819 – Percy Florence (named after the city of his birth) was the only one that would survive. This was a period of remarkable artistic productivity for Shelley, and besides much else he composed England in 1819, a sonnet that glances back at the events of the past autumn. In a spirit of resignation, he sent it to Leigh Hunt for The Examiner, adding wisely, 'I do not expect you to publish it, but you may show it to whom you please' (Jones ii 167). Hunt decided not to publish.

By the winter of 1820–1, the Shelleys were resident in Pisa where they became acquainted with the 19-year-old Teresa Viviani, who was incarcerated at the Convent of St Anna while she waited for her wealthy parents to negotiate her marriage to a suitably rich husband. The Shelleys took pity on the beautiful young woman, unhappily confined to two small rooms, whom they called Emilia. Shelley in particular was struck by the horror of her situation, and seems to have fallen in love with her. He sent her flowers and wrote her short poems and verse-letters. For her part, Emilia charmed both Mary and Percy with letters declaring her affection, and wrote an essay on love for them, ‘Il vero amore’: ‘But where is he, susceptible of such love? Where? Who is capable of inspiring it? Oh love! I am all love. ... Love has no wish but for virtue. ... Love is a fire that burns and destroys not, a mixture of pleasure and pain, a pain that brings pleasure, an essence eternal, spiritual, infinite, pure, celestial.’¹⁹ Emotionally preoccupied by the beautiful young woman who seemed to beseech him, Shelley began reading Dante’s La Vita Nuova, which contained some of the Italian poet’s most impassioned love poetry to Beatrice Portinari. In January and February 1821, he composed Epipsychidion, a remarkable poem in rhyming couplets that declares his feelings for Emilia while offering a thinly veiled emotional and psychological autobiography. It is for this part of the poem (beginning at line 190) that Epipsychidion is so remarkable. One must bear in mind that autobiography was in those days a genre in its infancy; the only precedent in contemporary poetry, Wordsworth’s Prelude, was still in manuscript. Shelley adopts a typically idiosyncratic approach to the task of writing about himself and the women in his life, referring to ‘mortal forms’ – Harriet Westbrook, Mary Shelley, and even the prostitutes who had crossed his path in early manhood. It was, he later observed, ‘an idealized history of my life and feelings.’²⁰

He sent a fair copy to London for publication but, embarrassed about the poem’s content, instructed the publisher to produce only 100 copies ‘for the esoteric few’ (though it is now thought at least 200 or 250 were printed). He also composed a Preface attributing authorship of the poem to a man who had died in Florence – though, as he told his publisher, ‘it is a production of a portion of me already dead; and in this sense the advertisement is no fiction’.²¹ Shelley’s disguise was quickly penetrated, however, and he soon suppressed the poem completely.

The Shelleys moved to Pisa where, c.20 January 1821, he read an article by his old friend Thomas Love Peacock entitled ‘The Four Ages of Poetry’, in the first number of Ollier’s Literary Miscellany, arguing that English poetry was in terminal decline. To Shelley this was an attack on everything he stood for. It was impossible for him not to respond. The result was his Defence of Poetry, of which extracts are presented here, an amplification of the ideas found elsewhere in his writing. At its heart is a belief that the poet, a participant in ‘the eternal, the infinite, and the one’ – that is to say, a kind of priest or prophet – is the mouthpiece for cosmic, moral and political truths. It is Shelley’s most important prose utterance, and was sent to Ollier for the next number of his Literary Miscellany; it was not published.

In April 1821 Shelley heard of Keats’s death. They had met at Hunt’s in 1817, and he had become an admirer of his work, particularly Hyperion. During his frequent boating expeditions Shelley devised a poem on Keats’s death entitled Adonais. Its starting point was the belief that a ‘savage criticism’ of Endymion in the Quarterly Review had exacerbated Keats’s incipient tuberculosis, contracted while nursing his brother Tom.

This had not been so, but Shelley became convinced of it. It turned Keats into yet another version of the prophet in the wilderness, which was how he saw himself. Adonais is the occasion for some of the most persuasive Neoplatonic poetry Shelley was to compose:

He is made one with Nature: there is heard
His voice in all her music, from the moan
Of thunder, to the song of night's sweet bird;
He is a presence to be felt and known
In darkness and in light, from herb and stone,
Spreading itself where'er that Power may move
Which has withdrawn his being to its own,
Which wields the world with never-wearied love,
Sustains it from beneath, and kindles it above.

(ll. 370–8)

This is akin to the pantheist passages in Tintern Abbey (ll. 94–103); both poems speak of the indefinable 'presence' that transcends the limitations of the human condition, coexistent with a universal consciousness that runs through nature. Shelley saw Keats as absorbed into that larger entity, just as the nameless woman of Wordsworth's 'A Slumber did my Spirit Seal' was incorporated into the 'earth's diurnal course / With rocks and stones and trees!' (ll. 7–8).

By now, strains had begun to sour Mary and Percy's marriage, due partly to mutual despondency at their children's deaths, and partly to an unfounded allegation that Claire had given birth to Shelley's child. In a letter of March 1820 Shelley complained that 'Mary considers me a portion of herself, and feels no more remorse in torturing me than in torturing her own mind. Could she suddenly know a person in every way my equal, and hold close and perpetual communion with him, as a distinct being from herself, as a friend instead of a husband, she would obtain empire over herself that she might not make him miserable.'²² There would be scant respite from these tensions during their last years together. In fact, the arrival in Pisa of Edward and Jane Williams brought another woman into Shelley's life. According to Mary, Jane 'has a very pretty voice, and a taste and ear for music which is almost miraculous. The harp is her favourite instrument; but we have none, and a very bad piano.' Little wonder, then, that Shelley should have given Jane a guitar, enclosing the fair copy of 'With a Guitar, To Jane' (p. 1268) – as undisguised a love poem as he would ever write. The Shelleys moved to San Terenzo near Lerici in April 1822, where he received his boat, the Ariel, on 22 May. He sailed to Livorno with Edward Williams, but on the way back a storm blew up and the boat went down under full sail. Ten days later his body was washed up along the beach between Massa and Viareggio, the flesh of his arms and face entirely eaten away. It was identified by the copy of Keats's poems in his jacket pocket, and burnt on the beach in Byron's presence.

Shelley's literary reputation has risen comparatively slowly, thanks in part to the deplorable state of his texts. Most of his poems were printed incorrectly, often because he was unable to supervise their production. Alongside her remarkable novels, one of Mary Shelley's greatest creative achievements was to edit the first collected edition of her husband's poetry in 1839, which remained the critical standard well into the late twentieth century. The works presented here are edited for this anthology from early printed texts and Shelley's manuscripts.

To Wordsworth (composed probably September–October 1815)¹

From Alastor; or, The Spirit of Solitude, and Other Poems (1816)

Poet of nature, thou hast wept to know
That things depart which never may return;
Childhood and youth, friendship and love's first glow
Have fled like sweet dreams,² leaving thee to mourn.
These common woes I feel. One loss is mine 5
Which thou too feel'st, yet I alone deplore.³
Thou wert as a lone star,⁴ whose light did shine
On some frail bark in winter's midnight roar;
Thou hast like to a rock-built refuge stood
Above the blind and battling multitude; 10
In honoured poverty⁵ thy voice did weave
Songs consecrate to truth and liberty –
Deserting these, thou leavest me to grieve,
Thus having been, that thou shouldst cease to be.

To Wordsworth

¹ Shelley admired Tintern Abbey and the Ode, but was disappointed by The Excursion (1814), and despised Wordsworth for the conservatism of his middle age. He did not know The Prelude. See headnote, p. 1073, for further discussion.

² Poet of nature...dreams a reference to Wordsworth's lament for the loss of his earlier intensity of vision in the Ode (p. 549).

³ deplore lament.

⁴ Thou wert as a lone star cf. Wordsworth's praise of Milton, 'London 1802' 9: 'Thy soul was like a star and dwelt apart.'

⁵ In honoured poverty it cannot be said that Wordsworth was ever truly poor (although he and his siblings had known hard times after they were orphaned in 1783). Shelley is lamenting Wordsworth's acceptance of the job of Distributor for Stamps in Westmorland, which brought him a yearly salary of £400 (£15,000/US$27,000 today).

Alastor; or, The Spirit of Solitude (composed 10 September and 14 December 1815)¹

From Alastor; or, The Spirit of Solitude, and Other Poems (1816)

Preface

The poem entitled 'Alastor' may be considered as allegorical of one of the most interesting situations of the human mind. It represents a youth² of uncorrupted feelings and adventurous genius led forth by an imagination inflamed and purified through familiarity with all that is excellent and majestic, to the contemplation of the universe. He drinks deep of the fountains of knowledge and is still insatiate. The magnificence and beauty of the external world sinks profoundly into the frame of his conceptions, and affords to their modifications a variety not to be exhausted. So long as it is possible for his desires to point towards objects thus infinite and unmeasured, he is joyous and tranquil and self-possessed. But the period arrives when these objects cease to suffice. His mind is at length suddenly awakened and thirsts for intercourse with an intelligence similar to itself. He images to himself the being whom he loves. Conversant with speculations of the sublimest and most perfect natures, the vision in which he embodies his own imaginations unites all of wonderful, or wise, or beautiful, which the poet, the philosopher, or the lover could depicture. The intellectual faculties, the imagination, the functions of sense, have their respective requisitions³ on the sympathy of corresponding powers in other human beings. The poet is represented as uniting these requisitions, and attaching them to a single image. He seeks in vain for a prototype of his conception.⁴ Blasted by his disappointment, he descends to an untimely grave.

The picture is not barren of instruction to actual men. The poet's self-centred seclusion was avenged by the furies of an irresistible passion pursuing him to speedy ruin. But that power which strikes the luminaries of the world with sudden darkness and extinction, by awakening them to too exquisite a perception of its influences, dooms to a slow and poisonous decay those meaner spirits that dare to abjure its dominion. Their destiny is more abject and inglorious as their delinquency is more contemptible and pernicious. They who, deluded by no generous error, instigated by no sacred thirst of doubtful knowledge, duped by no illustrious superstition, loving nothing on this earth, and cherishing no hopes beyond, yet keep aloof from sympathies with their kind, rejoicing neither in human joy nor mourning with human grief; these, and such as they, have their apportioned curse. They languish because none feel with them their common nature. They are morally dead. They are neither friends, nor lovers, nor fathers, nor citizens of the world, nor benefactors of their country. Among those who attempt to exist without human sympathy, the pure and tender-hearted perish through the intensity and passion of their search after its communities, when the vacancy of their spirit suddenly makes itself felt. All else,⁵ selfish, blind, and torpid, are those unforeseeing multitudes who constitute, together with their own, the lasting misery and loneliness of the world. Those who love not their fellow-beings live unfruitful lives, and prepare for their old age a miserable grave.

The good die first,
And those whose hearts are dry as summer dust,
Burn to the socket!⁶

14 December 1815

*Nondum amabam, et amare amabam, quaerebam quid amarem, amans
amare.*⁷

Earth, ocean, air, beloved brotherhood!
If our great mother⁸ has imbued my soul
With aught of natural piety⁹ to feel
Your love, and recompense the boon with mine;
If dewy morn, and odorous noon, and even, 5
With sunset and its gorgeous ministers,
And solemn midnight's tingling silentness;
If autumn's hollow sighs in the sere¹⁰ wood,
And winter robing with pure snow and crowns
Of starry ice the grey grass and bare boughs; 10
If spring's voluptuous pantings when she breathes
Her first sweet kisses, have been dear to me;
If no bright bird, insect, or gentle beast
I consciously¹¹ have injured, but still loved
And cherished these my kindred – then forgive 15
This boast, beloved brethren, and withdraw
No portion of your wonted favour now.

Mother of this unfathomable world!¹²
Favour my solemn song, for I have loved
Thee ever, and thee only; I have watched 20
Thy shadow and the darkness of thy steps,
And my heart ever gazes on the depth
Of thy deep mysteries. I have made my bed
In charnels¹³ and on coffins, where black death
Keeps record of the trophies won from thee, 25
Hoping to still these obstinate questionings¹⁴
Of thee and thine, by forcing some lone ghost,
Thy messenger, to render up the tale
Of what we are.¹⁵ In lone and silent hours,

When night makes a weird sound of its own stillness, 30
Like an inspired and desperate alchemist¹⁶
Staking his very life on some dark hope,
Have I mixed awful talk¹⁷ and asking looks
With my most innocent love, until strange tears,
Uniting with those breathless kisses, made 35
Such magic as compels the charmed night
To render up thy charge – and though ne'er yet
Thou hast unveiled thy inmost sanctuary,
Enough from incommunicable dream,
And twilight phantasms, and deep noonday thought, 40
Has shone within me, that serenely now
And moveless, as a long-forgotten lyre¹⁸
Suspended in the solitary dome
Of some mysterious and deserted fane,¹⁹
I wait thy breath, Great Parent, that my strain 45
May modulate with murmurs of the air
And motions of the forests and the sea,
And voice of living beings, and woven hymns
Of night and day, and the deep heart of man.
There was a poet whose untimely tomb 50
No human hands with pious reverence reared,
But the charmed eddies of autumnal winds
Built o'er his mouldering bones a pyramid
Of mouldering leaves in the waste wilderness;
A lovely youth – no mourning maiden decked 55
With weeping flowers or votive cypress²⁰ wreath
The lone couch of his everlasting sleep;
Gentle and brave and generous – no lorn²¹ bard
Breathed o'er his dark fate one melodious sigh;
He lived, he died, he sung, in solitude. 60
Strangers have wept to hear his passionate notes,
And virgins, as unknown he passed, have pined
And wasted for fond love of his wild eyes.

The fire of those soft orbs has ceased to burn,
And silence, too enamoured of that voice, 65
Locks its mute music in her rugged cell.

By solemn vision and bright silver dream
His infancy was nurtured;²² every sight
And sound from the vast earth and ambient²³ air
Sent to his heart its choicest impulses. 70

The fountains of divine philosophy²⁴
Fled not his thirsting lips, and all of great
Or good or lovely, which the sacred past
In truth or fable consecrates, he felt
And knew. When early youth had passed, he left 75

His cold fireside and alienated home²⁵
To seek strange truths in undiscovered lands:
Many a wide waste and tangled wilderness
Has lured his fearless steps, and he has bought
With his sweet voice and eyes, from savage men, 80
His rest and food. Nature's most secret steps
He like her shadow has pursued, where'er
The red volcano overcanopies
Its fields of snow and pinnacles of ice

With burning smoke, or where bitumen lakes²⁶ 85
On black bare pointed islets ever beat
With sluggish surge, or where the secret caves
Rugged and dark, winding among the springs
Of fire and poison, inaccessible

To avarice or pride, their starry domes 90
Of diamond and of gold expand above
Numberless and immeasurable halls,

Frequent²⁷ with crystal column, and clear shrines
Of pearl, and thrones radiant with chrysolite.²⁸
Nor had that scene of ampler majesty 95
Than gems or gold, the varying roof of heaven

And the green earth lost in his heart its claims
To love and wonder; he would linger long
In lonesome vales, making the wild his home,
Until the doves and squirrels would partake 100
From his innocuous hand his bloodless food,²⁹
Lured by the gentle meaning of his looks,
And the wild antelope that starts whene'er
The dry leaf rustles in the brake, suspend
Her timid steps to gaze upon a form 105
More graceful than her own.

His wandering step,³⁰
Obedient to high thoughts, has visited
The awful ruins of the days of old:
Athens, and Tyre, and Balbec,³¹ and the waste
Where stood Jerusalem,³² the fallen towers 110
Of Babylon,³³ the eternal pyramids,
Memphis and Thebes,³⁴ and whatso'er of strange
Sculptured on alabaster obelisk
Or jasper tomb, or mutilated sphinx,
Dark Ethiopia in her desert hills 115
Conceals. Among the ruined temples there,
Stupendous columns and wild images
Of more than man, where marble demons³⁵ watch
The Zodiac's brazen mystery³⁶ and dead men
Hang their mute thoughts on the mute walls around, 120
He lingered, poring on memorials
Of the world's youth, through the long burning day
Gazed on those speechless shapes, nor, when the moon
Filled the mysterious halls with floating shades,
Suspended he that task, but ever gazed 125
And gazed, till meaning on his vacant mind
Flashed³⁷ like strong inspiration, and he saw

The thrilling secrets of the birth of time.

Meanwhile an Arab maiden brought his food,
Her daily portion, from her father's tent, 130
And spread her matting for his couch, and stole
From duties and repose to tend his steps –
Enamoured, yet not daring for deep awe
To speak her love – and watched his nightly sleep,
Sleepless herself, to gaze upon his lips 135
Parted in slumber, whence the regular breath
Of innocent dreams arose. Then when red morn
Made paler the pale moon, to her cold home
Wildered, and wan, and panting, she returned.

The poet wandering on, through Arabia 140
And Persia and the wild Carmanian waste,
And o'er the aerial mountains which pour down
Indus and Oxus from their icy caves,
In joy and exultation held his way;
Till in the Vale of Kashmir, 38 far within 145
Its loneliest dell, where odorous plants entwine
Beneath the hollow rocks a natural bower,
Beside a sparkling rivulet he stretched
His languid limbs. 39 A vision on his sleep
There came, a dream of hopes that never yet 150
Had flushed his cheek: he dreamed a veiled maid
Sat near him, talking in low solemn tones.
Her voice was like the voice of his own soul
Heard in the calm of thought; 40 its music long, 41
Like woven sounds of streams and breezes, held 155
His inmost sense suspended in its web
Of many-coloured woof and shifting hues.
Knowledge and truth and virtue were her theme,
And lofty hopes of divine liberty,
Thoughts the most dear to him, and poesy, 160
Herself a poet. Soon the solemn mood
Of her pure mind kindled through all her frame

A permeating fire – wild numbers⁴² then
She raised, with voice stifled in tremulous sobs
Subdued by its own pathos;⁴³ her fair hands 165
Were bare alone, sweeping from some strange harp
Strange symphony,⁴⁴ and in their branching veins
The eloquent blood told an ineffable tale.
The beating of her heart was heard to fill
The pauses of her music, and her breath 170
Tumultuously accorded with those fits
Of intermitted song. Sudden she rose,
As if her heart impatiently endured
Its bursting burden: at the sound he turned,
And saw by the warm light of their own life 175
Her glowing limbs beneath the sinuous veil
Of woven wind, her outspread arms now bare,
Her dark locks floating in the breath of night,
Her beamy bending eyes, her parted lips
Outstretched and pale, and quivering eagerly. 180
His strong heart sunk and sickened with excess
Of love. He reared his shuddering limbs and quelled
His gasping breath, and spread his arms to meet
Her panting bosom; she drew back awhile,
Then, yielding to the irresistible joy, 185
With frantic gesture and short breathless cry
Folded his frame in her dissolving arms.
Now blackness veiled his dizzy eyes, and night
Involved⁴⁵ and swallowed up the vision; sleep,
Like a dark flood suspended in its course, 190
Rolled back its impulse on his vacant brain.

Roused by the shock he started from his trance –
The cold white light of morning, the blue moon
Low in the west, the clear and garish⁴⁶ hills,
The distinct valley and the vacant woods, 195
Spread round him where he stood. Whither have fled

The hues of heaven that canopied his bower
Of yesternight? The sounds that soothed his sleep,
The mystery and the majesty of earth,
The joy, the exultation? His wan eyes 200
Gaze on the empty scene as vacantly
As ocean's moon looks on the moon in heaven.
The spirit of sweet human love has sent
A vision to the sleep of him who spurned
Her choicest gifts. He eagerly pursues 205
Beyond the realms of dream that fleeting shade;
He overleaps the bounds.⁴⁷ Alas, alas!
Were limbs and breath and being intertwined
Thus treacherously? Lost, lost, forever lost
In the wide pathless desert of dim sleep, 210
That beautiful shape! Does the dark gate of death
Conduct to thy mysterious paradise,
Oh sleep? Does the bright arch of rainbow clouds
And pendent⁴⁸ mountains seen in the calm lake
Lead only to a black and watery depth, 215
While death's blue vault with loathliest⁴⁹ vapours hung,
Where every shade which the foul grave exhales
Hides its dead eye from the detested day,
Conducts, oh sleep, to thy delightful realms?⁵⁰
This doubt with sudden tide flowed on his heart; 220
The insatiate hope which it awakened stung
His brain even like despair.⁵¹

While daylight held

The sky, the poet kept mute conference⁵²
With his still soul. At night the passion came
Like the fierce fiend of a distempered dream, 225
And shook him from his rest, and led him forth
Into the darkness. As an eagle grasped
In folds of the green serpent, feels her breast

Burn with the poison, and precipitates⁵³
Through night and day, tempest and calm and cloud, 230
Frantic with dizzying anguish, her blind flight
O'er the wide airy wilderness; thus driven
By the bright shadow⁵⁴ of that lovely dream,
Beneath the cold glare of the desolate night,
Through tangled swamps and deep precipitous dells, 235
Startling with careless step the moonlight snake,
He fled. Red morning dawned upon his flight,
Shedding the mockery of its vital hues
Upon his cheek of death. He wandered on
Till vast Aornos seen from Petra's steep⁵⁵ 240
Hung o'er the low horizon like a cloud;
Through Balk⁵⁶ and where the desolated tombs
Of Parthian kings scatter to every wind
Their wasting dust, wildly he wandered on
Day after day, a weary waste of hours, 245
Bearing within his life the brooding care
That ever fed on its decaying flame.
And now his limbs were lean: his scattered hair
Sered⁵⁷ by the autumn of strange suffering
Sung dirges in the wind; his listless hand 250
Hung like dead bone within its withered skin;
Life, and the lustre that consumed it, shone
As in a furnace burning secretly
From his dark eyes alone. The cottagers,
Who ministered with human charity 255
His human wants, beheld with wondering awe
Their fleeting visitant. The mountaineer,
Encountering on some dizzy precipice
That spectral form, deemed that the spirit of wind
With lightning eyes, and eager breath, and feet 260
Disturbing not the drifted snow, had paused
In its career; the infant would conceal

His troubled visage in his mother's robe
In terror at the glare of those wild eyes,
To remember their strange light in many a dream 265
Of after-times; but youthful maidens, taught
By nature, would interpret half the woe⁵⁸
That wasted him, would call him with false names
Brother and friend, would press his pallid hand
At parting, and watch, dim through tears, the path 270
Of his departure from their father's door.

At length upon the lone Chorasman shore⁵⁹
He paused, a wide and melancholy waste
Of putrid marshes. A strong impulse urged
His steps to the seashore; a swan⁶⁰ was there, 275
Beside a sluggish stream among the reeds.
It rose as he approached, and with strong wings
Scaling the upward sky, bent its bright course
High over the immeasurable main.
His eyes pursued its flight. 'Thou hast a home, 280
Beautiful bird; thou voyagest to thine home,
Where thy sweet mate will twine her downy neck
With thine, and welcome thy return with eyes
Bright in the lustre of their own fond joy.
And what am I that I should linger here, 285
With voice far sweeter than thy dying notes,
Spirit more vast than thine, frame more attuned
To beauty, wasting these surpassing powers
In the deaf air, to the blind earth, and heaven
That echoes not my thoughts?' A gloomy smile 290
Of desperate hope wrinkled his quivering lips –
For sleep, he knew, kept⁶¹ most relentlessly
Its precious charge, and silent death exposed,
Faithless perhaps as sleep, a shadowy lure,⁶²
With doubtful smile mocking its own strange charms.⁶³ 295
Startled by his own thoughts he looked around.

There was no fair fiend near him, not a sight
Or sound of awe but in his own deep mind.

A little shallop⁶⁴ floating near the shore
Caught the impatient wandering of his gaze. 300

It had been long abandoned, for its sides
Gaped wide with many a rift, and its frail joints
Swayed with the undulations of the tide.

A restless impulse urged him to embark
And meet lone death on the drear ocean's waste, 305
For well he knew that mighty shadow loves
The slimy caverns of the populous deep.

The day was fair and sunny, sea and sky
Drank its inspiring radiance, and the wind
Swept strongly from the shore, blackening the waves. 310

Following his eager soul, the wanderer
Leaped in the boat, he spread his cloak aloft
On the bare mast and took his lonely seat,
And felt the boat speed o'er the tranquil sea
Like a torn cloud before the hurricane. 315

As one that in a silver vision floats
Obedient to the sweep of odorous winds
Upon resplendent clouds, so rapidly
Along the dark and ruffled waters fled
The straining boat. A whirlwind swept it on 320
With fierce gusts and precipitating force
Through the white ridges of the chafed sea.

The waves arose; higher and higher still
Their fierce necks writhed beneath the tempest's scourge
Like serpents struggling in a vulture's grasp. 325

Calm and rejoicing in the fearful war
Of wave ruining⁶⁵ on wave, and blast on blast
Descending, and black flood on whirlpool driven
With dark obliterating course, he sat:

As if their genii were the ministers 330
Appointed to conduct him to the light

Of those beloved eyes, the poet sat
 Holding the steady helm. Evening came on,
 The beams of sunset hung their rainbow hues⁶⁶
 High mid the shifting domes of sheeted spray 335
 That canopied his path o'er the waste deep;
 Twilight, ascending slowly from the east,
 Entwined in dusker wreaths her braided locks
 O'er the fair front and radiant eyes of day;
 Night followed, clad with stars. On every side 340
 More horribly the multitudinous streams
 Of ocean's mountainous waste to mutual war
 Rushed in dark tumult thundering, as to mock
 The calm and spangled sky. The little boat
 Still fled before the storm, still fled like foam 345
 Down the steep cataract of a wintry river –
 Now pausing on the edge of the riven⁶⁷ wave,
 Now leaving far behind the bursting mass
 That fell, convulsing ocean; safely fled –
 As if that frail and wasted human form 350
 Had been an elemental god.⁶⁸

At midnight

The moon arose – and lo! the ethereal cliffs⁶⁹
 Of Caucasus,⁷⁰ whose icy summits shone
 Among the stars like sunlight, and around
 Whose caverned base the whirlpools and the waves, 355
 Bursting and eddying irresistibly,
 Rage and resound forever. Who shall save?
 The boat fled on, the boiling torrent drove,
 The crags closed round with black and jagged arms,
 The shattered mountain overhung the sea, 360
 And faster still, beyond all human speed,
 Suspended on the sweep of the smooth wave,
 The little boat was driven. A cavern there
 Yawned, and amid its slant and winding depths

Engulfed the rushing sea. The boat fled on 365
With unrelaxing speed. 'Vision and love!'
The poet cried aloud, 'I have beheld
The path of thy departure. Sleep and death
Shall not divide us long!'

The boat pursued
The windings of the cavern. Daylight shone 370
At length upon that gloomy river's flow;
Now, where the fiercest war among the waves
Is calm, on the unfathomable stream
The boat moved slowly. Where the mountain, riven,
Exposed those black depths to the azure sky, 375
Ere yet the flood's enormous volume fell
Even to the base of Caucasus, with sound
That shook the everlasting rocks, the mass
Filled with one whirlpool all that ample chasm;
Stair above stair the eddying waters rose, 71 380
Circling immeasurably fast, and laved
With alternating dash the gnarled roots
Of mighty trees that stretched their giant arms
In darkness over it. In the midst was left,
Reflecting yet distorting every cloud, 385
A pool of treacherous and tremendous calm.
Seized by the sway of the ascending stream,
With dizzy swiftness, round and round and round,
Ridge after ridge the straining boat arose,
Till on the verge of the extremest curve, 390
Where, through an opening of the rocky bank,
The waters overflow, and a smooth spot
Of glassy quiet mid those battling tides
Is left, the boat paused shuddering. Shall it sink
Down the abyss? Shall the reverting stress 395
Of that resistless gulf embosom it?
Now shall it fall? A wandering stream of wind,
Breathed from the west, has caught the expanded sail,

And lo! with gentle motion, between banks
Of mossy slope, and on a placid stream, 400
Beneath a woven grove it sails – and hark!
The ghastly torrent mingles its far roar
With the breeze murmuring in the musical woods.
Where the embowering trees recede, and leave
A little space of green expanse, the cove 405
Is closed by meeting banks, whose yellow flowers⁷²
Forever gaze on their own drooping eyes,
Reflected in the crystal calm. The wave
Of the boat's motion marred their pensive task
Which nought but vagrant bird, or wanton wind, 410
Or falling spear-grass, or their own decay
Had e'er disturbed before. The poet longed
To deck with their bright hues his withered hair,
But on his heart its solitude returned
And he forbore. Not the strong impulse hid 415
In those flushed cheeks, bent eyes, and shadowy frame
Had yet performed its ministry;⁷³ it hung
Upon his life, as lightning in a cloud
Gleams, hovering ere it vanish, ere the floods
Of night close over it.

The noonday sun 420
Now shone upon the forest, one vast mass
Of mingling shade whose brown⁷⁴ magnificence
A narrow vale embosoms; there huge caves,
Scooped in the dark base of their airy⁷⁵ rocks,
Mocking its moans,⁷⁶ respond and roar forever. 425
The meeting boughs and implicated⁷⁷ leaves
Wove twilight o'er the poet's path as, led
By love, or dream, or god, or mightier death,
He sought in nature's dearest haunt some bank,
Her cradle,⁷⁸ and his sepulchre. More dark 430

And dark the shades accumulate. The oak,
Expanding its immense and knotty arms,
Embraces the light beech. The pyramids
Of the tall cedar overarching, frame
Most solemn domes within, and far below, 435
Like clouds suspended in an emerald sky,
The ash and the acacia floating hang
Tremulous and pale. Like restless serpents clothed
In rainbow and in fire, the parasites,⁷⁹
Starred with ten thousand blossoms, flow around 440
The grey trunks, and, as gamesome⁸⁰ infants' eyes
With gentle meanings and most innocent wiles
Fold their beams round the hearts of those that love,
These twine their tendrils with the wedded boughs
Uniting their close union; the woven leaves 445
Make network of the dark blue light of day⁸¹
And the night's noontide clearness, mutable
As shapes in the weird clouds. Soft mossy lawns⁸²
Beneath these canopies extend their swells,
Fragrant with perfumed herbs, and eyed with blooms 450
Minute yet beautiful. One darkest glen
Sends from its woods of musk-rose, twined with jasmine,
A soul-dissolving odour, to invite
To some more lovely mystery. Through the dell,
Silence and Twilight here, twin-sisters, keep 455
Their noonday watch, and sail among the shades
Like vaporous shapes half-seen; beyond, a well,
Dark, gleaming, and of most translucent wave,
Images⁸³ all the woven boughs above,
And each depending⁸⁴ leaf, and every speck 460
Of azure sky, darting between their chasms;
Nor aught else in the liquid mirror laves
Its portraiture,⁸⁵ but some inconstant star

Between one foliated lattice⁸⁶ twinkling fair,
Or painted bird, sleeping beneath the moon, 465
Or gorgeous insect floating motionless,
Unconscious of the day ere yet his wings
Have spread their glories to the gaze of noon.⁸⁷
Hither the poet came. His eyes beheld
Their own wan light through the reflected lines 470
Of his thin hair, distinct in the dark depth
Of that still fountain; as the human heart,
Gazing in dreams over the gloomy grave,
Sees its own treacherous likeness there.⁸⁸ He heard
The motion of the leaves, the grass that sprung 475
Startled and glanced and trembled even to feel
An unaccustomed presence, and the sound
Of the sweet brook that from the secret springs
Of the dark fountain rose. A spirit⁸⁹ seemed 480
To stand beside him, clothed in no bright robes
Of shadowy silver or enshrining light
Borrowed from aught the visible world affords
Of grace, or majesty, or mystery –
But, undulating woods and silent well,
And leaping rivulet and evening gloom 485
Now deepening the dark shades, for speech assuming⁹⁰
Held commune with him, as if he and it
Were all that was – only, when his regard
Was raised by intense pensiveness, two eyes,
Two starry eyes, hung in the gloom of thought 490
And seemed with their serene and azure smiles
To beckon him.

Obedient to the light
That shone within his soul, he went pursuing
The windings of the dell. The rivulet
Wanton and wild, through many a green ravine 495
Beneath the forest flowed. Sometimes it fell

Among the moss with hollow harmony
Dark and profound; now on the polished stones
It danced, like childhood laughing as it went;
Then through the plain in tranquil wanderings crept, 500
Reflecting every herb and drooping bud
That overhung its quietness. 'Oh stream!
Whose source is inaccessibly profound,
Whither do thy mysterious waters tend?
Thou imagest my life: thy darksome stillness, 505
Thy dazzling waves, thy loud and hollow gulfs,
Thy searchless fountain⁹¹ and invisible course
Have each their type⁹² in me. And the wide sky
And measureless ocean may declare as soon
What oozy⁹³ cavern or what wandering cloud 510
Contains thy waters, as the universe
Tell where these living thoughts reside, when stretched
Upon thy flowers my bloodless limbs shall waste
I' the passing wind!'

Beside the grassy shore
Of the small stream he went; he did impress 515
On the green moss his tremulous step that caught
Strong shuddering from his burning limbs. As one
Roused by some joyous madness from the couch
Of fever, he did move, yet not like him
Forgetful of the grave,⁹⁴ where, when the flame 520
Of his frail exultation shall be spent,
He must descend. With rapid steps he went
Beneath the shade of trees, beside the flow
Of the wild babbling rivulet – and now
The forest's solemn canopies were changed 525
For the uniform and lightsome⁹⁵ evening sky.
Grey rocks did peep from the spare moss, and stemmed
The struggling brook; tall spires of windlestrae⁹⁶

Threw their thin shadows down the rugged slope,
And nought but gnarled roots of ancient pines 530
Branchless and blasted, clenched with grasping roots
The unwilling soil. A gradual change was here,
Yet ghastly. For, as fast years flow away,
The smooth brow gathers, and the hair grows thin
And white, and where irradiate⁹⁷ dewy eyes 535
Had shone, gleam stony orbs: so from his steps
Bright flowers departed, and the beautiful shade
Of the green groves, with all their odorous winds
And musical motions. Calm, he still pursued
The stream, that with a larger volume⁹⁸ now 540
Rolled through the labyrinthine dell; and there
Fretted⁹⁹ a path through its descending curves
With its wintry speed. On every side now rose
Rocks which, in unimaginable forms,
Lifted their black and barren pinnacles 545
In the light of evening, and, its precipice
Obscuring, the ravine disclosed above,
Mid toppling stones, black gulfs and yawning caves,
Whose windings gave ten thousand various tongues
To the loud stream. Lo! where the pass expands 550
Its stony jaws, the abrupt mountain breaks
And seems, with its accumulated crags,
To overhang the world – for wide expand,
Beneath the wan stars and descending moon,
Islanded seas, blue mountains, mighty streams, 555
Dim tracts and vast, robed in the lustrous gloom
Of leaden-coloured¹⁰⁰ even, and fiery hills
Mingling their flames with twilight, on the verge
Of the remote horizon. The near scene,
In naked and severe simplicity, 560
Made contrast with the universe. A pine,
Rock-rooted, stretched athwart the vacancy

Its swinging boughs, to each inconstant blast
Yielding one only response, at each pause
In most familiar cadence, with the howl, 565
The thunder and the hiss of homeless streams
Mingling its solemn song, whilst the broad river,
Foaming and hurrying o'er its rugged path,
Fell into that immeasurable void,
Scattering its waters to the passing winds. 570

Yet the grey precipice and solemn pine
And torrent were not all; one silent nook
Was there. Even on the edge of that vast mountain,
Upheld by knotty roots and fallen rocks,
It overlooked in its serenity 575
The dark earth and the bending vault of stars.
It was a tranquil spot that seemed to smile
Even in the lap of horror. Ivy clasped
The fissured stones with its entwining arms,
And did embower with leaves forever green, 580
And berries dark, the smooth and even space
Of its inviolated floor; and here

The children of the autumnal whirlwind¹⁰¹ bore,
In wanton sport, those bright leaves whose decay,
Red, yellow, or ethereally pale, 585
Rivals the pride of summer. 'Tis the haunt
Of every gentle wind whose breath can teach
The wilds to love tranquillity. One step,¹⁰²
One human step alone, has ever broken
The stillness of its solitude; one voice 590
Alone¹⁰³ inspired its echoes – even that voice
Which hither came floating among the winds,
And led the loveliest among human forms¹⁰⁴
To make their¹⁰⁵ wild haunts the depository
Of all the grace and beauty that ended¹⁰⁶ 595
Its motions, render up its majesty,

Scatter its music on the unfeeling storm,
And to the damp leaves and blue cavern mould,
Nurses of rainbow flowers and branching moss,
Commit¹⁰⁷ the colours of that varying cheek, 600
That snowy breast, those dark and drooping eyes.

The dim and horned moon hung low, and poured
A sea of lustre on the horizon's verge
That overflowed its mountains. Yellow mist
Filled the unbounded atmosphere, and drank 605
Wan moonlight even to fullness: not a star
Shone, not a sound was heard; the very winds,
Danger's grim playmates, on that precipice
Slept, clasped in his embrace. Oh storm of Death,
Whose sightless speed divides this sullen night, 610

And thou, colossal skeleton,¹⁰⁸ that, still
Guiding its irresistible career
In thy devastating omnipotence,
Art king of this frail world – from the red field
Of slaughter, from the reeking hospital, 615
The patriot's sacred couch, the snowy bed
Of innocence, the scaffold and the throne,
A mighty voice invokes thee: Ruin calls
His brother Death. A rare and regal prey¹⁰⁹
He hath prepared, prowling around the world – 620
Glutted with which thou mayst repose, and men
Go to their graves like flowers or creeping worms,
Nor ever more offer at thy dark shrine
The unheeded tribute of a broken heart.

When on the threshold of the green recess 625
The wanderer's footsteps fell, he knew that death
Was on him. Yet a little, ere it fled,
Did he resign his high and holy soul
To images of the majestic past
That paused within his passive¹¹⁰ being now, 630

Like winds that bear sweet music when they breathe
Through some dim latticed chamber. He did place
His pale lean hand upon the rugged trunk
Of the old pine; upon an ivied stone
Reclined his languid head; his limbs did rest, 635
Diffused and motionless, on the smooth brink
Of that obscurest chasm – and thus he lay,
Surrendering to their final impulses
The hovering powers of life. Hope and despair,
The torturers, slept; 111 no mortal pain or fear 640
Marred his repose, the influxes of sense 112
And his own being unalloyed by pain,
Yet feebler and more feeble, calmly fed
The stream of thought, till he lay breathing there
At peace, and faintly smiling. His last sight 645
Was the great moon, which o'er the western line
Of the wide world her mighty horn suspended,
With those dun beams inwoven darkness seemed
To mingle. Now upon the jagged hills
It rests, and still as 113 the divided frame 650
Of the vast meteor 114 sunk, the poet's blood,
That ever beat in mystic sympathy
With nature's ebb and flow, grew feebler still;
And when two lessening points of light 115 alone
Gleamed through the darkness, the alternate gasp 655
Of his faint respiration scarce did stir
The stagnate 116 night – till the minutest ray
Was quenched, the pulse yet lingered in his heart.
It paused, it fluttered. But when heaven remained
Utterly black, the murky shades involved 660
An image, silent, cold, and motionless,
As their own voiceless earth and vacant air.
Even as a vapour 117 fed with golden beams

That ministered on sunlight ere the west
 Eclipses it, was now that wondrous frame – 665
 No sense, no motion, 118 no divinity –
 A fragile lute 119 on whose harmonious strings
 The breath of heaven did wander, a bright stream
 Once fed with many-voiced 120 waves, a dream
 Of youth, which night and time have quenched for ever – 670
 Still, dark, and dry, and unremembered now.
 Oh for Medea's wondrous alchemy,
 Which wheresoe'er it fell made the earth gleam
 With bright flowers, and the wintry boughs exhale
 From vernal blooms fresh fragrance! 121 Oh that God, 675
 Profuse 122 of poisons, would concede the chalice
 Which but one living man 123 has drained – who now,
 Vessel of deathless wrath, a slave that feels
 No proud exemption in the blighting curse
 He bears, over the world wanders for ever, 680
 Lone as incarnate death! Oh that the dream
 Of dark magician 124 in his visioned cave,
 Raking the cinders of a crucible
 For life and power, even when his feeble hand
 Shakes in its last decay, were the true law 685
 Of this so lovely world! But thou art fled
 Like some frail exhalation which the dawn
 Robes in its golden beams – ah, thou hast fled! –
 The brave, the gentle, and the beautiful,
 The child of grace and genius. Heartless things 690
 Are done and said i' the world, and many worms
 And beasts and men live on, and mighty earth
 From sea and mountain, city and wilderness,
 In vesper low or joyous orison, 125
 Lifts still its solemn voice – but thou art fled; 695
 Thou canst no longer know or love the shapes

Of this phantasmal scene,¹²⁶ who have to thee
 Been purest ministers – who are, alas,
 Now thou art not! Upon those pallid lips,
 So sweet even in their silence, on those eyes 700
 That image sleep in death, upon that form
 Yet safe from the worm’s outrage, let no tear
 Be shed, not even in thought; nor – when those hues
 Are gone, and those divinest lineaments
 Worn by the senseless¹²⁷ wind – shall live alone 705
 In the frail pauses of this simple strain.
 Let not high verse, mourning the memory
 Of that which is no more, or painting’s woe
 Or sculpture, speak in feeble imagery
 Their own cold powers. Art and eloquence 710
 And all the shows o’ the world are frail and vain
 To weep a loss that turns their lights to shade.
 It is a woe too ‘deep for tears’,¹²⁸ when all
 Is reft at once, when some surpassing spirit,
 Whose light adorned the world around it, leaves 715
 Those who remain behind not sobs or groans,
 The passionate tumult of a clinging hope,
 But pale despair and cold tranquillity,
 Nature’s vast frame, the web of human things,
 Birth and the grave, that are not as they were.¹²⁹ 720

Alastor; or, The Spirit of Solitude

¹ For introductory remarks on this poem see p. 1073. Thomas Love Peacock recalled, in his Memoirs of Shelley: ‘I proposed that [title] which he adopted: Alastor; or, the Spirit of Solitude. The Greek word Ἀλαφστωρ is an evil genius, Ἄ κακοδαιμόνων...The poem treated the spirit of solitude as a spirit of evil. I mention the true meaning of the word because many have supposed Alastor to be the name of the hero of the poem.’

2 a youth not named in the poem, though obviously a version of Shelley himself.

3 requisitions claims.

4 a prototype of his conception an ideal embodiment of his imaginings. The essay 'On Love' refers to 'the ideal prototype of everything excellent or lovely that we are capable of conceiving as belonging to the nature of man'; see p. 1108. See also Shelley's letter to John Gisborne, 18 June 1822: 'I think one is always in love with something or other; the error (and I confess it is not easy for spirits cased in flesh and blood to avoid it) consists in seeking in a mortal image the likeness of what is perhaps eternal' (Jones ii 434). For more on ideal prototypes, see 'On Love', pp. 1108–9.

5 All else completely different.

6 Shelley quoted these lines from Wordsworth, The Excursion i 500–2, but they had originally been composed as Ruined Cottage 96–8 (p. 433).

7 'I was not yet in love, and I loved to be in love, I sought what I might love, in love with loving'; St Augustine, Confessions III i.

8 our great mother Cybele, goddess of the powers of nature.

9 natural piety Wordsworth, 'The Rainbow' 8–9: 'And I could wish my days to be / Bound each to each by natural piety.'

10 sere dry, withered.

11 consciously i.e. conscious of his culpability. Shelley used to go shooting, but became a vegetarian at the age of 19.

12 Mother of this unfathomable world Nature, as well as Necessity; compare Queen Mab vi 198: 'Necessity! Thou mother of the world!'

13 charnels graveyards.

14 obstinate questionings an allusion to Wordsworth, 'Ode' 144–5: 'those obstinate questionings / Of sense and outward things.'

15 I have made...what we are Thomas Jefferson Hogg recalled that Shelley had, as a boy, frequented graveyards in the hope of meeting ghosts.

16 alchemist Alchemists sought to turn base metals to gold – an impossibility.

17 awful talk awe-inspired discussion.

18 a long-forgotten lyre an Aeolian harp; with lines 42–9 compare Coleridge, 'Eolian Harp' 36–40.

19 fane temple.

20 cypress symbol of death and mourning.

21 lorn lonesome.

22 By solemn vision...nurtured Shelley catches the tone of Wordsworth's account of the Wanderer's natural education in The Excursion, originally composed as The Pedlar in 1798 (see pp. 444–53).

23 ambient surrounding.

24 divine philosophy cf. Milton, Comus 475: 'How charming is divine philosophy!'

25 alienated home Like Victor Frankenstein, the poet alienates his family. Shelley's relationship with his own father became strained during his undergraduate years and ended with a complete break in January 1812.

26 bitumen lakes lakes of mineral pitch, used in ancient times as mortar. Cf. the ‘lakes of bitumen’ in Byron’s Manfred I i 90.

27 Frequent crowded.

28 chrysolite olivine, a silicate of magnesia and iron found in lava. Its colour varies from pale yellowish-green (the precious stone) to dark bottle-green.

29 his bloodless food Shelley was a vegetarian; see his ‘Essay on the Vegetable System of Diet’.

30 The poet’s journey takes him back through human history to the birth of time (l. 128).

31 Tyre, and Balbec ancient cities in the present-day Lebanon.

32 Jerusalem was destroyed by the Emperor Titus in 70 CE; in 1867 it had a population of only 16,000.

33 The ancient city of Babylon, home of the hanging gardens (one of the seven wonders of the ancient world), was in modern Iraq, south of Baghdad.

34 Memphis and Thebes The youth goes up the Nile; these are ancient Egyptian cities.

35 demons spirits, genii.

36 The Zodiac’s brazen mystery The Zodiac in the temple of Denderah, Upper Egypt, was renowned; mythological figures were arranged around the ceiling of its portico. The Zodiac was taken to Paris in 1822 and is now in the Bibliothèque Nationale de France.

37 on his vacant mind / Flashed as in Wordsworth’s Daffodils 15–16: ‘They flash upon that inward eye / Which is the bliss of solitude.’

38 through Arabie...Kashmir the poet's journey takes him through Arabia, Persia (modern Iran), through the Kerman desert in eastern Persia, over the Hindu Kush mountains (the 'Indian Caucasus'), and into Kashmir in northwest India.

39 he stretched...limbs a recollection of Gray, Elegy 103–4: 'His listless length at noontide would he stretch / And pore upon the brook that babbles by.'

40 'His mind ... thirsts for intercourse with an intelligence similar to itself. He images to himself the being whom he loves', pp. 1081–2 above; see also 'On Love', pp. 1108–9 below.

41 long for a long time.

42 numbers a song, with the accompaniment of a lute.

43 pathos emotion.

44 Strange symphony There is possibly an echo here of Coleridge's Kubla Khan 42–3: 'Could I revive within me / Her symphony and song.'

45 Involved wrapped around.

46 garish glaring.

47 the bounds i.e. between illusion and reality, in trying to pursue the dream-image into the real world. As Peter Butter suggests, there is a divergence here from the essay 'On Love' (pp. 1108–9). There, the desire for love draws us to nature; here, the natural world appears vacant and dead to the poet, whose love is narcissistic, directed to an ideal conceived within his own mind.

48 pendent overhanging.

49 loathliest obnoxious.

50 Does the bright arch...delightful realms? i.e. can it be that nature in all its beauty leads to nothing, while death, in all its horror, leads to the paradise revealed to the poet in sleep? The question is not answered.

51 despair i.e. of ever being united with the ideal he has been allowed to see.

52 conference communion; part of his inner being was at repose.

53 precipitates hurries.

54 shadow memory.

55 vast Aornos seen from Petra's steep The poet returns from India, where the great rock Aornos stands by the Indus. There is no place called Petra in this area.

56 The ancient city of Balkh was in modern-day Afghanistan. He is travelling through the area southeast of the Caspian Sea, where the Parthian kingdom used to be.

57 Sered thinned, faded.

58 would interpret half the woe i.e. they would guess that he was in love, but not that he was in love with an ideal.

59 Chorasmian shore eastern shore of the Caspian Sea.

60 a swan sacred to Apollo, god of poetry; it sang before dying.

61 kept concealed, kept to itself.

62 lure temptation.

63 For sleep...charms The poet has not seen his vision in sleep; perhaps he will not see her in death.

64*shallop* small open boat.

65*ruining* tumbling.

66*hung their rainbow hues* i.e. made rainbows in the spray.

67*riven* split, torn asunder.

68*an elemental god* a god of the elements.

69*the ethereal cliffs* the cliffs reach into the ether.

70The boat has crossed the Caspian Sea to the mountains of the Caucasus, now in Georgia and Russia, on the western shore. Prometheus was nailed to the Caucasus by Jupiter.

71*Stair above stair the eddying waters rose* As it spins, the whirlpool lifts the boat up at its outer edge higher and higher ('stair above stair').

72*yellow flowers* Narcissus was a beautiful youth who mistook his own image, reflected in the water, for a nymph. He fell in love with it, committed suicide, and was changed into the flower today named after him.

73*performed its ministry* an allusion to Coleridge, Frost at Midnight 1: 'The frost performs its secret ministry.'

74*brown* dark.

75*airy* lofty, high.

76*Mocking its moans* echoing the moans of the wind in the forest.

77*implicated* intertwining.

78*Her cradle* The poet travels back to the source of life.

79*parasites* climbing plants.

80*gamesome* playful.

81*Make network of the dark blue light of day* Daylight is seen as if through netted threads.

82*lawns* grassy clearings.

83*Images* reflects.

84*depending* hanging.

85*laves / Its portraiture* There is nothing else reflected in the well.

86*one foliated lattice* a mass of interlaced leaves.

87*Or gorgeous insect...noon* The butterfly is unaware that outside the forest it is noon.

88*Gazing in dreams...there* i.e. imagines its continued but uncertain (treacherous) life after death.

89*A spirit* probably nature.

90*for speech assuming* Nature used woods, well, rivulet and gloom as a means of communication.

91*searchless fountain* undiscoverable source.

92*type* i.e. corresponding idealized version.

93*oozy* damp.

94*Forgetful of the grave* It is the fever-stricken man who, in his delirium, forgets the grave; the poet is all too mindful of death.

95 lightsome illuminated.

96 windlestrae dry stalks left by dead or dying plants.

97 irradiate shining.

98 volume of water.

99 Fretted wore, ground.

100 leaden-coloured dark grey.

101 The children of the autumnal whirlwind i.e. gusts of wind.

102 One step i.e. that of the poet.

103 one voice / Alone i.e. that of the vision.

104 the loveliest among human forms the poet.

105 their i.e. the winds’.

106 endued invested.

107 Commit entrust.

108 colossal skeleton Death.

109 A rare and regal prey i.e. the world’s rulers, who will glut Death, so that their victims may die according to their worth. It is worth remembering that this poem was written just after Napoleon’s defeat at Waterloo.

110 passive an important detail; compare ‘Mont Blanc’ 37–8.

111 Hope and despair...slept cf. Percy’s journal entry for 28 July 1814: ‘I hope – but my hopes are not unmixed with fear for what will befall this inestimable spirit when we appear to die' (Shelley Journals i 7).

112 the influxes of sense his perceptions.

113 still as i.e. as still as.

114 meteor at this period, a reference to any atmospheric occurrence.

115 two lessening points of light tips of the setting moon's crescent.

116 stagnate stagnant.

117 vapour cloud.

118 No sense, no motion echoes Wordsworth, 'A Slumber did my Spirit Seal' 5: 'No motion has she now, no force.'

119 A fragile lute Once again, Shelley has in mind an Aeolian harp.

120 many-voiced Compare 'Mont Blanc' 13.

121 Oh for...fragrance Medea, an enchantress in Greek mythology, brewed a potion to restore youth to Aeson, the father of her lover Jason; when spilt on the ground it had the effects described here.

122 Profuse productive.

123 one living man Ahasuerus, the wandering Jew, doomed to eternal life.

124 dark magician the alchemist who, besides seeking to turn base metals into gold, seeks the elixir of eternal life.

125 vesper...orison evensong ... prayer – uttered, figuratively, by the earth.

126 this phantasmal scene i.e. the transcendent, visionary world.

127 senseless unfeeling.

128 It is a woe too 'deep for tears' Wordsworth, 'Ode' 206: 'Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears.'

129 that are not as they were cf. Wordsworth, 'Ode' 6: 'It is not now as it has been of yore.'

Journal-Letter from to Thomas Love Peacock, 22 July to 2 August 1816 (extract)¹

22 July 1816. From Servox, three leagues remain to Chamounix. Mont Blanc was before us. The Alps with their innumerable glaciers on high, all around, closing in the complicated windings of the single vale; forests inexpressibly beautiful, but majestic in their beauty; interwoven beech and pine and oak overshadowed our road or receded whilst lawns of such verdure as I had never seen before occupied these openings, and, extending gradually, becoming darker into their recesses.

Mont Blanc was before us but was covered with cloud, and its base furrowed with dreadful gaps was seen alone. Pinnacles of snow, intolerably bright, part of the chain connected with Mont Blanc, shone though the clouds at intervals on high. I never knew I never imagined what mountains were before. The immensity of these aerial² summits excited, when they suddenly burst upon the sight, a sentiment of ecstatic wonder not unallied to madness. And remember this was all one scene. It all pressed home to our regard and to our imagination. Though it embraced a great number of miles, the snowy pyramids which shot into the bright blue sky seemed to overhang our path; the ravine, clothed with gigantic pines and black with its depth below (so deep that the very roaring of the untameable Arve which rolled through it could not be heard above), was close to our very footsteps. All was as much our own as if we had been the creators of such impressions in the minds of others, as now occupied our own. Nature was the poet whose harmony held our spirits more breathless than that of the divinest.

25 July 1816. We have returned from visiting this glacier – a scene, in truth, of dizzying wonder. The path that winds to it along the side of a mountain, now clothed with pines, now intersected with snowy hollows, is wide and steep. The cabin of Montanvert is three leagues from Chamounix, half of which distance is performed on mules – not so sure-footed but that, on the first day, the one which I rode fell in what the guides call a ‘mauvais pas’, so that I narrowly escaped being precipitated down the mountain. The guide continually held that which Mary rode.

We passed over a hollow covered with snow down which vast stones, detached from the rock above, are accustomed to roll. One had fallen the preceding day, a little time after we had returned. The guides desired us to pass quickly, for it is said that sometimes the least sound will accelerate their fall. We arrived at Montanvert, however, safe.

Journal-Letter from Percy Bysshe Shelley to Thomas Love Peacock

1 This important letter describes Shelley’s initial response to the landscape which later provided an important setting for Mont Blanc and Frankenstein. He had set off, with Mary Godwin and Claire Clairmont, on a tour of the vale of Chamounix, on 21 July; they would return to Maison Chappuis a week later.

2 aerial lofty.

We walked to some distance upon its surface. The waves are elevated about 12 or 15 feet from the surface of the mass, which is intersected with long gaps of unfathomable depth, the ice of whose sides is more beautifully azure than the sky. In these regions, everything changes and is in motion. This vast mass of ice has one general progress which ceases neither day nor night. It breaks and rises forever; its undulations sink whilst others rise. From the precipices which surround it, the echo of rocks which fall from their aerial summits, or of the ice and snow, scarcely ceases for one moment. One would think that Mont Blanc was a living being, and that the frozen blood forever circulated slowly through his stony veins.

Hymn to Intellectual Beauty (composed between 22 June and 29 August 1816; edited from printed text corrected by Shelley)¹

From The Examiner (19 January 1817)

The awful² shadow of some unseen Power
Floats though unseen amongst us, visiting
This various world with as inconstant wing³
As summer winds that creep from flower to flower;
Like moonbeams that behind some piny mountain shower,⁴ 5
It visits with inconstant glance
Each human heart and countenance;
Like hues and harmonies of evening,
Like clouds in starlight widely spread,
Like memory of music fled, 10
Like aught that for its grace may be
Dear, and yet dearer for its mystery.

Spirit of Beauty, that doth consecrate
With thine own hues all thou dost shine upon
Of human thought or form – where art thou gone? 15
Why dost thou pass away and leave our state,

This dim vast vale of tears, vacant and desolate?
Ask why the sunlight not forever
Weaves rainbows o'er yon mountain river,
Why aught should fail and fade that once is shown, 20
Why fear and dream, and death and birth
Cast on the daylight of this earth
Such gloom, why man has such a scope
For love and hate, despondency and hope?

No voice from some sublimer world hath ever 25
To sage or poet these responses given;
Therefore the name of God, and ghosts, and heaven⁵
Remain the records of their vain endeavour,
Frail spells, whose uttered charm might not avail to sever,
From all we hear and all we see, 30
Doubt, chance, and mutability.
Thy light alone, like mist o'er mountains driven,
Or music by the night wind sent
Through strings of some still instrument,⁶
Or moonlight on a midnight stream, 35
Gives grace and truth to life's unquiet dream.

Love, hope, and self-esteem, like clouds depart
And come, for some uncertain moments lent.
Man were immortal and omnipotent,
Didst thou,⁷ unknown and awful as thou art, 40
Keep with thy glorious train firm state within his heart.
Thou messenger of sympathies
That wax and wane in lovers' eyes;
Thou that to human thought art nourishment,
Like darkness to a dying flame!⁸ 45

Depart not as thy shadow came,
Depart not lest the grave should be,
Like life and fear, a dark reality.

While yet a boy I sought for ghosts, and sped
Through many a listening chamber, cave and ruin 50
And starlight wood, with fearful steps pursuing
Hopes of high talk with the departed dead.⁹
I called on poisonous names¹⁰ with which our youth is fed –
I was not heard, I saw them not
When musing deeply on the lot 55
Of life, at that sweet time when winds are wooing
All vital things that wake to bring
News of buds and blossoming.
Sudden thy shadow fell on me –
I shrieked, and clasped my hands in ecstasy! 60

I vowed that I would dedicate my powers
To thee and thine; have I not kept the vow?
With beating heart and streaming eyes, even now
I call the phantoms of a thousand hours
Each from his voiceless grave: they have in visioned bowers 65
Of studious zeal or love's delight
Outwatched with me the envious night;
They know that never joy illumed my brow
Unlinked with hope that thou wouldst free
This world from its dark slavery, 70
That thou, oh awful loveliness,
Wouldst give whate'er these words cannot express.

The day becomes more solemn and serene
When noon is past; there is a harmony
In autumn, and a lustre in its sky, 75
Which through the summer is not heard or seen,
As if it could not be, as if it had not been!
Thus let thy power, which like the truth
Of nature on my passive youth
Descended, ¹¹ to my onward life supply 80
Its calm – to one who worships thee,
And every form containing thee,
Whom, spirit fair, thy spells did bind
To fear ¹² himself, and love all humankind.

Hymn to Intellectual Beauty

¹This poem should be read in the light of Wordsworth's 'Ode' (p. 549), by which it was inspired, which is also about the 'inconstancy' of the kind of intense vision that Shelley celebrates.

²*awful* awesome.

³*with as inconstant wing* Shelley's point is that the 'awful Power' is not always perceptible.

⁴*some piny mountain shower* 'shower' is a verb. This poem was composed during Shelley's residence on the banks of Lake Geneva.

⁵*Therefore the name of God, and ghosts, and heaven* The original Examiner printed text reads: 'Therefore the names of Demon, Ghost, and Heaven'.

⁶*some still instrument* an Aeolian harp.

⁷*Man were ... Didst thou* man would be ... if thou didst ...

8 nourishment, / Like darkness to a dying flame Strong light was believed to stifle candlelight; conversely, darkness would feed it.

9 As a boy, Shelley did go to cemeteries and woods at night, in the hope of meeting ghosts.

10 poisonous names presumably those of God and Christ. In earlier years Shelley did try prayer.

11 the truth / Of nature...Descended The passivity of the mind is equivalent to the psychological relaxation mentioned by De Quincey in his discussion of Wordsworth's 'There was a boy' (pp. 848–50). Shelley discusses it in his 'Essay on Christianity', written between 1813 and 1819: 'All that it [i.e. human life] contains of pure or of divine visits the passive mind in some serenest mood' (Shelley's Prose 205).

12 fear revere.

Mont Blanc. Lines written in the Vale of Chamouni (composed between 22 July and 29 August 1816)¹

From History of a Six Weeks' Tour through a Part of France, Switzerland, Germany and Holland by Percy Bysshe and Mary Shelley (1817)

I

The everlasting universe of things
Flows through the mind, and rolls its rapid waves,
Now dark, now glittering, now reflecting gloom,
Now lending splendour, where from secret springs

The source of human thought its tribute² brings 5
Of waters, with a sound but half its own,³
Such as a feeble brook will oft assume
In the wild woods, among the mountains lone,
Where waterfalls around it leap forever,
Where woods and winds contend, and a vast river 10
Over its rocks ceaselessly bursts and raves.

II

Thus thou, ravine of Arve – dark, deep ravine –
Thou many-coloured, many-voicéd vale,
Over whose pines, and crags, and caverns sail
Fast cloud-shadows and sunbeams: awful⁴ scene, 15
Where Power in likeness of the Arve comes down
From the ice gulfs that gird his secret throne,
Bursting through these dark mountains like the flame
Of lightning through the tempest; thou dost lie,
Thy giant brood of pines around thee clinging, 20
Children of elder time, in whose devotion
The chainless winds still come and ever came
To drink their odours, and their mighty swinging
To hear – an old and solemn harmony;
Thine earthly rainbows stretched across the sweep 25
Of the ethereal waterfall, whose veil
Robes some unsculptured image; the strange sleep
Which, when the voices of the desert fail,
Wraps all in its own deep eternity;
Thy caverns echoing to the Arve's commotion – 30
A loud, lone sound no other sound can tame;
Thou art pervaded with that ceaseless motion,
Thou art the path of that unresting sound,
Dizzy ravine! – and when I gaze on thee
I seem as in a trance sublime and strange 35
To muse on my own separate fantasy,

My own, my human mind, which passively
Now renders and receives fast influencings,
Holding an unremitting interchange⁵
With the clear universe of things around; 40
One legion of wild thoughts, whose wandering wings
Now float above thy darkness, and now rest
Where that⁶ or thou⁷ art no unbidden guest,
In the still cave of the witch Poesy,
Seeking among the shadows that pass by, 45
Ghosts of all things that are, some shade of thee,
Some phantom, some faint image; till the breast
From which they⁸ fled recalls them, thou art there!

III

Some say that gleams of a remoter world
Visit the soul in sleep, that death is slumber, 50
And that its shapes the busy thoughts outnumber
Of those who wake and live. I look on high;
Has some unknown omnipotence unfurled⁹
The veil of life and death? Or do I lie
In dream, and does the mightier world of sleep 55
Spread far around and inaccessibly
Its circles? For the very spirit fails,
Driven like a homeless cloud from steep to steep
That vanishes among the viewless gales!
Far, far above, piercing the infinite sky, 60
Mont Blanc appears, still, snowy, and serene.
Its subject mountains their unearthly forms
Pile around it, ice and rock; broad vales between
Of frozen floods, unfathomable deeps
Blue as the overhanging heaven, that spread 65
And wind among the accumulated steeps;
A desert peopled by the storms alone,

Save when the eagle brings some hunter's bone,
And the wolf tracks her there. How hideously
Its shapes are heaped around! – rude, bare, and high, 70
Ghastly, and scarred, and riven. Is this the scene
Where the old earthquake-demon taught her young
Ruin? Were these their toys? Or did a sea
Of fire envelop once this silent snow?
None can reply – all seems eternal now. 75
The wilderness has a mysterious tongue
Which teaches awful doubt,¹⁰ or faith so mild,
So solemn, so serene, that man may be
But for such faith with nature reconciled.
Thou hast a voice, great mountain, to repeal 80
Large codes¹¹ of fraud and woe – not understood
By all, but which the wise, and great, and good
Interpret, or make felt, or deeply feel.

1V

The fields, the lakes, the forests, and the streams,
Ocean, and all the living things that dwell 85
Within the daedal¹² earth; lightning, and rain,
Earthquake, and fiery flood, and hurricane,
The torpor of the year¹³ when feeble dreams
Visit the hidden buds, or dreamless sleep
Holds every future leaf and flower; the bound 90
With which from that detested trance they leap;
The works and ways of man, their death and birth,
And that of him and all that his may be;
All things that move and breathe¹⁴ with toil and sound
Are born and die; revolve, subside and swell. 95
Power dwells apart in its tranquillity
Remote, serene, and inaccessible:¹⁵
And this, the naked countenance of earth

On which I gaze, even these primeval mountains
 Teach the adverting¹⁶ mind. The glaciers creep 100
 Like snakes that watch their prey, from their far fountains
 Slow rolling on; there, many a precipice,
 Frost and the sun in scorn of mortal power
 Have piled: dome, pyramid, and pinnacle,
 A city of death, distinct¹⁷ with many a tower 105
 And wall impregnable of beaming ice.
 Yet not a city, but a flood of ruin
 Is there, that from the boundaries of the sky
 Rolls its perpetual stream; vast pines are strewing
 Its destined path, or in the mangled soil 110
 Branchless and shattered stand; the rocks, drawn down
 From yon remotest waste, have overthrown
 The limits of the dead and living world,
 Never to be reclaimed. The dwelling-place
 Of insects, beasts, and birds, becomes its spoil; 115
 Their food and their retreat for ever gone,
 So much of life and joy is lost. The race
 Of man flies far in dread; his work and dwelling
 Vanish like smoke before the tempest's stream,
 And their place is not known. Below, vast caves 120
 Shine in the rushing torrents' restless gleam,
 Which from those secret chasms in tumult welling¹⁸
 Meet in the vale; and one majestic river,¹⁹
 The breath and blood of distant lands, forever
 Rolls its loud waters to the ocean waves, 125
 Breathes its swift vapours to the circling air.

V

Mont Blanc yet gleams on high: the Power is there,
 The still and solemn Power of many sights
 And many sounds, and much of life and death.

In the calm darkness of the moonless nights, 130
 In the lone glare of day, the snows descend
 Upon that mountain; none beholds them there,
 Nor when the flakes burn in the sinking sun,
 Or the starbeams dart through them; winds contend
 Silently there, and heap the snow with breath 135
 Rapid and strong, but silently! Its home
 The voiceless lightning in these solitudes
 Keeps innocently, and like vapour broods
 Over the snow. The secret strength of things
 Which governs thought, and to the infinite dome 140
 Of heaven is as a law, inhabits thee!
 And what were thou, and earth, and stars, and sea,
 If to the human mind's imaginings
 Silence and solitude were vacancy?²⁰

Mont Blanc. Lines written in the Vale of Chamouni

¹This is Shelley's exploration of the nature of imaginative thought, and its relation to the natural world; as such, it should be read in the light of Wordsworth's Tintern Abbey, to which it is a response (see p. 415). It has been seen as a defiant reaction to the religious certainties of Coleridge's Chamouny; the Hour Before Sunrise. A Hymn (p. 697), which Shelley may have read in The Friend (1809). Mary Shelley wrote that the poem 'was composed under the immediate impression of the deep and powerful feelings excited by the objects which it attempts to describe; and, as an undisciplined overflowing of the soul, rests its claim to approbation on an attempt to imitate the untamable wilderness and inaccessible solemnity from which those feelings sprang.'

²*tribute* tributary. In Shelley's metaphor the human mind is like a mountain spring feeding into a large river (the 'everlasting universe of things' – effectively, the perceived world).

3 with a sound but half its own cf. Tintern Abbey, in which Wordsworth refers to ‘what they [the senses] half-create / And what perceive’ (ll. 107–8).

4 awful awe-inspiring.

5 an unremitting interchange the ‘interchange’ takes place because the mind does not merely perceive; it works on its perceptions, transforming them imaginatively.

6 that the darkness of line 42.

7 thou the ravine.

8 they the ‘legion of wild thoughts’ (l. 41).

9 unfurled drawn aside.

10 awful doubt awe-inspired scepticism – effectively Shelley’s own position.

11 codes laws.

12 daedal varied, richly adorned.

13 The torpor of the year i.e. winter.

14 All things that move and breathe an echo of Wordsworth’s pantheist statement of faith (much admired by Shelley) in Tintern Abbey 101–3:

A motion and a spirit that impels

All thinking things, all objects of all thought,

And rolls through all things.

15 inaccessible At 4,810 metres, Mont Blanc is the highest mountain in Europe; it had been climbed only three times by 1816.

16 adverting heedful, observant, thoughtful.

17 distinct adorned.

18 Which from those secret chasms in tumult welling an echo of Coleridge's recently published Kubla Khan 17: 'And from this chasm, with ceaseless turmoil seething.' Shelley had seen Byron's copy of the printed text, brought from England in April 1816.

19 one majestic river The Rhône, fed by Lake Geneva, into which flows the Arve.

20 Shelley's concluding expression of doubt stands in stark contrast to the certainty of Coleridge's Chamouny; the Hour Before Sunrise. A Hymn (see p. 697).

Ozymandias (composed 26–28 December 1817)¹

From The Examiner (11 January 1818)

I met a traveller from an antique land
Who said, 'Two vast and trunkless legs of stone
Stand in the desert. Near them, on the sand
Half-sunk, a shattered visage lies, whose frown
And wrinkled lip, and sneer of cold command, 5
Tell that its sculptor well those passions read
Which yet survive, stamped on these lifeless things,
The hand that mocked them, and the heart that fed;
And on the pedestal these words appear:
'My name is Ozymandias, King of Kings, 10

Look on my works, ye mighty, and despair!”
Nothing beside remains. Round the decay
Of that colossal wreck, boundless and bare,
The lone and level sands stretch far away.’

Ozymandias

¹ Horace Smith (1779–1849), a banker and writer of light verse, met Shelley in London in December 1816. Shelley and Smith visited the British Museum together, and their admiration of the newly acquired statue of Rameses II (thirteenth century BCE, also known as Ozymandias) in 1817 prompted Smith to propose a sonnet competition on the subject. Smith’s sonnet was published on 1 February 1818 in The Examiner, and reads as follows:

In Egypt’s sandy silence, all alone,
Stands a gigantic leg, which far off throws
The only shadow that the desert knows.
‘I am great Ozymandias’, saith the stone,
‘The King of Kings; this mighty city shows
The wonders of my hand.’ The city’s gone;
Nought but the leg remaining to disclose
The site of this forgotten Babylon.
We wonder, and some hunter may express
Wonder like ours, when through the wilderness
Where London stood, holding the wolf in chase,
He meets some fragment huge, and stops to guess
What powerful but unrecorded race
Once dwelt in that annihilated place.

On Love (composed probably 20–25 July 1818; edited from MS)¹

What is love? Ask him who lives, what is life; ask him who adores, what is God.

I know not the internal constitution of other men, or even of thine whom I now address. I see that in some external attributes they resemble me, but, when misled by that appearance I have thought to appeal to something in common and unburden my inmost soul to them, I have found my language misunderstood like one in a distant and savage land. The more opportunities they have afforded me for experience, the wider has appeared the interval between us, and to a greater distance have the points of sympathy been withdrawn. With a spirit ill-fitted to sustain such proof,² trembling and feeble through its tenderness, I have everywhere sought, and have found only repulse and disappointment.

Thou demandest what is love. It is that powerful attraction towards all that we conceive, or fear, or hope beyond ourselves, when we find within our own thoughts the chasm of an insufficient void, and seek to awaken in all things that are, a community with what we experience within ourselves. If we reason, we would be understood; if we imagine, we would that the airy children of our brain were born anew within another's; if we feel, we would that another's nerves should vibrate to our own, that the beams of their eyes should kindle at once and mix and melt into our own, that lips of motionless ice should not reply to lips quivering and burning with the heart's best blood. This is love. This is the bond and the sanction which connects not only man with man, but with everything which exists. We are born into the world and there is something within us which, from the instant that we live and move, thirsts after its likeness; it is probably in correspondence with this law that the infant drains milk from the bosom of its mother. This propensity develops itself with the development of our nature.

We see dimly³ within our intellectual nature a miniature, as it were, of our entire self, yet deprived of all that we condemn or despise: the ideal prototype of everything excellent or lovely that we are capable of conceiving as belonging to the nature of man – not only the portrait of our external being, but an assemblage of the minutest particulars of which our nature is composed; a mirror whose surface reflects only the forms of purity and brightness; a soul within our soul that describes a circle around its proper Paradise which pain and sorrow and evil dare not overleap.⁴ To this we eagerly refer all sensations, thirsting that they should resemble or correspond with it.

The discovery of its antitype – the meeting with an understanding capable of clearly estimating the deductions of our own, an imagination which should enter into and seize upon the subtle and delicate peculiarities which we have delighted to cherish and unfold in secret, with a frame whose nerves, like the chords of two exquisite lyres strung to the accompaniment of one delightful voice, vibrate with the vibrations of our own, and of a combination of all these in such proportion as the type within demands: this is the invisible and unattainable point to which love tends, and to attain which it urges forth the powers of man to arrest the faintest shadow of that without the possession of which there is no rest or respite to the heart over which it rules.

Hence in solitude, or in that deserted state when we are surrounded by human beings and yet they sympathize not with us, we love the flowers, the grass, and the waters and the sky. In the motion of the very leaves of spring in the blue air there is then found a secret correspondence with our heart. There is eloquence in the tongueless wind and a melody in the flowing of brooks and the rustling of the reeds beside them, which by their inconceivable relation to something within the soul, awaken the spirits to a dance of breathless rapture, and bring tears of mysterious tenderness to the eyes like the enthusiasm of patriotic success or the voice of one beloved singing to you alone. Sterne says that if he were in a desert he would love some cypress⁵... So soon as this want or power is dead, man becomes the living sepulchre of himself, and what yet survives is the mere husk of what once he was.

On Love

¹ This essay, Reiman suggests, is ‘Shelley’s response to Plato’s Symposium and may possibly be the false start of an essay introductory to his translation’ (SC vi 639). Shelley translated the Symposium 7–20 July 1818.

2 proof trial.

3 ‘These words inefficient and metaphorical. Most words so. No help’ (Shelley’s note).

4 Paradise...overleap Shelley recalls Paradise Lost iv 181–2, where Satan ‘overleaped all bound / Of hill or highest wall’ in order to enter Eden.

5 ‘I declare, said I, clapping my hands cheerily together, that was I in a desert, I would find out wherewith in it to call forth my affections. If I could not do better, I would fasten them upon some sweet myrtle, or seek some melancholy cypress to connect myself to’ (Sterne, A Sentimental Journey ed. Gardner D. Stout, Jr (Berkeley, 1967), pp. 115–16).

Lines written among the Euganean Hills, October 1818 1

From Rosalind and Helen (1819)

Many a green isle² needs must be
In the deep wide sea of misery,
Or the mariner, worn and wan,
Never thus could voyage on
Day and night, and night and day, 5
Drifting on his dreary way,
With the solid darkness black
Closing round his vessel’s track;
Whilst above, the sunless sky,
Big with clouds, hangs heavily, 10
And behind the tempest fleet
Hurries on with lightning feet,

Riving³ sail and cord and plank
Till the ship has almost drank
Death from the o'er-brimming deep, 15
And sinks down, down, like that sleep
When the dreamer seems to be

Weltering⁴ through eternity;
And the dim low line before
Of a dark and distant shore 20
Still recedes, as ever still
Longing with divided will,
But no power to seek or shun,
He is ever drifted on
O'er the unreposing wave 25
To the haven of the grave.

What if there no friends will greet?⁵
What if there no heart will meet
His with love's impatient beat?
Wander wheresoe'er he may, 30
Can he dream before that day
To find refuge from distress
In friendship's smile, in love's caress?

Then 'twill wreak⁶ him little woe
Whether such there be or no: 35

Senseless⁷ is the breast, and cold,
Which relenting love would fold;
Bloodless are the veins and chill
Which the pulse of pain did fill;
Every little living nerve 40
That from bitter words did swerve
Round the tortured lips and brow,
Are like sapless leaflets now
Frozen upon December's bough.

On the beach of a northern sea⁸ 45
Which tempests shake eternally,
As once the wretch there lay to sleep,
Lies a solitary heap:
One white skull and seven dry bones,
On the margin of the stones 50
Where a few grey rushes stand,
Boundaries of the sea and land.
Nor is heard one voice of wail
But the sea-mews,⁹ as they sail
O'er the billows of the gale; 55
Or the whirlwind up and down
Howling like a slaughtered town,
When a king in glory rides
Through the pomp of fratricides.¹⁰
Those unburied bones around 60
There is many a mournful sound;
There is no lament for him
Like a sunless vapour, dim,
Who once clothed with life and thought
What now moves nor murmurs not. 65

Aye, many flowering islands lie
In the waters of wide agony;
To such a one this morn was led
My bark, by soft winds piloted.
Mid the mountains Euganean¹¹ 70
I stood listening to the paean
With which the legioned rooks¹² did hail
The sun's uprising majestical;
Gathering round with wings all hoar,
Through the dewy mist they soar 75
Like grey shades, till th' eastern heaven
Bursts,¹³ and then, as clouds of even¹⁴

Flecked with fire and azure lie
 In the unfathomable sky,
 So their plumes of purple grain,¹⁵ 80
 Starred with drops of golden rain,
 Gleam above the sunlight woods,
 As in silent multitudes
 On the morning's fitful gale
 Through the broken mist they sail, 85
 And the vapours cloven and gleaming
 Follow down the dark steep streaming,
 Till all is bright and clear and still
 Round the solitary hill.

 Beneath is spread like a green sea 90
 The waveless plain of Lombardy,¹⁶
 Bounded by the vaporous air,
 Islanded by cities fair;
 Underneath day's azure eyes
 Ocean's nursling, Venice,¹⁷ lies, 95
 A peopled labyrinth of walls,
 Amphitrite's¹⁸ destined halls
 Which her hoary sire now paves
 With his blue and beaming waves.
 Lo! the sun upsprings behind,¹⁹ 100
 Broad, red, radiant, half-reclined
 On the level quivering line
 Of the waters crystalline;
 And before that chasm of light,
 As within a furnace bright, 105
 Column, tower, and dome, and spire,
 Shine like obelisks of fire,
 Pointing with inconstant motion
 From the altar of dark ocean
 To the sapphire-tinted skies; 110
 As the flames of sacrifice

From the marble shrines did rise,
As to pierce the dome of gold²⁰
Where Apollo spoke of old.

Sun-girt city, thou hast been 115
Ocean's child, and then his queen;

Now is come a darker day,²¹
And thou soon must be his prey,
If the power that raised thee here
Hallow so thy watery bier. 120

A less drear ruin than than now,
With thy conquest-branded brow
Stooping to the slave of slaves
From thy throne, among the waves
Wilt thou be, when the sea-mew 125
Flies, as once before it flew,

O'er thine isles depopulate,²²
And all is in its ancient state,
Save where many a palace gate
With green sea-flowers overgrown 130
Like a rock of ocean's own,
Topples o'er the abandoned sea
As the tides change sullenly.

The fisher on his watery way,
Wandering at the close of day, 135
Will spread his sail and seize his oar
Till he pass the gloomy shore,
Lest thy dead should, from their sleep

Bursting o'er the starlight²³ deep,
Lead a rapid masque²⁴ of death 140
O'er the waters of his path.

Those who alone thy towers behold
Quivering through aerial gold,
As I now behold them here,

Would imagine not they were 145
Sepulchres where human forms,
Like pollution-nourished worms,
To the corpse of greatness cling,
Murdered and now mouldering;²⁵
But if Freedom should awake 150
In her omnipotence, and shake
From the Celtic Anarch's²⁶ hold
All the keys of dungeons²⁷ cold,
Where a hundred cities lie
Chained like thee, ingloriously, 155
Thou and all thy sister band
Might adorn this sunny land,
Twining memories of old time
With new virtues more sublime:
If not, perish thou and they! – 160
Clouds which stain truth's rising day
By her sun consumed away,
Earth can spare ye, while like flowers
In the waste of years and hours,
From your dust new nations spring 165
With more kindly blossoming.

Perish! let there only be
Floating o'er thy hearthless sea,
As the garment of thy sky
Clothes the world immortally, 170
One remembrance more sublime
Than the tattered pall of time,
Which scarce hides thy visage wan –
That a tempest-cleaving swan²⁸
Of the songs of Albion,²⁹ 175
Driven from his ancestral streams
By the might of evil dreams,³⁰

Found a nest in thee; and Ocean
 Welcomed him with such emotion
 That its joy grew his,³¹ and sprung 180
 From his lips³² like music flung
 O'er a mighty thunder-fit,
 Chastening terror. What though yet
 Poesy's unfailing river,
 Which through Albion winds forever, 185
 Lashing with melodious wave
 Many a sacred poet's grave,
 Mourn its latest nursling fled?
 What though thou with all thy dead
 Scarce can for this fame repay 190
 Aught thine own?³³ Oh rather say,
 Though³⁴ thy sins and slaveries foul
 Overcloud a sunlike soul?
 As the ghost of Homer clings
 Round Scamander's³⁵ wasting springs; 195
 As divinest Shakespeare's might
 Fills Avon and the world with light,
 Like omniscient power which he
 Imaged mid mortality;
 As the love from Petrarch's urn 200
 Yet amid yon hills doth burn,³⁶
 A quenchless lamp by which the heart
 Sees things unearthly – so thou art,
 Mighty spirit;³⁷ so shall be
 The city that did refuge thee. 205

 Lo, the sun floats up the sky
 Like thought-winged liberty,
 Till the universal light
 Seems to level plain and height;
 From the sea a mist has spread, 210

And the beams of morn lie dead
On the towers of Venice now,
Like its glory long ago.
By the skirts of that grey cloud
Many-domed Padua³⁸ proud 215
Stands, a peopled solitude
Mid the harvest-shining plain,
Where the peasant heaps his grain
In the garner of his foe,³⁹
And the milk-white oxen slow 220
With the purple vintage strain,
Heaped upon the creaking wain,
That the brutal Celt⁴⁰ may swill
Drunken sleep with savage will;
And the sickle to the sword 225
Lies unchanged, though many a lord,
Like a weed whose shade is poison,
Overgrows this region's foison,⁴¹
Sheaves of whom are ripe to come
To destruction's harvest home: 230
Men must reap the things they sow,
Force from force must ever flow
Or worse – but 'tis a bitter woe
That love or reason cannot change
The despot's rage, the slave's revenge. 235

Padua, thou within whose walls
Those mute guests at festivals,
Son and mother, Death and Sin,
Played at dice for Ezzelin,⁴²
Till Death cried, 'I win, I win!' 240
And Sin cursed to lose the wager,
But Death promised, to assuage her,
That he would petition for
Her to be made Vice-Emperor,

When the destined years were o'er, 245
Over all between the Po
And the eastern Alpine snow,
Under the mighty Austrian.
Sin smiled so as Sin only can,
And since that time, aye, long before, 250
Both have ruled from shore to shore –
That incestuous pair who follow
Tyrants as the sun the swallow,
As repentance follows crime,
And as changes follow time. 255

In thine halls the lamp of learning,
Padua, now no more is burning;⁴³
Like a meteor, whose wild way
Is lost over the grave of day,
It gleams betrayed and to betray. 260
Once remotest nations came
To adore that sacred flame,
When it lit not many a hearth
On this cold and gloomy earth;
Now new fires from antique light 265
Spring beneath the wide world's might,
But their spark lies dead in thee,
Trampled out by tyranny.
As the Norway woodman quells,
In the depth of piny dells,⁴⁴ 270
One light flame among the brakes,⁴⁵
While the boundless forest shakes,
And its mighty trunks are torn
By the fire thus lowly born;
The spark beneath his feet is dead, 275
He starts to see the flames it fed
Howling through the darkened sky
With a myriad tongues victoriously,

And sinks down in fear: so thou,
Oh tyranny, beholdest now 280
Light around thee, and thou hearest
The loud flames ascend, and fearest –
Grovel on the earth! Aye, hide
In the dust thy purple⁴⁶ pride!

Noon descends around me now; 285
'Tis the noon of autumn's glow
When a soft and purple mist,
Like a vaporous amethyst,
Or an air-dissolved star⁴⁷
Mingling light and fragrance, far 290
From the curved horizon's bound
To the point of heaven's profound,
Fills the overflowing sky;
And the plains that silent lie
Underneath, the leaves unsodden 295
Where the infant frost has trodden
With his morning-winged feet,
Whose bright print is gleaming yet;
And the red and golden vines,
Piercing with their trellised lines 300
The rough, dark-skirted wilderness;
The dun and bladed grass no less,
Pointing from this hoary tower⁴⁸
In the windless air; the flower
Glimmering at my feet; the line 305
Of the olive-sandalled Apennine⁴⁹
In the south dimly islanded;
And the Alps, whose snows are spread
High between the clouds and sun;
And of living things each one; 310
And my spirit which so long
Darkened this swift stream of song –

Interpenetrated lie
By the glory of the sky:
Be it love, light, harmony, 315
Odour, or the soul of all
Which from heaven like dew doth fall,
Or the mind which feeds this verse
Peopling the lone universe.

Noon descends, and after noon 320
Autumn's evening meets me soon,
Leading the infantine moon
And that one star, 50 which to her
Almost seems to minister
Half the crimson light she brings 325
From the sunset's radiant springs;
And the soft dreams of the morn
(Which like winged winds had borne
To that silent isle, which lies
Mid remembered agonies, 330
The frail bark of this lone being)
Pass, to other sufferers fleeing,
And its ancient pilot, Pain,
Sits beside the helm again.

Other flowering isles must be 335
In the sea of life and agony;
Other spirits float and flee
O'er that gulf – even now, perhaps,
On some rock the wild wave wraps,
With folding wings they waiting sit 340
For my bark, to pilot it
To some calm and blooming cove,
Where for me and those I love,
May a windless bower be built
Far from passion, pain, and guilt, 51 345
In a dell mid lawny hills

Which the wild sea-murmur fills,
 And soft sunshine, and the sound
 Of old forests echoing round,
 And the light and smell divine 350
 Of all flowers that breathe and shine.
 We may live so happy there
 That the spirits of the air,
 Envyng us, may even entice
 To our healing paradise 355
 The polluting multitude;
 But their rage would be subdued
 By that clime divine and calm,
 And the winds whose wings rain balm
 On the uplifted soul, and leaves 360
 Under which the bright sea heaves;
 While each breathless interval
 In their whisperings musical
 The inspired soul supplies
 With its own deep melodies, 365
 And the love which heals all strife
 Circling like the breath of life,
 All things in that sweet abode
 With its own mild brotherhood:
 They, not it, would change, and soon 370
 Every sprite beneath the moon
 Would repent its envy vain,
 And the earth grow young again.

Lines written among the Euganean Hills

¹This meditative poem was written at a difficult moment in Shelley's life. His baby daughter Clara had died at Venice in late September (barely a year old), and on their return to Byron's villa at Este, I Capuccini, a deep gloom had pervaded the household. Clara's death depressed Mary, and Percy found himself in bad health. He sent this poem with a number of others to his publisher, prefacing them with this: 'I do not know which of the few scattered poems I left in England will be selected by my bookseller, to add to this collection. One, which I sent from Italy, was written after a day's excursion among those lovely mountains which surround what was once the retreat, and where is now the sepulchre, of Petrarch. If anyone is inclined to condemn the insertion of the introductory lines, which image forth the sudden relief of a state of deep despondency by the radiant visions disclosed by the sudden burst of an Italian sunrise in autumn on the highest peak of those delightful mountains, I can only offer as my excuse, that they were not erased at the request of a dear friend, with whom added years of intercourse only add to my apprehension of its value, and who would have had more right than anyone to complain, that she has not been able to extinguish in me the very power of delineating sadness.' The 'dear friend' is Mary Shelley.

2*a green isle* the Euganean hills stand in the midst of a plain to the west of Padua.

3*Riving* tearing.

4*Weltering* tumbling.

5*What if there no friends will greet?* In Greek myth, friends were supposed to be reunited after death in the Elysian fields, where they would revel for eternity.

6*wreak* give.

7*Senseless* i.e. unperceiving (because dead).

8Shelley's daughter Clara was buried on the Lido, by the northern Adriatic.

9*sea-mews* seagulls.

10 a slaughtered town...fratricides a reference to the mass slaughter of the Danish King Christian II after he entered Stockholm, 1520.

11 Euganean stressed on the third syllable, like ‘Caribbean’.

12 rooks Shelley may be referring to jackdaws, as there are no rooks in Italy. He may be thinking favourably of them because Coleridge had done so in This Lime-Tree Bower My Prison (p. 637).

13 Bursts i.e. into light – the sun rises in the east.

14 even i.e. night.

15 their plumes of purple grain their feathers were dyed purple by the light of the rising sun.

16 Beneath...Lombardy in a letter to Peacock of 8 October 1818 Shelley described the view from his villa in the Euganean Hills: ‘We see before us the wide flat plains of Lombardy, in which we see the sun and moon rise and set, and the evening star, and all the golden magnificence of autumnal clouds’ (Jones ii 43).

17 Shelley was at Venice for a few days at the end of September 1818.

18 Amphitrite was the daughter of Oceanus, god of the sea (her ‘sire’, line 98), and the wife of Poseidon. She will inherit the halls of Venice when they are swamped by the sea.

19 behind i.e. behind Venice.

20 dome of gold the Delphic oracle, through which Apollo (god of youth, poetry and music) was believed to speak.

21 Now is come a darker day Shelley’s sorrow for Venice was due partly to the fact that, by the terms of the Congress of Vienna, 1815, it had been handed over to Austria; as he told Peacock on 8 October 1818:

‘Venice, which was once a tyrant, is now the next worse thing – a slave’ (Jones ii 43).

22 depopulate laid waste.

23 starlight i.e. starlit (an adjective).

24 masque procession.

25 Shelley was shocked by the degraded state of Venice under Austrian occupation: ‘I had no conception of the excess to which avarice, cowardice, superstition, ignorance, passionless lust, and all the inexpressible brutalities which degrade human nature could be carried, until I had lived a few days among the Venetians’ (Jones ii 43).

26 Celtic Anarch Austrian tyrant, as at line 223.

27 dungeons On his visit to Venice in September 1818 Shelley visited the dungeons in the Doges’ palace ‘where the prisoners were confined sometimes half up to their middles in stinking water’ (Jones ii 43).

28 a tempest-cleaving swan Byron, then living at the Palazzo Mocenigo, Venice, where Shelley had met him the previous month.

29 Albion England.

30 Driven...dreams Byron was in self-exile, having been driven out of England by his wife’s campaign against him after their separation.

31 its joy grew his As Shelley reported to Peacock on 8 October 1818: ‘[Byron] is changed into the liveliest, and happiest looking man I ever met’ (Jones ii 42).

32 sprung / From his lips a reference to Don Juan Canto I, which Byron had read to Shelley in late September 1818.

33 What though...own Venice lacks a poet of its own as famous as Byron.

34 Though i.e. '[What] Though thy sins ...?'

35 Scamander, a river near Troy, site of the wars described by Homer in the Iliad, but now neglected by poets (and therefore wasted).

36 As the love...burn The house and grave of the great Italian poet Petrarch (1304–74) are at Arqua in the Euganean Hills.

37 Mighty spirit Byron.

38 Shelley was in Padua August 1818.

39 the garner of his foe the granary of the Austrians. Shelley told Peacock, 'The Austrians take sixty percent in taxes' (Jones ii 43).

40 Celt Austrian.

41 foison harvest.

42 Ezzelino da Romano (1194–1259), despot of Padua. Shelley is probably recalling Coleridge's Ancient Mariner, where Death and Life-in-Death cast dice for the mariner's soul.

43 In thine halls...burning Padua University is one of the oldest in Europe, as it was founded in the eleventh century.

44 piny dells dells of pine trees.

45 brakes ferns.

46 purple colour of imperial triumph.

47 an air-dissolved star the star's light is diffused by the atmosphere.

48 this hoary tower of the Benedictine monastery of the Olivetani on Monte Venda, the highest point in the Euganean Hills.

49 olive-sandalled Apennine olive trees grow in the Apennines.

50 that one star Hesper, the evening star.

51 guilt this poem is inspired partly by guilt at the death of Shelley's baby daughter, Clara, due in part to his negligence.

Stanzas written in Dejection, near Naples (composed December 1818)¹

From Posthumous Poems (1824)

The sun is warm, the sky is clear,
The waves are dancing fast and bright,
Blue isles and snowy mountains wear
The purple noon's transparent light:
The breath of the moist air is light 5
Around its unexpanded buds;
Like many a voice of one delight
The winds, the birds, the ocean floods,
The City's voice itself is soft like Solitude's.

I see the Deep's untrampled floor 10
With green and purple seaweeds strown;
I see the waves upon the shore,
Like light dissolved in star-showers, thrown:
I sit upon the sands alone,
The lightning of the noontide ocean 15
Is flashing round me, and a tone
Arises from its measured motion,
How sweet! did any heart now share in my emotion.

Alas! I have nor hope nor health,²
 Nor peace within nor calm around, 20
 Nor that content surpassing wealth
 The sage in meditation found,
 And walked with inward glory crowned –
 Nor fame, nor power, nor love, nor leisure.
 Others I see whom these surround – 25
 Smiling they live, and call life pleasure;
 To me that cup has been dealt in another measure.

Yet now despair itself is mild,
 Even as the winds and waters are;
 I could lie down like a tired child, 30
 And weep away the life of care
 Which I have borne and yet must bear,
 Till death like sleep might steal on me,
 And I might feel in the warm air
 My cheek grow cold, and hear the sea 35
 Breathe o'er my dying brain its last monotony.

 Some might lament that I were cold,
 As I when this sweet day is gone,
 Which my lost heart, too soon grown old,
 Insults with this untimely moan; 40
 They might lament – for I am one
 Whom men love not – and yet regret,
 Unlike this day, which, when the sun
 Shall on its stainless glory set,
 Will linger, though enjoyed, like joy in memory yet. 45

Stanzas written in Dejection

² health Mary Shelley recalled: ‘At this time Shelley suffered greatly in health. He put himself under the care of a medical man, who promised great things, and made him endure severe bodily pain, without any good results. Constant and poignant physical pain exhausted him; and though he preserved the appearance of cheerfulness, and often greatly enjoyed our wanderings in the environs of Naples, and our excursions on the sunny sea, yet many hours were passed when his thoughts, shadowed by illness, became gloomy, and then he escaped to solitude, and in verses, which he hid from fear of wounding me, poured forth morbid but too natural bursts of discontent and sadness.’

The Mask of Anarchy Written on the Occasion of the Massacre at Manchester (composed 5–23 September 1819; edited from MS; published 1832)¹

As I lay asleep in Italy²
There came a voice from over the Sea,
And with great power it forth led me
To walk in the visions of Poesy.

I met Murder on the way – 5
He had a mask like Castlereagh³ –
Very smooth he looked, yet grim;
Seven bloodhounds followed him.⁴

All were fat; and well they might
Be in admirable plight, 10
For one by one, and two by two,
He tossed them human hearts to chew,
Which from his wide cloak he drew.

Next came Fraud, and he had on,
Like Eldon,⁵ an ermined gown; 15
His big tears, for he wept well,
Turned to millstones as they fell.

And the little children, who
Round his feet played to and fro,
Thinking every tear a gem, 20
Had their brains knocked out by them.

Clothed with the Bible, as with light,
And the shadows of the night,
Like Sidmouth,⁶ next Hypocrisy
On a crocodile⁷ rode by. 25

And many more Destructions played
In this ghastly masquerade,
All disguised, even to the eyes,
Like Bishops, lawyers, peers, or spies.

Last came Anarchy:⁸ he rode 30
On a white horse, splashed with blood;
He was pale even to the lips,
Like Death in the Apocalypse.⁹

And he wore a kingly crown,
And in his grasp a sceptre shone; 35
On his brow this mark I saw –
'I am God, and King, and Law.'¹⁰

With a pace stately and fast,
Over English land he passed,
Trampling to a mire of blood 40
The adoring multitude.¹¹

And a mighty troop around,
With their trampling shook the ground,

Waving each a bloody sword,
For the service of their Lord.¹² 45

And with glorious triumph, they
Rode through England proud and gay,
Drunk as with intoxication
Of the wine of desolation.

O'er fields and towns, from sea to sea, 50
Passed the Pageant¹³ swift and free,
Tearing up, and trampling down,
Till they came to London town.

And each dweller, panic-stricken,
Felt his heart with terror sicken 55
Hearing the tempestuous cry
Of the triumph of Anarchy.

For with pomp to meet him came
Clothed in arms like blood and flame,
The hired murderers, who did sing 60
'Thou art God, and Law, and King.

We have waited, weak and lone,
For thy coming, Mighty One!
Our purses are empty, our swords are cold,
Give us glory, and blood, and gold.' 65

Lawyers and priests, a motley crowd,
To the earth their pale brows bowed;
Like a bad prayer, not overloud,
Whispering, 'Thou art Law and God.'

Then all cried with one accord, 70
'Thou art King, and God, and Lord;
Anarchy, to thee we bow,
By thy name made holy now!'

And Anarchy, the Skeleton,
Bowed and grinned to everyone, 75
As well as if his education
Had cost ten millions to the nation.

For he knew the Palaces
Of our Kings were rightly his;
His the sceptre, crown, and globe,¹⁴ 80
And the gold-inwoven robe.

So he sent his slaves before
To seize upon the Bank and Tower,¹⁵
And was proceeding with intent
To meet his pensioned Parliament;¹⁶ 85

When one fled past, a maniac maid,
And her name was Hope, she said;
But she looked more like Despair,
And she cried out in the air:

‘My father Time is weak and grey 90
With waiting for a better day;
See how idiot-like he stands,
Fumbling with his palsied hands!

He has had child after child
And the dust of death is piled 95
Over everyone but me –
Misery, oh, misery!’

Then she lay down in the street,
Right before the horses’ feet,
Expecting, with a patient eye, 100
Murder, Fraud and Anarchy.

When between her and her foes
A mist, a light, an image rose,

Small at first, and weak, and frail,
Like the vapour of a vale; 105

Till as clouds grow on the blast,
Like tower-crowned giants striding fast,
And glare with lightnings as they fly,
And speak in thunder to the sky,

It grew – a Shape arrayed in mail 110
Brighter than the viper's scale,
And upborne on wings whose grain¹⁷
Was as the light of sunny rain.

On its helm,¹⁸ seen far away,
A planet, like the morning's,¹⁹ lay; 115
And those plumes²⁰ its light rained through
Like a shower of crimson dew.

With step as soft as wind it passed
O'er the heads of men – so fast
That they knew the presence there, 120
And looked – and all was empty air.

As flowers beneath May's footstep waken,
As stars from night's loose hair are shaken,
As waves arise when loud winds call,
Thoughts sprung where'er that step did fall. 125

And the prostrate multitude
Looked – and ankle-deep in blood,
Hope, that maiden most serene,
Was walking with a quiet mien.

And Anarchy, the ghastly birth, 130
Lay dead earth upon the earth;
The Horse of Death, tameless as wind,
Fled, and with his hoofs did grind
To dust the murderers thronged behind.

A rushing light of clouds and splendour, 135
A sense awakening and yet tender,
Was heard and felt – and at its close
These words of joy and fear arose

(As if their own indignant Earth
Which gave the sons of England birth 140
Had felt their blood upon her brow,
And shuddering with a mother's throe

Had turned every drop of blood
By which her face had been bedewed
To an accent unwithstood; 145
As if her heart had cried aloud):

‘Men of England, heirs of Glory,
Heroes of unwritten story,
Nurslings of one mighty Mother,
Hopes of her, and one another, 150

Rise like lions after slumber
In unvanquishable number,
Shake your chains to Earth like dew
Which in sleep had fallen on you –
Ye are many; they are few. 155

What is Freedom? Ye can tell
That which slavery is, too well –
For its very name has grown
To an echo of your own.

’Tis to work and have such pay 160
As just keeps life from day to day
In your limbs, as in a cell
For the tyrants’ use to dwell.

So that ye for them are made
Loom, and plough, and sword, and spade, 165

With or without your own will bent
To their defence and nourishment.

'Tis to see your children weak
With their mothers pine and peak,²¹
When the winter winds are bleak – 170
They are dying whilst I speak.

'Tis to hunger for such diet
As the rich man in his riot²²
Casts to the fat dogs that lie
Surfeiting beneath his eye. 175

'Tis to let the Ghost of Gold²³
Take from toil a thousandfold –
More than ere its substance could
In the tyrannies of old.

Paper coin – that forgery 180
Of the title-deeds, which ye
Hold to something of the worth
Of the inheritance of Earth.

'Tis to be a slave in soul
And to hold no strong control 185
Over your own wills, but be
All that others make of ye.

And at length when ye complain
With a murmur weak and vain,
'Tis to see the Tyrant's crew 190
Ride over your wives and you –
Blood is on the grass like dew.

Then it is to feel revenge
Fiercely thirsting to exchange
Blood for blood and wrong for wrong – 195
Do not thus when ye are strong.

Birds find rest in narrow nest
When weary of their winged quest;
Beasts find fare in woody lair
When storm and snow are in the air. 200

Asses, swine, have litter spread
And with fitting food are fed;
All things have a home but one –
Thou, oh, Englishman, hast none!24

This is slavery – savage men 205
Or wild beasts within a den
Would endure not as ye do;
But such ills they never knew.

What art thou Freedom? Oh, could slaves
Answer from their living graves 210
This demand, tyrants would flee
Like a dream's dim imagery.

Thou art not, as impostors say,
A shadow soon to pass away,
A superstition, and a name 215
Echoing from the cave of Fame.25

For the labourer thou art bread,
And a comely table spread
From his daily labour come
To a neat and happy home. 220

Thou art clothes, and fire, and food
For the trampled multitude;
No – in countries that are free
Such starvation cannot be
As in England now we see. 225

To the rich thou art a check,
When his foot is on the neck

Of his victim, thou dost make
That he treads upon a snake.

Thou art Justice; ne'er for gold 230
May thy righteous laws be sold
As laws are in England – thou
Shieldst alike the high and low.

Thou art Wisdom – Freemen never
Dream that God will damn for ever 235
All who think those things untrue
Of which Priests make such ado.

Thou art Peace – never by thee
Would blood and treasure wasted be,
As tyrants wasted them, when all 240
Leagued to quench thy flame in Gaul.26

What if English toil and blood
Was poured forth, even as a flood?
It availed, oh Liberty!
To dim, but not extinguish thee. 245

Thou art Love – the rich27 have kissed
Thy feet, and like him following Christ,28
Give their substance to the free
And through the rough world follow thee;

Or turn their wealth to arms, and make 250
War for thy beloved sake
On wealth, and war, and fraud – whence they
Drew the power which is their prey.

Science,29 Poetry, and Thought
Are thy lamps; they make the lot 255
Of the dwellers in a cot30
So serene, they curse it not.

Spirit, Patience, Gentleness,
All that can adorn and bless
Art thou – let deeds, not words, express 260
Thine exceeding loveliness.

Let a great Assembly be
Of the fearless and the free
On some spot of English ground
Where the plains stretch wide around. 265

Let the blue sky overhead
The green earth on which ye tread,
All that must eternal be
Witness the solemnity.

From the corners uttermost 270
Of the bounds of English coast;
From every hut, village and town
Where those who live and suffer moan
For others' misery or their own;

From the workhouse and the prison 275
Where pale as corpses newly risen,
Women, children, young and old,
Groan for pain, and weep for cold;

From the haunts of daily life
Where is waged the daily strife 280
With common wants and common cares
Which sows the human heart with tares;31

Lastly from the palaces
Where the murmur of distress
Echoes, like the distant sound 285
Of a wind alive around,

Those prison halls of wealth and fashion,
Where some few feel such compassion

For those who groan, and toil, and wail
As must make their brethren pale – 290

Ye who suffer woes untold,
Or to feel, or³² to behold
Your lost country bought and sold
With a price of blood and gold –

Let a vast Assembly be, 295
And with great solemnity
Declare with measured words that ye
Are, as God has made ye, free.

Be your strong and simple words
Keen to wound as sharpened swords, 300
And wide as targes³³ let them be
With their shade to cover ye.

Let the tyrants pour around
With a quick and startling sound,
Like the loosening of a sea, 305
Troops of armed emblazonry.

Let the charged artillery drive
Till the dead air seems alive
With the clash of clanging wheels,
And the tramp of horses' heels. 310

Let the fixed bayonet
Gleam with sharp desire to wet
Its bright point in English blood,
Looking keen as one for food.

Let the horsemen's scimitars³⁴ 315
Wheel and flash, like sphereless stars
Thirsting to eclipse their burning
In a sea of death and mourning.

Stand ye calm and resolute,
Like a forest close and mute, 320
With folded arms and looks which are
Weapons of an unvanquished war;

And let Panic, who outspeeds
The career of armed steeds
Pass, a disregarded shade 325
Through your phalanx undismayed.

Let the laws of your own land,
Good or ill, between ye stand
Hand to hand, and foot to foot,
Arbiters of the dispute, 330

The old laws of England – they
Whose reverend heads with age are grey,
Children of a wiser day;
And whose solemn voice must be
Thine own echo – Liberty! 335

On those who first should violate
Such sacred heralds in their state,
Rest the blood that must ensue,
And it will not rest on you.

And if then the tyrants dare, 340
Let them ride among you there,
Slash, and stab, and maim, and hew –
What they like, that let them do.

With folded arms and steady eyes,
And little fear, and less surprise, 345
Look upon them as they slay,
Till their rage has died away.

Then they will return with shame
To the place from which they came,

And the blood thus shed will speak 350
In hot blushes on their cheek.

Every woman in the land
Will point at them as they stand –
They will hardly dare to greet
Their acquaintance in the Street. 355

And the bold, true warriors
Who have hugged Danger in wars
Will turn to those who would be free,
Ashamed of such base company.

And that slaughter to the nation 360
Shall steam up like inspiration,
Eloquent, oracular –
A volcano heard afar.³⁵

And these words shall then become
Like oppression's thundered doom 365
Ringing through each heart and brain,
Heard again – again – again.

Rise like lions after slumber
In unvanquishable number;
Shake your chains to earth like dew 370
Which in sleep had fallen on you –
Ye are many, they are few.'

The Mask of Anarchy

¹ On 16 August 1819, at St Peter's Field, on the outskirts of Manchester, a political meeting of 60,000 working men and women was dispersed by mounted dragoons, with a brutality that left eleven people dead and 421 cases of serious injury. The news reached Shelley within about a week, and he began meditating this poetic response to the event. See headnote, p. 1077.

² Shelley was in Livorno when he heard of the Peterloo Massacre, ‘and the torrent of my indignation has not yet done boiling in my veins’, as he told Charles Ollier on 5 September 1819 (Jones ii 117).

Figure 15 The Peterloo Massacre, by an unknown artist, published by Richard Carlile, 1 October 1819. On 16 August 1819, at St Peter’s Field, on the outskirts of Manchester, a peaceful public meeting was dispersed by armed dragoons with a brutality that left eleven people dead and 421 cases of serious injury. The news reached Shelley within about a week, and inspired ‘The Mask of Anarchy’. (Manchester Art Gallery, UK/The Bridgeman Art Library.)

4In 1815, Britain joined an alliance of seven other nations (Austria, France, Russia, Prussia, Portugal, Spain and Sweden) in an agreement to postpone final abolition of the slave trade.

5John Scott, Baron Eldon, Lord Chancellor, who, on 27 March 1817, was responsible for depriving Shelley of access to his children (Ianthe and Charles) by Harriet Westbrook. Shelley did not see Ianthe again, and Charles he never saw.

6Henry Addington (1757–1844), created Viscount Sidmouth in 1805, had been Prime Minister and Chancellor of the Exchequer, and was in 1819 Home Secretary. He applauded the Peterloo Massacre in the House of Commons, as reported by Hazlitt (Howe xx 142).

7*a crocodile* Crocodiles were believed to weep as they devoured their prey, and ‘crocodile tears’ remain a byword for hypocrisy.

8*Anarchy* For more on Anarchy see headnote, p. 1077. Shelley refers to the breakdown of order such as that which led to the Peterloo Massacre. He did not regard it as a good thing either for the government or for the victims.

9*He was pale...Apocalypse* Revelation 6:8: ‘And I looked, and behold a pale horse: and his name that sat on him was Death, and Hell followed with him.’

10 On his brow...Law a parody of the inscription borne by the messianic rider of Revelation: ‘And he hath on his vesture and on his thigh a name written, KING OF KINGS, AND LORD OF LORDS’ (Revelation 19:16).

11 The adoring multitude The people admire Anarchy. Shelley’s point is that to resort to violence is to justify the government’s equally violent means of suppression.

12 their Lord George III, the ‘old, mad, blind, despised, and dying king’ of England in 1819 (p. 1134), although the term could also apply to the Christian God of the Church of England, part of what Shelley regarded as the corrupt political system responsible for the Peterloo Massacre.

13 Pageant tableau, allegorical procession.

14 globe golden orb, symbol of kingly power.

15 the Bank and Tower strongholds of power: the Bank of England, in Threadneedle Street since 1734, and the Tower of London, the most perfect medieval fortress in Britain, on Tower Hill since around 1066. They had been the objects of an alleged plot in 1817, providing an excuse for the suspension of habeas corpus.

16 his pensioned Parliament The politicians are in the pay of Anarchy, because his violent means enable them to retain power.

17 grain colour.

18 helm helmet.

19 A planet, like the morning’s i.e. a star, like Venus (the morning star).

20 plumes feathers in the helmet.

21 pine and peak grow thin and emaciated; cf. Macbeth I iii 23.

22 riot extravagance.

23 the Ghost of Gold paper money, which Shelley regarded as a trick to inflate the currency and depress the cost of labour.

24 Asses, swine...hast none a reworking of Christ’s words: ‘The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head’ (Matthew 8:20).

25 Fame rumour, gossip.

26 Gaul Revolutionary France. England formed an alliance with Prussia and Austria in 1793, against France, following the execution of Louis XVI.

27 the rich i.e. those dedicated to liberty, such as Shelley.

28 like him following Christ Shelley appears to have in mind the three disciples of Christ described at Luke 9:57–62.

29 Science knowledge.

30 cot cottage.

31 tares weeds – i.e. anxieties.

32 Or...or either ... or.

33 targes shields.

34 the horsemen's scimitars Most of the wounded at Peterloo suffered sabre cuts.

35 And that slaughter...afar This image of revolution is comparable to the image of 'a volcano's meteor-breathing chasm, / Whence the oracular vapour is hurled up' (Prometheus Unbound II iii 3–4).

Ode to the West Wind (composed c.25 October 1819)¹

From Prometheus Unbound (1820)²

Oh wild west wind, thou breath of autumn's being;
Thou from whose unseen presence the leaves dead
Are driven, like ghosts from an enchanter fleeing,

Yellow, and black, and pale, and hectic³ red,
Pestilence-stricken multitudes; oh thou 5
Who chariotest to their dark wintry bed

The winged seeds, where they lie cold and low,
Each like a corpse within its grave, until
Thine azure sister of the spring shall blow

Her clarion⁴ o'er the dreaming earth, and fill 10
(Driving sweet buds like flocks to feed in air)
With living hues and odours plain and hill –

Wild spirit, which art moving everywhere,
Destroyer and preserver, hear, oh hear!

11

Thou on whose stream, mid the steep sky's commotion, 15
Loose clouds like earth's decaying leaves are shed,
Shook from the tangled boughs of heaven and ocean,

Angels⁵ of rain and lightning; there are spread
On the blue surface of thine airy surge,
Like the bright hair uplifted from the head 20

Of some fierce maenad,⁶ even from the dim verge
Of the horizon to the zenith's height,

The locks of the approaching storm. Thou dirge⁷

Of the dying year, to which this closing night
Will be the dome of a vast sepulchre, 25
Vaulted with all thy congregated might

Of vapours, from whose solid atmosphere
Black rain, and fire, and hail will burst⁸ – oh hear!

III

Thou who didst waken from his summer dreams
The blue Mediterranean, where he lay, 30
Lulled by the coil of his crystalline streams,

Beside a pumice isle in Baiae's bay,
And saw in sleep old palaces and towers
Quivering within the wave's intenser day,⁹

All overgrown with azure moss and flowers 35
So sweet, the sense faints picturing them! Thou
For whose path the Atlantic's level powers

Cleave themselves into chasms, while far below
The sea-blooms and the oozy woods which wear
The sapless foliage of the ocean, know 40

Thy voice, and suddenly grow grey with fear,
And tremble and despoil themselves¹⁰ – oh hear!

IV

If I were a dead leaf thou mightest bear;
If I were a swift cloud to fly with thee;
A wave to pant beneath thy power, and share 45

The impulse of thy strength, only less free
Than thou, oh uncontrollable! If even
I were as in my boyhood, and could be

The comrade of thy wanderings over heaven,
As then, when to outstrip thy skyey speed 50
Scarce seemed a vision; I would ne'er have striven

As thus with thee in prayer in my sore need.
Oh lift me as a wave, a leaf, a cloud!
I fall upon the thorns of life! I bleed!

A heavy weight of hours has chained and bowed 55
One too like thee¹¹ – tameless, and swift, and proud.

V

Make me thy lyre, even as the forest is:
What if my leaves are falling like its own?¹²
The tumult of thy mighty harmonies

Will take from both a deep autumnal tone, 60
Sweet though in sadness. Be thou, spirit fierce,
My spirit! Be thou me, impetuous one!

Drive my dead thoughts over the universe
Like withered leaves to quicken a new birth!
And, by the incantation of this verse, 65

Scatter, as from an unextinguished hearth
Ashes and sparks, my words among mankind!

Be through my lips to unawakened earth

The trumpet of a prophecy! Oh wind,
If winter comes, can spring be far behind? 70

Ode to the West Wind

¹‘This poem was conceived and chiefly written in a wood that skirts the Arno, near Florence, and on a day when that tempestuous wind, whose temperature is at once mild and animating, was collecting the vapours which pour down the autumnal rains. They began, as I foresaw, at sunset, with a violent tempest of hail and rain, attended by that magnificent thunder and lightning peculiar to the Cisalpine regions’ (Shelley’s note). This is Shelley’s most powerful account of the poet’s function, in the light of the Peterloo Massacre; see headnote, p. 1077.

²In addition to Prometheus Unbound, Shelley’s 1820 volume contained a number of shorter works composed in Italy.

³*hectic* Shelley is thinking of the ‘hectic’ flush of a fever.

⁴*clarion* war-trumpet.

⁵*Angels* messengers.

⁶*maenad* Bacchante, an inspired votary of Bacchus, god of wine.

⁷*dirge* lament for the dead.

⁸*Black rain, and fire, and hail will burst* millennial weather conditions, but also those which prevailed on the day this poem was conceived; see p. 1131 n. 1, above.

⁹*Beside a pumice isle...day* In a letter to Peacock of 17 or 18 December 1818, Shelley described ‘passing the Bay of Baiae and observing the ruins of its antique grandeur standing like rocks in the transparent sea

under our boat' (Jones ii 61). In Roman times Baiae was the resort of emperors and the rich.

¹⁰ 'The phenomenon alluded to at the conclusion of the third stanza is well known to naturalists. The vegetation at the bottom of the sea, of rivers, and of lakes, sympathizes with that of the land in the change of seasons, and is consequently influenced by the winds which announce it' (Shelley's note).

¹¹ One too like thee i.e. the poet.

¹² What if my leaves are falling like its own? Shelley was only 27, but he had just noticed that he had some premature strands of grey hair.

England in 1819 (composed by 23 December 1819; published 1839; edited from MS)¹

An old, mad, blind, despised, and dying king;²
Princes,³ the dregs of their dull race, who flow
Through public scorn – mud from a muddy spring;
Rulers who neither see, nor feel, nor know,
But leech-like to their fainting country cling, 5
Till they drop, blind in blood, without a blow.
A people starved and stabbed in th' untilled field;⁴
An army, which liberticide⁵ and prey
Makes as a two-edged sword to all who wield;⁶
Golden and sanguine⁷ laws which tempt and slay; 10
Religion Christless, Godless – a book sealed;
A senate, time's worst statute, unrepealed⁸ –
Are graves from which a glorious phantom may
Burst, to illumine our tempestuous day.

England in 1819

¹ Shelley sent this sonnet to Leigh Hunt for The Examiner on 23 December 1819. By now, he was becoming resigned to the fact that no one wanted to publish his poems. He sounds almost impatient in the letter to Hunt: ‘What a state England is in! But you will never write politics. I don’t wonder; but I wish then that you would write a paper in the Examiner on the actual state of the country, and what, under all the circumstances of the conflicting passions and interests of men, we are to expect’ (Jones ii 166).

² George III, on the throne since 1760, was old and ill, and had been insane for years. He died on 29 January 1820.

³ Princes George III’s sons were prodigal, profligate and unstable to the point of madness.

⁴ A people...field a reference to the Peterloo Massacre, 16 August 1819 (see p. 1077).

⁵ liberticide the killing of liberty.

⁶ Makes...wield the soldiers destroy their own freedom as they cut down the crowd.

⁷ Golden and sanguine gold and blood are associated with tyranny.

⁸ An early, deleted version of this line in MS reads: ‘A cloak of lies worn on Power’s holiday.’ The ‘senate’, or Houses of Parliament, was woefully unrepresentative in Shelley’s day.

‘Lift not the painted veil’ (composed 1819;¹ first published 1824; edited from MS)

Lift not the painted veil which those who live
Call Life; though unreal shapes be pictured there
And it but mimic all we would believe
With colours idly spread – behind lurk Fear
And Hope, twin destinies, who ever weave 5
Their shadows o’er the chasm, sightless and drear.²
I knew one who had lifted it. He sought,
For his lost heart was tender, things to love
But found them not, alas; nor was there aught
The world contains, the which he could approve. 10
Through the unheeding many³ he did move,
A splendour among shadows, a bright blot
Upon this gloomy scene, a Spirit that strove
For truth, and like the Preacher,⁴ found it not.

Lift not the painted veil

¹ The dating of this sonnet is disputed; Mary Shelley placed it in 1818. Its mood of isolation and dejection may be due in part to an attack on Shelley in the Quarterly Review, news of which reached him in July that year. Some editors suggest it might have been composed as late as spring 1820.

² sightless and drear invisible and dark.

³ many i.e. crowds, multitudes.

⁴ the Preacher a reference to the Preacher in Ecclesiastes, who ‘applied mine heart to know, and to search, and to seek out wisdom, and the reason of things, and to know the wickedness of folly, even of foolishness and madness ... but I find not’ (Ecclesiastes 7:25, 28).

On Life (composed late 1819)

From Essays, Letters from Abroad, Translations and Fragments (2 vols, Philadelphia, 1840)

Life and the world, or whatever we call that which we are and feel, is an astonishing thing. The mist of familiarity¹ obscures from us the wonder of our being. We are struck with admiration at some of its transient modifications, but it is itself the great miracle. What are changes of empires, the wreck of dynasties, with the opinions which supported them; what is the birth and the extinction of religious and of political systems, to life? What are the revolutions of the globe which we inhabit, and the operations of the elements of which it is composed, compared with life? What is the universe of stars and suns (of which this inhabited earth is one), and their motions and their destiny, compared with life? Life, the great miracle, we admire not because it is so miraculous. It is well that we are so shielded by the familiarity of what is at once so certain and so unfathomable, from an astonishment which would otherwise absorb and overawe the functions of that which is its object.

If any artist, I do not say had executed, but had merely conceived in his mind the system of the sun, and the stars and planets, they not existing, and had painted to us in words or upon canvas the spectacle now afforded by the nightly cope of heaven, and illustrated it by the wisdom of astronomy, great would be our admiration. Or had he imagined the scenery of this earth, the mountains, the seas and the rivers, the grass and the flowers, and the variety of the forms and masses of the leaves of the woods, and the colours which attend the setting and the rising sun, and the hues of the atmosphere, turbid or serene, these things not before existing, truly we should have been astonished – and it would not have been a vain boast to have said of such a man, ‘Non merita nome di creatore, sennon Iddio ed il Poeta’.² But now these things are looked on with little wonder, and to be conscious of them with intense delight is esteemed to be the distinguishing mark of a refined and extraordinary person. The multitude of men care not for them; it is thus with life – that which includes all.

What is life? Thoughts and feelings arise, with or without our will, and we employ words to express them. We are born, and our birth is unremembered, and our infancy remembered but in fragments. We live on, and in living we lose the apprehension of life. How vain is it to think that words can penetrate the mystery of our being! Rightly used they may make evident our ignorance to ourselves, and this is much. For what are we? Whence do we come, and whither do we go? Is birth the commencement, is death the conclusion of our being? What is birth and death?

The most refined abstractions of logic conduct to a view of life which, though startling to the apprehension, is in fact that which the habitual sense of its repeated combinations has extinguished in us. It strips, as it were, the painted curtain from this scene of things. I confess that I am one of those who am unable to refuse my assent to the conclusions of those philosophers who assert that nothing exists but as it is perceived.

It is a decision against which all our persuasions struggle, and we must be long convicted before we can be convinced that the solid universe of external things is 'such stuff as dreams are made of'.³ The shocking absurdities of the popular philosophy of mind and matter, and its fatal consequences in morals, their violent dogmatism concerning the source of all things, had early conducted me to materialism.⁴ This materialism is a seducing system to young and superficial minds; it allows its disciples to talk, and dispenses them from thinking. But I was discontented with such a view of things as it afforded; man is a being of high aspirations 'looking both before and after',⁵ whose 'thoughts wander through eternity',⁶ disclaiming alliance with transience and decay, incapable of imagining to himself annihilation, existing but in the future and the past, being not what he is, but what he has been and shall be. Whatever may be his true and final destination, there is a spirit within him at enmity with nothingness and dissolution. This is the character of all life and being. Each is at once the centre and the circumference, the point to which all things are referred, and the line in which all things are contained. Such contemplations as these, materialism and the popular philosophy of mind and matter alike forbid; they are only consistent with the intellectual system.

It is absurd to enter into a long recapitulation of arguments sufficiently familiar to those enquiring minds whom alone a writer on abstruse subjects can be conceived to address. Perhaps the most clear and vigorous statement of the intellectual system is to be found in Sir William Drummond's Academical Questions; after such an exposition it would be idle to translate into other words what could only lose its energy and fitness by the change. Examined point by point and word by word, the most discriminating intellects have been able to discern no train of thoughts in the process of reasoning, which does not conduct inevitably to the conclusion which has been stated.

What follows from the admission? It establishes no new truth, it gives us no additional insight into our hidden nature, neither its action, nor itself. Philosophy, impatient as it may be to build, has much work yet remaining as pioneer for the overgrowth of ages. It makes one step towards this object; it destroys error and the roots of error. It leaves what is too often the duty of the reformer in political and ethical questions to leave – a vacancy. It reduces the mind to that freedom in which it would have acted, but for the misuse of words and signs, the instruments of its own creation. By signs, I would be understood in a wide sense, including what is properly meant by that term, and what I peculiarly mean. In this latter sense, almost all familiar objects are signs, standing not for themselves but for others, in their capacity of suggesting one thought which shall lead to a train of thoughts. Our whole life is thus an education of error.

Let us recollect our sensations as children. What a distinct and intense apprehension had we of the world and of ourselves. Many of the circumstances of social life were then important to us, which are now no longer so. But that is not the point of comparison on which I mean to insist. We less habitually distinguished all that we saw and felt from ourselves. They seemed as it were to constitute one mass. There are some persons who in this respect are always children. Those who are subject to the state called reverie feel as if their nature were dissolved into the surrounding universe, or as if the surrounding universe were absorbed into their being.⁷ They are conscious of no distinction. And these are states which precede or accompany or follow an unusually intense and vivid apprehension of life. As men grow up, this power commonly decays, and they become mechanical and habitual agents. Thus feelings and then reasonings are the combined result of a multitude of entangled thoughts, and of a series of what are called impressions, planted by reiteration.

The view of life presented by the most refined deductions of the intellectual philosophy, is that of unity. Nothing exists but as it is perceived. The difference is merely nominal between those two classes of thought which are vulgarly distinguished by the names of ideas and of external objects.⁸ Pursuing the same thread of reasoning, the existence of distinct individual minds, similar to that which is employed in now questioning its own nature, is likewise found to be a delusion. The words, I, you, they are not signs of any actual difference subsisting between the assemblage of thoughts thus indicated, but are merely marks employed to denote the different modifications of the one mind.

Let it not be supposed that this doctrine conducts to the monstrous presumption that I, the person who now write and think, am that one mind. I am but a portion of it. The words I, and you and they are grammatical devices invented simply for arrangement and totally devoid of the intense and exclusive sense usually attached to them. It is difficult to find terms adequate to express so subtle a conception as that to which the intellectual philosophy has conducted us. We are on that verge where words abandon us, and what wonder if we grow dizzy to look down the dark abyss of how little we know!

The relations of things remain unchanged by whatever system. By the word things is to be understood any object of thought; that is, any thought upon which any other thought is employed, with an apprehension of distinction. The relations of these remain unchanged – and such is the material of our knowledge.

What is the cause of life? That is, how was it produced, or what agencies distinct from life, have acted or act upon life? All recorded generations of mankind have wearily busied themselves in inventing answers to this question. And the result has been religion. Yet that the basis of all things cannot be (as the popular philosophy alleges) mind, is sufficiently evident. Mind (as far as we have any experience of its properties, and, beyond that, experience how vain is argument) cannot create, it can only perceive. It is said also to be the cause; but cause is only a word expressing a certain state of the human mind with regard to the manner in which two thoughts are apprehended to be related to each other. If anyone desires to know how unsatisfactorily the popular philosophy employs itself upon this great question, they need only impartially reflect upon the manner in which thoughts develop themselves in their minds. It is infinitely improbable that the cause of mind – that is, of existence – is similar to mind.

Prometheus Unbound: A Lyrical Drama in Four Acts (composed September 1818– December 1819; edited from printed and MS sources)¹

*Audisne haec Amphiarae, sub terram abdite?*²

Preface

The Greek tragic writers, in selecting as their subject any portion of their national history or mythology, employed in their treatment of it a certain arbitrary discretion. They by no means conceived themselves bound to adhere to the common interpretation, or to imitate in story (as in title) their rivals and predecessors. Such a system would have amounted to a resignation of those claims to preference over their competitors which incited the composition: the Agamemnonian story³ was exhibited on the Athenian theatre with as many variations as dramas.

I have presumed to employ a similar licence. The Prometheus Unbound of Aeschylus supposed the reconciliation of Jupiter with his victim⁴ as the price of the disclosure of the danger threatened to his empire by the consummation of his marriage with Thetis. Thetis, according to this view of the subject, was given in marriage to Peleus;⁵ and Prometheus, by the permission of Jupiter, delivered from his captivity by Hercules. Had I framed my story on this model, I should have done no more than have attempted to restore the lost drama of Aeschylus⁶ – an ambition which, if my preference to this mode of treating the subject had incited me to cherish, the recollection of the high comparison such an attempt would challenge might well abate. But in truth, I was averse from a catastrophe so feeble as that of reconciling the champion with the oppressor of mankind. The moral interest of the fable, which is so powerfully sustained by the sufferings and endurance of Prometheus, would be annihilated if we could conceive of him as unsaying his high language and quailing before his successful and perfidious adversary.⁷ The only imaginary being resembling in any degree Prometheus, is Satan; and Prometheus is, in my judgement, a more poetical character than Satan, because, in addition to courage and majesty, and firm and patient opposition to omnipotent force, he is susceptible of being described as exempt from the taints of ambition, envy, revenge, and a desire for personal aggrandizement⁸ – which, in the hero of Paradise Lost, interfere with the interest. The character of Satan engenders in the mind a pernicious casuistry which leads us to weigh his faults with his wrongs, and to excuse the former because the latter exceed all measure. In the minds of those who consider that magnificent fiction with a religious feeling, it engenders something worse. But Prometheus is, as it were, the type of the highest perfection of moral and intellectual nature, impelled by the purest and the truest motives to the best and noblest ends.

This poem was chiefly written upon the mountainous ruins of the Baths of Caracalla,⁹ among the flowery glades, and thickets of odoriferous blossoming trees, which are extended in ever-winding labyrinths upon its immense platforms and dizzy arches suspended in the air. The bright blue sky of Rome, and the effect of the vigorous awakening spring in that divinest climate, and the new life with which it drenches the spirits even to intoxication, were the inspiration of this drama.

The imagery which I have employed will be found, in many instances, to have been drawn from the operations of the human mind, or from those external actions by which they are expressed. This is unusual in modern poetry, although Dante and Shakespeare are full of instances of the same kind – Dante indeed more than any other poet, and with greater success. But the Greek poets, as writers to whom no resource of awakening the sympathy of their contemporaries was unknown, were in the habitual use of this power; and it is the study of their works (since a higher merit would probably be denied me) to which I am willing that my readers should impute this singularity.

One word is due in candour to the degree in which the study of contemporary writings may have tinged my composition, for such has been a topic of censure with regard to poems far more popular (and indeed more deservedly popular) than mine.¹⁰ It is impossible that anyone who inhabits the same age with such writers¹¹ as those who stand in the foremost ranks of our own, can conscientiously assure himself that his language and tone of thought may not have been modified by the study of the productions of those extraordinary intellects. It is true that, not the spirit of their genius, but the forms in which it has manifested itself, are due less to the peculiarities of their own minds than to the peculiarity of the moral and intellectual condition of the minds among which they have been produced. Thus a number of writers possess the form, whilst they want the spirit, of those whom (it is alleged) they imitate; because the former is the endowment of the age in which they live, and the latter must be the uncommunicated lightning of their own mind.

The peculiar style of intense and comprehensive imagery which distinguishes the modern literature of England has not been, as a general power, the product of the imitation of any particular writer. The mass of capabilities remains at every period materially the same; the circumstances which awaken it to action perpetually change. If England were divided into forty republics, each equal in population and extent to Athens, there is no reason to suppose but that, under institutions not more perfect than those of Athens, each would produce philosophers and poets equal to those who (if we except Shakespeare) have never been surpassed. We owe the great writers of the golden age of our literature¹² to that fervid awakening of the public mind which shook to dust the oldest and most oppressive form of the Christian religion.¹³ We owe Milton to the progress and development of the same spirit – the sacred Milton was, let it ever be remembered, a republican, and a bold enquirer into morals and religion. The great writers of our own age are, we have reason to suppose, the companions and forerunners of some unimagined change in our social condition, or the opinions which cement it. The cloud of mind is discharging its collected lightning, and the equilibrium between institutions and opinions is now restoring, or is about to be restored.

As to imitation, poetry is a mimetic art. It creates, but it creates by combination and representation. Poetical abstractions are beautiful and new, not because the portions of which they are composed had no previous existence in the mind of man or in nature, but because the whole produced by their combination has some intelligible and beautiful analogy with those sources of emotion and thought, and with the contemporary condition of them. One great poet is a masterpiece of nature which another not only ought to study but must study. He might as wisely and as easily determine that his mind should no longer be the mirror of all that is lovely in the visible universe, as exclude from his contemplation the beautiful which exists in the writings of a great contemporary. The pretence of doing it would be a presumption in any but the greatest; the effect, even in him, would be strained, unnatural, and ineffectual. A poet is the combined product of such internal powers as modify the nature of others, and of such external influences as excite and sustain these powers; he is not one, but both. Every man's mind is, in this respect, modified by all the objects of nature and art; by every word and every suggestion which he ever admitted to act upon his consciousness; it is the mirror upon which all forms are reflected, and in which they compose one form. Poets, not otherwise than philosophers, painters, sculptors and musicians, are in one sense the creators, and in another the creations, of their age. From this subjection the loftiest do not escape. There is a similarity between Homer and Hesiod, between Aeschylus and Euripides, between Virgil and Horace, between Dante and Petrarch, between Shakespeare and Fletcher, between Dryden and Pope: each has a generic resemblance under which their specific distinctions are arranged. If this similarity be the result of imitation, I am willing to confess that I have imitated.

Let this opportunity be conceded to me of acknowledging that I have what a Scotch philosopher¹⁴ characteristically terms, 'a passion for reforming the world'. What passion incited him to write and publish his book, he omits to explain. For my part, I had rather be damned with Plato and Lord Bacon,¹⁵ than go to heaven with Paley and Malthus.¹⁶ But it is a mistake to suppose that I dedicate my poetical compositions solely to the direct enforcement of reform, or that I consider them in any degree as containing a reasoned system on the theory of human life. Didactic poetry is my abhorrence; nothing can be equally well expressed in prose that is not tedious and supererogatory in verse. My purpose has hitherto been simply to familiarize the highly-refined imagination of the more select classes of poetical readers with beautiful idealisms of moral excellence, aware that until the mind can love, and admire, and trust, and hope, and endure, reasoned principles of moral conduct are seeds cast upon the highway of life, which the unconscious passenger tramples into dust although they would bear the harvest of his happiness. Should I live to accomplish what I purpose (that is, produce a systematical history of what appear to me to be the genuine elements of human society), let not the advocates of injustice and superstition flatter themselves that I should take Aeschylus rather than Plato as my model.¹⁷

The having spoken of myself with unaffected freedom will need little apology with the candid, and let the uncandid consider that they injure me less than their own hearts and minds by misrepresentation. Whatever talents a person may possess to amuse and instruct others (be they ever so inconsiderable), he is yet bound to exert them. If his attempt be ineffectual, let the punishment of an unaccomplished purpose have been sufficient; let none trouble themselves to heap the dust of oblivion upon his efforts. The pile they raise will betray his grave which might otherwise have been unknown.

Prometheus Unbound

¹This work should be read in the light of Mary Shelley's note, p. 1509; for introductory remarks see headnote, p. 1076. See also M. H. Abrams, 'Shelley's "Prometheus Unbound"', in Natural Supernaturalism: Tradition and Revolution in Romantic Literature (New York, 1971), pp. 299–307.

²'Do you hear this, Amphiaraus, in your home beneath the earth?' (Cicero, Tusculan Disputations II xxv 59). Amphiaraus was a prophet, saved by Jupiter from pursuers by being miraculously swallowed by the earth, after which he became an oracular god. Shelley directs the comment to Aeschylus, asking him to hear this reworking of the Prometheus myth.

3 the Agamemnonian story famously related by Aeschylus in the Oresteia (458 BCE), a trilogy of plays that tells of the tragic homecoming of the Greek commander Agamemnon from the Trojan war and its consequences.

4 his victim Prometheus, whom he nailed to the rock of the Caucasus for 30,000 years.

5 Thetis, a goddess of the sea, married Peleus, King of Thessaly, after a long courtship.

6 the lost drama of Aeschylus i.e. Aeschylus' Prometheus Unbound, the lost sequel to Prometheus Bound. It is not known how Aeschylus effected the reconciliation between Prometheus and Jupiter. Fragments show that it opened with Prometheus restored to light after 3,000 years, and that the chorus was composed of Titans. In Greek myth, the Titans were a god-like race expelled from heaven by Jupiter.

7 Shelley points to a crucial distinction between his work and Aeschylus'. He refused to accept the idea of Prometheus' submission to Jupiter; in his poem it is Jupiter who succumbs.

8 Prometheus is...aggrandizement Prometheus returned fire to man after it was taken away by Jupiter.

9 the Baths of Caracalla ancient baths in Rome, named after Emperor Caracalla (211–217 CE). Shelley began Prometheus Unbound in Este near Padua, September 1818, and completed it in Rome, December 1819.

10 One word...than mine The remainder of the Preface is a response to John Taylor Coleridge who, in an anonymous review of The Revolt of Islam (1818) in the Quarterly Review 21 (1819) 460–71, described Shelley as 'an unsparing imitator' of Wordsworth, 'to whose religious mind it must be matter, we think, of perpetual sorrow to see the philosophy which comes pure and holy from his pen, degraded and perverted, as it continually is, by this miserable crew of atheists or pantheists'. Shelley thought that the review was by Southey.

11 such writers identified in the MS as Wordsworth, Coleridge and Byron. It is worth bearing in mind that Shelley's works, when published, enjoyed virtually no sale and were widely attacked; that's why he writes from the standpoint of someone whose writings were less popular than theirs.

12 the golden age of our literature Shelley means the Elizabethan age – that of Spenser and Sidney.

13 the oldest and most oppressive form of the Christian religion Roman Catholicism.

14 a Scotch philosopher Robert Forsyth in The Principles of Moral Science (1805).

15 Plato and Lord Bacon in the MS, Shelley adds Rousseau and Milton to this group. Francis Bacon (1561–1626), Lord Chancellor of England, philosopher and essayist, appealed to Shelley because he was a Neoplatonist.

16 William Paley (1743–1805) argued the usefulness of hell as a means of controlling morals; Thomas Robert Malthus (1776–1834) argued that famine, war and disease were necessary as means of controlling population growth. Shelley regarded them as conservative and utilitarian.

17 Plato's hero is a man leading others towards the light.

ACT I

*Scene: a ravine of icy rocks in the Indian Caucasus.*¹ Prometheus² is discovered bound to the precipice. Panthea and Ione are seated at his feet.
Time: night. During the scene, morning slowly breaks.

PROMETHEUS. Monarch of Gods and Daemons,³ and all spirits

But One,⁴ who throng those bright and rolling worlds

Which thou and I alone of living things

Behold with sleepless eyes! Regard this earth

Made multitudinous with thy slaves, whom thou 5

Requitest for knee-worship, prayer, and praise,

And toil, and hecatombs⁵ of broken hearts,

With fear and self-contempt and barren hope;

Whilst me, who am thy foe, eyeless in hate,⁶

Hast thou made reign and triumph, to thy scorn, 10

O'er mine own misery and thy vain revenge.

Three thousand years of sleep-unsheltered hours

And moments, aye⁷ divided by keen pangs

Till they seemed years, torture and solitude,

Scorn and despair – these are mine empire: 15

More glorious far than that which thou surveyest

From thine unenvied throne, oh mighty God!

Almighty, had I deigned to share the shame

Of thine ill tyranny, and hung not here

Nailed to this wall of eagle-baffling mountain, 20

Black, wintry, dead, unmeasured; without herb,

Insect, or beast, or shape or sound of life –

Ah me, alas! Pain, pain ever, forever!

No change, no pause, no hope; yet I endure.

I ask the Earth, have not the mountains felt? 25

I ask yon Heaven, the all-beholding Sun,

Has it not seen? The Sea, in storm or calm,

Heaven's ever-changing shadow, spread below,

Have its deaf waves not heard my agony?
Ah me, alas! Pain, pain ever, forever! 30

The crawling glaciers⁸ pierce me with the spears
Of their moon-freezing crystals; the bright chains
Eat with their burning cold into my bones;
Heaven's winged hound,⁹ polluting from thy lips
His beak in poison not his own, tears up 35
My heart; and shapeless sights come wandering by,
The ghastly people of the realm of dream,
Mocking me; and the Earthquake-fiends are charged
To wrench the rivets from my quivering wounds
When the rocks split and close again behind; 40
While from their loud abysses howling throug
The genii of the storm, urging the rage
Of whirlwind, and afflict me with keen hail.

And yet to me welcome is Day and Night,
Whether one breaks the hoar-frost of the morn, 45
Or starry, dim, and slow, the other climbs
The leaden-coloured east – for then they lead
The wingless, crawling Hours,¹⁰ one among whom
(As some dark priest hales¹¹ the reluctant victim)
Shall drag thee, cruel King, to kiss the blood 50
From these pale feet, which then might trample thee
If they disdained not such a prostrate slave.

Disdain? Ah no, I pity thee.¹² What Ruin
Will hunt thee undefended through wide Heaven!
How will thy soul, cloven to its depth with terror, 55
Gape like a hell within! I speak in grief,
Not exultation, for I hate no more
As then, ere misery made me wise. The curse
Once breathed on thee I would recall.¹³ Ye Mountains,
Whose many-voiced Echoes, through the mist 60
Of cataracts, flung the thunder of that spell;
Ye icy Springs, stagnant with wrinkling frost,

Which vibrated to hear me, and then crept
Shuddering through India; thou serenest Air,
Through which the Sun walks burning without beams; 65
And ye swift Whirlwinds, who on poised wings
Hung mute and moveless o'er yon hushed abyss,
As thunder, louder than your own, made rock
The orb'd world – if then my words had power
(Though I am changed so that aught evil wish 70
Is dead within, although no memory be
Of what is hate), let them not lose it now!
What was that curse, for ye all heard me speak?
FIRST VOICE (from the mountains)

Thrice three hundred thousand years¹⁴
O'er the Earthquake's couch we stood; 75
Oft, as men convulsed with fears,
We trembled in our multitude.

SECOND VOICE (from the springs)
Thunderbolts had parched our water,
We had been stained with bitter blood,
And had run mute, mid shrieks of slaughter, 80
Through a city and a solitude.

THIRD VOICE (from the air)
I had clothed, since Earth uprose,
Its wastes in colours not their own,
And oft had my serene repose
Been cloven by many a rending groan. 85

FOURTH VOICE (from the whirlwinds)
We had soared beneath these mountains
Unresting ages; nor had thunder,
Nor yon volcano's flaming fountains,
Nor any power above or under
Ever made us mute with wonder. 90

FIRST VOICE

But never bowed our snowy crest
As at the voice of thine unrest. 15

SECOND VOICE

Never such a sound before
To the Indian waves we bore.
A pilot asleep on the howling sea 95
Leaped up from the deck in agony,
And heard, and cried, ‘Ah, woe is me!’
And died as mad as the wild waves be.

THIRD VOICE

By such dread words from Earth to Heaven
My still realm was never riven; 100
When its wound was closed, there stood
Darkness o’er the day like blood.

FOURTH VOICE

And we shrank back; for dreams of ruin
To frozen caves our flight pursuing
Made us keep silence thus, and thus, 105
Though silence is as hell to us.

THE EARTH

The tongueless caverns of the craggy hills
Cried, ‘Misery!’ then; the hollow Heaven replied
‘Misery!’ And the Ocean’s purple waves,
Climbing the land, howled to the lashing winds, 110
And the pale nations heard it, ‘Misery!’

PROMETHEUS. I heard a sound of voices – not the voice

Which I gave forth. Mother, 16 thy sons and thou
Scorn him, without whose all-enduring will

Beneath the fierce omnipotence of Jove 115
Both they and thou had vanished, like thin mist
Unrolled on the morning wind. Know ye not me,
The Titan?¹⁷ He who made his agony
The barrier to your else all-conquering foe?
Oh rock-embosomed lawns and snow-fed streams 120
Now seen athwart frore¹⁸ vapours, deep below,
Through whose o'ershadowing woods I wandered once
With Asia,¹⁹ drinking life from her loved eyes,
Why scorns the spirit which informs ye, now
To commune with me? Me alone, who checked, 125
As one who checks a fiend-drawn charioteer,
The falsehood and the force of him who reigns
Supreme, and with the groans of pining slaves
Fills your dim glens and liquid wildernesses?
Why answer ye not still, brethren?²⁰

THE EARTH. They dare not. 130

PROMETHEUS. Who dares? For I would hear that curse again....

Ha, what an awful whisper rises up!
'Tis scarce like sound; it tingles through the frame
As lightning tingles, hovering ere it strike.
Speak, Spirit! From thine inorganic voice 135
I only know that thou art moving near
And love. How cursed I him?

THE EARTH. How canst thou hear,
Who knowest not the language of the dead?

PROMETHEUS. Thou art a living spirit; speak as they.

THE EARTH. I dare not speak like life, lest Heaven's fell King
140

Should hear, and link me to some wheel of pain²¹

More torturing than the one whereon I roll.
Subtle thou art and good, and though the Gods
Hear not this voice, yet thou art more than God,
Being wise and kind. Earnestly hearken now. 145

PROMETHEUS. Obscurely through my brain, like shadows dim,
Sweep awful²² thoughts, rapid and thick. I feel
Faint, like one mingled in entwining love;
Yet 'tis not pleasure.

THE EARTH. No, thou canst not hear;
Thou art immortal, and this tongue is known 150
Only to those who die.

PROMETHEUS. And what art thou,
Oh melancholy Voice?

THE EARTH. I am the Earth,
Thy mother; she within whose stony veins,²³
To the last fibre of the loftiest tree
Whose thin leaves trembled in the frozen air, 155
Joy ran, as blood within a living frame,
When thou didst from her bosom, like a cloud
Of glory,²⁴ arise – a spirit of keen joy!²⁰
And at thy voice her pining sons uplifted
Their prostrate brows from the polluting dust, 160
And our almighty Tyrant²⁶ with fierce dread
Grew pale, until his thunder chained thee here.
Then – see those million worlds which burn and roll
Around us; their inhabitants beheld
My sphered light wane in wide heaven; the sea 165
Was lifted by strange tempest, and new fire
From earthquake-rifted mountains of bright snow
Shook its portentous hair beneath Heaven's frown;

Lightning and inundation vexed the plains;
 Blue thistles bloomed in cities; foodless toads 170
 Within voluptuous chambers panting crawled,
 When plague had fallen on man and beast and worm,
 And famine and black blight on herb and tree;
 And in the corn and vines and meadow-grass
 Teemed ineradicable poisonous weeds 175
 Draining their growth – for my wan breast was dry
 With grief, and the thin air, my breath, was stained
 With the contagion of a mother's hate
 Breathed on her child's destroyer. Aye, I heard
 Thy curse, the which, if thou rememberest not, 180
 Yet my innumerable seas and streams,
 Mountains, and caves, and winds, and yon wide air,
 And the inarticulate people of the dead,
 Preserve, a treasured spell. We meditate
 In secret joy and hope those dreadful words, 185
 But dare not speak them.

PROMETHEUS. Venerable mother!
 All else who live and suffer take from thee
 Some comfort: flowers, and fruits, and happy sounds,
 And love, though fleeting. These may not be mine;
 But mine own words, I pray, deny me not. 190

THE EARTH. They shall be told. Ere Babylon was dust,
 The magus Zoroaster, 27 my dead child,
 Met his own image walking in the garden;
 That apparition, sole of men, he saw.
 For know there are two worlds of life and death; 195
 One that which thou beholdest – but the other
 Is underneath the grave, where do inhabit
 The shadows of all forms that think and live
 Till death unite them and they part no more,
 Dreams and the light imaginings of men, 200

And all that faith creates or love desires,
Terrible, strange, sublime and beauteous shapes.
There thou art, and dost hang, a writhing shade
Mid whirlwind-peopled mountains; all the gods
Are there, and all the powers of nameless worlds – 205
Vast, sceptred phantoms, heroes, men, and beasts,
And Demogorgon,²⁸ a tremendous gloom –
And he, the supreme Tyrant,²⁹ on his throne
Of burning gold. Son, one of these shall utter
The curse which all remember. Call at will 210
Thine own ghost, or the ghost of Jupiter,
Hades or Typhon,³⁰ or what mightier Gods
From all-prolific Evil since thy ruin
Have sprung and trampled on my prostrate sons.
Ask, and they must reply; so the revenge 215
Of the Supreme may sweep through vacant shades,
As rainy wind through the abandoned gate
Of a fallen palace.

PROMETHEUS. Mother, let not aught
Of that which may be evil pass again
My lips, or those of aught resembling me. 220
Phantasm of Jupiter, arise, appear!

IONE.³¹
My wings are folded o'er mine ears;
My wings are crossed over mine eyes;
Yet through their silver shade appears,
And through their lulling plumes arise 225
A shape, a throng of sounds:
May it be no ill to thee,
Oh thou of many wounds,³²
Near whom, for our sweet sister's³³ sake,
Ever thus we watch and wake. 230

PANTHEA.

The sound is of whirlwind underground,
Earthquake, and fire, and mountains cloven;³⁴
The shape is awful like the sound,
Clothed in dark purple, star-inwoven.
A sceptre of pale gold, 235
To stay³⁵ steps proud, o'er the slow cloud
His veined hand doth hold.³⁶
Cruel he looks, but calm and strong,
Like one who does, not suffers wrong.

PHANTASM OF JUPITER.

Why have the secret powers of this strange world 240
Driven me, a frail and empty phantom, hither
On direst storms? What unaccustomed sounds
Are hovering on my lips, unlike the voice
With which our pallid race hold ghastly talk
In darkness? And, proud sufferer, who art thou? 245

PROMETHEUS. Tremendous Image, as thou art must be
He whom thou shadowest forth. I am his foe,
The Titan. Speak the words which I would hear
Although no thought inform thine empty voice.

THE EARTH. Listen, and though your echoes must be mute, 250
Grey mountains, and old woods, and haunted springs,
Prophetic caves, and isle-surrounding streams,
Rejoice to hear what yet ye cannot speak.

PHANTASM. A spirit seizes me and speaks within:
It tears me as fire tears a thunder-cloud! 255

PANTHEA. See how he lifts his mighty looks; the heaven
Darkens above.

IONE. He speaks; oh shelter me!

PROMETHEUS. I see the curse on gestures proud and cold,
And looks of firm defiance and calm hate,
And such despair as mocks itself with smiles, 260
Written as on a scroll – yet speak, oh speak!

PHANTASM.

Fiend, I defy thee! With a calm, fixed mind,
All that thou canst inflict I bid thee do;
Foul tyrant both of Gods and humankind,
One only being shalt thou not subdue. 265
Rain then thy plagues upon me here,
Ghastly disease, and frenzying fear;
And let alternate frost and fire
Eat into me, and be thine ire
Lightning, and cutting hail, and legioned forms 270
Of furies, driving by upon the wounding storms.

Aye, do thy worst. Thou art omnipotent.
O'er all things but thyself I gave thee power,
And my own will.³⁷ Be thy swift mischiefs sent
To blast mankind, from yon ethereal tower. 275
Let thy malignant spirit move
Its darkness over those I love;
On me and mine I imprecate³⁸
The utmost torture of thy hate,
And thus devote³⁹ to sleepless agony 280
This undecending head, while thou must reign on high.
But thou, who art the God and Lord – oh thou
Who fillest with thy soul this world of woe;
To whom all things of Earth and Heaven do bow
In fear and worship; all-prevailing foe! 285
I curse thee! Let a sufferer's curse

Clasp thee, his torturer, like remorse;
Till thine infinity shall be

A robe of envenomed agony,⁴⁰
And thine omnipotence a crown of pain 290
To cling like burning gold round thy dissolving brain.

Heap on thy soul, by virtue of this curse,
Ill deeds; then be thou damned, beholding good,
Both infinite as is the universe,

And thou, and thy self-torturing solitude.⁴¹ 295
An awful image of calm power
Though now thou sittest, let the hour
Come when thou must appear to be
That which thou art internally;
And after many a false and fruitless crime 300
Scorn track thy lagging fall through boundless space and time.

The Phantasm vanishes.

PROMETHEUS. Were these my words, oh Parent?

THE EARTH. They were thine.

PROMETHEUS. It doth repent me; words are quick and vain –
Grief for awhile is blind, and so was mine.

I wish no living thing to suffer pain.⁴² 305

THE EARTH.

Misery, oh misery to me,
That Jove at length should vanquish thee.
Wail, howl aloud, Land and Sea;
The Earth's rent heart shall answer ye.
Howl, spirits of the living and the dead, 310
Your refuge, your defence lies fallen and vanquished.

FIRST ECHO. Lies fallen and vanquished?

SECOND ECHO. Fallen and vanquished!

IONE.

Fear not, 'tis but some passing spasm –
The Titan is unvanquished still. 315
But see, where through the azure chasm
Of yon forked and snowy hill,
Trampling the slant winds on high
With golden-sandalled feet that glow
Under plumes of purple dye 320
Like rose-ensanguined ivory –
A shape comes now,
Stretching on high from his right hand
A serpent-cinctured⁴³ wand.

PANTHEA. 'Tis Jove's world-wandering herald, Mercury.⁴⁴ 325

IONE.

And who are those with hydra tresses⁴⁵
And iron wings that climb the wind,
Whom the frowning God represses
Like vapours steaming up behind,
Clanging loud, an endless crowd? 330

PANTHEA.

These are Jove's tempest-walking hounds⁴⁶
Whom he gluts with groans and blood,
When charioted on sulphurous cloud
He bursts Heaven's bounds.

IONE.

Are they now led from the thin dead 335

On new pangs to be fed?

PANTHEA. The Titan looks as ever – firm, not proud.

FIRST FURY. Ha! I scent life!

SECOND FURY. Let me but look into his eyes.

THIRD FURY. The hope of torturing him smells like a heap
Of corpses to a death-bird after battle. 340

FIRST FURY. Darest thou delay, oh Herald? Take cheer, hounds
Of hell; what if the Son of Maia⁴⁷ soon
Should make us food and sport? Who can please long
The Omnipotent?

MERCURY. Back to your towers of iron
And gnash, beside the streams of fire and wail, 345
Your foodless teeth!⁴⁸ Geryon, arise! And Gorgon,
Chimera, and thou Sphinx,⁴⁹ subtlest of fiends,
Who ministered to Thebes Heaven's poisoned wine:
Unnatural love and more unnatural hate⁵⁰ –
These shall perform your task.

FIRST FURY. Oh mercy, mercy! 350
We die with our desire; drive us not back.

MERCURY. Crouch then in silence.
 Awful sufferer!
To thee unwilling, most unwillingly
I come, by the great Father's will driven down,
To execute a doom⁵¹ of new revenge. 355
Alas, I pity thee, and hate myself
That I can do no more. Aye from thy sight

Returning, for a season, Heaven seems Hell,
So thy worn form pursues me night and day,
Smiling reproach. Wise art thou, firm and good, 360
But vainly wouldst stand forth alone in strife
Against the Omnipotent, as yon clear lamps
That measure and divide the weary years
From which there is no refuge, long have taught
And long must teach. Even now thy torturer arms 365
With the strange might of unimagined pains
The powers who scheme slow agonies in Hell,
And my commission is to lead them here,
Or what more subtle, foul or savage fiends
People the abyss, and leave them to their task. 370
Be it not so! There is a secret⁵² known
To thee, and to none else of living things,
Which may transfer the sceptre of wide Heaven,
The fear of which perplexes the Supreme.
Clothe it in words, and bid it clasp his throne 375
In intercession; bend thy soul in prayer,
And like a suppliant in some gorgeous fane
Let the will kneel within thy haughty heart;
For benefits and meek submission tame
The fiercest and the mightiest.

PROMETHEUS. Evil minds 380
Change good to their own nature. I gave all
He has, and in return he chains me here
Years, ages, night and day – whether the sun
Split my parched skin, or in the moony night
The crystal-winged snow cling round my hair – 385
Whilst my beloved race is trampled down
By his thought-executing⁵³ ministers.
Such is the Tyrant's recompense – 'tis just;
He who is evil can receive no good;
And for a world bestowed, or a friend lost, 390

He can feel hate, fear, shame – not gratitude.
He but requites me for his own misdeed.
Kindness to such is keen reproach, which breaks
With bitter stings the light sleep of Revenge.
Submission, thou dost know I cannot try; 395
For what submission but that fatal word,
The death-seal of mankind's captivity –
Like the Sicilian's hair-suspended sword
Which trembles o'er his crown⁵⁴ – would he accept;
Or could I yield? Which yet I will not yield. 400
Let others flatter Crime, where it sits throned
In brief omnipotence; secure are they,
For Justice, when triumphant, will weep down
Pity, not punishment, on her own wrongs,
Too much avenged by those who err.⁵⁵ I wait, 405
Enduring thus the retributive hour
Which since we spake is even nearer now.
But hark, the hell-hounds clamour; fear delay!
Behold – Heaven lours under thy Father's frown!

MERCURY. Oh that we might be spared – I to inflict 410
And thou to suffer. Once more answer me:
Thou knowest not the period⁵⁶ of Jove's power?

PROMETHEUS. I know but this, that it must come.

MERCURY. Alas!
Thou canst not count thy years to come of pain?

PROMETHEUS. They last while Jove must reign – nor more nor less 415
Do I desire or fear.

MERCURY. Yet pause, and plunge
Into eternity, where recorded time,

Even all that we imagine, age on age,
Seems but a point, and the reluctant mind
Flags wearily in its unending flight, 420
Till it sink, dizzy, blind, lost, shelterless.
Perchance it has not numbered the slow years
Which thou must spend in torture, unreprieved.

PROMETHEUS. Perchance no thought can count them – yet they pass.

MERCURY. If thou might'st dwell among the Gods the while, 425
Lapped in voluptuous joy?

PROMETHEUS. I would not quit
This bleak ravine, these unrepentant pains.

MERCURY. Alas! I wonder at, yet pity thee.

PROMETHEUS. Pity the self-despising slaves of Heaven –
Not me, within whose mind sits peace serene 430
As light in the sun, throned. How vain is talk!
Call up the fiends.

IONE. Oh sister, look! White fire
Has cloven to the roots yon huge snow-loaded cedar;
How fearfully God's thunder howls behind!

MERCURY. I must obey his words and thine, alas; 435
Most heavily remorse hangs at my heart.⁵⁷

PANTHEA. See where the child of Heaven,⁵⁸ with winged feet
Runs down the slanted sunlight of the dawn.

IONE. Dear sister, close thy plumes over thine eyes
Lest thou behold and die; they come – they come 440
Blackening the birth of day with countless wings,

And hollow underneath, like death.

FIRST FURY. Prometheus!

SECOND FURY. Immortal Titan!

THIRD FURY. Champion of Heaven's slaves!

PROMETHEUS. He whom some dreadful voice invokes is here –
Prometheus, the chained Titan. Horrible forms, 445
What and who are ye? Never yet there came
Phantasms so foul through monster-teeming Hell
From the all-miscreative⁵⁹ brain of Jove.
Whilst I behold such execrable shapes,
Methinks I grow like what I contemplate, 450
And laugh and stare in loathsome sympathy.

FIRST FURY. We are the ministers of pain and fear,
And disappointment, and mistrust, and hate,
And clinging crime; and as lean dogs pursue
Through wood and lake some struck and sobbing fawn,⁶⁰ 455
We track all things that weep and bleed and live,
When the great King betrays them to our will.

PROMETHEUS. Oh many fearful natures in one name,
I know ye; and these lakes and echoes know
The darkness and the clangour of your wings. 460
But why more hideous than your loathed selves
Gather ye up in legions from the deep?

SECOND FURY. We knew not that; sisters, rejoice, rejoice!

PROMETHEUS. Can aught exult in its deformity?

SECOND FURY. The beauty of delight makes lovers glad, 465

Gazing on one another; so are we.⁶¹
As from the rose which the pale priestess kneels
To gather for her festal crown of flowers
The aerial crimson falls, flushing her cheek –
So from our victim's destined agony 470
The shade which is our form invests us round,
Else are we shapeless as our mother Night.

PROMETHEUS. I laugh your power, and his who sent you here,
To lowest scorn. Pour forth the cup of pain.

FIRST FURY. Thou thinkest we will rend thee bone from bone, 475
And nerve from nerve, working like fire within?

PROMETHEUS. Pain is my element, as hate is thine;
Ye rend me now – I care not.

SECOND FURY. Dost imagine
We will but laugh into thy lidless⁶² eyes?

PROMETHEUS. I weigh not what ye do, but what ye suffer, 480
Being evil. Cruel was the Power which called
You, or aught else so wretched, into light.

THIRD FURY. Thou think'st we will live through thee, one by one,
Like animal life, and though we can obscure not
The soul which burns within, that we will dwell 485
Beside it, like a vain loud multitude
Vexing the self-content of wisest men;
That we will be dread thought beneath thy brain,
And foul desire round thine astonished heart,
And blood within thy labyrinthine veins 490
Crawling like agony.⁶³

PROMETHEUS. Why, ye are thus now;

Yet am I king over myself, and rule
The torturing and conflicting throngs within,
As Jove rules you when Hell grows mutinous.

CHORUS OF FURIES.

From the ends of the earth, from the ends of the earth, 495
Where the night has its grave and the morning its birth,
Come, come, come!

Oh ye who shake hills with the scream of your mirth
When cities sink howling in ruin, and ye
Who with wingless footsteps trample the sea, 500
And close upon shipwreck and famine's track
Sit chattering with joy on the foodless wreck –
Come, come, come!

Leave the bed, low, cold, and red,
Strewed beneath a nation dead; 505
Leave the hatred, as in ashes
Fire is left for future burning:
It will burst in bloodier flashes
When ye stir it, soon returning;
Leave the self-contempt implanted 510
In young spirits, sense-enchanted,
Misery's yet unkindled fuel;
Leave Hell's secrets half unchanted
To the maniac dreamer – cruel
More than ye can be with hate, 515
Is he with fear.

Come, come, come!
We are steaming up from Hell's wide gate,
And we burden the blasts of the atmosphere,
But vainly we toil till ye come here. 520

IONE. Sister, I hear the thunder of new wings. 64

PANTHEA. These solid mountains quiver with the sound

Even as the tremulous air; their shadows make
The space within my plumes more black than night.

FIRST FURY.

Your call was as a winged car 525
Driven on whirlwinds fast and far;
It rapt⁶⁵ us from red gulfs of war;

SECOND FURY.

From wide cities, famine-wasted;

THIRD FURY.

Groans half-heard, and blood untasted;

FOURTH FURY.

Kingly conclaves⁶⁶ stern and cold, 530
Where blood with gold is bought and sold;

FIFTH FURY.

From the furnace, white and hot,
In which –

A FURY.

Speak not, whisper not!
I know all that ye would tell,
But to speak might break the spell⁶⁷ 535
Which must bend the Invincible,
The stern of thought;
He yet defies the deepest power of Hell.

A FURY. Tear the veil!⁶⁸

ANOTHER FURY. It is torn!

CHORUS. The pale stars of the morn
 Shine on a misery dire to be borne. 540
 Dost thou faint, mighty Titan? We laugh thee to scorn.
 Dost thou boast the clear knowledge thou wakenedst for man?
 Then was kindled within him a thirst which outran
 Those perishing waters; a thirst of fierce fever,
 Hope, love, doubt, desire – which consume him forever. 545
 One⁶⁹ came forth of gentle worth
 Smiling on the sanguine earth;
 His words outlived him, like swift poison
 Withering up truth, peace, and pity.
 Look, where round the wide horizon 550
 Many a million-peopled city
 Vomits smoke in the bright air.
 Hark that outcry of despair!
 'Tis his mild and gentle ghost
 Wailing for the faith he kindled. 555
 Look again, the flames almost
 To a glow-worm's lamp have dwindled;
 The survivors round the embers
 Gather in dread.
 Joy, joy, joy! 560
 Past ages crowd on thee,⁷⁰ but each one remembers,
 And the future is dark, and the present is spread
 Like a pillow of thorns for thy slumberless head.

SEMICHORUS I.

Drops of bloody agony flow
 From his white and quivering brow.⁷¹ 565
 Grant a little respite now –
 See, a disenchanting nation⁷²
 Springs like day from desolation;
 To Truth its state is dedicate,
 And Freedom leads it forth, her mate; 570

A legioned band of linked brothers
Whom Love calls children –

SEMICHORUS II.

'Tis another's: 73

See how kindred murder kin! 'Tis another's: 74
'Tis the vintage-time for Death and Sin;
Blood, like new wine, bubbles within, 575
Till Despair smothers
The struggling world, which slaves and tyrants win.

All the Furies vanish, except one.

IONE. Hark, sister! What a low yet dreadful groan
Quite unsuppressed is tearing up the heart
Of the good Titan, as storms tear the deep, 580
And beasts hear the sea moan in inland caves.
Darest thou observe how the fiends torture him?

PANTHEA. Alas, I looked forth twice, but will no more.

IONE. What didst thou see?

PANTHEA. A woeful sight; a youth 75
With patient looks nailed to a crucifix. 585

IONE. What next?

PANTHEA. The Heaven around, the earth below
Was peopled with thick shapes of human death,
All horrible, and wrought by human hands;
And some appeared the work of human hearts,
For men were slowly killed by frowns and smiles. 590
And other sights too foul to speak and live
Were wandering by. Let us not tempt worse fear

By looking forth; those groans are grief enough.

FURY. Behold an emblem: those who do endure
Deep wrongs for man, and scorn, and chains, but heap 595
Thousandfold torment on themselves and him.

PROMETHEUS. Remit the anguish of that lighted stare;
Close those wan lips; let that thorn-wounded brow
Stream not with blood – it mingles with thy tears!
Fix, fix those tortured orbs⁷⁶ in peace and death, 600
So thy sick throes shake not that crucifix,
So those pale fingers play not with thy gore.
Oh horrible! Thy name I will not speak –
It hath become a curse. I see, I see
The wise, the mild, the lofty, and the just, 605
Whom thy slaves hate for being like to thee;⁷⁷
Some hunted by foul lies from their heart's home,
An early-chosen, late-lamented home,
As hooded ounces⁷⁸ cling to the driven hind;⁷⁹
Some linked to corpses in unwholesome cells; 610
Some (hear I not the multitude laugh loud?)
Impaled in lingering fire. And mighty realms
Float by my feet, like sea-uprooted isles,
Whose sons are kneaded down in common blood
By the red light of their own burning homes. 615

FURY. Blood thou canst see, and fire – and canst hear groans;
Worse things, unheard, unseen, remain behind.

PROMETHEUS. Worse?

FURY. In each human heart terror survives
The ravin⁸⁰ it has gorged; the loftiest fear
All that they would disdain to think were true.⁸¹ 620

Hypocrisy and custom make their minds
The fanes of many a worship, now outworn.
They dare not devise good for man's estate,
And yet they know not that they do not dare.
The good want power, but to weep barren tears; 625
The powerful goodness want – worse need for them;
The wise want love, and those who love want wisdom;
And all best things are thus confused to ill.
Many are strong and rich, and would be just,
But live among their suffering fellow-men 630
As if none felt: they know not what they do. 82

PROMETHEUS. Thy words are like a cloud of winged snakes;
And yet I pity those they torture not. 83

FURY. Thou pitiest them? I speak no more. (vanishes)

PROMETHEUS. Ah woe!

Ah woe! Alas, pain, pain ever, forever! 635
I close my tearless eyes, but see more clear
Thy works within my woe-illumed mind,
Thou subtle 84 Tyrant! Peace is in the grave.
The grave hides all things beautiful and good:
I am a God and cannot find it there – 640
Nor would I seek it. For, though dread revenge,
This is defeat, fierce King, not victory.
The sights with which thou torturest gird my soul
With new endurance, till the hour arrives
When they shall be no types of things which are. 645

PANTHEA. Alas! What sawest thou more?

PROMETHEUS. There are two woes:

To speak, and to behold; thou spare me one.
Names are there, nature's sacred watchwords: they
Were borne aloft in bright emblazonry.

The nations thronged around, and cried aloud 650
As with one voice, 'Truth, Liberty, and Love!'⁸⁵
Suddenly fierce confusion fell from Heaven
Among them – there was strife, deceit, and fear;
Tyrants rushed in, and did divide the spoil.
This was the shadow⁸⁶ of the truth I saw. 655

THE EARTH. I felt thy torture, son, with such mixed joy
As pain and virtue give. To cheer thy state
I bid ascend⁸⁷ those subtle and fair spirits
Whose homes are the dim caves of human thought,
And who inhabit, as birds wing the wind, 660
Its world-surrounding ether; they behold
Beyond that twilight realm, as in a glass,⁸⁸
The future: may they speak comfort to thee!

PANTHEA. Look, sister, where a troop of spirits gather,
Like flocks of clouds in spring's delightful weather, 665
Thronging in the blue air!

IONE. And see, more come,
Like fountain-vapours when the winds are dumb,
That climb up the ravine in scattered lines.
And hark – is it the music of the pines?
Is it the lake? Is it the waterfall? 670

PANTHEA. 'Tis something sadder, sweeter far than all.

CHORUS OF SPIRIT.
From unremembered ages we
Gentle guides and guardians be
Of Heaven-oppressed mortality;
And we breathe, and sicken not, 675
The atmosphere of human thought:

Be it dim, and dank, and grey,
Like a storm-extinguished day
Travelled o'er by dying gleams;
 Be it bright as all between 680
Cloudless skies and windless streams,
 Silent, liquid, and serene;
As the birds within the wind,
 As the fish within the wave,
As the thoughts of man's own mind 685
 Float through all above the grave,
We make there our liquid lair,
Voyaging cloudlike and unpent⁸⁹
Through the boundless element:
Thence we bear the prophecy 690
Which begins and ends in thee.

IONE. More yet come, one by one: the air around them
Looks radiant as the air around a star.

FIRST SPIRITS.

On a battle-trumpet's blast
I fled hither, fast, fast, fast, 695
Mid the darkness upward cast.
From the dust of creeds outworn,⁹⁰
From the tyrant's banner torn,
Gathering round me, onward borne,
There was mingled many a cry – 700
'Freedom! Hope! Death! Victory!'
Till they faded through the sky;
And one sound above, around,
One sound beneath, around, above,
Was moving – 'twas the soul of love; 705
'Twas the hope, the prophecy
Which begins and ends in thee.

SECOND SPIRITS.

A rainbow's arch stood on the sea,
Which rocked beneath, immovably;
And the triumphant storm did flee, 710
Like a conqueror swift and proud,
Between, with many a captive cloud,
A shapeless, dark and rapid crowd,
Each by lightning riven in half.
I heard the thunder hoarsely laugh. 715
Mighty fleets were strewn like chaff
And spread beneath a hell of death⁹¹
O'er the white waters. I alit
On a great ship lightning-split,
And speeded hither on the sigh 720
Of one who gave an enemy
His plank, then plunged aside to die.

THIRD SPIRITS.

I sat beside a sage's bed,
And the lamp was burning red
Near the book where he had fed,⁹² 725
When a dream with plumes of flame
To his pillow hovering came,
And I knew it was the same
Which had kindled long ago
Pity, eloquence, and woe; 730
And the world awhile below
Wore the shade its lustre made.
It has borne me here as fleet
As Desire's lightning feet:
I must ride it back ere morrow, 735
Or the sage will wake in sorrow.

FOURTH SPIRITS.

On a poet's lips I slept

Dreaming like a love-adept⁹³
In the sound his breathing kept;
Nor seeks nor finds he mortal blisses, 740
But feeds on the aerial kisses
Of shapes that haunt thought's wildernesses.
He will watch from dawn to gloom
The lake-reflected sun illumine
The yellow bees in the ivy-bloom, 745
Nor heed nor see what things they be;
But from these create he can
Forms more real than living man,
Nurslings of immortality!
One of these awakened me, 750
And I sped to succour thee.

IONE. Behold'st thou not two shapes from the east and west
Come, as two doves to one beloved nest,
Twin nurslings of the all-sustaining air
On swift still wings glide down the atmosphere? 755
And hark, their sweet, sad voices! 'Tis despair
Mingled with love, and then dissolved in sound.

PANTHEA. Canst thou speak, sister? All my words are drowned.

IONE. Their beauty gives me voice. See how they float
On their sustaining wings of skyey grain,⁹⁴ 760
Orange and azure deepening into gold;
Their soft smiles light the air like a star's fire.

CHORUS OF SPIRIT. Hast thou beheld the form of Love?

FIFTH SPIRIT. As over wide dominions
I sped, like some swift cloud that wings the wide air's wildernesses,
That planet-crested shape⁹⁵ swept by on lightning-braided

pinions,⁹⁶ 765

Scattering the liquid joy of life⁹⁷ from his ambrosial⁹⁸ tresses:
His footsteps paved the world with light, but as I passed 'twas fading,

And hollow Ruin yawned behind. Great sages bound in madness,
And headless patriots and pale youths who perished, unupbraiding,
Gleamed in the night I wandered o'er; till thou, oh King of sadness,
770

Turned by thy smile the worst I saw to recollected gladness.

SIXTH SPIRIT. Ah sister! Desolation is a delicate thing:

It walks not on the earth, it floats not on the air,
But treads with lulling footstep, and fans with silent wing
The tender hopes which in their hearts the best and gentlest bear,
775

Who, soothed to false repose by the fanning plumes above,
And the music-stirring motion of its soft and busy feet,
Dream visions of aerial joy, and call the monster, Love,
And wake, and find the shadow Pain, as he whom now we greet.

CHORUS.

Though Ruin now Love's shadow be, 780
Following him destroyingly

On Death's white and winged steed,⁹⁹
Which the fleetest cannot flee –
Trampling down both flower and weed,
Man and beast, and foul and fair, 785
Like a tempest through the air;
Thou shalt quell this horseman grim,
Woundless though in heart or limb.

PROMETHEUS. Spirits, how know ye this shall be?

CHORUS.

In the atmosphere we breathe – 790

As buds grow red when snowstorms flee
From spring gathering up beneath,
Whose mild winds shake the elder brake, 100
And the wandering herdsmen know
That the whitethorn 101 soon will blow – 795
Wisdom, Justice, Love, and Peace,
When they struggle to increase,
Are to us as soft winds be
To shepherd-boys – the prophecy
Which begins and ends in thee. 800

IONE. Where are the spirits fled?

PANTHEA. Only a sense
Remains of them, like the omnipotence
Of music, when the inspired voice and lute
Languish, ere yet the responses are mute
Which, through the deep and labyrinthine soul, 805
Like echoes through long caverns, wind and roll.

PROMETHEUS. How fair these air-born 102 shapes! And yet I feel
Most vain all hope but love – and thou art far,
Asia, who, when my being overflowed,
Wert like a golden chalice to bright wine 810
Which else had sunk into the thirsty dust.
All things are still. Alas, how heavily
This quiet morning weighs upon my heart.
Though I should dream, I could even sleep with grief
If slumber were denied not. I would fain 815
Be what it is my destiny to be,
The saviour and the strength of suffering man,
Or sink into the original gulf of things.
There is no agony and no solace left;
Earth can console, Heaven can torment no more. 820

PANTHEA. Hast thou forgotten one who watches thee
The cold dark night, and never sleeps but when
The shadow of thy spirit falls on her?

PROMETHEUS. I said all hope was vain but love; thou lovest.

PANTHEA. Deeply in truth; but the eastern star looks white, 825
And Asia waits in that far Indian vale,
The scene of her sad exile – rugged once,
And desolate and frozen, like this ravine,
But now invested with fair flowers and herbs,
And haunted by sweet airs and sounds, which flow 830
Among the woods and waters, from the ether¹⁰³
Of her transforming presence, which would fade
If it were mingled not with thine. Farewell!

Act I

¹Shelley moves the location from the Caucasus mountains near the Caspian to the Indian Caucasus, the Hindu Kush mountains in north India and Afghanistan. It was believed to have been the original home of the human race, and associated with the golden age; it was thus appropriate as the location for universal rebirth.

²*Prometheus* ‘forethinker’ in Greek.

³*Monarch of Gods and Daemons* Jupiter (Jove). In Shelley’s terms, a symbol of political and religious tyranny. Daemons are capable of mediating between humanity and the gods.

⁴*One* Prometheus, who is in much the same position that Shelley felt himself to be.

⁵*hecatombs* numerous sacrifices.

6*eyeless in hate* blind with hatred; for a moment Prometheus becomes Samson, ‘Eyeless in Gaza at the mill with slaves’ (Milton, Samson Agonistes 41).

7*aye* continually.

8*crawling glaciers* Observed by Shelley in Switzerland; see his letter to Peacock (p. 1100), and the creeping glaciers at ‘Mont Blanc’ 100.

9*Heaven’s winged hound* the eagle or vulture that incessantly devoured Prometheus’ liver over a 3,000-year period.

10*Hours* Latin ‘Horae’, female divinities that preside over the changing of the seasons.

11*hales* drags.

12*Ah no, I pity thee* the pivotal statement of the play. Prometheus’ Christ-like pity for his torturer marks the beginning of his redemption.

13*recall* revoke.

14Lines 74–106 describe the effects of the curse of Prometheus on Jupiter, which he has now revoked.

15*the voice of thine unrest* i.e. Prometheus’ curse.

16*Mother Earth*, mother of the Titans and of all things that spring from the earth.

17*The Titan* Prometheus was one of the Titans.

18*frore* frosty.

19*Asia* daughter of Oceanus and bride of Prometheus, from whom she is now separated.

20*brethren* Prometheus is the sibling of forests and streams, as they are all children of Earth.

21*some wheel of pain* Ixion's punishment was to be banished from heaven and tied to a burning and spinning wheel in Hades.

22*awful* awesome.

23*stony veins* In his letter to Peacock, Shelley had referred to the blood circulating through the 'stony veins' of Mont Blanc (see p. 1101).

24*a cloud / Of glory* compare Wordsworth, 'Ode': 'But trailing clouds of glory do we come / From God, who is our home' (ll. 64–5).

25This refers to Prometheus' rebellion against Jupiter.

26*our almighty Tyrant* Jupiter.

27*Zoroaster* Persian religious leader, King of Bactria (sixth or seventh century BCE), who taught that the universe is ruled by two powers, but that the eventual victory of the good spirit (Ahura Mazda or Ormuzd) over the evil (Ahriman) is guaranteed. The encounter with his double is apocryphal; Shelley apparently has in mind Zoroaster's formative meeting with the angel Vohu Manah ('good thought'), who introduced him to Ahura Mazda.

28*Demogorgon* important deity described by Mary Shelley as 'the primal power of the world'.

29*the supreme Tyrant* Jupiter.

30*Hades or Typhon* In Greek myth, Hades was the brother of Jupiter, king of the underworld; Typhon was a monster with a hundred serpentine heads, each of which emitted flames.

31Ione and Panthea are daughters of Oceanus and younger sisters of Asia. They are a chorus, describing and commenting on the events.

32*Oh thou of many wounds* Prometheus.

33*sweet sister* Asia.

34*cloven* split asunder.

35*stay* steady.

36*A sceptre...hold* The Phantasm of Jupiter holds a sceptre as he approaches over the cloud.

37*O'er all things...will* Prometheus empowered Jupiter; in the same way, we empower the tyrants who rule over us.

38*imprecate* invoke, call down.

39*devote* condemn, doom.

40*A robe of envenomed agony* There is a recollection of Nessus' poisoned shirt which, when worn by Hercules, burned his skin and tore off his flesh when he attempted to remove it.

41*Both infinite...solitude* '... both good and evil being infinite as the universe is, and as thou art, and as thy solitude is.'

42A deleted stage-direction in the MS reveals at this point that Prometheus 'bends his head as in pain'.

43*cinctured* entwined.

44*Mercury* son of Maia and Zeus, messenger of the gods. He is the unwilling servant of tyranny.

45*hydra tresses* hair of snakes.

46*Jove's tempest-walking hounds* i.e. the Furies, avenging spirits.

47*the Son of Maia* Mercury.

48*Back to your towers...teeth* Mercury threatens to drive the Furies back to Hades, where flow the rivers Phlegethon and Cocytus ('streams of fire and wail' – 'wail' is a noun).

49Geryon, Gorgon, Chimera and Sphinx are all monsters of classical legend.

50*Unnatural love and more unnatural hate* Before solving the riddle of the Sphinx, Oedipus was led to an 'Unnatural love' for his mother, and (unwittingly) to kill his father ('more unnatural hate').

51*doom* judgement.

52*a secret* i.e. that the children of Thetis (a sea-goddess) will be greater than their father, so that if Jupiter unites with her he will be overthrown by his own son.

53*thought-executing* i.e. acting out one's will as quickly as it is conceived; cf. King Lear III ii 4: 'Yon sulph'rous and thought-executing fires.'

54*Like the Sicilian's...crown* Damocles was a court flatterer exposed by Dionysius I of Syracuse who, to show him the precariousness of monarchy, seated him on a throne beneath a sword suspended by a hair.

55*For Justice...err* Justice will take pity on those who commit crimes against her, evil-doers having already punished themselves by the misery of being what they are.

56*period* end.

57 Shelley is implicitly critical of Mercury. Although he sympathizes with Prometheus, he continues to obey Jupiter. He is like those who detest the tyrants who govern them, but do nothing to bring them down.

58 the child of Heaven Mercury.

59 all-miscreative Jupiter is infinitely capable of creating bad or horrible things – like the Furies. Shelley may be recalling Byron, Childe Harold's Pilgrimage iv 1122–3: 'And Circumstance, that unspiritual god / And miscreator.'

60 as lean dogs...fawn cf. Wordsworth's 'Hart-Leap Well' and Twelfth Night I i 21–2: 'And my desires, like fell and cruel hounds, / E'er since pursue me.'

61 so are we i.e. glad.

62 lidless unclosing.

63 That we will...like agony Evil thoughts and desires will be as intimately present to Prometheus as the blood in his body.

64 new wings a second group of Furies which are to show Prometheus visions of external evils (the first have shown him internal ones).

65 rapt carried.

66 Kingly conclaves secret meetings where important decisions of state are taken.

67 to speak might break the spell To speak might weaken the force of that which is shown.

68 A deleted stage-direction in the MS reveals that at this point 'The Furies, having mingled in a strange dance, divide, and in the background is seen a plain covered with burning cities.' The events Prometheus is shown are in the past: the Crucifixion, the French Revolution and their consequences.

69*One* Jesus Christ.

70*thee* Prometheus, rather than Christ.

71Lines 564–5 describe Prometheus as if he were Christ.

72*a disenchanted nation* France during the Revolution. Shelley borrows the phrase from Coleridge, 'France: An Ode' 28.

73*'Tis another's* The Revolutionaries are no longer Love's, but children of Hatred.

74*See how kindred murder kin!* During the Reign of Terror (July 1793–July 1794), Robespierre and his associates were responsible for the guillotining of many innocent people.

75*a youth* Christ.

76*tortured orbs* eyes, tormented by the appalling sights they have witnessed.

77*Whom thy slaves hate for being like to thee* cf. Shelley's note to Hellas 1090–1: 'The sublime human character of Jesus Christ was deformed by an imputed identification with a Power, who tempted, betrayed, and punished the innocent beings who were called into existence by His sole will; and for the period of a thousand years, the spirit of this most just, wise, and benevolent of men has been propitiated with myriads of hecatombs of those who approached the nearest to His innocence and wisdom.'

78*hooded ounces* hunting leopards, hooded until released at their prey.

79*hind* female deer.

80*ravin* prey.

81*In each human heart...true* ‘superstitious fear lingers in every man’s mind after he has stopped believing in the cause of it.’

82Lines 618–31 comprise the climax of the temptation. The temptation is to despair, because it seems impossible to improve things. Prometheus silences the Fury by saying that he would prefer any amount of suffering to acquiescence. they know not what they do an allusion to Christ on the cross, Luke 23:34: ‘Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do.’

83*And yet I pity those they torture not* a transcendental act of pity; Prometheus pities those who do not recognize the miseries of the world for what they are.

84*subtle* cunning.

85*Truth, Liberty, and Love!* A reference to the motto of the French Revolution: liberté, égalité, fraternité.

86*shadow* image.

87*ascend* The spirits, which are like angels, ascend from within, rather than descend from without.

88*glass* a fortune-teller’s glass ball.

89*unpent* free, unconfined.

90*creeds outworn* Wordsworth, ‘The world is too much with us’ 10.

91*Mighty fleets...death* Spread beneath the wrecked fleets was a hell of death.

92*where he had fed* i.e. his mind.

93 love-adept one skilled in love.

94 skyey grain the colour of the sky.

95 planet-crested shape Love wears the crest of Venus.

96 lightning-braided pinions electric wings.

97 the liquid joy of life love; for Shelley, love is a liquid energy (just as electricity, heat and light were believed to be forms of liquid energy in his day).

98 ambrosial divine, celestial.

99 On Death's white and winged steed Revelation 6:8: 'And I looked, and behold a pale horse: and his name that sat on him was Death, and Hell followed with him.'

100 brake braken.

101 whitethorn hawthorn; compare Milton, Lycidas 48.

102 air-born born in air; imaginary.

103 ether a more refined substance than air, believed in the nineteenth century to be the medium which transmitted heat, light and electricity.

ACT II, SCENE I

*Morning. A lovely vale in the Indian Caucasus. Asia*¹ alone.

ASIA. From all the blasts of Heaven thou hast descended –
Yes, like a spirit, like a thought which makes
Unwonted tears throng to the horny eyes,²
And beatings haunt the desolated heart
Which should have learnt repose; thou hast descended

Cradled in tempests; thou dost wake, oh Spring,
Oh child of many winds! As suddenly
Thou comest as the memory of a dream,
Which now is sad because it hath been sweet;
Like genius, or like joy which riseth up 10
As from the earth, clothing with golden clouds
The desert of our life.
This is the season, this the day, the hour;
At sunrise thou shouldst come, sweet sister mine,
Too long desired, too long delaying, come! 15
How like death-worms the wingless moments crawl!

The point of one white star³ is quivering still
Deep in the orange light of widening morn
Beyond the purple mountains; through a chasm
Of wind-divided mist the darker lake 20
Reflects it: now it wanes – it gleams again
As the waves fade, and as the burning threads
Of woven cloud unravel in pale air.

'Tis lost! And through yon peaks of cloudlike snow
The roseate sunlight quivers – hear I not 25

The Aeolian music of her⁴ sea-green plumes
Winnowing the crimson dawn? (Panthea enters)

I feel, I see

Those eyes which burn through smiles that fade in tears,
Like stars half-quenched in mists of silver dew.

Beloved and most beautiful, who wearest 30
The shadow of that soul by which I live,
How late thou art! The sphered sun had climbed
The sea, my heart was sick with hope, before
The printless air felt thy belated plumes.

PANTHEA. Pardon, great sister; but my wings were faint 35

With the delight of a remembered dream,
As are the noontide plumes of summer winds
Sate with sweet flowers. I was wont to sleep
Peacefully, and awake refreshed and calm

Before the sacred Titan's fall and thy 40
Unhappy love had made, through use and pity,
Both love and woe familiar to my heart
As they had grown to thine. Erewhile⁵ I slept
Under the glaucous⁶ caverns of old Ocean
Within dim bowers of green and purple moss, 45
Our young Ione's soft and milky arms
Locked then, as now, behind my dark moist hair,
While my shut eyes and cheek were pressed within
The folded depth of her life-breathing bosom –
But not as now, since I am made the wind 50
Which fails beneath the music that I bear
Of thy most wordless converse; since dissolved
Into the sense with which love talks, my rest
Was troubled and yet sweet, my waking hours
Too full of care and pain.

ASIA. Lift up thine eyes 55
And let me read thy dream.

PANTHEA. As I have said,
With our sea-sister at his feet I slept.⁷
The mountain mists, condensing at our voice
Under the moon, had spread their snowy flakes,
From the keen ice shielding our linked sleep. 60
Then two dreams came.⁸ One I remember not.
But in the other his pale, wound-worn limbs
Fell from Prometheus, and the azure night
Grew radiant with the glory of that form
Which lives unchanged within, and his voice fell 65
Like music which makes giddy the dim brain,
Faint with intoxication of keen joy:
'Sister of her whose footsteps pave the world
With loveliness – more fair than aught but her,

Whose shadow thou art – lift thine eyes on me!’ 70
I lifted them: the overpowering light
Of that immortal shape was shadowed o’er
By love, which, from his soft and flowing limbs,
And passion-parted lips, and keen, faint eyes,
Steamed forth like vaporous fire – an atmosphere 75
Which wrapped me in its all-dissolving power
As the warm ether of the morning sun
Wraps ere it drinks some cloud of wandering dew.
I saw not, heard not, moved not, only felt
His presence flow and mingle through my blood 80
Till it became his life, and his grew mine,
And I was thus absorbed until it passed,
And like the vapours when the sun sinks down,
Gathering again in drops upon the pines,
And tremulous as they, in the deep night 85
My being was condensed; and as the rays
Of thought were slowly gathered, I could hear
His voice, whose accents lingered ere they died
Like footsteps of far melody. Thy name
Among the many sounds, alone I heard 90
Of what might be articulate; though still
I listened through the night when sound was none.
Ione wakened then, and said to me,
‘Canst thou divine what troubles me tonight?
I always knew what I desired before, 95
Nor ever found delight to wish in vain.
But now I cannot tell thee what I seek,
I know not – something sweet, since it is sweet
Even to desire. It is thy sport, false sister;
Thou hast discovered some enchantment old, 100
Whose spells have stolen my spirit as I slept
And mingled it with thine⁹ – for when just now
We kissed, I felt within thy parted lips
The sweet air that sustained me, and the warmth

Of the life-blood, for loss of which I faint, 105
Quivered between our intertwining arms.’
I answered not, for the eastern star grew pale,
But fled to thee.

ASIA. Thou speakest, but thy words
Are as the air; I feel them not. Oh lift
Thine eyes, that I may read his written soul! 110

PANTHEA. I lift them, though they droop beneath the load
Of that they would express: what canst thou see
But thine own fairest shadow imaged there?

ASIA. Thine eyes are like the deep, blue, boundless Heaven
Contracted to two circles underneath 115
Their long, fine lashes; dark, far, measureless,
Orb within orb, and line through line inwoven.

PANTHEA. Why lookest thou as if a spirit passed?

ASIA. There is a change; beyond their inmost depth
I see a shade, a shape – ’tis he, arrayed 120
In the soft light of his own smiles, which spread
Like radiance from the cloud-surrounded moon.
Prometheus, it is thou – depart not yet!
Say not those smiles that we shall meet again
Within that bright pavilion which their beams 125
Shall build o’er the waste world? The dream is told.
What shape is that between us?¹⁰ Its rude hair
Roughens the wind that lifts it, its regard
Is wild and quick, yet ’tis a thing of air –
For through its grey robe gleams the golden dew 130
Whose stars the noon has quenched not.

DREAM. Follow, follow!

PANTHEA. It is mine other dream.

ASIA. It disappears.

PANTHEA. It passes now into my mind. Methought
As we sat here, the flower-enfolding buds
Burst¹¹ on yon lightning-blasted almond tree, 135
When swift from the white Scythian wilderness
A wind swept forth, wrinkling the earth with frost.
I looked, and all the blossoms were blown down;¹²
But on each leaf was stamped – as the blue-bells
Of Hyacinth tell Apollo's written grief¹³ – 140
'Oh follow, follow!'

ASIA. As you speak, your words
Fill, pause by pause, my own forgotten sleep
With shapes. Methought among these lawns together
We wandered, underneath the young grey dawn,
And multitudes of dense white fleecy clouds 145
Were wandering in thick flocks along the mountains,
Shepherded by the slow, unwilling wind;
And the white dew on the new-bladed grass,
Just piercing the dark earth, hung silently.
And there was more which I remember not, 150
But on the shadows of the morning clouds,
Athwart the purple mountain slope, was written
'Follow, oh follow!' as they vanished by;
And on each herb from which heaven's dew had fallen
The like was stamped, as with a withering fire. 155
A wind arose among the pines; it shook
The clinging music from their boughs, and then
Low, sweet, faint sounds like the farewell of ghosts,
Were heard: 'Oh follow, follow, follow me!'
And then I said, 'Panthea, look on me.' 160

But in the depth of those beloved eyes
Still I saw, 'Follow, follow!'

ECHO. Follow, follow!

PANTHEA. The crags, this clear spring morning, mock our voices
As they were spirit-tongued.

ASIA. It is some being
Around the crags. What fine clear sounds, oh list! 165

ECHOES (unseen)

Echoes we; listen!
We cannot stay:
As dew-stars glisten
Then fade away,
Child of Ocean!¹⁴ 170

ASIA. Hark! Spirits speak! The liquid responses
Of their aerial tongues yet sound.

PANTHEA. I hear.

ECHOES.

Oh follow, follow,
As our voice recedeth
Through the caverns hollow 175
Where the forest spreadeth; (more distant)
Oh follow, follow,
Through the caverns hollow;
As the song floats, thou pursue,
Where the wild bee never flew, 180
Through the noontide darkness deep,
By the odour-breathing sleep

Of faint night-flowers, and the waves
At the fountain-lighted caves,
While our music, wild and sweet, 185
Mocks thy gently-falling feet,
Child of Ocean!

ASIA. Shall we pursue the sound? It grows more faint
And distant.

PANTHEA. List, the strain floats nearer now.

ECHOES.

In the world unknown 190
Sleeps a voice unspoken;
By thy step alone
Can its rest be broken,
Child of Ocean!

ASIA. How the notes sink upon the ebbing wind! 195

ECHOES.

Oh follow, follow,
Through the caverns hollow;
As the song floats thou pursue,
By the woodland noontide dew,
By the forest, lakes, and fountains, 200
Through the many-folded mountains,
To the rents, and gulfs, and chasms,
Where the Earth reposed from spasms,
On the day when he and thou
Parted, to commingle now, 205
Child of Ocean!

ASIA. Come, sweet Panthea, link thy hand in mine,
And follow ere the voices fade away.

Act II, Scene I

1 Asia daughter of Oceanus and bride of Prometheus.

2 horny eyes the eyes have the appearance of horn.

3 one white star Venus, the morning star.

4 her i.e. Panthea's.

5 Erewhile before Prometheus' fall.

6 glaucous pale green.

7 I slept In Act I, we saw Panthea leaving Prometheus after seeing his ordeal and sympathizing with it. Now we hear of her sleep and dreams before departing for Asia.

8 The relation of the dreams is the main action of the scene.

9 Whose spells...thine Both Ione and Panthea have experienced a loss of their sense of separate identity, in favour of a spiritual commingling.

10 What shape is that between us? It is the second dream.

11 Burst blossomed.

12 The almond tree blossoms early, in anticipation of the spring. Panthea and Asia must not be discouraged by the fall of the blossoms, but must follow the dream.

13 as the blue-bells...grief After Hyacinthus was killed by Zephyrus, Apollo changed his blood into a flower and wrote his lament, 'Ai', on the petals.

¹⁴ Child of Ocean Asia, Panthea and Ione are daughters of Ocean.

ACT II, SCENE II

A forest, intermingled with rocks and caverns. Asia and Panthea pass into it. Two young fauns¹ are sitting on a rock, listening.

SEMICHORUS I OF SPIRITS.

The path through which that lovely twain²
Have passed, by cedar, pine, and yew,
And each dark tree that ever grew,
Is curtained out from Heaven's wide blue;
Nor sun, nor moon, nor wind, nor rain, 5
Can pierce its interwoven bowers;
Nor aught, save when some cloud of dew,
Drifted along the earth-creeping breeze
Between the trunks of the hoar trees,
Hangs each a pearl in the pale flowers³ 10
Of the green laurel, blown anew,
And bends, and then fades silently,
One frail and fair anemone;
Or when some star of many a one
That climbs and wanders through steep night, 15
Has found the cleft through which alone
Beams fall from high those depths upon,
Ere it is borne away, away,
By the swift Heavens that cannot stay –
It⁴ scatters drops of golden light, 20
Like lines of rain that ne'er unite;
And the gloom divine is all around,
And underneath is the mossy ground.

SEMICHORUS II.

There the voluptuous nightingales

Are awake through all the broad noonday. 25
When one with bliss or sadness fails
 (And through the windless ivy-boughs,
 Sick with sweet love, droops dying away
On its mate's music-panting bosom),
Another from the swinging blossom, 30
 Watching to catch the languid close
 Of the last strain, then lifts on high
 The wings of the weak melody,
Till some new strain of feeling bear
 The song, and all the woods are mute; 35
When there is heard through the dim air
The rush of wings, and rising there
 Like many a lake-surrounded flute,
Sounds overflow the listener's brain
So sweet that joy is almost pain. 40

SEMICHORUS I.

There those enchanted eddies play
 Of echoes, music-tongued, which draw,
 By Demogorgon's mighty law,
 With melting rapture or deep awe,
All spirits on that secret way, 45
 As inland boats are driven to ocean
Down streams made strong with mountain-thaw;
 And first there comes a gentle sound
 To those in talk or slumber bound,
 And wakes the destined; soft emotion 50
Attracts, impels them. Those who saw
 Say from the breathing earth behind
 There steams a plume-uplifting wind
Which drives them on their path, while they Believe their own swift wings and feet 55
The sweet desires within obey;
And so they float upon their way

Until, still sweet, but loud and strong,
The storm of sound is driven along,
 Sucked up and hurrying – as they fleet 60
 Behind, its gathering billows meet
And to the fatal mountain bear⁵
Like clouds amid the yielding air.

FIRST FAUN. Canst thou imagine where those spirits live
 Which make such delicate music in the woods? 65
 We haunt within the least frequented caves
 And closest coverts, and we know these wilds,
 Yet never meet them, though we hear them oft:
 Where may they hide themselves?

SECOND FAUN. 'Tis hard to tell.
 I have heard those more skilled in spirits⁶ say, 70
 The bubbles, which the enchantment of the sun
 Sucks from the pale faint water-flowers that pave
 The oozy bottom of clear lakes and pools,
 Are the pavilions where such dwell and float
 Under the green and golden atmosphere 75
 Which noontide kindles through the woven leaves;
 And when these burst, and the thin fiery air,
 The which they breathed within those lucent⁷ domes,
 Ascends to flow like meteors through the night,
 They ride on it, and rein their headlong speed, 80
 And bow their burning crests, and glide in fire
 Under the waters of the earth again.⁸

FIRST FAUN. If such live thus, have others other lives,
 Under pink blossoms or within the bells
 Of meadow flowers, or folded violets deep, 85
 Or on their dying odours, when they die,
 Or in the sunlight of the sphered dew?

SECOND FAUN. Aye, many more which we may well divine.

But should we stay to speak, noontide would come,

And thwart⁹ Silenus find his goats undrawn,¹⁰ 90

And grudge to sing those wise and lovely songs

Of fate, and chance, and God, and Chaos old,

And love, and the chained Titan's woeful doom,

And how he shall be loosed, and make the earth

One brotherhood: delightful strains which cheer 95

Our solitary twilights, and which charm

To silence the unenvying nightingales.

Act II, Scene II

¹*fauns* minor Roman deities, usually depicted as men with the ears, horns, tail and feet of goats.

²*that lovely twain* Asia and Panthea.

³*Hangs each a pearl in the pale flowers* hangs a pearl in each pale flower.

⁴*It* the star of line 14.

⁵The 'destined' spirits (Asia and Panthea) are borne by the gathering 'storm of sound' to the 'fatal' (i.e. fated, destined) mountain of Demogorgon.

⁶*those more skilled in spirits* scientists.

⁷*lucent* shining.

⁸*I have heard those...again* In Shelley's day it was believed that hydrogen was released by pond-plants in hot weather, and that it ascended to the upper atmosphere, where it became charged with electricity, ignited, and appeared as meteors or falling stars. Lines 81–2 describe the return of atmospheric electricity to the earth.

⁹*thwart* obstinate, difficult.

¹⁰*undrawn* unmilked; Silenus was a demigod and attendant of Bacchus.

ACT II, SCENE III

A pinnacle of rock among mountains. Asia and Panthea.

PANTHEA. Hither the sound has borne us – to the realm
Of Demogorgon, and the mighty portal,¹
Like a volcano's meteor-breathing² chasm,
Whence the oracular vapour³ is hurled up
Which lonely men drink wandering in their youth, 5
And call truth, virtue, love, genius, or joy;
That maddening wine of life, whose dregs they drain
To deep intoxication, and uplift,
Like maenads⁴ who cry loud, 'Evoe! Evoe!' –
The voice which is contagion to the world. 10

ASIA. Fit throne for such a Power – magnificent!
How glorious art thou, Earth! And if thou be
The shadow of some spirit lovelier still,⁵
Though evil stain its work, and it should be
Like its creation, weak yet beautiful, 15
I could fall down and worship that and thee.
Even now my heart adoreth – wonderful!
Look, sister, ere the vapour dim thy brain:
Beneath is a wide plain of billowy mist,
As a lake, paving in the morning sky, 20
With azure waves which burst in silver light,
Some Indian vale. Behold it, rolling on
Under the curdling winds, and islanding

The peak whereon we stand; midway, around,
Encinctured⁶ by the dark and blooming forests, 25
Dim twilight-lawns, and stream-illumed caves,
And wind-enchanted shapes of wandering mist;
And far on high the keen sky-cleaving mountains
From icy spires of sunlike radiance fling
The dawn, as lifted Ocean's dazzling spray, 30
From some Atlantic islet scattered up,
Spangles the wind with lamp-like water-drops.
The vale is girdled with their walls; a howl
Of cataracts from their thaw-cloven ravines
Satiates the listening wind, continuous, vast, 35
Awful as silence. Hark, the rushing snow!
The sun-awakened avalanche! whose mass,
Thrice sifted by the storm, had gathered there
Flake after flake, in Heaven-defying minds
As thought by thought is piled, till some great truth 40
Is loosened, and the nations echo round,
Shaken to their roots, as do the mountains now.

PANTHEA. Look how the gusty sea of mist is breaking
In crimson foam, even at our feet! It rises
As Ocean at the enchantment of the moon 45
Round foodless men wrecked on some oozy isle.

ASIA. The fragments of the cloud are scattered up;
The wind that lifts them disentwines my hair;
Its billows now sweep o'er mine eyes; my brain
Grows dizzy; seest those shapes within the mist? 50

PANTHEA. A countenance with beckoning smiles: there burns
An azure fire within its golden locks!
Another and another – hark, they speak!
SONG OF SPIRITS.

To the deep, to the deep,

Down, down! 55
Through the shade of sleep,
Through the cloudy strife
Of Death and of Life;
Through the veil and the bar⁷
Of things which seem and are, 60
Even to the steps of the remotest throne,
Down, down!

While the sound whirls around,
Down, down!
As the fawn draws the hound, 65
As the lightning the vapour,
As a weak moth the taper;
Death, despair; love, sorrow;
Time both; today, tomorrow;
As steel obeys the spirit of the stone,⁸ 70
Down, down!
Through the grey, void abysm,
Down, down!

Where the air is no prism,⁹
And the moon and stars are not, 75
And the cavern-crags wear not
The radiance of Heaven,
Nor the gloom to Earth given;
Where there is One pervading, One alone,
Down, down! 80

In the depth of the deep,
Down, down!
Like veiled lightning asleep,
Like that spark nursed in embers,
The last look Love remembers, 85
Like a diamond which shines

On the dark wealth of mines,¹⁰
A spell is treasured but for thee alone.
Down, down!

We have bound thee, we guide thee 90
Down, down!¹¹
With the bright form beside thee;
Resist not the weakness;
Such strength is in meekness,
That the Eternal, the Immortal, 95
Must unloose through life's portal
The snake-like Doom coiled underneath his throne
By that alone.

²*meteor-breathing* Meteors were believed to be exhalations from the earth.

³*the oracular vapour* Anyone inhaling the vapour of Demogorgon's volcano-like residence is likely to be inspired with the power of prophecy.

⁴*maenads* drunken female worshippers of Bacchus.

⁵*And if thou be...still* A similar thought occurs in Paradise Lost v 574–6: 'though what if earth / Be but the shadow of heaven, and things therein / Each to other like, more than on earth is thought?'

⁶*Encinctured* surrounded.

⁷*bar* barrier. Asia and Panthea are passing through the barrier dividing earthly appearance from the higher, transcendental reality.

8 the stone i.e. a magnet.

9 Where the air is no prism Shelley believed that white light in its purest form was that of heaven, and that its breaking down into different colours was characteristic of the fallen world.

10 Like a diamond...mines It was believed that diamonds glowed in the dark.

11 We have bound thee...down Asia and Panthea have been bound, and are being led by the spirits. Asia has to submit so that Demogorgon (the Eternal) can permit the destined downfall of Jupiter.

ACT II, SCENE IV

The Cave of Demogorgon. Asia and Panthea.

PANTHEA. What veiled form sits on that ebon throne?

ASIA. The veil has fallen.

PANTHEA. I see a mighty darkness
Filling the seat of power, and rays of gloom
Dart round, as light from the meridian sun,¹
Ungazed upon and shapeless; neither limb, 5
Nor form, nor outline² – yet we feel it is
A living spirit.

DEMOGORGON. Ask what thou wouldst know.

ASIA. What canst thou tell?

DEMOGORGON. All things thou dar'st demand.

ASIA. Who made the living world?

DEMOGORGON. God.

ASIA. Who made all
That it contains – thought, passion, reason, will,
Imagination? 10

DEMOGORGON. God. Almighty God.

ASIA. Who made that sense which, when the winds of spring
In rarest visitation, or the voice
Of one beloved heard in youth alone,
Fills the faint eyes with falling tears which dim 15
The radiant looks of unbewailing flowers,
And leaves this peopled earth a solitude
When it returns no more?

DEMOGORGON. Merciful God.

ASIA. And who made terror, madness, crime, remorse,
Which from the links of the great chain of things, 20
To every thought within the mind of man
Sway and drag heavily, and each one reels
Under the load towards the pit of death;³
Abandoned hope, and love that turns to hate;
And self-contempt, bitterer to drink than blood; 25
Pain, whose unheeded and familiar speech
Is howling, and keen shrieks, day after day;
And Hell, or the sharp fear of Hell?

DEMOGORGON. He reigns.⁴

ASIA. Utter his name. A world pining in pain
Asks but his name; curses shall drag him down. 30

DEMOGORGON. He reigns.

ASIA. I feel, I know it – who?

DEMOGORGON. He reigns.

ASIA. Who reigns? There was the Heaven and Earth⁵ at first,
And Light and Love; then Saturn, from whose throne
Time fell, an envious shadow;⁶ such the state
Of the earth's primal spirits beneath his sway, 35
As the calm joy of flowers and living leaves
Before the wind or sun has withered them,
And semivital worms; but he⁷ refused
The birthright of their being – knowledge, power,
The skill which wields the elements, the thought 40
Which pierces this dim universe like light,
Self-empire and the majesty of love –
For thirst of which they fainted. Then Prometheus
Gave wisdom, which is strength, to Jupiter,
And with this law alone, 'Let man be free', 45
Clothed him with the dominion of wide Heaven.
To know nor faith, nor love, nor law; to be
Omnipotent but friendless is to reign –
And Jove now reigned; for on the race of man
First famine, and then toil, and then disease, 50
Strife, wounds, and ghastly death unseen before,
Fell; and the unseasonable seasons⁸ drove,
With alternating shafts of frost and fire,
Their shelterless, pale tribes to mountain caves;
And in their desert⁹ hearts fierce wants¹⁰ he sent, 55
And mad disquietudes, and shadows idle
Of unreal good, which levied¹¹ mutual war,
So ruining the lair wherein they raged.
Prometheus saw, and waked the legioned hopes
Which sleep within folded Elysian¹² flowers, 60
Nepenthe, moly, amaranth,¹³ fadeless blooms,

That they might hide with thin and rainbow wings
 The shape of Death; and Love he sent to bind
 The disunited tendrils of that vine
 Which bears the wine of life, the human heart; 65
 And he tamed fire which, like some beast of chase
 Most terrible, but lovely, played beneath
 The frown of man; and tortured to his will
 Iron and gold, the slaves and signs of power,
 And gems and poisons, and all subtlest forms 70
 Hidden beneath the mountains and the waves.
 He gave man speech, and speech created thought,
 Which is the measure of the universe;
 And Science struck the thrones of Earth and Heaven,
 Which shook but fell not; and the harmonious mind 75
 Poured itself forth in all-prophetic song,
 And music lifted up the listening spirit
 Until it walked, exempt from mortal care,
 Godlike, o'er the clear billows of sweet sound;
 And human hands first mimicked and then mocked,¹⁴ 80
 With moulded limbs more lovely than its own,
 The human form, till marble grew divine,
 And mothers, gazing, drank the love men see
 Reflected in their race,¹⁵ behold, and perish.
 He told the hidden power of herbs and springs, 85
 And Disease drank and slept. Death grew like sleep.
 He taught the implicated¹⁶ orbits woven
 Of the wide-wandering stars,¹⁷ and how the sun
 Changes his lair,¹⁸ and by what secret spell
 The pale moon is transformed, when her broad eye 90
 Gazes not on the interlunar¹⁹ sea.
 He taught to rule, as life directs the limbs,
 The tempest-winged chariots of the Ocean,²⁰
 And the Celt knew the Indian. Cities then

Were built, and through their snow-like columns flowed 95
The warm winds, and the azure ether shone,
And the blue sea and shadowy hills were seen.
Such the alleviations of his state
Prometheus gave to man, for which he hangs
Withering in destined pain; but who rains down 100
Evil, the immedicable plague, which, while
Man looks on his creation like a God
And sees that it is glorious, drives him on,
The wreck of his own will, the scorn of earth,
The outcast, the abandoned, the alone? 105
Not Jove; while yet his frown shook Heaven – aye, when
His adversary from adamantine chains
Cursed him – he trembled like a slave. Declare
Who is his master? Is he too a slave?

DEMOGORGON. All spirits are enslaved which serve things evil;
110
Thou knowest if Jupiter be such or no.

ASIA. Whom calledst thou God?

DEMOGORGON. I spoke but as ye speak,
For Jove is the supreme of living things.

ASIA. Who is the master of the slave?

DEMOGORGON. If the abysm
Could vomit forth its secrets – but a voice 115
Is wanting, the deep truth is imageless; 21
For what would it avail to bid thee gaze
On the revolving world? What to bid speak
Fate, Time, Occasion, Chance, and Change? To these
All things are subject but eternal Love. 120

ASIA. So much I asked before, and my heart gave
The response thou hast given; and of such truths
Each to itself must be the oracle.
One more demand; and do thou answer me
As my own soul would answer, did it know 125
That which I ask. Prometheus shall arise
Henceforth the Sun of this rejoicing world:
When shall the destined hour arrive?

DEMOGORGON. Behold!²²

ASIA. The rocks are cloven,²³ and through the purple night
I see cars drawn by rainbow-winged steeds 130
Which trample the dim winds; in each there stands
A wild-eyed charioteer urging their flight.
Some look behind, as fiends pursued them there,
And yet I see no shapes but the keen stars;
Others, with burning eyes, lean forth, and drink 135
With eager lips the wind of their own speed,
As if the thing they loved fled on before,
And now, even now, they clasped it. Their bright locks
Stream like a comet's flashing hair – they all
Sweep onward.

DEMOGORGON. These are the immortal Hours, 140
Of whom thou didst demand. One waits for thee.

ASIA. A spirit with a dreadful countenance
Checks its dark chariot by the craggy gulf.
Unlike thy brethren, ghastly charioteer,
What art thou? Whither wouldst thou bear me? Speak! 145

SPIRIT. I am the shadow of a destiny
More dread than is my aspect; ere yon planet
Has set, the Darkness which ascends with me

Shall wrap in lasting night Heaven's kingless throne.

ASIA. What meanest thou?

PANTHEA. The terrible shadow²⁴ floats 150
Up from its throne, as may the lurid smoke
Of earthquake-ruined cities o'er the sea.
Lo! it ascends the car; the coursers fly
Terrified. Watch its path among the stars
Blackening the night!

ASIA. Thus I am answered; strange! 155

PANTHEA. See, near the verge,²⁵ another chariot stays;
An ivory shell inlaid with crimson fire
Which comes and goes within its sculptured rim
Of delicate strange tracery; the young spirit
That guides it has the dove-like eyes of hope; 160
How its soft smiles attract the soul! as light
Lures winged insects through the lampless air.

SPIRIT.

My coursers are fed with the lightning,²⁶
They drink of the whirlwind's stream,
And when the red morning is bright'ning 165
They bathe in the fresh sunbeam;
They have strength for their swiftness, I deem –
Then ascend with me, Daughter of Ocean.

I desire – and their speed makes night kindle;
I fear – they outstrip the typhoon; 170
Ere the cloud piled on Atlas can dwindle
We encircle the earth and the moon;
We shall rest from long labours ere noon –
Then ascend with me, Daughter of Ocean.

Act II, Scene IV

1*the meridian sun* the noonday sun.

2*neither limb...outline* cf. Milton's description of Death, Paradise Lost ii 668–9.

3*Which from the links...death* Shelley refers to the doctrine of the great chain of being by which England justified its monarchy and its rigidly hierarchical social system for centuries. As Peter Butter suggests, the image may be suggested by the sight of convicts chained together in Rome, which Shelley described to Peacock on 6 April 1819: 'In the square of St Peter's there are about 300 fettered criminals at work, hoeing out the weeds that grow between the stones of the pavement. Their legs are heavily ironed, and some are chained two by two. They sit in long rows hoeing out the weeds....Near them sit or saunter groups of soldiers armed with loaded muskets' (Jones ii 93).

4*He reigns* a statement that fails to identify the force that has taken over a world created by a benevolent deity. It could be Jupiter, or 'Almighty God', or some other force. Matthews suggests that Asia is interrogating herself, and the answers therefore reveal only what she already knows.

5*Heaven and Earth* Ouranos and Gaia, parents of Saturn and the other giants.

6*Saturn...envious shadow* The Greek name for Saturn was Kronos (time), which was therefore Saturn's 'shadow'.

7*he* Saturn.

8*unseasonable seasons* In the golden age perpetual spring reigned.

9*desert* abandoned, desolate.

10*fierce wants* desperate needs.

11 levied undertook.

12 Elysian heavenly; from the Elysian fields, where Greek heroes were believed to spend an afterlife in revelry.

13 Nepenthe is a grief-banishing drug; moly is the magic herb given by Hermes to Odysseus to counteract the poison of Circe; amaranth is an unfading flower.

14 mimicked...mocked imitated ... created forms more beautiful than the merely natural (i.e. idealized).

15 And mothers...race Pregnant women, gazing at the statues, gave birth to children like them, whose features reflect the passion with which the statues were made. Yeats reworks this idea in his poem, 'The Statues'.

16 implicated intertwined.

17 stars planets or comets.

18 lair position in the Zodiac.

19 interlunar between the old and the new moon.

20 chariots of the ocean boats.

21 the deep truth is imageless Neville Rogers offers a useful Platonic reading; Shelley at Work (2nd edn, Oxford, 1967), pp. 160–1.

22 Behold i.e. the destined hour has arrived.

23 The rocks are cloven volcanic eruption caused by the meeting of Demogorgon and the sea-sisters.

24 The terrible shadow Demogorgon.

25 verge horizon.

26 My coursers...lightning The chariot is fuelled by electricity from the sun.

ACT II, SCENE V

The car pauses within a cloud on the top of a snowy mountain. Asia, Panthea, and the Spirit of the Hour.

SPIRIT.

On the brink of the night and the morning
My coursers are wont to respire;¹
But the Earth has just whispered a warning
That their flight must be swifter than fire –
They shall drink the hot speed of desire! 5

ASIA. Thou breathest on their nostrils, but my breath
Would give them swifter speed.

SPIRIT. Alas, it could not.

PANTHEA. Oh Spirit, pause and tell whence is the light
Which fills the cloud? The sun is yet unrisen.

SPIRIT. The sun will rise not until noon.² Apollo 10
Is held in Heaven by wonder; and the light
Which fills this vapour, as the aerial hue
Of fountain-gazing roses fills the water,
Flows from thy mighty sister.³

PANTHEA. Yes, I feel –

ASIA. What is it with thee, sister? Thou art pale. 15

PANTHEA. How thou art changed! I dare not look on thee;
I feel, but see thee not. I scarce endure
The radiance of thy beauty. Some good change
Is working in the elements, which suffer
Thy presence thus unveiled. The Nereids⁴ tell 20
That on the day when the clear hyaline⁵
Was cloven at thine uprise, and thou didst stand
Within a veined shell,⁶ which floated on
Over the calm floor of the crystal sea,
Among the Aegean isles, and by the shores 25
Which bear thy name – love, like the atmosphere
Of the sun's fire filling the living world,
Burst from thee, and illumined Earth and Heaven
And the deep Ocean and the sunless caves
And all that dwells within them; till grief cast 30
Eclipse upon the soul from which it came:
Such art thou now; nor is it I alone,
Thy sister, thy companion, thine own chosen one,
But the whole world which seeks thy sympathy.
Hearest thou not sounds i' the air which speak the love 35
Of all articulate beings? Feelest thou not
The inanimate winds enamoured of thee? List!

(Music)

ASIA. Thy words are sweeter than aught else but his
Whose echoes they are – yet all love is sweet,
Given or returned. Common as light is love, 40
And its familiar voice wearies not ever.
Like the wide Heaven, the all-sustaining air,
It makes the reptile equal to the God:
They who inspire it most are fortunate,
As I am now; but those who feel it most 45
Are happier still, after long sufferings,
As I shall soon become.

PANTHEA. List! Spirits speak.

VOICE (in the air, singing)⁷

Life of Life! thy lips enkindle

With their love the breath between them;
And thy smiles before they dwindle 50

Make the cold air fire; then screen them
In those looks, where whoso gazes
Faints, entangled in their mazes.

Child of Light! thy limbs are burning

Through the vest which seems to hide them, 55
As the radiant lines of morning

Through the clouds ere they divide them;
And this atmosphere divinest
Shrouds thee wheresoe'er thou shinest.

Fair are others; none beholds thee, 60

But thy voice sounds low and tender
Like the fairest, for it folds thee

From the sight, that liquid splendour,
And all feel, yet see thee never,
As I feel now, lost forever! 65

Lamp of Earth! where'er thou movest

Its dim shapes are clad with brightness,
And the souls of whom thou lovest

Walk upon the winds with lightness,
Till they fail, as I am failing, 70
Dizzy, lost, yet unbewailing!

ASIA.

My soul is an enchanted boat,
Which, like a sleeping swan, doth float
Upon the silver waves of thy sweet singing;

And thine doth like an angel sit 75
Beside the helm conducting it,
Whilst all the winds with melody are ringing.
It seems to float ever, forever,
Upon that many-winding river,
Between mountains, woods, abysses, 80
A paradise of wildernesses!
Till, like one in slumber bound,
Borne to the ocean, I float down, around,
Into a sea profound of ever-spreading sound.

Meanwhile thy spirit lifts its pinions 85
In music's most serene dominions,
Catching the winds that fan that happy Heaven.
And we sail on, away, afar,
Without a course, without a star,
But by the instinct of sweet music driven, 90
Till through Elysian garden islets
By thee, most beautiful of pilots,
Where never mortal pinnacle glided,
The boat of my desire is guided:
Realms where the air we breathe is love, 95
Which in the winds and on the waves doth move,
Harmonizing this earth with what we feel above.

We have passed Age's icy caves,
And Manhood's dark and tossing waves,
And Youth's smooth ocean, smiling to betray: 100
Beyond the glassy gulfs we flee
Of shadow-peopled Infancy,
Through death and birth to a diviner day⁸ –
A paradise of vaulted bowers
Lit by downward-gazing flowers, 105
And watery paths that wind between
Wildernesses calm and green,

Peopled by shapes too bright to see,
And rest, having beheld – somewhat like thee,
Which walk upon the sea and chaunt melodiously!⁹ 110

² The sun...until noon All morning the sun is obscured by volcanic ash thrown into the atmosphere.

³ the light...sister Asia emanates light, as a revelation of what she essentially is.

⁴ Nereids sea-nymphs, daughters of Nereus.

⁵ hyaline glassy, transparent sea.

⁶ thou didst stand...shell Asia is identified with Aphrodite, the goddess of love, who came floating on a shell to land on the island of Cythera.

⁷ This is the voice of Prometheus.

⁸ Beyond the glassy gulfs...day Asia and Prometheus travel into the world of pre-existence, described by Wordsworth in his ‘Ode’ (p. 549).

⁹ Peopled by shapes...melodiously The inhabitants of the realm of pre-existence are too bright to see at first, but now that Asia and Prometheus have got used to it, Asia sees that Prometheus is the same kind of being as the others, and that they both belong there.

ACT III, SCENE I

Heaven. Jupiter on his throne; Thetis and the other deities assembled.

JUPITER. Ye congregated powers of Heaven, who share
The glory and the strength of him ye serve,
Rejoice! Henceforth I am omnipotent.
All else had been subdued to me; alone
The soul of man, like unextinguished fire, 5
Yet burns towards Heaven with fierce reproach, and doubt,
And lamentation, and reluctant prayer –
Hurling up insurrection, which might make
Our antique empire insecure, though built
On eldest faith, and Hell's coeval, ¹ fear. 10
And though my curses through the pendulous air, ²
Like snow on herbless peaks, fall flake by flake
And cling to it; ³ though under my wrath's night
It climb the crags of life, step after step,
Which wound it, as ice wounds unsandalled feet, 15
It yet remains supreme o'er misery,
Aspiring, unrepressed, yet soon to fall.
Even now have I begotten a strange wonder,
That fatal child, the terror of the earth, ⁴
Who waits but till the destined Hour arrive, 20
Bearing from Demogorgon's vacant throne
The dreadful might of ever-living limbs
Which clothed that awful spirit unbeheld,
To redescend and trample out the spark.
Pour forth Heaven's wine, Idaean Ganymede, ⁵ 25
And let it fill the daedal ⁶ cups like fire;
And from the flower-inwoven soil divine
Ye all-triumphant harmonies arise,
As dew from earth under the twilight stars.
Drink! Be the nectar circling through your veins 30
The soul of joy, ye ever-living Gods,
Till exultation burst in one wide voice
Like music from Elysian winds!

And thou

Ascend beside me, veiled in the light
 Of the desire which makes thee one with me, 35
 Thetis,⁷ bright image of eternity!
 When thou didst cry, 'Insufferable might!
 God! Spare me! I sustain not the quick flames,
 The penetrating presence;⁸ all my being (Like him whom the Numidian seps did thaw 40
 Into a dew with poison)⁹ is dissolved,
 Sinking through its foundations' – even then
 Two mighty spirits, mingling, made a third
 Mightier than either, which unbodied now
 Between us floats, felt although unbeheld, 45
 Waiting the incarnation which ascends
 (Hear ye the thunder of the fiery wheels
 Griding¹⁰ the winds?) from Demogorgon's throne.
 Victory! Victory! Feel'st thou not, oh World,
 The earthquake of his chariot thundering up 50
 Olympus?

(The car of the Hour arrives. Demogorgon descends, and moves towards the throne of Jupiter.)

Awful shape, what art thou? Speak!

DEMOGORGON. Eternity. Demand no direr name.
 Descend, and follow me down the abyss.
 I am thy child, as thou wert Saturn's child,
 Mightier than thee: and we must dwell together 55
 Henceforth in darkness. Lift thy lightnings not.
 The tyranny of Heaven none may retain,
 Or reassume, or hold, succeeding thee;
 Yet if thou wilt (as 'tis the destiny
 Of trodden worms to writhe till they are dead), 60
 Put forth thy might.

JUPITER. Detested prodigy!

Even thus beneath the deep Titanian prisons¹¹
I trample thee! Thou lingerest?

Mercy! Mercy!

No pity, no release, no respite! Oh,
That thou wouldst make mine enemy my judge, 65
Even where he hangs, seared by my long revenge,
On Caucasus! He would not doom me thus.
Gentle, and just, and dreadless, is he not
The monarch of the world? What then art thou?
No refuge! No appeal!

Sink with me then; 70

We two will sink on the wide waves of ruin,
Even as a vulture and a snake outspent
Drop, twisted in inextricable fight,
Into a shoreless sea. Let Hell unlock
Its mounded oceans of tempestuous fire, 75
And whelm¹² on them into the bottomless void
The desolated world, and thee, and me,
The conqueror and the conquered, and the wreck
Of that for which they combated.

Ai! Ai!

The elements obey me not. I sink 80
Dizzily down – ever, forever, down –
And, like a cloud, mine enemy above
Darkens my fall with victory! Ai! Ai!

Act III, Scene I

¹*coeval* contemporary. Fear and faith enable Jupiter to retain power.

²*pendulous air* The air hangs; cf. King Lear III iv 69.

³*it* i.e. the soul of man, as in line 16.

4 That fatal child, the terror of the earth Jupiter's rape of Thetis produced Demogorgon.

5 A shepherd-boy from Mt Ida, Ganyমেদে was abducted to satisfy Jupiter's lust and be his cup-bearer.

6 daedal beautifully crafted.

7 Thetis was the daughter of Nereus, a sea-god.

8 Semele was consumed by fire when she tricked Jupiter into appearing in his own undisguised form.

9 Sabellus dissolved when bitten by a seps (a legendary snake) in the Numidian desert.

10 Griding grating against.

11 the deep Titanian prisons after their overthrow by Jupiter, the Titans were imprisoned in Tartarus, far below the earth.

12 whelm throw violently.

ACT III, SCENE II

*The mouth of a great river in the island Atlantis.*1 Ocean2 is discovered reclining near the shore; Apollo stands beside him.

OCEAN. He fell, thou sayest, beneath his conqueror's frown?

APOLLO. Aye, when the strife was ended which made dim

The orb I rule,3 and shook the solid stars.4

The terrors of his eye illumined Heaven

With sanguine light through the thick ragged skirts 5

Of the victorious Darkness, as he fell,

Like the last glare of day's red agony,

Which from a rent among the fiery clouds
Burns far along the tempest-wrinkled deep.

OCEAN. He sunk to the abyss? To the dark void? 10

APOLLO. An eagle so,⁵ caught in some bursting cloud
On Caucasus, his thunder-baffled wings
Entangled in the whirlwind, and his eyes,
Which gazed on the undazzling sun, now blinded
By the white lightning, while the ponderous hail 15
Beats on his struggling form, which sinks at length
Prone, and the aerial ice clings over it.

OCEAN. Henceforth the fields of Heaven-reflecting sea
Which are my realm, will heave, unstained with blood,
Beneath the uplifting winds, like plains of corn 20
Swayed by the summer air; my streams will flow
Round many-peopled continents, and round
Fortunate isles; and from their glassy thrones
Blue Proteus⁶ and his humid nymphs shall mark
The shadow of fair ships – as mortals see 25
The floating bark of the light-laden moon⁷
With that white star,⁸ its sightless pilot's crest,
Borne down the rapid sunset's ebbing sea –
Tracking their path no more by blood and groans,
And desolation, and the mingled voice 30
Of slavery and command, but by the light
Of wave-reflected flowers, and floating odours,
And music soft, and mild, free, gentle voices,
That sweetest music, such as spirits love.

APOLLO. And I shall gaze not on the deeds which make 35
My mind obscure with sorrow, as eclipse
Darkens the sphere I guide; but list, I hear

The small, clear, silver lute of the young spirit
That sits in the morning star.⁹

OCEAN. Thou must away?
Thy steeds will pause at even, till when farewell. 40
The loud deep calls me home even now, to feed it
With azure calm out of the emerald urns
Which stand forever full beside my throne.
Behold the Nereids under the green sea –
Their wavering limbs borne on the wind-like streams, 45
Their white arms lifted o'er their streaming hair
With garlands pied and starry sea-flower crowns –
Hastening to grace their mighty sister's joy.
 (a sound of waves is heard)
It is the unpastured¹⁰ sea hungering for calm.
Peace, monster; I come now. Farewell.

APOLLO. Farewell 50

Act III, Scene II

¹*Atlantis* legendary sunken city west of the Straits of Gibraltar, believed by Plato to be the home of an ideal commonwealth.

²Ocean was god of the sea.

³*The orb I rule* Apollo was the Greek god of the sun.

⁴*solid stars* fixed stars.

⁵*An eagle so* i.e. 'Yes, he sank like an eagle ...'

⁶*Blue Proteus* elusive sea-god, able to change his shape at will.

⁷*the light-laden moon* the new moon (full of light).

8 that white star Venus, the evening star.

9 I hear...star It is time for the sun to rise. All the events thus far have taken place during a single dawn.

10 unpastured unfed.

ACT III, SCENE III

*Caucasus. Prometheus, Hercules, Ione, the Earth, Spirits, Asia, and Panthea, borne in the car with the Spirit of the Hour. Hercules unbinds Prometheus, who descends.*1

HERCULES. Most glorious among spirits, thus doth strength
To wisdom, courage, and long-suffering love,
And thee, who art the form they animate,
Minister like a slave.

PROMETHEUS. Thy gentle words
Are sweeter even than freedom long desired 5
And long delayed.
Asia, thou light of life,
Shadow of beauty unbeheld; and ye,
Fair sister nymphs, who made long years of pain
Sweet to remember, through your love and care –
Henceforth we will not part. There is a cave, 10
All overgrown with trailing odorous2 plants
Which curtain out the day with leaves and flowers,
And paved with veined emerald; and a fountain
Leaps in the midst with an awakening sound.
From its curved roof the mountain's frozen tears, 15
Like snow, or silver, or long diamond spires,
Hang downward, raining forth a doubtful light;
And there is heard the ever-moving air
Whispering without from tree to tree, and birds
And bees; and all around are mossy seats, 20

And the rough walls are clothed with long soft grass –
A simple dwelling which shall be our own,
Where we will sit and talk of time and change
As the world ebbs and flows, ourselves unchanged.
What can hide man from mutability? 25
And if ye sigh, then I will smile; and thou,
Ione, shall chant fragments of sea-music
Until I weep, when ye shall smile away
The tears she brought, which yet were sweet to shed.
We will entangle buds and flowers and beams 30
Which twinkle on the fountain's brim, and make
Strange combinations out of common things,
Like human babes in their brief innocence;
And we will search, with looks and words of love,
For hidden thoughts, each lovelier than the last, 35
Our unexhausted spirits, and, like lutes
Touched by the skill of the enamoured wind,
Weave harmonies divine, yet ever new,
From difference sweet where discord cannot be.
And hither come – sped on the charmèd winds 40
Which meet from all the points of Heaven, as bees
From every flower aerial Enna³ feeds
At their known island-homes in Himera⁴ –
The echoes of the human world, which tell
Of the low voice of love, almost unheard, 45
And dove-eyed pity's murmured pain, and music,
Itself the echo of the heart, and all
That tempers or improves man's life, now free.
And lovely apparitions, dim at first,
Then radiant – as the mind, arising bright 50
From the embrace of beauty (whence the forms
Of which these are the phantoms) casts on them
The gathered rays which are reality –
Shall visit us, the progeny immortal
Of Painting, Sculpture, and rapt Poesy, 55

And arts, though unimagined, yet to be.
The wandering voices and the shadows these
Of all that man becomes, the mediators⁵
Of that best worship, Love, by him and us
Given and returned; swift shapes and sounds which grow 60
More fair and soft as man grows wise and kind,
And veil by veil, evil and error fall.⁶
Such virtue has the cave and place around. (Turning to the Spirit of the Hour)

For thee, fair Spirit, one toil remains. Ione,
Give her that curved shell which Proteus old 65
Made Asia's nuptial boon, breathing within it
A voice to be accomplished, and which thou
Didst hide in grass under the hollow rock.

IONE. Thou most desired Hour, more loved and lovely
Than all thy sisters, this is the mystic shell; 70
See the pale azure fading into silver,
Lining it with a soft yet glowing light –
Looks it not like lulled music sleeping there?

SPIRIT. It seems in truth the fairest shell of Ocean;
Its sound must be at once both sweet and strange. 75

PROMETHEUS. Go, borne over the cities of mankind
On whirlwind-footed coursers – once again
Outspeed the sun around the orb'd world;
And as thy chariot cleaves the kindling air,
Thou breathe into the many-folded shell, 80
Loosening its mighty music; it shall be
As thunder mingled with clear echoes. Then
Return, and thou shalt dwell beside our cave.
And thou, oh Mother Earth –

THE EARTH. I hear, I feel;

Thy lips are on me, and their touch runs down 85
Even to the adamantine central gloom
Along these marble nerves – 'tis life, 'tis joy,
And through my withered, old, and icy frame
The warmth of an immortal youth shoots down,
Circling. Henceforth the many children fair 90
Folded in my sustaining arms – all plants
And creeping forms, and insects rainbow-winged,
And birds, and beasts, and fish, and human shapes,
Which drew disease and pain from my wan bosom,
Draining the poison of despair – shall take 95
And interchange sweet nutriment; to me
Shall they become like sister-antelopes
By one fair dam, snow-white and swift as wind,
Nursed among lilies near a brimming stream.
The dew-mists of my sunless sleep shall float 100
Under the stars like balm; night-folded flowers
Shall suck unwithering hues in their repose;
And men and beasts in happy dreams shall gather
Strength for the coming day and all its joy;
And death shall be the last embrace of her 105
Who takes the life she gave, even as a mother
Folding her child, says, 'Leave me not again.'

ASIA. Oh mother, wherefore speak the name of death?
Cease they to love, and move, and breathe, and speak,
Who die?

THE EARTH. It would avail not to reply: 110
Thou art immortal, and this tongue is known
But to the uncommunicating dead.
Death is the veil which those who live call life:
They sleep, and it is lifted; 7 and meanwhile
In mild variety the seasons mild – 115
With rainbow-skirted showers, and odorous winds,

And long blue meteors cleansing the dull night,
And the life-kindling shafts of the keen sun's
All-piercing bow, and the dew-mingled rain
Of the calm moonbeams, a soft influence mild – 120
Shall clothe the forests and the fields, aye, even
The crag-built deserts of the barren deep
With ever-living leaves, and fruits, and flowers.
And thou!⁸ There is a cavern where my spirit
Was panted forth in anguish whilst thy pain 125
Made my heart mad, and those who did inhale it
Became mad too, and built a temple there,
And spoke, and were oracular,⁹ and lured
The erring nations round to mutual war
And faithless faith, such as Jove kept with thee – 130
Which breath now rises, as among tall weeds
A violet's exhalation, and it fills
With a serener light and crimson air
Intense, yet soft, the rocks and woods around;
It feeds the quick growth of the serpent vine, 135
And the dark linked ivy tangling wild,
And budding, blown, or odour-faded blooms
Which star the winds with points of coloured light
As they rain through them, and bright golden globes
Of fruit, suspended in their own green heaven, 140
And, through their veined leaves and amber stems
The flowers whose purple and translucent bowls
Stand ever mantling with aerial dew,
The drink of spirits. And it circles round,
Like the soft waving wings of noonday dreams, 145
Inspiring calm and happy thoughts like mine,
Now thou art thus restored. This cave is thine.
Arise, appear! (A spirit rises in the likeness of a winged child.)
This is my torch-bearer,
Who let his lamp out in old time with gazing
On eyes from which he kindled it anew 150

With love, which is as fire, sweet daughter mine,
 For such is that within thine own. Run, wayward!
 And guide this company beyond the peak
 Of Bacchic Nysa,¹⁰ maenad-haunted mountain,
 And beyond Indus and its tribute rivers, 155
 Trampling the torrent streams and glassy lakes
 With feet unwet, unwearied, undelaying;
 And up the green ravine, across the vale,
 Beside the windless and crystalline pool,
 Where ever lies, on unerasing waves, 160
 The image of a temple,¹¹ built above,
 Distinct with column, arch, and architrave,
 And palm-like capital, and over-wrought,
 And populous with most living imagery –
 Praxitelean shapes,¹² whose marble smiles 165
 Fill the hushed air with everlasting love.
 It is deserted now, but once it bore
 Thy name, Prometheus; there the emulous youths
 Bore to thy honour through the divine gloom
 The lamp which was thine emblem¹³ – even as those 170
 Who bear the untransmitted torch of hope
 Into the grave, across the night of life,
 As thou hast borne it most triumphantly
 To this far goal of time. Depart – farewell.
 Beside that temple is the destined cave. 175

Act III, Scene III

¹According to legend, Hercules killed the eagle torturing Prometheus and freed him after Prometheus had made his peace with Jupiter.

²*odor*ous fragrant.

3 Enna town in the middle of Sicily, an emblem of fertility. Shelley recalls Paradise Lost iv 269.

4 Himera town on the north coast of Sicily.

5 mediators Man's works of art are the mediators of love between him and Prometheus.

6 evil and error fall Shelley regards human nature as progressive.

7 They sleep...lifted cf. 'Mont Blanc' 50: 'death is slumber.'

8 And thou! Earth turns from Asia to Prometheus.

9 a temple...oracular perhaps the temple at Delphi, where the priestess uttered prophecies in a state of ecstasy – although Shelley's meaning could be metaphorical.

10 They are to be guided from the Indian Caucasus to Greece, passing Nysa (a city in India), where Bacchus was born.

11 a temple the Academy outside Athens where Plato once taught.

12 Praxitelean shapes i.e. statues carved by Praxiteles, Greek sculptor of the fourth century BCE, famous for his depictions of Artemis and Aphrodite. In Rome, March 1819, Shelley saw the statues of Castor and Pollux believed to have been made by Praxiteles: 'These figures combine the irresistible energy with the sublime and perfect loveliness supposed to have belonged to the divine nature' (Jones ii 88–9).

13 there the...emblem In the Athenian festival in honour of the fire-gods, young men raced from the altar of Prometheus to the city, carrying lighted torches, without letting them go out.

ACT III, SCENE IV

A forest. In the background a cave. Prometheus, Asia, Panthea, Ione, and the Spirit of the Earth.

IONE. Sister, it is not earthly: how it glides
Under the leaves! How on its head there burns
A light, like a green star whose emerald beams
Are twined with its fair hair! How, as it moves,
The splendour drops in flakes upon the grass! 5
Knowest thou it?

PANTHEA. It is the delicate spirit
That guides the earth through Heaven. From afar
The populous constellations call that light
The loveliest of the planets; and sometimes
It floats along the spray of the salt sea, 10
Or makes its chariot of a foggy cloud,
Or walks through fields or cities while men sleep,
Or o'er the mountain-tops, or down the rivers,
Or through the green waste wilderness, as now,
Wondering at all it sees. Before Jove reigned 15
It loved our sister Asia, and it came
Each leisure hour to drink the liquid light
Out of her eyes, for which it said it thirsted
As one bit by a dipsas;¹ and with her
It made its childish confidence, and told her 20
All it had known or seen, for it saw much,
Yet idly reasoned what it saw; and called her
(For whence it sprung it knew not, nor do I)
'Mother, dear mother'.

THE SPIRIT OF THE EARTH (running to Asia)

Mother, dearest mother;
May I then talk with thee as I was wont? 25
May I then hide my eyes in thy soft arms
After thy looks have made them tired of joy?
May I then play beside thee the long noons

When work is none in the bright silent air?

ASIA. I love thee, gentlest being, and henceforth 30
Can cherish thee unenvied; speak, I pray –
Thy simple talk once solaced, now delights.

SPIRIT OF THE EARTH. Mother, I am grown wiser, though a child
Cannot be wise like thee, within this day,
And happier too – happier and wiser both. 35
Thou knowest that toads, and snakes, and loathly worms,
And venomous and malicious beasts, and boughs
That bore ill berries in the woods, were ever
An hindrance to my walks o'er the green world;
And that, among the haunts of humankind, 40
Hard-featured men, or with proud, angry looks,
Or cold, staid gait, or false and hollow smiles,
Or the dull sneer of self-loved ignorance,
Or other such foul masks, with which ill thoughts
Hide that fair being whom we spirits call man; 45
And women too, ugliest of all things evil
(Though fair, even in a world where thou art fair
When good and kind, free and sincere like thee),
When false or frowning made me sick at heart
To pass them, though they slept, and I unseen. 50
Well, my path lately lay through a great city
Into the woody hills surrounding it.
A sentinel was sleeping at the gate,
When there was heard a sound so loud, it shook
The towers amid the moonlight, yet more sweet 55
Than any voice but thine, sweetest of all;
A long, long sound, as it would never end –
And all the inhabitants leapt suddenly
Out of their rest, and gathered in the streets,
Looking in wonder up to Heaven, while yet 60
The music pealed along. I hid myself
Within a fountain in the public square,

Where I lay like the reflex² of the moon
Seen in a wave under green leaves – and soon
Those ugly human shapes and visages 65
Of which I spoke as having wrought me pain,
Passed floating through the air, and fading still
Into the winds that scattered them; and those
From whom they passed seemed mild and lovely forms
After some foul disguise had fallen, and all 70
Were somewhat changed, and after brief surprise
And greetings of delighted wonder, all
Went to their sleep again; and when the dawn
Came – wouldst thou think that toads, and snakes, and efts,³
Could e'er be beautiful? Yet so they were, 75
And that with little change of shape or hue:
All things had put their evil nature off.
I cannot tell my joy, when o'er a lake,
Upon a drooping bough with nightshade twined,
I saw two azure halcyons clinging downward 80
And thinning one bright bunch of amber berries
With quick long beaks,⁴ and in the deep there lay
Those lovely forms imaged as in a sky.
So with my thoughts full of these happy changes,
We meet again, the happiest change of all. 85

ASIA. And never will we part, till thy chaste sister⁵
Who guides the frozen and inconstant moon,
Will look on thy more warm and equal light
Till her heart thaw like flakes of April snow,
And love thee.

SPIRIT OF THE EARTH. What? As Asia loves Prometheus? 90

ASIA. Peace, wanton!⁶ Thou are yet not old enough.
Think ye by gazing on each other's eyes

To multiply your lovely selves, and fill
With sphered fires the interlunar air?

SPIRIT OF THE EARTH. Nay, mother, while my sister trims her
lamp⁷ 95

'Tis hard I should go darkling.⁸

ASIA. Listen, look! (The Spirit of the Hour enters.)

PROMETHEUS. We feel what thou hast heard and seen – yet speak.

SPIRIT OF THE HOUR. Soon as the sound had ceased whose thunder filled

The abysses of the sky and the wide earth
There was a change: the impalpable thin air 100

And the all-circling sunlight were transformed,
As if the sense of love dissolved in them
Had folded itself round the sphered world.

My vision then grew clear, and I could see
Into the mysteries of the universe: 105
Dizzy as with delight I floated down;

Winnowing⁹ the lightsome air with languid plumes
My coursers sought their birthplace in the sun,
Where they henceforth will live exempt from toil,
Pasturing flowers of vegetable fire, 110

And where my moonlike car¹⁰ will stand within
A temple – gazed upon by Phidian forms¹¹
Of thee, and Asia, and the Earth, and me,
And you fair nymphs, looking the love we feel,
In memory of the tidings it has borne – 115

Beneath a dome fretted¹² with graven flowers,¹³
Poised on twelve columns of resplendent stone,
And open to the bright and liquid sky.
Yoked to it by an amphisbaenic snake
The likeness of those winged steeds will mock 120

The flight from which they find repose. Alas!
Whither has wandered now my partial tongue
When all remains untold which ye would hear?
As I have said, I floated to the earth:
It was, as it is still, the pain of bliss 125
To move, to breathe, to be; I wandering went
Among the haunts and dwellings of mankind,
And first was disappointed not to see
Such mighty change as I had felt within Expressed in outward things. But soon I looked, 130
And behold! thrones were kingless, and men walked
One with the other even as spirits do –
None fawned, none trampled; hate, disdain, or fear,
Self-love or self-contempt, on human brows
No more inscribed, as o'er the gate of Hell, 135
'All hope abandon, ye who enter here';¹⁴
None frowned, none trembled, none with eager fear
Gazed on another's eye of cold command
Until the subject of a tyrant's will
Became, worse fate, the abject of his own,¹⁵ 140
Which spurred him, like an outspent horse, to death;
None wrought his lips in truth-entangling lines
Which smiled the lie his tongue disdained to speak;
None, with firm sneer, trod out in his own heart
The sparks of love and hope, till there remained 145
Those bitter ashes, a soul self-consumed,
And the wretch crept, a vampire among men,
Infecting all with his own hideous ill;
None talked that common, false, cold, hollow talk
Which makes the heart deny the 'yes' it breathes, 150
Yet question that unmeant hypocrisy
Which such a self-mistrust as has no name.
And women, too – frank, beautiful, and kind
As the free Heaven which rains fresh light and dew
On the wide earth, passed – gentle radiant forms, 155

From custom's evil taint exempt and pure,
Speaking the wisdom once they could not think,
Looking emotions once they feared to feel,
And changed to all which once they dared not be,
Yet being now, made earth like Heaven; nor pride, 160
Nor jealousy, nor envy, nor ill shame,
The bitterest of those drops of treasured gall,
Spoilt the sweet taste of the nepenthe,¹⁶ love.
Thrones, altars, judgement-seats¹⁷ and prisons (wherein,
And beside which, by wretched men were borne 165
Sceptres, tiaras, swords and chains, and tomes
Of reasoned wrong glozed on¹⁸ by ignorance)
Were like those monstrous and barbaric shapes,¹⁹
The ghosts of a no more remembered fame
Which, from their unworn obelisks,²⁰ look forth 170
In triumph o'er the palaces and tombs
Of those who were their conquerors, mouldering round.
These²¹ imaged to the pride of kings and priests
A dark yet mighty faith, a power as wide
As is the world it wasted, and are now 175
But an astonishment; even so the tools
And emblems of its last captivity,
Amid the dwellings of the peopled earth,
Stand, not o'erthrown, but unregarded now.
And those foul shapes,²² abhorred by God and man – 180
Which, under many a name and many a form
Strange, savage, ghastly, dark and execrable,
Were Jupiter, the tyrant of the world;
And which the nations, panic-stricken, served
With blood, and hearts broken by long hope, and love 185
Dragged to his altars soiled and garlandless,
And slain amid men's unreclaiming tears,
Flattering the thing they feared, which fear was hate –

Frown,²³ mouldering fast, o'er their abandoned shrines.
The painted veil, by those who were, called life, 190
Which mimicked, as with colours idly spread,
All men believed and hoped, is torn aside;
The loathsome mask has fallen, the man remains
Sceptreless, free, uncircumscribed – but man:
Equal, unclassed, tribeless, and nationless, 195
Exempt from awe, worship, degree; the king
Over himself; just, gentle, wise – but man.
Passionless? No, yet free from guilt or pain,
Which were, for his will made, or suffered them;
Nor yet exempt, though ruling them like slaves, 200
From chance, and death, and mutability,
The clogs²⁴ of that which else might oversoar
The loftiest star of unascended Heaven,
Pinnacled dim in the intense inane.²⁵

Act III, Scene IV

¹*dipsas* serpent which induced an unquenchable thirst in those it bit.

²*reflex* reflection.

³*efts* small lizards. Everything is returning to a prelapsarian state.

⁴*Upon a drooping bough...beaks* In the regenerated, purified world, deadly nightshade is no longer poisonous, and kingfishers turn vegetarian rather than eat fish. (Shelley was a vegetarian.)

⁵*thy chaste sister* Selene, Greek goddess of the moon.

⁶*wanton* spoiled child.

⁷*trims her lamp* When trimming a lamp, one prepares the wick for fresh burning.

8 darkling in the dark.

9 Winnowing beating.

10 car chariot.

11 Phidian forms statues carved by Phidias, Greek sculptor of the fifth century BCE, famous for his portrayal of Jupiter at Olympia.

12 fretted decorated.

13 The scene described is based on the Pantheon at Rome and the Sala della Biga in the Vatican, both of which Shelley visited. The Biga is a two-horse chariot, the emblem of the moon. Its yoke was a snake with a head at both ends, the amphisbaena.

14 All hope abandon, ye who enter here The inscription above the gate leading to hell in Dante, Inferno iii 9.

15 the abject of his own the outcast of his own will.

16 nepenthe grief-banishing drink.

17 judgement-seats tribunals.

18 glozed on explained, glossed.

19 monstrous and barbaric shapes i.e. of Egyptian deities, carved into the obelisks. In Shelley's day hieroglyphics seemed monstrous and barbarous because they had not then been deciphered.

20 obelisks Egyptian obelisks had been brought to Rome in ancient times and erected in the main piazzas, where Shelley saw them.

21 These i.e. the 'monstrous and barbaric shapes' (l. 168).

22 those foul shapes i.e. of religions that rule by fear.

23 Frown the subject governing this verb is 'shapes' (l. 180).

24 clogs hindrances.

25 intense inane deep space.

ACT IV

Scene: a part of the forest near the Cave of Prometheus. Panthea and Ione are sleeping; they awaken gradually during the first song.

VOICE OF UNSEEN SPIRITS.

The pale stars are gone!
For the sun, their swift shepherd,
To their folds them compelling
In the depths of the dawn,
Hastes, in meteor-eclipsing array, and they flee 5
Beyond his blue dwelling,
As fawns flee the leopard.

But where are ye?

(A train of dark forms and shadows passes by confusedly, singing.)

Here, oh, here;
We bear the bier 10
Of the father of many a cancelled year!
Spectres we
Of the dead Hours be,
We bear Time to his tomb in eternity.

Strew, oh strew 15
Hair, not yew!
Wet the dusty pall with tears, not dew!
Be the faded flowers
Of Death's bare bowers
Spread on the corpse of the King of Hours! 20

Haste, oh haste!
As shades are chased,
Trembling, by day, from heaven's blue waste,
We melt away,
Like dissolving spray, 25
From the children of a diviner day,

With the lullaby

Of winds that die
On the bosom of their own harmony.

IONE. What dark forms were they? 30

PANTHEA. The past Hours weak and grey,
With the spoil which their toil
Raked together
From the conquest but One¹ could foil.

IONE. Have they passed?

PANTHEA. They have passed; 35
They outspeeded the blast,
While 'tis said, they are fled –

IONE. Whither, oh whither?

PANTHEA. To the dark, to the past, to the dead.

VOICE OF UNSEEN SPIRIT.

Bright clouds float in Heaven, 40
Dew-stars gleam on earth,
Waves assemble on ocean –
They are gathered and driven
By the storm of delight, by the panic of glee!
They shake with emotion, 45
They dance in their mirth –
But where are ye?²
The pine boughs are singing
Old songs with new gladness,
The billows and fountains 50
Fresh music are flinging,

Like the notes of a spirit from land and from sea;
The storms mock the mountains
With the thunder of gladness –
But where are ye? 55

IONE. What charioteers are these?

PANTHEA. Where are their chariots?

SEMICHORUS OF HOURS I.

The voice of the Spirits of Air and of Earth
Has drawn back the figured³ curtain of sleep
Which covered our being and darkened our birth
In the deep –

A VOICE.

In the deep?

SEMICHORUS II.

Oh, below the deep. 60

SEMICHORUS I.

A hundred ages⁴ we had been kept
Cradled in visions of hate and care,
And each one who waked as his brother slept,
Found the truth –

SEMICHORUS II.

Worse than his visions were!

SEMICHORUS I.

We have heard the lute of Hope in sleep; 65
We have known the voice of Love in dreams;
We have felt the wand of Power, and leap –

SEMICHORUS II.

As the billows leap in the morning beams!

CHORUS.

Weave the dance on the floor of the breeze,
Pierce with song heaven's silent light, 70
Enchant the Day that too swiftly flees,
To check its flight ere the cave of Night.

Once the hungry Hours were hounds
Which chased the Day like a bleeding deer,
And it limped and stumbled with many wounds 75
Through the nightly dells of the desert year.

But now, oh weave the mystic measure
Of music and dance and shapes of light;
Let the Hours, and the spirits of might and pleasure,
Like the clouds and sunbeams, unite.

PANTHEA. See, where the Spirits of the human mind⁵
Wrapped in sweet sounds, as in bright veils, approach.

CHORUS OF SPIRITS.

We join the throng
Of the dance and the song,
By the whirlwind of gladness borne along – 85
As the flying-fish leap
From the Indian deep,
And mix with the sea-birds, half asleep.

CHORUS OF HOURS.

Whence come ye, so wild and so fleet,
For sandals of lightning are on your feet, 90
And your wings are soft and swift as thought,
And your eyes are as love which is veiled not?

CHORUS OF SPIRITS.

We come from the mind
Of humankind,
Which was late so dusk,⁶ and obscene, and blind; 95
Now 'tis an ocean
Of clear emotion,
A Heaven of serene and mighty motion;

From that deep abyss
Of wonder and bliss, 100
Whose caverns are crystal palaces;
From those skyey towers
Where Thought's crowned powers
Sit watching your dance, ye happy Hours;

From the dim recesses 105
Of woven caresses,
Where lovers catch ye by your loose tresses;
From the azure isles
Where sweet Wisdom smiles,
Delaying your ships with her siren wiles; 110

From the temples high
Of man's ear and eye,
Roofed over Sculpture and Poesy;
From the murmurings
Of the unsealed springs, 115
Where Science⁷ bedews her daedal⁸ wings.

Years after years,
Through blood and tears
And a thick hell of hatreds, and hopes, and fears,
We waded and flew, 120
And the islets were few
Where the bud-blighted flowers of happiness grew.

Our feet now, every palm,⁹
Are sandalled with calm,
And the dew of our wings is a rain of balm; 125
And beyond our eyes¹⁰
The human love lies
Which makes all it gazes on, paradise.

CHORUS OF SPIRITS AND HOURS.

Then weave the web of the mystic measure;
From the depths of the sky and the ends of the earth, 130
Come, swift Spirits of might and of pleasure,
Fill the dance and the music of mirth –
As the waves of a thousand streams rush by
To an ocean of splendour and harmony!

CHORUS OF SPIRITS.

Our spoil is won, 135
Our task is done,
We are free to dive, or soar, or run
Beyond and around,
Or within the bound¹¹
Which clips¹² the world with darkness round. 140

We'll pass the eyes
Of the starry skies
Into the hoar deep to colonize;
Death, Chaos, and Night,
From the sound of our flight 145
Shall flee, like mist from a tempest's might;

And Earth, Air, and Light,
And the Spirit of Might
Which drives round the stars in their fiery flight;

And Love, Thought, and Breath, 150
The powers that quell Death,
Wherever we soar shall assemble beneath;

And our singing shall build,
In the void's loose field,
A world for the Spirit of Wisdom to wield; 155
We will take our plan
From the new world of man,
And our work shall be called the Promethean.

CHORUS OF HOURS.

Break the dance, and scatter the song;
Let some depart and some remain. 160

SEMICHORUS I.

We, beyond Heaven, are driven along –

SEMICHORUS II.

Us the enchantments of earth retain –

SEMICHORUS I.

Ceaseless, and rapid, and fierce, and free,
With the Spirits which build a new earth and sea,
And a Heaven where yet Heaven could never be – 165

SEMICHORUS II.

Solemn, and slow, and serene, and bright,
Leading the Day and outspeeding the Night
With the powers of a world of perfect light –

SEMICHORUS I.

We whirl, singing loud, round the gathering sphere,
Till the trees, and the beasts, and the clouds appear 170
From its chaos made calm by love, not fear –

SEMICHORUS II.

We encircle the oceans and mountains of earth,
And the happy forms of its death and birth
Change to the music of our sweet mirth.

CHORUS OF HOURS AND SPIRITS.

Break the dance, and scatter the song; 175
Let some depart, and some remain;
Wherever we fly we lead along
In leashes, like starbeams, soft yet strong,
The clouds that are heavy with love's sweet rain.

PANTHEA. Ha! They are gone!

IONE. Yet feel you no delight 180
From the past sweetness?

PANTHEA. As the bare green hill
When some soft cloud vanishes into rain,
Laughs with a thousand drops of sunny water
To the unpavilioned sky!¹³

IONE. Even whilst we speak
New notes arise. What is that awful sound? 185

PANTHEA. 'Tis the deep music of the rolling world,
Kindling within the strings of the waved air
Aeolian modulations.

IONE. Listen too,
How every pause is filled with under-notes, 190
Clear, silver, icy, keen, awakening tones,
Which pierce the sense, and live within the soul,
As the sharp stars pierce winter's crystal air
And gaze upon themselves within the sea.

PANTHEA. But see where, through two openings in the forest
Which hanging branches overcanopy, 195
And where two runnels¹⁴ of a rivulet,
Between the close moss, violet-inwoven,
Have made their path of melody – like sisters
Who part with sighs that they may meet in smiles,
Turning their dear disunion to an isle 200
Of lovely grief, a wood of sweet sad thoughts –
Two visions of strange radiance float upon
The ocean-like enchantment of strong sound,
Which flows intenser, keener, deeper yet
Under the ground and through the windless air. 205

IONE. I see a chariot – like that thinnest boat
In which the Mother of the Months¹⁵ is borne
By ebbing light into her western cave
When she upsprings from interlunar dreams –
O'er which is curved an orblike canopy 210
Of gentle darkness, and the hills and woods,
Distinctly seen through that dusk¹⁶ airy veil,
Regard¹⁷ like shapes in an enchanter's glass;
Its wheels are solid clouds, azure and gold,
Such as the genii of the thunderstorm 215
Pile on the floor of the illumined sea
When the sun rushes under it; they roll
And move and grow as with an inward wind.
Within it sits a winged infant: white
Its countenance, like the whiteness of bright snow; 220
Its plumes are as feathers of sunny frost;
Its limbs gleam white through the wind-flowing folds
Of its white robe, woof of ethereal pearl;
Its hair is white – the brightness of white light¹⁸
Scattered in strings; yet its two eyes are heavens 225
Of liquid darkness, which the Deity

Within seems pouring, as a storm is poured
From jagged clouds, out of their arrowy lashes,
Tempering the cold and radiant air around
With fire that is not brightness;¹⁹ in its hand 230
It sways a quivering moonbeam, from whose point
A guiding power directs the chariot's prow
Over its wheeled clouds, which, as they roll
Over the grass, and flowers, and waves, wake sounds
Sweet as a singing rain of silver dew. 235

PANTHEA. And from the other opening in the wood
Rushes, with loud and whirlwind harmony,
A sphere, which is as many thousand spheres,
Solid as crystal, yet through all its mass
Flow, as through empty space, music and light: 240
Ten thousand orbs involving and involved,²⁰
Purple and azure, white, and green, and golden,
Sphere within sphere; and every space between
Peopled with unimaginable shapes,
Such as ghosts dream dwell in the lampless deep, 245
Yet each intertranspicuous;²¹ and they whirl
Over each other with a thousand motions,
Upon a thousand sightless²² axles spinning,
And, with the force of self-destroying swiftness,
Intensely, slowly, solemnly roll on, 250
Kindling with mingled sounds, and many tones,
Intelligible words and music wild.
With mighty whirl the multitudinous²³ orb
Grinds the bright brook into an azure mist
Of elemental subtlety, like light; 255
And the wild odour of the forest flowers,
The music of the living grass and air,
The emerald light of leaf-entangled beams
Round its intense yet self-conflicting speed,

Seem kneaded into one aerial mass 260
Which drowns the sense. Within the orb itself,
Pillowed upon its alabaster arms
Like to a child o'erwearied with sweet toil,
On its own folded wings and wavy hair
The Spirit of the Earth is laid asleep, 265
And you can see its little lips are moving
Amid the changing light of their own smiles,
Like one who talks of what he loves in dream –

IONE. 'Tis only mocking²⁴ the orb's harmony.

PANTHEA. And from a star upon its forehead, shoot – 270
Like swords of azure fire, or golden spears
With tyrant-quelling myrtle²⁵ overtwined,
Embleming Heaven and Earth united now –
Vast beams like spokes of some invisible wheel
Which whirl as the orb whirls, swifter than thought, 275
Filling the abyss with sunlike lightnings;
And perpendicular now, and now transverse,
Pierce the dark soil, and, as they pierce and pass,
Make bare the secrets of the earth's deep heart:
Infinite mines of adamant²⁶ and gold, 280
Valueless²⁷ stones, and unimagined gems,
And caverns on crystalline columns poised
With vegetable silver²⁸ overspread;
Wells of unfathomed fire, and water-springs
Whence the great sea, even as a child, is fed, 285
Whose vapours clothe earth's monarch mountain-tops
With kingly, ermine snow. The beams flash on
And make appear the melancholy ruins
Of cancelled cycles²⁹ – anchors, beaks of ships,
Planks turned to marble, quivers, helms,³⁰ and spears, 290

And gorgon-headed targes,³¹ and the wheels
Of scythed chariots,³² and the emblazonry
Of trophies, standards, and armorial beasts –
Round which Death laughed: sepulchred emblems
Of dead Destruction, ruin within ruin! 295
The wrecks beside of many a city vast,
Whose population which the earth grew over
Was mortal, but not human – see, they lie,
Their monstrous works and uncouth skeletons,
Their statues, homes and fanes;³³ prodigious³⁴ shapes 300
Huddled in grey annihilation, split,
Jammed in the hard black deep; and over³⁵ these
The anatomies³⁶ of unknown winged things,
And fishes which were isles of living scale,
And serpents, bony chains, twisted around 305
The iron crags, or within heaps of dust
To which the tortuous strength of their last pangs
Had crushed the iron crags; and over³⁷ these
The jagged alligator, and the might
Of earth-convulsing behemoth,³⁸ which once 310
Were monarch beasts, and on the slimy shores
And weed-overgrown continents of earth
Increased and multiplied like summer worms
On an abandoned corpse, till the blue globe
Wrapped deluge round it like a cloak, and they 315
Yelled, gasped, and were abolished – or some God
Whose throne was in a comet, passed, and cried,
‘Be not!’ – and like my words they were no more.

THE EARTH.³⁹

The joy, the triumph, the delight, the madness!
The boundless, overflowing, bursting gladness! 320
The vaporous exultation not to be confined!

Ha! Ha! the animation of delight
Which wraps me, like an atmosphere of light,
And bears me as a cloud is borne by its own wind!

THE MOON.

Brother mine, calm wanderer, 325
Happy globe of land and air,
Some spirit is darted like a beam from thee,
Which penetrates my frozen frame,
And passes with the warmth of flame,
With love, and odour, and deep melody 330
Through me, through me!

THE EARTH.

Ha! Ha! the caverns of my hollow mountains,
My cloven fire-crags,⁴⁰ sound-exulting fountains,
Laugh with a vast and inextinguishable laughter:
The oceans, and the deserts, and the abysses 335
Of the deep air's unmeasured wildernesses,
Answer from all their clouds and billows, echoing after.
They cry aloud as I do: 'Sceptred Curse,⁴¹
Who all our green and azure universe
Threatenedst to muffle round with black destruction, sending 340
A solid cloud to rain hot thunderstones,
And splinter and knead down my children's bones,
All I bring forth, to one void mass battering and blending;

Until each crag-like tower, and storied column,
Palace, and obelisk, and temple solemn, 345
My imperial mountains crowned with cloud, and snow, and fire,
My sea-like forests, every blade and blossom
Which finds a grave or cradle in my bosom,
Were stamped by thy strong hate into a lifeless mire:

How art thou sunk, withdrawn, covered, drunk up 350

By thirsty nothing, as the brackish cup⁴²
Drained by a desert-troop, a little drop for all;
And from beneath, around, within, above,
Filling thy void annihilation, love
Burst in like light on caves cloven by the thunderball. 355

THE MOON.

The snow upon my lifeless mountains
Is loosened into living fountains,
My solid oceans flow, and sing, and shine;
A spirit from my heart bursts forth,
It clothes with unexpected birth 360
My cold bare bosom – oh, it must be thine
On mine, on mine!

Gazing on thee I feel, I know
Green stalks burst forth, and bright flowers grow,
And living shapes upon my bosom move; 365
Music is in the sea and air,
Winged clouds soar here and there,
Dark with the rain new buds are dreaming of –
'Tis love, all love!

THE EARTH.

It interpenetrates my granite mass, 370
Through tangled roots and trodden clay doth pass
Into the utmost leaves and delicatest flowers;
Upon the winds, among the clouds 'tis spread;
It wakes a life in the forgotten dead –
They breathe a spirit up from their obscurest bowers – 375
And like a storm, bursting its cloudy prison
With thunder and with whirlwind, has arisen⁴³
Out of the lampless caves of unimagined being,
With earthquake shock and swiftmess making shiver
Thought's stagnant chaos, unremoved for ever,⁴⁴ 380

Till hate, and fear, and pain, light-vanquished shadows, fleeing,

Leave Man – who was a many-sided mirror
Which could distort to many a shape of error
This true fair world of things – a sea reflecting love;
Which⁴⁵ over all his kind,⁴⁶ as the sun's Heaven 385
Gliding o'er ocean, smooth, serene, and even,
Darting from starry depths radiance and life, doth move:

Leave Man, even as a leprous child is left
Who follows a sick beast to some warm cleft
Of rocks, through which the might of healing springs is poured;
390
Then when it wanders home with rosy smile,
Unconscious, and its mother fears awhile
It is a spirit, then weeps on her child restored:⁴⁷

Man, oh not men! a chain of linked thought,
Of love and might to be divided not, 395
Compelling the elements with adamant stress,
As the sun rules, even with a tyrant's gaze,
The unquiet republic of the maze
Of planets, struggling fierce toward Heaven's free wilderness:

Man, one harmonious soul of many a soul, 400
Whose nature is its own divine control,
Where all things flow to all, as rivers to the sea;
Familiar acts are beautiful through love;
Labour, and Pain, and Grief, in life's green grove
Sport like tame beasts – none knew how gentle they could be!
405

His will – with all mean passions, bad delights,
And selfish cares, its trembling satellites,
A spirit ill to guide, but mighty to obey –

Is as a tempest-winged ship, whose helm
Love rules through waves which dare not overwhelm, 410
Forcing life's wildest shores to own its sovereign sway:

All things confess his strength. Through the cold mass
Of marble and of colour his dreams pass –
Bright threads whence mothers weave the robes their children wear;
Language is a perpetual Orphic song,⁴⁸ 415
Which rules with Daedal harmony⁴⁹ a throng
Of thoughts and forms, which else senseless and shapeless were:

The lightning is his slave;⁵⁰ Heaven's utmost deep
Gives up her stars, and like a flock of sheep
They pass before his eye, are numbered, and roll on! 420
The tempest is his steed, he strides the air;⁵¹
And the abyss shouts from her depth laid bare,
'Heaven, hast thou secrets? Man unveils me; I have none.'

THE MOON.

The shadow of white Death has passed
From my path in heaven at last, 425
A clinging shroud of solid frost and sleep;
And through my newly-woven bowers
Wander happy paramours
Less mighty, but as mild as those who keep
Thy vales more deep. 430

THE EARTH.

As the dissolving warmth of dawn may fold
A half-unfrozen dew-globe, green and gold
And crystalline, till it becomes a wingèd mist,
And wanders up the vault of the blue day,
Outlives the noon, and on the sun's last ray 435
Hangs o'er the sea, a fleece of fire and amethyst –

THE MOON.

Thou art folded, thou art lying
In the light which is undying
Of thine own joy, and Heaven's smile divine;
All suns and constellations shower 440
On thee a light, a life, a power
Which doth array thy sphere; thou pourest thine
On mine, on mine!

THE EARTH.

I spin beneath my pyramid of night, 52
Which points into the heavens, dreaming delight, 445
Murmuring victorious joy in my enchanted sleep –
As a youth lulled in love-dreams, faintly sighing,
Under the shadow of his beauty lying, 53
Which round his rest a watch of light and warmth doth keep.

THE MOON.

As in the soft and sweet eclipse 450
When soul meets soul on lovers' lips,
High hearts are calm, and brightest eyes are dull –
So when thy shadow falls on me,
Then am I mute and still, by thee
Covered; of thy love, Orb most beautiful, 455
Full, oh too full! –

Thou art speeding round the sun,
Brightest world of many a one,
Green and azure sphere, which shinest
With a light which is divinest 460
Among all the lamps of Heaven
To whom life and light is given;
I, thy crystal paramour
Borne beside thee by a power

Like the polar paradise, 465
 Magnet-like, of lovers' eyes;
 I, a most enamoured maiden,
 Whose weak brain is overladen
 With the pleasure of her love,
 Maniac-like around thee move, 470
 Gazing, an insatiate bride,
 On thy form from every side
 Like a maenad round the cup
 Which Agave lifted up
 In the weird Cadmaean forest. 54 475
 Brother, wheresoe'er thou soarest
 I must hurry, whirl and follow
 Through the heavens wide and hollow,
 Sheltered, by the warm embrace
 Of thy soul, from hungry space; 480
 Drinking from thy sense and sight
 Beauty, majesty, and might,
 As a lover or chameleon
 Grows like what it looks upon;
 As a violet's gentle eye 485
 Gazes on the azure sky
 Until its hue grows like what it beholds;
 As a grey and watery mist
 Glows like solid amethyst
 Athwart the western mountain it enfolds, 490
 When the sunset sleeps
 Upon its snow –

THE EARTH.

 And the weak day weeps
 That it should be so.
 Oh gentle Moon, the voice of thy delight 495
 Falls on me like thy clear and tender light
 Soothing the seaman, borne the summer night

Through isles forever calm;
Oh gentle Moon, thy crystal accents pierce
The caverns of my pride's deep universe, 500
Charming the tiger joy, whose trappings fierce
Made wounds which need thy balm.

PANTHEA. I rise as from a bath of sparkling water,
A bath of azure light, among dark rocks,
Out of the stream of sound.

IONE. Ah me! sweet sister, 505
The stream of sound has ebbed away from us,
And you pretend to rise out of its wave
Because your words fall like the clear soft dew
Shaken from a bathing wood-nymph's limbs and hair.

PANTHEA. Peace, peace! A mighty Power, which is as darkness,
510
Is rising out of Earth, and from the sky
Is showered like night, and from within the air
Bursts, like eclipse which had been gathered up
Into the pores of sunlight: 55 the bright visions,
Wherein the singing spirits rode and shone, 515
Gleam like pale meteors through a watery night.

IONE. There is a sense of words upon mine ear –

PANTHEA. A universal sound like words – oh list!

DEMOGORGON.
Thou Earth, calm empire of a happy soul,
Sphere of divinest shapes and harmonies; 520
Beautiful orb! gathering as thou dost roll
The love which paves thy path along the skies:

THE EARTH.

I hear! I am as a drop of dew that dies.

DEMOGORGON.

Thou Moon, which gazest on the nightly Earth
With wonder, as it gazes upon thee, 525
Whilst each to men, and beasts, and the swift birth⁵⁶
Of birds, is beauty, love, calm, harmony:

THE MOON.

I hear! I am a leaf shaken by thee.

DEMOGORGON.

Ye kings of suns and stars, Daemons and Gods,
Ethereal Dominations,⁵⁷ who possess 530
Elysian, windless, fortunate abodes
Beyond Heaven's constellated wilderness:

A VOICE (from above)

Our great Republic hears: we are blessed, and bless.

DEMOGORGON.

Ye happy dead, whom beams of brightest verse
Are clouds to hide, not colours to portray, 535
Whether your nature is that universe
Which once ye saw and suffered –

A VOICE (from beneath)

Or as they

Whom we have left, we change and pass away.

DEMOGORGON.

Ye elemental Genii,⁵⁸ who have homes
From man's high mind even to the central stone 540
Of sullen lead; from Heaven's star-fretted domes

To the dull weed some sea-worm battens⁵⁹ on:

A CONFUSED VOICE.

We hear: thy words waken Oblivion.

DEMOGORGON.

Spirits, whose homes are flesh; ye beasts and birds;
Ye worms and fish; ye living leaves and buds; 545
Lightning and wind; and ye untameable herds,
Meteors and mists, which throng air's solitudes:

A VOICE.

Thy voice to us is wind among still woods.

DEMOGORGON.

Man, who wert once a despot and a slave;
A dupe and a deceiver; a decay; 550
A traveller from the cradle to the grave
Through the dim night⁶⁰ of this immortal day:

ALL.

Speak: thy strong words may never pass away.

DEMOGORGON.

This is the day, which down the void abysm
At the Earth-born's spell⁶¹ yawns for Heaven's despotism, 555
And Conquest is dragged captive through the deep:
Love, from its awful throne of patient power
In the wise heart, from the last giddy hour
Of dread endurance, from the slippery, steep,
And narrow verge of crag-like agony, springs 560
And folds over the world its healing wings.

Gentleness, Virtue, Wisdom, and Endurance:
These are the seals of that most firm assurance

Which bars the pit over Destruction's strength;
And if, with infirm hand, Eternity, 565
Mother of many acts and hours, should free
The serpent that would clasp her with his length,
These are the spells by which to reassume
An empire o'er the disentangled Doom.

To suffer woes which Hope thinks infinite; 570
To forgive wrongs darker than death or night;
To defy Power which seems omnipotent;
To love, and bear; to hope, till Hope creates
From its own wreck the thing it contemplates;
Neither to change, nor falter, nor repent: 575
This, like thy glory, Titan, is to be
Good, great and joyous, beautiful and free;
This is alone Life, Joy, Empire, and Victory.

Act IV

1 One Prometheus.

2 ye the new Hours.

3 figured patterned.

4 A hundred ages i.e. for the duration of Saturn's long reign.

5 the Spirits of the human mind presumably the same spirits who comforted Prometheus in Act I.

6 dusk gloomy.

7 Science knowledge.

8 daedal skilful.

9 palm sole of the foot.

10 beyond our eyes beyond our range of vision.

11 the bound i.e. of the earth's atmosphere.

12 clips embraces.

13 the unpavilioned sky The sky is not separated from the earth by a pavilion.

14 runnels streamlets.

15 the Mother of the Months the moon.

16 dusk dark, dusk-like.

17 Regard appear.

18 the brightness of white light in other words, the brilliant, unrefracted light of 'pure', transcendental vision.

19 fire that is not brightness Contemporary scientific thought indicated that there were 'dark rays' – infrared emanations that produced heat but no light. Humphry Davy suggested that they were emitted by the moon.

20 involving and involved entwined and entwining; inextricably intertwined.

21 intertranspicuous transparent between and through each other.

22 sightless invisible.

23 multitudinous thronging with multitudes.

24 mocking imitating.

25 tyrant-quelling myrtle Greek warriors were sometimes crowned with myrtle, a symbol of love.

26 adamant diamonds.

27 Valueless precious beyond price.

28 vegetable silver silver crafted to appear in organic form; Shelley is recalling the fruit of the tree of life in Milton's Eden, which was 'Of vegetable gold' (Paradise Lost iv 220).

29 cycles i.e. eras of time.

30 helms helmets.

31 targes shields.

32 scythed chariots The ancient British queen Boudicca used to put blades on the axles of her chariot-wheels.

33 fanés temples.

34 prodigious fantastic.

35 over i.e. under. Shelley is burrowing ever further into the mists of time.

36 anatomies skeletons.

37 over i.e. under.

38 behemoth either the elephant or the hippopotamus – probably, as in Milton, the former: 'Behemoth biggest born of earth upheaved / His vastness' (Paradise Lost vii 471–2).

39 Where the Earth of Act I and III iv was a Hellenic goddess and earth-mother, that which appears here is brother and lover of the moon.

40 My cloven fire-crags volcanoes.

41 Sceptred Curse Jupiter.

42 the brackish cup i.e. the salty water in the cup.

43 has arisen 'Love' is the subject that governs this verb.

44 unremoved for ever i.e. hitherto not removed.

45 Which i.e. Love.

46 his kind i.e. mankind.

47 Leave man...restored Shelley refers to the legend of King Bladud of Britain, a leper who followed a lost pig to the hot springs of Bath, by which he was cured.

48 Language is a perpetual Orphic song i.e. it governs our morals and actions. Orpheus tamed wild beasts and stopped the tortures of Hades with his music.

49 Daedal harmony Shelley is thinking of Daedalus, the Greek inventor and craftsman, who devised the labyrinth in which the minotaur was kept. His name is a byword for intricacy and skill.

50 The lightning is his slave in the sense that man was discovering how electricity could be harnessed to his purposes.

51 he strides the air Ballooning was all the rage in London after the Montgolfier brothers made their first flight in 1783. Shelley had used balloons as a means of distributing his broadside, 'A Declaration of Rights', in the summer of 1812.

52 my pyramid of night As with the ‘shadowy cone’ at Paradise Lost iv 776, Shelley refers to the idea that the earth’s shadow is a cone or pyramid of darkness in diametrical opposition to the sun.

53 As a youth...lying The youth lies under the halo (‘shadow’) cast by the light of his beauty into the air above him.

54 Like a maenad...forest Agave, daughter of Cadmus, became a maenad and killed her own son, Pentheus.

55 the pores of sunlight It was believed in the eighteenth century that there were minute gaps (or pores) between light particles.

56 birth race.

57 Dominations the fourth of the nine orders of angels, as at Paradise Lost iii 392.

58 elemental Genii animating spirits of the elements.

59 battens feeds gluttonously.

60 the dim night i.e. the period preceding the eternal day.

61 the Earth-born’s spell i.e. Prometheus’ revocation of his curse.

To a Skylark (composed late June 1820)¹

From Prometheus Unbound (1820)²

Hail to thee, blithe spirit!
Bird thou never wert –
That from heaven, or near it,
Pourest thy full heart

In profuse strains of unpremeditated art. 5

Higher still and higher
From the earth thou springest
Like a cloud of fire;
The blue deep thou wingest,
And singing still dost soar, and soaring ever singest. 10

In the golden lightning
Of the sunken sun
O'er which clouds are brightning,
Thou dost float and run
Like an unbodied joy whose race is just begun. 15

The pale purple even
Melts around thy flight;
Like a star of heaven
In the broad daylight
Thou art unseen³ – but yet I hear thy shrill delight, 20

Keen as are the arrows
Of that silver sphere,⁴
Whose intense lamp narrows
In the white dawn clear,
Until we hardly see – we feel that it is there. 25

All the earth and air
With thy voice is loud,
As when night is bare
From one lonely cloud
The moon rains out her beams – and heaven is overflowed. 30

What thou art we know not;
What is most like thee?
From rainbow clouds there flow not

Drops so bright to see
As from thy presence showers a rain of melody. 35

Like a poet hidden
In the light of thought,
Singing hymns unbidden,⁵
Till the world is wrought
To sympathy with hopes and fears it heeded not; 40

Like a high-born maiden
In a palace-tower,
Soothing her love-laden
Soul in secret hour,
With music sweet as love, which overflows her bower; 45

Like a glow-worm golden
In a dell of dew,
Scattering unbeholden
Its aerial hue
Among the flowers and grass which screen it from the view; 50

Like a rose embowered
In its own green leaves,
By warm winds deflowered
Till the scent it gives
Makes faint with too much sweet these heavy-winged thieves; 55

Sound of vernal showers
On the twinkling grass,
Rain-awakened flowers,
All that ever was
Joyous and clear and fresh, thy music doth surpass. 60

Teach us, sprite or bird,
What sweet thoughts are thine;

I have never heard
Praise of love or wine
That panted forth a flood of rapture so divine: 65
Chorus Hymeneal⁶
Or triumphal chaunt
Matched with thine would be all
But an empty vaunt,⁷
A thing wherein we feel there is some hidden want. 70

What objects are the fountains
Of thy happy strain?⁸
What fields or waves or mountains?
What shapes of sky or plain?
What love of thine own kind? What ignorance of pain? 75

With thy clear keen joyance
Languor cannot be –
Shadow of annoyance
Never came near thee;
Thou lovest, but ne'er knew love's sad satiety. 80

Waking or asleep,
Thou of death must deem
Things more true and deep
Than we mortals dream,
Or how could thy notes flow in such a crystal stream? 85

We look before and after,⁹
And pine for what is not;
Our sincerest laughter
With some pain is fraught –
Our sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest thought. 90

Yet if we could scorn

Hate and pride and fear;
If we were things born
Not to shed a tear,
I know not how thy joy we ever should come near. 95

Better than all measures
Of delightful sound;
Better than all treasures
That in books are found –
Thy skill to poet were, thou scorner of the ground! 100

Teach me half the gladness
That thy brain must know,
Such harmonious madness¹⁰
From my lips would flow
The world should listen then, as I am listening now. 105

To a Skylark

¹As Mary Shelley recalled, this poem was written at the Gisbornes' house at Livorno, probably on 22 June: 'It was on a beautiful summer evening, while wandering among the lanes whose myrtle hedges were the bowers of the fireflies, that we heard the carolling of the skylark which inspired one of the most beautiful of his poems.'

²In addition to Prometheus Unbound, Shelley's 1820 volume contained a number of shorter works composed in Italy.

³*Thou art unseen* John Gisborne recalled how he and Shelley used to listen to the skylarks, which flew 'to a height at which the straining eye could scarcely ken the stationary and diminutive specks into which their soft and still receding forms had at length vanished' (journal of John Gisborne, 20 October 1827).

4*that silver sphere* The morning star (Venus) is so bright that it can be seen even after sunrise.

5*hymns unbidden* i.e. poems that are the direct result of inspiration.

The writer of the following lines died at Florence as he was preparing for a voyage to one of the wildest of the Sporades,³ which he had bought, and where he had fitted up the ruins of an old building, and where it was his hope to have realised a scheme of life suited perhaps to that happier and better world of which he is now an inhabitant, but hardly practicable in this. His life was singular, less on account of the romantic vicissitudes which diversified it than the ideal tinge which it received from his own character and feelings. The present poem, like the Vita Nuova of Dante,⁴ is sufficiently intelligible to a certain class of readers without a matter-of-fact history of the circumstances to which it relates; and to a certain other class it must ever remain incomprehensible from a defect of a common organ of perception for the ideas of which it treats. Not but that, ‘gran vergogna sarebbe a colui, che rimasse cosa sotto veste di figura, o di colore rettorico: e domandato non sapesse denudare le sue parole da cotal veste, in guisa che avessero verace intendimento’.⁵

The present poem appears to have been intended by the Writer as the dedication to some longer one. The stanza on the opposite page is almost a literal translation from Dante’s famous Canzone

Voi, ch’ intendendo, il terzo ciel movete, etc.⁶

The presumptuous application of the concluding lines to his own composition will raise a smile at the expense of my unfortunate friend: be it a smile not of contempt but pity.

S.

My song, I fear that thou wilt find but few
Who fitly shall conceive thy reasoning,
Of such hard matter dost thou entertain;
Whence, if by misadventure, chance should bring
Thee to base company (as chance may do), 5
Quite unaware of what thou dost contain,
I prithee comfort thy sweet self again,
My last delight! Tell them that they are dull,
And bid them own that thou art beautiful.

Sweet spirit, sister of that orphan one⁷

Whose empire is the name thou weapest on,
In my heart's temple I suspend to thee
These votive wreaths of withered memory.

Poor captive bird who, from thy narrow cage, 5
Pourest such music that it might assuage
The rugged hearts of those who prisoned thee,
Were they not deaf to all sweet melody –
This song shall be thy rose: its petals pale
Are dead indeed, my adored nightingale, 10
But soft and fragrant is the faded blossom
And it has no thorn left to wound thy bosom.

High spirit-winged heart, who dost for ever
Beat thine unfeeling bars with vain endeavour,
Till those bright plumes of thought, in which arrayed 15
It over-soared this low and worldly shade,
Lie shattered; and thy panting, wounded breast
Stains with dear blood its unmaternal nest –
I weep vain tears: blood would less bitter be,
Yet poured forth gladlier, could it profit thee. 20

Seraph of Heaven, too gentle to be human,
Veiling beneath that radiant form of woman
All that is insupportable in thee
Of light, and love, and immortality!
Sweet benediction in the eternal curse! 25
Veiled glory of this lampless universe!

Thou moon beyond the clouds!⁸ Thou living form
Among the dead! Thou star above the storm!
Thou wonder, and thou beauty, and thou terror!
Thou harmony of nature's art! Thou mirror 30
In whom, as in the splendour of the sun,
All shapes look glorious which thou gazest on!
Aye, even the dim words which obscure thee now
Flash, lightning-like, with unaccustomed glow;

I pray thee that thou blot from this sad song 35
 All of its much mortality and wrong
 With those clear drops which start like sacred dew
 From the twin lights⁹ thy sweet soul darkens through,
 Weeping till sorrow becomes ecstasy;
 Then smile on it, so that it may not die. 40
 I never thought before my death to see
 Youth's vision thus made perfect. Emily,
 I love thee; though the world by no thin name
 Will hide that love from its unvalued shame.¹⁰
 Would we two had been twins of the same mother!¹¹ 45
 Or that the name my heart lent to another¹²
 Could be a sister's bond for her and thee,
 Blending two beams of one eternity!
 Yet were one lawful and the other true,
 These names, though dear, could paint not, as is due, 50
 How beyond refuge I am thine. Ah me!
 I am not thine: I am a part of thee.
 Sweet lamp, my moth-like muse has burned its wings,
 Or, like a dying swan who soars and sings,
 Young Love should teach Time, in his own grey style, 55
 All that thou art. Art thou not void of guile,
 A lovely soul formed to be blessed and bless?
 A well of sealed and secret happiness¹³
 Whose waters like blithe light and music are,
 Vanquishing dissonance and gloom? A star¹⁴ 60
 Which moves not in the moving heavens, alone?
 A smile amid dark frowns? A gentle tone
 Amid rude voices? A beloved light?
 A solitude, a refuge, a delight?
 A lute which those whom love has taught to play 65
 Make music on, to soothe the roughest day
 And lull fond grief asleep? A buried treasure?
 A cradle of young thoughts of wingless pleasure?

A violet-shrouded grave of woe? I measure
 The world of fancies, seeking one like thee, 70
 And find, alas, mine own infirmity.
 She met me, stranger, upon life's rough way,
 And lured me towards sweet death – as night by day,
 Winter by spring, or sorrow by swift hope,
 Led into light, life, peace. An antelope 75
 In the suspended impulse of its lightness
 Were less ethereally light; the brightness
 Of her divinest presence trembles through
 Her limbs as, underneath a cloud of dew
 Embodied in the windless heaven of June 80
 Amid the splendour-winged stars, the moon
 Burns, inextinguishably beautiful;
 And from her lips, as from a hyacinth full
 Of honey-dew, a liquid murmur drops,
 Killing the sense with passion, sweet as stops 85
 Of planetary music¹⁵ heard in trance.
 In her mild lights the starry spirits dance,
 The sunbeams of those wells which ever leap
 Under the lightnings of the soul – too deep
 For the brief fathom-line of thought or sense. 90
 The glory of her being, issuing thence,
 Stains the dead, blank, cold air with a warm shade
 Of unentangled intermixture made
 By love, of light and motion: one intense
 Diffusion, one serene Omnipresence 95
 Whose flowing outlines mingle in their flowing,
 Around her cheeks and utmost fingers glowing
 With the unintermitted blood, which there
 Quivers (as in a fleece of snow-like air
 The crimson pulse of living morning quivers),¹⁶ 100
 Continuously prolonged and ending never,
 Till they are lost, and in that beauty furled
 Which penetrates and clasps and fills the world,

Scarce visible from extreme loveliness.
 Warm fragrance seems to fall from her light dress 105
 And her loose hair and where some heavy tress
 The air of her own speed has disentwined,
 The sweetness seems to satiate the faint wind;
 And in the soul a wild odour is felt
 Beyond the sense, like fiery dews that melt 110
 Into the bosom of a frozen bud.
 See where she stands! A mortal shape endued
 With love and life and light and deity,
 And motion which may change but cannot die;
 An image of some bright eternity; 115
 A shadow of some golden dream; a splendour
 Leaving the third sphere¹⁷pilotless; a tender
 Reflection of the eternal moon of love
 Under whose motions life's dull billows move;
 A metaphor of spring and youth and morning; 120
 A vision like incarnate April warning,
 With smiles and tears, Frost the anatomy
 Into his summer grave.¹⁸
 Ah, woe is me!
 What have I dared? Where am I lifted? How Shall I descend and perish not? I know 125
 That love makes all things equal: I have heard
 By mine own heart this joyous truth averred:
 The spirit of the worm beneath the sod,
 In love and worship, blends itself with God.
 Spouse! Sister! Angel! Pilot of the fate 130
 Whose course has been so starless! Oh too late
 Beloved! Oh too soon adored by me!
 For in the fields of immortality
 My spirit should at first have worshipped thine,
 A divine presence in a place divine; 135
 Or should have moved beside it on this earth,
 A shadow of that substance from its birth;

But not as now: I love thee; yes, I feel
That on the fountain of my heart a seal
Is set, to keep its waters pure and bright 140
For thee, since in those tears thou hast delight.
We – are we not formed as notes of music are,
For one another, though dissimilar;
Such difference without discord, as can make
Those sweetest sounds in which all spirits shake 145
As trembling leaves in a continuous air?
Thy wisdom speaks in me, and bids me dare
Beacon¹⁹ the rocks on which high hearts are wrecked.
I never was attached to that great sect
Whose doctrine is that each one should select 150
Out of the crowd a mistress or a friend,
And all the rest, though fair and wise, commend
To cold oblivion, though it is in the code
Of modern morals, and the beaten road
Which those poor slaves with weary footsteps tread, 155
Who travel to their home among the dead
By the broad highway of the world, and so
With one chained friend, perhaps a jealous foe,
The dreariest and the longest journey go.
True love in this differs from gold and clay: 160
That to divide is not to take away.
Love is like understanding that grows bright,
Gazing on many truths; 'tis like thy light,
Imagination, which from earth and sky,
And from the depths of human fantasy, 165
As from a thousand prisms and mirrors, fills
The universe with glorious beams, and kills
Error, the worm, with many a sunlike arrow
Of its reverberated lightning. Narrow
The heart that loves, the brain that contemplates, 170
The life that wears, the spirit that creates
One object, and one form, and builds thereby

A sepulchre for its eternity.

Mind from its object differs most in this:
Evil from good; misery from happiness; 175
The baser from the nobler; the impure
And frail, from what is clear and must endure.
If you divide suffering and dross, you may
Diminish till it is consumed away;
If you divide pleasure and love and thought, 180
Each part exceeds the whole; and we know not
How much, while any yet remains unshared,
Of pleasure may be gained, of sorrow spared:
This truth is that deep well whence sages draw
The unenvied light of hope; the eternal law 185
By which those live, to whom this world of life
Is as a garden ravaged, and whose strife
Tills for the promise of a later birth
The wilderness of this Elysian earth.²⁰

There was a being²¹ whom my spirit oft 190
Met on its visioned wanderings, far aloft
In the clear golden prime of my youth's dawn,
Upon the fairy isles of sunny lawn,
Amid the enchanted mountains, and the caves
Of divine sleep, and on the air-like waves 195
Of wonder-level dream, whose tremulous floor
Paved her light steps – on an imagined shore,
Under the grey beak of some promontory
She met me, robed in such exceeding glory
That I beheld her not. In solitudes 200
Her voice came to me through the whispering woods,
And from the fountains, and the odours deep
Of flowers which, like lips murmuring in their sleep
Of the sweet kisses which had lulled them there,
Breathed but of her to the enamoured air; 205
And from the breezes whether low or loud,
And from the rain of every passing cloud,

And from the singing of the summer birds,
 And from all sounds, all silence. In the words
 Of antique verse and high romance – in form, 210
 Sound, colour – in whatever checks that storm²²
 Which with the shattered present chokes the past;
 And in that best philosophy whose taste
 Makes this cold common hell, our life, a doom
 As glorious as a fiery martyrdom;²³ 215
 Her spirit was the harmony of truth.
 Then from the caverns of my dreamy youth
 I sprang, as one sandalled with plumes of fire,
 And towards the lodestar²⁴ of my one desire
 I flitted like a dizzy moth, whose flight 220
 Is as a dead leaf's in the owlet light,
 When it would seek in Hesper's setting sphere²⁵
 A radiant death, a fiery sepulchre,
 As if it were a lamp of earthly flame.
 But she whom prayers or tears then could not tame 225
 Passed like a god throned on a winged planet
 Whose burning plumes to tenfold swiftness fan it
 Into the dreary cone of our life's shade;
 And as a man with mighty loss dismayed
 I would have followed, though the grave between 230
 Yawned like a gulf whose spectres are unseen,
 When a voice said: 'Oh thou of hearts the weakest,
 The phantom is beside thee whom thou seekest.'
 Then I, 'Where?' The world's echo answered, 'Where?'
 And in that silence, and in my despair, 235
 I questioned every tongueless wind that flew
 Over my tower of mourning, if it knew
 Whither 'twas fled, this soul out of my soul;
 And murmured names and spells which have control
 Over the sightless tyrants of our fate; 240
 But neither prayer nor verse could dissipate

The night which closed on her; nor uncreate
 That world within this chaos, mine and me,
 Of which she was the veiled Divinity,
 The world I say of thoughts that worshipped her:²⁶ 245
 And therefore I went forth, with hope and fear
 And every gentle passion sick to death,
 Feeding my course with expectation's breath,
 Into the wintry forest of our life;
 And struggling through its error with vain strife, 250
 And stumbling in my weakness and my haste,
 And half bewildered by new forms, I passed,
 Seeking among those untaught foresters
 If I could find one form resembling hers,
 In which she might have masked herself from me. 255
 There – one whose voice was venomed melody²⁷
 Sat by a well, under blue nightshade bowers;
 The breath of her false mouth was like faint flowers,
 Her touch was as electric poison – flame
 Out of her looks into my vitals came, 260
 And from her living cheeks and bosom flew
 A killing air, which pierced like honey-dew
 Into the core of my green heart, and lay
 Upon its leaves until, as hair grown grey
 O'er a young brow, they hid its unblown prime 265
 With ruins of unseasonable time.
 In many mortal forms I rashly sought
 The shadow of that idol²⁸ of my thought.
 And some were fair – but beauty dies away;
 Others were wise – but honeyed words betray; 270
 And one was true – oh, why not true to me?
 Then, as a hunted deer that could not flee,
 I turned upon my thoughts, and stood at bay,
 Wounded and weak and panting; the cold day
 Trembled, for pity of my strife and pain. 275
 When, like a noonday dawn, there shone again

Deliverance. One stood on my path²⁹ who seemed
As like the glorious shape which I had dreamed,
As is the Moon whose changes ever run
Into themselves, to the eternal sun; 280
The cold chaste moon, the Queen of heaven's bright isles,
Who makes all beautiful on which she smiles,
That wandering shrine of soft yet icy flame
Which ever is transformed, yet still the same,
And warms not but illumines. Young and fair 285
As the descended spirit of that sphere,
She hid me, as the moon may hide the night
From its own darkness, until all was bright
Between the heaven and earth of my calm mind;
And as a cloud charioted by the wind, 290
She led me to a cave in that wild place
And sat beside me, with her downward face
Illumining my slumbers, like the moon
Waxing and waning o'er Endymion.

And I was laid asleep,³⁰ spirit and limb, 295
And all my being became bright or dim
As the moon's image in a summer sea,
According as she smiled or frowned on me.
And there I lay, within a chaste cold bed;
Alas, I then was nor alive nor dead, 300
For at her silver voice came Death and Life,
Unmindful each of their accustomed strife,
Masked like twin babes, a sister and a brother,
The wandering hopes of one abandoned mother,³¹
And through the cavern without wings they flew, 305
And cried, 'Away, he is not of our crew!'
I wept and, though it be a dream, I weep.

What storms then shook the ocean of my sleep,
Blotting that moon whose pale and waning lips
Then shrank as in the sickness of eclipse; 310
And how my soul was as a lampless sea,

And who was then its tempest; and when she,³²
The planet of that hour, was quenched, what frost
Crept o'er those waters till from coast to coast
The moving billows of my being fell 315
Into a death of ice, immovable;
And then what earthquakes made it gape and split,
The white moon smiling all the while on it,
These words conceal. If not, each word would be
The key of staunchless tears – weep not for me! 320

At length, into the obscure forest came
The vision I had sought through grief and shame.
Athwart that wintry wilderness of thorns
Flashed from her motion splendour like the morn's,
And from her presence life was radiated 325
Through the grey earth and branches bare and dead,
So that her way was paved, and roofed above
With flowers as soft as thoughts of budding love;
And music from her respiration spread
Like light – all other sounds were penetrated 330
By the small, still, sweet spirit of that sound,
So that the savage winds hung mute around;
And odours warm and fresh fell from her hair
Dissolving the dull cold in the froze air:
Soft as an incarnation of the sun 335
When light is changed to love, this glorious one
Floated into the cavern where I lay
And called my spirit, and the dreaming clay
Was lifted by the thing that dreamed below
As smoke by fire, and in her beauty's glow 340
I stood, and felt the dawn of my long night
Was penetrating me with living light:
I knew it was the vision veiled from me
So many years – that it was Emily.

Twin spheres of light³³ who rule this passive earth, 345
This world of love, this me; and into birth

Awaken all its fruits and flowers, and dart
 Magnetic might into its central heart;
 And lift its billows and its mists, and guide
 By everlasting laws each wind and tide 350
 To its fit cloud, and its appointed cave;
 And lull its storms, each in the craggy grave
 Which was its cradle, luring to faint bowers
 The armies of the rainbow-winged showers;
 And as those married lights which from the towers 355
 Of heaven look forth, and fold the wandering globe
 In liquid sleep and splendour, as a robe;
 And all their many-mingled influence blend,
 If equal, yet unlike, to one sweet end;
 So ye, bright regents, with alternate sway 360
 Govern my sphere of being, night and day!
 Thou, not disdainng even a borrowed might;
 Thou, not eclipsing a remoter light;
 And through the shadow of the seasons three,
 From spring to autumn's sere maturity, 365
 Light it into the winter of the tomb
 Where it may ripen to a brighter bloom.
 Thou too, oh comet beautiful and fierce, 34
 Who drew the heart of this frail universe
 Towards thine own; till wrecked in that convulsion, 370
 Alternating attraction and repulsion,
 Thine went astray and that was rent in twain –
 Oh float into our azure heaven again!
 Be there love's folding star at thy return;
 The living sun will feed thee from its urn 375
 Of golden fire; the moon will veil her horn
 In thy last smiles; adoring even and morn
 Will worship thee with incense of calm breath
 And lights and shadows; as the star of death
 And birth is worshipped by those sisters wild 380
 Called Hope and Fear – upon the heart are piled

Their offerings – of this sacrifice divine
A world shall be the altar.

Lady mine,
Scorn not these flowers of thought, the fading birth
Which from its heart of hearts that plant puts forth 385
Whose fruit, made perfect by thy sunny eyes,
Will be as of the trees of paradise.

The day is come, and thou wilt fly with me.
To whatsoe'er of dull mortality
Is mine, remain a vestal³⁵ sister still; 390
To the intense, the deep, the imperishable,
Not mine but me, henceforth be thou united
Even as a bride, delighting and delighted.
The hour is come, the destined star has risen
Which shall descend upon a vacant prison. 395

The walls are high, the gates are strong, thickset
The sentinels, but true love never yet
Was thus constrained: it overleaps all fence
Like lightning, with invisible violence
Piercing its continents;³⁶ like heaven's free breath 400
Which he who grasps can hold not; liker Death
Who rides upon a thought – and makes his way
Through temple, tower, and palace, and the array
Of arms; more strength has love than he or they,
For it can burst his charnel and make free 405
The limbs in chains, the heart in agony,
The soul in dust and chaos.

Emily,
A ship is floating in the harbour now,
A wind is hovering o'er the mountain's brow,
There is a path on the sea's azure floor, 410
No keel has ever ploughed that path before;
The halcyons brood around the foamless isles,³⁷
The treacherous ocean has forsworn its wiles,

The merry mariners are bold and free –
 Say, my heart's sister, wilt thou sail with me? 415
 Our bark is as an albatross whose nest
 Is a far Eden of the purple east;
 And we between her wings will sit while night
 And day, and storm and calm, pursue their flight,
 Our ministers along the boundless sea 420
 Treading each other's heels, unheededly.
 It is an isle under Ionian skies, 38
 Beautiful as a wreck of paradise,
 And, for the harbours are not safe and good,
 This land would have remained a solitude 425
 But for some pastoral people native there,
 Who from the Elysian, clear, and golden air
 Draw the last spirit of the age of gold –
 Simple and spirited, innocent and bold.
 The blue Aegean girds this chosen home 430
 With ever-changing sound and light and foam,
 Kissing the sifted sands and caverns hoar;
 And all the winds wandering along the shore
 Undulate with the undulating tide.
 There are thick woods where sylvan forms abide, 435
 And many a fountain, rivulet, and pond
 As clear as elemental diamond
 Or serene morning air; and far beyond,
 The mossy tracks made by the goats and deer
 (Which the rough shepherd treads but once a year) 440
 Pierce into glades, caverns, and bowers, and halls
 Built round with ivy, which the waterfalls
 Illumining with sound that never fails
 Accompany the noonday nightingales,
 And all the place is peopled with sweet airs. 39 445
 The light clear element which the isle wears
 Is heavy with the scent of lemon-flowers
 Which floats like mist laden with unseen showers,

And falls upon the eyelids like faint sleep;
 And from the moss violets and jonquils peep 450
 And dart their arrowy odour through the brain
 Till you might faint with that delicious pain.
 And every motion, odour, beam, and tone
 With that deep music is in unison,
 Which is a soul within the soul – they seem 455
 Like echoes of an antenatal dream.
 It is an isle 'twixt heaven, air, earth, and sea
 Cradled, and hung in clear tranquility,
 Bright as that wandering Eden Lucifer, 40
 Washed by the soft blue oceans of young air. 460
 It is a favoured place. Famine or blight,
 Pestilence, war and earthquake never light
 Upon its mountain-peaks; blind vultures, they
 Sail onward far upon their fatal way;
 The winged storms, chaunting their thunder-psalm 465
 To other lands, leave azure chasms of calm
 Over this isle, or weep themselves in dew,
 From which its fields and woods ever renew
 Their green and golden immortality.
 And from the sea there rise, and from the sky 470
 There fall, clear exhalations, soft and bright,
 Veil after veil, each hiding some delight
 Which sun or moon or zephyr draw aside,
 Till the isle's beauty, like a naked bride
 Glowing at once with love and loveliness, 475
 Blushes and trembles at its own excess.
 Yet like a buried lamp, a soul no less
 Burns in the heart of this delicious isle,
 An atom of the eternal, whose own smile
 Unfolds itself, and may be felt (not seen) 480
 O'er the grey rocks, blue waves, and forests green,
 Filling their bare and void interstices.
 But the chief marvel of the wilderness

Is a lone dwelling built by whom or how
 None of the rustic island-people know. 485
 'Tis not a tower of strength, though with its height
 It overtops the woods – but for delight
 Some wise and tender ocean-king, ere crime
 Had been invented, in the world's young prime,
 Reared it, a wonder of that simple time, 490
 An envy of the isles, a pleasure-house⁴¹
 Made sacred to his sister and his spouse.
 It scarce seems now a wreck of human art,
 But as it were Titanic⁴² – in the heart
 Of earth having assumed its form, then grown 495
 Out of the mountains from the living stone,
 Lifting itself in caverns light and high:
 For all the antique and learned imagery
 Has been erased, and in the place of it
 The ivy and the wild-vine interknit 500
 The volumes⁴³ of their many-twining stems;
 Parasite flowers illumine with dewy gems
 The lampless halls; and when they fade, the sky
 Peeps through their winter-woof of tracery
 With moonlight patches, or star atoms keen, 505
 Or fragments of the day's intense serene,⁴⁴
 Working mosaic on their Parian floors.⁴⁵
 And day and night, aloof, from the high towers
 And terraces, the earth and ocean seem
 To sleep in one another's arms, and dream 510
 Of waves, flowers, clouds, woods, rocks, and all that we
 Read in their smiles, and call reality.
 This isle and house are mine, and I have vowed
 Thee to be lady of the solitude.
 And I have fitted up some chambers there 515
 Looking towards the golden eastern air,
 And level with the living winds, which flow

Like waves above the living waves below.
I have sent books and music there, and all
Those instruments with which high spirits call 520
The future from its cradle, and the past
Out of its grave, and make the present last
In thoughts and joys which sleep but cannot die,
Folded within their own eternity.
Our simple life wants little, and true taste 525
Hires not the pale drudge Luxury to waste
The scene it would adorn, and therefore still,
Nature with all her children haunts the hill.
The ring-dove in the embowering ivy yet
Keeps up her love-lament, and the owls flit 530
Round the evening tower, and the young stars glance
Between the quick bats in their twilight dance;
The spotted deer bask in the fresh moonlight
Before our gate, and the slow, silent night
Is measured by the pants of their calm sleep. 535
Be this our home in life, and when years heap
Their withered hours, like leaves, on our decay,
Let us become the overhanging day,
The living soul of this Elysian isle –
Conscious, inseparable, one. Meanwhile 540
We two will rise, and sit, and walk together,
Under the roof of blue Ionian weather,
And wander in the meadows, or ascend
The mossy mountains where the blue heavens bend
With lightest winds, to touch their paramour; 545
Or linger where the pebble-paven shore,
Under the quick, faint kisses of the sea
Trembles and sparkles as with ecstasy,
Possessing and possessed by all that is
Within that calm circumference of bliss, 550
And by each other, till to love and live
Be one; or at the noontide hour arrive
Where some old cavern hoar seems yet to keep

The moonlight of the expired night asleep
 Through which the awakened day can never peep – 555
 A veil for our seclusion, close as night's,
 Where secure sleep may kill thine innocent lights;
 Sleep, the fresh dew of languid love, the rain
 Whose drops quench kisses till they burn again.
 And we will talk, until thought's melody 560
 Become too sweet for utterance, and it die
 In words, to live again in looks, which dart
 With thrilling tone into the voiceless heart,
 Harmonizing silence without a sound.
 Our breath shall intermix, our bosoms bound, 565
 And our veins beat together; and our lips
 With other eloquence than words, eclipse
 The soul that burns between them, and the wells
 Which boil under our being's inmost cells,
 The fountains of our deepest life, shall be 570
 Confused in passion's golden purity
 As mountain-springs under the morning sun.
 We shall become the same, we shall be one
 Spirit within two frames – oh wherefore two? –
 One passion in twin-hearts, which grows and grew, 575
 Till like two meteors of expanding flame,
 Those spheres instinct with it become the same,
 Touch, mingle, are transfigured; ever still
 Burning, yet ever inconsumable –
 In one another's substance finding food 580
 Like flames too pure and light and unimbued⁴⁶
 To nourish their bright lives with baser prey,
 Which point to heaven and cannot pass away;
 One hope within two wills, one will beneath
 Two overshadowing minds, one life, one death, 585
 One heaven, one hell, one immortality,
 And one annihilation. Woe is me!
 The winged words on which my soul would pierce

Into the height of love's rare universe
Are chains of lead around its flight of fire – 590
I pant, I sink, I tremble, I expire!

Weak verses, go, kneel at your sovereign's feet,
And say, 'We are the masters of thy slave;
What wouldest thou with us and ours and thine?'
Then call your sisters from oblivion's cave, 595
All singing loud: 'Love's very pain is sweet,
But its reward is in the world divine
Which, if not here, it builds beyond the grave.'
So shall ye live when I am there. Then haste
Over the hearts of men until ye meet 600
Marina, Vanna, Primus and the rest,⁴⁷
And bid them love each other and be blessed,
And leave the troop which errs, and which reproves,
And come and be my guest – for I am love's.

Epipsychidion

¹The poem's title, literally translated from the Greek, means 'a little soul upon a soul'; Epipsychidion is thus a poem praising the Platonic inner soul, akin to the spirit of intellectual beauty, to which Shelley composed a Hymn in 1816 (see p. 1101). The circumstances of the poem's composition and publication are recounted in the headnote, p. 1078 above.

²From Teresa Viviani, Il vero amore: 'The loving soul flings itself outside creation, and creates for itself in the infinite a world all its own, very different from this dark and frightening abyss.'

³*the Sporades* an archipelago of 24 islands off the east coast of Greece, of which only five are inhabited.

4 the Vita Nuova of Dante Dante's 'The New Life' collects his love poems to Beatrice Portinari.

5 'It would be a great shame to him who should rhyme under cover of a figure or rhetorical colouring if afterwards, being asked, he should be unable to strip that cover from his words, so as to give them a real meaning.'

6 Voi, ch' intendendo, il terzo ciel movete from Dante's Convito, Trattato II: 'Oh ye who by understanding the Third Heaven move.' The concluding lines of the Canzone are translated in the nine-line passage that follows.

7 sister of that orphan one Shelley's spirit.

8 Thou moon beyond the clouds! Emilia had written to Shelley, during work on this poem in January 1821: 'I do not adore the moon, but I adore in it, and in the spectacle of Heaven, two of the loveliest works of the Creator: that inspires my fervour more, and reminds me more of the omnipotence of a Christ hanging upon a cross, lacerated, who tears my heart and proves to me the treacherous barbarity of men' (B. C. Barker-Benfield, Shelley's Guitar (Oxford, 1992), p. 147).

9 lights eyes.

10 though the world...shame though the world will fail to value our relationship and demean it by name-calling.

11 Would we two had been twins of the same mother! An allusion to the Song of Solomon 8:1: 'Oh that thou wert as my brother, that sucked the breasts of my mother!'

12 another Mary Shelley.

13 A well of sealed and secret happiness The Song of Solomon refers to a sister as 'a spring shut up, a fountain sealed' (4:12).

14 A star The pole star or north star maintains a fixed position in the heavens.

15 stops Of planetary music the music of the spheres.

16 quivers editorial emendation; the first edition reads 'quiver', but 'quivers' is required for the verb to agree with its subject.

17 the third sphere the sphere of Venus or love.

18 A vision...grave Shelley compares Teresa with April made flesh ('incarnate'), pushing Frost's skeleton ('anatomy') into the grave made for it by the impending summer.

19 Beacon a verb, meaning 'to light up, to illuminate' – in this metaphor, like a lighthouse.

20 those live...Elysian earth Shelley classes himself among those who regard the 'world of life' – that is, the real world – as a 'ravaged' version of Eden, which will be restored at a millennial event in the future ('a later birth').

21 a being an idealized female figure whom Shelley claims to have encountered in visions.

22 storm i.e. the welter of ephemeral, mundane things in the present that obscure our awareness of the past.

23 that best philosophy...martyrdom Shelley commends the philosophy that would have us find glory and fire in the 'cold common hell' of our everyday lives.

24 lodestar the guiding star, usually the pole star.

25 Hesper's setting sphere the evening star.

26 That world...worshipped her Shelley's thoughts worship her, and create a world of their own that is 'mine', one that exists within the chaos of himself ('me').

27 one whose voice was venomed melody Shelley may be recalling a prostitute who gave him venereal disease during his undergraduate years. He believed that his grey hairs were a side-effect of the treatment he had received for it.

28 idol image.

29 One stood on my path usually identified as Mary Shelley.

30 I was laid asleep Shelley echoes Wordsworth's 'Tintern Abbey' 46–7: 'we are laid asleep / In body, and become a living soul.'

31 a sister...mother Shelley alludes to his first wife, Harriet Westbrook, by whom he had two children, Ianthe and Charles. After Harriet committed suicide in 1816, he was denied custody of the children.

32 she Shelley's first wife Harriet.

33 Twin spheres of light i.e. Emilia (sun) and Mary (moon).

34 Thou too, oh comet beautiful and fierce usually identified as Claire Clairmont, Mary Shelley's step-sister, with whom Shelley had an intense relationship. She was at this time in Florence.

35 vestal chaste, virginal.

36 continents those things which contain it.

37 The halcyons brood around the foamless isles Usually identified as a species of kingfisher, the halcyon was believed to breed around the time of the winter solstice in a nest floating on the sea, charming the wind and waves so that the sea was calm during this period.

38 under Ionian skies Ionia refers to the ancient region of central coastal Anatolia in present-day Turkey, which included many small islands in the Aegean.

39 peopled with sweet airs Shelley echoes The Tempest III ii 130–1: ‘The isle is full of noises, / Sounds, and sweet airs, that give delight and hurt not.’

40 that wandering Eden Lucifer Shelley is being witty. Venus, the morning star (‘Lucifer’), appearing just before sunrise, is a ‘wandering Eden’ – ironically, given that Lucifer is also the name of the rebel archangel.

41 a pleasure-house a feature of the poem that may echo the ‘pleasure dome’ in Coleridge’s Kubla Khan or the ‘pleasure-house’ in Wordsworth’s ‘Hart-Leap Well’. Shelley knew both poems.

42 Titanic built by the Titans (the family of giants who contended for the sovereignty of heaven and were overthrown by Zeus).

43 volumes coils.

44 serene clear sky.

45 Parian floors The floors are made of white marble from the Greek island of Paros.

46 unimbued unstained.

A Defence of Poetry; or, Remarks Suggested by an Essay Entitled ‘The Four

Ages of Poetry' (extracts) (composed February–March 1821; first published 1840; edited from MS)¹

According to one mode of regarding those two classes of mental action which are called reason and imagination, the former may be considered as mind contemplating the relations borne by one thought to another, however produced; and the latter, as mind acting upon those thoughts so as to colour them with its own light, and composing from them, as from elements, other thoughts, each containing within itself the principle of its own integrity. The one is the to poiein,² or the principle of synthesis, and has for its objects those forms which are common to universal nature and existence itself; the other is the to logizein,³ or principle of analysis, and its action regards the relations of things simply as relations, considering thoughts not in their integral unity but as the algebraical representations which conduct to certain general results. Reason is the enumeration of quantities already known; imagination the perception of the value of those quantities, both separately and as a whole. Reason respects the differences, and imagination the similitudes of things. Reason is to imagination as the instrument to the agent, as the body to the spirit, as the shadow to the substance.

Poetry, in a general sense, may be defined to be ‘the expression of the imagination’; and poetry is connate⁴ with the origin of man. Man is an instrument over which a series of external and internal impressions are driven, like the alternations of an ever-changing wind over an Aeolian lyre, which move it, by their motion, to ever-changing melody.⁵ But there is a principle within the human being (and perhaps within all sentient beings) which acts otherwise than in the lyre, and produces not melody alone, but harmony, by an internal adjustment of the sounds or motions thus excited to the impressions which excite them. It is as if the lyre could accommodate its chords to the motions of that which strikes them, in a determined proportion of sound – even as the musician can accommodate his voice to the sound of the lyre. A child at play by itself will express its delight by its voice and motions, and every inflection of tone and every gesture will bear exact relation to a corresponding antitype⁶ in the pleasurable impressions which awakened it. It will be the reflected image of that impression – and as the lyre trembles and sounds after the wind has died away, so the child seeks, by prolonging in its voice and motions the duration of the effect, to prolong also a consciousness of the cause. In relation to the objects which delight a child, these expressions are what poetry is to higher objects.

The savage (for the savage is to ages what the child is to years) expresses the emotions produced in him by surrounding objects in a similar manner – and language and gesture, together with plastic or pictorial imitation, become the image of the combined effect of those objects, and of his apprehension of them. Man in society, with all his passions and his pleasures, next becomes the object of the passions and pleasures of man; an additional class of emotions produces an augmented treasure of expressions; and language, gesture, and the imitative arts become at once the representation and the medium, the pencil and the picture, the chisel and the statue, the chord and the harmony. The social sympathies (or those laws from which as from its elements society results) begin to develop themselves from the moment that two human beings coexist; the future is contained within the present as the plant within the seed; and equality, diversity, unity, contrast, mutual dependence, become the principles alone capable of affording the motives according to which the will of a social being is determined to action (inasmuch as he is social), and constitute pleasure in sensation, virtue in sentiment, beauty in art, truth in reasoning, and love in the intercourse of kind. Hence men, even in the infancy of society, observe a certain order in their words and actions distinct from that of the objects and the impressions represented by them, all expression being subject to the laws of that from which it proceeds.

But let us dismiss those more general considerations which might involve an enquiry into the principles of society itself, and restrict our view to the manner in which the imagination is expressed upon its forms. In the youth of the world, men dance and sing and imitate natural objects, observing in these actions (as in all others) a certain rhythm or order. And although all men observe a similar, they observe not the same order in the motions of the dance, in the melody of the song, in the combinations of language, in the series of their imitations of natural objects. For there is a certain order or rhythm belonging to each of these classes of mimetic representation, from which the hearer and the spectator receive an intenser and a purer pleasure than from any other. The sense of an approximation to this order has been called taste by modern writers.⁷ Every man in the infancy of art observes an order which approximates more or less closely to that from which this highest delight results. But the diversity is not sufficiently marked as that its gradations should be sensible,⁸ except in those instances where the predominance of this faculty of approximation to the beautiful (for so we may be permitted to name the relation between this highest pleasure and its cause) is very great. Those in whom it exists in excess are poets, in the most universal sense of the word – and the pleasure resulting from the manner in which they express the influence of society or nature upon their own minds, communicates itself to others, and gathers a sort of reduplication from that community. Their language is vitally metaphorical; that is, it marks the before unapprehended relations of things, and perpetuates their apprehension, until the words which represent them become through time signs for portions or classes of thoughts, instead of pictures of integral thoughts; and then if no new poets should arise to create afresh the associations which have been thus disorganized, language will be dead to all the nobler purposes of human intercourse.

These similitudes or relations are finely said by Lord Bacon⁹ to be ‘the same footsteps of nature impressed upon the various subjects of the world’¹⁰ – and he considers the faculty which perceives them as the storehouse of axioms common to all knowledge. In the infancy of society every author is necessarily a poet, because language itself is poetry; and to be a poet is to apprehend the true and the beautiful, in a word the good which exists in the relation subsisting first between existence and perception, and secondly between perception and expression. Every original language near to its source is in itself the chaos of a cyclic poem: the copiousness of lexicography and the distinctions of grammar are the works of a later age, and are merely the catalogue and the form of the creations of poetry.

But poets, or those who imagine and express this indestructible order, are not only the authors of language and of music, of the dance and architecture and statuary and painting; they are the institutors of laws, and the founders of civil society, and the inventors of the arts of life, and the teachers who draw into a certain propinquity with the beautiful and the true that partial apprehension of the agencies of the invisible world which is called religion. Hence all original religions are allegorical, or susceptible of allegory, and like Janus have a double face of false and true. Poets, according to the circumstances of the age and nation in which they appeared, were called in the earlier epochs of the world legislators or prophets.¹¹ A poet essentially comprises and unites both these characters. For he not only beholds intensely the present as it is, and discovers those laws according to which present things ought to be ordered, but he beholds the future in the present, and his thoughts are the germs of the flower and the fruit of latest time. Not that I assert poets to be prophets in the gross sense of the word, or that they can foretell the form as surely as they foreknow the spirit of events – such is the pretence of superstition which would make poetry an attribute of prophecy, rather than prophecy an attribute of poetry.

A poet participates in the eternal, the infinite, and the one; as far as relates to his conceptions, time and place and number are not. The grammatical forms which express the moods of time, and the difference of persons and the distinction of place are convertible with respect to the highest poetry without injuring it as poetry, and the choruses of Aeschylus, and the Book of Job, and Dante's Paradise would afford, more than any other writings, examples of this fact, if the limits of this paper did not forbid citation. The creations of sculpture, painting, and music, are illustrations still more decisive.

Language, colour, form, and religious and civil habits of action are all the instruments and the materials of poetry; they may be called poetry by that figure of speech which considers the effect as a synonym of the cause. But poetry in a more restricted sense expresses those arrangements of language, and especially metrical language, which are created by that imperial faculty whose throne is curtained within the invisible nature of man. And this springs from the nature itself of language, which is a more direct representation of the actions and passions of our internal being, and is susceptible of more various and delicate combinations, than colour, form, or motion, and is more plastic¹² and obedient to the control of that faculty of which it is the creation. For language is arbitrarily produced by the imagination and has relation to thoughts alone; but all other materials, instruments and conditions of art, have relations among each other which limit and interpose between conception and expression. The former is as a mirror which reflects, the latter as a cloud which enfeebles, the light of which both are mediums of communication. Hence the fame of sculptors, painters and musicians (although the intrinsic powers of the great masters of these arts may yield in no degree to that of those who have employed language as the hieroglyphic of their thoughts) has never equalled that of poets in the restricted sense of the term, as two performers of equal skill will produce unequal effects from a guitar and a harp. The fame of legislators and founders of religions (so long as their institutions last) alone seems to exceed that of poets in the restricted sense – but it can scarcely be a question whether, if we deduct the celebrity which their flattery of the gross opinions of the vulgar usually conciliates, together with that which belonged to them in their higher character of poets, any excess will remain.

We have thus circumscribed the word ‘poetry’ within the limits of that art which is the most familiar and the most perfect expression of the faculty itself. It is necessary however to make the circle still narrower, and to determine the distinction between measured and unmeasured language,¹³ for the popular division into prose and verse is inadmissible in accurate philosophy.

Sounds as well as thoughts have relation both between each other and towards that which they represent, and a perception of the order of those relations has always been found connected with a perception of the order of the relations of thoughts. Hence the language of poets has ever affected a certain uniform and harmonious recurrence of sound, without which it were not poetry, and which is scarcely less indispensable to the communication of its influence than the words themselves, without reference to that peculiar order. Hence the vanity of translation: it were as wise to cast a violet into a crucible that you might discover the formal principle of its colour and odour, as seek to transfuse from one language into another the creations of a poet. The plant must spring again from its seed or it will bear no flower – and this is the burden of the curse of Babel.

An observation of the regular mode of the recurrence of this harmony in the language of poetical minds, together with its relation to music, produced metre, or a certain system of traditional forms of harmony and language. Yet it is by no means essential that a poet should accommodate his language to this traditional form, so that the harmony which is its spirit be observed. The practice is indeed convenient and popular, and to be preferred, especially in such composition as includes much action: but every great poet must inevitably innovate upon the example of his predecessors in the exact structure of his peculiar versification.

The distinction between poets and prose writers is a vulgar error. The distinction between philosophers and poets has been anticipated. Plato was essentially a poet¹⁴ – the truth and splendour of his imagery and the melody of his language is the most intense that it is possible to conceive. He rejected the measure of the epic, dramatic, and lyrical forms, because he sought to kindle a harmony in thoughts divested of shape and action, and he forbore to invent any regular plan of rhythm which would include, under determinate forms, the varied pauses of his style. Cicero¹⁵ sought to imitate the cadence of his periods but with little success. Lord Bacon was a poet.¹⁶ His language has a sweet and majestic rhythm which satisfies the sense no less than the almost superhuman wisdom of his philosophy satisfies the intellect; it is a strain which distends,¹⁷ and then bursts the circumference of the reader's mind, and pours itself forth together with it into the universal element with which it has perpetual sympathy. All the authors of revolutions in opinion are not only necessarily poets as they are inventors, nor even as their words unveil the permanent analogy of things by images which participate in the life of truth – but as their periods¹⁸ are harmonious and rhythmical and contain in themselves the elements of verse, being the echo of the eternal music. Nor are those supreme poets who have employed traditional forms of rhythm on account of the form and action of their subjects, less capable of perceiving and teaching the truth of things, than those who have omitted that form. Shakespeare, Dante and Milton (to confine ourselves to modern writers) are philosophers of the very loftiest power.

A poem is the very image of life expressed in its eternal truth. There is this difference between a story and a poem: that a story is a catalogue of detached facts which have no other bond of connection than time, place, circumstance, cause and effect; the other is the creation of actions according to the unchangeable forms of human nature, as existing in the mind of the creator, which is itself the image of all other minds. The one is partial, and applies only to a definite period of time, and a certain combination of events which can never again recur; the other is universal, and contains within itself the germ of a relation to whatever motives or actions have place in the possible varieties of human nature. Time, which destroys the beauty and the use of the story of particular facts, stripped of the poetry which should invest them, augments that of poetry, and forever develops new and wonderful applications of the eternal truth which it contains. Hence epitomes¹⁹ have been called the moths of just history;²⁰ they eat out the poetry of it. The story of particular facts is as a mirror which obscures and distorts that which should be beautiful: poetry is a mirror which makes beautiful that which is distorted.

The parts of a composition may be poetical, without the composition as a whole being a poem. A single sentence may be considered as a whole though it may be found in the midst of a series of unassimilated portions; a single word even may be a spark of inextinguishable thought. And thus all the great historians – Herodotus, Plutarch, Livy²¹ – were poets; and although the plan of these writers, especially that of Livy, restrained them from developing this faculty in its highest degree, they make copious and ample amends for their subjection, by filling all the interstices of their subject with living images.

Having determined what is poetry and who are poets, let us proceed to estimate its effects upon society.

Poetry is ever accompanied with pleasure: all spirits on which it falls, open themselves to receive the wisdom which is mingled with its delight.²² In the infancy of the world, neither poets themselves nor their auditors are fully aware of the excellency of poetry, for it acts in a divine and unapprehended manner, beyond and above consciousness – and it is reserved for future generations to contemplate and measure the mighty cause and effect in all the strength and splendour of their union. Even in modern times, no living poet ever arrived at the fullness of his fame. The jury which sits in judgement upon a poet, belonging as he does to all time, must be composed of his peers; it must be impanelled²³ by Time from the selectest of the wise of many generations. A poet is a nightingale who sits in darkness and sings to cheer its own solitude with sweet sounds; his auditors are as men entranced by the melody of an unseen musician, who feel that they are moved and softened, yet know not whence or why.²⁴ The poems of Homer and his contemporaries were the delight of infant Greece; they were the elements of that social system which is the column upon which all succeeding civilization has reposed. Homer embodied the ideal perfection of his age in human character – nor can we doubt that those who read his verses were awakened to an ambition of becoming like to Achilles, Hector and Ulysses.²⁵ The truth and beauty of friendship, patriotism and persevering devotion to an object, were unveiled to the depths in these immortal creations; the sentiments of the auditors must have been refined and enlarged by a sympathy with such great and lovely impersonations, until from admiring they imitated, and from imitation they identified themselves with the objects of their admiration. Nor let it be objected that these characters are remote from moral perfection, and that they can by no means be considered as edifying patterns for general imitation. Every epoch under names more or less specious has deified its peculiar errors; revenge is the naked idol of the worship of a semi-barbarous age, and self-deceit is the veiled image of unknown evil before which luxury and satiety²¹ lie prostrate.

But a poet considers the vices of his contemporaries as the temporary dress in which his creations must be arrayed, and which cover without concealing the eternal proportions of their beauty.²⁷ An epic or dramatic personage is understood to wear them around his soul, as he may the ancient armour or the modern uniform around his body – whilst it is easy to conceive a dress more graceful than either. The beauty of the internal nature cannot be so far concealed by its accidental vesture,²⁸ but that the spirit of its form shall communicate itself to the very disguise, and indicate the shape it hides from the manner in which it is worn. A majestic form and graceful motions will express themselves through the most barbarous and tasteless costume. Few poets of the highest class have chosen to exhibit the beauty of their conceptions in its naked truth and splendour, and it is doubtful whether the alloy of costume, habit, etc., be not necessary to temper this planetary music for mortal ears.

The whole objection however of the immorality of poetry rests upon a misconception of the manner in which poetry acts to produce the moral improvement of man. Ethical science²⁹ arranges the elements which poetry has created, and propounds schemes and proposes examples of civil and domestic life. Nor is it for want of admirable doctrines that men hate, and despise, and censure, and deceive, and subjugate one another. But poetry acts in another and a diviner manner. It awakens and enlarges the mind itself by rendering it the receptacle of a thousand unapprehended combinations of thought. Poetry lifts the veil from the hidden beauty of the world, and makes familiar objects be as if they were not familiar; it reproduces all that it represents, and the impersonations clothed in its Elysian³⁰ light stand thenceforward in the minds of those who have once contemplated them as memorials of that gentle and exalted content which extends itself over all thoughts and actions with which it coexists. The great secret of morals is love, or a going out of our own nature, and an identification of ourselves with the beautiful which exists in thought, action, or person not our own. A man, to be greatly good, must imagine intensely and comprehensively; he must put himself in the place of another and of many others; the pains and pleasures of his species must become his own. The great instrument of moral good is the imagination – and poetry administers to the effect by acting upon the cause.³¹

Poetry enlarges the circumference of the imagination by replenishing it with thoughts of ever-new delight which have the power of attracting and assimilating to their own nature all other thoughts, and which form new intervals and interstices whose void forever craves fresh food. Poetry strengthens the faculty which is the organ of the moral nature of man, in the same manner as exercise strengthens a limb. A poet therefore would do ill to embody his own conceptions of right and wrong (which are usually those of his place and time) in his poetical creations (which participate in neither). By this assumption of the inferior office of interpreting the effect, in which perhaps after all he might acquit himself but imperfectly, he would resign a glory in a participation in the cause. There was little danger that Homer, or any of the eternal poets, should have so far misunderstood themselves as to have abdicated this throne of their widest dominion. Those in whom the poetical faculty, though great, is less intense (as Euripides, Lucan, Tasso, Spenser)³² have frequently affected a moral aim, and the effect of their poetry is diminished in exact proportion to the degree in which they compel us to advert to³³ this purpose....

The poetry of Dante³⁴ may be considered as the bridge thrown over the stream of time, which unites the modern and the ancient world. The distorted notions of invisible things which Dante and his rival Milton have idealized, are merely the mask and the mantle in which these great poets walk through eternity enveloped and disguised. It is a difficult question to determine how far they were conscious of the distinction which must have subsisted³⁵ in their minds between their own creed and that of the people. Dante at least appears to wish to mark the full extent of it by placing Riphæus (whom Virgil calls 'justissimus unus')³⁶ in Paradise, and observing a most heretical caprice in his distribution of rewards and punishments. And Milton's poem contains within itself a philosophical refutation of that system of which, by a strange but natural antithesis, it has been a chief popular support.

Nothing can exceed the energy and magnificence of the character of Satan as expressed in Paradise Lost. It is a mistake to suppose that he could ever have been intended for the popular personification of evil. Implacable hate, patient cunning, and a sleepless refinement of device to inflict the extremest anguish on an enemy – these things are evil; and, although venial³⁷ in a slave, are not to be forgiven in a tyrant; although redeemed by much that ennobles his defeat in one subdued, are marked by all that dishonours his conquest in the victor. Milton's Devil as a moral being is as far superior to his God as one who perseveres in some purpose which he has conceived to be excellent in spite of adversity and torture, is to one who in the cold security of undoubted triumph inflicts the most horrible revenge upon his enemy, not from any mistaken notion of inducing him to repent of a perseverance in enmity, but with the alleged design of exasperating him to deserve new torments. Milton has so far violated the popular creed (if this shall be judged to be a violation) as to have alleged no superiority of moral virtue to his God over his Devil. And this bold neglect of a direct moral purpose is the most decisive proof of the supremacy of Milton's genius. He mingled, as it were, the elements of human nature as colours upon a single palette, and arranged them into the composition of his great picture according to the laws of epic truth; that is, according to the laws of that principle by which a series of actions of the external universe and of intelligent and ethical beings is calculated to excite the sympathy of succeeding generations of mankind. The Divina Commedia and Paradise Lost have conferred upon modern mythology a systematic form; and when change and time shall have added one more superstition to the mass of those which have arisen and decayed upon the earth, commentators will be learnedly employed in elucidating the religion of ancestral Europe, only not utterly forgotten because it will have been stamped with the eternity of genius.

Homer was the first, and Dante the second, epic poet – that is, the second poet the series of whose creations bore a defined and intelligible relation to the knowledge, and sentiment, and religion, and political conditions of the age in which he lived, and of the ages which followed it, developing itself in correspondence with their development. For Lucretius had limed³⁸ the wings of his swift spirit in the dregs of the sensible³⁹ world; and Virgil, with a modesty which ill became his genius, had affected the fame of an imitator even whilst he created anew all that he copied; and none among the flock of mock-birds, though their notes were sweet (Apollonius Rhodius, Quintus Calaber Smyrnaeus, Nonnus, Lucan, Staius, or Claudian),⁴⁰ have sought even to fulfil a single condition of epic truth. Milton was the third epic poet. For, if the title of epic in its highest sense is to be refused to the Aeneid, still less can it be conceded to the Orlando

Furioso,⁴¹ the Gerusalemme Liberata, The Lusiad,⁴² or The Faerie Queene.

Dante and Milton were both deeply penetrated with the ancient religion of the civilized world – and its spirit exists in their poetry probably in the same proportion as its forms survived in the unreformed worship of modern Europe.⁴³ The one preceded and the other followed the Reformation at almost equal intervals. Dante was the first religious reformer, and Luther surpassed him rather in the rudeness and acrimony, than in the boldness of his censures of papal usurpation.⁴⁴ Dante was the first awakener of entranced Europe; he created a language in itself music and persuasion out of a chaos of inharmonious barbarisms; he was the congregator of those great spirits who presided over the resurrection of learning, the Lucifer⁴⁵ of that starry flock which in the thirteenth century shone forth from republican Italy, as from a heaven, into the darkness of the benighted world. His very words are instinct⁴⁶ with spirit – each is as a spark, a burning atom of inextinguishable thought, and many yet lie covered in the ashes of their birth, and pregnant with a lightning which has yet found no conductor. All high poetry is infinite; it is as the first acorn, which contained all oaks potentially. Veil after veil may be undrawn, and the inmost naked beauty of the meaning never exposed. A great poem is a fountain forever overflowing with the waters of wisdom and delight – and after one person or one age has exhausted all its divine effluence⁴⁷ which its peculiar relations enable them to share, another and yet another succeeds, and new relations are ever developed, the source of an unforeseen and an unconceived delight.

The age immediately succeeding to that of Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio, was characterized by a revival of painting, sculpture, music, and architecture. Chaucer caught the sacred inspiration, and the superstructure of English literature is based upon the materials of Italian invention.

But let us not be betrayed from a defence into a critical history of poetry and its influence on society. Be it enough to have pointed out the effects of poetry (in the large and true sense of the word) upon their own and all succeeding times, and to revert to the partial instances cited as illustrations of an opinion the reverse of that attempted to be established by the author of ‘The Four Ages of Poetry’.⁴⁸

But poets have been challenged to resign the civic crown⁴⁹ to reasoners and mechanists on another plea. It is admitted that the exercise of the imagination is more delightful, but it is alleged that that of the reason is more useful. Let us examine as the grounds of this distinction what is here meant by utility. Pleasure or good in a general sense is that which the consciousness of a sensitive and intelligent being seeks, and in which, when found, it acquiesces. There are two modes or degrees of pleasure – one durable, universal, and permanent; the other transitory and particular. Utility may either express the means of producing the former or the latter. In the former sense, whatever strengthens and purifies the affections, enlarges the imagination, and adds a spirit to sense, is useful. But the meaning in which the author of ‘The Four Ages of Poetry’ seems to have employed the word utility is the narrower one of banishing the importunity of the wants of our animal nature, the surrounding men with security of life, the dispersing the grosser delusions of superstition, and the conciliating such a degree of mutual forbearance among men as may consist with the motives of personal advantage.

Undoubtedly the promoters of utility in this limited sense have their appointed office in society. They follow the footsteps of poets, and copy the sketches of their creations into the book of common life. They make space, and give time. Their exertions are of the highest value so long as they confine their administration of the concerns of the inferior powers of our nature within the limits of what is due to the superior ones. But whilst the sceptic destroys gross superstitions, let him spare to deface, as some of the French writers have defaced, the eternal truths charactered⁵⁰ upon the imaginations of men. Whilst the mechanist abridges,⁵¹ and the political economist combines labour,⁵² let them beware that their speculations, for want of a correspondence with those first principles which belong to the imagination, do not tend, as they have in modern England, to exasperate at once the extremes of luxury and want.⁵³ They have exemplified the saying, ‘To him that hath, more shall be given; and from him that hath not, the little that he hath shall be taken away'.⁵⁴ The rich have become richer, and the poor have become poorer; and the vessel of the state is driven between the Scylla and Charybdis⁵⁵ of anarchy and despotism. Such are the effects which must ever flow from an unmitigated exercise of the calculating faculty.

It is difficult to define pleasure in its highest sense, the definition involving a number of apparent paradoxes. For, from an inexplicable defect of harmony in the constitution of human nature, the pain of the inferior is frequently connected with the pleasure of the superior portions of our being. Sorrow, terror, anguish, despair itself are often the chosen expressions of an approximation to the highest good. Our sympathy in tragic fiction depends on this principle; tragedy delights by affording a shadow of the pleasure which exists in pain. This is the source also of the melancholy which is inseparable from the sweetest melody.⁵⁶ The pleasure that is in sorrow is sweeter than the pleasure of pleasure itself – and hence the saying, 'It is better to go to the house of mourning than to the house of mirth'.⁵⁷ Not that this highest species of pleasure is necessarily linked with pain. The delight of love and friendship, the ecstasy of the admiration of nature, the joy of the perception and still more of the creation of poetry is often wholly unalloyed.

The production and assurance of pleasure in this highest sense is true utility; those who produce and preserve this pleasure are poets or poetical philosophers.

The exertions of Locke, Hume, Gibbon, Voltaire, Rousseau,⁵⁸ and their disciples, in favour of oppressed and deluded humanity, are entitled to the gratitude of mankind. Yet it is easy to calculate the degree of moral and intellectual improvement which the world would have exhibited had they never lived. A little more nonsense would have been talked for a century or two, and perhaps a few more men, women and children burnt as heretics. We might not at this moment have been congratulating each other on the abolition of the Inquisition in Spain.⁵⁹ But it exceeds all imagination to conceive what would have been the moral condition of the world if neither Dante, Petrarch, Boccaccio, Chaucer, Shakespeare,

Calderón,⁶⁰ Lord Bacon, nor Milton, had ever existed; if Raphael and Michelangelo had never been born; if the Hebrew poetry had never been translated; if a revival of a study of Greek literature had never taken place; if no monuments of ancient sculpture had been handed down to us; and if the poetry of the religion of the ancient world had been extinguished together with its belief. The human mind could never, except by the intervention of these excitements, have been awakened to the invention of those grosser⁶¹ sciences, and that application of analytical reasoning to the aberrations of society, which it is now attempted to exalt over the direct expression of the inventive and creative faculty itself.

We have more moral, political and historical wisdom than we know how to reduce into practice; we have more scientific and economical knowledge than can be accommodated to the just distribution of the produce which they multiply. The poetry in these systems of thought is concealed by the accumulation of facts and calculating processes. There is no want of knowledge respecting what is wisest and best in morals, government, and political economy – or at least, what is wiser and better than what men now practise and endure. But we let ‘I dare not wait upon I would, like the poor cat i’ the adage.’⁶² We want the creative faculty to imagine that which we know; we want the generous impulse to act that which we imagine; we want the poetry of life – our calculations have outrun conception; we have eaten more than we can digest. The cultivation of those sciences which have enlarged the limits of the empire of man over the external world, has, for want of the poetical faculty, proportionally circumscribed those of the internal world – and man, having enslaved the elements, remains himself a slave. To what but to a cultivation of the mechanical arts in a degree disproportioned to the presence of the creative faculty (which is the basis of all knowledge) is to be attributed the abuse of all inventions for abridging and combining labour, to the exasperation of the inequality of mankind? From what other cause has it arisen that these inventions which should have lightened, have added a weight to the curse imposed on Adam?⁶³ Thus, poetry, and the principle of self (of which money is the visible incarnation) are the God and the Mammon of the world.⁶⁴

The functions of the poetical faculty are twofold: by one it creates new materials for knowledge and power and pleasure; by the other it engenders in the mind a desire to reproduce and arrange them according to a certain rhythm and order which may be called the beautiful and the good. The cultivation of poetry is never more to be desired than at periods when, from an excess of the selfish and calculating principle, the accumulation of the materials of external life exceed the quantity of the power of assimilating them to the internal laws of human nature. The body has then become too unwieldy for that which animates it.

Poetry is indeed something divine. It is at once the centre and the circumference of knowledge; it is that which comprehends all science, and that to which all science must be referred. It is at the same time the root and the blossom of all other systems of thought. It is that from which all spring, and that which adorns all – and that which, if blighted, denies the fruit and the seed, and withholds from the barren world the nourishment and the succession of the scions⁶⁵ of the tree of life. It is the perfect and consummate⁶⁶ surface and bloom of things; it is as the odour and the colour of the rose to the texture of the elements which compose it, as the form and the splendour of unfaded beauty to the secrets of anatomy and corruption. What were virtue, love, patriotism, friendship etc.; what were the scenery of this beautiful universe which we inhabit; what were our consolations on this side of the grave; and what were our aspirations beyond it – if poetry did not ascend to bring light and fire from those eternal regions where the owl-winged faculty of calculation dare not ever soar? Poetry is not like reasoning, a power to be exerted according to the determination of the will. A man cannot say, ‘I will compose poetry’. The greatest poet even cannot say it: for the mind in creation is as a fading coal which some invisible influence, like an inconstant wind, awakens to transitory brightness. This power arises from within, like the colour of a flower which fades and changes as it is developed, and the conscious portions of our natures are unprophetic either of its approach or its departure. Could this influence be durable in its original purity and force, it is impossible to predict the greatness of the results – but when composition begins, inspiration is already on the decline, and the most glorious poetry that has ever been communicated to the world is probably a feeble shadow of the original conception of the poet. I appeal to the greatest poets of the present day, whether it be not an error to assert that the finest passages of poetry are produced by labour and study. The toil and the delay recommended by critics can be justly interpreted to mean no more than a careful observation of the inspired moments, and an artificial connection of the spaces between them by the intertexture of conventional expressions; a necessity only imposed by a limitedness of the poetical faculty itself. For Milton conceived the Paradise Lost as a whole before he executed it in portions. We have his own authority also for the muse having ‘dictated’ to him the ‘unpremeditated song’,⁶⁷ and let this be an answer to those who would allege the fifty-six various readings of the first line of the Orlando Furioso. Compositions so produced are to poetry what mosaic is to painting. This instinct and intuition of the poetical faculty is still more observable in the plastic and pictorial arts:⁶⁸ a great statue or picture grows under the power of the artist as a child in the mother’s womb, and the very mind which directs the hands in formation is incapable of accounting to itself for the origin, the gradations, or the media of the process.

Poetry is the record of the best and happiest moments of the happiest and best minds. We are aware of evanescent visitations of thought and feeling sometimes associated with place or person, sometimes regarding our own mind alone, and always arising unforeseen and departing unbidden, but elevating and delightful beyond all expression – so that even in the desire and the regret they leave, there cannot but be pleasure, participating as it does in the nature of its object. It is, as it were, the interpenetration of a diviner nature through our own, but its footsteps are like those of a wind over a sea, which the coming calm erases, and whose traces remain only as on the wrinkled sand which paves it.

These, and corresponding conditions of being, are experienced principally by those of the most delicate sensibility and the most enlarged imagination – and the state of mind produced by them is at war with every base desire. The enthusiasm of virtue, love, patriotism and friendship, is essentially linked with these emotions; and whilst they last, self appears as what it is – an atom to a universe. Poets are not only subject to these experiences as spirits of the most refined organization, but they can colour all that they combine with the evanescent hues of this ethereal world; a word or a trait in the representation of a scene or a passion, will touch the enchanted chord, and reanimate, in those who have ever experienced these emotions, the sleeping, the cold, the buried image of the past. Poetry thus makes immortal all that which is best and most beautiful in the world; it arrests the vanishing apparitions which haunt the interlunations⁶⁹ of life, and veiling them in language or in form sends them forth among mankind, bearing sweet news of kindred joy to those with whom their sisters abide – abide, because there is no portal of expression from the caverns of the spirit which they inhabit, into the universe of things. Poetry redeems from decay the visitations of the divinity in man.

Poetry turns all things to loveliness: it exalts the beauty of that which is most beautiful, and it adds beauty to that which is most deformed; it marries exultation and horror, grief and pleasure, eternity and change; it subdues to union under its light yoke all irreconcilable things. It transmutes all that it touches, and every form moving within the radiance of its presence is changed by wondrous sympathy to an incarnation of the spirit which it breathes; its secret alchemy turns to potable gold⁷⁰ the poisonous waters which flow from death through life; it strips the veil of familiarity from the world, and lays bare the naked and sleeping beauty which is the spirit of its forms.⁷¹

All things exist as they are perceived, at least in relation to the percipient: ‘The mind is its own place, and of itself can make a heaven of hell, a hell of heaven’.⁷² But poetry defeats the curse which binds us to be subjected to the accident of surrounding impressions. And whether it spreads its own figured⁷³ curtain or withdraws life’s dark veil from before the scene of things, it equally creates for us a being within our being. It makes us the inhabitants of a world to which the familiar world is a chaos. It reproduces the common universe of which we are portions and percipients, and it purges from our inward sight the film of familiarity which obscures from us the wonder of our being. It compels us to feel that which we perceive, and to imagine that which we know. It creates anew the universe after it has been annihilated in our minds by the recurrence of impressions blunted by reiteration. It justifies that bold and true word of Tasso: ‘Non merita nome di creatore, sennon Iddio ed il Poeta’.⁷⁴

A poet, as he is the author to others of the highest wisdom, pleasure, virtue and glory, so he ought personally to be the happiest, the best, the wisest, and the most illustrious of men. As to his glory, let time be challenged to declare whether the fame of any other institutor of human life be comparable to that of a poet. That he is the wisest, the happiest, and the best, inasmuch as he is a poet, is equally incontrovertible: the greatest poets have been men of the most spotless virtue, of the most consummate prudence, and (if we could look into the interior of their lives) the most fortunate of men. And the exceptions, as they regard those who possessed the imaginative faculty in a high yet an inferior degree, will be found on consideration to confirm rather than destroy the rule. Let us for a moment stoop to the arbitration⁷⁵ of popular breath, and usurping and uniting in our own persons the incompatible characters of accuser, witness, judge and executioner, let us without trial, testimony, or form, determine that certain motives of those who are ‘there sitting where we dare not soar’⁷⁶ are reprehensible. Let us assume that Homer was a drunkard, that Virgil was a flatterer, that Horace was a coward, that Tasso was a madman, that Lord Bacon was a speculator,⁷⁷ that Raphael was a libertine, that Spenser was a Poet Laureate.⁷⁸ It is inconsistent with this division of our subject to cite living poets, but posterity has done ample justice to the great names now referred to. Their errors have been weighed and have been found as dust in the balance – if their sins ‘were as scarlet, they are now white as snow’;⁷⁹ they have been washed in the blood of the mediator and the redeemer Time. Observe in what a ludicrous chaos the imputations of real and of fictitious crime have been confused in the contemporary calumnies against poetry and poets; consider how little is as it appears – or appears as it is; look to your own motives, and judge not lest ye be judged.⁸⁰

Poetry, as has been said, in this respect differs from logic: that it is not subject to the control of the active powers of the mind, and that its birth and recurrence has no necessary connection with consciousness or will. It is presumptuous to determine that these are the necessary conditions of all mental causation, when mental effects are experienced insusceptible of being referred to them. The frequent recurrence of the poetical power, it is obvious to suppose, may produce in the mind an habit of order and harmony correlative with its own nature and with its effects upon other minds. But in the intervals of inspiration (and they may be frequent without being durable) a poet becomes a man, and is abandoned to the sudden reflux⁸¹ of the influences under which others habitually live. But as he is more delicately organized than other men, and sensible to pain and pleasure (both his own and that of others) in a degree unknown to them, he will avoid the one and pursue the other with an ardour proportioned to this difference. And he renders himself obnoxious to calumny, when he neglects to observe the circumstances under which these objects of universal pursuit and flight have disguised themselves in one another's garments.

But there is nothing necessarily evil in this error, and thus cruelty, envy, revenge, avarice, and the passions purely evil, have never formed any portion of the popular imputations on the lives of poets.

I have thought it most favourable to the cause of truth to set down these remarks according to the order in which they were suggested to my mind by a consideration of the subject itself, instead of following that of the treatise which excited me to make them public. Thus, although devoid of the formality of a polemical reply, if the views which they contain be just, they will be found to involve a refutation of the doctrines of 'The Four Ages of Poetry', so far at least as regards the first division of the subject. I can readily conjecture what should have moved the gall⁸² of the learned and intelligent author of that paper; I confess myself, like him, unwilling to be stunned by the Theseids of the hoarse Codri of the day.⁸³ Bavius and Maevis undoubtedly are, as they ever were, insufferable persons.⁸⁴ But it belongs to a philosophical critic to distinguish rather than confound.

The first part of these remarks has related to poetry in its elements and principles; and it has been shown, as well as the narrow limits assigned them would permit, that what is called poetry in a restricted sense has a common source with all other forms of order and of beauty according to which the materials of human life are susceptible of being arranged, and which is poetry in an universal sense.

The second part⁸⁵ will have for its object an application of these principles to the present state of the cultivation of poetry, and a defence of the attempt to idealize the modern forms of manners and opinion, and compel them into a subordination to the imaginative and creative faculty. For the literature of England, an energetic development of which has ever preceded or accompanied a great and free development of the national will, has arisen, as it were, from a new birth. In spite of the low-thoughted envy which would undervalue contemporary merit, our own will be a memorable age in intellectual achievements, and we live among such philosophers and poets as surpass beyond comparison any who have appeared since the last national struggle for civil and religious liberty. The most unfailing herald, companion, or follower of the awakening of a great people to work a beneficial change in opinion or institution, is poetry. At such periods there is an accumulation of the power of communicating and receiving intense and impassioned conceptions respecting man and nature. The persons in whom this power resides may often (as far as regards many portions of their nature) have little apparent correspondence with that spirit of good of which they are the ministers.⁸⁶ But even whilst they deny and abjure,⁸⁷ they are yet compelled to serve the power which is seated upon the throne of their own soul. It is impossible to read the compositions of the most celebrated writers of the present day without being startled with the electric life which burns within their words. They measure the circumference and sound the depths of human nature with a comprehensive and all-penetrating spirit, and they are themselves perhaps the most sincerely astonished at its manifestations, for it is less their own spirit than the spirit of the age. Poets are the hierophants⁸⁸ of an unapprehended inspiration, the mirrors of the gigantic shadows which futurity casts upon the present, the words which express what they understand not; the trumpets which sing to battle, and feel not what they inspire; the influence which is moved not, but moves. Poets are the unacknowledged legislators of the world.

A Defence of Poetry

1Inspired by Thomas Love Peacock's essay, 'The Four Ages of Poetry', published in Ollier's Literary Miscellany (1820). Peacock's argument was that classical poetry passed through four ages: (1) an iron age of warriors, heroes and gods; (2) a golden age of recollection (Homeric); (3) a silver age in which poetry took new forms and recreated itself (Virgilian); and (4) the brass age, a second childhood in which it regressed to the crudities of the iron age. Then came the dark ages, and then the 'four ages' of modern poetry. The romantic age, Peacock argued, is that of brass, in which the poet is half-barbarian, living in the past, with an outmoded way of thinking. Shelley had read it by 20 January 1821, and told Ollier (his and Peacock's publisher) that it 'has excited my polemical faculties so violently, that the moment I get rid of ophthalmia I mean to set about an answer to it, which I will send you, if you please. It is very clever, but, I think, very false' (Jones ii 258). Shelley began his response in late February; Part I was finished by 20 March. He sent it to Ollier, promising another two Parts after its publication. Unfortunately, the Literary Miscellany failed, and Part I of the 'Defence' did not appear; Shelley was drowned in 1822 without completing it or seeing Part I into print. It was published in 1840. Of the various influences on it, the two most obvious are Wordsworth's Preface to Lyrical Ballads and Sir Philip Sidney's Apologie for Poetrie.

2*to poiein* 'making' – the source of the word 'poet'.

3*to logizein* 'reasoning', 'calculating'.

4*connate* coeval, as old as.

5*Man is an instrument...melody* cf. Shelley's 'Essay on Christianity': 'There is a power by which we are surrounded, like the atmosphere in which some motionless lyre is suspended, which visits with its breath our silent chords at will.'

6 antitype ‘that which is shadowed forth or represented by the “type” or symbol’ (OED).

7 has been called taste by modern writers most notably Hazlitt, who, in his ‘Essay on Taste’ (1818), wrote: ‘Genius is the power of producing excellence: taste is the power of perceiving the excellence thus produced in its several sorts and degrees, with all their force, refinement, distinctions, and connections’ (Howe xvii 57). Other writers on the subject include Coleridge (in Biographia Literaria), Burke and Hume.

8 sensible perceptible.

9 Francis Bacon, Baron Verulam, Viscount St Albans (1561–1626), Lord Chancellor of England, philosopher and essayist. His work appealed to Shelley because he was a Neoplatonist.

10 Of the Advancement of Learning (1605), Book II, Chapter 5: ‘Are not the organs of the senses of one kind with the organs of reflection, the eye with a glass ...? Neither are these only similitudes, as men of narrow observation may conceive them to be, but the same footsteps of Nature, treading or printing upon several subjects or matters.’

11 prophets In his Apologie for Poetrie, Sir Philip Sidney had observed: ‘Among the Romans a poet was called “Vates”, which is as much as a diviner, foreseer, or prophet ... so heavenly a title did that excellent people bestow upon this heart-ravishing knowledge.’

12 plastic susceptible to the artist’s creative power.

13 measured and unmeasured language Shelley is looking for a more accurate definition of poetry and prose than that popularly conceived.

14 Plato was essentially a poet again, Shelley follows Sidney, who wrote in his Apologie: ‘Of all philosophers he [Plato] is the most poetical.’

15 Marcus Tullius Cicero (106–43 BCE), Roman statesman and man of letters.

16 ‘see the Filium Labyrinthi, and the Essay on Death particularly’ (Shelley’s note).

17 distends expands.

18 periods sentences.

19 epitomes summary accounts.

20 Bacon, Of the Advancement of Learning Book II, Chapter 2: ‘As for the corruptions and moths of history, which are epitomes, the use of them deserveth to be banished, as all men of sound judgment have confessed, as those that have fretted and corroded the sound bodies of many excellent histories, and wrought them into base and unprofitable dregs.’

21 Herodotus, Plutarch, Livy historians of ancient Greece and Rome: Herodotus (c.480–c.425 BCE) wrote the first Greek history in nine books about the struggle between Asia and Greece, from Croesus to Xerxes; Plutarch (c.46–c.120 CE) wrote the Parallel Lives of eminent Romans and Greeks; Titus Livius (59 BCE–17 CE) wrote a history of Rome in 142 books, 35 of which are extant.

22 Poetry...delight Shelley echoes Sidney’s remark that the poet ‘cometh to you with words set in delightful proportion, either accompanied with, or prepared for the well enchanting skill of music; and with a tale forsooth he cometh unto you, with a tale which holdeth children from play, and old men from the chimney corner; and, pretending no more, doth intend the winning of the mind from wickedness to virtue.’

23 impanelled summoned, chosen.

24 A poet...or why cf. 'To a Skylark' 36–40.

25 Achilles, Hector and Ulysses heroes in the Trojan war.

26 luxury and satiety lust and excessive gratification.

27 But a poet...beauty cf. Shelley's remark in a letter to the Gisbornes of 13 July 1821: 'Poets, the best of them, are a very chameleonic race: they take the colour not only of what they feed on, but of the very leaves under which they pass' (Jones ii 308). This is close to Keats's notion of negative capability, which also uses the metaphor of a chameleon; see his letter to Woodhouse of 27 October 1818 (p. 1424).

28 accidental vesture i.e. outward appearance.

29 Ethical science the science (or philosophy) of ethics.

30 Elysian divine.

31 A man...upon the cause a fundamental principal in Shelley's philosophy.

32 Euripides, Lucan, Tasso, Spenser Euripides (c.480–406 BCE), one of the three great Attic tragedians, author of Orestes, Medea, Bacchae, among others; Marcus Annaeus Lucanus (39–65 CE), whose one surviving poem is the Pharsalia, the greatest Latin epic after the Aeneid; Torquato Tasso (1544–95) was the author of the epic Gerusalemme Liberata (1575).

33 advert to take notice of.

34 The poetry of Dante Shelley read Dante in the original and in the blank verse translation of H. F. Cary (1775–1844), which began with the Inferno (1805), and continued in 1812 with Purgatorio and Paradiso. He visited Dante's tomb at Ravenna in August 1821 (Jones ii 335).

35 subsisted existed.

36 ‘The one man who was most just’ (Aeneid ii 426). Dante places the Trojan Rhipheus in Paradise, even though he died before Christ’s birth (Paradiso xx).

37 venial pardonable.

38 limed birds were caught by smearing bird-lime, a sticky substance, on twigs where they perched.

39 sensible perceived.

40 Apollonius Rhodius...Claudian minor classical poets: Apollonius Rhodius (c.295–215 BCE), author of Argonautica; Quintus Smyrnaeus (fourth century CE), called Calaber because of the discovery in Calabria of the only known MS of his Posthomerica, a 14-book sequel to Homer; Nonnus (c.400 CE), author of a Greek epic in 48 books on the adventures of the god Dionysus, Dionysiaca; Publius Papinius Statius (c.40–c.96 CE), author of the Thebaid; Claudius Claudianus, Roman poet of the fourth century CE, author of the epic Rape of Proserpine. For Lucan see p. 1239 n. 32.

41 Orlando Furioso epic by Ariosto.

42 The Lusiad epic by Luiz de Camoëns.

43 the unreformed worship of modern Europe i.e. the domination of the Roman Catholic Church.

44 papal usurpation wrongful assumption of supreme authority of the Pope.

45 Lucifer i.e. light-bearer.

46 instinct imbued.

47 effluence emanations.

48 the author of 'The Four Ages of Poetry' Thomas Love Peacock (see p. 1233 n. 1).

49 civic crown (corona civica) a garland of oak leaves and acorns, bestowed as a much-prized distinction upon one who saved the life of a fellow-citizen in war, here meant as the emblem of public utility.

50 charactered represented.

51 the mechanist abridges by inventing machines that reduce the need for labour.

52 the political economist combines labour by organizing workers in the most efficient manner.

53 luxury and want excessive overindulgence and desperate poverty.

54 Matthew 25:29.

55 Scylla and Charybdis dangerous cave of the monster Scylla, and a whirlpool, which demolished part of Ulysses' fleet in the Odyssey.

56 This is the source...melody cf. 'To a Skylark' 90: 'Our sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest thought.'

57 Ecclesiastes 7:2.

58 'I follow the classification adopted by the author of "The Four Ages of Poetry", but Rousseau was essentially a poet. The others, even Voltaire, were mere reasoners' (Shelley's note).

59 We might not...Spain The Spanish Inquisition was suppressed in 1820, restored in 1823, and abolished finally in 1834.

60 Pedro Calderón de la Barca (1600–81), whose plays Shelley was reading in Spanish in August 1819; as he told Peacock: ‘A kind of Shakespeare is this Calderon, and I have some thoughts, if I find that I cannot do anything better, of translating some of his plays’ (Jones ii 115).

61 grosser more materialistic, to do with the physical world.

62 Macbeth I vii 44–5.

63 the curse imposed on Adam at Genesis 3:17–19.

64 the God and the Mammon of the world ‘No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon’ (Matthew 6:24).

65 scions shoots, buds.

66 consummate complete.

67 We have...song a reference to Paradise Lost ix 21–4, where Milton says that Urania, his ‘celestial patroness’, ‘dictates to me slumbering, or inspires / Easy my unpremeditated verse’.

68 the plastic and pictorial arts sculpture and painting.

69 interlunations dark intervals.

70 potable gold the elixir of life, potable (drinkable) gold, was the goal of the alchemist. There are rivers of it at Paradise Lost iii 608–9.

71 it strips...forms probably a recollection of Biographia Literaria chapter 14, where Coleridge says that Wordsworth aimed to remove ‘the film of familiarity’ from ‘the wonders of the world before us’ (see p. 712).

72 Paradise Lost i 254–5.

73 figured patterned.

74 ‘None deserves the name of creator except God and the poet’; from Pierantonio Serassi’s Life of Torquato Tasso (1785).

75 arbitration judgement.

76 Paradise Lost iv 829.

77 peculator embezzler of public money.

78 Poet Laureate Although he liked him when he met him (see headnote, p. 1071 above), Shelley thought that Southey’s acceptance of the Laureateship marked his total abandonment of his youthful radicalism.

79 A paraphrase of Isaiah 1:18.

80 judge not lest ye be judged There are a number of scriptural echoes; see Daniel 5:27; Isaiah 40:15; Revelation 7:14; Hebrews 9:15; and Matthew 7:1.

81 reflux flowing back.

82 gall bitterness. Peacock had argued that the poets of the present day were barbarians.

83 unwilling to be stunned...day Codrus was the name applied by Roman poets to bad writers who annoyed others by reading aloud their feeble outpourings. Juvenal had criticized Codrus’ Theseid in the first of his satires.

84 Bavius and Maevius...persons Bavius and Maevius were mediocre poets mocked by Virgil (Eclogues iii 90–1) and (Maevius only) Horace (Epode x). William Gifford was the author of The Baviad (1794) and The Maeviad (1795) in which he lampooned the Della Cruscans (mannered poetasters of the 1780s and 1790s) and their ilk. Shelley refers to the proliferation of bad poetry in his own day; as he told Peacock, 21 March 1821: ‘The Bavii and Maevii of the day are very fertile’ (Jones ii 276).

85 The second part never written by Shelley (see p. 1233 n. 1).

86 The persons...ministers Shelley may be thinking of Southey and Wordsworth, who had both, in Shelley’s eyes, betrayed the cause of ‘civil and religious liberty’; like Byron, he regarded both as traitors to the radical cause.

87 abjure recant.

88 hierophants expounders.

Adonais: An Elegy on the Death of John Keats, author of Endymion, Hyperion, etc. (1821; composed between 11 April and 8 June 1821)¹

Lament for Bion*)³

It is my intention to subjoin to the London edition of this poem,⁴ a criticism upon the claims of its lamented object to be classed among the writers of the highest genius who have adorned our age. My known repugnance to the narrow principles of taste on which several of his earlier compositions were modelled, prove at least that I am an impartial judge. I consider the fragment of *Hyperion*⁵ as second to nothing that was ever produced by a writer of the same years.

John Keats died at Rome of a consumption in his twenty-fourth year, on the — of — 1821,⁶ and was buried in the romantic and lonely cemetery of the protestants in that city, under the pyramid which is the tomb of Cestius, and the massy walls and towers, now mouldering and desolate, which formed the circuit of ancient Rome. The cemetery is an open space among the ruins covered in winter with violets and daisies. It might make one in love with death⁷ to think that one should be buried in so sweet a place.⁸

The genius⁹ of the lamented person to whose memory I have dedicated these unworthy verses was not less delicate and fragile than it was beautiful; and where canker-worms abound, what wonder if its young flower was blighted in the bud? The savage criticism on his Endymion, which appeared in the Quarterly Review, produced the most violent effect on his susceptible mind; the agitation thus originated ended in the rupture of a blood-vessel in the lungs; a rapid consumption ensued, and the succeeding acknowledgements from more candid critics of the true greatness of his powers, were ineffectual to heal the wound thus wantonly inflicted.¹⁰

It may be well said that these wretched men know not what they do.¹¹ They scatter their insults and their slanders without heed as to whether the poisoned shaft lights on a heart made callous by many blows, or one like Keats', composed of more penetrable stuff.¹² One of their associates is, to my knowledge, a most base and unprincipled calumniator.¹³ As to Endymion – was it a poem (whatever might be its defects) to be treated contemptuously by those who had celebrated with various degrees of complacency and panegyric, Paris, and Woman, and A Syrian Tale, and Mrs. Lefanu, and Mr. Barrett, and Mr Howard Payne,¹⁴ and a long list of the illustrious obscure? Are these the men who, in their venal good nature, presumed to draw a parallel between the Revd. Mr Milman and Lord Byron?¹⁵ What gnat did they strain at here, after having swallowed all those camels?¹⁶ Against what woman taken in adultery, dares the foremost of these literary prostitutes to cast his opprobrious stone?¹⁷ Miserable man! You, one of the meanest, have wantonly defaced one of the noblest specimens of the workmanship of God. Nor shall it be your excuse that, murderer as you are, you have spoken daggers but used none.¹⁸

The circumstances of the closing scene of poor Keats' life were not made known to me until the Elegy was ready for the press. I am given to understand that the wound which his sensitive spirit had received from the criticism of Endymion, was exasperated by the bitter sense of unrequited benefits; the poor fellow seems to have been hooted from the stage of life, no less by those on whom he had wasted the promise of his genius, than those on whom he had lavished his fortune and his care. He was accompanied to Rome, and attended in his last illness by Mr Severn,¹⁹ a young artist of the highest promise, who, I have been informed, 'almost risked his own life, and sacrificed every prospect to unwearied attendance upon his dying friend.'²⁰ Had I known these circumstances before the completion of my poem, I should have been tempted to add my feeble tribute of applause to the more solid recompense which the virtuous man finds in the recollection of his own motives. Mr Severn can dispense with a reward from 'such stuff as dreams are made of'.²¹ His conduct is a golden augury of the success of his future career; may the unextinguished spirit of his illustrious friend animate the creations of his pencil, and plead against oblivion for his name!

¹ For introductory comments, see headnote, p. 1079. See also James A. W. Heffernan, 'Adonais: Shelley's Consumption of Keats', in Romanticism: A Critical Reader, ed. Duncan Wu (Oxford, 1995) 173–

91. Shelley adapted the name from Adonis, the beautiful youth with whom Aphrodite, the Greek goddess of fertility, fell in love. He was killed by a wild boar, and from his blood sprang the rose, or from Aphrodite's tears the anemone. The poem was completed by 11 June 1821, and five days later Shelley told John Gisborne: 'this day I send it to the press at Pisa ... I think it will please you: I have dipped my pen in consuming fire for his destroyers, otherwise the style is calm and solemn' (Jones ii 300).

Adonais: An Elegy on the Death of John Keats

Preface

² Shortly before composing Adonais, Shelley translated Plato's 'Epigram on Aster':

Thou wert the morning star among the living,

Ere thy fair light had fled;

Now, having died, thou art as Hesperus, giving

New splendour to the dead.

³ 'Poison came, Bion, to thy mouth, thou didst know poison. To such lips as thine did it come, and was not sweetened? What mortal was so cruel that could mix poison for thee, or who could give thee the venom that heard thy voice? Surely, he had not music in his soul.'

⁴ the London edition of this poem Shelley supervised the first publication of this poem in Pisa, 1821, but died before it could appear in London. The first English edition was published at Cambridge, 1829.

⁵ the fragment of Hyperion i.e. Hyperion: A Fragment, published 1820 (see p. 1425), rather than The Fall of Hyperion (p. 1490), not published during Shelley's lifetime. When Shelley first received Keats's 1820 volume, he commented: 'the fragment called Hyperion promises for him that he is destined to become one of the first writers of the age' (letter of 29 October 1820, Jones ii 239).

6Keats died 23 February 1821, aged 25.

7*in love with death* Compare Keats, 'Ode to a Nightingale' 52.

8Shelley visited the Protestant (or, more correctly, the non-Catholic) Cemetery in Rome in late November 1818; his son William was buried there in 1819.

9*genius* spirit.

10 The savage criticism...inflicted This helped perpetuate the myth that Keats was 'killed' by a review – that of Endymion in the Quarterly for April 1818, by Croker.

11 these wretched men know not what they do an echo of Christ's comment on those who crucified him: 'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do' (Luke 23:34).

12 penetrable stuff cf. Hamlet III iv 35–6: 'And let me wring your heart, for so I shall / If it be made of penetrable stuff.'

13 One of their associates...calumniator Robert Southey, who Shelley thought had attacked his poem, The Revolt of Islam, in the Quarterly in 1817; the actual author was John Taylor Coleridge. Shelley has in mind Southey's part in the spreading of rumours about the 'league of incest'; see p. 959 n. 2.

14 Revd George Croly, Paris in 1815 (1817); Eaton Stannard Barrett, Woman (1810); H. Galley Knight, Ilderim: A Syrian Tale (1816): all these works were reviewed in the Quarterly, 1817–20. Mrs Alicia Lefanu (c.1795–c.1826) was the author of The Flowers (1809). John Howard Payne was an American dramatist, whose Brutus was reviewed harshly by the Quarterly.

15 Revd Henry Hart Milman's Saviour, Lord of the Bright City and Fall of Jerusalem were praised by the Quarterly, 1818–20.

16 What gnat...camels cf. Christ's criticism of the Pharisees, Matthew 23:24: 'Ye blind guides, which strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel.'

17 Against what woman...stone see John 8:7.

18 you have spoken daggers but used none cf. Hamlet III ii 396: 'I will speak daggers to her, but use none.'

19 Joseph Severn (1793–1879), a young artist who accompanied Keats to Rome, and nursed him until his death. Severn remained in Rome, became British Consul there in 1860, and was buried next to Keats.

20 This information was in a letter from the Revd Robert Finch to John Gisborne, and was passed on to Shelley on 13 June 1821.

I

I weep for Adonais – he is dead!
Oh weep for Adonais, though our tears
Thaw not the frost which binds so dear a head!
And thou, sad Hour, selected from all years
To mourn our loss, rouse thy obscure compeers, 5
And teach them thine own sorrow, say: 'With me
Died Adonais; till the Future dares
Forget the Past, his fate and fame shall be
An echo and a light unto eternity!'

II

Where wert thou, mighty Mother,¹ when he lay, 10
When thy Son lay, pierced by the shaft² which flies
In darkness?³ Where was lorn Urania
When Adonais died? With veiled eyes,
Mid listening Echoes, in her Paradise
She sat, while one,⁴ with soft enamoured breath, 15
Rekindled all the fading melodies,
With which, like flowers that mock the corpse beneath,
He had adorned and hid the coming bulk of death.

III

Oh weep for Adonais – he is dead!
Wake, melancholy Mother, wake and weep! 20
Yet wherefore? Quench within their burning bed
Thy fiery tears, and let thy loud heart keep,
Like his, a mute and uncomplaining sleep;
For he is gone, where all things wise and fair
Descend. Oh dream not that the amorous Deep 25
Will yet restore him to the vital air –
Death feeds on his mute voice, and laughs at our despair.

IV

Most musical of mourners, weep again!
Lament anew, Urania! He died,⁵
Who was the Sire of an immortal strain, 30
Blind, old, and lonely, when his country's pride,
The priest, the slave, and the liberticide,⁶
Trampled and mocked with many a loathed rite
Of lust and blood;⁷ he went, unterrified,
Into the gulf of death, but his clear Sprite⁸ 35
Yet reigns o'er earth – the third among the sons of light.⁹

V

Most musical of mourners, weep anew!
Not all to that bright station dared to climb –
And happier they their happiness who knew,
Whose tapers yet burn through that night of time 40
In which suns perished;¹⁰ others more sublime,
Struck by the envious wrath of man or God,
Have sunk, extinct in their refulgent¹¹ prime;
And some yet live, treading the thorny road
Which leads, through toil and hate, to Fame's serene abode. 45

VI

But now, thy youngest, dearest one, has perished
The nursling of thy widowhood,¹² who grew,
Like a pale flower by some sad maiden cherished,
And fed with true love tears instead of dew¹³ –
Most musical of mourners, weep anew! 50
Thy extreme hope, the loveliest and the last,
The bloom, whose petals nipped before they blew¹⁴
Died on the promise of the fruit, is waste;
The broken lily lies – the storm is overpast.

VII

To that high Capital,¹⁵ where kingly Death 55
Keeps his pale court¹⁶ in beauty and decay,
He came; and bought, with price of purest breath,
A grave among the eternal.¹⁷ Come away!¹⁸
Haste, while the vault of blue Italian day
Is yet his fitting charnel-roof!¹⁹ while still 60
He lies, as if in dewy sleep he lay;

Awake him not! surely he takes his fill
Of deep and liquid²⁰ rest, forgetful of all ill.

VIII

He will awake no more, oh never more!
Within the twilight chamber spreads apace 65
The shadow of white Death, and at the door
Invisible Corruption waits to trace
His extreme way to her dim dwelling-place;
The eternal Hunger sits, but pity and awe
Soothe her pale rage, nor dares she to deface 70
So fair a prey, till darkness, and the law
Of mortal change, shall fill the grave which is her maw.

IX

Oh weep for Adonais! The quick Dreams,²¹
The passion-winged Ministers of thought
Who were his flocks, whom near the living streams 75
Of his young spirit he fed, and whom he taught
The love which was its music, wander not –
Wander no more from kindling brain to brain,
But droop there, whence they sprung; and mourn their lot
Round the cold heart, where, after their sweet pain,²² 80
They ne'er will gather strength, or find a home again.

X

And one with trembling hands clasps his cold head,
And fans him with his moonlight wings, and cries,
'Our love, our hope, our sorrow, is not dead,²³
See, on the silken fringe of his faint eyes, 85
Like dew upon a sleeping flower, there lies
A tear some Dream has loosened from his brain.'

Lost Angel of a ruined Paradise!²⁴
She knew not 'twas her own; as with no stain
She faded, like a cloud which had outwept its rain.²⁵ 90

XI

One from a lucid urn of starry dew
Washed his light limbs as if embalming them;
Another clipped her profuse locks, and threw
The wreath upon him, like an anadem,²⁶
Which frozen tears instead of pearls begem; 95
Another in her wilful grief would break
Her bow and winged reeds,²⁷ as if to stem
A greater loss with one which was more weak,
And dull the barbed fire²⁸ against his frozen cheek.

XII

Another Splendour on his mouth alit²⁹ – 100
That mouth, whence it was wont to draw the breath
Which gave it strength to pierce the guarded wit,
And pass into the panting heart beneath
With lightning and with music: the damp death
Quenched its caress upon his icy lips, 105
And, as a dying meteor stains a wreath
Of moonlight vapour, which the cold night clips,³⁰
It flushed through his pale limbs, and passed to its eclipse.

XIII

And others came – Desires and Adorations,
Winged Persuasions and veiled Destinies, 110
Splendours, and Glooms, and glimmering Incarnations
Of hopes and fears, and twilight Fantasies;

And Sorrow, with her family of Sighs,
And Pleasure, blind with tears, led by the gleam
Of her own dying smile instead of eyes, 115
Came in slow pomp – the moving pomp might seem Like pageantry of mist on an autumnal stream.³¹

XIV

All he had loved, and moulded into thought,
From shape, and hue, and odour, and sweet sound,
Lamented Adonais. Morning sought 120
Her eastern watchtower, and her hair unbound,
Wet with the tears which should adorn the ground,
Dimmed the aerial eyes that kindle day;
Afar the melancholy thunder moaned,
Pale Ocean in unquiet slumber lay, 125
And the wild winds flew round, sobbing in their dismay.

XV

Lost Echo³² sits amid the voiceless mountains
And feeds her grief with his remembered lay,³³
And will no more reply to winds or fountains,
Or amorous birds perched on the young green spray, 130
Or herdsman's horn, or bell at closing day;
Since she can mimic not his lips, more dear
Than those for whose disdain she pined away
Into a shadow of all sounds – a drear
Murmur, between their songs, is all the woodmen hear. 135

XVI

Grief made the young Spring wild, and she threw down
Her kindling buds, as if she Autumn were,
Or they dead leaves; since her delight is flown

For whom should she have waked the sullen year?
To Phoebus was not Hyacinth so dear³⁴ 140
Nor to himself Narcissus, as to both
Thou Adonais: wan they stand and sere³⁵
Amid the drooping comrades of their youth,
With dew all turned to tears; odour, to sighing ruth.³⁶

XVII

Thy spirit's sister, the lorn nightingale,³⁷ 145
Mourns not her mate with such melodious pain;
Not so the eagle, who like thee could scale
Heaven, and could nourish in the sun's domain
Her mighty youth with morning,³⁸ doth complain,
Soaring and screaming round her empty nest, 150
As Albion³⁹ wails for thee: the curse of Cain⁴⁰
Light on his head⁴¹ who pierced thy innocent breast,
And scared the angel soul that was its earthly guest!

XVIII

Ah woe is me! Winter is come and gone,
But grief returns with the revolving year; 155
The airs and streams renew their joyous tone;
The ants, the bees, the swallows reappear;
Fresh leaves and flowers deck the dead Seasons' bier;
The amorous birds now pair in every brake,⁴²
And build their mossy homes in field and breere;⁴³ 160
And the green lizard, and the golden snake,
Like unimprisoned flames, out of their trance awake.

XIX

Through wood and stream and field and hill and Ocean
A quickening life from the Earth's heart has burst
As it has ever done, with change and motion, 165
From the great morning of the world when first
God dawned on Chaos; in its steam immersed
The lamps of Heaven flash with a softer light;
All baser things pant with life's sacred thirst,
Diffuse themselves, and spend in love's delight, 170
The beauty and the joy of their renewed might.

XX

The leprous corpse touched by this spirit tender
Exhales itself in flowers of gentle breath;⁴⁴
Like incarnations of the stars, when splendour
Is changed to fragrance, they illumine death 175
And mock the merry worm that wakes beneath;
Nought we know, dies. Shall that alone which knows⁴⁵
Be as a sword consumed before the sheath⁴⁶
By sightless⁴⁷ lightning? – th' intense atom glows
A moment, then is quenched in a most cold repose. 180

XXI

Alas! that all we loved of him should be,
But for our grief, as if it had not been,
And grief itself be mortal! Woe is me!
Whence are we, and why are we? Of what scene
The actors or spectators? Great and mean 185
Meet massed in death, who lends what life must borrow.
As long as skies are blue, and fields are green,
Evening must usher night, night urge the morrow,
Month follow month with woe, and year wake year to sorrow.

XXII

He will awake no more, oh never more! 190
‘Wake thou,’ cried Misery, ‘childless Mother, rise
Out of thy sleep, and slake,⁴⁸ in thy heart’s core,
A wound more fierce than his with tears and sighs.’
And all the Dreams that watched Urania’s eyes,
And all the Echoes whom their sister’s song⁴⁹ 195
Had held in holy silence, cried: ‘Arise!’
Swift as a Thought by the snake Memory stung,
From her ambrosial⁵⁰ rest the fading Splendour sprung.⁵¹

XXIII

She rose like an autumnal Night, that springs
Out of the East, and follows wild and drear 200
The golden Day, which, on eternal wings,
Even as a ghost abandoning a bier,
Had left the Earth a corpse. Sorrow and fear
So struck, so roused, so rapt⁵² Urania;
So saddened round her like an atmosphere 205
Of stormy mist; so swept her on her way
Even to the mournful place where Adonais lay.

XXIV

Out of her secret Paradise she sped,
Through camps and cities rough with stone, and steel,
And human hearts, which to her airy tread 210
Yielding not, wounded the invisible
Palms⁵³ of her tender feet where’er they fell:
And barbed tongues,⁵⁴ and thoughts more sharp than they
Rent the soft Form they never could repel,

Whose sacred blood, like the young tears of May, 215
Paved with eternal flowers that undeserving way.

XXV

In the death-chamber for a moment Death,
Shamed by the presence of that living Might,
Blushed to annihilation, and the breath
Revisited those lips, and life's pale light 220
Flashed through those limbs, so late her dear delight.
'Leave me not wild and drear and comfortless,
As silent lightning leaves the starless night!
Leave me not!' cried Urania. Her distress
Roused Death: Death rose and smiled, and met her vain caress.
 225

XXVI

'Stay yet awhile! speak to me once again;
Kiss me, so long but as a kiss may live;
And in my heartless⁵⁵ breast and burning brain
That word, that kiss shall all thoughts else survive,
With food of saddest memory kept alive, 230
Now thou art dead, as if it were a part
Of thee, my Adonais! I would give
All that I am to be as thou now art!
But I am chained to Time, and cannot thence depart!

XXVII

Oh gentle child, beautiful as thou wert, 235
Why didst thou leave the trodden paths of men
Too soon, and with weak hands⁵⁶ though mighty heart
Dare the unpastured dragon⁵⁷ in his den?
Defenceless as thou wert, oh where was then

Wisdom the mirrored shield,⁵⁸ or scorn the spear? 240
Or hadst thou waited the full cycle, when
Thy spirit should have filled its crescent sphere,
The monsters of life's waste had fled from thee like deer.

XXVIII

The herded wolves, bold only to pursue;
The obscene ravens, clamorous o'er the dead; 245
The vultures to the conqueror's banner true
Who feed where Desolation first has fed,
And whose wings rain contagion – how they fled,
When, like Apollo, from his golden bow,
The Pythian of the age one arrow sped 250
And smiled!⁵⁹ The spoilers⁶⁰ tempt no second blow,
They fawn on the proud feet that spurn them lying low.

XXIX

The sun comes forth, and many reptiles spawn;
He sets, and each ephemeral insect then
Is gathered into death without a dawn, 255
And the immortal stars awake again;⁶¹
So is it in the world of living men:
A godlike mind soars forth, in its delight
Making earth bare and veiling heaven, and when
It sinks, the swarms that dimmed or shared its light 260
Leave to its kindred lamps⁶² the spirit's awful night.'

XXX

Thus ceased she: and the mountain shepherds came
Their garlands sere, their magic mantles rent;
The Pilgrim of Eternity⁶³ (whose fame

Over his living head like Heaven is bent, 265
An early but enduring monument)
Came, veiling all the lightnings of his song
In sorrow; from her wilds Ierne sent
The sweetest lyrist⁶⁴ of her saddest wrong,
And love taught grief to fall like music from his tongue. 270

XXXI

Midst others of less note came one frail Form,⁶⁵
A phantom among men, companionless
As the last cloud of an expiring storm
Whose thunder is its knell. He, as I guess,
Had gazed on Nature's naked loveliness, 275
Actaeon-like,⁶⁶ and now he fled astray
With feeble steps o'er the world's wilderness,
And his own thoughts, along that rugged way,
Pursued, like raging hounds, their father and their prey.

XXXII

A pardlike⁶⁷ Spirit beautiful and swift, 280
A Love in desolation masked, a Power
Girt round with weakness – it can scarce uplift
The weight of the superincumbent hour:⁶⁸
It is a dying lamp, a falling shower,
A breaking billow; even whilst we speak, 285
Is it not broken? On the withering flower
The killing sun smiles brightly: on a cheek
The life can burn in blood, even while the heart may break.

XXXIII

His head was bound with pansies overblown,
And faded violets, white, and pied, and blue; 290
And a light spear topped with a cypress cone,
Round whose rude shaft dark ivy tresses grew⁶⁹
Yet dripping with the forest's noonday dew,
Vibrated, as the ever-beating heart
Shook the weak hand that grasped it: of that crew 295
He came the last, neglected and apart –
A herd-abandoned deer struck by the hunter's dart.

XXXIV

All stood aloof, and at his partial moan
Smiled through their tears; well knew that gentle band
Who in another's fate now wept his own; 300
As in the accents of an unknown land,
He sung new sorrow; sad Urania scanned
The Stranger's mien, and murmured, 'Who art thou?'
He answered not, but with a sudden hand
Made bare his branded and ensanguined brow, 305
Which was like Cain's or Christ's⁷⁰ – oh that it should be so!

XXXV

What softer voice is hushed over the dead?
Athwart what brow is that dark mantle thrown?
What form leans sadly o'er the white deathbed
In mockery⁷¹ of monumental stone, 310
The heavy heart heaving without a moan?
If it be He⁷² who, gentlest of the wise,
Taught, soothed, loved, honoured the departed one,
Let me not vex, with inharmonious sighs,
The silence of that heart's accepted sacrifice. 315

XXXVI

Our Adonais has drunk poison – oh!
What deaf and viperous murderer could crown
Life's early cup with such a draught of woe?⁷³
The nameless worm would now itself disown:
It felt, yet could escape the magic tone 320
Whose prelude held all envy, hate, and wrong,
But what was howling in one breast alone,
Silent with expectation of the song,
Whose master's hand is cold, whose silver lyre unstrung.

XXXVII

Live thou whose infamy is not thy fame! 325
Live! Fear no heavier chastisement from me,
Thou noteless⁷⁴ blot on a remembered name!
But be thyself, and know thyself to be!
And ever at thy season⁷⁵ be thou free
To spill the venom when thy fangs o'erflow – 330
Remorse and self-contempt shall cling to thee;
Hot Shame shall burn upon thy secret brow,
And like a beaten hound tremble thou shalt – as now.

XXXVIII

Nor let us weep that our delight is fled
Far from these carrion kites that scream below – 335
He wakes or sleeps with the enduring dead;
Thou canst not soar where he is sitting now.
Dust to the dust! But the pure spirit shall flow
Back to the burning fountain whence it came,
A portion of the Eternal, which must glow 340
Through time and change, unquenchably the same,
Whilst thy cold embers choke the sordid hearth of shame.

XXXIX

Peace, peace! He is not dead, he doth not sleep –
He hath awakened from the dream of life –
'Tis we who, lost in stormy visions, keep 345
With phantoms an unprofitable strife,
And in mad trance, strike with our spirit's knife
Invulnerable nothings. We decay
Like corpses in a charnel;⁷⁶ fear and grief
Convulse us and consume us day by day, 350
And cold hopes swarm like worms within our living clay.

XL

He has outsoared the shadow of our night;⁷⁷
Envy and calumny and hate and pain,
And that unrest which men miscall delight,
Can touch him not and torture not again; 355
From the contagion of the world's slow stain
He is secure, and now can never mourn
A heart grown cold, a head grown grey in vain;
Nor, when the spirit's self has ceased to burn,
With sparkless ashes load an unlamented urn. 360

XLI

He lives, he wakes – 'tis Death is dead, not he;
Mourn not for Adonais. Thou young Dawn
Turn all thy dew to splendour, for from thee
The spirit thou lamentest is not gone;
Ye caverns and ye forests, cease to moan! 365
Cease ye faint flowers and fountains, and thou Air
Which like a mourning veil thy scarf hadst thrown
O'er the abandoned Earth, now leave it bare
Even to the joyous stars which smile on its despair!

XLII

He is made one with Nature: there is heard 370
His voice in all her music, from the moan
Of thunder, to the song of night's sweet bird;⁷⁸
He is a presence to be felt and known
In darkness and in light, from herb and stone,
Spreading itself where'er that Power⁷⁹ may move 375
Which has withdrawn his being to its own,
Which wields the world with never-wearied love,
Sustains it from beneath, and kindles it above.⁸⁰

XLIII

He is a portion of the loveliness
Which once he made more lovely: he doth bear 380
His part, while the one Spirit's plastic stress⁸¹
Sweeps through the dull dense world, compelling there
All new successions to the forms they wear;
Torturing th' unwilling dross that checks its flight
To its own likeness, as each mass may bear; 385
And bursting in its beauty and its might
From trees and beasts and men into the Heaven's light.

XLIV

The splendours of the firmament of time⁸²
May be eclipsed, but are extinguished not;
Like stars to their appointed height they climb, 390
And death is a low mist which cannot blot
The brightness it may veil. When lofty thought
Lifts a young heart above its mortal lair,
And love and life contend in it for what

Shall be its earthly doom,⁸³ the dead live there 395
And move like winds of light on dark and stormy air.⁸⁴

XLV

The inheritors of unfulfilled renown⁸⁵
Rose from their thrones, built beyond mortal thought,
Far in the Unapparent. Chatterton
Rose pale, his solemn agony had not 400
Yet faded from him; Sidney, as he fought
And as he fell and as he lived and loved
Sublimely mild, a Spirit without spot,
Arose; and Lucan, by his death approved:
Oblivion as they rose shrank like a thing reprov'd. 405

XLVI

And many more whose names on Earth are dark,
But whose transmitted effluence⁸⁶ cannot die
So long as fire outlives the parent spark,
Rose, robed in dazzling immortality.
'Thou art become as one of us', they cry, 410
'It was for thee yon kingless sphere has long
Swung blind in unascended majesty,
Silent alone amid an Heaven of song.
Assume thy winged throne, thou Vesper of our throng!'⁸⁷

XLVII

Who mourns for Adonais? Oh come forth 415
Fond⁸⁸ wretch, and know thyself and him aright!
Clasp with thy panting soul the pendulous Earth;⁸⁹
As from a centre, dart thy spirit's light
Beyond all worlds, until its spacious might

Satiate the void circumference; then shrink 420
Even to a point within our day and night –
And keep thy heart light lest it make thee sink
When hope has kindled hope, and lured thee to the brink.⁹⁰

XLVIII

Or go to Rome, which is the sepulchre
Oh not of him, but of our joy: 'tis nought 425
That ages, empires, and religions there
Lie buried in the ravage they have wrought;
For such as he⁹¹ can lend – they⁹² borrow not
Glory from those who made the world their prey;⁹³
And he is gathered to the kings of thought⁹⁴ 430
Who waged contention with their time's decay,
And of the past are all that cannot pass away.

XLIX

Go thou to Rome – at once the Paradise,
The grave, the city, and the wilderness;
And where its wrecks like shattered mountains rise, 435
And flowering weeds, and fragrant copses dress
The bones of Desolation's nakedness,
Pass, till the Spirit of the spot shall lead
Thy footsteps to a slope of green access⁹⁵
Where, like an infant's smile,⁹⁶ over the dead, 440
A light of laughing flowers along the grass is spread.

L

And grey walls⁹⁷ moulder round, on which dull Time
Feeds, like slow fire upon a hoary brand;⁹⁸

And one keen pyramid with wedge sublime,⁹⁹
Pavilioning the dust of him who planned 445
This refuge for his memory, doth stand
Like flame transformed to marble; and beneath,
A field is spread, on which a newer band
Have pitched in Heaven's smile their camp of death
Welcoming him we lose with scarce extinguished breath. 450

LI

Here pause: these graves are all too young as yet
To have outgrown the sorrow which consigned
Its charge to each; and if the seal is set,
Here, on one fountain of a mourning mind,
Break it not thou!¹⁰⁰ Too surely shalt thou find 455
Thine own well full, if thou returnest home,
Of tears and gall.¹⁰¹ From the world's bitter wind¹⁰²
Seek shelter in the shadow of the tomb.
What Adonais is, why fear we to become?

LII

The One remains, the many change and pass; 460
Heaven's light forever shines, Earth's shadows fly;
Life, like a dome of many-coloured glass,
Stains the white radiance of Eternity,¹⁰³
Until Death tramples it to fragments. Die,
If thou wouldst be with that which thou dost seek! 465
Follow where all is fled! Rome's azure sky,
Flowers, ruins, statues, music, words, are weak
The glory they transfuse with fitting truth to speak.

LIII

Why linger, why turn back, why shrink, my Heart?104
Thy hopes are gone before: from all things here 470
They have departed – thou shouldst now depart!
A light is passed from the revolving year,
And man, and woman; and what still is dear
Attracts to crush, repels to make thee wither.
The soft sky smiles, the low wind whispers near: 475
'Tis Adonais calls! Oh, hasten thither,
No more let Life divide what Death can join together.

LIV

That Light whose smile kindles the Universe,
That Beauty in which all things work and move,
That Benediction which the eclipsing Curse 480
Of birth can quench not, that sustaining Love
Which through the web of being blindly wove
By man and beast and earth and air and sea,
Burns bright or dim, as each are mirrors of
The fire for which all thirst – now beams on me, 485
Consuming the last clouds of cold mortality.

LV

The breath whose might I have invoked in song
Descends on me; my spirit's bark is driven
Far from the shore, far from the trembling throng
Whose sails were never to the tempest given; 490
The massy earth and sphered skies are riven!
I am borne darkly, fearfully, afar;
Whilst burning through the inmost veil of Heaven,
The soul of Adonais, like a star,
Beacons from the abode where the Eternal are.105 495

Adonais: An Elegy on the Death of John Keats

1 mighty Mother Urania, muse of astronomy, whom Shelley makes the mother of Adonais. She is forsaken ('lorn') in line 12.

2 the shaft i.e. of an arrow. Shelley is writing figuratively of Croker's hostile review of Endymion in the Quarterly. He is also recalling Psalm 91:5: 'Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night; nor for the arrow that flieth by day.'

3 Where wert thou...darkness the appeal is an essential part of formal elegy; cf. Lycidas 50–1: 'Where were ye nymphs when the remorseless deep / Closed o'er the head of your loved Lycidas?'

4 one i.e. an Echo.

5 He died Milton, whose muse was also Urania. He died on 8 November 1674 in Bunhill House, London.

6 liberticide destroyer of liberty.

7 When the Stuart monarchy was restored with Charles II in 1660, some of those responsible for the execution of Charles I were beheaded. Milton escaped punishment, partly through the efforts of his friend and former colleague, Andrew Marvell.

8 Sprite spirit.

9 the third among the sons of light a reference to Shelley's discussion of epic poets in 'A Defence of Poetry', where Milton is ranked alongside Homer and Dante. In a MS note, Shelley lists the poets who would mourn Keats: 'It is difficult to assign any order of precedence except that founded on fame; thence, why (the Scriptures excepted), Virgil, Anacreon, Petrarch, Homer, Sophocles, Aeschylus, Dante, Petrarch, Lucretius, Virgil, Calderon, Shakespeare, Milton.'

10 And happier they...perished minor poets ('tapers') whose works survive are happier than major poets ('suns') whose work is lost.

11 refulgent glorious, radiant.

12 The nursling of thy widowhood Keats is presented as Milton's heir. Shelley was an admirer of Keats's Miltonic 'Hyperion'; see p. 1248 n. 5.

13 Lines 48–9 recall Keats's Isabella 424.

14 blew blossomed.

15 that high Capital Rome; Keats died at 26, Piazza di Spagna, today a museum devoted to him, Shelley and Byron.

16 Death...court an echo of Richard II III ii 160–2:

for within the hollow crown
That rounds the mortal temples of a king
Keeps Death his court ...

17 the eternal i.e. both Rome, the eternal city, and the many illustrious people buried there.

18 Come away! addressed to those gathered round the body of Adonais.

19 charnel-roof the roof of a tomb.

20 liquid undisturbed, perfect.

21 quick Dreams Keats's living ('quick') poems, which grieve for him.

22 sweet pain Curiously, this appears in Keats's manuscript draft of 'Hyperion: A Fragment' Book III (starting at line 125 of the published text):

Soon wild commotions shook him, and made flush
All the immortal fairness of his limbs
Into a hue more roseate than sweet pain
Gives to a ravish'd Nymph when her warm tears
Gush luscious with no sob ...

It seems unlikely that Shelley knew Keats's unpublished manuscript; 'sweet pain' is just a very typical Keatsian formulation.

23 our sorrow, is not dead cf. Lycidas 166: 'For Lycidas your sorrow is not dead.'

24 a ruined Paradise Adonais' creative imagination.

25 like a cloud that had outwept its rain i.e. like a cloud that had more grief than it could express through its available moisture.

26 anadem garland of flowers.

27 winged reeds arrows.

28 barbed fire a peculiar image that refers to the hooks or barbs on arrows that makes them difficult to remove from the wound. Shelley is almost certainly thinking of the 'storm of arrows barbed with fire' at Paradise Lost vi 546.

29 alit alighted.

30 clips means both 'embraces' and 'cuts off'.

31 the moving pomp...autumnal stream Shelley has in mind Keats's 'season of mists and mellow fruitfulness' ('To Autumn' 1).

32 The nymph Echo faded into an echo of sound when Narcissus rejected her; Narcissus fell in love with his own reflection and was transformed into a flower.

33 lay Keats's poetry.

34 Hyacinth, loved by Phoebus Apollo, was killed out of jealousy by Zephyrus and then turned into a flower by Apollo.

35 sere withered.

36 ruth pity.

37 the lorn nightingale a reference to Keats's 'Ode to a Nightingale'.

38 The eagle was believed to be able to replenish its youthful vision by flying into the sun and then diving into a fountain.

39 Albion England.

40 the curse of Cain Cain, who killed his brother Abel and brought murder into the world, was cursed as 'a fugitive and a vagabond ... in the earth' (Genesis 4:12, 14).

41 his head i.e. that of the critic held responsible by Shelley for Keats's death – John Wilson Croker (although Shelley was unaware of his identity, the review having been published anonymously).

42 brake thicket.

43 brere archaic spelling of 'briar'.

44 flowers of gentle breath anemones, thought to have sprung from Adonis' blood when he was killed by a boar.

45 that alone which knows the human mind.

46 a sword consumed before the sheath Shelley would have known Byron's variations on this image: Childe Harold's Pilgrimage iii 913, and 'So we'll go no more a-roving' 5: 'For the sword outwears its sheath.'

47 sightless invisible.

48 slake soothe.

49 And all the Echoes...song Echo repeated Keats's poem at line 15.

50 ambrosial heavenly.

51 the fading Splendour sprung the Splendour was fading from grief.

52 rapt enchanted.

53 Palms soles.

54 barbed tongues i.e. hostile critics.

55 heartless disheartened, dejected.

56 with weak hands a reference to the weakness of Keats's early verse. Keats wrote to Shelley, 16 August 1820: 'I remember you advising me not to publish my first-blights, on Hampstead Heath' (Rollins ii 323). In fact, Keats's first volume, Poems (1817), received generally favourable reviews; it was Endymion (1818) that attracted criticism.

57 the unpastured dragon the critic blamed by Shelley for Keats's death.

58 the mirrored shield Perseus used a mirrored shield to slay the Medusa.

59 The Pythian...smiled Byron's English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809) attacked those responsible for the harsh review of his Hours of Idleness; see p. 863. Apollo killed a python with an arrow and established the Pythian games in celebration.

60 spoilers ravagers, barbarians (i.e. the reviewers).

61 The sun...awake again in Shelley's metaphor, the sun is the great poet during his lifetime; the reptiles are the critics; the ephemeral insects imitate the great poet's works; the stars are great poets of the past.

62 its kindred lamps stars (i.e. other creative spirits).

63 The Pilgrim of Eternity Byron; the reference is to Childe Harold's Pilgrimage.

64 Ierne sent...lyrist Thomas Moore, from Ireland (Ierne) – popular poet, author of ballads and songs. Shelley forwarded a copy of Adonais to Moore through Horace Smith, who reported, 3 October 1821: ‘I gave Moore your copy of Adonais and he was very much pleased with it, particularly with the allusion to himself’ (Jones ii 351).

65 one frail Form Shelley.

66 Actaeon, seeing Diana bathing, was turned into a stag and torn to pieces by his own dogs.

67 pardlike A pard is a leopard or panther; in an early draft, Shelley has ‘Pantherlike’.

68 the superincumbent hour The overhanging (‘superincumbent’) hour is that of Adonais’ death.

69 a light spear...grew A thyrsus, a staff or spear tipped with an ornament like a pine-cone, and sometimes wreathed with ivy or vine branches, was carried, in Greek myth, by Dionysus (Bacchus) and his votaries. Ivy was the emblem of the poet in Latin poetry.

70 Shelley’s comparison of himself with Christ enraged early reviewers, although it had already been made, implicitly at least, in Prometheus Unbound and ‘Ode to the West Wind’. In particular, the Revd George Croly, in Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine (December 1821), quoted this line and remarked: ‘We have heard it mentioned as the only apology for the predominant irreligion and nonsense of this person’s works, that his understanding is unsettled.’

71 mockery imitation; the ‘form’ is alive, but is so still it appears to be a statue.

72 He Leigh Hunt, a crucial influence on Keats (p. 816).

73 What deaf...woe Stanzas 36–7 attack the reviewer responsible for Keats's death. Shelley thought him to be Southey, though the actual culprit was John Wilson Croker.

74 noteless not worth noting, undistinguished.

75 at thy season every quarter, when the Quarterly Review was published.

76 charnel tomb.

77 the shadow of our night The shadow cast by the earth away from the sun.

78 night's sweet bird the nightingale. Shelley refers, again, to Keats's 'Ode to a Nightingale'.

79 Power cf. Mont Blanc and Hymn to Intellectual Beauty.

80 On the Neoplatonism of this stanza see headnote, p. 1079.

81 plastic stress shaping, moulding power. Shelley is almost certainly thinking of the pantheism of Coleridge's Eolian Harp, where the divine 'intellectual breeze' is 'Plastic and vast' (l. 39).

82 The splendours...time i.e. Keats and other poets.

83 doom destiny.

84 When lofty thought...air The creative minds of the dead influence the hearts of the young.

85 inheritors of unfulfilled renown poets who died before they could realize their full potential. Shelley goes on to specify Thomas

Chatterton, who committed suicide at the age of 17 in 1770; Sir Philip Sidney, who died in 1586 at the age of 32, from a wound sustained in the Netherlands in their fight against Spain; and Lucan, who committed suicide in 65 CE at the age of 25. (Having been a flatterer of Nero, Lucan joined a conspiracy against him; his suicide served to redeem his reputation.)

86 effluence i.e. power.

87 In the Ptolemaic system of astronomy, the songs of concentric whirling spheres around the earth blended into a harmony. Adonais is to be the genius of the third sphere of Venus.

88 Fond It is foolish ('Fond') to mourn Adonais.

89 the pendulous Earth an allusion to 'The pendulous round earth' of Paradise Lost iv 1000, where 'pendulous' means 'suspended' (i.e. in space).

90 And keep...brink Shelley tells the 'Fond wretch' to keep his heart light so that when death is near, he has not built too much hope on immortality.

91 he Adonais.

92 they 'such as he'; creative spirits like Keats.

93 they borrow not...prey Adonais lends his glory to his Roman surroundings; the ruins of empires pass away, while the influence of creative minds endures. Those who have made the world their prey would include the likes of Ozymandias (see p. 1108).

94 kings of thought including Chatterton, Sidney and Lucan.

95 a slope of green access the Protestant Cemetery in Rome, where Keats was buried.

96 like an infant's smile Shelley's son William died suddenly at the age of 3 in June 1819; he was also buried in the Protestant Cemetery in Rome.

97 grey walls of Rome, begun by Aurelian (emperor, 270–5), which bound one side of the cemetery.

98 a hoary brand a log in the fireplace, nearly burnt up.

99 The pyramid is a monument to a Roman tribune, Gaius Cestius, who died about 12 BCE, incorporated into the city walls.

100 on one fountain...thou The mourner is told not to break the seal on the fountain of Shelley's grief for his son William.

101 gall bitter grief.

102 bitter wind a wry pun on 'malaria', the disease from which William Shelley died (meaning 'bad air' in Italian).

103 Life...Eternity Just as sunlight shining through stained glass separates into different colours, so eternal unity is distributed among different people and things on earth.

104 Shelley is addressing himself.

105 The soul of Adonais...are an allusion to Plato's epigram (p. 1248 n. 2).

Music, when soft voices die

From Posthumous Poems (1824)

Music, when soft voices die,
Vibrates in the memory –
Odours, when sweet violets sicken,
Live within the sense they quicken.
Rose leaves, when the rose is dead, 5
Are heaped for the beloved's bed;
And so thy thoughts, when thou art gone,
Love itself shall slumber on.

When passion's trance is overpast (composed 1821)¹

From Posthumous Poems (1824)

When passion's trance is overpast,
If tenderness and truth could last
Or live, whilst all wild feelings keep
Some mortal slumber, dark and deep,
I should not weep, I should not weep! 5

It were enough to feel, to see
Thy soft eyes gazing tenderly,
And dream the rest – and burn and be
The secret food of fires unseen,
Couldst thou but be as thou hast been. 10

After the slumber of the year
The woodland violets reappear;
All things revive in field or grove,

And sky and sea; but two, which move,
And for all others, life and love. 15

When passion's trance is overpast

¹ Strains had formed within the Shelleys' marriage during the months prior to composition of this poem.

To Edward Williams (composed 26 January 1822; edited from MS)¹

The serpent² is shut out from Paradise –
The wounded deer must seek the herb no more
In which its heart's cure lies;
The widowed dove must cease to haunt a bower
Like that from which its mate with feigned sighs 5
Fled in the April hour;
I too must seldom seek again
Near happy friends a mitigated pain.

Of hatred I am proud; with scorn, content;
Indifference, which once hurt me, is now grown 10
Itself indifferent.
But not to speak of love, Pity alone
Can break a spirit already more than bent.
The miserable one
Turns the mind's poison into food: 15
Its medicine is tears, its evil, good.³

Therefore if now I see you seldomer
Dear friends, dear friend,⁴ know that I only fly
Yours looks, because they stir
Griefs that should sleep, and hopes that cannot die. 20
The very comfort which they minister
I scarce can bear; yet I
(So deeply is the arrow gone)
Should quickly perish if it were withdrawn.

When I return to my cold home,⁵ you ask 25
Why I am not as I have lately been?
You spoil me for the task
Of acting a forced part in life's dull scene.
Of wearing on my brow the idle mask
Of author, great or mean, 30
In the world's carnival. I sought
Peace thus, and but in you I found it not.

Full half an hour today I tried my lot
With various flowers, and every one still said
'She loves me, loves me not'. 35
And if this meant a vision long since fled –
If it meant Fortune, Fame, or Peace of thought,
If it meant – (but I dread
To speak what you may know too well);
Still there was truth in the sad oracle. 40

The crane o'er seas and forests seeks her home.
No bird so wild but has its quiet nest
When it no more would roam.
The sleepless billows on the ocean's breast
Break like a bursting heart, and die in foam 45
And thus, at length, find rest.
Doubtless there is a place of peace
Where my weak heart and all its throbs will cease.

I asked her yesterday if she believed
That I had resolution; one who had 50
Would ne'er have thus relieved
His heart with words, but what his judgement bad
Would do, and leave the scorner unrelieved.
These verses were too sad
To send to you, but that I know, 55
Happy yourself you feel another's woe.

To Edward Williams

¹ Edward and Jane Williams were friends of Thomas Medwin, Shelley's boyhood friend, who brought them to meet the Shelleys in Pisa in January 1821. By January 1822 Shelley had become somewhat estranged from Mary and had developed strong feelings for Jane. He gave a copy of this poem to Edward Williams on 26 January 1822, saying: 'If any of these stanzas should please you, you may read them to Jane, but to no one else – and yet on second thoughts I had rather you would not' (Jones ii 384). On the same day, Williams recorded in his journal that 'Shelley sent us some beautiful but too melancholy lines.'

² The serpent Byron's nickname for Shelley was 'The Snake'.

³ its evil good Shelley is recalling Satan: ‘Evil be thou my good’ (Paradise Lost iv 110).

⁴ dear friend presumably a reference to Jane Williams.

⁵ my cold home a reference to his strained marriage.

With a Guitar, to Jane (composed April 1822; edited from MS)¹

Ariel to Miranda – Take

This slave of music for the sake
Of him who is the slave of thee;
And teach it all the harmony
In which thou canst, and only thou, 5
Make the delighted spirit glow,
Till joy denies itself again
And, too intense, is turned to pain;
For by permission and command
Of thine own Prince Ferdinand² 10
Poor Ariel³ sends this silent token
Of more than ever can be spoken;
Your guardian spirit Ariel, who
From life to life must still pursue
Your happiness, for thus alone 15
Can Ariel ever find his own;
From Prospero’s enchanted cell,
As the mighty verses tell,
To the throne of Naples he
Lit you o’er the trackless sea,⁴ 20
Flitting on, your prow before,
Like a living meteor.
When you die, the silent moon

In her interlunar swoon⁵
Is not sadder in her cell 25
Than deserted Ariel;
When you live again on earth⁶
Like an unseen star of birth⁷
Ariel guides you o'er the sea
Of life from your nativity. 30
Many changes have been run
Since Ferdinand and you begun
Your course of love, and Ariel still
Has tracked your steps and served your will;
Now in humbler, happier lot 35
This is all remembered not;
And now, alas! the poor sprite⁸ is Imprisoned for some fault of his
In a body like a grave –
From you he only dares to crave, 40
For his service and his sorrow,
A smile today, a song tomorrow.

The artist who this idol⁹ wrought
To echo all harmonious thought
Felled a tree, while on the steep 45
The woods were in their winter sleep,
Rocked in that repose divine
On the windswept Apennine;
And dreaming, some of autumn past,
And some of spring approaching fast, 50
And some of April buds and showers,
And some of songs in July bowers,
And all of love; and so this tree –
Oh that such our death may be –
Died in sleep, and felt no pain, 55
To live in happier form again,

From which, beneath Heaven's fairest star,¹⁰
The artist wrought this loved guitar
And taught it justly to reply
To all who question skilfully 60
In language gentle as thine own;
Whispering in enamoured tone
Sweet oracles of woods and dells
And summer winds in sylvan cells;
For it had learnt all harmonies 65
Of the plains and of the skies,
Of the forests and the mountains,
And the many-voiced fountains,
The clearest echoes of the hills,
The softest notes of falling rills, 70
The melodies of birds and bees,
The murmuring of summer seas,
And pattering rain and breathing dew,
And airs of evening; and it knew
That seldom-heard mysterious sound¹¹ 75
Which, driven on its diurnal round¹²
As it floats through boundless day,
Our world enkindles on its way –
All this it knows, but will not tell
To those who cannot question well 80
The Spirit that inhabits it;
It talks according to the wit
Of its companions; and no more
Is heard than has been felt before
By those who tempt it to betray 85
These secrets of an elder day.
But, sweetly as its answers will
Flatter hands of perfect skill,
It keeps its highest holiest tone
For one beloved Jane alone. 90

With a Guitar, to Jane

¹ By the time this poem was written, the Shelleys' relationship had more or less broken down, and Shelley was becoming strongly attached to Jane Williams. He bought her a beautiful guitar in April 1822 and gave it to her with a fair copy draft of this poem, from which my text is taken. Both the guitar and the manuscript survive today in the Bodleian Library, Oxford.

² Ferdinand a reference to Edward Williams. By coincidence, the maker of the guitar given to Jane was Ferdinando Bottari.

³ Poor Ariel Shelley casts himself in the role of Jane's guardian spirit.

⁴ To the throne...sea In Shakespeare's play, Ariel conducts Prospero and Miranda back to Naples, from where they were once banished.

⁵ In her interlunar swoon a recollection of Milton's Samson Agonistes:

The sun to me is dark
And silent as the moon,
When she deserts the night
Hid in her vacant interlunar cave. (ll. 86–9)

Pliny writes that the time when the moon is in conjunction with the sun is called the interlunar day.

⁶ When you live again on earth a reference to reincarnation.

⁷ star of birth Astrologers believe that we are born under particular stars that govern our fates.

⁸ the poor sprite Ariel (Shelley).

⁹ this idol the guitar, made by Ferdinando Bottari in Pisa.

¹⁰ Heaven's fairest star Venus, which is the brightest 'star' in the sky, and that of love.

¹¹ mysterious sound the music of the spheres.

¹² its diurnal round Shelley's phrasing is Wordsworthian, recalling Lucy: 'Rolled round in earth's diurnal course' ('A slumber did my spirit seal' 7). 'Diurnal' means 'daily'.

John Clare (1793–1864)

Clare was born on 13 July 1793 in the village of Helpston, Northamptonshire. His father, Parker Clare, was a thresher, but, as the illegitimate son of a Scottish schoolmaster, he wanted to give his son the best education he could, and sent him to school for at least three months a year until he was 12. At school John met Mary Joyce, who was four years younger; she was his girlfriend until their relationship ended at around the time of her father's death. She would be the subject of many of his later poems; in later life he believed she was his wife.

He became a labourer while still a boy, and began to write poetry for pleasure, scribbling on any scrap of paper he could find. With the encouragement of Edward Drury, a local businessman, he found a supporter (and editor)¹ in the London publisher, John Taylor. Poems Descriptive of Rural Life and Scenery went into print in January 1820; its success made him a literary celebrity, the 'Northamptonshire Peasant Poet', and on his visits to London he mixed with Lamb,² Hazlitt, De Quincey and Coleridge.³ Another volume, The Village Minstrel, was published in 1821, but sales were disappointing; by 1830 it had sold only 1,250 copies. Clare was forced to continue working as a labourer, and suffered increasing bouts of ill health; it was six years before he published The Shepherd's Calendar (1827), which sold only 425 copies in the next two years. When he asked for an accounting of the proceeds from his publications in 1829, Clare learnt that he was £140 (£7,000/US$13,800 today) in debt.

His attempt to set himself up as an independent farmer at Northborough in 1831 was blighted by bouts of bad physical and mental health. In June 1837 he was committed by John Taylor to Matthew Allen's asylum, from which he escaped in 1841, believing that when he returned to Northborough he would find his childhood sweetheart, Mary Joyce, waiting for him. Six months later he was taken to the General Lunatic Asylum at Northampton, where he remained until his death on 20 May 1864.

Clare appears to have written incessantly throughout his life, even during his insanity. Obsessed with Byron, and believing he was the noble Lord, he composed two poems, 'Child Harold' and 'Don Juan', which adapt the Byronic manner to his own idiosyncratic purposes. In the selection that follows I have concentrated on Clare's lyrics – of which 'First Love', 'I am', 'Oh could I be as I have been', 'The Flitting' and 'Silent Love' are among his finest.

To Elia (unsigned)¹

From The London Magazine (1822)

Elia, thy reveries and visioned themes

To care's lorn heart a luscious pleasure prove,
Wild as the mystery of delightful dreams,

Soft as the anguish of remembered love;
Like records of past days their memory dances 5

Mid the cool feelings manhood's reason brings,
As the unearthly visions of romances

Peopled with sweet and uncreated things;
And yet thy themes thy gentle worth enhances!

Then wake again thy wild harp's tenderest strings – 10
Sing on, sweet bard, let fairy loves again
Smile in thy dreams with angel ecstasies;
Bright o'er our souls will break the heavenly strain
Through the dull gloom of earth's realities.

To Elia

Sonnet (first published London Magazine 6 (1822) 272; edited from MS)

Ere I had known the world and understood
Those many follies wisdom names its own
Distinguishing things evil from things good
The dreads of sin and death ere I had known
Knowledge the root of evil – had I been 5
Left in some lone place where the world is wild
And trace of troubling man was never seen
Brought up by nature as her favoured child
As born for nought but joy where all rejoice
Emparadised in ignorance of sin 10
Where nature tries with never chiding voice
Like tender nurse nought but our smiles to win
The future dreamless – beautiful would be
The present – foretaste of eternity

January (A Cottage Evening) (extract)

From The Shepherd's Calendar (first published 1827; edited from MS)

Oh spirit of the days gone bye
Sweet childhoods fearful extacy
The witching¹ spells of winter nights 235
Where are they fled wi their delights
When listning on the corner seat
The winter evenings length to cheat
I heard my mothers memory tell
Tales superstition loves so well 240
Things said or sung a thousand times
In simple prose or simpler ryhmes
Ah where is page of poesy
So sweet as theirs was wont to be
The majic wonders that decievd 245
When fictions were as truths believd
The fairey feats that once prevaild
Told to delight and never faild
Where are they now their fears and sighs
And tears from founts of happy eyes 250
Breathless suspense and all their crew
To what wild dwelling have they flew
I read in books but find them not
For poesy hath its youth forgot
I hear them told to childern still 255
But fear ne'er numbs my spirits chill
I still see faces pale wi dread
While mine coud laugh at what is said
See tears imagind woes supply
While mine wi real cares are dry 260
Where are they gone the joys and fears
The links the life of other years
I thought they bound around my heart
So close that we coud never part
Till reason like a winters day 265
Nipt childhoods visions all away
Nor left behind one withering flower

To cherish in a lonely hour
Memory may yet the themes repeat
But childhoods heart doth cease to beat 270
At storys reasons sterner lore
Turneth like gossips from her door

June (extract)

From The Shepherd's Calendar (1827)

And now when sheering of the flocks are done 105
Some ancient customs mixd wi harmless fun
Crowns the swains merry toils – the timid maid
Pleasd to be praisd and yet of praise affraid
Seeks her best flowers not those of woods and fields
But such as every farmers garden yields 110
Fine cabbage roses¹ painted like her face
And shining pansys trimd in golden lace
And tall tuft larkheels² featherd thick wi flowers
And woodbines³ climbing oer the door in bowers
And London tufts⁴ of many a mottld hue 115
And pale pink pea and monkshood⁵ darkly blue
And white and purple jiliflowers⁶ that stay
Lingering in blossom summer half away
And single blood walls⁷ of a lucious smell
Old fashiond flowers which hus wives love so well 120
And columbines stone blue or deep night brown
Their honey-comb-like blossoms hanging down

Each cottage-gardens fond adopted child
 Tho heaths still claim them where they yet grow wild
 Mong their old wild companions summer blooms 125
 Furze brake and mozzling ling⁸ and golden broom
 Snap dragons gaping like to sleeping clowns⁹
 And 'clipping pinks'¹⁰ (which maidens sunday gowns
 Full often wear catched at by toying chaps)
 Pink as the ribbons round their snowy caps 130
 'Bess in her bravery'¹¹ too of glowing dyes
 As deep as sunsets crimson pillowd skyes
 And marjoram notts sweet briar and ribbon grass
 And lavender the choice of every lass
 And sprigs of lads love¹² all familiar names 135
 Which every garden thro the village claims
 These the maid gathers wi a coy delight
 And tyes them up in readiness for night
 Giving to every swain tween love and shame
 Her 'clipping poseys'¹³ as their yearly claim 140
 And turning as he claims the custom kiss
 Wi stifld smiles half ankering after bliss
 She shrinks away and blushing calls it rude
 But turns to smile and hopes to be pursued
 While one to whom the seeming hint applied 145
 Follows to claim it and is not denyd
 No doubt a lover for within his coat
 His nosgay owns each flower of better sort
 And when the envious mutter oer their beer
 And nodd the secret to his neighbor near 150
 Raising the laugh to make the matter known
 She blushes silent and will not disown
 And ale and songs and healths and merry ways
 Keeps up a shadow of old farmers days
 But the old beachen bowl that once supplyd 155

Its feast of frumity¹⁴ is thrown aside
 And the old freedom that was living then
 When masters made them merry wi their men
 Whose coat was like his neighbors russet brown
 And whose rude speech was vulgar as his clown¹⁵ 160
 Who in the same hour drank the rest among
 And joind the chorus while a labourer sung
 All this is past – and soon may pass away
 The time torn remnant of the holiday
 As proud distinction makes a wider space 165
 Between the genteel and the vulgar race
 Then must they fade as pride oer custom showers
 Its blighting mildew on her feeble flowers

To the Snipe (composed before 1831; edited from MS)

Lover of swamps

The quagmire¹ overgrown

With hassock² tufts of sedge – where fear encamps
Around thy home alone

The trembling grass 5

Quakes from the human foot

Nor bears the weight of man to let him pass

Where he alone and mute

Sitteth at rest

In safety neath³ the clump 10

Of hugh flag-forrest⁴ that thy haunts invest

Or some old sallow⁵ stump

Thriving on seams

That tiney islands swell

Just hilling from the mud and rancid streams 15

Suiting thy nature well

For here thy bill
Suited by wisdom good
Of rude unseemly length doth delve and drill
The gelid mass for food 20

And here may hap
When summer suns hath drest
The moors rude desolate and spongy lap
May hide thy mystic nest

Mystic indeed 25
For isles that ocean make
Are scarcely more secure for birds to build
Then this flag-hidden lake

Boys thread the woods
To their remotest shades 30
But in these marshy flats these stagnant floods
Security pervades

From year to year
Places untrodden lye
Where man nor boy nor stock⁶ hath ventured near 35
– Nought gazed on but the sky

And fowl that dread
The very breath of man
Hiding in spots that never knew his tread
A wild and timid clan 40

Wigeon and teal⁷
And wild duck – restless lot
That from mans dreaded sight will ever steal
To the most dreary spot

Here tempests howl 45
Around each flaggy plot

Where they who dread mans sight the water fowl
Hide and are frighted not

Tis power divine
That heartens them to brave 50
The roughest tempest and at ease recline
On marshes or the wave

Yet instinct knows
Not safety's bounds to shun
The firmer ground where skulking fowler goes 55
With searching dogs and gun

By tepid springs
Scarcely one stride across
Though brambles from its edge a shelter flings
Thy safety is at loss 60

And never chuse
The little sinky foss⁸
Streaking the moores whence spa-red water⁹ spews
From puddles fringed with moss

Free booters¹⁰ there 65
Intent to kill and slay
Startle with cracking guns the trepid¹¹ air
And dogs thy haunts betray

From dangers reach
Here thou art safe to roam 70
Far as these washy flag-worn marshes stretch
A still and quiet home

In these thy haunts
Ive gleaned habitual love
From the vague world where pride and folly taunts 75
I muse and look above

Thy solitudes
The unbounded heaven esteems
And here my heart warms into higher moods
And dignifying dreams 80

I see the sky
Smile on the meanest spot
Giving to all that creep or walk or flye
A calm and cordial lot

Thine teaches me 85
Right feelings to employ
That in the dreariest places peace will be
A dweller and a joy

To the Snipe

1 quagmire bog, marsh. Clare is thinking of Whittlesey Mere, the habitat of snipe and other water-birds, which extended to 2,000 acres; it was drained in 1850.

2 hassock firm tuft or clump of matted vegetation, especially of coarse grass or sedge, such as occurs in boggy ground.

3 neath underneath.

4 hugh flag-forrest a forest of huge marsh-reeds.

5 sallow willow.

6 stock livestock, cattle.

7 Wigeon and teal wigeon is a species of duck; teal is a small freshwater bird.

8 sinky foss yielding ditch.

9 spa-red water the water is red with iron oxide.

10 Free booters plunderers, poachers.

11 trepid agitated, fearful.

The Flitting (composed 1832; edited from MS)1

I've left my own old home of homes
Green fields and every pleasant place
The summer like a stranger comes
I pause and hardly know her face
I miss the hazels happy green 5
The blue bells quiet hanging blooms
Where envys sneer was never seen
Where staring malice never comes

I miss the heath its yellow furze
Molehills and rabbit tracks that lead 10
Through beesom ling² and teazel burrs
That spread a wilderness indeed
The woodland oaks and all below
That their white powdered branches shield
The mossy pads³ – the very crow 15
Croaked music in my native fields

I sit me in my corner chair
That seems to feel itself from home
I hear bird music here and there
From awthorn hedge and orchard come 20
I hear but all is strange and new
– I sat on my old bench in June

The sailing puddocks⁴ shrill ‘peelew’
Oer royce wood⁵ seemed a sweeter tune

I walk adown the narrow lane 25
The nightingale is singing now
But like to me she seems at loss
For royce wood and its shielding bough
I lean upon the window sill
The trees and summer happy seem 30
Green sunny green they shine – but still
My heart goes far away to dream

Of happiness and thoughts arise
With home bred pictures many a one
Green lanes that shut out burning skies 35
And old crooked stiles to rest upon
Above them hangs the maple tree
Below grass swells a velvet hill
And little footpads⁶ sweet to see
Goes seeking sweeter places still 40

With bye and bye a brook to cross
Oer which a little arch is thrown
No brook is here I feel the loss
From home and friends and all alone
– The stone pit with its shelvey sides 45
Seemed hanging rocks in my esteem
I miss the prospect far and wide
From Langley bush⁷ and so I seem

Alone and in a stranger scene
Far far from spots my heart esteems 50
The closen with their ancient green
Heath woods and pastures sunny streams
The hawthorns here were hung with may
But still they seem in deader green

The sun e'en seems to loose its way 55
Nor knows the quarter⁸ it is in

I dwell on trifles like a child
I feel as ill becomes a man
And still my thoughts like weedlings wild
Grow up to blossom where they can 60
They turn to places known so long
And feel that joy was dwelling there
So homebred pleasure fills the song
That has no present joys to heir

I read in books for happiness 65
But books mistake the way to joy
They change as well give age the glass
To hunt its visage when a boy
For books they follow fashions new
And throw all old esteems away 70
In crowded streets flowers never grew
But many there hath died away

Some sing the pomps of chivalry⁹
As legends of the ancient time
Where gold and pearls and mystery 75
Are shadows painted for sublime
But passions of sublimity
Belong to plain and simpler things
And David underneath a tree
Sought when a shepherd Salems¹⁰ springs¹¹ 80

Where moss did unto cushions spring
Forming a seat of velvet hue
A small unnoticed trifling thing
To all but heavens daily dew
And Davids crown hath passed away 85
Yet poesy breaths his shepherd-skill

His palace lost – and to this day
The little moss is blooming still¹²

Strange scenes mere shadows are to me
Vague unpersonifying things 90
I love with my old haunts to be
By quiet woods and gravel springs
Where little pebbles wear as smooth
As hermits beads by gentle floods
Whose noises doth my spirits sooth 95
And warms them into singing moods

Here every tree is strange to me
All foreign things where ere I go
Theres none where boyhood made a swee¹³
Or clambered up to rob a crow 100
No hollow tree or woodland bower
Well known when joy was beating high
Where beauty ran to shun a shower
And love took pains to keep her dry
And laid the shoaf¹⁴ upon the ground 105
To keep her from the dripping grass
And ran for stowks¹⁵ and set them round
Till scarce a drop of rain could pass
Through – where the maidens they reclined
And sung sweet ballads now forgot 110
Which brought sweet memorys to the mind
But here a memory knows them not

There have I sat by many a tree
And leaned oer many a rural stile
And conned¹⁶ my thoughts as joys to me 115
Nought heeding who might frown or smile
Twas natures beautys that inspired
My heart with rapture not its own

And shes a fame that never tires
How could I feel myself alone 120

No – pasture molehills used to lie
And talk to me of sunny days
And then the glad sheep listing bye
And still in ruminating praise
Of summer and the pleasant place 125
And every weed and blossom too
Was looking upward in my face
With friendships welcome ‘how do ye do’

All tennants of an ancient place
And heirs of noble heritage 130
Coeval they with adams race
And blest with more substantial age
For when the world first saw the sun
These little flowers beheld him too
And when his love for earth begun 135
They were the first his smiles to woo

These little lambtoe¹⁷ bunches springs
In red tinged and begolden dye
For ever and like china kings
They come but never seem to die 140
These may-blooms with its little threads
Still comes upon the thorny bowers
And ne’er forgets those pinky heads
Like fairy pins amid the flowers

And still they bloom as in the day 145
They first crowned wilderness and rock
When abel haply crowned with may
The firstlings of his little flock
And Eve might from the matted thorn
To deck her lone and lovely brow 150

Reach that same rose that heedless scorn
Misnames as the dog rosey¹⁸ now

Give me no high flown fangled things
No haughty pomp in marching chime
Where muses play on golden strings 155
And splendour passes for sublime
Where citys stretch as far as fame
And fancys straining eye can go
And piled untill the sky for shame
Is stooping far away below 160

I love the verse that mild and bland
Breaths of green fields and open sky¹⁹
I love the muse that in her hand
Bears wreaths of native poesy
Who walks nor skips the pasture brook 165
In scorn – but by the drinking horse
Leans oer its little brig²⁰ to look
How far the sallows²¹ lean accross

And feels a rapture in her breast
Upon their root-fringed grains to mark 170
A hermit morehens sedgy nest
Just like a naiads²² summer bark
She counts the eggs she cannot reach
Admires the spot and loves it well
And yearns so natures lessons teach 175
Amid such neighbourhoods to dwell

I love the muse who sits her down
Upon the molehills little lap
Who feels no fear to stain her gown
And pauses by the hedgerow gap 180
Not with that affectation praise
Of song to sing and never see

A field flower grown in all her days
Or e'en a forests aged tree

E'en here my simple feelings nurse 185
A love for every simple weed

And e'en this little shepherds purse²³
Grieves me to cut it up – Indeed
I feel at times a love and joy
For every weed and every thing 190
A feeling kindred from a boy
A feeling brought with every spring

And why – this 'shepherds purse' that grows
In this strange spot in days gone bye
Grew in the little garden rows 195

Of that old hut²⁴ now left – and I
Feel what I never felt before
This weed an ancient neighbour here
And though I own the spot no more
Its every trifle makes it dear 200

The ivy at the parlour end
The woodbine²⁵ at the garden gate
Are all and each affections friend
That renders parting desolate
But times will change and friends must part 205
And nature still can make amends
Their memory lingers round the heart
Like life whose essence is its friends

Time looks on pomp with careless moods
Or killing apathys disdain 210
– So where old marble citys stood
Poor persecuted weeds remain
She feels a love for little things
That very few can feel beside

And still the grass eternal springs 215
Where castles stood and grandeur died²⁶

The Flitting

¹ The valedictory tone of this remarkable poem owes much to the fact that it was composed shortly after Clare had moved to a cottage in Northborough from Helpston. Clare was born in Helpston in 1793, and although Northborough was only a few miles away it felt as if he had been exiled to a different country.

² besom ling besom (heath and broom), and heather ('ling').

³ pads paths.

⁴ puddocks kite's.

⁵ royce wood Royce Wood was a favourite haunt of Clare's, a home to many nightingales.

⁶ footpads footpaths.

⁷ Langley bush an old whitethorn bush that was a favourite spot for gypsies in Clare's youth. Clare's journal records its destruction in 1823.

⁸ the quarter i.e. which part of the sky.

⁹ Some sing the pomps of chivalry John Lucas, John Clare (1994), p. 61, suggests that Clare has Byron in mind.

¹⁰ Salems Jerusalem's.

¹¹ And David...springs Clare could have any number of the Psalms in mind.

12 John Lucas comments on lines 79–88: ‘Clare is saying not merely that true poetry is “nature” poetry, but that it has its roots in ordinary living, the lives of commoners. “Salem’s springs” can after all be linked not merely to the life of the fields but to the sermons of the radical Methodists who spoke to and for the people.... Methodist chapels were often named “Salem”’ (John Clare (1994), p. 61).

13 swee swing.

14 shoaf sheaf.

15 stowk stook (of wheat or barley).

16 conned examined.

17 lambtoe common bird’s-foot trefoil.

18 dog rosey dog-rose, a common species of wild rose (Rosa canina), with pale red flowers, frequent in hedges.

19 green fields and open sky possibly an echo of Wordsworth, ‘Composed upon Westminster Bridge, 3 September 1802’ 6–7: ‘Ships, towers, domes, theatres, and temples lie / Open unto the fields, and to the sky.’

20 brig bridge.

21 sallows willows.

22 naiad water-nymph.

23 shepherds purse a common cruciferous weed, Capsella bursa-pastoris.

24 hut cottage – presumably the one he had just moved out of in Helpston.

25 woodbine honeysuckle.

26 The poem ends on a note of defiance: the grass is like the poor because no matter how often you cut it down it grows back up. Lucas commends Clare's 'exultant insistence on the "grass eternal" as an invading army which will finally overwhelm its apparently irresistible enemies' (John Clare (1994), p. 62).

The Badger (composed between 1835 and 1837; edited from MS)

The badger grunting on his woodland track
With shaggy hide and sharp nose scrowed¹ with black
Roots in the bushes and the woods and makes
A great hugh² burrow in the ferns and brakes³
With nose on ground he runs a awkward pace 5
And anything will beat him in the race
The shepherds dog will run him to his den
Followed and hooted by the dogs and men
The woodman when the hunting comes about
Go round at night to stop the foxes out 10
And hurrying through the bushes ferns and brakes
Nor sees the many holes the badger makes
And often through the bushes to the chin
Breaks the old holes and tumbles headlong in

When midnight comes a host of dogs and men 15
Go out and track the badger to his den
And put a sack within the hole and lye
Till the old grunting badger passes bye
He comes and hears they let the strongest loose
The old fox hears the noise and drops the goose 20
The poacher shoots and hurrys from the cry
And the old hare half wounded buzzes bye

They get a forked stick to bear him down
And clapt⁴ the dogs and bore him to the town
And bait him all the day with many dogs 25
And laugh and shout and fright the scampering hogs

He runs along and bites at all he meets
They shout and hollo down the noisy streets
He turns about to face the loud uproar
And drives the rebels to their very doors 30
The frequent stone is hurled where ere they go
When badgers fight and every ones a foe
The dogs are clapt and urged to join the fray
The badger turns and drives them all away

Though scarcely half as big dimute⁵ and small 35
He fights with dogs for hours and beats them all
The heavy mastiff savage in the fray
Lies down and licks his feet and turns away
The bull dog knows his match and waxes⁶ cold
The badger grins and never leaves his hold 40
He drives the crowd and follows at their heels
And bites them through the drunkard swears and reels

The frightened women takes the boys away
The blackguard laughs and hurrys on the fray
He trys to reach the woods a awkard race 45
But sticks and cudgels quickly stop the chace
He turns agen and drives the noisy crowd
And beats the many dogs in noises loud
He drives away and beats them every one
And then they loose them all and set them on 50
He falls as dead and kicked by boys and men
Then starts and grins and drives the crowd agen
Till kicked and torn and beaten out he lies
And leaves his hold and cackles groans and dies

Some keep a baited badger tame as hog 55
And tame him till he follows like the dog
They urge him on like dogs and show fair play
He beats and scarcely wounded goes away
Lapt⁷ up as if asleep he scorns to fly
And siezes any dog that ventures nigh 60
Clapt like a dog he never bites the men
But worrys dogs and hurrys to his den
They let him out and turn a barrow down
And there he fights the pack of all the town
He licks the patting hand and trys to play 65
And never trys to bite or run away
And runs away from noise in hollow trees
Burnt by the boys to get a swarm of bees

The Badger

² hugh huge.

³ brakes bracken.

⁴ clapt set on.

⁵ dimute diminutive.

⁶ waxes becomes.

⁷ Lapt curled.

A Vision (composed 2 August 1844; edited from MS)

I lost the love, of heaven above;
I spurn'd the lust, of earth below;
I felt the sweets of fancied love, –
And hell itself my only foe.

I lost earths joys, but felt the glow, 5
Of heaven's flame abound in me:
'Till loveliness, and I did grow,
The bard of immortality.

I loved, but woman fell away;
I hid me, from her faded fame: 10
I snatched the sun's eternal ray, –
And wrote 'till earth was but a name.

In every language upon earth,
On every shore, o'er every sea;
I gave my name immortal birth, 15
And kep't my spirit with the free.

'I am' (composed by 20 December 1846;
edited from MS)

I am – yet what I am, none cares or knows;
My friends forsake me like a memory lost: –
I am the self-consumer of my woes; –
They rise and vanish in oblivion's host,

Like shadows in love's frenzied stifled throes: – 5
And yet I am, and live – like vapours tost

Into the nothingness of scorn and noise, –
Into the living sea of waking dreams,
Where there is neither sense of life or joys,
But the vast shipwreck of my lifes esteems; 10
Even the dearest, that I love the best
Are strange – nay, rather stranger than the rest.

I long for scenes where man hath never trod
A place where woman never smiled or wept
There to abide with my Creator, God; 15
And sleep as I in childhood, sweetly slept,
Untroubling, and untroubled where I lie,
The grass below – above the vaulted sky.

An Invite to Eternity (composed by July 1847; edited from MS)

Wilt thou go with me sweet maid
Say maiden wilt thou go with me
Through the valley depths of shade
Of night and dark obscurity
Where the path hath lost its way 5
Where the sun forgets the day
Where there's nor life nor light to see
Sweet maiden wilt thou go with me

Where stones will turn to flooding streams
Where plains will rise like ocean waves 10
Where life will fade like visioned dreams
And mountains darken into caves
Say maiden wilt thou go with me
Through this sad non-identity
Where parents live and are forgot 15
And sisters live and know us not

Say maiden wilt thou go with me
In this strange death of life to be
To live in death and be the same
Without this life, or home, or name 20
At once to be, and not to be
That was, and is not – yet to see
Things pass like shadows – and the sky
Above, below, around us lie

The land of shadows wilt thou trace 25
And look – nor know each others face
The present mixed with reasons gone
And past, and present all as one
Say maiden can thy life be led
To join the living with the dead 30
Then trace thy footsteps on with me
We're wed to one eternity

Little Trotty Wagtail (composed 9 August 1849; edited from MS)

Little trotty wagtail he went in the rain
And tittering tottering sideways he near got straight again
He stooped to get a worm and look'd up to catch a fly
And then he flew away e're his feathers they were dry

Little trotty wagtail he waddled in the mud 5
And left his little foot marks trample where he would
He waddled in the water pudge and waggle went his tail
And chirrupt up his wings to dry upon the garden rail

Little trotty wagtail you nimble all about
And in the dimpling water pudge you waddle in and out 10
Your home is nigh at hand and in the warm pigsty
So little Master Wagtail I'll bid you a 'Good bye'

Silent Love (composed between 1842 and 1864; edited from MS)

The dew it trembles on the thorn
Then vanishes so love is born
Young love that speaks in silent thought
'Till scorned, then withers and is nought

The pleasure of a single hour 5
The blooming of a single flower
The glitter of the morning dew
Such is young love when it is new

The twitter of the wild birds wing
The murmur of the bees 10
Lays of hay crickets when they sing
Or other things more frail than these

Such is young love when silence speaks
Till weary with the joy it seeks
Then fancy shapes supplies 15
'Till sick of its own heart it dies

The dew drop falls at mornings hour
When none are standing by
And noiseless fades the broken flower
So lovers in their silence die 20

['O could I be as I have been'] (composed between 1842 and 1864; edited from MS)

O could I be as I have been
And ne'er can be no more
A harmless thing in meadows green
Or on the wild sea shore

Oh could I be what once I was 5
In heaths and valleys green
A dweller in the summer grass
Green fields and places green

A tennant of the happy fields
By grounds of wheat and beans 10
By gipseys' camps and milking bield¹
Where lussious woodbine² leans

To sit on the deserted plough
Left when the corn was sown
In corn and wild weeds buried now 15
In quiet peace unknown

The harrows resting by the hedge
The roll³ within the Dyke⁴
Hid in the Ariff⁵ and the sedge⁶
Are things I used to like. 20

I used to tread through fallow lands
And wade through paths of grain
When wheat ears pattered on the hands
And head-aches⁷ left a stain

I wish I was what I have been 25
And what I was could be
As when I roved in shadows green
And loved my willow tree

8

To gaze upon the starry sky
And higher fancies build 30
And make in solitary joy
Loves temple in the field

O could I be as I have been

Felicia Dorothea Hemans (née Browne) (1793–1835)

Felicia Dorothea Browne was born at 118 Duke Street, Liverpool, on 25 September 1793,¹ the daughter of George Browne, merchant, and Felicity Wagner (of mingled German, Italian and Lancashire descent). She had three brothers: Sir Thomas Henry Browne, KCH, distinguished in the Peninsular Wars; Lieutenant-Colonel George Baxter Browne, CB, also distinguished in the Peninsular Wars, later chief commissioner of police in Ireland; and Claude Scott Browne, Deputy Assistant Commissary-General in Upper Canada. Her father suffered business problems in 1800 and moved his family to Gwyrch (pronounced ‘Goo-erch’), near Abergele, North Wales, where Felicia was largely brought up, her education being supervised by her mother, who taught her French, Portuguese, Spanish and Italian. Her sister recalled that ‘She could repeat pages of poetry from her favourite authors, after having read them but once over.... One of her earliest tastes was a passion for Shakespeare, which she read, as her choicest recreation, at six years old.’²

She began writing poetry, and published her first volume of poems by subscription when she was 14, in 1808. Subscribers included John Wilson Croker, Reginald Heber and William Roscoe. According to her biographer, the reviews were so harsh ‘as to confine her to her bed for several days’.³ In fact, the critics were fair; they were certainly firm, but all found encouraging words for the author. Anna Laetitia Barbauld in the Monthly Review commented, not unfairly, that some of the poems were ‘jejune’, and that they ‘contain some erroneous and some pitiable lines’, but concluded by remarking that, ‘if the youthful author were to content herself for some years with reading instead of writing, we should open any future work from her pen with an expectation of pleasure, founded on our recollection of this publication.’⁴ And the Poetical Register found in the poems ‘promise of something better in future.... They are pretty, and not devoid of poetical ideas.’⁵ Hemans cannot have been too much discouraged, because within the year she would publish her second volume, England and Spain; or, Valour and Patriotism, inspired by her brothers’ involvement in the Peninsular campaign.

One of the subscribers to Poems (1808) was young Thomas Medwin, who had met its author in North Wales. He showed the book to his friend, Percy Bysshe Shelley, who in turn wrote to Thomas Jefferson Hogg, 28 July 1811: ‘Now there is Miss F. D. Browne (certainly a tyger); yet she surpasses my sister in poetical talents, this your dispassionate criticism must allow.’⁶ Shelley scholarship has it that he bombarded Miss Browne with letters but that, recognizing trouble when she saw it, her mother forbade her from responding.⁷

Her father left for Canada in 1810, looking for fresh opportunities, but he was to die there two years later. The following year Captain Alfred Hemans returned to England, a veteran of the Peninsular campaign, and one of the subscribers to the 1808 volume. While still Felicia Browne, she published The Domestic Affections in 1812, shortly before marrying him. For a while they lived at Daventry, a dull Midlands town which she detested, before returning to her maternal home in Wales. The pair were ill-suited; her husband is reported to have said that ‘it was the curse of having a literary wife that he could never get a pair of stockings mended.’⁸ It is interesting to find this corroborated by none other than Wordsworth, who noted: ‘She was totally ignorant of housewifery and could as easily have managed the spear of Minerva as her needle.’⁹

Literary success came with publication of The Restoration of the Works of Art to Italy in 1816, which was snapped up for a second edition by Byron’s publisher, John Murray. ‘It is a good poem – very’, Byron told him.¹⁰ By now Hemans had four children (all boys), and just before the birth of a fifth, her husband abandoned his wife for Italy, never to return.

Although her mother and sister helped raise her children, the need to provide meant that she had to keep writing. It was a trap from which she was not to escape. ‘Her poetry was often written with a readiness approaching improvisation’, W. M. Rossetti wrote; ‘this she felt as in some degree a blemish, and towards the close of her life she regretted having often had to write in a haphazard way, so as to supply means for the education of her sons.’¹¹ The swiftness with which her poems were composed may be seen in her manuscripts; few carry corrections, revisions or even deletions.¹² Her working life was one of furious productivity, undertaken in spare moments from household chores. A stream of books flowed from her pen: Tales, and Historic Scenes in Verse (1819); Stanzas to the Memory of the Late King (1820); Welsh Melodies (1822); The Siege of Valencia, and Other Poems (1823); The Forest Sanctuary (1825); Lays of Many Lands (1826); Records of Woman (1828); and Songs of the Affections (1830). She also contributed poems and essays to a wide range of periodicals and magazines, becoming a regular contributor to the New Monthly Magazine in 1823. Her usual practice was to publish poems first in periodicals, and then collect them in volume form. By this means she maximized her income and became known to a range of different audiences.

She was on a treadmill, but there were rewards: her work enjoyed widespread popularity and sold in large quantities, sometimes outselling even Byron. It was the kind of success that Shelley and Keats could only dream about. As early as 1819, the Edinburgh Monthly Review commented: ‘The more we become acquainted with Mrs Hemans as a poet, the more we are delighted with her productions, and astonished by her powers.’¹³ The reviewer then became quite rapturous: ‘With an exquisite airiness and spirit, with an imagery which quite sparkles, are touched her lighter delineations; with a rich and glowing pencil her descriptions of visible nature: a sublime eloquence is the charm of her sentiments of magnanimity; while she melts into tenderness with a grace in which she has few equals.’¹⁴ Reviewing The Siege of Valencia in 1823, the British Critic remarked: ‘When a woman can write like this, she ought to write. Her mind is national property. In the grand scheme of a popular literature, there are many departments which can alone be filled by the emanations of female genius.’¹⁵ In 1826 the Literary Chronicle described her as, quite simply, ‘the first poetess of the day’.¹⁶

Perhaps the most influential of her many reviews was that by Francis Jeffrey for the second editions of Records of Woman and The Forest Sanctuary. He praised her work because

It is infinitely sweet, elegant, and tender – touching, perhaps, and contemplative, rather than vehement and overpowering; and not only finished throughout with an exquisite delicacy, and even serenity of execution, but informed with a purity and loftiness of feeling, and a certain sober and humble tone of indulgence and piety, which must satisfy all judgements, and allay the apprehensions of those who are most afraid of the passionate exaggerations of poetry.¹⁷

This was not meant to be as patronizing as it sounds. Not only was Jeffrey a genuine admirer of her work, he was a personal friend, and sought to promote her poetry for what he saw as its virtues. If his comments betray a gendered view of literature, they are representative of their time and place.

By now, successive reprints of her poetry in America meant that she was among the foremost internationally acclaimed poets of the day. Fan mail arrived for her on every boat that crossed the Atlantic, bringing correspondence from such distinguished readers as Ellery Channing. The first collected edition of her poems, edited by Professor Andrews Norton, was published in America in 1825, to widespread acclaim. At about this time Ann Grant wrote, telling her that she was ‘Praised by all that read you, loved by all that praise you, and known, in some degree, wherever our language is spoken.’¹⁸ At the height of her fame, Bishop Reginald Heber, friend and literary adviser, encouraged her to write a five-act tragedy, The Vespers of Palermo, staged at Covent Garden on 12 December 1823 – about the ‘Sicilian Vespers’ insurrection against French rule in 1282; it was, alas, a failure, though staged the following year in Edinburgh, with an epilogue by Sir Walter Scott, with some success.

There were darker hours ahead. Her eldest brother died in 1826, followed by her mother the following year. It was a terrible blow, by which time her own health, ravaged by years of unremitting hard work, was beginning to fail. She moved to Wavertree, a village near Liverpool, where she continued to write. Hoping that it would reinvigorate her, she toured Scotland and the Lakes in 1830, meeting Wordsworth along the way.

Hemans was always an admirer of Wordsworth. His poems, she once wrote, ‘quite haunt me, and I have a strange feeling as if I must have known them in my childhood, they come over me so like old melodies.’¹⁹ She loved the Lake District, partly because she viewed it through the lens of his poetry.

I seem to be writing to you almost from the spirit-land; all is here so brightly still, so remote from everyday cares and tumults, that I sometimes can scarcely persuade myself I am not dreaming. It scarcely seems to be ‘the light of common day’ that is clothing the woody mountain before me; there is something almost visionary in its soft gleams and ever-changing shadows. I am charmed with Mr Wordsworth, whose kindness to me has been quite a soothing influence over my spirits.²⁰

Wordsworth enjoyed her company; he spent a morning with her, ‘reading to me a great deal from Spenser, and afterwards his own Laodamia, my favourite Tintern Abbey, and many of his noble sonnets’.²¹ That evening he helped her onto a horse and led her on a ride along a mountain path overlooking Grasmere valley.

Perhaps feeling the draw of her Celtic roots, she said farewell to England and moved to Ireland in April 1831, to be closer to her brother, George Browne, Commissioner of the Dublin City Police, then residing at the Hermitage near Kilkenny. She was able to make a pilgrimage to the home of Mary Tighe, the author of the remarkable poem Psyche (1805), written in Spenserian stanzas, whom she had celebrated in ‘The Grave of a Poetess’ (see p. 1357). She was embarrassed to find that, such was her fame, ‘I found myself the object of quite a reception. There was no help for it, though I never felt so much as if I wanted a large leaf to wrap me up and shelter me.’²²

She moved to Dublin in the autumn and made friends with such liberal Anglicans as Archbishop Whateley and Joseph Blanco White. On occasion she attended concerts, and heard Paganini: ‘he is certainly singular-looking, pale, slight, and with long, neglected hair ... I thought the expression of his countenance rather that of good-natured and mild enjouement, than of anything else.’²³ Her health continued to deteriorate. A tour of the Wicklow mountains in search of fresh air ended prematurely when she stayed, unwittingly, at an inn at which the proprietor and his family were infected with scarlet fever, which she then contracted.

While recovering she visited the gardens of the Dublin Society, but on a visit in November 1834 became so immersed in the book she was reading that before she knew it she found herself in the midst of an autumnal fog. She went home immediately but was ‘attacked by a fit of ague’, as her sister described it.²⁴ This was no passing illness; it was the final coup de grâce that would precipitate her death the following year. Her remaining time was short, but the habit of writing was so deeply ingrained that she could not stop, regardless of her physical state. It was at this moment that she composed her last great work, Despondency and Aspiration (p. 1370), in which she takes the reader on that most Wordsworthian of quests – to the roots of her poetic talent.

And then a glorious mountain-chain uprose,
Height above spiry height!
A soaring solitude of woods and snows,
All steeped in golden light!
While as it passed, those regal peaks
unveiling,
I heard, methought, a waving of dread wings
And mighty sounds, as if the vision hailing,
From lyres that quivered through ten thousand strings.²⁵

The ‘glorious mountain-chain’ is Welsh, and the lyres those of Druidic bards. The vision is morally and ideologically loaded. The mountain range exemplifies the virtues of steadfastness and fidelity she celebrates in her poetry, and which comprise:

The deep religion, which hath dwelt from yore,
Silently brooding by lone cliff and lake,
And wildest river shore!²⁶

Hemans’s Welshness is often overlooked by critics, but it is worth bearing in mind that Wales was her adoptive home, and a profound attachment to it runs through her work. In The Rock of Cader Idris (pp. 1296–7), that famous mountain, like the bards who once thronged its summits, is freighted with a Welshness felt to the core of her being, a symbol of heroic independence against the incursions of Roman and Saxon invaders.

Having completed Despondency and Aspiration, she might have been expected to put down her pen for good, but she could not stop. In a final expression of heroic energy of the kind she had often written about, she composed a series of sonnets under the rubric, Thoughts During Sickness. The second of these, Sickness like Night (p. 1374), moves us because of its determination to convert something terrifying – the darkness of impending death – into the promise of ‘starry, spiritual night’.

She lingered on for several months, confessing she felt ‘as if hovering between heaven and earth’.²⁷ For some time her condition stabilized, but tuberculosis had not left her. One day in April it tightened its grip, she went into a decline and died on Saturday 16 May 1835. She was buried in St Anne’s Church, Dublin.

There were to be many tributes to her, some in verse. Indeed, poems inspired by her life and death comprise an intriguing sub-genre in themselves – notably Letitia Landon’s Felicia Hemans, Stanzas on the Death of Mrs Hemans and Elizabeth Barrett’s Stanzas Addressed to Miss Landon, and suggested by her ‘Stanzas on the Death of Mrs Hemans’, all included in this volume (see pp. 1520, 1522, 1534 below). But the finest may be Wordsworth’s lament for her in his Extempore Effusion on the Death of James Hogg:

Mourn rather for that holy spirit,
Sweet as the spring, as ocean deep;
For her who, ere her summer faded,
Has sunk into a breathless sleep.

(p. 594 above)

Hemans was deeply Wordsworthian in that she shared his sense of the numinous, vividly real in the discussion of second sight in her poem of 1830 (p. 1369). No doubt her Welshness had much to do with this, as well as the close contact she enjoyed with the natural world as a child (her hatred of Daventry stemmed partly from its lack of green spaces).

She spent the first two decades of her life in a country obsessed with the threat of invasion – from France. There were two ways of reacting to this: you could denounce the war, like Anna Laetitia Barbauld in Eighteen Hundred and Eleven; or, if your brothers and husband had seen service (as was true of Hemans), you could strike a more patriotic attitude. Her readiness to do this was partly the cause of her popularity, and explains why she was acceptable to Tory critics like Croker, who attacked Barbauld for her scepticism. But this doesn’t do Hemans full justice, as even her early work is concerned with more than love of her country. Pride, defiance, courage in the face of inevitable defeat, even love: these are the virtues that pervade her poems.

Her work is best represented by Records of Woman (1828), the complete sequence of which is included here (alongside some of the accompanying ‘Miscellaneous Pieces’). The volume was published by William Blackwood, the Edinburgh publisher, in May 1828, on a profit-sharing plan. ‘I have put my heart and individual feelings into it more than anything else I have written’, she told Mary Russell Mitford, ‘but whether it will interest my friends more for this reason remains to be seen.’²⁸ It was her masterpiece, and an instant commercial success. By August all 1,000 copies were sold, and Blackwood was able to remit her share of the profits – £75 (£3,870/US$7,000 today). A second edition was in print by October. (A third edition was out in June the following year.)

Hemans described it as ‘a series of poetic tales ... illustrative of the female character, affections, and fate’.²⁹ Its theme is the hardship and duties of womanhood, ranging from

Joan of Arc to 'ordinary' women like Edith. It was something she knew much about, having been under pressure to support her family from the moment her husband left. Many of the Records of Woman are concerned with the plight of those shackled to feckless, unreliable, weak or ineffectual men. The first four poems ('Arabella Stuart', 'The Bride of the Greek Isle', 'The Switzer's Wife' and 'Properzia Rossi') praise the constancy of their heroines. The poems that follow, however, temper their commitment with bleaker lessons drawn from such characters as the Indian Woman, 'driven to despair by her husband's desertion of her for another wife', or Constanza, the nun who nurses the warrior who once betrayed her. Although the Indian Woman ends by committing suicide, other heroines witness the deaths of the men who abandoned or deceived them, and there is a strong sense, throughout the volume, that their fate is merited. As Adam Roberts has observed, men die bloodily, and seem to deserve it: 'Physical frailty is transformed to the masculine, and women adopt heroism in a more than metaphorical sense.'³⁰

On the other hand, Hemans celebrates the love of mother and child, most obviously in such works as 'Madeline', 'The Memorial Pillar' and 'The Grave of a Poetess'. The volume thus moves away from heterosexual love towards that between mothers and (usually) daughters, away from betrayal to fidelity.

In editing these poems afresh, including the complete Records of Woman, I have benefited greatly from the labours of two of Hemans' most diligent and insightful editors – Paula R. Feldman and Susan J. Wolfson. Professor Wolfson has been particularly generous in response to requests for information of various kinds.

Written on the Sea-Shore

From Poems (1808)

How awful, how sublime this view,
Each day presenting something new;
Hark! now the seas majestic roar,
And now the birds their warblings pour;
Now yonder lark's sweet notes resound,
And now an awful stillness reigns around.

The Rock of Cader Idris¹

From Welsh Melodies (1822)²

It is an old tradition of the Welsh bards that, on the summit of the mountain Cader Idris, is an excavation resembling a couch, and that whoever should pass a night in that hollow would be found in the morning either dead, in a state of frenzy, or endowed with the highest poetical inspiration.

I lay on that rock where the storms have their dwelling,
The birthplace of phantoms, the home of the cloud;
Around it for ever deep music is swelling,
The voice of the mountain wind, solemn and loud.
'Twas a midnight of shadows all fitfully streaming, 5
Of wild waves and breezes that mingled their moan,
Of dim shrouded stars, as from gulfs faintly gleaming,
And I met the dread gloom of its grandeur alone.

I lay there in silence — a spirit came o'er me;
Man's tongue hath no language to speak what I saw: 10
Things glorious, unearthly, passed floating before me,
And my heart almost fainted with rapture and awe.
I viewed the dread beings around us that hover,
Though veiled by the mists of mortality's breath;
And I called upon darkness the vision to cover, 15
For a strife was within me of madness and death.

I saw them — the powers of the wind and the ocean,
The rush of whose pinion bears onward the storms;
Like the sweep of the white-rolling wave was their motion,
I felt their dim presence, but knew not their forms! 20
I saw them — the mighty of ages departed —
The dead were around me that night on the hill:
From their eyes, as they passed, a cold radiance they darted —
There was light on my soul, but my heart's blood was chill.

I saw what man looks on, and dies — but my spirit 25
Was strong, and triumphantly lived through that hour;
And as from the grave, I awoke to inherit
A flame all immortal, a voice, and a power!
Day burst on that rock with the purple cloud crested,
And high Cader Idris rejoiced in the sun — 30

But oh, what new glory all nature invested,
When the sense which gives soul to her beauty was won!

The Rock of Cader Idris

¹ Cader Idris (Chair of Idris), a long mountain ridge, reaching a height of 2,927 ft at Pen-y-Gader.

² Though born in Liverpool, Hemans identified strongly with the Welsh, and poetry celebrating Welsh cultural identity forms a small but significant part of her output. This is probably the most famous of those works.

Manuscript fragments in prose (composed c.1827)

From The Works of Mrs Hemans (1839)¹

Oh, that we could but fix upon one eternal and unchangeable Being, the affections which here we pour forth, a wasted treasure, upon the dust! But they are ‘of the earth, earthy’;² they cling with vain devotedness to mortal idols; how often to be thrown back upon our own hearts, and to press them down with a weight of ‘voiceless thoughts’;³ and of feelings which find no answer in the world!

Oh, that the mind could throw from it the burden of the past for ever! Why is it that voices and tones and looks, which have passed away, come over us with a suddenness and intenseness of remembrance which make the heart die within us, and the eyes overflow with fruitless tears? Who shall explain the mysteries of the world within?

How the name of love is profaned in this world! Truly does Lord Byron call ‘circumstance’ an ‘unspiritual God’.⁴ What strange, coarse ties – coarse but not strong – one daily sees him forming! – not of the ‘silver cords'⁵ of the heart, but of the homely housewifely worsted of interest – convenience – economical consideration. One wonders how they are to resist the wear and tear of life, or how those whom they link together are to be held side by side through sorrow, difficulty, disappointment, without the strong affection which 'overcometh all things',⁶ and ennobles all things – even the humblest offices performed in attendance at the sick-bed of one we love. What work, what sacrifice is there which a deep, true, powerful feeling cannot dignify!

What is fame to a heart yearning for affection, and finding it not? Is it not as a triumphal crown to the brow of one parched with fever, and asking for one fresh healthful draught – the 'cup of cold water'?⁷

Is it real affliction – ill health – disappointment – or the 'craving void that aches within the breast'⁸ for sympathies which perhaps earth does not afford – that weans us most from life? I think the latter. If we could only lie down to die as to sleep, how few would not willingly throw off what Wordsworth calls

The weight

Of all this unintelligible world!⁹

and 'flee away, and be at rest.'¹⁰

Manuscript fragments in prose

¹ This is a brief selection of some of the fragments published in 1839 in the collected edition of Hemans's poetry. It is introduced by her sister with the comment: 'A few original fragments found after Mrs Hemans's death in one of her MS. books, may here be given as belonging to this date.'

² of the earth, earthy from 1 Corinthians 15:47.

³ voiceless thoughts from Byron, Childe Harold's Pilgrimage iii 912–13: 'I live and die unheard, / With a most voiceless thought, sheathing it as a sword.'

4 Truly does Lord Byron ... unspiritual God Hemans refers to Byron, Childe Harold's Pilgrimage iv 1122: 'And Circumstance, that unspiritual god.'

5 silver cords a frequently used image in poetry, deriving from Ecclesiastes 12:6: 'Or ever the silver cord be loosed, or the golden bowl be broken ...'

6 overcometh all things interestingly, a recollection of Sir Thomas Browne's 'Fragment on Mummies', which discusses poetry, observing that 'Time sadly overcometh all things'.

7 cup of cold water Hemans is recalling Matthew 10:42: 'And whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward.'

8 craving void that aches within the breast an echo of Pope, 'Eloisa to Abelard' 94: 'No craving void left aching in the breast.'

9 the weight ... world from Wordsworth, Tintern Abbey 40–1.

10 flee away, and be at rest the memorable final line of Byron's Stanzas ('I would I were a careless child').

Records of Woman

¹ Wordsworth, 'Laodamia' 86–90. Hemans's epigraph is from Laodamia's speech about the power and agony of love – a running theme of Records of Woman. For Hemans's friendship with Wordsworth, see headnote, p. 1293.

² 'That is the lot of the beautiful on earth!' From Schiller, Wallenstein IV xii. Thekla is speaking, having just learnt that her lover, Max Piccolomini, has been slaughtered in battle, and insists on visiting his grave. In June 1830 Hemans read Schiller with Wordsworth.

³ Hemans never met Baillie, but they enjoyed a cordial correspondence. Shortly after Hemans's death, the 73-year-old Baillie told Andrews Norton that, of all the poets she knew, 'there is not one of them all whose lyre emitted sweeter or more touching sounds than her own' (Felicia Hemans ed. Susan J. Wolfson (Princeton, 2000), p. 576).

Arabella Stuart ¹

'The Lady Arabella' (as she has been frequently entitled) was descended from Margaret, eldest daughter of Henry VII, and consequently allied by birth to Elizabeth, as well as James I. This affinity to the throne proved the misfortune of her life, as the jealousies which it constantly excited in her royal relatives, who were anxious to prevent her marrying, shut her out from the enjoyment of that domestic happiness which her heart appears to have so fervently desired. By a secret, but early discovered union with William Seymour, son of Lord Beauchamp, she alarmed the cabinet of James, and the wedded lovers were immediately placed in separate confinement. From this they found means to concert a romantic plan of escape and, having won over a female attendant, by whose assistance she was disguised in male attire, Arabella, though faint from recent sickness and suffering, stole out in the night, and at last reached an appointed spot where a boat and servants were in waiting. She embarked and, at break of day, a French vessel, engaged to receive her, was discovered and gained. As Seymour, however, had not yet arrived, she was desirous that the vessel should lie at anchor for him; but this wish was overruled by her companions who, contrary to her entreaties, hoisted sail, 'which', says Disraeli, occasioned so fatal a termination to this romantic adventure. Seymour, indeed, had escaped from the Tower; he reached the wharf, and found his confidential man² waiting with a boat, and arrived at Lee.³ The time passed; the waves were rising; Arabella was not there; but in the distance he descried a vessel. Hiring a fisherman to take him on board, he discovered, to his grief, on hailing it, that it was not the French ship charged with his Arabella; in despair and confusion he found another ship from Newcastle which, for a large sum, altered its course and landed him in Flanders.

Arabella, meantime, whilst imploring her attendants to linger, and earnestly looking out for the expected boat of her husband, was overtaken in Calais Roads⁴ by a vessel in the King's service, and brought back to a captivity, under the suffering of which her mind and constitution gradually sank.

What passed in that dreadful imprisonment cannot perhaps be recovered for authentic history, but enough is known; that her mind grew impaired, that she finally lost her reason, and, if the duration of her imprisonment was short, that it was only terminated by her death. Some effusions, often begun and never ended, written and erased, incoherent and rational, yet remain among her papers.

*(Disraeli's Curiosities of Literature)*⁵

The following poem, meant as some record of her fate, and the imagined fluctuations of her thoughts and feelings, is supposed to commence during the time of her first imprisonment, whilst her mind was yet buoyed up by the consciousness of Seymour's affection, and the cherished hope of eventual deliverance.

Arabella Stuart

¹ Arabella Stuart (1575–1615) was imprisoned by Elizabeth I for her liaison with Edward Seymour; she was released with the accession of James I in 1603. Against his wishes, she married William Seymour in June 1610. Both were interrogated and arrested; Seymour was imprisoned in the Tower of London, Stuart held in private custody. In June 1611, disguised as a man, Stuart escaped with Seymour. While Seymour went to Ostend, Stuart was recaptured and imprisoned in the Tower. In Hemans's time it was thought that Stuart went mad in prison, but today it is believed that she remained sane and was party to several escape plots. But to no avail: she died in the Tower, 25 September 1615.

I

'Twas but a dream! I saw the stag leap free
Under the boughs where early birds were singing;
I stood o'ershadowed by the greenwood tree,³
And heard, it seemed, a sudden bugle ringing
Far through a royal forest: then the fawn 5
Shot, like a gleam of light, from grassy lawn
To secret covert; and the smooth turf shook,
And lilies quivered by the glade's lone brook,
And young leaves trembled as, in fleet career,
A princely band with horn and hound and spear, 10
Like a rich masque swept forth. I saw the dance
Of their white plumes⁴ that bore a silvery glance
Into the deep wood's heart, and all passed by
Save one – I met the smile of one clear eye,
Flashing out joy to mine. Yes, thou wert there, 15
Seymour! A soft wind blew the clustering hair
Back from thy gallant brow, as thou didst rein
Thy courser, turning from that gorgeous train,
And fling, methought, thy hunting-spear away
And, lightly graceful in thy green array, 20
Bound to my side; and we, that met and parted,

Ever in dread of some dark watchful power,
Won back to childhood's trust and, fearless-hearted,
Blent the glad fullness of our thoughts that hour,
Even like the mingling of sweet streams beneath 25
Dim woven leaves, and midst the floating breath
Of hidden forest flowers.

II

'Tis past! I wake
A captive, and alone, and far from thee,
My love and friend! Yet fostering, for thy sake,
A quenchless hope of happiness to be, 30
And feeling still my woman's spirit strong,
In the deep faith which lifts from earthly wrong
A heavenward glance. I know, I know our love
Shall yet call gentle angels from above
By its undying fervour; and prevail, 35
Sending a breath as of the spring's first gale
Through hearts now cold; and, raising its bright face,
With a free gush of sunny tears, erase
The characters of anguish. In this trust
I bear, I strive, I bow not to the dust, 40
That I may bring thee back no faded form,
No bosom chilled and blighted by the storm,
But all my youth's first treasures, when we meet,
Making past sorrow, by communion, sweet.

III

And thou too art in bonds! Yet droop thou not, 45
Oh, my beloved! There is one hopeless lot,
But one, and that not ours. Beside the dead
There sits the grief that mantles up its head,
Loathing the laughter and proud pomp of light,
When darkness, from the vainly-doting sight, 50

Covers its beautiful! ⁵ If thou wert gone
To the grave's bosom with thy radiant brow;
If thy deep-thrilling voice, with that low tone
Of earnest tenderness, which now, ev'n now,
Seems floating through my soul, were music taken 55
For ever from this world – oh thus forsaken
Could I bear on? Thou liv'st, thou liv'st, thou'rt mine!
With this glad thought I make my heart a shrine
And, by the lamp which quenchless there shall burn,
Sit, a lone watcher for the day's return. 60

IV

And lo! the joy that cometh with the morning,
Brightly victorious o'er the hours of care!
I have not watched in vain, serenely scorning
The wild and busy whispers of despair!
Thou hast sent tidings, as of heaven. I wait 65
The hour, the sign, for blessed flight to thee.
Oh for the skylark's wing that seeks its mate
As a star shoots! But on the breezy sea
We shall meet soon. To think of such an hour!
Will not my heart, o'erburdened by its bliss, 70
Faint and give way within me, as a flower
Borne down and perishing by noontide's kiss?
Yet shall I fear that lot, the perfect rest,
The full deep joy of dying on thy breast
After long-suffering won? So rich a close 75
Too seldom crowns with peace affection's woes.

V

Sunset! I tell each moment – from the skies
The last red splendour floats along my wall
Like a king's banner! Now it melts, it dies!

I see one star – I hear – ’twas not the call, 80
 Th’ expected voice; my quick heart throbb’d too soon.
 I must keep vigil till yon rising moon
 Shower down less
 Seemed holy things, as records of their vows.
 But change came o’er the scene. A hurrying tread
 s golden light. Beneath her beam,
 Through my lone lattice⁶ poured, I sit and dream
 Of summer lands afar, where holy love, 85
 Under the vine or in the citron-grove,
 May breathe from terror.
 Now the night grows deep
 And silent as its clouds, and full of sleep.
 I hear my veins beat. Hark, a bell’s slow chime!
 My heart strikes with it. Yet again – ’tis time! 90
 A step! A voice! Or but a rising breeze?
 Hark, haste – I come to meet thee on the seas!
 * * * * *

VI

Now never more, oh never, in the worth
 Of its pure cause, let sorrowing love on earth
 Trust fondly – never more! The hope is crushed 95
 That lit my life, the voice within me hushed
 That spoke sweet oracles, and I return
 To lay my youth, as in a burial-urn,
 Where sunshine may not find it. All is lost!
 No tempest met our barks, no billow tossed; 100
 Yet were they severed, ev’n as we must be
 That so have loved, so striven our hearts to free
 From their close-coiling fate! In vain, in vain –
 The dark links meet and clasp themselves again,
 And press out life. Upon the deck I stood, 105
 And a white sail came gliding o’er the flood

Like some proud bird of ocean; then mine eye
Strained out, one moment earlier to descry
The form it ached for, and the bark's career
Seemed slow to that fond yearning. It drew near, 110
Fraught with our foes! What boots it⁷ to recall
The strife, the tears? Once more a prison-wall
Shuts the green hills and woodlands from my sight,
And joyous glance of waters to the light,
And thee, my Seymour, thee!

I will not sink! 115

Thou, thou hast rent the heavy chain that bound thee,
And this shall be my strength – the joy to think
That thou mayst wander with heaven's breath around thee,
And all the laughing sky! This thought shall yet
Shine o'er my heart, a radiant amulet 120
Guarding it from despair. Thy bonds are broken,
And unto me, I know, thy true love's token
Shall one day be deliverance, though the years
Lie dim between, o'erhung with mists of tears.

VII

My friend, my friend, where art thou? Day by day, 125
Gliding, like some dark mournful stream, away
My silent youth flows from me. Spring the while Comes and rains beauty on the kindling boughs
Round hall and hamlet; summer, with her smile,
Fills the green forest; young hearts breathe their vows; 130
Brothers long parted meet; fair children rise
Round the glad board; Hope laughs from loving eyes –
All this is in the world! These joys lie sown,
The dew of every path; on one alone
Their freshness may not fall – the stricken deer,⁸ 135
Dying of thirst with all the waters near.

VIII

Ye are from dingle and fresh glade, ye flowers,
By some kind hand to cheer my dungeon sent!
O'er you the oak shed down the summer showers,
And the lark's nest was where your bright cups bent, 140
Quivering to breeze and raindrop like the sheen
Of twilight stars. On you heaven's eye⁹ hath been,
Through the leaves pouring its dark sultry blue
Into your glowing hearts; the bee to you
Hath murmured, and the rill. My soul grows faint 145
With passionate yearning, as its quick dreams paint
Your haunts by dell and stream – the green, the free,
The full of all sweet sound, the shut from me!

IX

There went a swift bird singing past my cell –
Oh love and freedom, ye are lovely things! 150
With you the peasant on the hills may dwell,
And by the streams, but I – the blood of kings,
A proud unmingling river, through my veins
Flows in lone brightness, and its gifts are chains!
Kings! I had silent visions of deep bliss, 155
Leaving their thrones far distant, and for this
I am cast under their triumphal car,¹⁰
An insect to be crushed. Oh, heaven is far –
Earth pitiless!

Dost thou forget me, Seymour? I am proved¹¹ 160
So long, so sternly! Seymour, my beloved!
There are such tales of holy marvels done
By strong affection, of deliverance won
Through its prevailing power! Are these things told
Till the young weep with rapture, and the old 165

Wonder, yet dare not doubt – and thou, oh thou,
Dost thou forget me in my hope's decay?
Thou canst not! Through the silent night, ev'n now,
I that need prayer so much, awake and pray
Still first for thee. Oh gentle, gentle friend! 170
How shall I bear this anguish to the end?
Aid! Comes there yet no aid? The voice of blood
Passes heaven's gate, ev'n ere the crimson flood
Sinks through the greensward! Is there not a cry 175
From the wrung heart, of power, through agony,
To pierce the clouds? Hear, Mercy, hear me! None
That bleed and weep beneath the smiling sun
Have heavier cause – yet hear! My soul grows dark –
Who hears the last shriek from the sinking bark¹²
On the mid seas, and with the storm alone, 180
And bearing to th' abyss, unseen, unknown,
Its freight of human hearts? Th' o'ermastering wave!
Who shall tell how it rushed – and none to save?

Thou hast forsaken me!¹³ I feel, I know,
There would be rescue if this were not so. 185
Thou'rt at the chase, thou'rt at the festive board,
Thou'rt where the red wine free and high is poured,
Thou'rt where the dancers meet! A magic glass
Is set within my soul, and proud shapes pass,
Flushing it o'er with pomp from bower and hall; 190
I see one shadow, stateliest there of all –

Thine! What dost thou amidst the bright and fair,
Whispering light words, and mocking my despair?
It is not well of thee! My love was more
Than fiery song may breathe, deep thought explore; 195
And there thou smilest while my heart is dying,
With all its blighted hopes around it lying;
Ev'n thou, on whom they hung their last green leaf –
Yet smile, smile on – too bright art thou for grief!

Death! What, is death a locked and treasured thing 200
Guarded by swords of fire?¹⁴ A hidden spring,
A fabled fruit, that I should thus endure
As if the world within me held no cure?
Wherefore not spread free wings – Heaven, Heaven control
These thoughts – they rush – I look into my soul 205
As down a gulf, and tremble at th' array
Of fierce forms crowding it! Give strength to pray,
So shall their dark host pass.

 The storm is stilled.
Father in heaven, thou, only thou canst sound 210
The heart's great deep, with floods of anguish filled,
 For human line too fearfully profound.
Therefore forgive, my Father, if thy child,
Rocked on its heaving darkness, hath grown wild
And sinned in her despair! It well may be 215
That thou wouldst lead my spirit back to thee,
By the crushed hope too long on this world poured,
The stricken love which hath perchance adored
A mortal in thy place! Now let me strive
With thy strong arm no more! Forgive, forgive – 220
Take me to peace!

 And peace at last is nigh.
A sign is on my brow, a token sent
Th' o'erwearied dust from home: no breeze flits by,
But calls me with a strange sweet whisper blent
Of many mysteries.

 Hark! The warning tone 225
Deepens – its word is Death. Alone, alone,
And sad in youth, but chastened, I depart,
Bowing to Heaven. Yet, yet my woman's heart
Shall wake a spirit and a power to bless,
Ev'n in this hour's o'ershadowing fearfulness – 230
Thee, its first love! Oh tender still, and true!

Be it forgotten if mine anguish threw
Drops from its bitter fountain on thy name,
Though but a moment.

Now, with fainting frame,
With soul just lingering on the flight begun, 235
To bind for thee its last dim thoughts in one,
I bless thee! Peace be on thy noble head,
Years of bright fame, when I am with the dead!
I bid this prayer survive me, and retain
Its might, again to bless thee, and again! 240
Thou hast been gathered into my dark fate
Too much; too long, for my sake, desolate
Hath been thine exiled youth; but now take back,
From dying hands, thy freedom, and retrack
(After a few kind tears for her whose days 245
Went out in dreams of thee) the sunny ways
Of hope, and find thou happiness! Yet send,
Ev'n then in silent hours, a thought, dear friend,
Down to my voiceless chamber; for thy love
Hath been to me all gifts of earth above, 250
Though bought with burning tears! It is the sting
Of death to leave that vainly-precious thing
In this cold world! What were it then, if thou,
With thy fond eyes, were gazing on me now?
Too keen a pang! Farewell, and yet once more, 255
Farewell! The passion of long years I pour
Into that word: thou hear'st not, but the woe
And fervour of its tones may one day flow
To thy heart's holy place; there let them dwell –
We shall o'ersweep the grave to meet – farewell! 260

The Bride of the Greek Isle¹

Fear! I'm a Greek, and how should I fear death?
A slave, and wherefore should I dread my freedom?
...I will not live degraded.² (Sardanapalus)

Come from the woods with the citron-flowers,
Come with your lyres for the festal hours,
Maids of bright Scio!³ They came, and the breeze
Bore their sweet songs o'er the Grecian seas;
They came, and Eudora stood robed and crowned, 5
The bride of the morn, with her train around.
Jewels flashed out from her braided hair
Like starry dews midst the roses there;
Pearls on her bosom quivering shone,
Heaved by her heart through its golden zone; 10
But a brow, as those gems of the ocean pale,
Gleamed from beneath her transparent veil;
Changeful and faint was her fair cheek's hue,
Though clear as a flower which the light looks through;
And the glance of her dark resplendent eye, 15
For the aspect of woman at times too high,
Lay floating in mists, which the troubled stream
Of the soul sent up o'er its fervid beam.

She looked on the vine at her father's door
Like one that is leaving his native shore; 20
She hung o'er the myrtle once called her own,
As it greenly waved by the threshold stone;
She turned – and her mother's gaze brought back
Each hue of her childhood's faded track.
Oh hush the song, and let her tears 25
Flow to the dream of her early years!
Holy and pure are the drops that fall
When the young bride goes from her father's hall;
She goes unto love yet untried and new,
She parts from love which hath still been true; 30
Mute be the song and the choral strain

Till her heart's deep wellspring is clear again!
She wept on her mother's faithful breast
Like a babe that sobs itself to rest;
She wept – yet laid her hand awhile 35
In his that waited her dawning smile,
Her soul's affianced, nor cherished less
For the gush of nature's tenderness!
She lifted her graceful head at last –
The choking swell of her heart was past; 40
And her lovely thoughts from their cells found way
 In the sudden flow of a plaintive lay.⁴

THE BRIDE'S FAREWELL

Why do I weep? To leave the vine
 Whose clusters o'er me bend,
The myrtle (yet, oh call it mine!), 45
 The flowers I loved to tend;
A thousand thoughts of all things dear
 Like shadows o'er me sweep,
I leave my sunny childhood here –
 Oh therefore let me weep! 50

I leave thee, sister, we have played
 Through many a joyous hour,
Where the silvery green of the olive shade
 Hung dim o'er fount and bower.
Yes, thou and I, by stream, by shore, 55
 In song, in prayer, in sleep,
Have been as we may be no more –
 Kind sister, let me weep!

I leave thee, father! Eve's bright moon
 Must now light other feet, 60
With the gathered grapes and the lyre in tune,
 Thy homeward step to greet.
Thou in whose voice, to bless thy child,
 Lay tones of love so deep,

Whose eye o'er all my youth hath smiled – 65
I leave thee! Let me weep!

Mother, I leave thee! On thy breast,
Pouring out joy and woe,
I have found that holy place of rest
Still changeless – yet I go! 70
Lips that have lulled me with your strain,
Eyes that have watched my sleep!
Will earth give love like yours again?
Sweet mother, let me weep!

And like a slight young tree that throws 75
The weight of rain from its drooping boughs,
Once more she wept. But a changeful thing
Is the human heart, as a mountain spring
That works its way through the torrent's foam,
To the bright pool near it, the lily's home! 80
It is well! The cloud on her soul that lay
Hath melted in glittering drops away.
Wake again, mingle, sweet flute and lyre!
She turns to her lover, she leaves her sire.
Mother, on earth it must still be so, 85
Thou rearest the lovely to see them go!
They are moving onward, the bridal throng,
Ye may track their way by the swells of song;
Ye may catch through the foliage their white robes' gleam
Like a swan midst the reeds of a shadowy stream. 90
Their arms bear up garlands, their gliding tread
Is over the deep-veined violet's bed;
They have light leaves around them, blue skies above,
An arch for the triumph of youth and love!

II

Still and sweet was the home that stood 95
In the flowering depths of a Grecian wood,

With the soft green light o'er its low roof spread,
 As if from the flow of an emerald shed,
 Pouring through lime-leaves that mingled on high,
 Asleep in the silence of noon's clear sky. 100
 Citrons amidst their dark foliage glowed,
 Making a gleam round the lone abode;
 Laurels o'erhung it, whose faintest shiver
 Scattered out rays like a glancing river;
 Stars of the jasmine its pillars crowned, 105
 Vine-stalks its lattice and walls had bound,
 And brightly before it a fountain's play
 Flung showers through a thicket of glossy bay
 To a cypress⁵ which rose in that flashing rain,
 Like one tall shaft of some fallen fane. 110
 And thither Ianthis had brought his bride,
 And the guests were met by that fountain-side;
 They lifted the veil from Eudora's face,
 It smiled out softly in pensive grace
 With lips of love and a brow serene, 115
 Meet for the soul of the deep wood-scene.
 Bring wine, bring odours, the board is spread!
 Bring roses, a chaplet for every head!
 The wine-cups foamed, and the rose was showered
 On the young and fair from the world embowered; 120
 The sun looked not on them in that sweet shade,
 The winds amid scented boughs were laid;
 But there came by fits, through some wavy tree,
 A sound and a gleam of the moaning sea.
 Hush, be still! Was that no more 125
 Than the murmur from the shore?
 Silence! Did thick raindrops beat
 On the grass like trampling feet?
 Fling down the goblet and draw the sword –
 The groves are filled with a pirate-horde! 130

Through the dim olives their sabres shine;
Now must the red blood stream for wine!

The youths from the banquet to battle sprang,
The woods with the shriek of the maidens rang;
Under the golden-fruited boughs 135
There were flashing poniards and dark'ning brows,
Footsteps o'er garland and lyre that fled,
And the dying soon on a greensward bed.

Eudora, Eudora! Thou dost not fly!
She saw but Ianthis before her lie, 140
With the blood from his breast in a gushing flow,
Like a child's large tears in its hour of woe,
And a gathering film in his lifted eye,
That sought his young bride out mournfully.
She knelt down beside him, her arms she wound 145
Like tendrils his drooping neck around,
As if the passion of that fond grasp
Might chain in life with its ivy-clasp.
But they tore her thence in her wild despair,
The sea's fierce rovers, they left him there; 150
They left to the fountain a dark-red vein,
And on the wet violets a pile of slain,
And a hush of fear through the summer-grove –
So closed the triumph of youth and love!

III

Gloomy lay the shore that night 155
When the moon, with sleeping light,
Bathed each purple Sciote hill –
Gloomy lay the shore, and still.
O'er the wave no gay guitar
Sent its floating music far; 160
No glad sound of dancing feet
Woke, the starry hours to greet.

But a voice of mortal woe
In its changes wild or low
Through the midnight's blue repose, 165
From the sea-beat rocks arose,
As Eudora's mother stood
Gazing o'er th' Aegean flood
With a fixed and straining eye –
Oh, was the spoilers' vessel nigh? 170
Yes, there becalmed in silent sleep,
Dark and alone on a breathless deep,
On a sea of molten silver, dark,
Brooding – it frowned, that evil bark!
There its broad pennon a shadow cast, 180
Moveless and black from the tall still mast,
And the heavy sound of its flapping sail
Idly and vainly wooed the gale.
Hushed was all else; had ocean's breast
Rocked e'en Eudora that hour to rest? 185

To rest? The waves tremble! What piercing cry
Bursts from the heart of the ship on high?
What light through the heavens, in a sudden spire,
Shoots from the deck up? Fire, 'tis fire!
There are wild forms hurrying to and fro, 190
Seen darkly clear on that lurid glow;
There are shout, and signal-gun, and call,
And the dashing of water, but fruitless all!
Man may not fetter, nor ocean tame
The might and wrath of the rushing flame! 195
It hath twined the mast like a glittering snake
That coils up a tree from a dusky brake;
It hath touched the sails, and their canvas rolls
Away from its breath into shrivelled scrolls;
It hath taken the flag's high place in air, 200
And reddened the stars with its wavy glare,
And sent out bright arrows, and soared in glee

To a burning mount midst the moonlight sea.
 The swimmers are plunging from stern and prow –
 Eudora, Eudora – where, where art thou? 205
 The slave and his master alike are gone;
 Mother, who stands on the deck alone?
 The child of thy bosom! And lo, a brand
 Blazing up high in her lifted hand!
 And her veil flung back, and her free dark hair 210
 Swayed by the flames as they rock and flare;
 And her fragile form to its loftiest height
 Dilated, as if by the spirit's might,
 And her eye with an eagle-gladness fraught –
 Oh, could this work be of woman wrought? 215
 Yes, 'twas her deed! By that haughty smile
 It was hers – she hath kindled her funeral pile!⁶
 Never might shame on that bright head be –
 Her blood was the Greek's, and hath made her free.
 Proudly she stands, like an Indian bride 220
 On the pyre with the holy dead beside;
 But a shriek from her mother hath caught her ear,
 As the flames to her marriage-robe draw near,
 And starting, she spreads her pale arms in vain
 To the form they must never enfold again. 225
 One moment more, and her hands are clasped,
 Fallen is the torch they had wildly grasped,
 Her sinking knee unto Heaven is bowed,
 And her last look raised through the smoke's dim shroud,
 And her lips as in prayer for her pardon move – 230
 Now the night gathers o'er youth and love!⁷

The Switzer’s Wife

Werner Stauffacher, one of the three confederates of the field of Grutli, had been alarmed by the envy with which the Austrian bailiff,¹ Landenberg, had noticed the appearance of wealth and comfort which distinguished his dwelling. It was not, however, until roused by the entreaties of his wife, a woman who seems to have been of an heroic spirit, that he was induced to deliberate with his friends upon the measures by which Switzerland was finally delivered.

*Nor look nor tone revealeth aught
Save woman’s quietness of thought;
And yet around her is a light
Of inward majesty and might.*

(M.J.J.)²

Wer solch ein Herz an seinen Busen drückt, Der kann fur Herd und Hof mit Freuden fechten.

*(Wilhelm Tell)*³

It was the time when children bound to meet
Their father's homeward step from field or hill,
And when the herd's returning bells are sweet
In the Swiss valleys, and the lakes grow still,
And the last note of that wild horn swells by 5
Which haunts the exile's heart with melody.

And lovely smiled full many an Alpine home,
Touched with the crimson of the dying hour,
Which lit its low roof by the torrent's foam,
And pierced its lattice through the vine-hung bower; 10
But one, the loveliest o'er the land that rose,
Then first looked mournful in its green repose.

For Werner sat beneath the linden tree
That sent its lulling whispers through his door,
Ev'n as man sits, whose heart alone would be 15
With some deep care, and thus can find no more
Th' accustomed joy in all which evening brings,
Gathering a household with her quiet wings.

His wife stood hushed before him – sad, yet mild
In her beseeching mien; he marked it not. 20
The silvery laughter of his bright-haired child
Rang from the greensward round the sheltered spot,
But seemed unheard; until at last the boy
Raised from his heaped-up flowers a glance of joy,

And met his father's face: but then a change 25
Passed swiftly o'er the brow of infant glee,
And a quick sense of something dimly strange
Brought him from play to stand beside the knee
So often climbed, and lift his loving eyes
That shone through clouds of sorrowful surprise. 30

Then the proud bosom of the strong man shook;
But tenderly his babe's fair mother laid
Her hand on his, and with a pleading look,
Through tears half-quivering, o'er him bent, and said,
'What grief, dear friend, hath made thy heart its prey, 35
That thou shouldst turn thee from our love away?

It is too sad to see thee thus, my friend!
Mark'st thou the wonder on thy boy's fair brow,
Missing the smile from thine? Oh cheer thee! Bend
To his soft arms, unseal thy thoughts e'en now! 40
Thou dost not kindly to withhold the share
Of tried affection in thy secret care.'

He looked up into that sweet earnest face,
But sternly, mournfully; not yet the band
Was loosened from his soul, its inmost place 45
Not yet unveiled by love's o'er-mastering hand.
'Speak low!' he cried, and pointed where on high
The white Alps glittered through the solemn sky.

'We must speak low amidst our ancient hills
And their free torrents, for the days are come 50
When tyranny lies couched by forest rills
And meets the shepherd in his mountain-home.
Go pour the wine of our own grapes in fear,
Keep silence by the hearth – its foes are near.

The envy of th' oppressor's eye hath been 55
Upon my heritage.⁴ I sit tonight
Under my household tree, if not serene,
Yet with the faces best beloved in sight;
Tomorrow eve may find me chained, and thee –
How can I bear the boy's young smiles to see?' 60

The bright blood left that youthful mother's cheek;
Back on the linden-stem she leaned her form,
And her lip trembled, as it strove to speak,

Like a frail harp-string, shaken by the storm.
'Twas but a moment, and the faintness passed, 65
And the free Alpine spirit woke at last.

And she, that ever through her home had moved
With the meek thoughtfulness and quiet smile
Of woman, calmly loving and beloved,
And timid in her happiness the while, 70
Stood brightly forth, and steadfastly, that hour,
Her clear glance kindling into sudden power.

Aye, pale she stood, but with an eye of light,
And took her fair child to her holy breast,
And lifted her soft voice, that gathered might 75
As it found language. 'Are we thus oppressed?
Then must we rise upon our mountain-sod,
And man must arm, and woman call on God!

I know what thou wouldst do – and be it done!
Thy soul is darkened with its fears for me. 80
Trust me to Heaven, my husband! This, thy son,
The babe whom I have borne thee, must be free!
And the sweet memory of our pleasant hearth
May well give strength – if aught be strong on earth.

Thou hast been brooding o'er the silent dread 85
Of my desponding tears; now lift once more,
My hunter of the hills, thy stately head,
And let thine eagle-glance my joy restore!
I can bear all, but seeing thee subdued –
Take to thee back thine own undaunted mood. 90

Go forth beside the waters, and along
The chamois-paths, and through the forests go;
And tell, in burning words, thy tale of wrong
To the brave hearts that midst the hamlets glow.
God shall be with thee, my beloved, away! 95
Bless but thy child, and leave me – I can pray!'

He sprang up like a warrior-youth awaking
To clarion-sounds upon the ringing air;
He caught her to his breast, while proud tears breaking
From his dark eyes, fell o'er her braided hair, 100
And 'Worthy art thou' was his joyous cry,
'That man for thee should gird himself to die.

My bride, my wife, the mother of my child!
Now shall thy name be armour to my heart;
And this our land, by chains no more defiled, 105
Be taught of thee to choose the better part!
I go – thy spirit on my words shall dwell,
Thy gentle voice shall stir the Alps – farewell!

And thus they parted, by the quiet lake,
In the clear starlight: he, the strength to rouse 110
Of the free hills; she, thoughtful for his sake,
To rock her child beneath the whispering boughs,
Singing its blue, half-curtained eyes to sleep,
With a low hymn amidst the stillness deep.

The Switzer's Wife

Jewsbury (1800–33) was a friend and correspondent of Hemans, and they saw a good deal of each other when Jewsbury visited Wales in the summer of 1828. Many of the poems which she wrote that summer appeared in her Lays of the Leisure Hours (1829), dedicated to Hemans 'in remembrance of the summer passed in her society'.

Properzia Rossi

Properzia Rossi, a celebrated female sculptor of Bologna,¹ possessed also of talents for poetry and music, died in consequence of an unrequited attachment. A painting by Ducis² represents her showing her last work, a basso-relievo of Ariadne,³ to a Roman knight, the object of her affection, who regards it with indifference.

*Tell me no more, no more
Of my soul's lofty gifts! Are they not vain
To quench its haunting thirst for happiness?
Have I not loved, and striven, and failed to bind
One true heart unto me, whereon my own
Might find a resting-place, a home for all
Its burden of affections? I depart
Unknown, though Fame goes with me; I must leave
The earth unknown. Yet it may be that death
Shall give my name a power to win such tears
As would have made life precious.*⁴

I

One dream of passion and of beauty more,
And in its bright fulfilment let me pour
My soul away! Let earth retain a trace
Of that which lit my being, though its race
Might have been loftier far – yet one more dream! 5
From my deep spirit one victorious gleam
Ere I depart – for thee alone, for thee!
May this last work, this farewell triumph be –
Thou, loved so vainly! I would leave enshrined
Something immortal of my heart and mind 10

That yet may speak to thee when I am gone,
Shaking thine inmost bosom with a tone
Of lost affection – something that may prove
What she hath been whose melancholy love
On thee was lavished; silent pang and tear, 15
And fervent song that gushed when none were near,
And dream by night, and weary thought by day,
Stealing the brightness from her life away,
While thou – awake, not yet within me die
Under the burden and the agony 20
Of this vain tenderness; my spirit, wake!
Ev'n for thy sorrowful affection's sake,
Live! In thy work breathe out, that he may yet,
Feeling sad mastery there, perchance regret
Thine unrequited gift.

II

 It comes – the power 25
Within me born, flows back; my fruitless dower
That could not win me love. Yet once again
I greet it proudly, with its rushing train
Of glorious images: they throng, they press;
A sudden joy lights up my loneliness – 30
I shall not perish all!
 The bright work grows
Beneath my hand, unfolding, as a rose,
Leaf after leaf, to beauty; line by line
I fix my thought, heart, soul, to burn, to shine
Through the pale marble's veins. It grows – and now 35
I give my own life's history to thy brow,
Forsaken Ariadne! Thou shalt wear
My form, my lineaments – but oh, more fair,
Touched into lovelier being by the glow
 Which in me dwells, as by the summer light 40
All things are glorified! From thee my woe

Shall yet look beautiful to meet his sight
 When I am passed away. Thou art the mould
 Wherein I pour the fervent thoughts, th' untold,
 The self-consuming! Speak to him of me, 45
 Thou, the deserted by the lonely sea,
 With the soft sadness of thine earnest eye;
 Speak to him, lorn one, deeply, mournfully,
 Of all my love and grief! Oh could I throw
 Into thy frame a voice, a sweet and low 50
 And thrilling voice of song – when he came nigh,
 To send the passion of its melody
 Through his pierced bosom – on its tones to bear
 My life's deep feeling, as the southern air
 Wafts the faint myrtle's breath – to rise, to swell, 55
 To sink away in accents of farewell,
 Winning but one, one gush of tears, whose flow
 Surely my parted spirit yet might know,
 If love be strong as death!

III

Now fair thou art,
 Thou form whose life is of my burning heart! 60
 Yet all the vision that within me wrought,
 I cannot make thee! Oh, I might have given
 Birth to creations of far nobler thought;
 I might have kindled, with the fire of heaven,
 Things not of such as die! But I have been 65
 Too much alone; a heart whereon to lean,
 With all these deep affections that o'erflow
 My aching soul, and find no shore below,
 An eye to be my star, a voice to bring
 Hope o'er my path, like sounds that breathe of spring, 70
 These are denied me – dreamt of still in vain,
 Therefore my brief aspirings from the chain
 Are ever but as some wild fitful song,

Rising triumphantly to die ere long
In dirge-like echoes.

IV

Yet the world will see 75
Little of this, my parting work, in thee;
 Thou shalt have fame – oh mockery! Give the reed
From storms a shelter, give the drooping vine
Something round which its tendrils may entwine;
 Give the parched flower a raindrop, and the meed 80
Of love's kind words to woman! Worthless fame,
That in his bosom wins not for my name
Th' abiding place it asked! Yet how my heart,
In its own fairy world of song and art,
Once beat for praise! Are those high longings o'er? 85
That which I have been can I be no more?
Never, oh never more – though still thy sky
Be blue as then, my glorious Italy!
And though the music, whose rich breathings fill
Thine air with soul, be wandering past me still, 90
And though the mantle of thy sunlight streams
Unchanged on forms instinct with poet-dreams –
Never, oh never more! Where'er I move,
The shadow of this broken-hearted love
Is on me and around! Too well they know, 95
 Whose life is all within, too soon and well,
When there the blight hath settled – but I go
 Under the silent wings of peace to dwell;
From the slow wasting, from the lonely pain,
The inward burning of those words 'in vain' 100
 Seared on the heart – I go. 'Twill soon be past.
Sunshine, and song, and bright Italian heaven,
 And thou, oh thou on whom my spirit cast
Unvalued wealth, who know'st not what was given
In that devotedness – the sad and deep 105

And unrepaid, farewell! If I could weep
 Once, only once, beloved one, on thy breast,
 Pouring my heart forth ere I sink to rest!
 But that were happiness, and unto me
 Earth's gift is fame. Yet I was formed to be 110
 So richly blessed! With thee to watch the sky,
 Speaking not, feeling but that thou wert nigh;
 With thee to listen, while the tones of song
 Swept ev'n as part of our sweet air along,
 To listen silently – with thee to gaze 115
 On forms, the deified of olden days –
 This had been joy enough, and hour by hour,
 From its glad wellsprings drinking life and power,
 How had my spirit soared, and made its fame
 A glory for thy brow. Dreams, dreams! The fire 120
 Burns faint within me. Yet I leave my name –
 As a deep thrill may linger on the lyre
 When its full chords are hushed – awhile to live,
 And one day haply in thy heart revive
 Sad thoughts of me; I leave it with a sound, 125
 A spell o'er memory, mournfully profound,
 I leave it on my country's air to dwell –
 Say proudly yet, 'Twas hers who loved me well!'

Properzia Rossi

¹ Properzia de' Rossi (?1490–1530) of Bologna, was an accomplished musician and sculptor who specialized in bas-relief sculptures, usually in stone or wood. She is believed to have loved, unrequitedly, Anton Galeazzo di Napoleone Malvasia who, in response to a lawsuit, was compelled to say that she was not his mistress. Persecuted by Amico Aspertini, another artist, her stock fell, and she died in poverty.

² Louis Ducis (1775–1847), painter of historical subjects and portraits.

³ An appropriate subject: Ariadne helped Theseus to escape the Minotaur's labyrinth. Afterwards she married him and had his child, but he abandoned her at Naxos and later married her sister, Phaedra.

⁴ This epigraph, like many of those in Hemans's later poems, was composed for its appearance here by Hemans herself.

Gertrude, or Fidelity till Death

The Baron Von Der Wart,¹ accused, though it is believed unjustly, as an accomplice in the assassination of the Emperor Albert, was bound alive on the wheel, and attended by his wife Gertrude throughout his last agonizing hours, with the most heroic devotedness. Her own sufferings, with those of her unfortunate husband, are most affectingly described in a letter which she afterwards addressed to a female friend, and which was published some years ago, at Haarlem, in a book entitled Gertrude Von Der Wart, or Fidelity unto Death.²

*Dark lours our fate,
And terrible the storm that gathers o'er us;
But nothing, till that latest agony
Which severs thee from nature, shall unloose
This fixed and sacred hold. In thy dark prison-house,
In the terrific face of armed law –
Yea, on the scaffold, if it needs must be,
I never will forsake thee.*

(Joanna Baillie)³

Her hands were clasped, her dark eyes raised,
The breeze threw back her hair;
Up to the fearful wheel she gazed –
All that she loved was there.
The night was round her clear and cold, 5
The holy heaven above,

Its pale stars watching to behold
The might of earthly love.

‘And bid me not depart’, she cried,
‘My Rudolph, say not so! 10
This is no time to quit thy side –
Peace, peace, I cannot go!
Hath the world aught for me to fear
When death is on thy brow?
The world – what means it? Mine is here – 15
I will not leave thee now.

I have been with thee in thine hour
Of glory and of bliss;
Doubt not its memory’s living power
To strengthen me through this! 20
And thou, mine honoured love and true,
Bear on, bear nobly on!
We have the blessed heaven in view,
Whose rest shall soon be won.’

And were not these high words to flow 25
From woman’s breaking heart?
Through all that night of bitterest woe
She bore her lofty part;
But oh, with such a glazing eye,
With such a curdling cheek – 30
Love, love, of mortal agony,
Thou, only thou shouldst speak!

The wind rose high, but with it rose
Her voice, that he might hear.
Perchance that dark hour brought repose 35
To happy bosoms near,
While she sat striving with despair
Beside his tortured form,
And pouring her deep soul in prayer
Forth on the rushing storm. 40

She wiped the death-damps from his brow
With her pale hands and soft,
Whose touch upon the lute-chords low
Had stilled his heart so oft.
She spread her mantle o'er his breast, 45
She bathed his lips with dew,
And on his cheek such kisses pressed
As hope and joy ne'er knew.

Oh lovely are ye, love and faith
Enduring to the last! 50
She had her meed – one smile in death –
And his worn spirit passed,
While ev'n as o'er a martyr's grave
She knelt on that sad spot,
And weeping blessed the God who gave 55
Strength to forsake it not!

Imelda

Sometimes

The young forgot the lessons they had learnt

*And loved when they should hate – like thee, Imelda!*¹

(Italy, a Poem)²

*Passa la bella Donna, e par che dorma.*³

(Tasso)

We have the myrtle's breath around us here,
Amidst the fallen pillars; this hath been
Some naiad's fane of old. How brightly clear,
Flinging a vein of silver o'er the scene,
Up through the shadowy grass, the fountain wells, 5
And music with it, gushing from beneath
The ivied altar – that sweet murmur tells
The rich wildflowers no tale of woe or death;
Yet once the wave was darkened, and a stain
Lay deep, and heavy drops (but not of rain) 10
On the dim violets by its marble bed,
And the pale shining water-lily's head.

Sad is that legend's truth. A fair girl met
One whom she loved by this lone temple's spring,
Just as the sun behind the pine-grove set, 15
And eve's low voice in whispers woke to bring
All wanderers home. They stood, that gentle pair,
With the blue heaven of Italy above,
And citron-odours dying on the air,
And light leaves trembling round, and early love 20
Deep in each breast. What recked their souls of strife
Between their fathers? Unto them young life
Spread out the treasures of its vernal years,
And if they wept, they wept far other tears
Than the cold world wrings forth. They stood that hour 25
Speaking of hope, wile tree, and fount, and flower,
And star, just gleaming through the cypress boughs,⁴
Broke on the whispery shades. Imelda knew 30
The footstep of her brother's wrath, and fled
Up where the cedars make yon avenue
Dim with green twilight; pausing there, she caught –

Was it the clash of swords? A swift dark thought
Struck down her lip's rich crimson as it passed, 35
And from her eye the sunny sparkle took
One moment with its fearfulness, and shook
Her slight frame fiercely, as a stormy blast
Might rock the rose. Once more, and yet once more,⁵
She stilled her heart to listen – all was o'er; 40
Sweet summer winds alone were heard to sigh,
Bearing the nightingale's deep spirit⁶ by.

That night Imelda's voice was in the song,
Lovely it floated through the festive throng,
Peopling her father's halls. That fatal night 45
Her eye looked starry in its dazzling light,
And her cheek glowed with beauty's flushing dyes,
Like a rich cloud of eve in southern skies –
A burning ruby cloud. There were⁷ whose gaze
Followed her form beneath the clear lamp's blaze, 50
And marvelled at its radiance. But a few
Beheld the brightness of that feverish hue
With something of dim fear, and in that glance
Found strange and sudden tokens of unrest,
Startling to meet amidst the mazy dance 55
Where thought, if present, an unbidden guest,
Comes not unmasked. Howe'er this were, the time
Sped as it speeds with joy, and grief, and crime
Alike, and when the banquet's hall was left
Unto its garlands of their bloom bereft, 60
When trembling stars looked silvery in their wane,
And heavy flowers yet slumbered, once again
There stole a footstep, fleet and light and lone,
Through the dim cedar shade – the step of one
That started at a leaf, of one that fled, 65
Of one that panted with some secret dread:
What did Imelda there? She sought the scene

Where love so late with youth and hope had been;
Bodings were on her soul – a shuddering thrill
Ran through each vein, when first the naiad's rill 70
Met her with melody – sweet sounds and low;
We hear them yet – they live along its flow –
Her voice is music lost! The fountain-side
She gained – the wave flashed forth – 'twas darkly dyed
Ev'n as from warrior-hearts, and on its edge, 75
 Amidst the fern, and flowers, and moss-tufts deep,
There lay, as lulled by stream and rustling sedge,
 A youth, a graceful youth. 'Oh, dost thou sleep,
Azzo?' she cried, 'My Azzo, is this rest?'
But then her low tones faltered. 'On thy breast 80
Is the stain – yes, 'tis blood! And that cold cheek,
That moveless lip! Thou dost not slumber? Speak,
Speak, Azzo, my beloved! No sound – no breath –
What hath come thus between our spirits? Death!
Death? I but dream – I dream!' And there she stood, 85
A faint, frail trembler, gazing first on blood,
With her fair arm around yon cypress⁸ thrown,
Her form sustained by that dark stem alone,
And fading fast, like spell-struck maid of old,
Into white waves dissolving, clear and cold, 90
When from the grass her dimmed eye caught a gleam –
'Twas where a sword lay shivered⁹ by the stream,
Her brother's sword! She knew it, and she knew
'Twas with a venomed point that weapon slew!
Woe for young love! But love is strong. There came 95
Strength upon woman's fragile heart and frame,
There came swift courage! On the dewy ground
She knelt, with all her dark hair floating round,
Like a long silken stole; she knelt and pressed
Her lips of glowing life to Azzo's breast, 100
Drawing the poison forth – a strange, sad sight!
Pale death, and fearless love, and solemn night:

So the moon saw them last.

The morn came singing

Through the green forests of the Appenines,
With all her joyous birds their free flight winging, 105
And steps and voices out amongst the vines.
What found that dayspring here? Two fair forms laid
Like sculptured sleepers, from the myrtle shade
Casting a gleam of beauty o'er the wave –
Still, mournful, sweet. Were such things for the grave? 110
Could it be so indeed? That radiant girl,
Decked as for bridal hours – long braids of pearl
Amidst her shadowy locks were faintly shining,
 As tears might shine, with melancholy light;
And there was gold her slender waist entwining, 115
 And her pale graceful arms – how sadly bright!
And fiery gems upon her breast were lying,
And round her marble brow red roses dying.
But she died first! The violet's hue had spread
 O'er her sweet eyelids with repose oppressed, 120
She had bowed heavily her gentle head,
 And, on the youth's hushed bosom, sunk to rest.
So slept they well – the poison's work was done;
Love with true heart had striven, but Death had won.

Imelda

¹ ‘The tale of Imelda is related in Sismondi’s Histoire des Républiques Italiennes, Vol. 3, p. 443’ (Hemans’s note). She refers to Jean Charles Léonard Simonde de Sismondi (1773–1842), Histoire des républiques italiennes du moyen âge (16 vols, Paris, 1809–26). The story is essentially that of Romeo and Juliet. Imelda’s family, the Lambertazzis, are Ghibellines, the imperial and aristocratic party; Boniface is from the Giérémei family, associated with the Guelphs, the Papal faction. Boniface’s murder led to forty days’ battle, and reconciliation did not come for another six years.

² Samuel Rogers (1763–1855), poet and banker, published Italy as a series of discrete poems in two parts in 1822 and 1828, before publishing the entire thing in 1830. It was one of the biggest bestsellers of its time. These lines are from The Campagna of Florence 228–30.

³ ‘The beautiful lady dies, and appears to sleep.’ From Tasso, Gerusalemme Liberata xii 69. The reference is to Clorinda, accidentally killed in battle by her lover, Tancred, who bends over her as she dies, attempting to forgive him.

⁴ the cypress boughs emblematic of grief.

⁵ Once more, and yet once more An allusion to the opening of Milton’s Lycidas: ‘Yet once more, oh ye laurels, and once more ...’

⁶ the nightingale’s deep spirit The nightingale’s sad song was said to be caused by a thorn in its breast.

⁷ There were i.e. there were [those] ...

⁸ cypress a symbol of grief.

⁹ shivered splintered.

Edith, a Tale of the Woods¹

*Du Heilige! rufe dein Kind zurück!
Ich habe genossen das irdische Glück,
Ich habe gelebt und geliebet.*

(Wallenstein)²

The woods – oh, solemn are the boundless woods
Of the great western world when day declines,
And louder sounds the roll of distant floods,
More deep³ the rustling of the ancient pines;

When dimness gathers on the stilly air, 5
And mystery seems o'er every leaf to brood,
Awful it is for human heart to bear
The might and burden of the solitude!
Yet in that hour, midst those green wastes, there sate
One young and fair – and oh, how desolate 10
But undismayed; while sank the crimson light,
And the high cedars darkened with the night,
Alone she sate; though many lay around,
They, pale and silent on the bloody ground,
Were severed from her need and from her woe, 15
Far as death severs life. O'er that wild spot
Combat had raged and brought the valiant low,
And left them with the history of their lot
Unto the forest oaks. A fearful scene
For her whose home of other days had been 20
Midst the fair halls of England! But the love
Which filled her soul was strong to cast out fear,
And by its might upborne all else above,
She shrank not – marked not that the dead were near.
Of him alone she thought, whose languid head 25
Faintly upon her wedded bosom fell;
Memory of aught but him on earth was fled,
While heavily she felt his life-blood well
Fast o'er her garments forth, and vainly bound
With her torn robe and hair the streaming wound, 30
Yet hoped, still hoped! Oh from such hope how long
Affection woos the whispers that deceive,
Ev'n when the pressure of dismay grows strong,
And we that weep, watch, tremble, ne'er believe
The blow indeed can fall! So bowed she there 35
Over the dying, while unconscious prayer
Filled all her soul. Now poured the moonlight down,
Veining the pine-stems through the foliage brown,
And fireflies, kindling up the leafy place,
Cast fitful radiance o'er the warrior's face 40

Whereby she caught its changes: to her eye
The eye that faded looked through gathering haze
Whence love, o'ermastering mortal agony,
Lifted a long, deep, melancholy gaze
When voice was not: that fond sad meaning passed – 45
She knew the fullness of her woe at last!
One shriek the forests heard, and mute she lay,
And cold, yet clasping still the precious clay
To her scarce-heaving breast. Oh love and death,
Ye have sad meetings on this changeful earth, 50
Many and sad! But airs of heavenly breath
Shall melt the links which bind you, for your birth
Is far apart.

Now light of richer hue
Than the moon sheds came flushing mist and dew;
The pines grew red with morning; fresh winds played, 55
Bright-coloured birds with splendour crossed the shade,
Flitting on flower-like wings; glad murmurs broke
From reed and spray and leaf, the living strings
Of Earth's Aeolian lyre,⁴ whose music woke
Into young life and joy all happy things. 60
And she too woke from that long dreamless trance
The widowed Edith: fearfully her glance
Fell, as in doubt, on faces dark and strange,
And dusky forms. A sudden sense of change
Flashed o'er her spirit, ev'n ere memory swept 65
The tide of anguish back with thoughts that slept;
Yet half instinctively she rose and spread
Her arms, as 'twere for something lost or fled,
Then faintly sank again. The forest bough,
With all its whispers waved not o'er her now – 70
Where was she? Midst the people of the wild,
By the red hunter's fire: an aged chief
Whose home looked sad (for therein played no child)
Had borne her, in the stillness of her grief,

To that lone cabin of the woods, and there, 75
 Won by a form so desolately fair,
 Or touched with thoughts from some past sorrow sprung,
 O'er her low couch an Indian matron hung,
 While in grave silence, yet with earnest eye,
 The ancient warrior of the waste stood by, 80
 Bending in watchfulness his proud grey head
 And leaning on his bow.
 And life returned –
 Life, but with all its memories of the dead,
 To Edith's heart; and well the sufferer learned
 Her task of meek endurance, well she wore 85
 The chastened grief that humbly can adore
 Midst blinding tears. But unto that old pair,
 Ev'n as a breath of spring's awakening air
 Her presence was, or as a sweet wild tune
 Bringing back tender thoughts, which all too soon 90
 Depart with childhood. Sadly they had seen
 A daughter to the land of spirits go,
 And ever from that time her fading mien
 And voice, like winds of summer, soft and low,
 Had haunted their dim years; but Edith's face 95
 Now looked in holy sweetness from her place,
 And they again seemed parents. Oh the joy,
 The rich, deep blessedness (though earth's alloy,
 Fear that still bodes, be there) of pouring forth
 The heart's whole power of love, its wealth and worth 100
 Of strong affection, in one healthful flow,
 On something all its own! – that kindly glow,
 Which to shut inward is consuming pain,
 Gives the glad soul its flowering time again
 When, like the sunshine, freed. And gentle cares 105
 Th' adopted Edith meekly gave for theirs
 Who loved her thus: her spirit dwelt the while
 With the departed, and her patient smile
 Spoke of farewells to earth – yet still she prayed,

Ev'n o'er her soldier's lowly grave, for aid 110
One purpose to fulfil, to leave one trace
Brightly recording that her dwelling-place
Had been among the wilds, for well she knew
The secret whisper of her bosom true,
Which warned her hence.

 And now by many a word 115
Linked unto moments when the heart was stirred,
By the sweet mournfulness of many a hymn
Sung when the woods at eve grew hushed and dim,
By the persuasion of her fervent eye,
All eloquent with childlike piety, 120
By the still beauty of her life, she strove
To win for heaven, and heaven-born truth, the love
Poured out on her so freely. Nor in vain
Was that soft-breathing influence to enchain
The soul in gentle bonds: by slow degrees 125
Light followed on, as when a summer breeze
Parts the deep masses of the forest shade
And lets the sunbeam through. Her voice was made
Ev'n such a breeze, and she, a lowly guide,
By faith and sorrow raised and purified, 130
So to the cross her Indian fosterers led,
Until their prayers were one. When morning spread
O'er the blue lake, and when the sunset's glow
Touched into golden bronze the cypress bough,
And when the quiet of the Sabbath time 135
Sank on her heart, though no melodious chime
Wakened the wilderness, their prayers were one.
Now might she pass in hope, her work was done.
And she was passing from the woods away;
The broken flower of England might not stay 140
Amidst those alien shades; her eye was bright
Ev'n yet with something of a starry light,
But her form wasted, and her fair young cheek
Wore oft and patiently a fatal streak,

A rose whose root was death. The parting sigh 145
 Of autumn through the forests had gone by,
 And the rich maple o'er her wanderings lone
 Its crimson leaves in many a shower had strewn,
 Flushing⁵ the air; and winter's blast had been
 Amidst the pines; and now a softer green 150
 Fringed their dark boughs, for spring again had come,
 The sunny spring! But Edith to her home
 Was journeying fast. 'Alas, we think it sad
 To part with life when all the earth looks glad
 In her young lovely things, when voices break 155
 Into sweet sounds, and leaves and blossoms wake.
 Is it not brighter then, in that far clime
 Where graves are not, nor blights of changeable time,⁶
 If here such glory dwell with passing blooms,
 Such golden sunshine rest around the tombs?' 160
 So thought the dying one. 'Twas early day,
 And sounds and odours with the breezes' play,
 Whispering of springtime, through the cabin-door
 Unto her couch life's farewell sweetness bore;
 Then with a look where all her hope awoke, 165
 'My father!' – to the grey-haired chief she spoke –
 'Know'st thou that I depart?' 'I know, I know',
 He answered mournfully, 'that thou must go
 To thy beloved, my daughter!' 'Sorrow not
 For me, kind mother!' With meek smiles once more 170
 She murmured in low tones; 'one happy lot
 Awaits us, friends, upon the better shore;
 For we have prayed together in one trust,
 And lifted our frail spirits from the dust
 To God who gave them. Lay me by mine own 175
 Under the cedar-shade: where he is gone
 Thither I go. There will my sisters be,
 And the dead parents, lipping at whose knee
 My childhood's prayer was learned – the Saviour's prayer

Which now ye know, and I shall meet you there, 180
Father and gentle mother! Ye have bound
The bruised reed, and mercy shall be found
By Mercy's children.' From the matron's eye
Dropped tears, her sole and passionate reply,
But Edith felt them not; for now a sleep, 185
Solemnly beautiful, a stillness deep,
Fell on her settled face. Then, sad and slow,
And mantling up his stately head in woe,
'Thou'rt passing hence', he sang, that warrior old,
In sounds like those by plaintive waters rolled. 190

Thou'rt passing from the lake's green side
And the hunter's hearth away;
For the time of flowers, for the summer's pride,
Daughter, thou canst not stay!

Thou'rt journeying to thy spirit's home, 195
Where the skies are ever clear!
The corn-month's golden hours will come,
But they shall not find thee here.

And we shall miss thy voice, my bird,
Under our whispering pine! 200
Music shall midst the leaves be heard,
But not a song like thine.

A breeze that roves o'er stream and hill
Telling of winter gone
Hath such sweet falls – yet caught we still 205
A farewell in its tone.

But thou, my bright one, thou shalt be
Where farewell sounds are o'er;
Thou, in the eyes thou lov'st, shalt see
No fear of parting more. 210

The mossy grave thy tears have wet,
And the wind's wild moanings by,

Thou with thy kindred shalt forget,
Midst flowers – not such as die.

The shadow from thy brow shall melt, 215

 The sorrow from thy strain,¹
But where thine earthly smile hath dwelt,
 Our hearts shall thirst in vain.

Dim will our cabin be, and lone,
 When thou, its light, art fled; 220
Yet hath thy step the pathway shown
 Unto the happy dead.

And we will follow thee, our guide,
 And join that shining band;
Thou’rt passing from the lake’s green side – 225
 Go to the better land!

The song had ceased – the listeners caught no breath;
That lovely sleep had melted into death.

Edith, a Tale of the Woods

¹ ‘Founded on incidents related in an American work, Sketches of Connecticut’ (Hemans’s note). Hemans refers to Lydia Sigourney’s Sketches of Connecticut, Forty Years Since (1824), which tells how the Englishwoman Oriana Selden is adopted by Zachary and Martha, a Mohegan Indian couple, after witnessing her husband’s death at Yorktown in 1781. Sigourney’s poetry was so influenced by Hemans that she was often referred to as ‘The American Hemans’.

² ‘Thou holy one! Call thy child back! I have enjoyed earthly pleasure; I have lived and loved.’ Johann Christoph Friedrich Schiller (1759–1805) composed Wallenstein in 1797–8; it was performed in 1799 and translated into English by Coleridge the following year. Hemans knew the play both in the original and in Coleridge’s rendering. The quotation is from Thekla’s song, after her lover Max has left her.

³ More deep i.e. More deep [than] ...

⁴ Aeolian lyre Hemans has Coleridge's poem of 1795 in mind (p. 621), and seems even to be thinking of his pantheist vision.

⁵ Flushing reddening.

⁶ blights of changeful time disease that comes with the passage of time.

⁷ strain song.

The Indian City¹

*What deep wounds ever closed without a scar?
The heart's bleed longest, and but heal to wear
That which disfigures it.*

*(Childe Harold)*²

I

Royal in splendour went down the day
On the plain where an Indian city lay,
With its crown of domes o'er the forest high,
Red as if fused in the burning sky,
And its deep groves pierced by the rays which made 5
A bright stream's way through each long arcade,
Till the pillared vaults of the banyan³ stood
Like torch-lit aisles midst the solemn wood,
And the plantain⁴ glittered with leaves of gold,
As a tree midst the genii-gardens old, 10
And the cypress lifted a blazing spire,
And the stems of the cocoas were shafts of fire.
Many a white pagoda's gleam
Slept lovely round upon lake and stream,

Broken alone by the lotus-flowers, 15
 As they caught the glow of the sun's last hours
 Like rosy wine in their cups, and shed
 Its glory forth on their crystal bed.
 Many a graceful Hindu maid
 With the water-vase from the palmy shade 20
 Came gliding light as the desert's roe,⁵
 Down marble steps to the tanks below;
 And a cool sweet plashing was ever heard,
 As the molten glass of the wave was stirred;
 And a murmur, thrilling the scented air, 25
 Told where the Brahmin⁶ bowed in prayer.
 There wandered a noble Muslim boy
 Through the scene of beauty in breathless joy;
 He gazed where the stately city rose
 Like a pageant of clouds in its red repose; 30
 He turned where birds through the gorgeous gloom
 Of the woods went glancing on starry plume;
 He tracked the brink of the shining lake
 By the tall canes feathered in tuft and brake,
 Till the path he chose, in its mazes wound 35
 To the very heart of the holy ground.
 And there lay the water, as if enshrined
 In a rocky urn from the sun and wind,
 Bearing the hues of the grove on high,
 Far down through its dark still purity. 40
 The flood beyond, to the fiery west
 Spread out like a metal mirror's⁷ breast,
 But that lone bay, in its dimness deep,
 Seemed made for the swimmer's joyous leap,
 For the stag athirst from the noontide chase, 45
 For all free things of the wildwood's race.
 Like a falcon's glance on the wide blue sky
 Was the kindling flash of the boy's glad eye,
 Like a sea-bird's flight to the foaming wave

From the shadowy bank was the bound he gave; 50
 Dashing the spray-drops, cold and white,
 O'er the glossy leaves in his young delight,
 And bowing his locks to the waters clear –
 Alas, he dreamt not that fate was near!
 His mother looked from her tent the while 55
 O'er heaven and earth with a quiet smile;
 She, on her way unto Mecca's fane,
 Had stayed⁸ the march of her pilgrim-train
 Calmly to linger a few brief hours
 In the Bramin city's glorious bowers, 60
 For the pomp of the forest, the wave's bright fall,
 The red gold of sunset – she loved them all.

II

The moon rose clear in the splendour given
 To the deep blue night of an Indian heaven;
 The boy from the high-arched woods came back – 65
 Oh, what had he met in his lonely track?
 The serpent's glance, through the long reeds bright?
 The arrowy spring of the tiger's might?
 No! Yet as one by a conflict worn,
 With his graceful hair all soiled and torn, 70
 And a gloom on the lids of his darkened eye,
 And a gash on his bosom – he came to die!
 He looked for the face to his young heart sweet,
 And found it, and sank at his mother's feet.
 'Speak to me! Whence doth the swift blood run? 75
 What hath befall'n thee, my child, my son?'
 The mist of death on his brow lay pale,
 But his voice just lingered to breathe the tale,
 Murmuring faintly of wrongs and scorn,
 And wounds from the children of Brahma⁹ born. 80
 This was the doom¹⁰ for a Muslim found

With foot profane on their holy ground;
This was for sullyng the pure waves free
Unto them alone – 'twas their God's decree.

A change came o'er his wandering look – 85

The mother shrieked not then, nor shook;
Breathless she knelt in her son's young blood,
Rending her mantle to staunch its flood,
But it rushed like a river which none may stay,
Bearing a flower to the deep away. 90

That which our love to the earth would chain,
Fearfully striving with Heaven in vain,
That which fades from us while yet we hold,
Clasped to our bosoms, its mortal mould,
Was fleeting before her, afar and fast; 95
One moment – the soul from the face had passed!

Are there no words for that common woe?
Ask of the thousands, its depths that know!
The boy had breathed, in his dreaming rest,
Like a low-voiced dove on her gentle breast; 100

He had stood, when she sorrowed, beside her knee,
Painfully stilling his quick heart's glee;
He had kissed from her cheek the widow's tears
With the loving lip of his infant years;
He had smiled o'er her path like a bright spring day – 105
Now in his blood on the earth he lay

Murdered! Alas, and we love so well
In a world where anguish like this can dwell!

She bowed down mutely o'er her dead –
They that stood round her watched in dread; 110
They watched – she knew not they were by;
Her soul sat veiled in its agony.

On the silent lip she pressed no kiss,
Too stern was the grasp of her pangs for this;
She shed no tear as her face bent low 115

O'er the shining hair of the lifeless brow;
She looked but into the half-shut eye

With a gaze that found there no reply
And, shrieking, mantled her head from sight
And fell, struck down by her sorrow's might! 120

And what deep change, what work of power,
Was wrought on her secret soul that hour?
How rose the lonely one? She rose
Like a prophetess from dark repose,
And proudly flung from her face the veil, 125
And shook the hair from her forehead pale,
And midst her wondering handmaids stood
With the sudden glance of a dauntless mood.

Aye, lifting up to the midnight sky
A brow in its regal passion high, 130
With a close and rigid grasp she pressed
The bloodstained robe to her heaving breast,
And said, 'Not yet, not yet I weep,
Not yet my spirit shall sink or sleep,
Not till yon city, in ruins rent, 135
Be piled for its victim's monument.

Cover his dust, bear it on before –
It shall visit those temple-gates once more!
And away in the train of the dead she turned,
The strength of her step was the heart that burned; 140
And the Brahmin groves in the starlight smiled
As the mother passed with her slaughtered child.

III

Hark, a wild sound of the desert's horn
Through the woods round the Indian city borne!
A peal of the cymbal and tambour¹¹ afar – 145
War, 'tis the gathering of Muslim war!
The Bramin looked from the leaguered¹² towers –
He saw the wild archer amidst his bowers,
And the lake that flashed through the plantain shade

As the light of the lances along it played, 150
And the canes that shook as if winds were high
When the fiery steed of the waste swept by,
And the camp as it lay, like a billowy sea,
Wide round the sheltering banyan tree.

There stood one tent from the rest apart – 155
That was the place of a wounded heart.
Oh, deep is a wounded heart, and strong
A voice that cries against mighty wrong,
And full of death as a hot wind's blight¹³
Doth the ire of a crushed affection light! 160

Maimuna from realm to realm had passed,
And her tale had rung like a trumpet's blast;
There had been words from her pale lips poured,
Each one a spell to unsheath the sword.
The Tartar had sprung from his steed to hear, 165
And the dark chief of Araby grasped his spear
Till a chain of long lances begirt¹⁴ the wall,
And a vow was recorded that doomed its fall.

Back with the dust of her son she came,
When her voice had kindled that lightning flame; 170
She came in the might of a queenly foe –
Banner, and javelin, and bended bow;
But a deeper power on her forehead sate –
There sought the warrior his star of fate;
Her eye's wild flash through the tented line 175
Was hailed as a spirit and a sign,
And the faintest tone from her lip was caught
As a Sybil's breath of prophetic thought.

Vain, bitter glory! The gift of grief
That lights up vengeance to find relief, 180
Transient and faithless – it cannot fill
So the deep void of the heart, nor still
The yearning left by a broken tie,
That haunted fever of which we die!

Sickening she turned from her sad renown, 185
 As a king in death might reject his crown;
 Slowly the strength of the walls gave way –
She withered faster from day to day.
 All the proud sounds of that bannered plain
 To stay the flight of her soul were vain; 190
 Like an eagle caged, it had striven, and worn
 The frail dust ne'er for such conflicts born,
 Till the bars were rent, and the hour was come
 For its fearful rushing through darkness home.
 The bright sun set in his pomp and pride, 195
 As on that eve when the fair boy died;
 She gazed from her couch, and a softness fell
 O'er her weary heart with the day's farewell;
 She spoke, and her voice in its dying tone
 Had an echo of feelings that long seemed flown. 200
 She murmured a low sweet cradle song,
 Strange midst the din of a warrior throng,
 A song of the time when her boy's young cheek
 Had glowed on her breast in its slumber meek;
 But something which breathed from that mournful strain 205
 Sent a fiftul gust o'er her soul again,
 And starting as if from a dream, she cried,
 'Give him proud burial at my side!
 There, by yon lake, where the palm-boughs wave,
 When the temples are fallen, make there our grave.' 210
 And the temples fell, though the spirit passed
 That stayed not for victory's voice at last,
 When the day was won for the martyr-dead,
 For the broken heart, and the bright blood shed.
 Through the gates of the vanquished the Tartar steed 215
 Bore in the avenger with foaming speed;
 Free swept the flame through the idol-fanes
 And the streams flowed red, as from warrior-veins,
 And the sword of the Muslim, let loose to slay,
 Like the panther leapt on its flying prey, 220

Till a city of ruin begirt the shade
Where the boy and his mother at rest were laid.
Palace and tower on that plain were left
Like fallen trees by the lightning cleft;
The wild vine mantled the stately square, 225
The Rajah's throne was the serpent's lair,
And the jungle grass o'er the altar sprung –
This was the work of one deep heart wrung!

The Indian City

¹ 'From a tale in Forbes' Oriental Memoirs' (Hemans's note). James Forbes (1749–1819) published his Oriental Memoirs in 1813. He tells how Sciad Ballah and his mother Mamah-Dooore, Muslims journeying to Mecca, passed the gates of Dhuboy, a Hindu city in Guzerat, western India, from which Muslims were banned. Sciad entered nonetheless and bathed illegally in the city's sacred lake. He was punished by having his hands cut off, and died just after returning to his mother. Having returned home she asked her sovereign for revenge. He besieged Dhuboy for years before eventually destroying it.

The Peasant Girl of the Rhône¹

*There is but one place in the world –
Thither, where he lies buried!...
There, there is all that still remains of him,
That single spot is the whole earth to me.*

(Coleridge’s Wallenstein)²

*Alas, our young affections run to waste,
Or water but the desert.*

(Childe Harold)³

There went a warrior’s funeral through the night,
A waving of tall plumes, a ruddy light
Of torches, fitfully and wildly thrown
From the high woods along the sweeping Rhône,
Far down the waters. Heavily and dead, 5
Under the moaning trees the horse-hoof’s tread
In muffled sounds upon the greensward fell
As chieftains passed, and solemnly the swell
Of the deep requiem, o’er the gleaming river

Borne with the gale, and with the leaves' low shiver, 10
Floated and died. Proud mourners there, yet pale,
 Wore man's mute anguish sternly – but of one,
Oh who shall speak? What words his brow unveil?
 A father following to the grave his son –
That is no grief to picture! Sad and slow, 15
 Through the wood-shadows moved the knightly train
With youth's fair form upon the bier laid low,
 Fair even when found, amidst the bloody slain,
Stretched by its broken lance. They reached the lone
 Baronial chapel, where the forest gloom 20
Fell heaviest, for the massy boughs had grown
 Into thick archways, as to vault the tomb.
Stately they trod the hollow ringing aisle,
A strange deep echo shuddered through the pile
Till crested heads at last, in silence bent 25
Round the De Coucis' antique monument,
When dust to dust was given, and Aymer slept
 Beneath the drooping banners of his line,
Whose broidered folds the Syrian wind had swept
 Proudly and oft o'er fields of Palestine. 30
So the sad rite was closed. The sculptor gave
Trophies erelong, to deck that lordly grave,
And the pale image of a youth arrayed
As warriors are for fight, but calmly laid
 In slumber on his shield. Then all was done, 35
All still around the dead. His name was heard
Perchance when wine-cups flowed, and hearts were stirred
 By some old song, or tale of battle won,
Told round the hearth; but in his father's breast
Manhood's high passions woke again, and pressed 40
On to their mark, and in his friend's clear eye
There dwelt no shadow of a dream gone by,
And with the brethren of his fields, the feast
Was gay as when the voice whose sounds had ceased
Mingled with theirs. Ev'n thus life's rushing tide 45

Bears back affection from the grave's dark side;
Alas, to think of this! The heart's void place
 Filled up so soon – so like a summer-cloud,
All that we loved to pass and leave no trace!
 He lay forgotten in his early shroud. 50
Forgotten? Not of all! The sunny smile
Glancing in play o'er that proud lip erewhile,
And the dark locks whose breezy waving threw
A gladness round, whene'er their shade withdrew
From the bright brow, and all the sweetness lying 55
 Within that eagle-eye's jet radiance deep,
And all the music with that young voice dying,
 Whose joyous echoes made the quick heart leap
As at a hunter's bugle – these things lived
Still in one breast whose silent love survived 60
The poms of kindred sorrow. Day by day
On Aymer's tomb fresh flowers in garlands lay,
Through the dim fane soft summer-odours breathing,
And all the pale sepulchral trophies wreathing,
And with a flush of deeper brilliance glowing 65
In the rich light, like molten rubies flowing
Through storied windows down. The violet there
Might speak of love, a secret love and lowly,
And the rose image all things fleet and fair,
And the faint passion-flower, the sad and holy, 70
Tell of diviner hopes. But whose light hand,
As for an altar, wove the radiant band?
Whose gentle nurture brought, from hidden dells
That gem-like wealth of blossoms and sweet bells,
To blush through every season? Blight and chill 75
Might touch the changing woods, but duly still
For years those gorgeous coronals renewed,
 And brightly clasping marble spear and helm,
Even through midwinter, filled the solitude
 With a strange smile, a glow of summer's realm. 80
Surely some fond and fervent heart was pouring

Its youth's vain worship on the dust, adoring
In lone devotedness!

One spring morn rose,
And found, within that tomb's proud shadow laid
(Oh, not as midst the vineyards, to repose 85
From the fierce noon) a dark-haired peasant maid:
Who could reveal her story? That still face
Had once been fair; for on the clear arched brow
And the curved lip, there lingered yet such grace
As sculpture gives its dreams; and long and low 90
The deep black lashes o'er the half-shut eye
(For death was on its lids) fell mournfully.
But the cold cheek was sunk, the raven hair
Dimmed, the slight form all wasted as by care.
Whence came that early blight? Her kindred's place 95
Was not amidst the high De Couci race,
Yet there her shrine had been! She grasped a wreath,
The tomb's last garland – this was love in death!

Indian Woman's Death Song

An Indian woman, driven to despair by her husband's desertion of her for another wife, entered a canoe with her children, and rowed it down the Mississippi towards a cataract. Her voice was heard from the shore singing a mournful death-song until overpowered by the sound of the waters in which she perished. The tale is related in Long's Expedition to the Source of St. Peter's River.¹

Non, je ne puis vivre avec un coeur brisé. Il faut que je retrouve la joie, et que je m'unisse aux esprits libres de l'air.

(Bride of Messina, translated by Madame de Staël)²

Let not my child be a girl, for very sad is the life of a woman.

(The Prairie)³

Down a broad river of the western wilds,
Piercing thick forest glooms, a light canoe
Swept with the current: fearful was the speed
Of the frail bark, as by a tempest's wing
Borne leaf-like on to where the mist of spray 5
Rose with the cataract's thunder. Yet within,
Proudly, and dauntlessly, and all alone,
Save that a babe lay sleeping at her breast,
A woman stood. Upon her Indian brow
Sat a strange gladness, and her dark hair waved 10
As if triumphantly. She pressed her child,
In its bright slumber, to her beating heart,
And lifted her sweet voice that rose awhile
Above the sound of waters, high and clear,
Wafting a wild proud strain, her song of death. 15

Roll swiftly to the spirit's land, thou mighty stream and free!
Father of ancient waters,⁴ roll, and bear our lives with thee!
The weary bird that storms have tossed would seek the sunshine's calm,
And the deer that hath the arrow's hurt flies to the woods of balm.

Roll on!⁵ My warrior's eye hath looked upon another's face, 20
And mine hath faded from his soul, as fades a moonbeam's trace;
My shadow comes not o'er his path, my whisper to his dream,
He flings away the broken reed – roll swifter yet, thou stream!

The voice that spoke of other days is hushed within his breast,
But mine its lonely music haunts, and will not let me rest; 25
It sings a low and mournful song of gladness that is gone;
I cannot live without that light – father of waves, roll on!

Will he not miss the bounding step that met him from the chase?
The heart of love that made his home an ever-sunny place?
The hand that spread the hunter's board, and decked his couch of yore?
30

He will not! Roll, dark foaming stream, on to the better shore!

Some blessed fount amidst the woods of that bright land must flow
Whose waters from my soul may lave the memory of this woe;
Some gentle wind must whisper there, whose breath may waft away
The burden of the heavy night, the sadness of the day. 35

And thou, my babe, though born, like me, for woman's weary lot,
Smile – to that wasting of the heart, my own! I leave thee not;
Too bright a thing art thou to pine in aching love away,
Thy mother bears thee far, young fawn, from sorrow and decay.

She bears thee to the glorious bowers where none are heard to weep, 40

And where th' unkind one hath no power again to trouble sleep;
And where the soul shall find its youth, as wakening from a dream –
One moment, and that realm is ours: on, on, dark rolling stream!

Joan of Arc, in Rheims

Jeanne d'Arc avait eu la joie de voir à Chalons quelques amis de son enfance. Une joie plus ineffable encore l'attendait à Rheims, au sein de son triomphe: Jacques d'Arc, son père, y se trouva, aussitôt que les troupes de Charles VII y furent entrées; et comme les deux frères de notre Héroïne l'avaient accompagnés, elle se vit, pour un instant au milieu de sa famille, dans les bras d'un père vertueux.

(Vie de Jeanne d'Arc)¹

*Thou hast a charmed cup, oh fame,
A draught that mantles high,
And seems to lift this earth-born frame
Above mortality;
Away! To me, a woman, bring
Sweet waters from affection's spring.*²

That was a joyous day in Rheims of old,
When peal on peal of mighty music rolled
Forth from her thronged cathedral, while around
A multitude whose billows³ made no sound,

Chained to a hush of wonder, though elate 5
With victory, listened at their temple's gate.
And what was done within? Within, the light
 Through the rich gloom of pictured windows flowing,
Tinged with soft awfulness a stately sight –
 The chivalry of France, their proud heads bowing 10
In martial vassalage – while midst that ring,
And shadowed by ancestral tombs, a king
Received his birthright's crown. For this the hymn
 Swelled out like rushing waters, and the day
With the sweet censer's misty breath grew dim, 15
 As through long aisles it floated o'er th' array
Of arms and sweeping stoles. But who, alone
And unapproached, beside the altar-stone,
With the white banner, forth like sunshine streaming,
And the gold helm,⁴ through clouds of fragrance gleaming, 20
Silent and radiant stood? The helm was raised,
And the fair face revealed that upward gazed,
 Intensely worshipping – a still, clear face,
Youthful, but brightly solemn! Woman's cheek
And brow were there, in deep devotion meek, 25
 Yet glorified with inspiration's trace
On its pure paleness, while, enthroned above,
The pictured Virgin with her smile of love
Seemed bending o'er her votaress⁵ – that slight form!
Was that the leader through the battle storm? 30
Had the soft light in that adoring eye
Guided the warrior where the swords flashed high?
'Twas so, even so, and thou, the shepherd's child,
Joanne, the lowly dreamer of the wild!
Never before, and never since that hour, 35
Hath woman, mantled with victorious power,
Stood forth as thou beside the shrine didst stand,
Holy amidst the knighthood of the land,
And beautiful with joy and with renown,

Lift thy white banner o'er the olden crown 40
Ransomed for France by thee!

The rites are done.

Now let the dome with trumpet-notes be shaken,
And bid the echoes of the tombs awaken,
And come thou forth, that Heaven's rejoicing sun
May give thee welcome from thine own blue skies, 45

Daughter of Victory! A triumphant strain,
A proud rich stream of warlike melodies,
Gushed through the portals of the antique fane
And forth she came. Then rose a nation's sound –
Oh, what a power to bid the quick heart bound 50
The wind bears onward with the stormy cheer
Man gives to glory on her high career!

Is there indeed such power? Far deeper dwells
In one kind household voice, to reach the cells
Whence happiness flows forth! The shouts that filled 55
The hollow heaven tempestuously were stilled
One moment, and in that brief pause the tone,
As of a breeze that o'er her home had blown,
Sank on the bright maid's heart – 'Joanne!'

Who spoke

Like those whose childhood with her childhood grew 60
Under one roof? 'Joanne!' – that murmur broke

With sounds of weeping forth! She turned – she knew
Beside her, marked from all the thousands there,
In the calm beauty of his silver hair,

The stately shepherd; and the youth whose joy 65
From his dark eye flashed proudly; and the boy,
The youngest-born, that ever loved her best –
'Father! And ye, my brothers!' On the breast
Of that grey sire she sank – and swiftly back,
Ev'n in an instant, to their native track 70

Her free thoughts flowed. She saw the pomp no more –
The plumes, the banners; to her cabin-door,

And to the fairy's fountain in the glade,⁶
Where her young sisters by her side had played,
And to her hamlet's chapel, where it rose 75
Hallowing the forest unto deep repose,
Her spirit turned. The very woodnote sung
In early springtime by the bird which dwelt
Where o'er her father's roof the beech-leaves hung
Was in her heart; a music heard and felt, 80
Winning her back to nature.⁷ She unbound
The helm of many battles from her head,
And, with her bright locks bowed to sweep the ground,
Lifting her voice up, wept for joy, and said,
'Bless me, my father, bless me! And with thee, 85
To the still cabin and the beechen-tree,
Let me return!'

Oh, never did thine eye
Through the green haunts of happy infancy
Wander again, Joanne! Too much of fame
Had shed its radiance on thy peasant name, 90
And bought alone by gifts beyond all price,
The trusting heart's repose, the paradise
Of home with all its loves, doth fate allow
The crown of glory unto woman's brow.

Joan of Arc, in Rheims

¹ 'Joan of Arc had had the pleasure of seeing some childhood friends at Châlons. A yet more sublime joy awaited her at Rheims, at the peak of her triumph. Jacques d'Arc, her father, had arrived there as soon as the troops of Charles VII had entered the city, and as our heroine's two brothers had accompanied him, she found herself momentarily amidst her family, and in the arms of a virtuous father.' Hemans's source is Jeanne d'Arc ou La Pucelle d'Orleans, in Almanach de Gotha pour l'Année 1822 (Gotha, 1822), p.102. See Susan Wolfson, Felicia

Hemans: Selected Poems, Letters, Reception Materials (Princeton, 2000).

² This epigraph is stanza 1 of Hemans's Woman and Fame, published in The Amulet (1829).

³ billows movements.

⁴ helm helmet.

⁵ votaress female worshipper.

⁶ 'A beautiful fountain near Domremi, believed to be haunted by fairies, and a favourite resort of Jeanne d'Arc in her childhood' (Hemans's note). Domrémy La Pucelle, a village in the department of Meuse, was Joan's birthplace.

⁷ nature Wolfson suggests that this is a reference not just to the natural world but to Joan's 'deepest female "nature"'.

Pauline¹

*To die for what we love! Oh there is power
In the true heart, and pride, and joy, for this;
It is to live without the vanished light
That strength is needed.*²

*Così trapassa al trapassar d'un giorno
Della vita mortal il fiore e'l verde.*

(Tasso)³

Along the starlit Seine⁴ went music swelling,
Till the air thrilled with its exulting mirth;
Proudly it floated, even as if no dwelling
For cares or stricken hearts were found on earth;

And a glad sound the measure lightly beat, 5
A happy chime of many dancing feet.

For in a palace of the land that night,
Lamps, and fresh roses, and green leaves were hung,
And from the painted walls a stream of light
On flying forms beneath soft splendour flung; 10
But loveliest far amidst the revel's pride
Was one, the lady from the Danube-side.⁵

Pauline, the meekly bright! Though now no more
Her clear eye flashed with youth's all tameless glee,
Yet something holier than its dayspring wore, 15
There in soft rest lay beautiful to see –
A charm with graver, tenderer sweetness fraught,
The blending of deep love and matron thought.⁶

Through the gay throng she moved, serenely fair,
And such calm joy as fills a moonlight sky 20
Sate on her brow beneath its graceful hair,
As her young daughter in the dance went by
With the fleet step of one that yet hath known
Smiles and kind voices in this world alone.

Lurked there no secret boding in her breast? 25
Did no faint whisper warn of evil nigh?
Such oft awake when most the heart seems blessed
Midst the light laughter of festivity –
Whence come those tones! Alas, enough we know,
To mingle fear with all triumphal show! 30

Who spoke of evil when young feet were flying
In fairy-rings around the echoing hall?
Soft airs through braided locks in perfume sighing,
Glad pulses beating unto music's call?
Silence! The minstrels pause – and hark, a sound, 35
A strange quick rustling which their notes had drowned!

And lo, a light upon the dancers breaking –
Not such their clear and silvery lamps had shed!
From the gay dream of revelry awaking,
One moment holds them still in breathless dread; 40
The wild, fierce lustre grows – then bursts a cry –
Fire! Through the hall and round it gathering – fly! 7

And forth they rush as chased by sword and spear –
To the green coverts of the garden-bowers,
A gorgeous masque of pageantry and fear 45
Startling the birds and trampling down the flowers,
While from the dome behind, red sparkles driven
Pierce the dark stillness of the midnight heaven.

And where is she, Pauline? The hurrying throng
Have swept her onward, as a stormy blast 50
Might sweep some faint o'erwearied bird along –
Till now the threshold of that death is passed,
And free she stands beneath the starry skies
Calling her child – but no sweet voice replies.

'Bertha, where art thou? Speak, oh speak, my own!' 55
Alas, unconscious of her pangs the while,
The gentle girl, in fear's cold grasp alone,
Powerless hath sunk within the blazing pile –
A young bright form, decked gloriously for death,
With flowers all shrinking from the flame's fierce breath! 60

But oh, thy strength, deep love! There is no power
To stay the mother from that rolling grave,
Though fast on high the fiery volumes tower,
And forth, like banners, from each lattice 8 wave.
Back, back she rushes through a host combined – 65
Mighty is anguish, with affection twined!

And what bold step may follow midst the roar
Of the red billows, o'er their prey that rise?

None! Courage there stood still – and never more
 Did those fair forms emerge on human eyes! 70
 Was one brief meeting theirs, one wild farewell?
 And died they heart to heart? Oh, who can tell?

Freshly and cloudlessly the morning broke
 On that sad palace, midst its pleasure-shades;
 Its painted roofs had sunk – yet black with smoke 75
 And lonely stood its marble colonnades;
 But yestereve their shafts with wreaths were bound –
 Now lay the scene one shrivelled scroll⁹ around!

And bore the ruins no recording trace
 Of all that woman's heart had dared and done? 80
 Yes, there were gems to mark its mortal place,
 That forth from dust and ashes dimly shone!
 Those had the mother on her gentle breast
 Worn round her child's fair image, there at rest.¹⁰

And they were all! The tender and the true 85
 Left this alone her sacrifice to prove,
 Hallowing the spot where mirth once lightly flew
 To deep, lone, chastened thoughts of grief and love.
 Oh, we have need of patient faith below,
 To clear away the mysteries of such woe! 90

Pauline

¹ When first published in the New Monthly Magazine (February 1827), this poem was given an epigraph from Wordsworth's Excursion iv 10–17:

One adequate support
 For the calamities of mortal life
 Exists, one only; an assured belief
 That the procession of our fate, howe'er
 Sad or disturbed, is ordered by a Being

Of infinite benevolence and power,
Whose everlasting purposes embrace
All accidents, converting them to Good.

²This epigraph was composed by Hemans for this poem.

³‘Thus the flower and the green of the mortal life fade as the day fades.’
Torquato Tasso, Gerusalemme Liberata canto 16, st. 15, 1–2. The lines are from a bird’s song in the garden of the enchantress Armida, where the Crusader, Rinaldo, is imprisoned.

⁴*Seine* river of Paris and northern France, flowing into the English Channel.

⁵‘The Princess Pauline Schwartzenberg. The story of her fate is beautifully related in L’Allemagne, Vol. 3, p. 336’ (Hemans’s note).
Anne-Louise-Germaine Necker, Madame de Staël (1766–1817), De l’Allemagne, was published as Germany, by John Murray, in 1813.
Pauline’s story is told in vol. 3, pp. 337–9.

⁶Hemans is close to her source: Staël says that Pauline ‘still united the charm of perfect beauty to all the dignity of the maternal character’
(Germany iii 337).

⁷‘On a sudden the numberless torches, which restored the splendour of the day, are about to be changed into devouring flames’ (Staël, Germany
iii 337).

⁸*lattice* window.

⁹*scroll* spiral ornament at the top of a pillar.

¹⁰ ‘A woman braved them; her hand seized that of her daughter, her hand saved her daughter; and although the fatal blow then struck her, her last act was maternal; her last act preserved the object of her affection; it was at this sublime instant that she appeared before God;

and it was impossible to recognize what remained of her upon earth except by the impression on a medal, given by her children, which also marked the place where this angel perished' (Staël, Germany iii 338–9).

Juana¹

Juana, mother of the Emperor Charles V,² upon the death of her husband, Philip the Handsome of Austria, who had treated her with uniform neglect, had his body laid upon a bed of state in a magnificent dress and, being possessed with the idea that it would revive, watched it for a length of time incessantly, waiting for the moment of returning life.

*It is but dust thou look'st upon. This love,
This wild and passionate idolatry,
What doth it in the shadow of the grave?
Gather it back within thy lonely heart,
So must it ever end: too much we give
Unto the things that perish.*³

The night-wind shook the tapestry round an ancient palace-room,
And torches, as it rose and fell, waved through the gorgeous gloom,
And o'er a shadowy regal couch threw fitful gleams and red,
Where a woman with long raven hair sat watching by the dead.

Pale shone the features of the dead, yet glorious still to see, 5
Like a hunter or a chief struck down while his heart and step were free;
No shroud he wore, no robe of death, but there majestic lay,
Proudly and sadly glittering in royalty's array.

But she that with the dark hair watched by the cold slumberer's side,
On her wan cheek no beauty dwelt, and in her garb no pride; 10
Only her full impassioned eyes as o'er that clay she bent,
A wildness and a tenderness in strange resplendence blent.

And as the swift thoughts crossed her soul, like shadows of a cloud,
Amidst the silent room of death, the dreamer spoke aloud;
She spoke to him who could not hear, and cried, 'Thou yet wilt wake,

15

And learn my watchings and my tears, beloved one, for thy sake.

They told me this was death, but well I knew it could not be;
Fairest and stateliest of the earth, who spoke of death for thee?
They would have wrapped the funeral shroud thy gallant form around,
But I forbade, and there thou art – a monarch, robed and crowned!

20

With all thy bright locks gleaming still, their coronal beneath,
And thy brow so proudly beautiful – who said that this was death?
Silence hath been upon thy lips, and stillness round thee long,
But the hopeful spirit in my breast is all undimmed and strong.

I know thou hast not loved me yet; I am not fair like thee, 25
The very glance of whose clear eye threw round a light of glee!
A frail and drooping form is mine – a cold unsmiling cheek,
Oh, I have but a woman's heart, wherewith thy heart to seek.

But when thou wak'st, my prince, my lord, and hear'st how I have kept
A lonely vigil by thy side, and o'er thee prayed and wept; 30
How in one long, deep dream of thee my nights and days have passed,
Surely that humble, patient love must win back love at last!

And thou wilt smile – my own, my own, shall be the sunny smile
Which brightly fell, and joyously, on all but me erewhile!
No more in vain affection's thirst my weary soul shall pine – 35
Oh, years of hope deferred were paid by one fond glance of thine!

Thou'lt meet me with that radiant look when thou com'st from the chase,
For me, for me, in festal halls it shall kindle o'er thy face!
Thou'lt not reckon no more though beauty's gift mine aspect may not bless;
In thy kind eyes this deep, deep love shall give me loveliness. 40

But wake! My heart within me burns yet once more to rejoice
In the sound to which it ever leaped – the music of thy voice;
Awake! I sit in solitude, that thy first look and tone,
And the gladness of thine opening eyes may all be mine alone.'

In the still chambers of the dust thus poured forth day by day 45
The passion of that loving dream from a troubled soul found way,
Until the shadows of the grave had swept o'er every grace
Left midst the awfulness of death on the princely form and face.

And slowly broke the fearful truth upon the watcher's breast,
And they bore away the royal dead with requiems to his rest, 50
With banners and with knightly plumes all waving in the wind –
But a woman's broken heart was left in its lone despair behind.

Juana

¹ Juana of Aragon, Queen of Castile (1479–1555), was married to Philip, Duke of Burgundy (1478–1506), as part of her father's policy in linking the Spanish with the Austrian, Portuguese and English royal families so as to surround France. Philip was not only neglectful; he was openly unfaithful to her, and supported France. His death in September 1506, from a fever, intensified her depression, and she refused to be separated from his embalmed body, precipitating accusations of insanity. Her father assumed the Regency, and she was effectively imprisoned in Spain for the rest of her life.

The American Forest Girl¹

*A fearful gift upon thy heart is laid,
Woman – a power to suffer and to love,
Therefore thou so canst pity.*²

Wildly and mournfully the Indian drum
On the deep hush of moonlight forests broke;
'Sing us a death-song, for thine hour is come',

So the red warriors to their captive spoke.
Still, and amidst those dusky forms alone, 5
 A youth, a fair-haired youth of England stood
Like a king's son, though from his cheek had flown
 The mantling crimson of the island-blood,
And his pressed lips looked marble. Fiercely bright
And high around him blazed the fires of night, 10
Rocking beneath the cedars to and fro
As the wind passed, and with a fitful glow
Lighting the victim's face. But who could tell
Of what within his secret heart befell,
Known but to heaven that hour? Perchance a thought 15
Of his far home then so intensely wrought,
That its full image, pictured to his eye
On the dark ground of mortal agony,
Rose clear as day – and he might see the band,
Of his young sisters wandering hand in hand 20
Where the laburnums drooped, or haply binding
The jasmine, up the door's low pillars winding,
Or, as day closed upon their gentle mirth,
Gathering with braided hair around the hearth
Where sat their mother – and that mother's face, 25
Its grave sweet smile yet wearing in the place
Where so it ever smiled! Perchance the prayer
Learned at her knee came back on his despair,
The blessing from her voice, the very tone
Of her 'Goodnight!' might breathe from boyhood gone. 30
He started and looked up; thick cypress boughs,
 Full of strange sound, waved o'er him, darkly red
In the broad stormy firelight; savage brows
 With tall plumes crested and wild hues o'erspread,
Girt him like feverish phantoms, and pale stars 35
Looked through the branches as through dungeon bars,
Shedding no hope. He knew, he felt his doom –
Oh, what a tale to shadow with its gloom
That happy hall in England! Idle fear!

Would the winds tell it? Who might dream or hear 40
The secret of the forests? To the stake

They bound him, and that proud young soldier strove
His father's spirit in his breast to wake,

Trusting to die in silence! He, the love
Of many hearts, the fondly reared, the fair, 45
Gladdening all eyes to see! And fettered there
He stood beside his death-pyre, and the brand
Flamed up to light it in the chieftain's hand.

He thought upon his God. Hush, hark! A cry
Breaks on the stern and dread solemnity – 50

A step hath pierced the ring! Who dares intrude
On the dark hunters in their vengeful mood?

A girl, a young slight girl, a fawn-like child

Of green savannahs³ and the leafy wild,
Springing unmarked till then, as some lone flower, 55
Happy because the sunshine is its dower,

Yet one that knew how early tears are shed,
For hers had mourned a playmate brother dead.

She had sat gazing on the victim long
Until the pity of her soul grew strong 60

And, by its passion's deep'ning fervour swayed,
Ev'n to the stake she rushed, and gently laid
His bright head on her bosom, and around
His form her slender arms to shield it wound

Like close liannes,⁴ then raised her glittering eye 65

And clear-toned voice that said, 'He shall not die!'
'He shall not die!' – the gloomy forest thrilled

To that sweet sound. A sudden wonder fell
On the fierce throng, and heart and hand were stilled,

Struck down as by the whisper of a spell. 70
They gazed – their dark souls bowed before the maid,
She of the dancing step in wood and glade!

And as her cheek flushed through its olive hue,

As her black tresses to the night-wind flew,
Something o'ermastered them from that young mien, 75
Something of heaven, in silence felt and seen,
And seeming, to their childlike faith, a token
That the Great Spirit by her voice had spoken.

They loosed the bonds that held their captive's breath;
From his pale lips they took the cup of death; 80
They quenched the brand beneath the cypress tree;
'Away', they cried, 'young stranger, thou art free!'

The American Forest Girl

¹ Wolfson observes that this is a 'captivity narrative', a primary genre in the literature of New World encounters – more so than 'Edith'.

³ savannahs treeless plains.

⁴ liannes lianas, climbing plants that grow in the tropics.

Costanza¹

*Art thou then desolate?
Of friends, of hopes forsaken? Come to me,
I am thine own! Have trusted hearts proved false?
Flatterers deceived thee? Wanderer, come to me!
Why didst thou ever leave me? Know'st thou all
I would have borne, and called it joy to bear
For thy sake? Know'st thou that thy voice had power
To shake me with a thrill of happiness
By one kind tone, to fill mine eyes with tears
Of yearning love? And thou – oh, thou didst throw*

*That crushed affection back upon my heart –
Yet come to me! It died not.*²

She knelt in prayer. A stream of sunset fell
Through the stained window of her lonely cell,
And with its rich, deep, melancholy glow
Flushing her cheek and pale Madonna brow,
While o'er her long hair's flowing jet it threw 5
Bright waves of gold – the autumn forest's hue –
Seemed all a vision's mist of glory spread
By painting's touch around some holy head,
Virgin's or fairest martyr's. In her eye,
Which glanced as dark clear water to the sky, 10
What solemn fervour lived! And yet what woe
Lay like some buried thing, still seen below
The glassy tide! Oh, he that could reveal
What life had taught that chastened heart to feel
Might speak indeed of woman's blighted years, 15
And wasted love, and vainly bitter tears!
But she had told her griefs to heaven alone,
And of the gentle saint no more was known
Than that she fled the world's cold breath, and made
A temple of the pine and chestnut shade, 20
Filling its depths with soul, whene'er her hymn
Rose through each murmur of the green and dim
And ancient solitude; where hidden streams
Went moaning through the grass like sounds in dreams,
Music for weary hearts! Midst leaves and flowers 25
She dwelt, and knew all secrets of their powers,
All nature's balms, wherewith her gliding tread
To the sick peasant on his lowly bed
Came and brought hope; while scarce of mortal birth
He deemed the pale fair form, that held on earth 30
Communion but with grief.

Erelong a cell,

A rock-hewn chapel rose, a cross of stone
 Gleamed through the dark trees o'er a sparkling well,
 And a sweet voice of rich yet mournful tone
 Told the Calabrian wilds that duly there 35
 Costanza lifted her sad heart in prayer.
 And now 'twas prayer's own hour. That voice again
 Through the dim foliage sent its heavenly strain
 That made the cypress quiver where it stood
 In day's last crimson soaring from the wood 40
 Like spiry flame. But as the bright sun set,
 Other and wilder sounds in tumult met
 The floating song. Strange sounds! The trumpet's peal
 Made hollow by the rocks, the clash of steel,
 The rallying war-cry. In the mountain-pass 45
 There had been combat; blood was on the grass;
 Banners had strewn the waters; chiefs lay dying,
 And the pine-branches crashed before the flying.
 And all was changed within the still retreat,
 Costanza's home – there entered hurrying feet, 50
 Dark looks of shame and sorrow; mail-clad men,
 Stern fugitives from that wild battle-glen,
 Scaring the ringdoves from the porch-roof, bore
 A wounded warrior in. The rocky floor
 Gave back deep echoes to his clanging sword 55
 As there they laid their leader and implored
 The sweet saint's prayers to heal him; then for flight,
 Through the wide forest and the mantling night,
 Sped breathlessly again. They passed – but he,
 The stateliest of a host – alas, to see 60
 What mother's eyes have watched in rosy sleep
 Till joy, for very fullness, turned to weep,
 Thus changed – a fearful thing! His golden crest
 Was shivered, and the bright scarf on his breast
 (Some costly love-gift) rent – but what of these? 65
 There were the clustering raven-locks – the breeze

As it came in through lime and myrtle flowers
Might scarcely lift them – steeped in bloody showers
So heavily upon the pallid clay
Of the damp cheek they hung! The eyes’ dark ray, 70
Where was it? And the lips – they gasped apart
With their light curve, as from the chisel’s art,
Still proudly beautiful! But that white hue –
Was it not death’s? That stillness, that cold dew
On the scarred forehead? No! His spirit broke 75
From its deep trance erelong, yet but awoke
To wander in wild dreams, and there he lay,
By the fierce fever as a green reed shaken,
The haughty chief of thousands, the forsaken
Of all save one! She fled not. Day by day 80
(Such hours are woman’s birthright), she, unknown,
Kept watch beside him, fearless and alone,
Binding his wounds, and oft in silence laving
His brow with tears that mourned the strong man’s raving.
He felt them not, nor marked the light veiled form 85
Still hovering nigh, yet sometimes when that storm
 Of frenzy sank, her voice, in tones as low
As a young mother’s by the cradle singing,
Would soothe him with sweet aves, gently bringing Moments of slumber, when the fiery glow 90
Ebbd from his hollow cheek.
 At last faint gleams
Of memory dawned upon the cloud of dreams,
And feebly lifting, as a child, his head,
And gazing round him from his leafy bed,
He murmured forth, ‘Where am I? What soft strain 95
Passed like a breeze across my burning brain?
Back from my youth it floated, with a tone
Of life’s first music, and a thought of one –
Where is she now? And where the gauds of pride³
Whose hollow splendour lured me from her side? 100

All lost – and this is death! I cannot die
Without forgiveness from that mournful eye!
Away – the earth hath lost her! Was she born
To brook abandonment, to strive with scorn?
My first, my holiest love! Her broken heart 105
Lies low, and I – unpardoned, I depart.’

But then Costanza raised the shadowy veil
From her dark locks and features brightly pale,
And stood before him with a smile – oh, ne’er
Did aught that smiled so much of sadness wear – 110
And said, ‘Cesario, look on me; I live
To say my heart hath bled, and can forgive.
I loved thee with such worship, such deep trust
As should be Heaven’s alone – and Heaven is just!
I bless thee – be at peace!’

But o’er his frame 115
Too fast the strong tide rushed – the sudden shame,
The joy, th’ amaze! He bowed his head – it fell
On the wronged bosom which had loved so well,
And love still perfect gave him refuge there –
His last faint breath just waved her floating hair. 120

³ gauds of pride medals.

Madeline, a Domestic Tale¹

*Who should it be? Where shouldst thou look for kindness?
When we are sick where can we turn for succour?*

*When we are wretched where can we complain?
And when the world looks cold and surly on us,
Where can we go to meet a warmer eye
With such sure confidence as to a mother?*

(Joanna Baillie)²

‘My child, my child, thou leav’st me! I shall hear
The gentle voice no more that blessed mine ear
With its first utterance; I shall miss the sound
Of thy light step amidst the flowers around,
And thy soft-breathing hymn at twilight’s close, 5
And thy ‘Goodnight’ at parting for repose.
Under the vine-leaves I shall sit alone,
And the low breeze will have a mournful tone
Amidst their tendrils, while I think of thee,
My child; and thou, along the moonlight sea, 10
With a soft sadness haply in thy glance,
Shalt watch thine own, thy pleasant land of France,
Fading to air. Yet blessings with thee go;
Love guard thee, gentlest, and the exile’s woe
From thy young heart be far! And sorrow not 15
For me, sweet daughter; in my lonely lot
God shall be with me. Now farewell, farewell!
Thou that hast been what words may never tell
Unto thy mother’s bosom, since the days
When thou wert pillowed there, and wont to raise 20
In sudden laughter thence thy loving eye
That still sought mine – those moments are gone by,
Thou too must go, my flower! Yet with thee dwell
The peace of God! One, one more gaze – farewell!’
This was a mother’s parting with her child, 25
A young meek bride on whom fair fortune smiled
And wooed her with a voice of love away
From childhood’s home; yet there, with fond delay,
She lingered on the threshold, heard the note
Of her caged bird through trellised rose-leaves float, 30

And fell upon her mother's neck and wept,
Whilst old remembrances that long had slept
Gushed o'er her soul, and many a vanished day,
As in one picture traced, before her lay.

But the farewell was said, and on the deep, 35
When its breast heaved in sunset's golden sleep,
With a calmed heart young Madeline erelong

Poured forth her own sweet solemn vesper song,³
Breathing of home; through stillness heard afar,
And duly rising with the first pale star, 40

That voice was on the waters, till at last
The sounding ocean-solitudes were passed
And the bright land was reached, the youthful world

That glows along the west.⁴ The sails were furled
In its clear sunshine, and the gentle bride 45
Looked on the home that promised hearts untried

A bower of bliss⁵ to come. Alas, we trace
The map of our own paths, and long ere years
With their dull steps the brilliant lines efface,
On sweeps the storm, and blots them out with tears. 50

That home was darkened soon: the summer breeze
Welcomed with death the wanderers from the seas,⁶
Death unto one, and anguish (how forlorn!)
To her that, widowed in her marriage-morn,
Sat in her voiceless dwelling, whence with him 55

Her bosom's first beloved, her friend and guide,
Joy had gone forth, and left the green earth dim,
As from the sun shut out on every side
By the close veil of misery! Oh, but ill,

When with rich hopes o'erfraught, the young high heart 60
Bears its first blow! It knows not yet the part
Which life will teach: to suffer and be still,
And with submissive love to count the flowers
Which yet are spared, and through the future hour

To send no busy dream! She had not learned 65
 Of sorrow till that hour, and therefore turned
 In weariness from life; then came th' unrest,
 The heart-sick yearning of the exile's breast,
 The haunting sounds of voices far away
 And household steps, until at last she lay 70
 On her lone couch of sickness, lost in dreams
 Of the gay vineyards and blue-rushing streams
 In her own sunny land, and murmuring oft
 Familiar names in accents wild yet soft
 To strangers round that bed, who knew not aught 75
 Of the deep spells wherewith each word was fraught.
 To strangers? Oh, could strangers raise the head
 Gently as hers was raised? Did strangers shed
 The kindly tears which bathed that feverish brow
 And wasted cheek with half-unconscious flow? 80
 Something was there that through the lingering night
 Outwatches patiently the taper's light,
 Something that faints not through the day's distress,
 That fears not toil, that knows not weariness –
 Love, true and perfect love! Whence came that power 85
 Uprearing through the storm the drooping flower?
 Whence? Who can ask? The wild delirium passed,
 And from her eyes the spirit looked at last
 Into her mother's face, and wakening knew
 The brow's calm grace, the hair's dear silvery hue, 90
 The kind sweet smile of old – and had she come,
 Thus in life's evening, from her distant home,
 To save her child? Ev'n so, nor yet in vain:
 In that young heart a light sprung up again,
 And lovely still, with so much love to give, 95
 Seemed this fair world, though faded; still to live
 Was not to pine forsaken. On the breast
 That rocked her childhood, sinking in soft rest,
 'Sweet mother, gentlest mother! Can it be?'
 The lorn one cried, 'and do I look on thee? 100

Take back thy wanderer from this fatal shore,⁷
Peace shall be ours beneath our vines once more.’

Madeline, a Domestic Tale

¹ ‘Originally published in the Literary Souvenir for 1828’ (Hemans’s note). The genre of the domestic tale attracted many female novelists and poets during the eighteenth century. Wordsworth’s Michael and The Brothers are well-known examples.

² Rayner IV ii 15–20. This is from the Countess Zaterloo’s speech to her son after she has removed her mask, revealing her identity.

³ vesper song evening song, a phrase used by Scott, Lady of the Lake iii st.23 7.

⁴ the youthful world / That glows along the west America or, possibly, Canada.

⁵ bower of bliss The phrase is borrowed from Spenser, Faerie Queene II i st. 51 9.

⁶ the summer breeze...the seas the wind was believed to carry disease.

⁷ this fatal shore probably a recollection of Wordsworth, ‘Laodamia’ 52, where Laodamia refers to the courage that took her husband Protesilaus to the ‘fatal shore’ of Troy.

The Queen of Prussia’s Tomb¹

This tomb is in the garden of Charlottenburgh, near Berlin. It was not without surprise that I came suddenly, among trees, upon a fair white Doric temple. I might, and should have deemed it a mere adornment of the grounds, but the cypress and the willow declare it a habitation of the dead. Upon a sarcophagus of white marble lay a sheet, and the outline of the human form was plainly visible beneath its folds. The person with me reverently turned it back and displayed the statue of his Queen. It is a portrait-statue recumbent, said to be a perfect resemblance – not as in death, but when she lived to bless and be blessed. Nothing can be more calm and kind than the expression of her features. The hands are folded on the bosom, the limbs are sufficiently crossed to show the repose of life. Here the King brings her children annually to offer garlands at her grave.² These hang in withered mournfulness above this living image of their departed mother.

Germany)³

*In sweet pride upon that insult keen
She smiled; then drooping mute and broken-hearted,
To the cold comfort of the grave departed.*

(Milman)⁴

It stands where northern willows weep,
A temple fair and lone;
Soft shadows o'er its marble sweep,
From cypress-branches⁵ thrown,
While silently around it spread, 5
Thou feel'st the presence of the dead.
And what within is richly shrined?
A sculptured woman's form,
Lovely in perfect rest reclined
As one beyond the storm – 10
Yet not of death but slumber lies

The solemn sweetness on those eyes.⁶
The folded hands, the calm pure face,
The mantle's quiet flow,
The gentle yet majestic grace 15
Throned on the matron brow;
These, in that scene of tender gloom,
With a still glory robe the tomb.

There stands an eagle at the feet
Of the fair image wrought; 20
A kingly emblem nor unmeet
To wake yet deeper thought;
She whose high heart finds rest below
Was royal in her birth and woe.

There are pale garlands hung above 25
Of dying scent and hue;
She was a mother – in her love
How sorrowfully true!
Oh, hallowed long be every leaf,
The records of her children’s grief! 30

She saw their birthright’s warrior-crown
Of olden glory spoiled,⁷
The standard of their sires borne down,
The shield’s bright blazon soiled;
She met the tempest meekly brave, 35
Then turned o’erwearied to the grave.⁸

She slumbered, but it came – it came,
Her land’s redeeming hour,⁹
With the glad shout and signal flame
Sent on from tower to tower!¹⁰ 40
Fast through the realm a spirit moved –
'Twas hers, the lofty and the loved.

Then was her name a note that rung
To rouse bold hearts from sleep,
Her memory as a banner flung 45
Forth by the Baltic deep;
Her grief, a bitter vial poured
To sanctify th’ avenger’s sword.

And the crowned eagle¹¹ spread again
His pinion to the sun, 50

And the strong land shook off its chain –
So was the triumph won!
But woe for earth, where sorrow's tone
Still blends with victory's – she was gone!¹²

The Queen of Prussia's Tomb

¹The tomb is that of Queen Louise of Mecklenburg-Strelitz (1776–1810), who is buried in the mausoleum in the palace park of Charlottenburg, a district in Berlin, which also contains the grave of her husband, Frederick William III of Prussia (1770–1840). Severely damaged in World War II, it is still to be seen. Although in modern terms Hemans's sympathy for Prussia may now seem odd, the Germans were at the time of writing recent allies of Britain in the fight against Napoleon. Louise had come to represent libertarian hopes and patriotic spirit, and her grave was a popular destination for pilgrims.

²Louise had no less than ten children.

³Joseph Moyle Sherer (1789–1869), traveller, published his Notes and Reflections During a Ramble in Germany in 1826. The passage to which Hemans refers is on pp. 391–5.

⁴Henry Hart Milman (1791–1868), Judicium Regale, An Ode 74–6. The poem describes a dream in which Napoleon, Queen Louise and others are judged. Milman was highly sympathetic to Louise; he was also a friend to Hemans, helping her revise The Vespers of Palermo for production on the London stage.

⁵*cypress-branches* symbolic of grief.

⁶The character of this monumental statue is that of the deepest serenity; the repose, however, of sleep – not the grave. See the description in Russell's Germany' (Hemans's note). Hemans refers to

John Russell, A Tour in Germany, and some of the Southern Provinces of the Austrian Empire (1824), pp. 263–4.

7 Louise accompanied her husband to the battlefield in the Jena campaign, when Prussia and its ally, Russia, attempted to repulse Napoleon, October 1806. The result was defeat for the Prussians; Napoleon entered Berlin on 25 October, and ten days later the Prussian rearguard capitulated.

8 Louise did not die immediately. She worked hard to maintain the alliance with Russia, and damaged her health in doing so; she died 18 July 1810.

9 Prussia began the fight back against Napoleon in 1813, with their allies – Russia, Austria and Britain. Napoleon’s final defeat came with abdication on 22 June 1815, after the Battle of Waterloo.

10 Before telephones or indeed telegraphs, the most rapid means of communication was the chain of beacons (or, as here, towers) that stretched across the country, on hills, in which fires could be lit so as to signal important events.

11 the crowned eagle symbol of Prussia.

The Memorial Pillar

On the roadside between Penrith and Appleby stands a small pillar with this inscription: ‘This pillar was erected in the year 1656 by Ann, Countess Dowager of Pembroke, for a memorial of her last parting, in this place, with her good and pious mother, Margaret, Countess Dowager of Cumberland, on 2 April 1616’. See notes to the Pleasures of Memory.1

*Hast thou, through Eden's wildwood vales, pursued
Each mountain-scene, magnificently rude,
Nor with attention's lifted eye, revered
That modest stone, by pious Pembroke reared,
Which still records, beyond the pencil's power,
The silent sorrows of a parting hour?*

(Rogers)²

Mother and child, whose blending tears
Have sanctified the place,
Where, to the love of many years,
Was given one last embrace,
Oh ye have shrined³ a spell of power, 5
Deep in your record of that hour!

A spell to waken solemn thought,
A still small undertone⁴
That calls back days of childhood fraught
With many a treasure gone, 10
And smites, perchance, the hidden source
(Though long untroubled) of remorse.

For who that gazes on the stone
Which marks your parting spot,
Who but a mother's love hath known, 15
The one love changing not?
Alas, and haply learned its worth
First with the sound of 'earth to earth?'

But thou, high-hearted daughter, thou
O'er whose bright honoured head 20
Blessings and tears of holiest flow
Ev'n here were fondly shed –
Thou from the passion of thy grief,
In its full burst, couldst draw relief.

For oh, though painful be th' excess, 25
 The might wherewith it swells,
In nature's fount no bitterness
 Of nature's mingling dwells;
And thou hadst not, by wrong or pride,
Poisoned the free and healthful tide. 30

But didst thou meet the face no more
 Which thy young heart first knew?
And all – was all in this world o'er,
 With ties thus close and true?
It was! On earth no other eye 35
Could give thee back thine infancy.

No other voice could pierce the maze
 Where deep within thy breast
The sounds and dreams of other days
 With memory lay at rest; 40
No other smile to thee could bring
A gladd'ning like the breath of spring.

Yet while thy place of weeping still
 Its lone memorial keeps,
While on thy name, midst wood and hill, 45
 The quiet sunshine sleeps
And touches in each graven line
Of reverential thought a sign,

Can I, while yet these tokens wear
 The impress of the dead, 50
Think of the love embodied there,
 As of a vision fled?
A perished thing, the joy and flower
And glory of one earthly hour?⁵

Not so; I will not bow me so 55
 To thoughts that breathe despair!
A loftier faith we need below,

Life's farewell words to bear.
Mother and child, your tears are past –
Surely your hearts have met at last! 60

The Memorial Pillar

² The Pleasures of Memory ii 173–4, 177–80. The River Eden flows through Cumbria.

³ shrined enshrined.

⁴ A still small undertone Hemans echoes 1 Kings 19:12: 'And after the earthquake a fire; but the Lord was not in the fire: and after the fire a still small voice.'

⁵ joy and flower...hour an echo of Wordsworth, Ode 180–1: 'Though nothing can bring back the hour / Of splendour in the grass, of glory in the flower.'

The Grave of a Poetess¹

Ne me plaignez pas – si vous saviez

*Combien de peines ce tombeau m'a épargnées!*²

I stood beside thy lowly grave,
Spring odours breathed around,
And music in the river-wave
Passed with a lulling sound.

All happy things that love the sun³ 5
In the bright air glanced by,
And a glad murmur seemed to run
Through the soft azure sky.

Fresh leaves were on the ivy-bough
That fringed the ruins near; 10
Young voices were abroad, but thou
Their sweetness couldst not hear.

And mournful grew my heart for thee,
Thou in whose woman's mind
The ray that brightens earth and sea, 15
The light of song was shrined;⁴

Mournful that thou wert slumbering low
With a dread curtain drawn
Between thee and the golden glow
Of this world's vernal dawn. 20

Parted from all the song and bloom
Thou wouldst have loved so well,
To thee the sunshine round thy tomb
Was but a broken spell.

The bird, the insect on the wing, 25
In their bright reckless play,
Might feel the flush and life of spring,
And thou wert passed away!

But then, ev'n then, a nobler thought
O'er my vain sadness came; 30

Th' immortal spirit woke, and wrought
Within my thrilling frame.

Surely on lovelier things, I said,
Thou must have looked ere now,
Than all that round our pathway shed 35
Odours and hues below,

The shadows of the tomb are here,
Yet beautiful is earth!
What seest thou then where no dim fear,
No haunting dream hath birth? 40

Here a vain love to passing flowers
Thou gav'st, but where thou art
The sway is not with changeful hours –
There love and death must part.

Thou hast left sorrow in thy song, 45
A voice not loud, but deep!
The glorious bowers of earth among,
How often didst thou weep!

Where couldst thou fix on mortal ground
Thy tender thoughts and high? 50
Now peace the woman's heart hath found,
And joy the poet's eye.

The Grave of a Poetess

¹ 'Extrinsic interest has lately attached to the fine scenery of Woodstock, near Kilkenny, on account of its having been the last residence of the author of Psyche [Mary Tighe]. Her grave is one of many in the churchyard of the village. The river runs smoothly by. The ruins of an ancient abbey that have been partially converted into a church reverently throw their mantle of tender shadow over it. (Tales by the O'Hara Family)' (Hemans's note). John Banim (1798–1842) and Michael Banim (1796–1874) published Tales by the O'Hara Family in 1825–7. Felicia managed to visit Mary Tighe’s grave only in April 1831, when she described it as follows: ‘We went to the tomb, “the grave of a poetess”, where there is a monument by Flaxman. It consists of a recumbent female figure, with much of the repose, the mysterious sweetness of happy death, which is to me so affecting in monumental sculpture. There is, however, a very small Titania-looking sort of figure with wings, sitting at the head of the sleeper, which I thought interfered with the singleness of effect which the tomb would have produced. Unfortunately, too, the monument is carved in very rough stone, which allows no delicacy of touch. That place of rest made me very thoughtful; I could not but reflect on the many changes which had brought me to the spot I had commemorated three years since, without the slightest idea of ever visiting it; and, though surrounded by attention and the appearance of interest, my heart was envying the repose of her who slept there’ (The Works of Mrs Hemans (7 vols, Edinburgh and London, 1839), i 238–9).

2 ‘Don’t pity me; if only you knew how much suffering this tomb has spared me!’ From Madame de Staël, Corinne, ou L’Italie (1807), Book 18, chapter 3, last paragraph. Corinne is in a graveyard in Florence and is reading an epitaph. It is worth adding that Corinne was one of Hemans’s favourite novels; she said that ‘it has a power over me that is quite indescribable. Some passages seem to give me back my own thoughts and feelings, my whole inner being, with a mirror more true than ever friend could hold up’ (Works (1839) i 160).

3 All happy things that love the sun an echo of Wordsworth, Resolution and Independence 8: ‘All things that love the sun are out of doors.’

4 shrined enshrined.

The Homes of England 1

Miscellaneous Pieces* (1828)

*Where's the coward that would not dare
To fight for such a land?*

*(Marmion)*²

The stately homes of England,
How beautiful they stand!
Amidst their tall ancestral trees,
O'er all the pleasant land.
The deer across their greensward bound 5
Through shade and sunny gleam,
And the swan glides past them with the sound
Of some rejoicing stream.

The merry homes of England!
Around their hearths by night, 10
What gladsome looks of household love
Meet in the ruddy light!
There woman's voice flows forth in song
Or childhood's tale is told,
Or lips move tunefully along 15
Some glorious page of old.

The blessed homes of England!
How softly on their bowers
Is laid the holy quietness
That breathes from Sabbath hours! 20
Solemn yet sweet, the church-bell's chime
Floats through their woods at morn;
All other sounds, in that still time,
Of breeze and leaf are born.

The cottage homes of England! 25
By thousands on her plains,
They are smiling o'er the silvery brooks
And round the hamlet fanes.³
Through glowing orchards forth they peep,
Each from its nook of leaves, 30

And fearless there the lowly sleep,
As the bird beneath their eaves.

The free, fair homes of England!
Long, long, in hut and hall,
May hearts of native proof be reared 35
To guard each hallowed wall!
And green for ever be the groves
And bright the flowery sod,
Where first the child's glad spirit loves
Its country and its God!⁴ 40

The Homes of England

¹ For extended discussion see Fiona Stafford, Starting Lines in Scottish, Irish, and English Poetry: From Burns to Heaney (Oxford, 2000), chapter 5.

² Walter Scott (1771–1832), Marmion (1808), iv st. 30 34–5. It may be significant, in view of the uncertainty over Hemans's intentions for this poem (see preceding note), that these lines are completely unironic. They are spoken by Fitz-Eustace as he and Marmion see the Scots army massing across the landscape of Scotland.

³ *fan*es churches.

⁴ 'Originally published in Blackwood's Magazine' (Hemans's note). The poem first appeared in Blackwood's, April 1827. In view of the uncertainty over its interpretation (see note 1, above), it is worth noting that readers of Blackwood's would not have been inclined to read the poem ironically.

The Sicilian Captive

*I have dreamt thou wert
A captive in thy hopelessness; afar
From the sweet home of thy young infancy,
Whose image unto thee is as a dream
Of fire and slaughter; I can see thee wasting,
Sick for thy native air. (L.E.L.)¹*

The champions had come from their fields of war,
Over the crests of the billows far,
They had brought back the spoils of a hundred shores,
Where the deep had foamed to their flashing oars.

They sat at their feast round the Norse-king's board; 5
By the glare of the torch-light the mead was pour'd;
The hearth was heaped with the pine-boughs high,
And it flung a red radiance on shields thrown by.

The Scalds² had chaunted in Runic rhyme, 10
Their songs of the Sword and the olden time,
And a solemn thrill, as the harp-chords rung,
Had breathed from the walls where the bright spears hung.

But the swell was gone from the quivering string,
They had summoned a softer voice to sing,
And a captive girl, at the warriors' call, 15
Stood forth in the midst of that frowning hall.

Lonely she stood: in her mournful eyes
Lay the clear midnight of southern skies,
And the drooping fringe of their lashes low,
Half-veiled a depth of unfathomed woe. 20

Stately she stood, though her fragile frame
Seemed struck with the blight of some inward flame,
And her proud pale brow had a shade of scorn,
Under the waves of her dark hair worn.

And a deep flush passed, like a crimson haze, 25
O'er her marble cheek by the pine-fire's blaze;
No soft hue caught from the south-wind's breath,
But a token of fever, at strife with death.

She had been torn from her home away,
With her long locks crowned for her bridal day, 30
And brought to die of the burning dreams
That haunt the exile by foreign streams.

They bade her sing of her distant land –
She held its lyre with a trembling hand,
Till the spirit its blue skies had given her, woke, 35
And the stream of her voice into music broke.

Faint was the strain, in its first wild flow;
Troubled its murmur, and sad, and low;
But it swelled into deeper power ere long,
As the breeze that swept over her soul grew strong. 40

They bid me sing of thee, mine own, my sunny land! of thee!
Am I not parted from thy shores by the mournful-sounding sea?
Doth not thy shadow wrap my soul? In silence let me die,
In a voiceless dream of thy silvery founts, and thy pure, deep sapphire sky;
How should thy lyre give here its wealth of buried sweetness forth?
45

Its tones of summer's breathings born, to the wild winds of the north?
Yet thus it shall be once, once more! – my spirit shall awake,
And through the mists of death shine out, my country, for thy sake!
That I may make thee known, with all the beauty and the light,
And the glory never more to bless thy daughter's yearning sight!
50

Thy woods shall whisper in my song, thy bright streams warble by,
Thy soul flow o'er my lips again – yet once, my Sicily!
There are blue heavens – far hence, far hence! but oh! their glorious blue!

Its very night is beautiful, with the hyacinth's deep hue!
It is above my own fair land, and round my laughing home, 55

And arching o'er my vintage-hills, they hang their cloudless dome;
And making all the waves as gems, that melt along the shore,
And steeping happy hearts in joy – that now is mine no more.
And there are haunts in that green land – oh! who may dream or tell,
Of all the shaded loveliness it hides in grot and dell! 60
By fountains flinging rainbow-spray on dark and glossy leaves,
And bowers wherein the forest-dove her nest untroubled weaves;
The myrtle dwells there, sending round the richness of its breath,
And the violets gleam like amethysts, from the dewy moss beneath.

And there are floating sounds that fill the skies through night and day, 65
Sweet sounds! the soul to hear them faints in dreams of heaven away!
They wander through the olive-woods, and o'er the shining seas,
They mingle with the orange-scents that load the sleepy breeze;
Lute, voice, and bird, are blending there; it were a bliss to die,
As dies a leaf, thy groves among, my flowery Sicily! 70

I may not thus depart – farewell! yet no, my country! no!
Is not love stronger than the grave? I feel it must be so!
My fleeting spirit shall o'ersweep the mountains and the main,
And in thy tender starlight rove, and through thy woods again.
Its passion deepens – it prevails! – I break my chain – I come 75
To dwell a viewless thing, yet blest – in thy sweet air, my home!

And her pale arms dropped the ringing lyre,
There came a mist o'er her eye's wild fire,
And her dark rich tresses, in many a fold,
Loosed from their braids, down her bosom rolled. 80

For her head sank back on the rugged wall,
A silence fell o'er the warriors' hall;
She had poured out her soul with her song's last tone;
The lyre was broken, the minstrel gone!

To Wordsworth¹

Thine is a strain to read among the hills,
The old and full of voices; by the source
Of some free stream, whose gladdening presence fills
The solitude with sound, for in its course
Even such is thy deep song, that seems a part 5
Of those high scenes, a fountain from their heart.

Or its calm spirit fitly may be taken
To the still breast in sunny garden bowers,
Where vernal winds each tree's low tones awaken,
And bud and bell with changes mark the hours. 10
There let thy thoughts be with me, while the day
Sinks with a golden and serene decay.

Or by some hearth where happy faces meet,
When night hath hushed the woods with all their birds,
There, from some gentle voice, that lay were sweet 15
As antique music, linked with household words,
While, in pleased murmurs, woman's lip might move,
And the raised eye of childhood shine in love.

Or where the shadows of dark solemn yews
Brood silently o'er some lone burial-ground, 20
Thy verse hath power that brightly might diffuse
A breath, a kindling as of spring, around
From its own glow of hope and courage high,
And steadfast faith's victorious constancy.

True bard, and holy! Thou art ev'n as one 25
Who, by some secret gift of soul or eye,
In every spot beneath the smiling sun,
Sees where the springs of living waters lie;
Unseen awhile they sleep – till, touched by thee,
Bright healthful waves flow forth to each glad wanderer free. 30

To Wordsworth

¹ Hemans was both an admirer and a friend of Wordsworth, whom she visited in the Lakes, and with whom she maintained a friendly correspondence; see headnote, p. 1293. This poem was inspired by Wordsworth's Miscellaneous Poems (1820), lent to Hemans by Maria Jane Jewsbury, a mutual friend. As Hemans told her, 'I ... really studied these poems, and they have been the daily food of my mind ever since I borrowed them.... This author is the true Poet of Home, and of all the lofty feelings which have their root in the soil of home affections' (Felicia Hemans: Selected Poems, Letters, Reception Materials ed. Susan J. Wolfson (Princeton, 2000), p. 492).

The Spirit's Mysteries

*And slight, withal, may be the things which bring Back on the heart the weight which it would fling
Aside for ever; it may be a sound –
A tone of music – summer's breath, or spring –
A flower – a leaf – the ocean – which may wound –
Striking th' electric chain wherewith we are darkly bound.*
(Childe Harold)¹

The power that dwelleth in sweet sounds to waken
Vague yearnings, like the sailor's for the shore,
And dim remembrances, whose hue seems taken
From some bright former state, our own no more –

Is not this all a mystery? Who shall say 5
Whence are those thoughts, and whither tends their way?

The sudden images of vanished things
That o'er the spirit flash, we know not why;
Tones from some broken harp's deserted strings,
Warm sunset hues of summers long gone by, 10
A rippling wave – the dashing of an oar –
A flower scent floating past our parents' door;

A word scarce noted in its hour perchance,
Yet back returning with a plaintive tone;
A smile – a sunny or a mournful glance, 15
Full of sweet meanings now from this world flown –
Are not these mysteries when to life they start,
And press vain tears in gushes from the heart?

And the far wanderings of the soul in dreams,
Calling up shrouded faces from the dead, 20
And with them bringing soft or solemn gleams,
Familiar objects brightly to o'erspread,
And wakening buried love, or joy, or fear:
These are night's mysteries – who shall make them clear?

And the strange inborn sense of coming ill 25
That oftentimes whispers to the haunted breast
In a low tone which nought can drown or still,
Midst feasts and melodies a secret guest;
Whence doth that murmur wake, that shadow fall?
Why shakes the spirit thus? 'Tis mystery all! 30

Darkly we move – we press upon the brink
Haply of viewless² worlds, and know it not;
Yes, it may be that nearer than we think
Are those whom death has parted from our lot!
Fearfully, wondrously, our souls are made – 35
Let us walk humbly on,³ but undismayed!

Humbly – for knowledge strives in vain to feel
Her way amidst these marvels of the mind –
Yet undismayed; for do they not reveal
Th’ immortal being with our dust entwined? 40
So let us deem, and e’en the tears they wake
Shall then be blessed, for that high nature’s sake!

The Graves of a Household ¹

They grew in beauty, side by side,
They filled one home with glee;
Their graves are severed far and wide,
By mount and stream and sea.

The same fond mother bent at night 5
O’er each fair sleeping brow;
She had each folded flower in sight –
Where are those dreamers now?

One midst the forests of the west²
By a dark stream is laid – 10
The Indian knows his place of rest
Far in the cedar shade.

The sea, the blue lone sea hath one,
He lies where pearls lie deep;

He was the loved of all, yet none 15
O'er his low bed may weep.

One sleeps where southern vines are dressed
Above the noble slain;
He wrapped his colours round his breast
*On a blood-red field of Spain.*³ 20

And one – o'er her the myrtle showers
Its leaves, by soft winds fanned;
She faded midst Italian flowers,
The last of that bright band.

And parted thus they rest, who played 25
Beneath the same green tree;
Whose voices mingled as they prayed
*Around one parent knee!*⁴

They that with smiles lit up the hall
And cheered with song the hearth – 30
*Alas, for love, if thou wert all,*
And nought beyond, oh earth!

The Graves of a Household

¹ In its preoccupation with the dispersal of siblings and use of the ballad stanza, this poem bears comparison with Wordsworth's 'We Are Seven', Wolfson suggests.

² Hemans was thinking in this stanza of her brother Claude Scott Browne, one year younger than her, who died in Kingston, Canada, in 1821.

³ Spain Hemans's husband and two of her brothers served in the Peninsular Wars in Spain.

The Land of Dreams

From Songs of the Affections, with Other Poems (1830)

*And dreams, in their development, have breath
And tears, and tortures, and the touch of joy;
They leave a weight upon our waking thoughts...
They make us what we were not – what they will,
And shake us with the vision that's gone by...¹*

Oh spirit land, thou land of dreams!
A world thou art of mysterious gleams,
Of startling voices, and sounds at strife –
A world of the dead in the hues of life.

Like a wizard's magic-glass thou art 5
When the wavy shadows float by, and part –
Visions of aspects, now loved, now strange,
Glimmering and mingling in ceaseless change.

Thou art like a city of the past
With its gorgeous halls into fragments cast, 10
Amidst whose ruins there glide and play
Familiar forms of the world's today.

Thou art like the depths where the seas have birth,
Rich with the wealth that is lost from earth –
All the sere flowers of our days gone by, 15
And the buried gems in thy bosom lie.

Yes, thou art like those dim sea-caves,
A realm of treasures, a realm of graves!
And the shapes through thy mysteries that come and go,
Are of beauty and terror, of power and woe. 20

But for me, oh thou picture-land of sleep,
Thou art all one world of affections deep –
And wrung from my heart is each flushing dye
That sweeps o'er thy chambers of imagery.

And thy bowers are fair – even as Eden fair; 25
All the beloved of my soul are there!
The forms my spirit most pines to see,
The eyes whose love hath been life to me –

They are there, and each blessed voice I hear,
Kindly, and joyous, and silvery clear; 30
But undertones are in each, that say,
'It is but a dream; it will melt away!'

I walk with sweet friends in the sunset's glow;
I listen to music of long ago;
But one thought, like an omen, breathes faint through the lay –
35

'It is but a dream; it will melt away!'

I sit by the hearth of my early days;
All the home-faces are met by the blaze,
And the eyes of the mother shine soft, yet say,
'It is but a dream; it will melt away!' 40

And away, like a flower's passing breath, 'tis gone,
And I wake more sadly, more deeply lone –
Oh, a haunted heart is a weight to bear!
Bright faces, kind voices, where are ye, where?

Shadow not forth, oh thou land of dreams, 45
The past, as it fled by my own blue streams!
Make not my spirit within me burn
For the scenes and the hours that may ne'er return!

Call out from the future thy visions bright,
From the world o'er the grave, take thy solemn light, 50

And oh! with the loved, whom no more I see,
Show me my home as it yet may be!

As it yet may be in some purer sphere –
No cloud, no parting, no sleepless fear;
So my soul may bear on through the long, long day, 55
Till I go where the beautiful melts not away!

Nature's Farewell

From Songs of the Affections, with Other Poems (1830)

*The beautiful is vanished, and returns not.*¹

A youth rode forth from his childhood's home,
Through the crowded paths of the world to roam,
And the green leaves whispered as he passed:
'Wherefore, thou dreamer, away so fast?

Knew'st thou with what thou art parting here, 5
Long wouldst thou linger in doubt and fear;
Thy heart's light laughter, thy sunny hours,
Thou hast left in our shades with the spring's wild-flowers.

Under the arch by our mingling made,
Thou and thy brother have gaily played; 10
Ye may meet again where ye roved of yore,
But as ye have met there – oh, never more!

On rode the youth – and the boughs among,
Thus the free birds o'er his pathway sung:
'Wherefore so fast unto life away? 15

Thou art leaving for ever thy joy in our lay!²

Thou mayst come to the summer woods again,
And thy heart have no echo to greet their strain;
Afar from the foliage its love will dwell –
A change must pass o'er thee – farewell, farewell! 20

On rode the youth, and the founts and streams
Thus mingled a voice with his joyous dreams:
'We have been thy playmates through many a day,
Wherefore thus leave us? Oh yet delay!

Listen but once to the sound of our mirth! 25
 For thee 'tis a melody passing from earth.³
 Never again wilt thou find in its flow
 The peace it could once on thy heart bestow.

 Thou wilt visit the scenes of thy childhood's glee
 With the breath of the world on thy spirit free; 30
 Passion and sorrow its depth will have stirred,
 And the singing of waters be vainly heard.

 Thou wilt bear in our gladsome laugh no part –
 What should it do for a burning heart?
 Thou wilt bring to the banks of our freshest rill 35
 Thirst which no fountain on earth may still.

 Farewell! When thou comest again to thine own,
 Thou wilt miss from our music its loveliest tone;
 Mournfully true is the tale we tell –
 Yet on, fiery dreamer! Farewell, farewell! 40

 And a something of gloom on his spirit weighed
 As he caught the last sounds of his native shade;
 But he knew not, till many a bright spell broke,
 How deep were the oracles nature spoke!

Nature's Farewell

² lay song.

³ 'tis a melody passing from earth an echo of Wordsworth, 'Ode' 18:
 'there hath passed away a glory from the earth.'

Second Sight

From Songs of the Affections, with Other Poems (1830)

*Ne'er erred the prophet heart that grief inspired,
Though joy's illusions mock their votarist.*

(Maturin)¹

A mournful gift is mine, oh friends,
A mournful gift is mine!
A murmur of the soul which blends
With the flow of song and wine.

An eye that through the triumph's hour 5
Beholds the coming woe,
And dwells upon the faded flower
Midst the rich summer's glow.

Ye smile to view fair faces bloom
Where the father's board is spread; 10
I see the stillness and the gloom
Of a home whence all are fled.

I see the withered garlands lie
Forsaken on the earth,
While the lamps yet burn and the dancers fly 15
Through the ringing hall of mirth.

I see the blood-red future stain
On the warrior's gorgeous crest,
And the bier amidst the bridal train
When they come with roses dressed. 20

I hear the still small moan of time²
Through the ivy branches made,
Where the palace in its glory's prime
With the sunshine stands arrayed.

The thunder of the seas I hear, 25
The shriek along the wave,
When the bark sweeps forth, and song and cheer
Salute the parting brave.

With every breeze a spirit sends
To me some warning sign – 30
A mournful gift is mine, oh friends,
A mournful gift is mine!

Oh, prophet heart, thy grief, thy power
To all deep souls belong;
The shadow in the sunny hour, 35
The wail in the mirthful song.

Their sight is all too sadly clear –
For them a veil is riven;
Their piercing thoughts repose not here,
Their home is but in heaven. 40

Despondency and Aspiration¹ (composed November 1834)

From The Works of Mrs Hemans (1839)

*Per correr miglior acqua alza le vele,
Omai la navicella del mio intelletto.*²

(Dante)

My soul was mantled with dark shadows born
Of lonely fear, disquieted in vain;
Its phantoms hung around the star of morn,
A cloud-like weeping train;
Through the long day they dimmed the autumn gold 5
On all the glistening leaves, and wildly rolled,
When the last farewell flush of light was glowing
Across the sunset sky,
O'er its rich isles of vaporous glory throwing
One melancholy dye. 10

And when the solemn night
Came rushing with her might
Of stormy oracles from caves unknown,
Then with each fitful blast
Prophetic murmurs passed, 15
Wakening or answering some deep sybil tone
Far buried in my breast, yet prompt to rise
With every gusty wail that o'er the wind-harp flies.

'Fold, fold thy wings', they cried, 'and strive no more,
Faint spirit, strive no more! For thee too strong 20
Are outward ill and wrong,
And inward wasting fires! Thou canst not soar
Free on a starry way
Beyond their blighting sway,
At Heaven's high gate serenely to adore! 25
How shouldst thou hope earth's fetters to unbind?
Oh passionate yet weak, oh trembler to the wind!

Never shall aught but broken music flow
From joy of thine, deep love, or tearful woe;
Such homeless notes as through the forest sigh, 30

From the reeds hollow shaken
When sudden breezes waken
Their vague wild symphony:
No power is theirs, and no abiding-place
In human hearts; their sweetness leaves no trace – 35
Born only so to die!

Never shall aught but perfume, faint and vain,
On the fleet pinion of the changeful hour,
From thy bruised life again
A moment's essence breathe; 40
Thy life, whose trampled flower
Into the blessed wreath

Of household charities³ no longer bound,
Lies pale and withering on the barren ground.

So fade, fade on! Thy gift of love shall cling, 45
A coiling sadness round thy heart and brain,
A silent, fruitless, yet undying thing
All sensitive to pain!

And still the shadow of vain dreams shall fall
O'er thy mind's world, a daily darkening pall. 50
Fold, then, thy wounded wing, and sink subdued
In cold and unrepining quietude!

Then my soul yielded; spells of numbing breath
Crept o'er it heavy with a dew of death,
Its powers, like leaves before the night rain, closing; 55
And, as by conflict of wild sea-waves tossed
On the chill bosom of some desert coast,
Mutely and hopelessly I lay reposing.

When silently it seemed
As if a soft mist gleamed 60
Before my passive sight, and, slowly curling,
To many a shape and hue
Of visioned beauty grew,

Like a wrought banner, fold by fold unfurling.
 Oh, the rich scenes that o'er mine inward eye⁴ 65
 Unrolling then swept by
 With dreamy motion! Silvery seas were there
 Lit by large dazzling stars, and arched by skies
 Of southern midnight's most transparent dyes,
 And gemmed with many an island, wildly fair, 70
 Which floated past me into orient day
 Still gathering lustre on th' illumined way,
 Till its high groves of wondrous flowering trees
 Coloured the silvery seas.

And then a glorious mountain-chain uprose, 75
 Height above spiry height!
 A soaring solitude of woods and snows
 All steeped in golden light!
 While as it passed, those regal peaks unveiling,
 I heard, methought, a waving of dread wings 80
 And mighty sounds, as if the vision hailing,
 From lyres that quivered through ten thousand strings;
 Or as if waters forth to music leaping,
 From many a cave, the Alpine Echo's hall,
 On their bold way victoriously were sweeping, 85
 Linked in majestic anthems, while through all
 That billowy swell and fall
 Voices, like ringing crystal, filled the air
 With inarticulate melody that stirred
 My being's core, then, moulding into word 90
 Their piercing sweetness, bade me rise and bear
 In that great choral strain my trembling part
 Of tones, by love and faith struck from a human heart.

Return no more, vain bodings of the night!
 A happier oracle within my soul 95
 Hath swelled to power – a clear unwavering light
 Mounts through the battling clouds that round me roll,

And to a new control
Nature's full harp gives forth rejoicing tones,
Wherein my glad sense owns 100
The accordant rush of elemental sound
To one consummate harmony profound,
One grand creation hymn
Whose notes the seraphim
Lift to the glorious height of music winged and crowned. 105

Shall not those notes find echoes in my lyre,
Faithful though faint? Shall not my spirit's fire,
If slowly, yet unswervingly, ascend
Now to its fount and end?
Shall not my earthly love, all purified, 110
Shine forth a heavenward guide,
An angel of bright power, and strongly bear
My being upward into holier air,
Where fiery passion-clouds have no abode,
And the sky's temple-arch o'erflows with God? 115

The radiant hope new-born
Expands like rising morn
In my life's life and, as a ripening rose,
The crimson shadow of its glory throws
More vivid, hour by hour, on some pure stream, 120
So from that hope are spreading
Rich hues, o'er nature shedding,
Each day, a clearer, spiritual gleam.

Let not those rays fade from me – once enjoyed,
Father of spirits, let them not depart! 125
Leaving the chilled earth, without form and void,
Darkened by mine own heart!
Lift, aid, sustain me! Thou by whom alone
All lovely gifts and pure
In the soul's grasp endure; 130
Thou, to the steps of whose eternal throne

All knowledge flows – a sea for evermore
 Breaking its crested waves on that sole shore⁵ –
 Oh consecrate my life, that I may sing
 Of Thee with joy that hath a living spring 135
 In a full heart of music! Let my lays
 Through the resounding mountains waft thy praise,
 And with that theme the wood's green cloisters fill,
 And make their quivering leafy dimness thrill
 To the rich breeze of song! Oh let me wake 140
 The deep religion, which hath dwelt from yore,
 Silently brooding by lone cliff and lake,
 And wildest river shore,
 And let me summon all the voices dwelling
 Where eagles build, and caverned rills are welling, 145
 And where the cataract's organ-peal is swelling,
 In that one spirit gathered to adore!

Forgive, oh Father, if presumptuous thought
 Too daringly in aspiration rise!
 Let not thy child all vainly have been taught 150
 By weakness, and by wanderings, and by sighs
 Of sad confession! Lowly be my heart,
 And on its penitential altar spread
 The offerings worthless, till Thy grace impart
 The fire from heaven, whose touch alone can shed 155
 Life, radiance, virtue! Let that vital spark
 Pierce my whole being, wildered else and dark!

Thine are all holy things – oh make me Thine,
 So shall I, too, be pure – a living shrine
 Unto that spirit which goes forth from Thee, 160
 Strong and divinely free,
 Bearing thy gifts of wisdom on its flight,
 And brooding o'er them with a dove-like wing,⁶
 Till thought, word, song, to Thee in worship spring,
 Immortally endowed for liberty and light. 165

Thoughts During Sickness: II. Sickness Like Night (composed late 1834)

From The New Monthly Magazine (1835)

Thou art like night, oh sickness, deeply stilling
Within my heart the world’s disturbing sound,
And the dim quiet of my chamber filling
With low, sweet voices, by life’s tumult drowned.
Thou art like awful night! Thou gatherest round 5
The things that are unseen, though close they lie,
And with a truth, clear, startling, and profound,

Giv'st their dread presence to our mortal eye.
Thou art like starry, spiritual night!
High and immortal thoughts attend thy way, 10
And revelations, which the common light
Brings not, though wakening with its rosy ray
All outward life: be welcome, then, thy rod,
Before whose touch my soul unfolds itself to God!

John Gibson Lockhart (1794–1854)

A graduate of the University of Glasgow, Lockhart also attended Balliol College, Oxford, where he graduated in 1813. He became a lawyer in Edinburgh, but always nurtured literary ambitions, which found an outlet in Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine, of which he and John Wilson were appointed editors in 1817. The magazine had floundered under the editorship of James Cleghorn and Thomas Pringle; in Wilson and Lockhart, Blackwood saw two likely prospects who could rejuvenate it, for which he paid £500 a year (£20,000/US$36,500 today) to be divided between them.

His instincts were right. Blackwood's soon established itself as one of the most important magazines of the day in opposition to the Whiggish tendencies of Jeffrey's Edinburgh Review. 'Toryism is an innate principle o' human nature; Whiggism but an evil habit', says the Ettrick Shepherd (James Hogg) in the twenty-third episode of 'Noctes Ambrosianae'¹ in December 1825 – a political stance taken for granted from the outset. It could only be a matter of time before they targeted Leigh Hunt and his circle.

A former inmate of the Horsemonger Lane Gaol (where he was incarcerated for libelling the Prince Regent), still liberal in his politics, and now a poet as well as editor of The Examiner weekly newspaper, Hunt was a prominent cultural figure and political commentator – the ideal subject for Lockhart's envenomed pen.² And Lockhart was clever. Just as Jeffrey had used the idea that Wordsworth, Coleridge and Southey comprised a 'School' as a vehicle for criticizing their work en masse, so Lockhart realized that were he to place Hunt at the centre of a coterie, his criticisms might in future be applied to others whose politics he disliked. Those lumped with him as fellow members of the Cockney School would include Shelley (who wasn't a Londoner, but had contributed to The Examiner), Byron (co-editor of The Liberal with Hunt), Hazlitt (not a Londoner by birth, but certainly a denizen of the city, and a contributor to The Examiner), Lamb (a contributor to Hunt's journals The Reflector, The Examiner and The Indicator) and Keats.

Lockhart and Wilson's attacks were virulent and recurrent, spanning years. In the cases of Keats and Hazlitt, the Cockney label stuck, conditioning the reception accorded their work elsewhere. In a letter of late 1818 to John Murray, Lockhart and Wilson congratulated themselves on the fact that the articles on the Cockney School are little if at all more severe than those in the Quarterly Review, and that they give more offence to the objects of their severity, only on account of their superior keenness – above all that happy name which you and all the reviews are now borrowing – the Cockney School – a thorn which will stick to them and madden them and finally damn them.³

From the outset, Lockhart's chief ploy was to disguise his true motives by referring to as many non-political (or at least, politically neutral) factors as possible – personal (im)morality, literary (bad) taste, social climbing, lack of self-awareness and the like.

Every man is, according to Mr Hunt, a dull potato-eating blockhead – of no greater value to God or man than any ox or dray-horse – who is not an admirer of Voltaire’s romans, a worshipper of Lord Holland and Mr Haydon, and a quoter of *John Buncl*e and Chaucer’s Flower and Leaf. Every woman is useful only as a breeding machine, unless she is fond of reading Launcelot of the Lake, in an antique summer-house.⁴

How such a profligate creature as Mr Hunt can pretend to be an admirer of Mr Wordsworth, is to us a thing altogether inexplicable. One great charm of Wordsworth’s noble compositions consists in the dignified purity of thought, and the patriarchal simplicity of feeling, with which they are throughout penetrated and imbued. We can conceive a vicious man admiring with distant awe the spectacle of virtue and purity; but if he does so sincerely, he must also do so with the profoundest feeling of the error of his own ways, and the resolution to amend them. His admiration must be humble and silent, not pert and loquacious. Mr Hunt praises the purity of Wordsworth as if he himself were pure, his dignity as if he also were dignified.⁵

Although Lockhart appears to discuss everything except politics, this is nothing if not ideological. The adjectives used to describe Hunt – ‘profligate’, ‘vicious’ – are designed to appeal to the prejudices of Blackwood’s Tory readership; by contrast, Wordsworth’s ‘patriarchal’ simplicity of feeling elevates him to the same level as those whose fear of revolution led to the Peterloo Massacre.⁶ The paragraph enacts an anxiety of the age – that of patrician poet besieged by a dissolute and jumped-up member of the lower orders, clamouring for fame and wealth. Even Hunt’s worship of Lord Holland⁷ is motivated by the same self-interest, it is implied. All of which is confirmed by Lockhart’s attack on Hunt’s pantheon: Voltaire (French, and therefore renowned for licentiousness), Chaucer (whose work was full of ruderies), *John Buncl*e (the story of an amorous Unitarian) and Launcelot of the Lake (about a morally questionable liaison).

And why should The Flower and the Leaf be included – at the time thought to have been written by Chaucer, but now ascribed to an anonymous female poet of the last quarter of the fifteenth century? Because, months before, on 16 March 1817, The Examiner published Keats’s sonnet Written on a Blank Space at the end of Chaucer’s Tale of ‘The Floure and the Lefe’ under a brief introductory note: ‘The following exquisite Sonnet, as well as one or two others that have lately appeared under the same signature, is from the pen of the young poet (KEATS), who was mentioned not long since in this paper, and who may already lay true claim to that title: – “The youngest he, / That sits in shadow of Apollo’s tree.”’⁸ Mention of The Flower and the Leaf suggests that, as early as this first attack, Keats was in Lockhart’s sights. Such was Keats’s own interpretation when reporting it to his friend Benjamin Bailey on 3 November: ‘There has been a flaming attack upon Hunt in [Blackwood’s] Edinburgh Magazine – I never read anything so virulent – accusing him of the greatest crimes ... I have no doubt that the second Number was intended for me.’⁹ Even then, he realized that as the recipient of Hunt’s patronage he was in the firing line, and fretted that ‘I shall have the reputation of Hunt’s élève.’¹⁰

Hunt also objected, and in The Examiner for 16 November challenged ‘Z.’ (Lockhart’s pen-name) to ‘avow himself; which he cannot fail to do, unless to an utter disregard of all Truth and Decency, he adds the height of Meanness and COWARDICE.’¹¹ He published no less than three such demands, none of which was heeded.

Keats was correct to suppose that Lockhart would soon mount a similar assault on him. For the moment, however, Lockhart’s problem was that he did not have sufficient information: that would soon change. In July 1818, Bailey happened to meet Lockhart at his father-in-law’s house and had the unpleasant experience of hearing him attack Keats. His response was to tell him that Keats was of a respectable family; and though he and his brothers and sister were orphans, they were left with a small but independent patrimony. He had been brought up to the profession of medicine which he had abandoned for the pursuit of literature.¹²

Lockhart then promised Bailey that he would not criticize Keats in print – a promise which, even after Keats’s death, Bailey continued to believe. But he did not count on Lockhart’s duplicity. Far from dissuading him, Bailey had inadvertently provided him with precisely the ammunition he required.¹³ Lockhart went straight to his office and drafted the fourth of the Cockney School essays, which appeared in the next available issue of Blackwood’s, August 1818.¹⁴ His sneers at Keats’s lack of classical learning and social class could now be backed up by factual evidence. It was worse than Croker’s review of Endymion in the Quarterly (April 1818) which Shelley thought precipitated Keats’s demise (see p. 1249 n. 10). (Shelley apparently did not see Lockhart’s essay – he was in Italy when it appeared.)

Keats may have been disappointed by some of his reviews, but there is nothing to suggest that they seriously depressed him, or that they ruined his health. In a letter to his publisher of October 1818, he said that ‘My own domestic criticism has given me pain without comparison beyond what Blackwood or the Quarterly could possibly inflict.’¹⁵ His brother Tom was, at this point, seriously ill with tuberculosis, and that would have placed Lockhart’s article in its proper context. In correspondence, Keats took revenge by referring to ‘the ignorant malevolence of cold lying Scotchmen and stupid Englishmen’.¹⁶ And in a letter to George and Georgiana Keats on 19 February 1819, he remarked:

I have no doubt of success in a course of years if I persevere. But it must be patience, for the reviews have enervated and made indolent men’s minds; few think for themselves. These reviews too are getting more and more powerful and especially the Quarterly. They are like a superstition which, the more it prostrates the crowd, and the longer it continues, the more powerful it becomes just in proportion to their increasing weakness. (Rollins ii 65)

Keats’s friends and colleagues were not so relaxed, especially when they knew he was dying. John Taylor, his publisher, fulminated in a letter to James Hessey of August 1820:

Did they not speak of him in ridicule as ‘Johnny Keats’, describe his appearance while addressing a sonnet [to] Ailsa Crag, and compare him as a Friesland hen to Shelley as a bird of paradise?¹⁷ Besides, what can you say to that cold-blooded passage where they say they will take care he shall never get £50 again for a volume of his poems?¹⁸ What had he done to cause such attacks as these? ‘Oh, it was all a joke, the writer meant nothing more than to be witty; he certainly thought there was much affectation in his poetry, and he expressed his opinion only, it was done in the fair spirit of criticism.’ – It was done in the spirit of this Devil, Mr Blackwood. So, if a young man is guilty of affectation while he is walking the streets, it is fair in another person, because he dislikes it, to come and knock him down?...

I feel regard for Mr Keats as a man of real genius, a gentleman, nay more – as one of the gentlest of human beings. He does not resent these things himself, he merely says of his opponents, ‘They don’t know me’. Now, this mildness makes those who are his friends feel the more warmly when they see him ill-used.¹⁹

Taylor’s judgements, though influenced by his love of Keats, are compelling. Lockhart and Wilson were brief-less advocates with time on their hands – amateur journalists who despised paid hacks like Hazlitt and Hunt. As they saw it, they wrote from a position of social, economic and moral superiority as much as from one of political opposition. Furthermore, they were in the employ of a hard-nosed Edinburgh bookseller with ‘the instincts of the small-town bully, ready to force a passage and crush competition with his fists if necessary’.²⁰ And that was the ethos by which Blackwood’s journal was run. He encouraged Lockhart and Wilson to use spies to gather information about their victims, and to use their knowledge of the law to write articles that stopped short of what might be actionable in court. All the same, they were arrogant enough sometimes to overstep the mark. In August 1818 John Wilson was responsible for a scorching attack, ‘Hazlitt Cross-Questioned’, for which Hazlitt sued Blackwood. When it became clear that Hazlitt was likely to win, the case was settled out of court. More importantly, an attack on Blackwood’s by John Scott, the editor of the London Magazine (and friend of Hunt, Hazlitt, Lamb and De Quincey), led to his fighting a duel with Lockhart’s friend Jonathan Christie. He was fatally wounded, and died a painful and drawn-out death in February 1821. (Walter Scott, Lockhart’s father-in-law, often said to have been a restraining influence, commented: ‘It would be great hypocrisy in me to say I am sorry for John Scott. He has got exactly what he was long fishing for.’)²¹

It was proof, were any needed, that words can kill, particularly when wielded by those as reckless as Lockhart and Wilson. The fourth of the Cockney School attacks, directed at Keats, is typical. Given its obviously partisan nature, it is regrettable that it set the tone of much Keats criticism until well into the twentieth century. In the short term it depressed sales of his books to the extent that Taylor and Hessey were compelled to remainder Endymion. Had he not succumbed to tuberculosis, Keats would probably not have been able to live by his pen.

In Lockhart’s defence, it is often remarked that marriage and his illustrious father-in-law mellowed him – and that is probably true. His significance for students of the Romantic period, however, is less for Peter’s Letters to his Kinsfolk (1819, a study of Edinburgh life and letters) or his seven-volume Memoirs of the Life of Sir Walter Scott (1837–8), but for his reputation as ‘The Scorpion which delighteth to sting men’s faces’.

*Of Keats,
The muses' son of promise, and what feats
He yet may do, etc.*

(Cornelius Webb)¹

Of all the manias of this mad age, the most incurable, as well as the most common, seems to be no other than the metromanie.² The just celebrity of Robert Burns and Miss Baillie³ has had the melancholy effect of turning the heads of we know not how many farm-servants and unmarried ladies; our very footmen compose tragedies, and there is scarcely a superannuated governess in the island that does not leave a roll of lyrics behind her in her bandbox.⁴

To witness the disease of any human understanding, however feeble, is distressing – but the spectacle of an able mind reduced to a state of insanity is of course ten times more afflicting. It is with such sorrow as this that we have contemplated the case of Mr John Keats. This young man appears to have received from nature talents of an excellent, perhaps even of a superior order – talents which, devoted to the purposes of any useful profession, must have rendered him a respectable, if not an eminent citizen. His friends, we understand, destined him to the career of medicine, and he was bound apprentice some years ago to a worthy apothecary in town.⁵

But all has been undone by a sudden attack of the malady to which we have alluded. Whether Mr John had been sent home with a diuretic or composing draught⁶ to some patient far gone in the poetical mania, we have not heard. This much is certain: that he has caught the infection, and that thoroughly. For some time we were in hopes that he might get off with a violent fit or two, but of late the symptoms are terrible. The frenzy of the Poems was bad enough in its way,⁷ but it did not alarm us half so seriously as the calm, settled, imperturbable drivelling idiocy of Endymion.⁸ We hope, however, that in so young a person, and with a constitution originally so good, even now the disease is not utterly incurable. Time, firm treatment, and rational restraint, do much for many apparently hopeless invalids – and if Mr Keats should happen, at some interval of reason, to cast his eye upon our pages, he may perhaps be convinced of the existence of his malady, which in such cases is often all that is necessary to put the patient in a fair way of being cured.

The readers of the Examiner newspaper were informed, some time ago, by a solemn paragraph, in Mr Hunt's best style, of the appearance of two new stars of glorious magnitude and splendour in the poetical horizon of the land of Cockaigne.⁹ One of these turned out, by and by, to be no other than Mr John Keats. This precocious adulation confirmed the wavering apprentice in his desire to quit the gallipots, and at the same time excited in his too susceptible mind a fatal admiration for the character and talents of the most worthless and affected¹⁰ of all the versifiers of our time. One of his first productions was the following sonnet, 'written on the day when Mr Leigh Hunt left prison'. It will be recollected that the cause of Hunt's confinement was a series of libels against his sovereign, and that its fruit was the odious and incestuous Story of Rimini.¹¹

[Quotes all of Keats's 'Written on the Day that Mr Leigh Hunt left Prison' ('What though, for showing truth to flattered state'), published Poems

(1817). Lockhart italicizes the phrases ‘Kind Hunt’, ‘In Spenser’s walls’ and ‘With daring Milton’.]

The absurdity of the thought in this sonnet is, however, if possible, surpassed in another, ‘addressed to Haydon’¹² the painter – that clever but most affected artist, who as little resembles Raphael¹³ in genius as he does in person, notwithstanding the foppery of having his hair curled over his shoulders in the old Italian fashion. In this exquisite piece it will be observed that Mr Keats classes together Wordsworth, Hunt, and Haydon as the three greatest spirits of the age, and that he alludes to himself, and some others of the rising brood of Cockneys, as likely to attain hereafter an equally honourable elevation.¹⁴ Wordsworth and Hunt! What a juxtaposition! The purest, the loftiest, and, we do not fear to say it, the most classical of living English poets, joined together in the same compliment with the meanest, the filthiest, and the most vulgar of Cockney poetasters. No wonder that he who could be guilty of this should class Haydon with Raphael, and himself with Spenser.¹⁵

[Quotes ‘Addressed to Haydon’ (see p. 1397), italicizing ll. 5–6 and 13–15.]

The nations are to listen and be dumb! And why, good Johnny Keats? Because Leigh Hunt is editor of the Examiner, and Haydon has painted the judgement of Solomon,¹⁶ and you and Cornelius Webb, and a few more city sparks, are pleased to look upon yourselves as so many future Shakespeares and Miltons! The world has really some reason to look to its foundations! Here is a *tempesta in matulâ*¹⁷ with a vengeance. At the period when these sonnets were published, Mr Keats had no hesitation in saying that he looked on himself as ‘not yet a glorious denizen of the wide heaven of poetry’,¹⁸ but he had many fine soothing visions of coming greatness, and many rare plans of study to prepare him for it. The following we think is very pretty raving.

[Quotes ll. 98–121 of ‘Sleep and Poetry’.]

Having cooled a little from this ‘fine passion’, our youthful poet passes very naturally into a long strain of foaming abuse against a certain class of English poets, whom, with Pope at their head, it is much the fashion with the ignorant unsettled pretenders of the present time to undervalue.¹⁹ Begging these gentlemen's pardon, although Pope was not a poet of the same high order with some who are now living, yet, to deny his genius, is just about as absurd as to dispute that of Wordsworth, or to believe in that of Hunt. Above all things, it is pitiably ridiculous to hear men, of whom their country will always have reason to be proud, reviled by uneducated and flimsy striplings, who are not capable of understanding either merits, or those of any other men of power – fanciful dreaming tea-drinkers who, without logic enough to analyse a single idea, or imagination enough to form one original image, or learning enough to distinguish between the written language of Englishmen and the spoken jargon of Cockneys, presume to talk with contempt of some of the most exquisite spirits the world ever produced, merely because they did not happen to exert their faculties in laborious affected descriptions of flowers seen in window-pots, or cascades heard at Vauxhall;²⁰ in short, because they chose to be wits, philosophers, patriots, and poets, rather than to found the Cockney school of versification, morality, and politics, a century before its time. ...

So much for the opening bud; now for the expanded flower. It is time to pass from the juvenile Poems to the mature and elaborate Endymion: A Poetic Romance. The old story of the moon falling in love with a shepherd, so prettily told by a Roman classic,²¹ and so exquisitely enlarged and adorned by one of the most elegant of German poets,²² has been seized upon by Mr John Keats, to be done with as might seem good unto the sickly fancy of one who never read a single line either of Ovid or of Wieland. If the quantity, not the quality, of the verses dedicated to the story is to be taken into account, there can be no doubt that Mr John Keats may now claim Endymion entirely to himself.

To say the truth, we do not suppose either the Latin or the German poet would be very anxious to dispute about the property of the hero of the 'Poetic Romance'. Mr Keats has thoroughly appropriated the character, if not the name. His Endymion is not a Greek shepherd loved by a Grecian goddess; he is merely a young Cockney²³ rhymester dreaming a fantastic dream at the full of the moon. Costume, were it worthwhile to notice such a trifle, is violated in every page of this goodly octavo.²⁴ From his prototype Hunt,²⁵ John Keats has acquired a sort of vague idea that the Greeks were a most tasteful people, and that no mythology can be so finely adapted for the purposes of poetry as theirs. It is amusing to see what a hand the two Cockneys make of this mythology: the one confesses that he never read the Greek tragedians, and the other knows Homer only from Chapman²⁶ – and both of them write about Apollo, Pan, nymphs, muses and mysteries as might be expected from persons of their education. We shall not, however, enlarge at present upon this subject, as we mean to dedicate an entire paper to the classical attainments and attempts of the Cockney poets.

As for Mr Keats' Endymion, it has just as much to do with Greece as it has with 'old Tartary the fierce'.²⁷ No man whose mind has ever been imbued with the smallest knowledge or feeling of classical poetry or classical history, could have stooped to profane and vulgarize every association in the manner which has been adopted by this 'son of promise'. Before giving any extracts, we must inform our readers that this romance is meant to be written in English heroic rhyme. To those who have read any of Hunt's poems, this hint might indeed be needless; Mr Keats has adopted the loose, nerveless versification and Cockney rhymes of the poet of Rimini.²⁸ But in fairness to that gentleman, we must add that the defects of the system are tenfold more conspicuous in his disciple's work than in his own. Mr Hunt is a small poet, but he is a clever man. Mr Keats is a still smaller poet, and he is only a boy of pretty²⁹ abilities, which he has done everything in his power to spoil. ...

We had almost forgot to mention that Keats belongs to the Cockney School of Politics, as well as the Cockney School of Poetry.

It is fit that he who holds Rimini to be the first poem should believe *The Examiner*³⁰ to be the first politician of the day. We admire consistency, even in folly. Hear how their bantling³¹ has already learned to lisp sedition.

[Quotes Endymion iii 1–23.]

And now good morrow to 'the muses' son of promise'; as for 'the feats he yet may do', as we do not pretend to say, like himself, 'Muse of my native land am I inspired',³² we shall adhere to the safe old rule of pauca verba.³³ We venture to make one small prophecy: that his bookseller will not a second time venture £50 upon anything he can write.³⁴ It is a better and a wiser thing to be a starved apothecary than a starved poet; so back to the shop Mr John, back to 'plasters, pills, and ointment boxes',³⁵ etc. But for heaven's sake, young Sangrado,³⁶ be a little more sparing of extenuatives and soporifics³⁷ in your practice than you have been in your poetry.

¹ Probably from Cornelius 'Corny' Webb's 'Epistle to a Friend', sent to William Blackwood in September 1817, for publication. In addition, Webb sent three sonnets in manuscript, edited by Nicholas Roe, John Keats and the Culture of Dissent (Oxford, 1997), pp. 269–70. Webb's phrase, 'The muses' son of promise', was quoted in ridicule of Keats for years.

² metromanie mania for writing poetry.

⁴ bandbox cardboard box for caps, hats, millinery.

⁶ a diuretic or composing draught a diuretic is a drug designed to promote production of urine; a 'composing draught' is a sedative.

7 The frenzy...way Keats's Poems (1817) had a reasonable press from the reviewers; of the six notices, three were by friends, and the remainder were favourable.

8 the calm, settled...Endymion By the time Lockhart's essay appeared, Endymion (1818) had been given short shrift by a number of reviewers, including the British Critic and the Quarterly Review.

9 The readers...Cockaigne Lockhart refers to Hunt's article, 'Young Poets', in The Examiner for 1 December 1817, in which he presented to his readers the work of Shelley, John Hamilton Reynolds and Keats. It is true that this article confirmed Keats in his desire to be a poet. 'Cockaigne' is Lockhart's view of literary London – characterized by effeminacy, bad taste and loose morals.

10 affected mannered.

11 Leigh Hunt composed Rimini largely in prison, having been successfully prosecuted for libelling the Prince Regent. For more detail, and an extract from Rimini, see pp. 816, 820.

12 See p. 1397.

13 resembles Raphael a mean-spirited reference to 'Addressed to Haydon' 8, which mentions 'Raphael's whispering'.

14 alludes to himself...honourable elevation Lockhart refers to 'Addressed to Haydon' 9–10: 'And other spirits there are standing apart / Upon the forehead of the age to come.' In fairness, Keats does not say that one of them is himself.

15 himself with Spenser probably a reference to Keats's 'Specimen of an Induction to a Poem' 55–7:

Diana, virgin goddess of the moon, saw him lying naked on Mt Latmus and fell in love with him. In time she bore him fifty daughters. 34 bookseller...he can write Keats's publishers were John Taylor (1781–1864) and James Augustus Hessey (1785–1870). They strongly resented this imputation, although reviews such as this one depressed Keats's sales.

³⁵ plasters...boxes Nicholas Roe points out that this is a mocking allusion to the Apothecaries Act of 1815, in which ‘the art and mystery of apothecaries’ was defined as extending to ‘medicines simple or compound, wares, drugs, receipts, distilled waters, chemical oils, syrups, conserves, lohocks, electuaries, pills, powders, lozenges, oils, ointments, plaisters.’ Roe concludes that in this light Lockhart’s attack ‘was directed more broadly at the new professionalism of medicine, codified by the Act, and the enhanced social status which was thus acquired by medical practitioners’ (John Keats and the Culture of Dissent (Oxford, 1997), p. 162).

³⁶ Sangrado in Le Sage’s Gil Blas, a physician whose sole remedies were bleeding and the drinking of hot water; often applied to quack doctors of any kind.

John Keats (1795–1821)

Of the major Romantic poets, Keats was the last to be born and the first to die, at the early age of 25. Had any other writer in this volume ceased to write at such an early age, they would be seen as merely promising, and in most cases not studied in a volume such as this: poets mature late, often around the age of 30. In achieving what he did within his all-too-brief lifetime, Keats demonstrated almost unparalleled precocity. Fearing he did not have long to live, he laboured furiously, developed with abnormal rapidity and produced some of the finest poetry in the English language.

He was born on 29 October 1795, in Finsbury, north London, the eldest child of Thomas Keats, Head Ostler at the Swan and Hoop Inn, Moorgate, and Frances Jennings. They were not working class, as is sometimes suggested, but a fairly well-to-do, respectable, middle-class family. From the very beginning Keats knew he wanted to be a poet, declaring as much from the time he could speak.¹ Brothers George and Tom were born in 1797 and 1799, his sister Fanny in 1803. But like many of their time, they were soon orphaned, for in 1804 their father died after falling from his horse, and in 1810 their mother died of a ‘decline’, which biographers have tended to interpret as a reference to consumption, an ailment that would afflict her children.

From 1803 Keats attended the Enfield school run by John Clarke whose son, Charles Cowden Clarke, became a lifelong friend. Clarke recalled Keats as having a highly retentive memory, and as reading the entire contents of the school library, ‘which consisted principally of abridgements of all the voyages and travels of any note; Mavor’s collection, also his “Universal History”; Robertson’s histories of Scotland, America, and Charles the Fifth; all Miss Edgeworth’s productions, together with many other works equally well calculated for youth.’² Nicholas Roe suggests that a number of republican authors were also in the school library which, together with Leigh Hunt’s liberal newspaper, The Examiner (which Clarke says Keats read at Enfield), exerted a strong influence on his politics.³ Clarke testifies also to Keats’s ‘high-mindedness, his utter unconsciousness of a mean motive, his placability, his generosity’ – qualities he displayed for the rest of his life.

With the deaths of his parents it became imperative that Keats find a trade, and in summer 1811 he left school to become a physician. He was 14 when he began an apprenticeship with Thomas Hammond, a doctor in Edmonton (two miles to the south of Enfield), who taught him how to give vaccinations for smallpox, bleed patients with a lancet or leeches, dress wounds, set bones, pull teeth, diagnose illnesses, and make up pills, ointments, poultices and other medicines. He did well enough to register as a student at Guy’s Hospital on 1 October 1815, a month short of his twentieth birthday. He made rapid progress: four weeks into his studies he was appointed dresser to Mr Lucas, one of the hospital surgeons, and on 25 July 1816 examination success made him licentiate of the Society of Apothecaries, giving him the right to practise as apothecary, physician and surgeon. During this period he continued to write; a fellow student at

Guy's recalled that in the lecture room 'I have seen Keats in a deep poetic dream: his mind was on Parnassus with the muses.'⁴

In mid-October 1816, he began the long climb up Parnassus when introduced to Leigh Hunt on the gentle slopes of Hampstead Heath. It was an encounter that changed his life. ‘We became intimate on the spot’, Hunt recalled, ‘and I found the young poet’s heart as warm as his imagination.’⁵ More than a decade older than Keats, Hunt was an established writer eager to form a coterie of like-minded souls with shared ideological convictions, prepared to engage in intellectual discourse both in person and in print. They enjoyed soirees, sonnet-writing competitions, and vigorous debates on political topics. Keats’s need for a mentor – someone to help him refine, develop and promote his talent – was satisfied. Friendship with Hunt gave Keats access to the cream of bohemian London: Shelley, Lamb, Hazlitt, John Scott (who would become editor of the London Magazine), Charles and James Ollier (who would publish Keats’s first book of poems) and Benjamin Robert Haydon, among others.

Hunt lived in the Vale of Health in Hampstead, in a white cottage full of music, pictures, busts of poets, flowers and books. Keats was soon a ‘familiar of the household, and was always welcomed’.⁶ He fell into the habit of sleeping on the sofa in Hunt’s library where, awakening one morning, he began to compose ‘Sleep and Poetry’, probably in October or November 1816:

What is more gentle than a wind in summer?
What is more soothing than the pretty hummer
That stays one moment in an open flower
And buzzes cheerily from bower to bower?

(ll. 1–4)

It is worth comparing these lines with Hunt’s Rimini (pp. 820–5); the feminine rhyme-endings, fey diction (the ‘hummer’ is a bee) and unashamed use of such adjectives as ‘pretty’ conform to what Hunt’s enemies termed ‘namby-pamby’ poetics. Hunt believed poetry to be the vehicle of pleasure – or, to use his term, ‘luxuries’. ‘We should consider ourselves as what we really are: creatures made to enjoy more than to know’, he wrote in Foliage (1818), adding, ‘I write to enjoy myself.’⁷ This belief in the ornamental, pleasure-giving function of poetry was a powerful influence on Keats, and although he would outgrow it, its fundamental precepts remained with him to the end.

Although Keats was now free to practise, he had arrived at the point where he felt he had to make a choice between medicine and poetry. In autumn 1816 he broke the news to his guardian, Richard Abbey. ‘Not intend to be a surgeon!’ said Abbey. ‘Why, what do you mean to be?’ ‘I mean to rely on my abilities as a poet.’ ‘John, you are either mad or a fool to talk in so absurd a manner.’ ‘My mind is made up. I know that I possess abilities greater than most men, and therefore I am determined to gain my living by exercising them.’⁸ Abbey is said to have called him a ‘silly boy’, and prophesied a ‘speedy termination to his inconsiderate enterprise’.

But there was encouragement too. On 1 December 1816 The Examiner published an article by Hunt entitled ‘Young Poets’, which praised Keats alongside Shelley: ‘He has not yet published anything except in a newspaper; but a set of his manuscripts was handed us the other day, and fairly surprised us with the truth of their ambition, and ardent grappling with Nature.’ It concluded with the complete text of ‘On First Looking into Chapman's Homer'.⁹ Having read it on the day of its appearance, Hunt was inspired to compose 'To John Keats' (p. 827).

Keats met Shelley at Hunt's cottage in December 1816, and shortly after read his 'Hymn to Intellectual Beauty' in manuscript, which Hunt was to publish in The Examiner early the following year (see p. 1074). At this point, Shelley was living in Bath with Mary Godwin, in the wake of the death of his first wife, Harriet Westbrook. When he moved to Marlow in Buckinghamshire in February 1817, he invited Keats to visit, but Keats declined in order that 'I might have my own unfettered scope'.¹⁰ Evidently, he feared Shelley might prove too strong an influence, perhaps because he felt that one mentor was enough. Keats and Shelley engaged in a last sonnet-writing competition before Shelley departed for the Continent in February 1818.

Hunt and Keats celebrated the publication of Keats's Poems on 3 March 1817 by breaking open a bottle of wine in Hunt's garden and crowning each other with garlands of ivy (Hunt) and laurel (Keats). They then wrote commemorative sonnets upon the occasion; Hunt was sufficiently unashamed to publish them in Foliage. But first, his opinion of Keats's first book was called for, and in June and July he published a three-part review in The Examiner, which hailed Keats as 'a young poet indeed' before pointing out his faults ('a tendency to notice everything too indiscriminately and without an eye to natural proportion and effect; and second, a sense of the proper variety of versification without a due consideration of its principles') and 'beauties', to which the third instalment was dedicated. 'Happy Poetry Preferred', reads the heading given by Hunt to an extract from 'Sleep and Poetry'. Though ostensibly a publicity exercise, the entire thing was hugely patronizing. Perhaps the most galling thing about the article was Hunt's use of Keats's 'smiling Muse' as a means of criticizing 'the morbidity that taints the productions of the Lake Poets'.¹¹

The friendship began to cool. A month before, Keats observed that Hunt flattered himself 'into an idea of being a great poet'.¹² And the use of his poems as ammunition for an attack on Wordsworth embarrassed him, for Keats was an admirer of the older poet: he loved 'Tintern Abbey', and despite reservations about The Excursion (1814) was awestruck by it. Keats liked Wordsworth for incorporating the vicissitudes of the world into a transcendent vision, as he told John Hamilton Reynolds on 3 May 1818:

We no sooner get into the second chamber, which I shall call the chamber of maiden thought, than we become intoxicated with the light and the atmosphere, we see nothing but pleasant wonders, and think of delaying there forever in delight. However, among the effects this breathing is father of, is that tremendous one of sharpening one's vision into the heart and nature of man, of convincing one's nerves that the world is full of misery and heartbreak, pain, sickness, and oppression – whereby this chamber of maiden thought becomes gradually darkened and, at the same time, on all sides of it many doors are set open – but all dark, all leading to dark passages. We see not the balance of good and evil. We are in a mist. We are now in that state. We feel the 'burden of the mystery'. To this point was Wordsworth come, as far as I can conceive, when he wrote 'Tintern Abbey', and it seems to me that his genius is explorative of those dark passages. (See p. 1423)

'Tintern Abbey' marks Wordsworth's artistic coming of age. It looks back to the time when nature 'To me was all in all', in favour of the present of July 1798, when that love is qualified by 'The still sad music of humanity'. At its heart is a definition of artistic maturity – one tempered by 'misery and heartbreak, pain, sickness, and oppression', to which Keats was always to aspire.¹³ If this was 'morbidly', it was also, Keats knew, the key to Wordsworth's poetic achievement.

Wordsworth's influence is evident in Endymion, on which Keats worked throughout the spring and summer of 1817, which shows him exploring the heroic couplet in ways that reveal a seriousness derived from Wordsworth and Shakespeare. Its 'Hymn to Pan' was the strongest evidence thus far that Keats would turn into the author of the 1819 Odes (see p. 1399). Shelley was among those who recognized its quality, but not Wordsworth, who expressed his opinion of it when introduced to Keats in London, as Haydon recalled:

Wordsworth received him kindly, and after a few minutes Wordsworth asked him what he had been lately doing. I said, 'He has just finished an exquisite Ode to Pan', and as he had not a copy I begged Keats to repeat it, which he did in his usual half-chant (most touching), walking up and down the room. When he had done I felt, really, as if I had heard a young Apollo. Wordsworth drily said, 'a very pretty piece of Paganism'.¹⁴

Biographers continue to dispute Keats's reaction to this. He saw a good deal of Wordsworth at this period, and it seems unlikely he took it to heart. Their encounter at the 'immortal dinner' at the end of the year seems to have been friendly and cordial (see pp. 860–1).

While working on Endymion, Keats continued to develop his ideas about creativity, which were influenced by Hazlitt's essay 'On Gusto', reprinted from The Examiner in Hazlitt and Hunt's The Round Table (1817). 'How is Hazlitt?' he asked Reynolds in September 1817. 'We were reading his Table last night. I know he thinks himself not estimated by ten people in the world. I wish he knew he is.'¹⁵

Hazlitt's starting point is that 'Gusto in art is power or passion defining any object' (see p. 779). For him, works of art are ratified by the artist's ability to transcend the barriers of the self and embody another object or being. This is close to what Keats terms 'imagination', which gives the artist access to a heightened reality he called 'truth'. That reality was intensified beyond the level of everyday experience – idealized and exemplary (or 'true'). Where he differed from Hazlitt was in regarding the artist as a chameleon, capable of abnegating the self and assuming the emotions and character of any other thing. Hazlitt, who was a great believer in the egotistical sublime of Wordsworth – in 'genius' – does not license this, for he thought of genius and gusto as identical. Keats's reservations about egotism are related to his increasing ambivalence towards Hunt, whose claims to genius he found absurd. For Keats, the imagination worked where the self was submerged in an act of what he called 'negative capability'.

A poet is the most unpoetical of any thing in existence, because he has no identity, he is continually in for – and filling – some other body. The sun, the moon, the sea, and men and women who are creatures of impulse, are poetical, and have about them an unchangeable attribute; the poet has none, no identity – he is certainly the most unpoetical of all God's creatures. (See pp. 1424–5)

It is crucial to Keats that the poet lose all sense of self in imaginative engagement with his subject. And he goes further:

What the imagination seizes as beauty must be truth, whether it existed before or not. For I have the same idea of all our passions as of love: they are all in their sublime, creative of essential beauty.... The imagination may be compared to Adam's dream: he awoke and found it truth. (See p. 1403)

Emerging from an imaginative experience in which he has 'lost' awareness of the self, the poet 'awakens' to an apprehension he would not otherwise have been granted – the 'essential beauty' of the thing created by his negatively capable imagination. The point about 'essential beauty' (equivalent to 'truth') is that it derives from the otherness of something distinct and separate from the artist's ego. Even so, it may not be external to the poet, having the same relation to him as Eve did to Adam.

Keats states that the artist who negates himself in the act of creation is 'capable of being in uncertainties, mysteries, doubts, without any irritable reaching after fact and reason'.¹⁶ Coleridge had once been such a poet, but the middle-aged man Keats encountered on Hampstead Heath was in thrall to logical trains of thought ('consequitive reasoning', in Keats's words), discoursing at length on 'a thousand things' with barely a glance in his direction: 'I heard his voice as he came towards me – I heard it as he moved away – I had heard it all the interval' (see p. 1458).

'Isabella', written principally during the spring of 1818, is the first great narrative work of Keats's maturity. It translates a story he found in Boccaccio's Decameron, probably at the suggestion of Hazlitt, and was intended for a volume of translations, to have been written jointly with Keats's friend John Hamilton Reynolds, which in the end did not materialize. Keats's handling of ottava rima, the Italian stanza he knew from Fairfax's translation of Tasso's Gerusalemme Liberata, is assured, and completion of a narrative poem gave him the confidence to tackle 'The Eve of St Agnes'. That he should have chosen to versify such a macabre tale – one focused, moreover, on psychological disturbance – indicates he was trying to break free of the Huntian emphasis on 'luxuries'. Even so, he thought the poem 'too smokeable.... There is too much inexperience of life, and simplicity of knowledge in it – which might do very well after one's death, but not while one is alive' (Rollins ii 174).

The 'Cockney School' attacks, initiated by John Gibson Lockhart (p. 1375), began the previous year, and were undoubtedly making Keats increasingly sceptical of the kind of influence Hunt exercised over him. He must have known he would soon be singled out by Lockhart for special attention. Rather than brood on it, he went on a walking tour of the Lake District and Scotland with his friend Charles Brown in the summer of 1818. One of his aims was to visit Wordsworth at Rydal Mount, but he was shaken to discover the great man was not at home because of the general election, in which he was campaigning on behalf of his patron – the Tory Lord Lowther. It was a disappointing reminder that the middle-aged poet had sold out to the conservative establishment. He left a brief note on Wordsworth's mantelpiece and continued on his way.

Keats and Brown walked round Derwentwater and climbed Skiddaw before crossing the border into Dumfries, then headed north to Inverary, to Oban, and towards the western Highlands, where the dominant language was Gaelic. But the weather was variable, and after climbing Ben Nevis on 2 August Keats realized he was suffering from tonsillitis and decided to return home. He arrived in London to find his brother Tom suffering from tuberculosis in its advanced stages, and nursed him until his death. That gave him a perspective from which to view Lockhart's Cockney School attack on him when it appeared in early September (see p. 1379). It was the kind of onslaught that might have destroyed a lesser talent, but it galvanized Keats into further composition, this time 'Hyperion: A Fragment', on which he worked until Tom's death on 1 December.

The new poem aspired, Keats said, to 'a more naked and grecian manner' (Rollins i 207). By this he meant he wanted to purge his poetry of Huntian sentiment, which he saw as his main problem as a writer. Instead, his new theme was loss and suffering, which he believed would draw him closer to Wordsworth and Milton. 'Hyperion' follows the exile of the Titans, pre-Hellenic gods, by their children, led by Jupiter. As the poem opens, Saturn and the Titans are already defeated and in despair, except for Hyperion, god of the sun, who is still in power and in Books I and II attempts to rouse them to action. In Book III Apollo enters, in the midst of being transformed into the god of the sun, music, healing and prophecy, by the Titan goddess, Mnemosyne (who has changed sides): 'Knowledge enormous makes a god of me', Apollo tells her (iii 113). Keats's friend Richard Woodhouse noted that 'The poem, if completed, would have treated of the dethronement of Hyperion, the former god of the sun, by Apollo (and incidentally of those of Oceanus by Neptune, of Saturn by Jupiter, etc., and of the war of the giants for Saturn's re-establishment), with other events of which we have but very dark hints in the mythological poets of Greece and Rome. In fact, the incidents would have been pure creations of the poet's brain.'¹⁷ For Keats, the appeal of the story was that Apollo's painful emergence and the despondency of the fallen Titans illustrated aspects of his artistic self.

Shelley recognized its achievement as soon as he read it. He enjoyed the way in which it appeared to rewrite Paradise Lost in non-Christian terms: on 29 October 1820 he told Marianne Hunt that 'the fragment called "Hyperion" promises for him that he is destined to become one of the first writers of the age' (Jones ii 239). Never one of Keats's admirers, Byron moderated his usual severity when assessing 'Hyperion', partly because Keats had just died when he read it, and partly because he was writing to Shelley: 'The impression of "Hyperion" upon my mind was that it was the best of his works.'¹⁸

In late September 1818 the Tory Quarterly Review published a highly critical review of Endymion by John Wilson Croker. It was a destructive analysis of Keats's diction and style, which began by arguing he was 'a copyist of Mr Hunt, but he is more unintelligible, almost as rugged, twice as diffuse, and ten times more tiresome and absurd than his prototype who, though he impudently presumed to seat himself in the chair of criticism, and to measure his own poetry by his own standard, yet generally had a meaning.' Croker went on to suggest that Keats had imbibed Hunt's aesthetic system, which stifled what little talent he possessed. As with the Cockney School attacks, Keats cannot have been pleased at being aligned with Hunt, but it would not be long before he dismissed the critics' animus with the hope that 'I shall be among the English Poets after my death.'¹⁹ This disproves Shelley's claim that Croker's review led directly to the disease from which Keats was to die (see pp. 1079, 1249 n. 10): Keats was hurt, but had the confidence to rise above it.

At this period he met the 18-year-old Fanny Brawne, who later recalled that ‘His conversation was in the highest degree interesting, and his spirits good, excepting at moments when anxiety regarding his brother’s health dejected them.’ He must have felt both relieved and guilty when his brother Tom, who he had been nursing, died less than two weeks after his nineteenth birthday on 1 December 1818. Work on ‘Hyperion’ came to an abrupt halt, but at least he could give attention to the rest of his life, which had been suspended during Tom’s final illness. He spent Christmas with Fanny Brawne and her family, before going to Chichester for a break in January 1819. Its medieval cathedral inspired a poem he had just begun – ‘The Eve of St Agnes’. Although complete by 2 February, he revised it again in September: few episodes illustrate so vividly the speed with which he was developing. The problem with the first version, as Keats saw it, was its sentimentality – the Huntian quality attacked by reviewers. He wanted to make it less obviously a vehicle of ‘luxuries’ by emphasizing the sense of physical suffering, death and the intensity of love. To that end he revised the last stanza so as to kill off Angela – ‘dead, stiff and ugly’ (as Woodhouse complained), and added a stanza to the bedroom scene so that ‘as soon as Madeline has confessed her love, Porphyro winds by degrees his arm round her, presses breast to breast, and acts all the acts of a bona fide husband, while she fancies she is only playing the part of a wife in a dream’ (see pp. 1069–70).

His publishers balked at the indecency, and dropped the new stanza for the 1820 printed text (though readers of this volume will find it in a featurefootnote on p. 1456). Woodhouse says he challenged Keats over these alterations, saying that ladies would not wish to read such things (an important consideration, as most poetry readers were women), to which Keats replied he wrote only for men.²⁰ It was not that he sought to be offensive for its own sake, but was striving to emerge from under Hunt’s shadow, to take his poetry into a world in which death and ecstasy were often found side by side.

Love and death-like suffering converge in ‘La Belle Dame Sans Merci: A Ballad’, a poem of April 1819 that may reflect Keats’s increasingly frustrated feelings for Fanny Brawne, not to mention his reaction to the letters sent to his dying brother by a friend, Charles Wells, under the fictitious identity of a woman, Amena. Writing as Amena, Wells had tantalized Tom with thoughts that he, as her Knight, might be soothed by her. It was a cruel deception by which, so Keats believed, Tom’s death was hastened, and may have shaped the nightmarish view of love in ‘La Belle Dame’. In the end the Knight is trapped forever on the cold hill’s side in a landscape that speaks of sterility and unfulfilled desire.

The darkness of ‘La Belle Dame’ shows how far Keats had travelled since being cast as Hunt’s acolyte eighteen months before; it speaks of the proximity of death, the awareness of which suffuses the great poetry on which he was about to embark. ‘Ode to Psyche’ was written in the days following its completion. Keats said that it

Is the first and the only one with which I have taken even moderate pains. I have for the most part dashed off my lines in a hurry; this I have done leisurely. I think it reads the more richly for it, and will I hope encourage me to write other things in even a more peaceable and healthy spirit. You must recollect that Psyche was not embodied as a goddess before the time of Apuleius the Platonist, who lived after the Augustan age, and consequently the goddess was never worshipped or sacrificed to with any of the ancient fervour, and perhaps never thought of in the old religion. I am more orthodox than to let a heathen goddess be so neglected. (Rollins ii 105–6)

Keats approaches the Psyche myth in his own way, anglicizing it through the literary genre of pastoral. But the most Keatsian element of all is the dream-vision with which it begins, of two lovers ‘couched side by side / In deepest grass’ – exactly the kind of thing he might have seen while wandering the lanes of Hampstead. These human figures become, in the transforming imagination of the poet, Psyche and Cupid. Having noted that Psyche has no temple or retinue of her own, the poet devotes himself to her service (‘Yes, I will be thy priest’) and declares his intention to build a temple to her in his mind, where she will always have a dwelling. This ‘Ode’ is usually read in the light of Keats’s statements of 21 April 1819 in the journal letter to the George Keatses (see pp. 1458–9). In some ways its most significant achievement is its stanza form, derived from experiments with the sonnet, and used throughout the remaining Odes.

It is not certain which poem Keats composed next. ‘Ode to a Nightingale’ is usually placed before ‘Ode on a Grecian Urn’ (as here), though John Barnard has argued for the reverse order. The ‘Ode to a Nightingale’ (written at Charles Brown’s house in Hampstead, now preserved as a museum) may represent the summit of Keats’s achievement. Poets before and after Keats chose the nightingale as their subject, but none so memorably. As the Ode begins, the poet stands, listening to the nightingale in the depths of the night, somewhere in the fields of Hampstead; it is so dark he cannot see the ground clearly, but can smell the flowers that surround him. The aching of his heart (presumably he is love-sick) is soothed, and he is tempted to a luxurious death accompanied by the nightingale’s song. In the grip of that fancy, he reflects that, as the inhabitant of other eras and worlds, the bird aspires to the status of an immortal being. With that, he emerges from the inner recesses of reverie to the threshold of full consciousness. Keats is inspired partly by Hazlitt’s comment on the author of The Faerie Queene: ‘Spenser was the poet of our waking dreams; and he has invented not only a language, but a music of his own for them. The undulations are infinite, like those of the waves of the sea: but the effect is still the same, lulling the senses into a deep oblivion of the jarring noises of the world, from which we have no wish ever to be recalled’ (Wu ii 205).

‘Ode on a Grecian Urn’ begins in the midst of a meditation on the object mentioned in its title – one that depicts images the poet has, as the poem begins, already transformed into an alternative reality. The world of the urn becomes, in the negatively capable imagination of the poet, one in which human frailties such as sickness, age and death are transcended; in which human passion never fades; in which creativity continues indefinitely, unthreatened by time. In other words, the idealized reality created by a long-dead Greek artist transports the poet to a place of perfection. It is important, from Keats’s perspective, that the artist speaks to all who see his work: ‘Beauty is truth, truth beauty.’ Critics have laboured across many decades to explicate that remark, though it is surely not obscure. In his letters he wrote that the imagination is like Adam’s dream; he awoke and found it truth (p. 1403). The elevated apprehensions of the imagination – the heightened insights into the world granted at those moments when the imagination ‘sees into the life of things’ – are visions of reality, a reality that exists not merely in the imagination, but in the real world. And that reality is, by its nature, a thing of beauty, a revelation of what was always there, but which we could not otherwise have seen in its true colours. So it is with the depictions on the urn: they are of a perfect, timeless universe, a heightened depiction of earthly things, preserved forever.

Critics tend to find the 'Ode on Melancholy' problematic. Again, the drama behind the poem is important. As it starts, the poet has descended into depression – real, psychological depression, a state of mind that lurks behind several of these poems. He tells himself, 'No, no, go not to Lethe', meaning that it would be a mistake to kill himself, the thought that has just passed through his mind. The rest of the poem is an attempt to understand why he should choose to live. The answer seems to be that melancholy is an inescapable aspect of all human experience – even the most joyous, as when two lovers devote themselves to each other. Again, Keats is reacting against Hunt's dictum that poetry is designed only for pleasure. It is as if he had set out to reconceive the passion of Hunt's characters, Paolo and Francesca (see Canto III of Rimini, p. 820 above), in order to understand within it the function of melancholy. The poem's final conceit is that 'Joy's grape' can be tasted at its fullest only by those who have also known the 'might' of Melancholy.

By this time it should be clear that Keats's great Odes are inspired by moods of his own mind, and the 'Ode to Indolence' is typical in that regard. It is set during 'My idle days', when 'The blissful cloud of summer indolence / Benumbed my eyes'. Like anyone else, Keats seems at certain periods to have wished not to exert himself in any way – simply to relax, shut his eyes, and think of nothing. In that mood he is assailed three times by three allegorical figures, who represent things capable of rousing him from his inertia and causing him 'annoy': Love, Ambition and Poesy. Keats gives them all due consideration, but bids them adieu, so preserving his 'idle sprite' for the pleasures of 'nothingness'. It is the last thing we might expect a young poet to do; but Keats's response is based on a profound conviction in the visionary power by which he is invested, and which he knows will guarantee his place in the pantheon.

By the end of June 1819, Keats had reached some kind of understanding with Fanny Brawne – not an engagement, exactly, more an expression of intent – before leaving for the Isle of Wight, where he began 'Lamia', which he would complete at Winchester in early autumn. Based on a story he had encountered in Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy, it heralded a fresh attempt to escape the 'smokeability' of Cockney School aesthetics. In particular, he aspired to an objectivity he thought lacking in earlier works. The defect of 'The Eve of St Agnes', he feared, was his identification with its characters. In 'Lamia' he would strive to tell the story as 'coldly' as he could.

He knew Coleridge's 'Christabel' (published in 1816; see p. 660), as well as the definition of the lamia from Lemprière's classical dictionary: 'Certain monsters of Africa, who had the face and breast of a woman, and the rest of the body like that of a serpent. They allured strangers to them, that they might devour them, and though they were not endowed with the faculty of speech, yet their hissings were pleasing and agreeable.' Keats makes his lamia sympathetic; she does not eat small children and possesses something of the glamour of Coleridge's Geraldine. The appeal of the narrative borrowed from Burton (quoted p. 1472 n. 1) lay in the fact that it permitted Keats further to explore the difference between the 'consequitive' reasoner, and the artist or lover – in this case, Apollonius the philosopher, and Lycius. Apollonius is therefore less agreeable than in Burton, where he is the instigator of a successful witch-hunt. Furthermore, Keats adds Lycius' death which makes his fatal passion more than merely poignant; it is almost tragic. He was satisfied with 'Lamia', as he wrote in September 1819: 'I am certain there is that sort of fire in it which must take hold of people in some way – give them either pleasant or unpleasant sensation. What they want is a sensation of some sort.’²¹ Keats’s friend Woodhouse admired ‘Lamia’ when he heard it, as he told John Taylor: ‘You may suppose all these events have given Keats scope for some beautiful poetry which, even in this cursory hearing of it, came every now and then upon me, and made me “start, as though a sea-nymph quired”.’²² Of all the various reactions, the most appreciative was that of Charles Lamb, whose review appeared in the New Times:

More exuberantly rich in imagery and painting is the story of the Lamia. It is of as gorgeous stuff as ever romance was composed of. Her first appearance in serpentine form – a beauteous wreath with melancholy eyes²³ –

her dialogue with Hermes, the Star of Lethe, as he is called by one of those prodigal phrases which Mr Keats abounds in, which are each a poem in a word, and which in this instance lays upon to us at once, like a picture, all the dim regions and their inhabitants, and the sudden coming of a celestial among them; the charming of her into woman’s shape again by the God; her marriage with the beautiful Lycius; her magic palace, which those who knew the street, and remembered it complete from childhood, never remembered to have seen before; the few Persian mutes, her attendants,

– who that same year

Were seen about the markets: none knew where

They could inhabit;²⁴ –

the high-wrought splendours of the nuptial bower, with the fading of the whole pageantry, Lamia, and all, away, before the glance of Apollonius, – are all that fairy land can do for us. They are for younger impressibilities.²⁵

Keats’s last great ode, ‘To Autumn’, was written in mid-September in Winchester, shortly after completion of ‘Lamia’. Many would regard it as the greatest thing he ever composed. In a letter to Reynolds, he described the weather and the countryside by which he was surrounded:

How beautiful the season is now, how fine the air. A temperate sharpness about it. Really, without joking, chaste weather – Dian skies. I never liked stubble fields so much as now. Aye better than the chilly green of the spring. Somehow a stubble plain looks warm – in the same way that some pictures look warm. This struck me so much in my Sunday’s walk that I composed upon it. (Rollins ii 167)

The letter tells us everything we need to know about Keats’s state of mind at this moment. As in the other Odes, he finds his mood reflected in his surroundings. The very season is embodied in the persona of a farm labourer sitting on the floor of a granary, or a half-reaped furrow – like the many rustic folk Keats must have seen on his walks around the countryside. And as that figure becomes the agent of plenitude and ripeness, it also becomes the agent of maturity – not merely that of the natural world but of Keats’s own talents as he achieves his finest poetic utterance to date. The third stanza of the poem takes the form of a valediction to the fullness of the harvest and the bounty of the natural world, containing the awareness of a darker time to come.

In recent decades the poem has generated controversy. Jerome J. McGann criticizes Keats for ignoring the political turmoil in English society and turning instead to the idealized world of nature; the poem is, he argues, ‘politically reactionary’.²⁶ This has inspired a series of defences that read the poem as a thinly veiled political statement – most notably by Andrew Bennett, Nicholas Roe, Tom Paulin and Andrew Motion.²⁷ These attempts to align the ideology of ‘To Autumn’ with that of radical thinkers of the day are of varying persuasiveness, and remind us that Keats’s personal politics were consistent with those of Shelley and Byron, for example. It is curious to reflect that, by interpreting the last and finest of Keats’s Odes as a work in which the natural world becomes a vector for its author’s state of mind, the reader may be engaging in a practice some modern critics would regard as reactionary, even degenerate. But one has to ask whether it is really necessary to justify the reading of poetry by reference to its ideological colour?

The two parts of ‘Lamia’ were interrupted so that Keats could work on a revised version of ‘Hyperion’, influenced by Milton (Paradise Lost) and Dante (Inferno). This time it was framed within a dream-vision, whereby Moneta would relate the Titans’ fall, picking up the original narrative at line 294 of Canto I with the entrance of Saturn and Thea. ‘The Fall of Hyperion’ would not be published until 1857, and during the nineteenth century it had few admirers – but it is now accepted that the passages written for it reveal the development in Keats’s thinking since composition of ‘Hyperion: A Fragment’ a year before. They show how critical he had become of the self-indulgent dreamer, instead favouring the poet for whom ‘the miseries of the world / Are misery’ (i 148–9). This was part of Keats’s disillusionment with Byron, now classed among ‘mock lyrists, large self-worshippers / And careless hectorers in proud bad verse’ (i 207–8).

Keats would write more, but nothing that would surpass the achievements of 1818–19. His enemy was time. In early February 1820, he collapsed on arrival at Wentworth Place in Hampstead, with a haemorrhage of the lungs. ‘I know the colour of that blood’, he told Charles Brown, ‘it is arterial blood. I cannot be deceived in that colour. That drop of blood is my death-warrant. I must die.’ The story of what happened next is well known. He would release Fanny Brawne from their ‘understanding’ and commence a drawn-out physical decline. His last lifetime volume, Lamia, Isabella, The Eve of St Agnes, and Other Poems, was published in July 1820.

In September he travelled to Italy with his friend Joseph Severn in search of a warmer climate, which it was hoped would prolong his life. But the journey and its tribulations damaged his health even further and, after arriving in Rome on 15 November, where he and Severn found lodgings at 26 Piazza di Spagna, he had only weeks before his final relapse. Writing to his old friend Charles Brown, he spoke of the ‘habitual feeling of my real life having past, and that I am leading a posthumous existence’. After weeks of suffering, he died on 23 February 1821. He was buried in the non-Catholic cemetery three days later. Unaware that his old friend was already dead, Leigh Hunt wrote to Severn at Rome, with a last request:

Tell him – tell that great poet and noble-hearted man – that we shall all bear his memory in the most precious part of our hearts, and that the world shall bow their heads to it, as our loves do. Or if this, again, will trouble his spirit, tell him that we shall never cease to remember and love him; and that the most sceptical of us has faith enough in the high things that nature puts into our heads to think all who are of one accord in mind or heart are journeying to one and the same place, and shall unite somewhere or other again, face to face, mutually conscious, mutually delighted. Tell him he is only before us on the road, as he was in everything else; or whether you tell him the latter or no, tell him the former, and add that we shall never forget that he was so, and that we are coming after...

Within three years both Shelley and Byron would follow; the next thirteen years saw the deaths of Hazlitt, Lamb and Coleridge. Keats's death marked the beginning of the end of Romanticism.

On First Looking into Chapman's Homer (composed October 1816)¹

From Poems (1817)

Much have I travelled in the realms of gold,
And many goodly states and kingdoms seen;
Round many western islands have I been
Which bards in fealty to Apollo² hold.
Oft of one wide expanse had I been told 5
That deep-browed Homer ruled as his demesne,³
Yet did I never breathe its pure serene⁴
Till I heard Chapman speak out loud and bold:
Then felt I like some watcher of the skies
When a new planet swims into his ken; 10
Or like stout Cortez⁵ when with eagle eyes
He stared at the Pacific – and all his men

Looked at each other with a wild surmise –
Silent, upon a peak in Darien.⁶

On First Looking into Chapman's Homer

¹ George Chapman (1559–1634) translated The Whole Works of Homer (1614). In October 1816 Charles Cowden Clarke was lent a copy and read through it with Keats one night. Keats returned to his lodgings in Dean Street at dawn the following morning, and had composed this poem by 10 o'clock. It was first published in The Examiner, 1 December 1816 (see headnote, p. 1386).

² Apollo is the god of poetry; bards are therefore bound in fealty to him.

³ demesne domain, kingdom.

⁴ serene clear, bright sky (Latin serenum means a clear or bright sky).

⁵ Cortez It was in fact Vasco Nunez de Balboa (1475–1519) who was the first European to stand, in 1513, on that peak and see the Pacific (which he claimed for Spain). In 1519 Hernán Cortés (1485–1547) conquered Mexico for Spain and entered Mexico City for the first time.

⁶ Darien is the region that connects Panama to Colombia.

Addressed to Haydon¹ (composed 19 November 1816)

From Poems (1817)

Great spirits now on earth are sojourning:²
He of the cloud, the cataract, the lake,
Who on Helvellyn's³ summit, wide awake,

Catches his freshness from archangel's wing;
He of the rose, the violet, the spring, 5
 The social smile, the chain for freedom's sake;⁴
 And lo! whose steadfastness would never take
A meaner sound than Raphael's whispering.⁵
And other spirits there are standing apart
 Upon the forehead of the age to come; 10
These, these will give the world another heart
 And other pulses: hear ye not the hum
Of mighty workings?⁶——
 Listen awhile ye nations, and be dumb.

Addressed to Haydon

¹ Haydon the artist Benjamin Robert Haydon, for whom see p. 858. Keats sent this poem to him in a letter, 20 November 1816, having dined with him the previous evening.

² Keats celebrates the achievement of Wordsworth (lines 2–4), Leigh Hunt (lines 5–6) and Haydon (lines 7–8). For Lockhart's criticism of this sonnet, see p. 1380.

³ Helvellyn mountain towers over Grasmere (3,116 ft), though Keats had not at this stage seen it.

⁴ the chain for freedom's sake a reference to Hunt's spell in jail for libelling the Prince Regent (p. 816).

⁵ whose steadfastness ... Raphael's whispering Obscurity is an element of Keats's early manner, and this is far from clear, as editors have observed. The overall meaning seems to be that Haydon's artistic ability rivals that of Raphael.

⁶ The incompleteness of the line is deliberate, and was suggested by Haydon. It originally read: 'Of mighty workings in a distant mart?'

On the Grasshopper and the Cricket (composed 30 December 1816)¹

From Poems (1817)

The poetry of earth is never dead:²

When all the birds are faint with the hot sun,
And hide in cooling trees, a voice will run
From hedge to hedge about the new-mown mead;
That is the Grasshopper's – he takes the lead 5
In summer luxury, he has never done
With his delights; for when tired out with fun
He rests at ease beneath some pleasant weed.

The poetry of earth is ceasing never:

On a lone winter evening, when the frost 10
Has wrought a silence,³ from the stove there shrills
The Cricket's song, in warmth increasing ever,
And seems to one in drowsiness half lost,
The Grasshopper's among some grassy hills.

On the Grasshopper and the Cricket

² According to Charles Cowden Clarke, Leigh Hunt thought the first line was 'a preposterous opening'.

³ On a lone winter...a silence When he first heard this line and a half, Hunt exclaimed 'Ah! That's perfect! Bravo Keats!' It is reminiscent of the opening of Coleridge's 'Frost at Midnight' (p. 645).

From Endymion: A Poetic Romance, Book
I (extracts) (composed April–November 1817; published 1818)¹

[‘A thing of beauty is a joy for ever’]

A thing of beauty is a joy for ever:²
Its loveliness increases; it will never
Pass into nothingness, but still will keep
A bower quiet for us, and a sleep
Full of sweet dreams, and health, and quiet breathing. 5
Therefore, on every morrow, are we wreathing
A flowery band to bind us to the earth,
Spite of despondence, of the inhuman dearth
Of noble natures, of the gloomy days,
Of all the unhealthy and o’er-darkened ways 10
Made for our searching – yes, in spite of all,
Some shape of beauty moves away the pall
From our dark spirits. Such the sun, the moon,
Trees old and young, sprouting a shady boon
For simple sheep; and such are daffodils 15
With the green world they live in; and clear rills
That for themselves a cooling covert make
’Gainst the hot season; the mid-forest brake,
Rich with a sprinkling of fair musk-rose³ blooms;
And such too is the grandeur of the dooms⁴ 20
We have imagined for the mighty dead,
All lovely tales that we have heard or read –
An endless fountain of immortal drink,
Pouring unto us from the heaven’s brink.

A thing of beauty is a joy for ever

¹ Keats's mythological romance has attracted few supporters since its first publication. It is interesting both for the way in which it reveals Hunt's influence, and the indications it provides of Keats's development. See headnote, p. 1388.

² A thing of beauty is a joy for ever Keats's fellow-student at Guy's Hospital, Henry Stephens, who was present when this line was composed, recalled that it originally read: 'A thing of beauty is a constant joy.'

³ musk-rose a rambling rose with white flowers and a characteristic scent.

⁴ dooms destinies.

*[Hymn to Pan]*¹

Oh thou, whose mighty palace roof doth hang
From jagged trunks, and overshadoweth
Eternal whispers, glooms, the birth, life, death
Of unseen flowers in heavy peacefulness; 235
Who lov'st to see the hamadryads² dress
Their ruffled locks where meeting hazels darken,
And through whole solemn hours dost sit, and hearken
The dreary melody of bedded reeds
In desolate places, where dank moisture breeds 240
The pipy hemlock³ to strange overgrowth;
Bethinking thee, how melancholy loath
Thou wast to lose fair Syrinx⁴ – do thou now,
By thy love's milky brow,
By all the trembling mazes that she ran, 245
Hear us, great Pan!

Oh thou, for whose soul-soothing quiet, turtles⁵
Passion their voices⁶ cooingly 'mong myrtles,⁷

What time thou wanderest at eventide
Through sunny meadows that outskirt the side 250
Of thine enmossed realms; oh thou, to whom
Broad-leaved fig trees even now foredoom⁸
Their ripened fruitage, yellow-girted bees
Their golden honeycombs, our village leas
Their fairest-blossomed beans and popped corn, 255
The chuckling⁹ linnet its five young unborn
To sing for thee, low-creeping strawberries
Their summer coolness, pent-up butterflies¹⁰
Their freckled wings – yea, the fresh-budding year
All its completions; be quickly near, 260
By every wind that nods the mountain pine,¹¹
Oh forester divine!

Thou, to whom every faun and satyr flies
For willing service, whether to surprise
The squatted hare¹² while in half-sleeping fit; 265
Or upward ragged precipices flit
To save poor lambkins from the eagle's maw;
Or by mysterious enticement draw
Bewildered shepherds to their path again;
Or to tread breathless round the frothy main, 270
And gather up all fancifullest shells
For thee to tumble into naiads' ¹³ cells,
And, being hidden, laugh at their out-peeping;
Or to delight thee with fantastic leaping,
The while they pelt each other on the crown 275
With silvery oak-apples, and fir-cones brown –
By all the echoes that about thee ring,
Hear us, oh satyr king!

Oh hearkener to the loud-clapping shears,
While ever and anon to his shorn peers 280

A ram goes bleating; winder of the horn,¹⁴
 When snouted wild-boars routing¹⁵ tender corn
 Anger our huntsmen; breather round our farms,
 To keep off mildews and all weather harms;
 Strange ministrant of undescribed sounds, 285
 That come a-swooning over hollow grounds
 And wither drearily on barren moors;
 Dread opener of the mysterious doors
 Leading to universal knowledge – see,
 Great son of Dryope,¹⁶ 290
 The many that are come to pay their vows
 With leaves about their brows!

Be still the unimaginable lodge
 For solitary thinkings; such as dodge
 Conception to the very bourne¹⁷ of heaven, 295
 That spreading in this dull and clodded earth
 Gives it a touch ethereal,¹⁸ a new birth;¹⁹
 Be still a symbol of immensity,
 A firmament reflected in a sea, 300
 An element filling the space between,
 An unknown – but no more. We humbly screen
 With uplift hands our foreheads, lowly bending,
 And giving out a shout most heaven-rending,
 Conjure thee to receive our humble paean,²⁰ 305
 Upon thy Mount Lycean!²¹

Hymn to Pan

¹ In spite of the fact that Wordsworth disparagingly told Keats that the ‘Hymn to Pan’ was ‘a very pretty piece of Paganism’, it looks forward to the mature style of the major 1819 odes. Pan is the god of universal nature. The ‘Hymn’ was composed on 26 April 1817.

2 hamadryads wood-nymphs fabled to live and die with the trees they inhabited.

3 pipy hemlock poison hemlock has tall hollow stems.

4 When Pan pursued Syrinx, she was changed into a reed.

5 turtles turtle-doves.

6 Passion their voices fill their voices with passion. The use of 'passion' as a verb follows Spenser's Faerie Queene, but was taken by reviewers to be a prime example of Cockney affectation.

7 myrtles shrubs with shiny evergreen leaves and white sweet-scented flowers, sacred to Venus and used as an emblem of love.

8 foredoom anticipate.

9 chuckling clucking.

10 pent-up butterflies butterflies still in chrysalis form.

11 pine emblem of Pan.

12 squatted hare the hare in its form.

13 naiad water-nymph.

14 winder of the horn one who blows the horn.

15 routing digging up (with the snout).

16 Keats follows Chapman's 'Hymn to Pan' which represents Pan as the son of Dryope and Hermes.

17 bourne boundary.

18 ethereal divine.

19 Be still the unimaginable lodge...new birth In his hostile review of Endymion in the Quarterly Review (April 1818), John Wilson Croker quoted these lines to support his charge that Keats ‘seems to us to write a line at random, and then he follows not the thought excited by this line, but that suggested by the rhyme with which it concludes.... Lodge, dodge – heaven, leaven – earth, birth; such, in six words, is the sum and substance of six lines.’

20 paean hymn of praise.

21 Lycaeus was a mountain of Arcadia sacred to Pan.

[The Pleasure Thermometer]*¹

Wherein lies happiness? In that which beck²
Our ready minds to fellowship divine,
A fellowship with essence,³ till we shine
Full alchemized,⁴ and free of space. Behold 780
The clear religion⁵ of heaven! Fold
A rose-leaf round thy finger’s taperness
And soothe thy lips; hist, when the airy stress
Of music’s kiss impregnates the free winds,
And with a sympathetic touch unbinds 785
Aeolian magic from their lucid wombs;⁶
Then old songs waken from enclouded⁷ tombs,
Old ditties sigh above their father’s grave,
Ghosts of melodious prophecyings rave
Round every spot where trod Apollo’s foot; 790
Bronze clarions awake and faintly bruit⁸
Where long ago a giant battle⁹ was;
And from the turf, a lullaby doth pass

In every place where infant Orpheus¹⁰ slept.
Feel we these things? That moment have we stepped 795
Into a sort of oneness, and our state
Is like a floating spirit's. But there are Richer entanglements, enthrallments far
More self-destroying,¹¹ leading, by degrees,
To the chief intensity: the crown of these 800
Is made of love and friendship, and sits high
Upon the forehead of humanity.
All its more ponderous and bulky worth
Is friendship, whence there ever issues forth
A steady splendour; but at the tip-top 805
There hangs by unseen film an orb'd drop
Of light, and that is love. Its influence,
Thrown in our eyes, genders¹² a novel sense
At which we start and fret; till in the end,
Melting into its radiance, we blend, 810
Mingle, and so become a part of it –
Nor with aught else can our souls interknit
So wingedly. When we combine therewith,
Life's self is nourished by its proper pith,¹³
And we are nurtured like a pelican brood.¹⁴ 815
Aye, so delicious is the unsating¹⁵ food,
That men who might have towered in the van¹⁶
Of all the congregated world, to fan
And winnow from the coming step of time
All chaff of custom, wipe away all slime 820
Left by men-slugs and human serpentry,
Have been content to let occasion¹⁷ die
Whilst they did sleep in love's Elysium.
And truly, I would rather be struck dumb
Than speak against this ardent listlessness;¹⁸ 825
For I have ever thought that it might bless

The world with benefits unknowingly,
 As does the nightingale, up-perched high,
 And cloistered among cool and bunched leaves –
 She sings but to her love, nor e'er conceives 830
 How tiptoe night holds back her dark-grey hood.
 Just so may love, although 'tis understood
 The mere commingling¹⁹ of passionate breath,
 Produce more than our searching witnesseth:
 What I know not – but who of men can tell 835
 That flowers would bloom, or that green fruit would swell
 To melting pulp, that fish would have bright mail,²⁰
 The earth its dower²¹ of river, wood, and vale,
 The meadows runnels,²² runnels pebble-stones,
 The seed its harvest, or the lute its tones, 840
 Tones ravishment, or ravishment its sweet,
 If human souls did never kiss and greet?

The Pleasure Thermometer

¹ The 'thermometer' measures happiness by its intensity and selfless involvement; the four 'degrees', in ascending order, are (i) sensual enjoyment of nature (line 782); (ii) music (lines 783–94); (iii) friendship (lines 803–5); (iv) passion (lines 805–42). This passage is spoken by Endymion. Keats commented on it in his letter to John Taylor of 30 January 1818: 'The whole thing must, I think, have appeared to you, who are a consequitive man, as a thing almost of mere words. But I assure you that when I wrote it, it was a regular stepping of the Imagination towards a Truth. My having written that argument will perhaps be of the greatest service to me of anything I ever did. It set before me at once the gradations of happiness even like a kind of Pleasure Thermometer' (Rollins i 218).

² *beck*s beckons.

3 essence used as a synonym for ‘a thing of beauty’.

4 alchemized transformed, spiritualized.

5 religion pronounced as four syllables.

6 when the airy stress...wombs Keats is thinking of an Aeolian harp.

7 enclouded dim, obscure.

8 bruit proclaim.

9 a giant battle between the Titans and the gods of Olympus, the background to ‘Hyperion’.

10 Orpheus was taught to play the lyre by Apollo, his father, and reached such skill that he could influence animate and inanimate nature by his music.

11 self-destroying capable of negating our sense of self (a good thing in Keats; see headnote, p. 1388).

12 genders creates.

13 proper pith own substance.

14 a pelican brood the pelican was said to feed its young with its own blood.

15 unsating uncloying.

16 towered in the van a military metaphor; had been foremost at the front of an attacking army.

17 occasion ephemeral circumstance.

18 ardent listlessness passionate suspension of self-consciousness, mystic trance.

19 commingling intermingling.

20 bright mail i.e. scales.

21 dower gift.

22 runnels streams.

Letter from John Keats to Benjamin Bailey, 22 November 1817 (extract)¹

I wish you knew all that I think about genius and the heart – and yet I think you are thoroughly acquainted with my innermost breast in that respect, or you could not have known me even thus long and still hold me worthy to be your dear friend. In passing, however, I must say of one thing that has pressed upon me lately and increased my humility and capability of submission, and that is this truth: men of genius are great as certain ethereal chemicals operating on the mass of neutral intellect – but they have not any individuality, any determined character. I would call the top and head of those who have a proper self, men of power.

But I am running my head into a subject which I am certain I could not do justice to under five years' study and 3 vols. octavo – and moreover long to be talking about the imagination. So, my dear Bailey, do not think of this unpleasant affair if possible – do not – I defy any harm to come of it – I defy – I shall write to Crips this week and request him to tell me all his goings-on from time to time by letter wherever I may be – it will all go on well. So don't, because you have suddenly discovered a coldness in Haydon,² suffer yourself to be teased. Do not, my dear fellow.

Oh, I wish I was as certain of the end of all your troubles as that of your momentary start about the authenticity of the imagination. I am certain of nothing but of the holiness of the heart's affections³ and the truth of imagination. What the imagination seizes as beauty must be truth, whether it existed before or not. For I have the same idea of all our passions as of love: they are all, in their sublime, creative of essential beauty.⁴ In a word, you may know my favourite speculation by my first book and the little song I sent in my last – which is a representation from the fancy of the probable mode of operating in these matters. The imagination may be compared to Adam’s dream: he awoke and found it truth.⁵ I am the more zealous in this affair because I have never yet been able to perceive how anything can be known for truth by consequitive⁶ reasoning – and yet it must be. Can it be that even the greatest philosopher ever arrived at his goal without putting aside numerous objections? However it may be, oh for a life of sensations rather than of thoughts! It is ‘a vision in the form of youth’, a shadow of reality to come. And this consideration has further convinced me, for it has come as auxiliary to another favourite speculation of mine – that we shall enjoy ourselves hereafter by having what we called happiness on earth repeated in a finer tone and so repeated. And yet such a fate can only befall those who delight in sensation, rather than hunger as you do after truth; Adam’s dream will do here, and seems to be a conviction that imagination and its empyreal reflection is the same as human life and its spiritual repetition. But as I was saying, the simple imaginative mind may have its rewards in the repetition of its own silent working coming continually on the spirit with a fine suddenness. To compare great things with small, have you never, by being surprised with an old melody in a delicious place by a delicious voice, felt over again your very speculations and surmises at the time it first operated on your soul? Do you not remember forming to yourself the singer’s face more beautiful than it was possible, and yet with the elevation of the moment you did not think so? Even then, you were mounted on the wings of imagination so high that the prototype must be hereafter – that delicious face you will see! What a time!

I am continually running away from the subject. Sure this cannot be exactly the case with a complex mind, one that is imaginative and at the same time careful of its fruits, who would exist partly on sensation, partly on thought – to whom it is necessary that years should bring the philosophic mind.⁷ Such an one I consider yours and therefore it is necessary to your eternal happiness that you not only drink this old wine of heaven, which I shall call the redigestion of our most ethereal musings on earth, but also increase in knowledge and know all things.

Letter from John Keats to Benjamin Bailey

¹ This letter contains one of Keats's earliest, and most important, statements on the imagination. Benjamin Bailey (1791–1853) was an undergraduate at Oxford when John Hamilton Reynolds introduced him to Keats in spring 1817. Throughout September 1817 Keats shared Bailey's college quarters, and composed Endymion Book III there.

² Benjamin Robert Haydon, artist and friend of Keats; see p. 858.

³ affections feelings.

⁴ For I have...beauty at their most sublime (i.e. intense and powerful), human emotions ('passions') apprehend the inherent beauty of the 'essences' they perceive.

⁵ The imagination...truth Genesis 2:21–2: 'And the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and he slept: and he took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof; And the rib, which the Lord God had taken from man, made he a woman, and brought her unto the man.' This episode was reworked in one of the most impressive passages of Paradise Lost viii 452–86.

⁶ consequitive consecutive, logical, rational.

⁷ the philosophic mind Wordsworth, 'Ode' 189.

Letter from John Keats to George and Tom Keats, 21 December 1817 (extract)

I spent Friday evening with Wells¹ and went the next morning to see 'Death on the Pale Horse'.² It is a wonderful picture when West's age is considered, but there is nothing to be intense upon – no women one feels mad to kiss, no face swelling into reality.³ The excellence of every art is its intensity, capable of making all disagreeables evaporate, from their being in close relationship with beauty and truth. Examine King Lear and you will find this exemplified throughout, but in this picture we have unpleasantness without any momentous depth of speculation excited, in which to bury its repulsiveness. The picture is larger than 'Christ Rejected'.⁴

I dined with Haydon the Sunday after you left, and had a very pleasant day. I dined too (for I have been out too much lately) with Horace Smith, and met his two brothers⁵ with Hill and Kingston and one Dubois. They only served to convince me how superior humour is to wit in respect to enjoyment. These men say things which make one start without making one feel. They are all alike; their manners are alike; they all know fashionables; they have a mannerism in their very eating and drinking, in their mere handling a decanter. They talked of Kean⁶ and his low company. Would I were with that company instead of yours, said I to myself! I know suchlike acquaintance will never do for me, and yet I am going to Reynolds⁷ on Wednesday.

Brown and Dilke⁸ walked with me and back from the Christmas pantomime. I had not a dispute but a disquisition with Dilke, on various subjects. Several things dovetailed in my mind, and at once it struck me what quality went to form a man of achievement, especially in literature, and which Shakespeare possessed so enormously. I mean negative capability; that is, when man is capable of being in uncertainties, mysteries, doubts, without any irritable reaching after fact and reason. Coleridge, for instance, would let go by a fine isolated verisimilitude⁹ caught from the penetralium¹⁰ of mystery, from being incapable of remaining content with half-knowledge. This pursued through volumes would perhaps take us no further than this: that with a great poet the sense of beauty overcomes every other consideration, or rather obliterates all consideration.

Letter from John Keats to George and Tom Keats

² Painting by Benjamin West (1738–1820), President of the Royal Academy. His exhibition was at 125 Pall Mall.

³ It is...reality Keats follows the opinions expressed by Hazlitt in his article, ‘West’s Picture of Death on the Pale Horse’, in the Edinburgh Magazine for December 1817: ‘There is no gusto, no imagination in Mr West’s colouring’ (Howe xviii 138).

⁴ West painted Christ Rejected 1812–14; it had been exhibited in the autumn of 1814 in Pall Mall, and attracted almost a quarter of a million visitors.

⁵ Horace (1779–1849) and James Smith (1775–1839) were responsible for the parodic Rejected Addresses (1812). Their brother was Leonard Smith (1778–1837).

⁶ Edmund Kean (1787–1833), after Kemble the most celebrated Shakespearean actor of his day.

⁷ John Hamilton Reynolds (1794–1852), friend of Keats and poet.

⁸ Charles Armitage Brown (1786–1842), one of Keats’s closest friends; Charles Wentworth Dilke (1789–1864), with whose family Keats was close, and who introduced Keats to the love of his life, Fanny Brawne.

⁹ verisimilitude revelation.

¹⁰ penetralium interior, depth.

On Sitting Down to Read King Lear Once Again (composed 22 January 1818; published 1838; edited from MS)

Oh golden-tongued Romance, with serene lute!

Fair plumèd siren,¹ queen of far away!

Leave melodizing on this wintry day,

Shut up thine olden pages, and be mute.

Adieu! for, once again, the fierce dispute 5

Betwixt damnation and impassioned clay²

Must I burn through; once more humbly assay³

The bitter-sweet of this Shakespearian fruit.

Chief poet, and ye clouds of Albion,⁴

Begetters of our deep eternal theme! 10

When through the old oak forest I am gone,⁵

Let me not wander in a barren dream;

But when I am consumed in the fire,

Give me new phoenix wings to fly at my desire.

On Sitting Down to Read King Lear Once Again

² clay i.e. flesh.

³ assay test.

⁴ Albion England.

⁵ When through the old oak forest I am gone i.e. when I have finished reading this play ...

Sonnet: ‘When I have fears that I may cease to be’ (composed 22–31 January 1818; edited from MS)

When I have fears that I may cease to be
Before my pen has gleaned my teeming brain,
Before high-piled books, in charact’ry,¹
Hold like rich garners² the full-ripened grain;
When I behold, upon the night’s starred face, 5
Huge cloudy symbols of a high romance,
And think that I may never live to trace
Their shadows, with the magic hand of chance;
And when I feel, fair creature of an hour,³
That I shall never look upon thee more, 10
Never have relish in the fairy power
Of unreflecting love – then on the shore
Of the wide world I stand alone and think,
Till love and fame to nothingness do sink.

Sonnet: ‘When I have fears that I may cease to be’

² garners storehouses for grain.

³ fair creature of an hour According to Woodhouse, Keats was remembering a beautiful woman he had seen at Vauxhall pleasure-garden.

Letter from John Keats to John Hamilton Reynolds, 3 February 1818 (extract)

It may be said that we ought to read our contemporaries, that Wordsworth etc. should have their due from us. But, for the sake of a few fine imaginative or domestic passages, are we to be bullied into a certain philosophy engendered in the whims of an egotist?¹ Every man has his speculations, but every man does not brood and peacock² over them till he makes a false coinage and deceives himself. Many a man can travel to the very bourne of heaven,³ and yet want confidence to put down his half-seeing. Sancho⁴ will invent a journey heavenward as well as anybody. We hate poetry that has a palpable design upon us – and if we do not agree, seems to put its hand in its breeches' pocket.⁵ Poetry should be great and unobtrusive, a thing which enters into one's soul, and does not startle it or amaze it with itself but with its subject. How beautiful are the retired flowers! How would they lose their beauty were they to throng into the highway crying out, 'Admire me, I am a violet!', 'Dote upon me, I am a primrose!' Modern poets differ from the Elizabethans in this: each of the moderns, like an Elector⁶ of Hanover, governs his petty state, and knows how many straws are swept daily from the causeways in all his dominions, and has a continual itching that all the housewives should have their coppers⁷ well-scoured. The ancients were emperors of vast provinces – they had only heard of the remote ones and scarcely cared to visit them. I will cut all this – I will have no more of Wordsworth or Hunt in particular. Why should we be of the tribe of Manasseh, when we can wander with Esau?⁸ Why should we kick against the pricks,⁹ when we can walk on roses? Why should we be owls, when we can be eagles? Why be teased with 'nice-eyed wagtails',¹⁰ when we have in sight 'The cherub Contemplation'?¹¹ Why with Wordsworth's Matthew, 'with a bough of wilding in his hand',¹² when we can have Jaques 'under an oak',¹³ etc. The secret of the bough of wilding will run through your head faster than I can write it. Old Matthew spoke to him some years ago on some nothing, and because he happens in an evening walk to imagine the figure of the old man, he must stamp it down in black and white, and it is henceforth sacred. I don't mean to deny Wordsworth's grandeur and Hunt's merit, but

I mean to say we need not be teased with grandeur and merit, when we can have them uncontaminated and unobtrusive. Let us have the old poets and Robin Hood!

Little ponds that hold the rains,
Where the nice-eyed wagtails glance,
Sipping 'twixt their jerking dance.

Letter from John Keats to John Hamilton Reynolds

1 Keats, like Hazlitt, regarded Wordsworth as too preoccupied with the workings of his own mind.

2 peacock preen himself.

3 the very bourne of heaven the gateway to heaven; Keats alludes to himself, Endymion i 295.

4 Sancho Panza, the comic buffoon who accompanies Don Quixote on his adventures.

5 seems to put its hand...pocket apparently a gesture of defiant hostility.

6 Elector one of the princes of Germany formerly entitled to take part in the election of the emperor.

7 coppers copper fittings (on their front doors, etc.).

8 Why should we...Esau Keats may be thinking of Gideon's comment, 'my family is poor in Manasseh, and I am the least in my father's house' (Judges 6:15). The point is that Manasseh's lands are small, while Esau was a nomad, free to go where he liked. See also Genesis 48:5–20.

9 Why should we...pricks Keats alludes to Acts 9:5: ‘I am Jesus whom thou persecutest: it is hard for thee to kick against the pricks.’

10 nice-eyed wagtails an allusion to Leigh Hunt, ‘The Nymphs’ (1818) ii 169–71:

11 The cherub Contemplation from Milton, ‘Il Penseroso’ 54.

12 with a bough of wilding in his hand! an allusion to Wordsworth, ‘The Two April Mornings’ 59–60.

13 under an oak Keats alludes to As You Like It, where Jaques is described ‘Under an oak, whose antique root peeps out / Upon the brook that brawls along this wood’ (II i 31–2).

Isabella; or, The Pot of Basil: A Story from Boccaccio¹ (composed c.March–27 April 1818)

From Lamia, Isabella, The Eve of St Agnes, and Other Poems (1820)

1

Fair Isabel, poor simple Isabel!

Lorenzo, a young palmer² in Love’s eye!
They could not in the self-same mansion dwell
Without some stir of heart, some malady;
They could not sit at meals but feel how well 5
It soothed each to be the other by;
They could not, sure, beneath the same roof sleep
But to each other dream, and nightly weep.

With every morn their love grew tenderer,
 With every eve deeper and tenderer still; 10
He might not in house, field, or garden stir,
 But her full shape would all his seeing fill;
And his continual voice was pleasanter
 To her, than noise of trees or hidden rill;
Her lute-string gave an echo of his name, 15
She spoilt her half-done broidery with the same.

He knew whose gentle hand was at the latch
 Before the door had given her to his eyes;
And from her chamber-window he would catch
 Her beauty farther than the falcon spies; 20
And constant as her vespers³ would he watch
 Because her face was turned to the same skies;
And with sick longing all the night outwear,
To hear her morning-step upon the stair.

A whole long month of May in this sad plight 25
 Made their cheeks paler by the break⁴ of June:
‘Tomorrow will I bow to my delight,
 Tomorrow will I ask my lady’s boon.’⁵
‘Oh may I never see another night,
 Lorenzo, if thy lips breathe not love’s tune.’ 30
So spake they to their pillows; but, alas,
Honeyless days and days did he let pass

Until sweet Isabella's untouched cheek
Fell sick within the rose's just domain,⁶
Fell thin as a young mother's, who doth seek 35
By every lull to cool her infant's pain:
'How ill she is,' said he, 'I may not speak,
And yet I will, and tell my love all plain:
If looks speak love-laws, I will drink her tears,
And at the least 'twill startle off her cares.' 40

So said he one fair morning, and all day
His heart beat awfully against his side;
And to his heart he inwardly did pray
For power to speak, but still the ruddy tide
Stifled his voice, and pulsed⁷ resolve away, 45
Fevered his high conceit of such a bride,
Yet brought him to the meekness of a child –
Alas, when passion is both meek and wild!

So once more he had waked and anguished
A dreary night of love and misery, 50
If Isabel's quick eye had not been wed
To every symbol⁸ on his forehead high;
She saw it waxing very pale and dead,
And straight all flushed; so, lisped tenderly,
'Lorenzo!' – here she ceased her timid quest, 55
But in her tone and look he read the rest.

'Oh Isabella, I can half perceive
That I may speak my grief into thine ear;

If thou didst ever anything believe,
Believe how I love thee, believe how near 60
My soul is to its doom; I would not grieve
Thy hand by unwelcome pressing, would not fear
Thine eyes⁹ by gazing, but I cannot live
Another night, and not my passion shrive.¹⁰

Love, thou art leading me from wintry cold; 65
Lady, thou leadest me to summer clime,
And I must taste the blossoms that unfold
In its ripe warmth this gracious morning time.
So said, his erewhile timid lips grew bold,
And poesied with hers in dewy rhyme;¹¹ 70
Great bliss was with them, and great happiness
Grew, like a lusty flower in June's caress.

10

Parting they seemed to tread upon the air,
Twin roses by the zephyr blown apart
Only to meet again more close, and share 75
The inward fragrance of each other's heart.
She, to her chamber gone, a ditty fair
Sang, of delicious love and honeyed dart;¹²
He with light steps went up a western hill
And bade the sun farewell, and joyed his fill.¹³ 80

11

All close they met again, before the dusk
Had taken from the stars its pleasant veil,
All close they met, all eves, before the dusk

Had taken from the stars its pleasant veil,
Close in a bower of hyacinth and musk, 85
Unknown of any, free from whispering tale.
Ah, better had it been for ever so,
Than idle ears should pleasure in their woe!

12

Were they unhappy then? It cannot be.
Too many tears for lovers have been shed, 90
Too many sighs give we to them in fee,¹⁴
Too much of pity after they are dead,
Too many doleful stories do we see
Whose matter in bright gold were best be read –
Except in such a page where Theseus' spouse¹⁵ 95
Over the pathless waves towards him bows.

13

But for the general award of love,
The little sweet doth kill much bitterness;
Though Dido silent is in under-grove,¹⁶
And Isabella's was a great distress, 100
Though young Lorenzo in warm Indian clove
Was not embalmed, this truth is not the less –
Even bees, the little almsmen of spring-bowers,
Know there is richest juice in poison-flowers.

14

With her two brothers¹⁷ this fair lady dwelt, 105
Enriched from ancestral merchandize,
And for them many a weary hand did swelt¹⁸
In torched mines and noisy factories,

And many once proud-quivered loins did melt
In blood from stinging whip; with hollow eyes 110
Many all day in dazzling river stood
To take the rich-ored driftings of the flood.19

15

For them the Ceylon diver held his breath,
And went all naked to the hungry shark;
For them his ears gushed blood; for them in death 115
The seal on the cold ice with piteous bark
Lay full of darts; for them alone did seethe
A thousand men in troubles wide and dark:
Half-ignorant, they turned an easy wheel
That set sharp racks at work, to pinch and peel. 120

16

Why were they proud? Because their marble founts
Gushed with more pride than do a wretch's tears?
Why were they proud? Because fair orange mounts20
Were of more soft ascent than lazar stairs?21
Why were they proud? Because red-lined accounts 125
Were richer than the songs of Grecian years?
Why were they proud? – again we ask aloud,
Why in the name of glory were they proud?

17

Yet were these Florentines as self-retired
In hungry pride and gainful cowardice 130
As two close Hebrews in that land inspired,22
Paled in and vineyarded from beggar-spies23 –
The hawks of ship-mast forests, the untired

And panniered mules for ducats and old lies,
Quick cat's-paws on the generous stray-away,²⁴ 135
Great wits in Spanish, Tuscan, and Malay.

18

How was it these same ledger-men could spy
Fair Isabella in her downy nest?
How could they find out in Lorenzo's eye
A straying from his toil? Hot Egypt's pest²⁵ 140
Into their vision covetous and sly!
How could these moneybags see east and west?
Yet so they did – and every dealer fair
Must see behind, as doth the hunted hare.

19

Oh eloquent and famed Boccaccio! 145
Of thee we now should ask forgiving boon,²⁶
And of thy spicy myrtles as they blow,
And of thy roses amorous of the moon,
And of thy lilies, that do paler grow
Now they can no more hear thy gittern's²⁷ tune, 150
For venturing syllables that ill beseem
The quiet glooms of such a piteous theme.

20

Grant thou a pardon here, and then the tale
Shall move on soberly, as it is meet;
There is no other crime, no mad assail 155
To make old prose in modern rhyme more sweet:
But it is done (succeed the verse or fail)
To honour thee, and thy gone spirit greet;

To stead²⁸ thee as a verse in English tongue,
An echo of thee in the north-wind sung. 160

21

These brethren having found by many signs
What love Lorenzo for their sister had,
And how she loved him too, each unconfines
His bitter thoughts to other, well nigh mad
That he, the servant of their trade designs, 165
Should in their sister's love be blithe and glad,
When 'twas their plan to coax her by degrees
To some high noble and his olive-trees.²⁹

22

And many a jealous conference had they,
And many times they bit their lips alone 170
Before they fixed upon a surest way
To make the youngster for his crime atone;
And at the last, these men of cruel clay
Cut Mercy with a sharp knife to the bone –
For they resolved in some forest dim 175
To kill Lorenzo, and there bury him.

23

So on a pleasant morning, as he leant
Into the sunrise, o'er the balustrade
Of the garden-terrace, towards him they bent
Their footing through the dews, and to him said, 180
'You seem there in the quiet of content,
Lorenzo, and we are most loath to invade
Calm speculation; but if you are wise,
Bestride your steed while cold is in the skies:

24

Today we purpose, aye, this hour we mount 185
 To spur three leagues towards the Apennine.
Come down, we pray thee, ere the hot sun count
 His dewy rosary on the eglantine.’
Lorenzo, courteously as he was wont,
 Bowed a fair greeting to these serpents’ whine, 190
And went in haste, to get in readiness
With belt, and spur, and bracing huntsman’s dress.

25

And as he to the courtyard passed along,
 Each third step did he pause, and listened oft
If he could hear his lady’s matin-song 195
 Or the light whisper of her footstep soft;
And as he thus over his passion hung,
 He heard a laugh full musical aloft,
When, looking up, he saw her features bright
Smile through an in-door lattice, 30 all delight. 200

26

‘Love, Isabel!’ said he, ‘I was in pain
 Lest I should miss to bid thee a good morrow;
Ah, what if I should lose thee, when so fain
 I am to stifle all the heavy sorrow
Of a poor three hours’ absence? But we’ll gain 205
 Out of the amorous dark what day doth borrow.
Goodbye! I’ll soon be back.’ ‘Goodbye!’ said she,
And as he went she chanted merrily.

27

So the two brothers and their murdered man³¹
Rode past fair Florence, to where Arno's stream 210
Gurgles through straitened banks, and still doth fan
Itself with dancing bulrush, and the bream
Keeps head against the freshets.³² Sick and wan
The brothers' faces in the ford did seem;
Lorenzo's flush with love. They passed the water 215
Into a forest quiet for the slaughter.

28

There was Lorenzo slain and buried in,
There in that forest did his great love cease.
Ah, when a soul doth thus its freedom win,
It aches in loneliness – is ill at peace 220
As the break-covert bloodhounds³³ of such sin:
They dipped their swords in the water, and did tease
Their horses homeward with convulsed spur,
Each richer by his being a murderer.

29

They told their sister how, with sudden speed, 225
Lorenzo had ta'en ship for foreign lands
Because of some great urgency and need
In their affairs, requiring trusty hands.
Poor girl, put on thy stifling widow's weed,
And 'scape at once from hope's accursed bands! 230
Today thou wilt not see him, nor tomorrow,
And the next day will be a day of sorrow.

30

She weeps alone for pleasures not to be;
Sorely she wept until the night came on,

And then, instead of love – oh misery! – 235
She brooded o'er the luxury³⁴ alone:
His image in the dusk she seemed to see,
And to the silence made a gentle moan,
Spreading her perfect arms upon the air,
And on her couch low murmuring, 'Where, oh where?' 240

31

But Selfishness, Love's cousin, held not long
Its fiery vigil in her single breast;
She fretted for the golden hour, and hung
Upon the time with feverish unrest
Not long – for soon into her heart a throng 245
Of higher occupants, a richer zest,
Came tragic: passion not to be subdued,
And sorrow for her love in travels rude.

32

In the middays of autumn, on their eves,
The breath of winter comes from far away, 250
And the sick west³⁵ continually bereaves
Of some gold tinge, and plays a roundelay
Of death among the bushes and the leaves,
To make all bare before he dares to stray
From his north cavern. So sweet Isabel 255
By gradual decay from beauty fell

33

Because Lorenzo came not. Oftentimes
She asked her brothers, with an eye all pale,
Striving to be itself, what dungeon climes
Could keep him off so long? They spake a tale 260

Time after time, to quiet her. Their crimes

Came on them like a smoke from Hinnom's vale,³⁶
And every night in dreams they groaned aloud
To see their sister in her snowy shroud.

34

And she had died in drowsy ignorance, 265
But for a thing more deadly dark than all;
It came like a fierce potion drunk by chance
Which saves a sick man from the feathered pall
For some few gasping moments; like a lance
Waking an Indian from his cloudy hall 270
With cruel pierce, and bringing him again
Sense of the gnawing fire at heart and brain.

35

It was a vision. In the drowsy gloom,
The dull of midnight, at her couch's foot
Lorenzo stood and wept: the forest tomb 275
Had marred his glossy hair which once could shoot
Lustre into the sun, and put cold doom
Upon his lips, and taken the soft lute
From his lorn³⁷ voice, and past his loamed ears
Had made a miry channel for his tears. 280

36

Strange sound it was when the pale shadow spake;
For there was striving in its piteous tongue
To speak as when on earth it was awake,
And Isabella on its music hung:
Languor there was in it, and tremulous shake, 285
As in a palsied Druid's harp unstrung;

And through it moaned a ghostly undersong
Like hoarse night-gusts sepulchral briars among.

37

Its eyes, though wild, were still all dewy bright
With love, and kept all phantom fear aloof 290
From the poor girl by magic of their light,

The while it did unthread the horrid woof³⁸
Of the late darkened time, the murderous spite
Of pride and avarice, the dark pine roof
In the forest, and the sodden turfed dell 295
Where, without any word, from stabs he fell –

38

Saying moreover, ‘Isabel, my sweet!
Red whortleberries droop above my head,
And a large flintstone weighs upon my feet;
Around me beeches and high chestnuts shed 300
Their leaves and prickly nuts; a sheepfold bleat
Comes from beyond the river to my bed:
Go, shed one tear upon my heather-bloom,
And it shall comfort me within the tomb.

39

I am a shadow now – alas, alas! – 305
Upon the skirts of human nature dwelling
Alone. I chant alone the holy mass
While little sounds of life are round me knelling,
And glossy bees at noon do fieldward pass,
And many a chapel bell the hour is telling, 310
Paining me through; those sounds grow strange to me,
And thou art distant in humanity.

40

I know what was, I feel full well what is,
And I should rage, if spirits could go mad;
Though I forget the taste of earthly bliss, 315
That paleness³⁹ warms my grave, as though I had
A seraph chosen from the bright abyss
To be my spouse: thy paleness makes me glad;
Thy beauty grows upon me, and I feel
A greater love through all my essence steal.’⁴⁰ 320

41

The spirit mourned ‘Adieu!’, dissolved, and left
The atom darkness in a slow turmoil,
As when of healthful midnight sleep bereft,
Thinking on rugged hours and fruitless toil,
We put our eyes into a pillowy cleft, 325
And see the spangly gloom froth up and boil:
It made sad Isabella’s eyelids ache,
And in the dawn she started up awake.

42

‘Ha ha!’ said she, ‘I knew not this hard life,
I thought the worst was simple misery; 330
I thought some fate with pleasure or with strife
Portioned us – happy days or else to die!
But there is crime: a brother’s bloody knife.
Sweet spirit, thou hast schooled my infancy:
I’ll visit thee for this, and kiss thine eyes, 335
And greet thee morn and even in the skies.’

43

When the full morning came, she had devised
How she might secret to the forest hie;
How she might find the clay, so dearly prized,
And sing to it one latest lullaby; 340

How her short absence might be unsurmised⁴¹
While she the inmost of the dream would try.
Resolved, she took with her an aged nurse,
And went into that dismal forest-hearse.⁴²

44

See, as they creep along the riverside, 345
How she doth whisper to that aged dame,
And after looking round the champaign⁴³ wide
Shows her a knife. 'What feverous hectic flame
Burns in thee, child? What good can thee betide,
That thou shouldst smile again?' The evening came, 350
And they had found Lorenzo's earthly bed:
The flint was there, the berries at his head.

45

Who hath not loitered in a green churchyard
And let his spirit, like a demon-mole,
Work through the clayey soil and gravel hard 355
To see skull, coffined bones, and funeral stole,⁴⁴
Pitying each form that hungry death hath marred,
And filling it once more with human soul?
Ah, this is holiday to what was felt
When Isabella by Lorenzo knelt! 360

46

She gazed into the fresh-thrown mould as though
One glance did fully all its secrets tell;

Clearly she saw, as other eyes would know
Pale limbs at bottom of a crystal well;
Upon the murderous spot she seemed to grow, 365
Like to a native lily of the dell –
Then with her knife, all sudden, she began
To dig more fervently than misers can.

47

Soon she turned up a soiled glove whereon
Her silk had played in purple fantasies;⁴⁵ 370
She kissed it with a lip more chill than stone
And put it in her bosom, where it dries
And freezes utterly unto the bone
Those dainties made to still an infant's cries.⁴⁶
Then 'gan she work again, nor stayed her care, 375
But to throw back at times her veiling hair.

48

That old nurse stood beside her wondering
Until her heart felt pity to the core
At sight of such a dismal labouring,
And so she kneeled, with her locks all hoar,⁴⁷ 380
And put her lean hands to the horrid thing:
Three hours they laboured at this travail sore.⁴⁸
At last they felt the kernel of the grave,
And Isabella did not stamp and rave.

49

Ah, wherefore all this wormy circumstance? 385
Why linger at the yawning tomb so long?
Oh for the gentleness of old romance,
The simple plaining of a minstrel's song!

Fair reader, at the old tale take a glance,
For here, in truth, it doth not well belong 390
To speak; oh turn thee to the very tale,
And taste the music of that vision pale.

50

With duller steel than the Perséan sword⁴⁹
They cut away no formless monster's head,
But one whose gentleness did well accord 395
With death, as life. The ancient harps have said
Love never dies but lives, immortal Lord:
If Love impersonate was ever dead,
Pale Isabella kissed it and low moaned;
'Twas love, cold – dead indeed, but not dethroned. 400

51

In anxious secrecy they took it home,
And then the prize was all for Isabel:
She calmed its wild hair with a golden comb,
And all around each eye's sepulchral cell
Pointed each fringed lash; the smeared loam 405
With tears, as chilly as a dripping well,
She drenched away – and still she combed, and kept
Sighing all day, and still she kissed and wept.

52

Then in a silken scarf, sweet with the dews
Of precious flowers plucked in Araby, 410
And divine liquids come with odorous ooze
Through the cold serpent-pipe⁵⁰ refreshfully,
She wrapped it up and for its tomb did choose
A garden-pot wherein she laid it by,

And covered it with mould, and o'er it set 415
Sweet basil, which her tears kept ever wet.

53

And she forgot the stars, the moon and sun,
 And she forgot the blue above the trees,
And she forgot the dells where waters run,
 And she forgot the chilly autumn breeze; 420
She had no knowledge when the day was done,
 And the new morn she saw not, but in peace
Hung over her sweet basil evermore,
And moistened it with tears unto the core.

54

And so she ever fed it with thin tears, 425
 Whence thick and green and beautiful it grew,
So that it smelt more balmy than its peers
 Of basil-tufts in Florence; for it drew
Nurture besides, and life, from human fears,
 From the fast-mouldering head there shut from view; 430
So that the jewel, safely casketed,
Came forth, and in perfumed leafits spread.

55

Oh Melancholy, linger here awhile!
 Oh Music, Music, breathe despondingly!
Oh Echo, Echo, from some sombre isle 435
 Unknown, Lethean, 51 sigh to us, oh sigh!
Spirits in grief, lift up your heads and smile –
 Lift up your heads, sweet spirits, heavily,
And make a pale light in your cypress glooms,
Tinting with silver wan your marble tombs. 440

56

Moan hither, all ye syllables of woe,
From the deep throat of sad Melpomene!⁵²
Through bronzed lyre in tragic order go
And touch the strings into a mystery;
Sound mournfully upon the winds and low – 445
For simple Isabel is soon to be
Among the dead: she withers like a palm
Cut by an Indian for its juicy balm.

57

Oh leave the palm to wither by itself,
Let not quick winter chill its dying hour! 450
It may not be – those Baälites of pelf,⁵³
Her brethren, noted the continual shower
From her dead eyes, and many a curious elf
Among her kindred wondered that such dower
Of youth and beauty should be thrown aside 455
By one marked out to be a noble's bride.

58

And furthermore her brethren wondered much
Why she sat drooping by the basil green,
And why it flourished as by magic touch –
Greatly they wondered what the thing might mean! 460
They could not surely give belief, that such
A very nothing would have power to wean
Her from her own fair youth and pleasures gay,
And even remembrance of her love's delay.

59

Therefore they watched a time when they might sift 465
 This hidden whim – and long they watched in vain,
For seldom did she go to chapel-shrift,⁵⁴
 And seldom felt she any hunger-pain;
And when she left, she hurried back as swift
 As bird on wing to breast its eggs again, 470
And, patient as a hen-bird, sat her there
Beside her basil, weeping through her hair.

60

Yet they contrived to steal the basil-pot,
 And to examine it in secret place:
The thing was vile with green and livid spot, 475
 And yet they knew it was Lorenzo's face.
The guerdon⁵⁵ of their murder they had got,
 And so left Florence in a moment's space,
Never to turn again. Away they went,
With blood upon their heads, to banishment. 480

61

Oh Melancholy, turn thine eyes away!
 Oh Music, Music, breathe despondingly!
Oh Echo, Echo, on some other day,
 From isles Lethean, sigh to us, oh sigh!
Spirits of grief, sing not your 'Well-a-way!', 485
 For Isabel, sweet Isabel, will die –
Will die a death too lone and incomplete
Now they have ta'en away her basil sweet.

62

Piteous she looked on dead and senseless things,
 Asking for her lost basil amorously; 490

And with melodious chuckle in the strings

Of her lorn voice,⁵⁶ she oftentimes would cry
After the pilgrim in his wanderings

To ask him where her basil was, and why
'Twas hid from her – 'For cruel 'tis', said she, 495
'To steal my basil-pot away from me.'

63

And so she pined, and so she died forlorn,

Imploring for her basil to the last;
No heart was there in Florence but did mourn
In pity of her love, so overcast. 500

And a sad ditty of this story borne
From mouth to mouth through all the country passed;
Still is the burthen sung: 'O cruelty,
To steal my basil-pot away from me!'

Isabella

¹ Keats based his poem on the fifth novel of the fourth day in Boccaccio's Decameron. He sticks fairly closely to the original.

² palmer pilgrim.

³ vespers evening prayers.

⁴ break beginning.

⁵ boon favour.

⁶ within the rose's just domain the part of the cheek that is pink.

⁷ pulsed drove.

8 symbol indication (of his lovesickness), which Isabella is quick to notice.

9 would not fear Thine eyes Lorenzo does not want to make her fearful by gazing devotedly at her.

10 shrive confess.

11 And poesied with hers in dewy rhyme that is, they kissed.

12 honeyed dart Cupid's arrows were believed to be tipped with gall and honey.

13 joyed his fill felt completely joyful.

14 in fee as their rightful due.

15 Theseus' spouse Ariadne fell in love with Theseus at first sight, and helped him find his way out of the minotaur's labyrinth.

16 Though Dido silent is in under-grove Dido, Queen of Carthage, loved Aeneas but was abandoned by him, and committed suicide. The wanderings of her forlorn ghost are described by Virgil, Aeneid vi 451.

17 two brothers There are three in Boccaccio, and they are not exploitative businessmen, as here.

18 swelt sweltered, suffered oppressive heat.

19 To take the rich-ored driftings of the flood that is, they panned for gold.

20 orange-mounts hills with orange trees on them.

21 lazar stairs a staircase in a lazar-house (house for diseased people, especially those suffering from leprosy).

22 that land inspired Palestine.

23 beggar-spies those who, were they to have contact with the brothers, might reveal to them the pains and sufferings of poverty, from which the brothers have insulated themselves.

24 Quick cat's-paws on the generous stray-away The alert ruffian cons money out of the innocent runaway.

25 Hot Egypt's pest The plague of darkness visited upon the Egyptians (Exodus 10:21–3).

26 forgiving boon the blessing of forgiveness.

27 gittern's a cithern is a sort of guitar dating back to the sixteenth century.

28 stead serve.

29 olive-trees i.e. estates.

30 in-door lattice Barnard suggests that this refers to a door with a lattice window set into it, rather than a lattice window in one of the building's outside walls.

31 their murdered man This line is famous as an example of 'prolepsis', the figure of speech whereby a future action is anticipated. It was first praised by Charles Lamb: 'The anticipation of the assassination is wonderfully conceived in one epithet.'

32 freshets fresh water streams.

33 break-covert bloodhounds hunting-dogs breaking cover in pursuit of their prey. Keats means that the victim's soul is as uneasy ('ill at peace') as those of his murderers ('the break-covert bloodhounds').

34 the luxury It is typical of Keats that Isabella's mounting grief should be a 'luxury'; that is, something intensely, keenly and painfully experienced.

35 the sick west the west wind.

36 Hinnom's vale Keats knew of this valley, to the south of Jerusalem, from the Bible: 'He burnt incense in the valley of the son of Hinnom, and burnt his children in the fire, after the abominations of the heathen' (2 Chronicles 28:3).

37 lorn ruined.

38 woof fabric. Keats uses the term metaphorically: the ghost reveals to Isabella the substance of what happened to him.

39 That paleness Isabella is pale-skinned.

40 Thy beauty grows upon me...my essence steal Keats quoted this couplet in his letter to Fanny Brawne of February 1820: 'In my present state of health I feel too much separated from you and could almost speak to you in the words of Lorenzo's ghost to Isabella' (Rollins ii 256).

41 unsurmised unnoticed.

42 forest-hearse forest-tomb; the forest where Lorenzo was buried.

43 champaign level, open countryside.

44 stole robe.

45 Her silk had played in purple fantasies she had embroidered the glove in purple silk.

46 Those dainties made to still an infant's cries i.e. her breasts.

47 hoar grey.

48 travail sore difficult task.

49 the Perséan sword Perseus was given a scythe-shaped sword with which to cut off the Gorgon's head.

50 cold serpent-pipe pipes coiled like snakes, through which the perfumes ('divine liquids') were distilled from 'precious flowers plucked in Araby'.

51 Lethean forgotten.

52 sad Melpomene Muse of Tragedy.

53 Baälites of pelf worshippers of money.

54 chapel-shrift confession.

55 guerdon reward, benefit.

56 her lorn voice Like that of Lorenzo, Isabella's voice is also now ruined ('lorn'), so that she can do no more than 'chuckle' with the music.

Letter from John Keats to John Hamilton Reynolds, 3 May 1818 (extract)

I will return to Wordsworth, whether or no he has an extended vision or a circumscribed grandeur, whether he is an eagle in his nest or on the wing. And to be more explicit and to show you how tall I stand by the giant, I will put down a simile of human life as far as I now perceive it – that is, to the point to which I say we both have arrived at. Well, I compare human life to a large mansion of many apartments,¹ two of which I can only describe, the doors of the rest being as yet shut upon me. The first we step into we call the infant or thoughtless chamber, in which we remain as long as we do not think. We remain there a long while, and, notwithstanding the doors of the second chamber remain wide open, showing a bright appearance, we care not to hasten to it, but are at length imperceptibly impelled by the awakening of the thinking principle within us. We no sooner get into the second chamber, which I shall call the chamber of maiden thought, than we become intoxicated with the light and the atmosphere, we see nothing but pleasant wonders, and think of delaying there forever in delight. However, among the effects this breathing² is father of, is that tremendous one of sharpening one's vision into the heart and nature of man, of convincing one's nerves that the world is full of misery and heartbreak, pain, sickness, and oppression – whereby this chamber of maiden thought becomes gradually darkened and, at the same time, on all sides of it many doors are set open – but all dark, all leading to dark passages. We see not the balance of good and evil. We are in a mist. We are now in that state. We feel the 'burden of the mystery'.³ To this point was Wordsworth come, as far as I can conceive, when he wrote 'Tintern Abbey', and it seems to me that his genius is explorative of those dark passages. Now if we live, and go on thinking, we too shall explore them. He is a genius and superior to us, insofar as he can, more than we, make discoveries, and shed a light in them. Here I must think Wordsworth is deeper than Milton, though I think it has depended more upon the general and gregarious advance of intellect, than individual greatness of mind. From the Paradise Lost and the other works of Milton, I hope it is not too presuming (even between ourselves) to say, his philosophy, human and divine, may be tolerably understood by one not much advanced in years. In his time, Englishmen were just emancipated from a great superstition⁴ – and men had got hold of certain points and resting-places in reasoning which were too newly born to be doubted, and too much opposed by the mass of Europe not to be thought ethereal and authentically divine. Who could gainsay his ideas on virtue, vice, and chastity in Comus, just at the time of the dismissal of codpieces,⁵ and a hundred other disgraces? Who would not rest satisfied with his hintings at good and evil in the Paradise Lost, when just free from the Inquisition⁶

and burning in Smithfield?⁷ The Reformation produced such immediate and great benefits, that Protestantism was considered under the immediate eye of heaven, and its own remaining dogmas and superstitions then, as it were, regenerated, constituted those resting-places and seeming sure points of reasoning. From that I have mentioned, Milton, whatever he may have thought in the sequel, appears to have been content with these by his writings. He did not think into the human heart, as Wordsworth has done; yet Milton as a philosopher had sure as great powers as Wordsworth. What is then to be inferred? Oh, many things. It proves there is really a grand march of intellect; it proves that a mighty providence subdues the mightiest minds to the service of the time being, whether it be in human knowledge or religion...

Letter from John Keats to John Hamilton Reynolds

¹ a large mansion...apartments cf. John 14:2: 'In my Father's house are many mansions.'

² breathing influence.

³ burden of the mystery from 'Tintern Abbey' 39.

⁴ a great superstition the Roman Catholic Church.

⁵ the dismissal of codpieces Codpieces (bagged appendages, often highly ornamented, worn by men on the front of breeches), went out of fashion in the last half of the seventeenth century. Milton's Comus was written in 1634.

Portugal, and the Spanish and Portuguese colonies. The Spanish Inquisition, reorganized 1478–83, became notorious in the sixteenth century for its severities. It was abolished in France in 1772, and in Spain finally in 1834. The Congregation of the Holy Office still exists, but is chiefly concerned with heretical literature.

¹ burning in Smithfield many Protestants were burned, roasted or boiled alive in Smithfield in the City of London during Mary's reign.

Letter from John Keats to Richard Woodhouse, 27 October 1818¹

My dear Woodhouse,

Your letter gave me a great satisfaction, more on account of its friendliness than any relish of that matter in it which is accounted so acceptable in the 'genus irritabile'.² The best answer I can give you is, in a clerk-like manner, to make some observations on two principal points, which seem to point like indices into the midst of the whole pro and con, about genius, and views, and achievements, and ambition, etc.

First: as to the poetical character itself (I mean that sort of which, if I am anything, I am a member – that sort distinguished from the Wordsworthian or egotistical sublime, which is a thing per se and stands alone),³ it is not itself – it has no self – it is everything and nothing – it has no character – it enjoys light and shade – it lives in gusto,⁴ be it foul or fair, high or low, rich or poor, mean or elevated. It has as much delight in conceiving an Iago as an Imogen.⁵ What shocks the virtuous philosopher delights the chameleon poet. It does no harm from its relish of the dark side of things, any more than from its taste for the bright one – because they both end in speculation. A poet is the most unpoetical of any thing in existence, because he has no identity, he is continually in for – and filling – some other body. The sun, the moon, the sea, and men and women who are creatures of impulse, are poetical, and have about them an unchangeable attribute; the poet has none, no identity – he is certainly the most unpoetical of all God's creatures. If, then, he has no self, and if I am a poet, where is the wonder that I should say I would write no more? Might I not at that very instant have been cogitating on the characters of Saturn and Ops?⁶ It is a wretched thing to confess, but is a very fact that not one word I ever utter can be taken for granted as an opinion growing out of my identical nature – how can it, when I have no nature? When I am in a room with people, if I ever am free from speculating on creations of my own brain, then not myself goes home to myself: but the identity of everyone in the room begins so to press upon me, that I am, in a very little time, annihilated – not only among men; it would be the same in a nursery of children. I know not whether I make myself wholly understood. I hope enough so to let you see that no dependence is to be placed on what I said that day.

In the second place I will speak of my views, and of the life I purpose to myself. I am ambitious of doing the world some good – if I should be spared, that may be the work of maturer years. In the interval I will assay to reach to as high a summit in poetry as the nerve bestowed upon me will suffer. The faint conceptions I have of poems to come brings the blood frequently into my forehead. All I hope is that I may not lose all interest in human affairs, that the solitary indifference I feel for applause, even from the finest spirits, will not blunt any acuteness of vision I may have. I do not think it will – I feel assured I should write from the mere yearning and fondness I have for the beautiful, even if my night's labours should be burnt every morning and no eye ever shine upon them.

But even now I am perhaps not speaking from myself, but from some character in whose soul I now live. I am sure, however, that this next sentence is from myself. I feel your anxiety, good opinion, and friendliness, in the highest degree, and am

Yours most sincerely

John Keats

Letter from John Keats to Richard Woodhouse

¹ This important letter about negative capability was the occasion for Woodhouse's equally important summary of it in correspondence with

John Taylor on the same day; see pp. 1067–9.

2 genus irritabile from Horace, Epistles II ii 102.

3 Troilus and Cressida I ii 15–16: ‘he is a very man per se, / And stands alone.’

4 gusto as an admirer of Hazlitt, Keats uses this word as meaning ‘power or passion defining any object’ (see p. 1388); that is to say, it is one of the highest attributes of the creative imagination.

5 Iago is the villain of Othello, Imogen the daughter to Cymbeline by a former Queen in Cymbeline.

6 Saturn and Ops are characters in ‘Hyperion’. Ops is usually identified with Cybele, wife of Saturn.

Hyperion: A Fragment (composed late September–1 December 1818; abandoned April 1819)1

From Lamia, Isabella, The Eve of St Agnes, and Other Poems (1820)

Book I

Deep in the shady sadness of a vale
Far sunken from the healthy breath of morn,
Far from the fiery noon, and eve’s one star,
Sat grey-haired Saturn,2 quiet as a stone,
Still as the silence round about his lair; 5
Forest on forest hung about his head
Like cloud on cloud. No stir of air was there,

Not so much life as on a summer's day
Robs not one light seed from the feathered grass,
But where the dead leaf fell, there did it rest. 10
A stream went voiceless by, still deadened more
By reason of his fallen divinity
Spreading a shade; the naiad³ mid her reeds
Pressed her cold finger closer to her lips.
 Along the margin-sand large footmarks went, 15
No further than to where his feet had strayed,
And slept there since. Upon the sodden ground
His old right hand lay nerveless,⁴ listless, dead,
Unsceptred; and his realmless eyes were closed,
While his bowed head seemed list'ning to the earth, 20
His ancient mother, for some comfort yet.
 It seemed no force could wake him from his place;
But there came one who, with a kindred hand
Touched his wide shoulders, after bending low
With reverence, though to one who knew it not. 25
She was a goddess of the infant world;
By her in stature the tall Amazon
Had stood a pigmy's height – she would have ta'en
Achilles by the hair and bent his neck,
Or with a finger stayed Ixion's wheel.⁵ 30
Her face was large as that of Memphian sphinx,⁶
Pedestalled haply in a palace court
When sages looked to Egypt for their lore.
But oh, how unlike marble was that face!
How beautiful, if sorrow had not made 35
Sorrow more beautiful than Beauty's self.
There was a listening fear in her regard,
As if calamity had but begun;
As if the vanward clouds of evil days
Had spent their malice, and the sullen rear 40
Was with its stored thunder labouring up.⁷

One hand she pressed upon that aching spot
 Where beats the human heart, as if just there,
 Though an immortal, she felt cruel pain;
 The other upon Saturn's bended neck 45
 She laid, and to the level of his ear
 Leaning with parted lips, some words she spake
 In solemn tenor and deep organ tone,
 Some mourning words which in our feeble tongue
 Would come in these like accents (oh how frail 50 To⁸ that large utterance of the early gods!),
 'Saturn, look up! – though wherefore, poor old King?
 I have no comfort for thee, no, not one;
 I cannot say, "Oh wherefore sleepest thou?"
 For heaven is parted from thee, and the earth 55
 Knows thee not, thus afflicted, for a god;
 And ocean too, with all its solemn noise,
 Has from thy sceptre passed, and all the air
 Is emptied of thine hoary majesty.
 Thy thunder, conscious of the new command,⁹ 60
 Rumbles reluctant o'er our fallen house,
 And thy sharp lightning in unpractised hands
 Scorches and burns our once serene domain.¹⁰
 Oh aching time! Oh moments big as years!
 All as ye pass swell out the monstrous truth, 65
 And press it so upon our weary griefs
 That unbelief has not a space to breathe.
 Saturn, sleep on! Oh thoughtless, why did I
 Thus violate thy slumbrous solitude?
 Why should I ope thy melancholy eyes? 70
 Saturn, sleep on, while at thy feet I weep!
 As when, upon a tranced summer night,
 Those green-robed senators of mighty woods,
 Tall oaks, branch-charmed by the earnest stars,
 Dream, and so dream all night without a stir, 75
 Save from one gradual solitary gust

Which comes upon the silence, and dies off
As if the ebbing air had but one wave;
So came these words and went, the while in tears
She touched her fair large forehead to the ground, 80
Just where her falling hair might be outspread,
A soft and silken mat for Saturn's feet.
One moon, with alteration slow, had shed
Her silver seasons four upon the night,
And still these two were postured motionless, 85
Like natural sculpture in cathedral cavern¹¹ –
The frozen god still couchant¹² on the earth,
And the sad goddess weeping at his feet.
Until at length old Saturn lifted up
His faded eyes, and saw his kingdom gone, 90
And all the gloom and sorrow of the place,
And that fair kneeling goddess, and then spake
As with a palsied¹³ tongue, and while his beard
Shook horrid¹⁴ with such aspen¹⁵ malady:
'Oh tender spouse of gold Hyperion,¹⁶ 95
Thea, I feel thee ere I see thy face;
Look up, and let me see our doom in it,
Look up, and tell me if this feeble shape
Is Saturn's; tell me if thou hear'st the voice
Of Saturn; tell me if this wrinkling brow, 100
Naked and bare of its great diadem,¹⁷
Peers like the front¹⁸ of Saturn. Who had power
To make me desolate? Whence came the strength?
How was it nurtured to such bursting forth,
While Fate seemed strangled in my nervous¹⁹ grasp? 105
But it is so, and I am smothered up
And buried from all godlike exercise
Of influence benign on planets pale,²⁰
Of admonitions to the winds and seas,

Of peaceful sway above man's harvesting, 110
 And all those acts which deity supreme
 Doth ease its heart of love in. I am gone
 Away from my own bosom; I have left
 My strong identity, my real self,²¹
 Somewhere between the throne and where I sit 115
 Here on this spot of earth. Search, Thea, search!
 Open thine eyes eterne,²² and sphere them round
 Upon all space – space starred, and lorn of light;
 Space regioned with life-air, and barren void;
 Spaces of fire, and all the yawn of hell. 120
 Search, Thea, search! And tell me if thou seest
 A certain shape or shadow, making way
 With wings or chariot fierce to repossess
 A heaven he lost erewhile: it must – it must
 Be of ripe progress; Saturn must be King. 125
 Yes, there must be a golden victory;
 There must be gods thrown down, and trumpets blown
 Of triumph calm, and hymns of festival
 Upon the gold clouds metropolitan,²³
 Voices of soft proclaim, and silver stir 130
 Of strings in hollow shells; and there shall be
 Beautiful things made new, for the surprise
 Of the sky-children. I will give command:
 Thea! Thea! Thea! Where is Saturn?
 This passion lifted him upon his feet, 135
 And made his hands to struggle in the air,
 His Druid locks²⁴ to shake and ooze with sweat,
 His eyes to fever out, his voice to cease.
 He stood, and heard not Thea's sobbing deep;
 A little time, and then again he snatched 140
 Utterance thus: 'But cannot I create?
 Cannot I form? Cannot I fashion forth
 Another world, another universe,

To overbear and crumble this to naught?
 Where is another chaos? Where?' That word 145
 Found way unto Olympus,²⁵ and made quake
 The rebel three.²⁶ Thea was startled up,
 And in her bearing was a sort of hope
 As thus she quick-voiced spake, yet full of awe:
 'This cheers our fallen house; come to our friends,²⁷ 150
 Oh Saturn, come away and give them heart!
 I know the covert,²⁸ for thence came I hither.'
 Thus brief, then with beseeching eyes she went
 With backward footing through the shade a space;
 He followed, and she turned to lead the way 155
 Through aged boughs that yielded like the mist
 Which eagles cleave upmounting from their nest.
 Meanwhile in other realms big tears were shed,
 More sorrow like to this, and suchlike woe
 Too huge for mortal tongue or pen of scribe. 160
 The Titans fierce, self-hid, or prison-bound,
 Groaned for the old allegiance once more,
 And listened in sharp pain for Saturn's voice.
 But one of the whole mammoth-brood still kept
 His sov'ainty, and rule, and majesty: 165
 Blazing Hyperion on his orb'd fire²⁹
 Still sat, still snuffed the incense, teeming up
 From man to the sun's god – yet unsecure.
 For as among us mortals omens drear
 Fright and perplex, so also shuddered he – 170
 Not at dog's howl, or gloom-bird's³⁰ hated screech,
 Or the familiar visiting of one
 Upon the first toll of his passing-bell,³¹
 Or prophesyings of the midnight lamp,
 But horrors portioned³² to a giant nerve 175
 Oft made Hyperion ache. His palace bright,

Bastioned with pyramids of glowing gold,
And touched with shade of bronzed obelisks,
Glared a blood-red through all its thousand courts,
Arches, and domes, and fiery galleries; 180
And all its curtains of aurorean³³ clouds
Flushed angrily,³⁴ while sometimes eagle's wings
(Unseen before by gods or wondering men)
Darkened the place; and neighing steeds were heard,
Not heard before by gods or wondering men. 185
Also, when he would taste the spicy wreaths
Of incense, breathed aloft from sacred hills,
Instead of sweets, his ample palate took
Savour of poisonous brass and metal sick.
And so, when harboured in the sleepy west 190
After the full completion of fair day,
For rest divine upon exalted couch
And slumber in the arms of melody,
He paced away the pleasant hours of ease
With stride colossal on from hall to hall; 195
While far within each aisle and deep recess
His winged minions in close clusters stood,
Amazed and full of fear, like anxious men
Who on wide plains gather in panting troops
When earthquakes jar their battlements and towers. 200
Even now, while Saturn, roused from icy trance,
Went step for step with Thea through the woods,
Hyperion, leaving twilight in the rear,
Came slope³⁵ upon the threshold of the west;
Then, as was wont, his palace-door flew ope 205
In smoothest silence, save what solemn tubes³⁶
Blown by the serious zephyrs³⁷ gave of sweet
And wandering sounds, slow-breathed melodies;
And like a rose in vermeil³⁸ tint and shape,
In fragrance soft, and coolness to the eye, 210

That inlet to severe magnificence
Stood full-blown, for the god to enter in.
He entered, but he entered full of wrath;
His flaming robes streamed out beyond his heels
And gave a roar as if of earthly fire, 215
That scared away the meek ethereal Hours³⁹
And made their dove-wings tremble. On he flared,
From stately nave to nave, from vault to vault,
Through bowers of fragrant and enwreathed light
And diamond-paved lustrous long arcades, 220
Until he reached the great main cupola.⁴⁰
There standing fierce beneath, he stamped his foot,
And from the basements deep to the high towers
Jarred his own golden region; and before
The quavering thunder thereupon had ceased, 225
His voice leaped out, despite of godlike curb,
To this result: ‘Oh dreams of day and night!
Oh monstrous forms! Oh effigies of pain!
Oh spectres busy in a cold, cold gloom!
Oh lank-eared phantoms of black-weeded pools! 230
Why do I know ye? Why have I seen ye? Why
Is my eternal essence⁴¹ thus distraught
To see and to behold these horrors new?
Saturn is fallen, am I too to fall?
Am I to leave this haven of my rest, 235
This cradle of my glory, this soft clime,
This calm luxuriance of blissful light,
These crystalline pavilions and pure fanes⁴²
Of all my lucent⁴³ empire? It is left
Deserted, void, nor any haunt of mine. 240
The blaze, the splendour, and the symmetry,
I cannot see – but darkness, death and darkness.
Even here, into my centre of repose,
The shady visions come to domineer,

Insult, and blind, and stifle up my pomp. 245
 Fall? No, by Tellus⁴⁴ and her briny robes!
 Over the fiery frontier of my realms
 I will advance a terrible right arm
 Shall scare that infant thunderer, rebel Jove,
 And bid old Saturn take his throne again.' 250
 He spake, and ceased, the while a heavier threat
 Held struggle with his throat but came not forth;
 For as in theatres of crowded men
 Hubbub increases more they call out 'Hush!'
 So at Hyperion's words the phantoms pale 255
 Bestirred themselves, thrice horrible and cold,
 And from the mirrored level where he stood
 A mist arose as from a scummy marsh.
 At this, through all his bulk an agony
 Crept gradual from the feet unto the crown, 260
 Like a lithe serpent vast and muscular
 Making slow way, with head and neck convulsed
 From over-strained might. Released, he fled
 To the eastern gates, and full six dewy hours
 Before the dawn in season due should blush, 265
 He breathed fierce breath against the sleepy portals,⁴⁵
 Cleared them of heavy vapours, burst them wide
 Suddenly on the ocean's chilly streams.
 The planet orb of fire whereon he rode
 Each day from east to west the heavens through, 270
 Spun round in sable curtaining of clouds;
 Not therefore veiled quite, blindfold and hid,
 But ever and anon the glancing spheres,
 Circles, and arcs, and broad-belted colure,⁴⁶
 Glowed through, and wrought upon the muffling dark 275
 Sweet-shaped lightnings from the nadir deep
 Up to the zenith – hieroglyphics old⁴⁷
 Which sages and keen-eyed astrologers

Then living on the earth, with labouring thought
Won from the gaze of many centuries – 280
Now lost, save what we find on remnants huge
Of stone, or marble swart,⁴⁸ their import gone,
Their wisdom long since fled. Two wings this orb
Possessed for glory, two fair argent⁴⁹ wings
Ever exalted at the god's approach; 285
And now from forth the gloom their plumes immense
Rose one by one, till all outspread were,
While still the dazzling globe maintained eclipse,
Awaiting for Hyperion's command.
Fain would he have commanded, fain took throne 290
And bid the day begin, if but for change.
He might not – no, though a primeval god;
The sacred seasons might not be disturbed.
Therefore the operations of the dawn
Stayed in their birth, even as here 'tis told. 295
Those silver wings expanded sisterly,
Eager to sail their orb; the porches wide
Opened upon the dusk demesnes⁵⁰ of night;
And the bright Titan, frenzied with new woes,
Unused to bend, by hard compulsion bent 300
His spirit to the sorrow of the time;
And all along a dismal rack of clouds,⁵¹
Upon the boundaries of day and night,
He stretched himself in grief and radiance faint.
There as he lay, the heaven with its stars 305
Looked down on him with pity, and the voice
Of Coelus,⁵² from the universal space,
Thus whispered low and solemn in his ear:
'Oh brightest of my children dear, earth-born
And sky-engendered, son of mysteries 310
All unrevealed even to the powers⁵³
Which met at thy creating; at whose joys

And palpitations sweet, and pleasures soft,
 I, Coelus, wonder how they came and whence,
 And at the fruits thereof what shapes they be, 315
 Distinct and visible – symbols divine,
 Manifestations of that beauteous life
 Diffused unseen throughout eternal space.
 Of these new-formed art thou, oh brightest child!
 Of these, thy brethren and the goddesses! 320
 There is sad feud among ye, and rebellion
 Of son against his sire.⁵⁴ I saw him fall,
 I saw my first-born⁵⁵ tumbled from his throne!
 To me his arms were spread, to me his voice
 Found way from forth the thunders round his head! 325
 Pale wox⁵⁶ I, and in vapours hid my face.
 Art thou, too, near such doom? Vague fear there is,
 For I have seen my sons most unlike gods.
 Divine ye were created, and divine
 In sad demeanour, solemn, undisturbed, 330
 Unruffled, like high gods, ye lived and ruled.
 Now I behold in you fear, hope, and wrath,
 Actions of rage and passion – even as
 I see them on the mortal world beneath,
 In men who die. This is the grief, oh son; 335
 Sad sign of ruin, sudden dismay, and fall!
 Yet do thou strive; as thou art capable,
 As thou canst move about, an evident god,⁵⁷
 And canst oppose to each malignant hour
 Ethereal presence. I am but a voice; 340
 My life is but the life of winds and tides,
 No more than winds and tides can I avail –
 But thou canst. Be thou therefore in the van
 Of circumstance;⁵⁸ yea, seize the arrow's barb
 Before the tense string murmur.⁵⁹ To the earth! 345
 For there thou wilt find Saturn and his woes.

Meantime I will keep watch on thy bright sun,
And of thy seasons be a careful nurse.’
Ere half this region-whisper had come down,
Hyperion arose, and on the stars 350
Lifted his curved lids, and kept them wide
Until it ceased, and still he kept them wide,
And still they were the same bright, patient stars.
Then with a slow incline of his broad breast,
Like to a diver in the pearly seas, 355
Forward he stooped over the airy shore
And plunged all noiseless into the deep night.

Hyperion

¹I recollect at this moment the origin of the Hyperion, Severn wrote in 1845. ‘Keats was abusing Milton to me, and a friend whose name I forget, but who was rather stern. I had expressed my great admiration and delight in Milton, when this friend, turning to Keats, said “Keats, I think it great reproach to you that Severn should admire and appreciate Milton, and you a poet should know nothing of him, for you confess never to have read him, therefore your dislike goes for nothing.” After this, Keats took up Milton and became an ardent admirer and soon began the Hyperion. I mention this to show that his likings and dislikings were extraordinary’ (Keats Circle ii 132–3). When it first appeared, Leigh Hunt hailed it as ‘a fragment – a gigantic one, like a ruin in the desert, or the bones of a mastodon. It is truly of a piece with its subject, which is the downfall of the elder gods’ (The Indicator, 2 and 9 August 1820). Keats never finished this attempt to recast Paradise Lost in pagan terms. For introductory remarks see headnote, p. 1390.

²*grey-haired Saturn* Hyperion’s brother, leader of the Titans and father of the rebellious Jupiter. As the poem opens Saturn and the Titans are defeated. The Titans were a god-like race expelled from heaven by Jupiter in Greek myth.

3 naiad water-nymph.

4 nerveless weak.

5 Ixion's wheel Ixion was banished from heaven and sentenced to be tied to a burning and spinning wheel in Hades for eternity.

6 Memphian sphinx Memphis was a city in Egypt. Keats saw a sphinx in the British Museum, early in 1819.

7 As if the vanward clouds...up Calamity is compared to clouds building up before a storm, followed by the cloud mass; the storm itself is compared to the artillery moving in the wake of advancing troops.

8 To i.e. compared with.

9 conscious of the new command Jupiter is the new thunderer.

10 our once serene domain the Saturnian golden age.

11 Like natural sculpture in cathedral cavern The motionless gods are compared to huge rock formations.

12 couchant lying down.

13 palsied trembling.

14 horrid bristling.

15 aspen the leaves of the aspen tremble in the slightest breeze.

16 tender spouse of gold Hyperion Thea is the sister and third wife of Hyperion.

17 diadem crown.

18 front forehead.

19 nervous muscular.

20 And buried...pale Jupiter has taken control of the planets.

21 My strong identity, my real self Titans depend on their identity for their power.

22 eterne eternal.

23 the gold clouds metropolitan The clouds are the gods' metropolis.

24 Druid locks i.e. long-haired.

25 Olympus the mountain that provided Jupiter with his seat of power.

26 The rebel three Saturn's sons – Jupiter, Neptune and Pluto.

27 our friends the rest of the Titans.

28 covert hiding-place.

29 orbed fire the sun, of which Hyperion is god.

30 gloom-bird owl.

31 passing-bell death-bell.

32 portioned proportioned.

33 aurorean roseate.

34 His palace...angerly Hyperion's palace is part-Roman and part-Egyptian.

35 slope sloping downward.

36 solemn tubes of a musical instrument, such as an organ.

37 zephyrs breezes.

38 vermeil scarlet.

39 Hours 'Horae', attendant nymphs of the sun.

40 cupola dome.

41 essence being.

42 fanés temples.

43 lucent shining.

44 Tellus mother of the Titans, married to her brother Saturn.

45 portals gateways.

46 colure technical term for 'each of two great circles which intersect each other at right angles at the poles, and divide the equinoctial and the ecliptic into four equal parts' (OED).

47 hieroglyphics old signs of the zodiac.

48 swart black.

49 argent silver.

50 demesnes domains, regions.

51 rack of clouds cloud-mass.

52 Coelus father of the Titans.

53 the powers Coelus and Terra (parents of the Titans).

54 son against his sire i.e. Jupiter's rebellion against Saturn.

55 my first-born Saturn.

56 vox became.

57 an evident god Saturn has being; Coelus is the sky, and is just a place – he cannot move around and has no 'essence'.

58 the van / Of circumstance i.e. act, take the initiative.

59 seize...murmur i.e. shoot your arrow before someone shoots at you.

Book II

Just at the self-same beat of Time's wide wings
Hyperion slid into the rustled air,
And Saturn gained with Thea that sad place
Where Cybele and the bruised Titans mourned.

It was a den where no insulting¹ light 5
Could glimmer on their tears; where their own groans
They felt, but heard not, for the solid roar
Of thunderous waterfalls and torrents hoarse,
Pouring a constant bulk, uncertain where.²
Crag jutting forth to crag, and rocks that seemed 10
Ever as if just rising from a sleep,
Forehead to forehead held their monstrous horns;
And thus in thousand hugest fantasies
Made a fit roofing to this nest of woe.
Instead of thrones, hard flint they sat upon, 15
Couches of rugged stone, and slaty ridge
Stubborned with iron. All were not assembled,
Some chained in torture and some wandering.
Coeus, and Gyges, and Briareus,
Typhon, and Dolor, and Porphyriion, 20

With many more, the brawniest in assault,
Were pent in regions of laborious breath,
Dungeoned in opaque element to keep
Their clenched teeth still clenched, and all their limbs
Locked up like veins of metal, cramped and screwed; 25
Without a motion, save of their big hearts
Heaving in pain, and horribly convulsed
With sanguine feverous boiling gurge³ of pulse.⁴
Mnemosyne⁵ was straying in the world;
Far from her moon had Phoebe⁶ wandered; 30
And many else were free to roam abroad,
But for the main, here found they covert⁷ drear.
Scarce images of life, one here, one there,
Lay vast and edgeways; like a dismal cirque
Of Druid stones upon a forlorn moor,⁸ 35
When the chill rain begins at shut of eve
In dull November, and their chancel vault,⁹
The heaven itself, is blinded throughout night.
Each one kept shroud,¹⁰ nor to his neighbour gave
Or word, or look, or action of despair. 40
Creus was one; his ponderous iron mace
Lay by him, and a shattered rib of rock
Told of his rage ere he thus sank and pined.
Iapetus another – in his grasp
A serpent's plashy¹¹ neck, its barbed tongue 45
Squeezed from the gorge,¹² and all its uncurled length
Dead, and because¹³ the creature could not spit
Its poison in the eyes of conquering Jove.
Next Cottus; prone he lay, chin uppermost
As though in pain, for still upon the flint 50
He ground severe his skull, with open mouth
And eyes at horrid working.¹⁴ Nearest him

Asia, born of most enormous Caf,
 Who cost her mother Tellus keener pangs,
 Though feminine, than any of her sons. 55
 More thought than woe was in her dusky face,
 For she was prophesying of her glory,
 And in her wide imagination stood
 Palm-shaded temples and high rival fanes
 By Oxus or in Ganges' sacred isles.15 60
 Even as Hope upon her anchor16 leans,
 So leant she, not so fair, upon a tusk
 Shed from the broadest of her elephants.
 Above her, on a crag's uneasy shelve,17
 Upon his elbow raised, all prostrate else, 65
 Shadowed Enceladus – once tame and mild
 As grazing ox unworried in the meads,
 Now tiger-passioned, lion-thoughted, wroth,
 He meditated, plotted, and even now18
 Was hurling mountains in that second war19 70
 Not long delayed, that scared the younger gods
 To hide themselves in forms of beast and bird.
 Not far hence Atlas; and beside him prone
 Phorcus, the sire of Gorgons. Neighbour'd close
 Oceanus, and Tethys, in whose lap 75
 Sobbed Clymene among her tangled hair.20
 In midst of all lay Themis, at the feet
 Of Ops the queen, all clouded round from sight;
 No shape distinguishable, more than when
 Thick night confounds the pine-tops with the clouds: 80
 And many else whose names may not be told.
 For when the muse's wings are air-ward spread
 Who shall delay her flight? And she must chaunt
 Of Saturn and his guide, who now had climbed
 With damp and slippery footing from a depth 85

More horrid²¹ still. Above a sombre cliff
Their heads appeared, and up their stature grew
Till on the level height their steps found ease;
Then Thea spread abroad her trembling arms
Upon the precincts of this nest of pain, 90
And sidelong fixed her eye on Saturn's face.
There saw she direst strife, the supreme god
At war with all the frailty of grief,
Of rage, of fear, anxiety, revenge,
Remorse, spleen, hope, but most of all despair. 95
Against these plagues he strove in vain, for Fate
Had poured a mortal oil upon his head,
A disanointing poison,²² so that Thea,
Affrighted, kept her still, and let him pass
First onwards in, among the fallen tribe. 100
As with us mortal men, the laden heart
Is persecuted more, and fevered more,
When it is nighing to the mournful house
Where other hearts are sick of the same bruise;
So Saturn, as he walked into the midst, 105
Felt faint, and would have sunk among the rest,
But that he met Enceladus' eye,
Whose mightiness and awe of him, at once
Came like an inspiration – and he shouted,
'Titans, behold your god!' At which some groaned, 110
Some started on their feet, some also shouted,
Some wept, some wailed, all bowed with reverence;
And Ops, uplifting her black folded veil,
Showed her pale cheeks and all her forehead wan,
Her eyebrows thin and jet, and hollow eyes. 115
There is a roaring in the bleak-grown pines
When winter lifts his voice; there is a noise
Among immortals when a god gives sign,
With hushing finger, how he means to load
His tongue with the full weight of utterless²³ thought, 120

With thunder, and with music, and with pomp:
 Such noise is like the roar of bleak-grown pines,
 Which, when it ceases in this mountained world,
 No other sound succeeds; but ceasing here,
 Among these fallen, Saturn's voice therefrom 125
 Grew up like organ, that begins anew
 Its strain, when other harmonies, stopped short,
 Leave the dinned air vibrating silverly.²⁴
 Thus grew it up: 'Not in my own sad breast,
 Which is its own great judge and searcher-out, 130
 Can I find reason why ye should be thus;
 Not in the legends of the first of days,
 Studied from that old spirit-leaved book²⁵
 Which starry Uranus with finger bright
 Saved from the shores of darkness, when the waves 135
 Low-ebbed still hid it up in shallow gloom,
 And the which book ye know I ever kept
 For my firm-based footstool – ah, infirm!
 Not there, nor in sign, symbol, or portent
 Of element, earth, water, air, and fire, 140
 At war, at peace, or inter-quarrelling
 One against one, or two, or three, or all
 Each several one against the other three,
 As fire with air loud warring when rainfloods
 Drown both, and press them both against earth's face, 145
 Where, finding sulphur, a quadruple wrath
 Unhinges the poor world – not in that strife,
 Wherefrom I take strange lore and read it deep,
 Can I find reason why ye should be thus.
 No, nowhere can unriddle, though I search 150
 And pore on nature's universal scroll
 Even to swooning, why ye divinities,
 The first-born of all shaped and palpable gods,
 Should cower beneath what, in comparison,
 Is untremendous might. Yet ye are here, 155

O'erwhelmed, and spurned, and battered – ye are here!
Oh Titans, shall I say “Arise”? Ye groan;
Shall I say “Crouch”? Ye groan. What can I then?
Oh heaven wide! Oh unseen parent dear!
What can I? Tell me, all ye brethren gods, 160
How we can war, how engine our great wrath;26
Oh speak your counsel now, for Saturn's ear
Is all a-hungered. Thou, Oceanus,
Ponderest high and deep, and in thy face
I see, astonied,27 that severe content 165
Which comes of thought and musing – give us help!'

So ended Saturn, and the god of the sea,28
Sophist and sage from no Athenian grove,29
But cogitation in his watery shades,
Arose, with locks not oozy,30 and began, 170
In murmurs, which his first-endeavouring tongue
Caught infant-like from the far-foamed sands:
'Oh ye, whom wrath consumes, who, passion-stung,
Writhe at defeat, and nurse your agonies!
Shut up your senses, stifle up your ears, 175
My voice is not a bellows unto ire.
Yet listen, ye who will, whilst I bring proof
How ye, perforce, must be content to stoop;
And in the proof much comfort will I give,
If ye will take that comfort in its truth. 180
We fall by course of nature's law, not force
Of thunder, or of Jove. Great Saturn, thou
Hast sifted well the atom-universe;31
But for this reason, that thou art the King,
And only blind from sheer supremacy, 185
One avenue was shaded from thine eyes
Through which I wandered to eternal truth.
And first, as thou wast not the first of powers,
So art thou not the last; it cannot be.

Thou art not the beginning nor the end.³² 190
From chaos and parental darkness came
Light, the first fruits of that intestine broil,³³
That sullen ferment which for wondrous ends
Was ripening in itself. The ripe hour came,
And with it light, and light, engendering 195
Upon its own producer,³⁴ forthwith touched
The whole enormous matter into life.
Upon that very hour, our parentage,
The heavens and the earth, were manifest;
Then thou first-born, and we the giant-race, 200
Found ourselves ruling new and beauteous realms.
Now comes the pain of truth, to whom 'tis pain;³⁵
Oh folly! for to bear all naked truths,
And to envisage circumstance, all calm,
That is the top of sovereignty. Mark well! 205
As heaven and earth are fairer, fairer far
Than chaos and blank darkness, though once chiefs;
And as we show beyond³⁶ that heaven and earth
In form and shape compact and beautiful,
In will, in action free, companionship, 210
And thousand other signs of purer life –
So on our heels a fresh perfection treads,
A power more strong in beauty, born of us
And fated to excel us, as we pass
In glory that old darkness. Nor are we 215
Thereby more conquered than by us the rule
Of shapeless chaos. Say, doth the dull soil
Quarrel with the proud forests it hath fed,
And feedeth still, more comely than itself?
Can it deny the chieftdom of green groves? 220
Or shall the tree be envious of the dove
Because it cooeth, and hath snowy wings
To wander wherewithal and find its joys?

We are such forest trees, and our fair boughs
Have bred forth not pale solitary doves 225
But eagles golden-feathered, who do tower
Above us in their beauty, and must reign
In right thereof; for 'tis the eternal law
That first in beauty should be first in might –
Yea, by that law another race may drive 230
Our conquerors to mourn as we do now.

Have ye beheld the young god of the seas,³⁷
My dispossessor? Have ye seen his face?
Have ye beheld his chariot, foamed along
By noble winged creatures he hath made? 235
I saw him on the calmed waters scud,
With such a glow of beauty in his eyes
That it enforced me to bid sad farewell
To all my empire; farewell sad I took,
And hither came to see how dolorous fate 240
Had wrought upon ye, and how I might best
Give consolation in this woe extreme.
Receive the truth, and let it be your balm.'

Whether through posed³⁸ conviction, or disdain,
They guarded silence when Oceanus 245
Left murmuring, what deepest thought can tell?
But so it was; none answered for a space,
Save one whom none regarded, Clymene.³⁹
And yet she answered not, only complained
With hectic⁴⁰ lips, and eyes up-looking mild, 250
Thus wording timidly among the fierce:
'Oh father, I am here the simplest voice,
And all my knowledge is that joy is gone,
And this thing woe crept in among our hearts,
There to remain for ever, as I fear. 255
I would not bode of evil, if I thought
So weak a creature could turn off the help

Which by just right should come of mighty gods;
Yet let me tell my sorrow, let me tell
Of what I heard, and how it made we weep, 260
And know that we had parted from all hope.
I stood upon a shore, a pleasant shore
Where a sweet clime was breathed from a land
Of fragrance, quietness, and trees, and flowers.
Full of calm joy it was, as I of grief, 265
Too full of joy and soft delicious warmth –
So that I felt a movement in my heart
To chide, and to reproach that solitude
With songs of misery, music of our woes;
And sat me down, and took a mouthed shell 270
And murmured into it, and made melody.
Oh melody no more! For while I sang,
And with poor skill let pass into the breeze
The dull shell's echo, from a bowery strand⁴¹
Just opposite, an island of the sea, 275
There came enchantment with the shifting wind,
That did both drown and keep alive my ears.
I threw my shell away upon the sand
And a wave filled it, as my sense was filled
With that new blissful golden melody. 280
A living death was in each gush of sounds,
Each family of rapturous hurried notes
That fell, one after one, yet all at once,
Like pearl beads dropping sudden from their string;
And then another, then another strain, 285
Each like a dove leaving its olive perch,
With music winged instead of silent plumes,
To hover round my head, and make me sick
Of joy and grief at once.⁴² Grief overcame,
And I was stopping up my frantic ears, 290
When, past all hindrance of my trembling hands,
A voice came sweeter, sweeter than all tune,

And still it cried, “Apollo! Young Apollo!
The morning-bright Apollo! Young Apollo!”
I fled, it followed me, and cried “Apollo!” 295
Oh father and oh brethren, had ye felt
Those pains of mine – oh Saturn, hadst thou felt,
Ye would not call this too indulged tongue
Presumptuous in thus venturing to be heard.’
So far her voice flowed on, like timorous brook 300
That, lingering along⁴³ a pebbled coast,
Doth fear to meet the sea – but sea it met
And shuddered; for the overwhelming voice
Of huge Enceladus⁴⁴ swallowed it in wrath –
The ponderous syllables, like sullen waves 305
In the half-glutted⁴⁵ hollows of reef-rocks,
Came booming thus, while still upon his arm
He leaned (not rising, from supreme contempt):
‘Or shall we listen to the over-wise,
Or to the over-foolish, giant gods? 310
Not thunderbolt on thunderbolt, till all
That rebel Jove’s whole armoury were spent,
Not world on world upon these shoulders piled
Could agonize me more than baby-words
In midst of this dethronement horrible. 315
Speak! Roar! Shout! Yell, ye sleepy Titans all!
Do ye forget the blows, the buffets vile?
Are ye not smitten by a youngling arm?⁴⁶
Dost thou forget, sham monarch of the waves,
Thy scalding in the seas? What, have I roused 320
Your spleens with so few simple words as these?
Oh joy, for now I see ye are not lost!
Oh joy, for now I see a thousand eyes
Wide glaring for revenge!’ As this he said,
He lifted up his stature vast, and stood, 325
Still without intermission speaking thus:

‘Now ye are flames, I’ll tell you how to burn
 And purge the ether of our enemies;⁴⁷
 How to feed fierce the crooked stings of fire⁴⁸
 And singe away the swollen clouds of Jove, 330
 Stifling that puny essence in its tent.
 Oh let him feel the evil he hath done –
 For though I scorn Oceanus’ lore,
 Much pain have I for more than loss of realms.
 The days of peace and slumberous calm are fled; 335
 Those days, all innocent of scathing war,
 When all the fair Existences of heaven
 Came open-eyed to guess what we would speak –
 That was before our brows were taught to frown,
 Before our lips knew else but solemn sounds; 340
 That was before we knew the winged thing,
 Victory, might be lost, or might be won.
 And be ye mindful that Hyperion,
 Our brightest brother, still is undisgraced –
 Hyperion, lo! His radiance is here!’ 345
 All eyes were on Enceladus’ face,
 And they beheld, while still Hyperion’s name
 Flew from his lips up to the vaulted rocks,⁴⁹
 A pallid gleam across his features stern –
 Not savage, for he saw full many a god 350
 Wroth as himself. He looked upon them all,
 And in each face he saw a gleam of light,
 But splendider in Saturn’s, whose hoar locks
 Shone like the bubbling foam about a keel
 When the prow sweeps into a midnight cove. 355
 In pale and silver silence they remained,
 Till suddenly a splendour, like the morn,
 Pervaded all the beetling⁵⁰ gloomy steeps,
 All the sad spaces of oblivion,
 And every gulf, and every chasm old, 360

And every height, and every sullen depth,
 Voiceless, or hoarse with loud tormented streams,
 And all the everlasting cataracts,
 And all the headlong torrents far and near,
 Mantled⁵¹ before in darkness and huge shade, 365
 Now saw the light and made it terrible.
 It was Hyperion: a granite peak
 His bright feet touched, and there he stayed to view
 The misery his brilliance had betrayed
 To the most hateful seeing of itself.⁵² 370
 Golden his hair of short Numidian curl,
 Regal his shape majestic, a vast shade
 In midst of his own brightness, like the bulk
 Of Memnon's image at the set of sun
 To one who travels from the dusking east;⁵³ 375
 Sighs, too, as mournful as that Memnon's harp
 He uttered, while his hands contemplative
 He pressed together, and in silence stood.
 Despondence seized again the fallen gods
 At sight of the dejected King of Day, 380
 And many hid their faces from the light.
 But fierce Enceladus sent forth his eyes
 Among the brotherhood, and at their glare
 Uprose Iapetus, and Creus too,
 And Phorcus, sea-born, and together strode 385
 To where he towered on his eminence.⁵⁴
 There those four shouted forth old Saturn's name;
 Hyperion from the peak loud answered, 'Saturn!'
 Saturn sat near the mother of the gods,
 In whose face was no joy, though all the gods 390
 Gave from their hollow throats the name of 'Saturn!'

Book II

1*insulting* The light would be an insulting reminder of their loss of power.

2*for the solid roar...where* Keats recollects the waterfalls he had seen on his walking tour of the Lake District and Scotland, summer 1818.

3*gurge* whirlpool.

4*pulse* i.e. that of blood in the heart.

5*Mnemosyne* mother of the muses by Jupiter, included among the Titans. She is seeking Apollo.

6*Phoebe* goddess of the moon.

7*covert* shelter.

8*Druid stones upon a forlorn moor* Keats visited the Castlerigg stone circle near Keswick in June 1818.

9*their chancel vault* The stones and the darkness evoke the atmosphere of a church.

10 shroud shrouded.

11 plashy marked as if splashed with colour.

12 gorge throat.

13 and because i.e. and all this because.

14 at horrid working looking round in a frightening manner.

15 For she was...sacred isles Asia will become the goddess of a future cult.

16 anchor traditional emblem of hope; see Hebrews 6:19.

17 shelve slope.

18 even now i.e. in his imagination.

19 that second war presumably to have been the subject of a further book of the poem, never written.

20 her tangled hair a recollection of Lycidas 69: 'the tangles of Neaera's hair.'

21 horrid frightening.

22 A disanointing poison the ointment deprives Saturn of his godhead.

23 utterless unutterable.

24 silverly with a silvery sound.

25 that old spirit-leaved book an imaginary book dating from the beginning of time, recording the first stages of the evolution of the world.

26 engine our great wrath turn our wrath into an instrument of war.

27 astonied astonished; an archaism used by Spenser and Milton.

28 the god of the sea Oceanus, father of all the gods.

29 no Athenian grove Oceanus did not gain his wisdom from an academy in Athens. Plato established his 'Academia' (academy) in Academus' grove.

30 locks not oozy Oceanus is not in the sea; Keats is also alluding to Lycidas 175: 'With nectar pure his oozy locks he laves.'

31 atom-universe Although Keats may be echoing Milton (Paradise Lost ii 900), he was aware that John Dalton (1766–1844) had proposed in 1801 that all elements are composed of fundamental units, or ‘atoms’, that are specific to that element.

32 Thou art not the beginning nor the end Revelation 1:8: ‘I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord.’

33 intestine broil civil war.

34 its own producer the darkness of chaos.

35 to whom 'tis pain for those to whom it is pain.

36 show beyond are manifestly superior to.

37 the young god of the seas Neptune, traditionally depicted as riding a chariot over the sea.

38 posed feigned.

39 Clymene daughter of Oceanus and Tethys.

40 hectic feverish.

41 bowery strand sheltered seashore.

42 Of joy and grief at once joy at the music; grief that her music is surpassed.

43 lingering along meandering towards.

44 Enceladus one of the most powerful of the Titans.

45 half-glutted half-filled.

46 youngling arm inexperienced arm.

47 the ether of our enemies the air our enemies breathe.

48 the crooked stings of fire flashes of lightning.

49 the vaulted rocks The rocks form a roof above them.

50 beetling overhanging.

51 Mantled cloaked, obscured.

52 The misery...itself Hyperion's radiance throws the misery of the Titans into sharper relief.

53 Memnon's image...east The statue was in fact one of a pair representing the Egyptian King Amenhotep III, outside his funerary temple on the west bank at Thebes, mentioned by Juvenal in his fifteenth satire. The eighteenth- and early nineteenth-century English poets believed that the statue held a lyre which, when struck by the sun at dawn or sunset, sounded forth.

54 eminence mountain.

Book III

Thus in alternate uproar and sad peace,
Amazed were those Titans utterly.
Oh leave them, muse! Oh leave them to their woes,
For thou art weak to sing such tumults dire;
A solitary sorrow best befits 5
Thy lips, and antheming a lonely grief.
Leave them, oh muse! For thou anon wilt find
Many a fallen old divinity¹
Wandering in vain about bewildered shores.
Meantime touch piously the Delphic harp,²

And not a wind of heaven but will breathe
In aid soft warble from the Dorian flute;³
For lo! 'tis for the father of all verse.⁴
Flush everything that hath a vermeil⁵ hue,
Let the rose glow intense and warm the air, 15
And let the clouds of even and of morn
Float in voluptuous fleeces o'er the hills;
Let the red wine within the goblet boil,
Cold as a bubbling well; let faint-lipped shells
On sands or in great deeps, vermilion turn 20
Through all their labyrinths; and let the maid
Blush keenly, as with some warm kiss surprised.
Chief isle of the embowered Cyclades,⁶
Rejoice, oh Delos,⁷ with thine olives green,
And poplars, and lawn-shading palms, and beech 25
In which the zephyr breathes the loudest song,
And hazels thick, dark-stemmed beneath the shade.
Apollo is once more the golden theme!
Where was he when the giant of the sun⁸
Stood bright amid the sorrow of his peers? 30
Together had he left his mother fair
And his twin-sister⁹ sleeping in their bower,
And in the morning twilight wandered forth
Beside the osiers of a rivulet,
Full ankle-deep in lilies of the vale. 35
The nightingale had ceased, and a few stars
Were lingering in the heavens, while the thrush
Began calm-throated. Throughout all the isle
There was no covert,¹⁰ no retired cave
Unhaunted by the murmurous noise of waves, 40
Though scarcely heard in many a green recess.
He listened and he wept, and his bright tears
Went trickling down the golden bow he held.

Thus with half-shut suffused¹¹ eyes he stood,
While from beneath some cumbrous boughs hard by 45
With solemn step an awful goddess¹² came,
And there was purport in her looks for him,
Which he with eager guess began to read
Perplexed, the while melodiously he said:
'How cam'st thou over the unfooted sea? 50
Or hath that antique mien and robed form
Moved in these vales invisible till now?
Sure I have heard those vestments¹³ sweeping o'er
The fallen leaves, when I have sat alone
In cool mid-forest. Surely I have traced 55
The rustle of those ample skirts about
These grassy solitudes, and seen the flowers
Lift up their heads, as still the whisper passed.
Goddess! I have beheld those eyes before,
And their eternal calm, and all that face, 60
Or I have dreamed.' 'Yes', said the supreme shape,
'Thou hast dreamed of me; and awaking up
Didst find a lyre all golden by thy side,
Whose strings touched by thy fingers, all the vast
Unwearied ear of the whole universe 65
Listened in pain and pleasure at the birth
Of such new tuneful wonder. Is't not strange
That thou shouldst weep, so gifted? Tell me, youth,
What sorrow thou canst feel – for I am sad
When thou dost shed a tear. Explain thy griefs 70
To one who in this lonely isle hath been
The watcher of thy sleep and hours of life,
From the young day when first thy infant hand
Plucked witless the weak flowers, till thine arm
Could bend that bow heroic to all times. 75
Show thy heart's secret to an ancient power
Who hath forsaken old and sacred thrones
For prophecies of thee, and for the sake

Of loveliness new born.' Apollo then,
With sudden scrutiny and gloomless eyes,¹⁴ 80
Thus answered, while his white melodious throat
Throbbled with the syllables: 'Mnemosyne!
Thy name is on my tongue I know not how;
Why should I tell thee what thou so well seest?
Why should I strive to show what from thy lips 85
Would come no mystery? For me, dark, dark
And painful, vile oblivion seals my eyes.
I strive to search wherefore I am so sad
Until a melancholy numbs my limbs;
And then upon the grass I sit and moan 90
Like one who once had wings. Oh why should I
Feel cursed and thwarted, when the liegeless air¹⁵
Yields to my step aspirant? Why should I
Spurn the green turf as hateful to my feet?
Goddess benign, point forth some unknown thing. 95
Are there not other regions than this isle?
What are the stars? There is the sun, the sun!
And the most patient brilliance of the moon!
And stars by thousands! Point me out the way
To any one particular beauteous star, 100
And I will flit into it with my lyre
And make its silvery splendour pant with bliss.
I have heard the cloudy thunder. Where is power?
Whose hand, whose essence, what divinity
Makes this alarum¹⁶ in the elements 105
While I here idle listen on the shores
In fearless yet in aching¹⁷ ignorance?
Oh tell me, lonely goddess, by thy harp
That wailleth every morn and eventide,
Tell me why thus I rave about these groves! 110
Mute thou remainest, mute! Yet I can read
A wondrous lesson in thy silent face:

Knowledge enormous¹⁸ makes a god of me.
 Names, deeds, grey legends, dire events, rebellions,
 Majesties, sovran¹⁹ voices, agonies, 115
 Creations and destroyings, all at once
 Pour into the wide hollows of my brain
 And deify me, as if some blithe wine
 Or bright elixir peerless I had drunk,
 And so become immortal.’ Thus the god, 120
 While his enkindled eyes, with level glance
 Beneath his white soft temples, steadfast kept
 Trembling with light upon Mnemosyne.
 Soon wild commotions shook him, and made flush
 All the immortal fairness of his limbs, 125
 Most like the struggle at the gate of death;
 Or liker still to one who should take leave
 Of pale immortal death, and with a pang
 As hot as death’s is chill, with fierce convulse²⁰
 Die into life. So young Apollo anguished; 130
 His very hair, his golden tresses famed
 Kept undulation round his eager neck.
 During the pain Mnemosyne upheld
 Her arms as one who prophesied. At length
 Apollo shrieked – and lo! from all his limbs 135

²*the Delphic harp* i.e. the divinely inspired harp.

³*the Dorian flute* flute of classical Greece. Keats echoes Paradise Lost i 550–1: ‘the Dorian mood / Of flutes and soft recorders.’ He marked the lines in his copy of Milton with the comment: 'The light and shade ... the sorrow, the pain, the sad-sweet melody.'

4 the father of all verse Apollo, god of the sun and poetry.

5 vermeil bright scarlet.

6 Cyclades a cluster of islands in the Aegean.

7 Delos island in the centre of the Cyclades, sacred to Apollo as it was his birthplace.

8 the giant of the sun Hyperion.

9 mother ... twin-sister Latona and Diana.

10 covert hiding-place.

11 suffused tearful.

12 an awful goddess The awe-inspiring goddess is Mnemosyne, mother of the Muses by Jupiter, and another Titan. She has abandoned the Titans and joined Apollo.

13 vestments clothes.

14 gloomless eyes Apollo's gloom lifts at hearing Mnemosyne.

15 the liegeless air the air has no master ('liege').

16 alarum turmoil.

17 aching longing.

18 Knowledge enormous Knowledge of suffering has made a god of Apollo. See Keats's admiring comments on Wordsworth for his ability to portray a world ‘full of misery and heartbreak, pain, sickness, and oppression’ (p. 1423).

19 sovran sovereign.

20 convulse convulsion.

21 In his annotated copy of Endymion (1818), Woodhouse recorded that this poem, ‘if completed, would have treated of the dethronement of Hyperion, the former god of the sun, by Apollo (and incidentally of those of Oceanus by Neptune, of Saturn by Jupiter, etc., and of the war of the giants for Saturn’s re-establishment), with other events of which we have but very dark hints in the mythological poets of Greece and Rome. In fact, the incidents would have been pure creations of the poet’s brain.’ Reviewing the poem, Leigh Hunt remarked: ‘If any living poet could finish this fragment, we believe it is the author himself. But perhaps he feels that he ought not’ (The Indicator, 2 and 9 August 1820). By the time those comments were published Keats was suffering frequent episodes of blood-spitting, and was preparing his final departure for Italy.

The Eve of St Agnes (composed 18
January–2 February 1819)¹

From Lamia, Isabella, The Eve of St Agnes, and Other Poems (1820)

I

St. Agnes' Eve – ah, bitter chill it was!
The owl, for all his feathers, was a-cold;
The hare limped trembling through the frozen grass,
And silent was the flock in woolly fold.

Numb were the beadsman's² fingers, while he told³ 5
His rosary, and while his frosted breath,
Like pious incense from a censer old,
Seemed taking flight for heaven, without a death,
Past the sweet Virgin's picture, while his prayer he saith.

II

His prayer he saith, this patient, holy man; 10
Then takes his lamp and riseth from his knees,
And back returneth, meagre,⁴ barefoot, wan,
Along the chapel aisle by slow degrees.
The sculptured dead on each side seem to freeze,
Imprisoned in black, purgatorial rails; 15
Knights, ladies, praying in dumb orat'ries,⁵
He passeth by; and his weak spirit fails
To think how they may ache in icy hoods and mails.

III

Northward he turneth through a little door,
And scarce three steps ere music's golden tongue 20
Flattered to tears this aged man and poor;
But no – already had his deathbell rung,
The joys of all his life were said and sung –
His was harsh penance on St Agnes' Eve:
Another way he went, and soon among 25
Rough ashes sat he for his soul's reprieve,⁶
And all night kept awake, for sinners' sake to grieve.

IV

That ancient beadsman heard the prelude⁷ soft,
And so it chanced, for many a door was wide
From hurry to and fro. Soon, up aloft, 30
The silver, snarling trumpets 'gan to chide;
The level chambers, ready with their pride,
Were glowing to receive a thousand guests;
The carved angels, ever eager-eyed,
Stared, where upon their heads the cornice⁸ rests, 35
With hair blown back, and wings put crosswise on their breasts.

V

At length burst in the argent⁹ revelry,
With plume, tiara, and all rich array,
Numerous as shadows haunting fairily
The brain, new stuffed in youth, with triumphs gay 40
Of old romance. These let us wish away,
And turn, sole-thoughted, to one lady there,
Whose heart had brooded all that wintry day
On love, and winged St Agnes' saintly care,
As she had heard old dames full many times declare. 45

VI

They told her how, upon St Agnes' Eve,
Young virgins might have visions of delight,
And soft adorings from their loves receive
Upon the honeyed middle of the night,
If ceremonies due they did aright – 50
As, supperless to bed they must retire,
And couch supine their beauties, lily-white;
Nor look behind, nor sideways, but require
Of heaven with upward eyes for all that they desire. 10

VII

Full of this whim was thoughtful Madeline. 55
The music, yearning like a god in pain,
She scarcely heard; her maiden eyes divine,
Fixed on the floor, saw many a sweeping train 11
Pass by – she heeded not at all; in vain
Came many a tiptoe, amorous cavalier, 60
And back retired, not cooled by high disdain,
But she saw not; her heart was elsewhere.
She sighed for Agnes' dreams, the sweetest of the year.

VIII

She danced along with vague, regardless eyes;
Anxious her lips, her breathing quick and short. 65
The hallowed hour was near at hand: she sighs
Amid the timbrels 12 and the thronged resort
Of whisperers in anger, or in sport,
Mid looks of love, defiance, hate, and scorn,
Hoodwinked with fairy fancy – all amont, 13 70

Save to St Agnes and her lambs unshorn,¹⁴
And all the bliss to be before tomorrow morn.

IX

So, purposing each moment to retire,
She lingered still. Meantime, across the moors
Had come young Porphyro, with heart on fire 75
For Madeline. Beside the portal doors,

Buttressed from moonlight,¹⁵ stands he, and implores
All saints to give him sight of Madeline
But for one moment in the tedious hours,
That he might gaze and worship all unseen, 80
Perchance speak, kneel, touch, kiss – in sooth such things have been.

X

He ventures in – let no buzzed whisper tell;
All eyes be muffled, or a hundred swords
Will storm his heart, love's fev'rous citadel.

For him those chambers held barbarian hordes,¹⁶ 85
Hyena foemen, and hot-blooded lords
Whose very dogs would execrations howl
Against his lineage;¹⁷ not one breast affords
Him any mercy in that mansion foul,
Save one old beldame,¹⁸ weak in body and in soul. 90

XI

Ah, happy chance! The aged creature came,
Shuffling along with ivory-headed wand
To where he stood, hid from the torch's flame
Behind a broad hall-pillar, far beyond

The sound of merriment and chorus bland.¹⁹ 95

He startled her; but soon she knew his face,
And grasped his fingers in her palsied hand,
Saying, 'Mercy, Porphyro! Hie thee from this place;
They are all here tonight, the whole bloodthirsty race!

XII

Get hence! Get hence! There's dwarfish Hildebrand – 100
He had a fever late, and in the fit
He cursed thee and thine, both house and land;
Then there's that old Lord Maurice, not a whit
More tame for his grey hairs. Alas me! Flit,
Flit like a ghost away!' 'Ah, gossip²⁰ dear, 105
We're safe enough; here in this armchair sit
And tell me how –' 'Good Saints! Not here, not here;
Follow me, child, or else these stones will be thy bier.'

XIII

He followed through a lowly arched way,
Brushing the cobwebs with his lofty plume, 110
And as she muttered, 'Wel-a – wel-a-day!' ²¹
He found him in a little moonlight room,
Pale, latticed, chill, and silent as a tomb.
'Now tell me where is Madeline', said he,
'Oh tell me, Angela, by the holy loom 115
Which none but secret sisterhood may see,
When they St Agnes' wool are weaving piously.' ²²

XIV

'St Agnes! Ah! It is St Agnes' Eve –
Yet men will murder upon holy days!
Thou must hold water in a witch's sieve 120
And be liege-lord²³ of all the elves and fays

To venture so; it fills me with amaze
To see thee, Porphyro! St Agnes' Eve!
God's help! My lady fair the conjuror plays²⁴
This very night. Good angels her deceive!²⁵ 125
But let me laugh awhile, I've mickle²⁶ time to grieve.'

XV

Feebly she laugheth in the languid moon,
While Porphyro upon her face doth look
Like puzzled urchin on an aged crone
Who keepeth closed a wondrous riddle-book, 130
As spectacted she sits in chimney nook.
But soon his eyes grew brilliant, when she told
His lady's purpose; and he scarce could brook²⁷
Tears, at the thought of those enchantments cold,²⁸
And Madeline asleep in lap of legends old. 135

XVI

Sudden a thought came like a full-blown rose,
Flushing his brow, and in his pained heart
Made purple riot;²⁹ then doth he propose
A stratagem that makes the beldame start:
'A cruel man and impious thou art – 140
Sweet lady, let her pray, and sleep, and dream
Alone with her good angels, far apart
From wicked men like thee. Go, go! I deem Thou canst not surely be the same that thou didst seem.'

XVII

'I will not harm her, by all saints I swear', 145
Quoth Porphyro, 'Oh may I ne'er find grace

When my weak voice shall whisper its last prayer,
If one of her soft ringlets I displace,
Or look with ruffian passion in her face;
Good Angela, believe me by these tears, 150
Or I will, even in a moment's space,
Awake, with horrid shout, my foemen's ears,
And beard³⁰ them, though they be more fanged than wolves and bears.'

XVIII

'Ah, why wilt thou affright a feeble soul?
A poor, weak, palsy-stricken, churchyard thing, 155
Whose passing-bell³¹ may ere the midnight toll;
Whose prayers for thee, each morn and evening,
Were never missed!' Thus plaining, doth she bring
A gentler speech from burning Porphyro;
So woeful, and of such deep sorrowing, 160
That Angela gives promise she will do
Whatever he shall wish, betide her weal or woe³² –

XIX

Which was to lead him, in close secrecy,
Even to Madeline's chamber, and there hide
Him in a closet, of such privacy 165
That he might see her beauty unespied,
And win perhaps that night a peerless bride,
While legioned fairies paced the coverlet
And pale enchantment held her sleepy-eyed.
Never on such a night have lovers met, 170
Since Merlin paid his Demon all the monstrous debt.³³

XX

‘It shall be as thou wishest’, said the Dame,
‘All cates³⁴ and dainties shall be stored there
Quickly on this feast-night; by the tambour frame³⁵
Her own lute thou wilt see. No time to spare, 175
For I am slow and feeble, and scarce dare
On such a catering trust my dizzy head.
Wait here, my child, with patience; kneel in prayer
The while. Ah! Thou must needs the lady wed,
Or may I never leave my grave among the dead.’ 180

XXI

So saying, she hobbled off with busy fear.
The lover’s endless minutes slowly passed;
The dame returned, and whispered in his ear
To follow her, with aged eyes aghast
From fright of dim espial.³⁶ Safe at last, 185
Through many a dusky gallery, they gain
The maiden’s chamber, silken, hushed, and chaste,
Where Porphyro took covert,³⁷ pleased amain.
His poor guide hurried back with agues in her brain.

XXII

Her falt’ring hand upon the balustrade, 190
Old Angela was feeling for the stair,
When Madeline, St Agnes’ charmed maid,³⁸
Rose, like a missioned spirit, unaware.
With silver taper’s light, and pious care,
She turned, and down the aged gossip led 195
To a safe level matting. Now prepare,
Young Porphyro, for gazing on that bed:
She comes, she comes again, like ring-dove frayed³⁹ and fled.

XXIII

Out went the taper as she hurried in;
Its little smoke, in pallid moonshine, died. 200
She closed the door, she panted, all akin
To spirits of the air, and visions wide –
No uttered syllable, or woe betide!⁴⁰
But to her heart, her heart was voluble,⁴¹
Paining with eloquence her balmy⁴² side, 205
As though a tongueless nightingale should swell
Her throat in vain, and die, heart-stifled, in her dell.

XXIV

A casement high and triple-arched there was,
All garlanded with carven imag'ries⁴³
Of fruits, and flowers, and bunches of knot-grass, 210
And diamonded with panes of quaint device,
Innumerable of stains and splendid dyes,
As are the tiger-moth's deep-damasked wings;
And in the midst, 'mong thousand heraldries,
And twilight saints, and dim emblazonings, 215
A shielded scutcheon⁴⁴ blushed with blood of queens and kings.

XXV

Full on this casement⁴⁵ shone the wintry moon,
And threw warm gules⁴⁶ on Madeline's fair breast,
As down she knelt for heaven's grace and boon;⁴⁷
Rose-bloom fell on her hands, together pressed, 220
And on her silver cross soft amethyst,
And on her hair a glory,⁴⁸ like a saint:
She seemed a splendid angel, newly dressed,

Save wings, for heaven. Porphyro grew faint;
She knelt, so pure a thing, so free from mortal taint. 225

XXVI

Anon his heart revives; her vespers⁴⁹ done,
Of all its wreathed pearls her hair she frees,
Unclasps her warmed jewels one by one,
Loosens her fragrant bodice – by degrees
Her rich attire creeps rustling to her knees. 230
Half-hidden, like a mermaid in seaweed,
Pensive awhile she dreams awake, and sees
In fancy, fair St Agnes in her bed,
But dares not look behind, or all the charm is fled.

XXVII

Soon, trembling in her soft and chilly nest, 235
In sort of wakeful swoon, perplexed she lay,
Until the popped warmth of sleep oppressed
Her soothed limbs, and soul fatigued away –
Flown like a thought, until the morrow-day,
Blissfully havened both from joy and pain, 240
Clasped like a missal where swart paynims pray;⁵⁰
Blinded alike from sunshine and from rain,
As though a rose should shut, and be a bud again.

XXVIII

Stol'n to this paradise, and so entranced,
Porphyro gazed upon her empty dress, 245
And listened to her breathing, if it chanced
To wake into a slumberous tenderness;
Which when he heard, that minute did he bless,
And breathed himself, then from the closet crept,

Noiseless as fear in a wide wilderness – 250
And over the hushed carpet, silent stepped
And 'tween the curtains peeped, where lo! – how fast she slept.

XXIX

Then by the bedside, where the faded moon
Made a dim, silver twilight, soft he set
A table, and, half anguished, threw thereon 255
A cloth of woven crimson, gold, and jet.
Oh for some drowsy Morphean amulet!⁵¹
The boisterous, midnight, festive clarion,⁵²
The kettle-drum, and far-heard clarionet,
Affray his ears, though but in dying tone; 260
The hall door shuts again, and all the noise is gone.

XXX

And still she slept an azure-lidded sleep
In blanched linen, smooth and lavendered,
While he from forth the closet brought a heap
Of candied apple, quince, and plum, and gourd;⁵³ 265
With jellies soother⁵⁴ than the creamy curd,
And lucent syrups tinct with cinnamon;⁵⁵
Manna⁵⁶ and dates, in argosy⁵⁷ transferred
From Fez;⁵⁸ and spiced dainties, every one
From silken Samarcand to cedared Lebanon. 270

XXXI

These delicates he heaped with glowing hand
On golden dishes and in baskets bright
Of wreathed silver; sumptuous they stand
In the retired quiet of the night,

Filling the chilly room with perfume light. 275
‘And now, my love, my seraph fair, awake!
Thou art my heaven, and I thine eremite.⁵⁹
Open thine eyes, for meek St Agnes’ sake,
Or I shall drowse beside thee, so my soul doth ache.’

XXXII

Thus whispering, his warm, unnerved⁶⁰ arm 280
Sank in her pillow. Shaded was her dream
By the dusk curtains; ’twas a midnight charm
Impossible to melt as iced stream.
The lustrous salvers in the moonlight gleam,
Broad golden fringe⁶¹ upon the carpet lies; 285
It seemed he never, never could redeem
From such a steadfast spell his lady’s eyes;
So mused awhile, entailed in woofed⁶² fantasies.

XXXIII

Awakening up, he took her hollow lute;
Tumultuous, and, in chords that tenderest be, 290
He played an ancient ditty, long since mute,
In Provence called, ‘La belle dame sans mercy’,⁶³
Close to her ear touching the melody –
Wherewith disturbed, she uttered a soft moan.
He ceased – she panted quick – and suddenly 295
Her blue affrayed⁶⁴ eyes wide open shone;
Upon his knees he sank, pale as smooth-sculptured stone.

XXXIV

Her eyes were open, but she still beheld,
Now wide awake, the vision of her sleep –

There was a painful change, that nigh expelled 300
The blisses of her dream so pure and deep.
At which fair Madeline began to weep
And moan forth witless words with many a sigh,
While still her gaze on Porphyro would keep;
Who knelt, with joined hands and piteous eye, 305
Fearing to move or speak, she looked so dreamingly.

XXXV

‘Ah, Porphyro!’ said she, ‘but even now
Thy voice was at sweet tremble in mine ear,
Made tuneable with every sweetest vow,
And those sad eyes were spiritual⁶⁵ and clear. 310
How changed thou art! How pallid, chill, and drear!
Give me that voice again, my Porphyro,
Those looks immortal, those complainings dear!
Oh leave me not in this eternal woe,
For if thou diest, my love, I know not where to go.’ 315

XXXVI

Beyond a mortal man impassioned far
At these voluptuous accents, he arose
Ethereal, flushed, and like a throbbing star
Seen mid the sapphire heaven’s deep repose;
Into her dream he melted, as the rose 320
Blendeth its odour with the violet –
Solution sweet.⁶⁶ Meantime the frost-wind blows
Like love’s alarum pattering the sharp sleet
Against the window-panes; St Agnes’ moon hath set.

XXXVII

'Tis dark; quick pattereth the flaw-blown sleet.⁶⁷ 325
 'This is no dream, my bride, my Madeline!
 'Tis dark; the iced gusts still rave and beat.
 'No dream, alas! Alas, and woe is mine!
 Porphyro will leave me here to fade and pine.
 Cruel! What traitor could thee hither bring? 330
 I curse not, for my heart is lost in thine,
 Though thou forsakest a deceived thing,
 A dove forlorn and lost with sick unpruned⁶⁸ wing.'

XXXVIII

'My Madeline! Sweet dreamer! Lovely bride!
 Say, may I be for aye thy vassal blessed? 335
 Thy beauty's shield, heart-shaped and vermeil dyed?
 Ah, silver shrine, here will I take my rest
 After so many hours of toil and quest,
 A famished pilgrim, saved by miracle.
 Though I have found, I will not rob thy nest, 340
 Saving of thy sweet self – if thou think'st well
 To trust, fair Madeline, to no rude infidel.

XXXIX

Hark! 'Tis an elfin-storm from fairy land,
 Of haggard seeming,⁶⁹ but a boon⁷⁰ indeed.
 Arise, arise! The morning is at hand; 345
 The bloated wassaillers will never heed.
 Let us away, my love, with happy speed;
 There are no ears to hear, or eyes to see,
 Drowned all in Rhenish⁷¹ and the sleepy mead.
 Awake! Arise, my love, and fearless be, 350
 For o'er the southern moors I have a home for thee.'

XL

She hurried at his words, beset with fears,
For there were sleeping dragons⁷² all around,
At glaring watch, perhaps, with ready spears;
Down the wide stairs a darkling⁷³ way they found. 355
In all the house was heard no human sound;
A chain-drooped lamp was flickering by each door;
The arras,⁷⁴ rich with horseman, hawk, and hound
Fluttered in the besieging wind's uproar,
And the long carpets rose along the gusty floor. 360

XLI

They glide, like phantoms, into the wide hall;
Like phantoms to the iron porch they glide,
Where lay the porter, in uneasy sprawl,
With a huge empty flagon by his side;
The wakeful bloodhound rose and shook his hide, 365
But his sagacious eye an inmate owns.
By one, and one, the bolts full easy slide,
The chains lie silent on the footworn stones –
The key turns, and the door upon its hinges groans.

XLII

And they are gone – aye, ages long ago 370
These lovers fled away into the storm.
That night the Baron dreamt of many a woe,
And all his warrior-guests, with shade and form
Of witch and demon, and large coffin-worm,
Were long be-nightmared. Angela the old 375
Died palsy-twitched,⁷⁵ with meagre face deform;
The beadsman, after thousand aves told,
For aye unsought for, slept among his ashes cold.

The Eve of St Agnes

1The inspiration for this poem was the superstition that on St Agnes' Eve (20 January) virgins might use various means of divination to conjure up an image of their future husbands. Keats originally composed the poem between 18 January and 2 February 1819; he revised it in September, much to the dismay of Woodhouse, who communicated his feelings to Keats's publishers, Taylor and Hessey. Although Woodhouse later noted that 'Keats left it to his publishers to adopt which [alterations] they pleased', Keats went through the proofs of the poem as printed in 1820, and insisted that some of the revisions be allowed to stand. Some of the more controversial revisions, not included in 1820, are given in featurefootnotes.

2 beadsman one paid to pray for others.

3 told counted.

4 meagre thin.

5 Knights...orat'ries Keats probably saw the sculptured effigies on the tombstones in Chichester Cathedral, January 1819. An oratory is a small chapel.

6 reprieve redemption.

7 prelude introductory music.

8 cornice ornamental moulding between the wall and ceiling.

9 argent silver.

10 At this point in a MS version of the poem, Keats inserted an additional stanza, intended to clarify the narrative:

'Twas said her future lord would there appear
Offering, as sacrifice (all in the dream),
Delicious food, even to her lips brought near,
Viands, and wine, and fruit, and sugared cream,
To touch her palate with the fine extreme
Of relish; then soft music heard, and then
More pleasures followed in a dizzy stream,
Palpable almost; then to wake again
Warm in the virgin morn, no weeping Magdalen.

11 train long skirts and robes sweeping along the floor.

12 timbrels tambourines.

13 amort listless, inanimate.

14 her lambs unshorn The Feast of St Agnes is celebrated, 21 January, at Sant' Agnese fuori le Mura in Rome by the presentation and blessing of two unshorn lambs. See Margaret Visser, The Geometry of Love: Space, Time, Mystery and Meaning in an Ordinary Church (London, 2001), pp. 119–21.

15 Buttressed from moonlight Porphyro stands in the shade of a buttress.

16 barbarian hordes the barbarians who attacked Rome.

17 Against his lineage Madeline's and Porphyro's families are at war.

18 beldame old lady.

19 bland soothing.

20 gossip talkative old lady.

21 Wel-a – wel-a-day Keats is probably recalling Coleridge, Christabel 252. It was a fairly recent publication, having been issued at Byron's request in 1816, eighteen years after Coleridge began to write it (see p. 615 above).

22 by the holy loom...piously The Feast of St Agnes is celebrated by the presentation and blessing of two unshorn sheep, whose wool is spun and woven by nuns.

23 liege-lord master.

24 the conjuror plays Madeline is attempting to conjure visions of her future husband.

25 Good angels her deceive Let angels send her instead good dreams.

26 mickle much.

27 brook restrain.

28 enchantments cold If Madeline is successful she will see only cold visions, not a living being.

29 Made purple riot i.e. made his heart beat excitedly.

30 beard defy.

31 passing-bell death-bell.

32 betide her weal or woe whether good or ill befalls her.

33 Since Merlin paid his Demon all the monstrous debt The precise reference of this line has puzzled commentators. Merlin was the son of a Welsh princess and a demon-father, from whom he inherited his magical powers.

34 cates delicacies.

35 tambour frame embroidery frame.

36 aghast...dim espial terrified of not being able to see the dangers around them.

37 took covert hid himself.

38 maid maiden.

39 frayed frightened.

40 No uttered syllable, or woe betide If she speaks she will break the spell.

41 voluble beating fast with excitement.

42 balmy soft and fragrant.

43 imag'ries designs.

44 shielded scutcheon coat-of-arms with royal quarterings on a field of gules.

45 casement window.

46 gules red light.

47 boon blessing.

48 glory halo.

49 vespers evening prayers.

50 Clasped like a missal where swart paynims pray clasped like a prayer-book carried by a believer through a pagan country.

51 Morphean amulet sleeping pill.

52 clarion trumpet.

53 gourd melon.

54 soother more soothing.

55 lucent syrups tinct with cinnamon clear syrups tinged with cinnamon.

56 Manna probably an exotic fruit.

57 argosy large merchant ship.

58 Fez in northern Morocco.

59 eremite hermit.

60 unnerved weak.

61 golden fringe of the tablecloth.

62 woofed woven.

63 La belle dame sans mercy title of a poem by Alain Chartier, 1424 – as well as one by Keats (p. 1460 n. 1).

64 affrayed startled.

65 spiritual lacking bodily substance.

66 The revised version of lines 314–22 reads:

See, while she speaks, his arms encroaching slow,
Have zoned her, heart to heart – loud, loud the dark
winds blow!

For on the midnight came a tempest fell;
More sooth, for that his quick rejoinder flows
Into her burning ear – and still the spell
Unbroken guards her in serene repose.
With her wild dream he mingled, as a rose

Marryeth its odour to a violet.
Still, still she dreams; louder the frost-wind blows ...

For Woodhouse's comment on the stanza, see pp. 1069–70 above.

67 flaw-blown sleet sleet blown by a sudden, tempestuous gust of wind.

68 unpruned unpruned.

69 haggard seeming wild appearance.

70 boon blessing.

71 Rhenish wine from the Rhine valley.

72 dragons dragoons.

73 darkling dark.

Journal-Letter from John Keats to George and Georgiana Keats, 14 February–3 May 1819 (extracts)¹

[16 April 1819] Last Sunday I took a walk towards Highgate and, in the lane that winds by the side of Lord Mansfield's park, I met Mr Green, our demonstrator at Guy's, in conversation with Coleridge.² I joined them, after enquiring by a look whether it would be agreeable. I walked with him at his alderman³-after-dinner pace for near two miles, I suppose. In those two miles he broached a thousand things; let me see if I can give you a list. Nightingales, poetry – on poetical sensation – metaphysics – different genera and species of dreams – nightmare – a dream accompanied by a sense of touch – single and double touch – a dream related – first and second consciousness – the difference explained between will and volition – so many metaphysicians from a want of smoking – the second consciousness – monsters – the kraken⁴ – mermaids – Southey believes in them – Southey’s belief too much diluted – a ghost story – Good morning – I heard his voice as he came towards me – I heard it as he moved away – I had heard it all the interval (if it may be called so). He was civil enough to ask me to call on him at Highgate⁵ goodnight! It looks so much like rain I shall not go to town to day, but put it off till tomorrow....

Journal-Letter from John Keats

¹ The lengthy journal-letter from which these two extracts are taken is one of Keats’s most entertaining and illuminating.

² Coleridge’s account of this meeting can be found on p. 733. It took place in the grounds of Kenwood House, seat of William Murray, Lord Mansfield (1705–93). Joseph Henry Green (1791–1863) was Coleridge’s literary executor, and had been Keats’s demonstrator at Guy’s Hospital, 1815–16.

³ alderman ‘[portly, elderly] dignitary’.

⁴ kraken mythical sea-monster of enormous size.

⁵ Coleridge was at this time resident at Highgate in north London, at the home of Dr James Gillman.

[21 April 1819]¹ The common cognomen² of this world among the misguided and superstitious is ‘a vale of tears’, from which we are to be redeemed by a certain arbitrary interposition of God and taken to Heaven. What a little, circumscribed, straitened notion! Call the world, if you please, ‘the Vale of Soul-Making’. Then you will find out the use of the world. (I am speaking now in the highest terms for human nature, admitting it to be immortal – which I will here take for granted for the purpose of showing a thought which has struck me concerning it.) I say ‘Soul-Making’ soul, as distinguished from an intelligence – there may be intelligences or sparks of the divinity in millions, but they are not souls till they acquire identities, till each one is personality itself.

Intelligences are atoms of perception. They know and they see and they are pure – in short, they are God. How then are souls to be made? How then are these sparks which are God to have identity³ given them – so as ever to possess a bliss peculiar to each one’s individual existence? How, but by the medium of a world like this? This point I sincerely wish to consider because I think it a grander system of salvation than the Christian religion – or rather it is a system of spirit-creation. This is effected by three grand materials acting the one upon the other for a series of years. These three materials are the intelligence; the human heart (as distinguished from intelligence or mind); and the world or elemental space suited for the proper action of mind and heart on each other for the purpose of forming the soul or intelligence destined to possess the sense of identity. I can scarcely express what I but dimly perceive, and yet I think I perceive it. That you may judge the more clearly I will put it in the most homely form possible: I will call the world a school instituted for the purpose of teaching little children to read; I will call the human heart the hornbook⁴ used in that school; and I will call the child able to read it the soul made from that school and its hornbook.

Do you not see how necessary a world of pains and troubles is to school an intelligence and make it a soul, a place where the heart must feel and suffer in a thousand diverse ways? Not merely is the heart a hornbook, it is the mind’s Bible, it is the mind’s experience, it is the teat from which the mind or intelligence sucks its identity. As various as the lives of men are, so various become their souls, and thus does God make individual beings, souls, identical souls of the sparks of his own essence. This appears to me a faint sketch of a system of salvation which does not affront our reason and humanity; I am convinced that many difficulties which Christians labour under would vanish before it.

There is one which even now strikes me: the salvation of children. In them the spark or intelligence returns to God without any identity, it having had no time to learn of, and be altered by, the heart – or seat of the human passions. It is pretty generally suspected that the Christian scheme has been copied from the ancient Persian and Greek philosophers. Why may they not have made this simple thing even more simple for common apprehension, by introducing mediators and personages in the same manner as in the heathen mythology abstractions are personified? Seriously, I think it probable that this system of soul-making may have been the parent of all the more palpable and personal schemes of redemption, among the Zoroastrians,⁵ the Christians, and the Hindus.⁶ For as one part of the human species must have their carved Jupiter, so another part must have the palpable and named mediator and saviour – their Christ, their Oromanes,⁷ and their Vishnu.⁸

If what I have said should not be plain enough, as I fear it may not be, I will put you in the place where I began in this series of thoughts. I mean, I began by seeing how man was formed by circumstances – and what are circumstances, but touchstones⁹ of his heart? And what are touchstones, but provings of his heart? And what are provings of his heart, but fortifiers or alterers of his nature? And what is his altered nature, but his soul? And what was his soul before it came into the world and had these provings and alterations and perfectionings? An intelligence without identity – and how is this identity to be made? Through the medium of the heart? And how is the heart to become this medium, but in a world of circumstances?

21 April 1819

¹ For useful comment on this important letter see John Barnard, John Keats (Cambridge, 1987), pp. 134–5. Keats's remarks relate to his 'Ode to Psyche', which was copied out later in this letter.

² cognomen nickname.

³ identity Rollins suggests that Keats must have been reading John Locke's Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1690), Book II, chapter 27, 'Of Identity or Diversity'.

⁴ hornbook In Keats's day children learned the alphabet from a leaf of paper mounted on a piece of wood with a handle. The paper was protected by a thin piece of horn.

⁵ Zoroastrians followers of the Zoroastrian religion, which originated in India and spread to Persia (modern-day Iran).

⁶ For Keats, Christianity derives from ancient philosophies, offering a redemptive scheme which is as valid as Hinduism and Zoroastrianism.

⁷ Oromanes Oromanes or Ahriman is the evil spirit in the dualistic doctrine of Zoroastrianism, who is opposed to Ormuzd, the deity of light. Keats is thus mistaken in thinking of him as a 'mediator and saviour'. Numerous sources for Keats's knowledge of Oromanes are suggested. Rollins suggests that he was probably an admirer of J. R. Planché's Abudah, or the Talisman of Oromanes, performed during Easter 1819 in London. Ronald Tetreault points out to me (via the NASSR-List) that in 1813–16 Thomas Love Peacock projected (and wrote part of) a twelve-Book epic poem entitled Ahrimanes, about which Keats may have known (see Shelley and his Circle ed. Kenneth Neil Cameron, vol. 3 (1970), pp. 211–44).

⁸ Vishnu preserver of the universe in Hindu mythology.

⁹ touchstones anything that can be used to test the authenticity of something else.

La Belle Dame Sans Merci: A Ballad (composed 21 April 1819; edited from MS)¹

Oh what can ail thee, knight-at-arms,
Alone and palely loitering?
The sedge has withered from the lake,
And no birds sing.

Oh what can ail thee, knight-at-arms, 5
So haggard and so woe-begone?
The squirrel's granary is full,
And the harvest's done.

I see a lily on thy brow
With anguish moist and fever dew, 10
And on thy cheeks a fading rose
Fast withereth too.

I met a lady in the meads,
Full beautiful – a fairy's child;
Her hair was long, her foot was light, 15
And her eyes were wild.

I made a garland for her head,
And bracelets too, and fragrant zone;²
She looked at me as she did love,
And made sweet moan. 20

I set her on my pacing steed,
And nothing else saw all day long,
For sidelong would she bend, and sing
A fairy's song.

She found me roots of relish sweet, 25
And honey wild and manna dew,³
And sure in language strange she said,
'I love thee true'.

8

She took me to her elfin grot
And there she wept, and sighed full sore, 30
And there I shut her wild wild eyes
With kisses four.⁴

And there she lulled me asleep,
And there I dreamed – ah, woe betide! –
The latest dream I ever dreamed 35
On the cold hill's side.

10

I saw pale kings and princes too,
Pale warriors, death-pale were they all;
They cried, 'La belle dame sans merci
Hath thee in thrall!' 40

11

I saw their starved lips in the gloam⁵
With horrid warning gaped wide,
And I awoke and found me here
On the cold hill's side.

12

And this is why I sojourn here, 45
Alone and palely loitering,
Though the sedge is withered from the lake,
And no birds sing.

La Belle Dame Sans Merci

¹ The poem's title derives from Alain Chartier's poem of 1424, which existed in a translation believed in Keats's day to be by Chaucer. For other possible sources, see headnote, p. 1391. Keats's poem, believed to be one of his finest, was published in a revised version in Hunt's magazine The Indicator, 10 May 1820, over the signature, 'Caviare'. It is widely agreed that the manuscript version, published here, is the better of the two.

² fragrant zone belt made out of flowers.

³ honey wild and manna dew Keats is recalling the conclusion of Coleridge's 'Kubla Khan': 'For he on honey-dew hath fed / And drank the milk of paradise.'

⁴ kisses four Sending this poem to his brother George, Keats wrote: 'Why four kisses? you will say. Why four? Because I wish to restrain the headlong impetuosity of my Muse. She would have fain said "score" without hurting the rhyme – but we temper the imagination (as the critics say) with judgment. I was obliged to choose an even number, that both eyes might have fair play: and to speak truly I think two a piece quite sufficient. Suppose I had said “seven”? There would have been three and a half apiece, a very awkward affair’ (Rollins ii 97).

⁵ gloom twilight.

Ode to Psyche* (composed 21–30 April 1819)¹

From Lamia, Isabella, The Eve of St. Agnes, and Other Poems* (1820)

Oh goddess! Hear these tuneless numbers,² wrung
By sweet enforcement and remembrance dear,
And pardon that thy secrets should be sung
Even into thine own soft-conched³ ear.
Surely I dreamt today, or did I see 5
The winged Psyche with awakened eyes?
I wandered in a forest thoughtlessly,⁴
And, on the sudden, fainting with surprise,
Saw two fair creatures, couched side by side
In deepest grass, beneath the whisp’ring roof 10
Of leaves and trembled blossoms, where there ran
A brooklet, scarce espied.⁵
Mid hushed, cool-rooted flowers, fragrant-eyed,
Blue, silver-white, and budded Tyrian,⁶
They lay calm-breathing on the bedded grass; 15
Their arms embraced, and their pinions⁷ too;
Their lips touched not, but had not bade adieu,
As if disjoined by soft-handed slumber,
And ready still past kisses to outnumber
At tender eye-dawn of aurean⁸ love. 20

The winged boy⁹ I knew;
But who wast thou, oh happy, happy dove?
His Psyche true!

Oh latest born and loveliest vision far
Of all Olympus' faded hierarchy!¹⁰ 25
Fairer than Phoebe's sapphire-regioned star,¹¹
Or Vesper,¹² amorous glow-worm of the sky;
Fairer than these, though temple thou hast none,
Nor altar heaped with flowers;
Nor virgin-choir to make delicious moan 30
Upon the midnight hours;
No voice, no lute, no pipe, no incense sweet
From chain-swung censer teeming;
No shrine, no grove, no oracle, no heat
Of pale-mouthed prophet dreaming.¹³ 35

Oh brightest! though too late for antique vows,
Too, too late for the fond believing lyre,¹⁴
When holy were the haunted forest boughs,
Holy the air, the water and the fire;
Yet even in these days so far retired 40
From happy pieties, thy lucent fans,¹⁵
Fluttering among the faint Olympians,
I see, and sing, by my own eyes inspired.
So let me be thy choir, and make a moan
Upon the midnight hours; 45
Thy voice, thy lute, thy pipe, thy incense sweet
From swung censer teeming;
Thy shrine, thy grove, thy oracle, thy heat
Of pale-mouthed prophet dreaming.

Yes, I will be thy priest, and build a fane¹⁶ 50

In some untrodden region of my mind,
 Where branched thoughts, new grown with pleasant pain,
 Instead of pines shall murmur in the wind;
 Far, far around shall those dark-clustered trees
 Fledge the wild-ridged mountains steep by steep; 55
 And there by zephyrs, streams, and birds, and bees,
 The moss-lain dryads¹⁷ shall be lulled to sleep;
 And in the midst of this wide quietness
 A rosy sanctuary will I dress
 With the wreathed trellis of a working brain, 60
 With buds, and bells, and stars without a name,
 With all the gardener Fancy e'er could feign,¹⁸>
 Who, breeding flowers, will never breed the same:
 And there shall be for thee all soft delight
 That shadowy thought can win – 65
 A bright torch, and a casement¹⁹ ope at night,
 To let the warm Love in!

Ode to Psyche

¹According to Keats's source, Lemprière's Bibliotheca Classica (1788), Psyche was 'a nymph whom Cupid [Eros] married and carried to a place of bliss, where he long enjoyed her company. Venus put her to death because she had robbed the world of her son; but Jupiter, at the request of Cupid, granted immortality to Psyche. The word signifies the soul, and this personification of Psyche is posterior to the Augustan age, though still it is connected with ancient mythology. Psyche is generally represented with the wings of a butterfly, to intimate the lightness of the soul, of which the butterfly is the symbol, and on that account, among the ancients, when a man has just expired, a butterfly appeared fluttering above, as if rising from the mouth of the deceased.' Keats was an admirer of Mary Tighe's Psyche (1805), and Claude Lorrain's famous painting, Landscape with Psyche outside the Palace of Cupid (1664, now at the National Gallery, London). For more commentary, see headnote p. 1392.

2 tuneless numbers his poetry.

3 soft-conched her ear is shaped like a conch-shell.

4 thoughtlessly without an anxious thought.

5 scarce espied seen only with difficulty.

6 Tyrian purple, after the dye made at Tyre.

7 pinions wings.

8 aurorean roseate.

9 The winged boy Cupid.

10 Olympus' faded hierarchy The gods of Olympus are faded by comparison with the beauty of Psyche.

11 Phoebe's sapphire-regioned star the moon, of which Phoebe is goddess.

12 Vesper evening star.

13 No heat...dreaming There are no prophets inspired to speak on Psyche's behalf.

14 fond believing lyre hymns sung by the unquestioningly devoted.

15 lucent fans shining wings.

16 fane temple.

17 dryads wood-nymphs.

¹⁸ feign invent.

¹⁹ casement window.

Ode to a Nightingale (composed May 1819)¹

From Lamia, Isabella, The Eve of St. Agnes, and Other Poems (1820)

My heart aches, and a drowsy numbness pains
My sense, as though of hemlock² I had drunk,
Or emptied some dull opiate to the drains³
One minute past,⁴ and Lethe-wards⁵ had sunk;
'Tis not through envy of thy happy lot, 5
But being too happy in thine happiness,
That thou, light-winged dryad⁶ of the trees,
In some melodious plot
Of beechen green, and shadows numberless,
Singest of summer in full-throated ease. 10

Oh for a draught of vintage!⁷ that hath been
Cooled a long age in the deep-delved earth,
Tasting of flora and the country green,
Dance, and Provençal song, and sunburnt mirth!
Oh for a beaker full of the warm south,⁸ 15
Full of the true, the blushful Hippocrene,⁹

With beaded bubbles winking at the brim,
And purple-stained mouth;
That I might drink, and leave the world unseen,
And with thee fade away into the forest dim – 20

Fade far away, dissolve, and quite forget
What thou among the leaves hast never known,
The weariness,¹⁰ the fever, and the fret
Here, where men sit and hear each other groan;
Where palsy shakes a few, sad, last grey hairs, 25
Where youth grows pale, and spectre-thin, and dies;¹¹
Where but to think is to be full of sorrow
And leaden-eyed despairs;
Where Beauty cannot keep her lustrous eyes,
Or new Love pine at them beyond tomorrow. 30

4

Away! Away! For I will fly to thee,
Not charioted by Bacchus and his pards,¹²
But on the viewless¹³ wings of Poesy,
Though the dull brain perplexes and retards;
Already with thee! Tender is the night, 35
And haply¹⁴ the Queen Moon is on her throne,
Clustered around by all her starry fays;¹⁵
But here there is no light
Save what from heaven is with the breezes blown
Through verdurous glooms and winding mossy ways. 40

I cannot see what flowers are at my feet,
Nor what soft incense hangs upon the boughs,
But, in embalmed darkness,¹⁶ guess each sweet
Wherewith the seasonable month¹⁷ endows
The grass, the thicket, and the fruit-tree wild, 45
White hawthorn, and the pastoral eglantine,
Fast-fading violets covered up in leaves,
And mid-May's eldest child,
The coming musk-rose,¹⁸ full of dewy wine,
The murmurous haunt of flies on summer eves. 50

Darkling¹⁹ I listen; and for many a time
I have been half in love with easeful Death,
Called him soft names in many a mused rhyme,
To take into the air my quiet breath;
Now more than ever seems it rich to die, 55
To cease upon the midnight with no pain,
While thou art pouring forth thy soul abroad
In such an ecstasy!
Still wouldst thou sing, and I have ears in vain –
To thy high requiem become a sod. 60

Thou wast not born for death, immortal bird!
No hungry generations tread thee down;
The voice I hear this passing night was heard
In ancient days by emperor and clown:²⁰
Perhaps the self-same song that found a path 65
Through the sad heart of Ruth, when, sick for home,
She stood in tears amid the alien corn;²¹
The same that oft-times hath

Charmed magic casements, opening on the foam
Of perilous seas, in fairy lands forlorn. 70

Forlorn! The very word is like a bell
To toll me back from thee to my sole self!
Adieu! The fancy cannot cheat so well
As she is fabled to do, deceiving elf.
Adieu! Adieu! Thy plaintive anthem fades 75
Past the near meadows, over the still stream,
Up the hillside, and now 'tis buried deep
In the next valley-glades:
Was it a vision, or a waking dream?
Fled is that music – do I wake or sleep? 80

Ode to a Nightingale

¹Twenty years after the event Keats's friend Charles Brown recorded how this poem was composed: 'In the spring of 1819 a nightingale had built her nest near my house. Keats felt a tranquil and continual joy in her song; and one morning he took his chair from the breakfast-table to the grass-plot under a plum-tree, where he sat for two or three hours. When he came into the house, I perceived he had some scraps of paper in his hand, and these he was quietly thrusting behind the books. On enquiry, I found those scraps, four or five in number, contained his poetic feeling on the song of our nightingale. The writing was not well legible; and it was difficult to arrange the stanzas on so many scraps. With his assistance I succeeded, and this was his "Ode to a Nightingale", a poem which has been the delight of everyone' (Keats Circle ii 65). See also headnote, p. 1392.

²*hemlock* can be used as a sedative; it should be noted that Keats is not saying that he has actually taken hemlock.

3 drains dregs.

4 past ago.

5 Lethe-wards towards Lethe, river of forgetfulness in Hades, from which souls drank to forget their past lives.

6 dryad wood-nymph.

7 vintage wine.

8 warm south wine from the Mediterranean.

9 Hippocrene spring sacred to the muses on Mt Helicon. Keats means wine.

10 weariness Wordsworth had written of ‘hours of weariness’ amid the ‘din / Of towns and cities’ in Tintern Abbey 26–8.

11 Where youth...dies often taken to refer to the death of Tom Keats from consumption, 1 December 1818. Cf. Wordsworth, Excursion iv 760: ‘While man grows old, and dwindles, and decays.’

12 Not charioted by Bacchus and his pards Keats’s source, Lemprière’s Bibliotheca Classica (1788), recorded that when Bacchus (god of wine) travelled east, he ‘was drawn in a chariot by a lion and a tyger and was accompanied by Pan and Silenus and all the satyrs’.

13 viewless invisible.

14 haply perhaps.

15 fays fairies.

16 embalmed darkness The night is full of the scent of plants.

17 the seasonable month May.

18 The coming musk-rose usually flowers in June.

19 Darkling in darkness.

20 clown peasant.

21 Through the...corn Ruth was forced, by famine, to leave home and labour in the fields of her kinsman, Boaz (Ruth 2:1–2).

Ode on a Grecian Urn (composed c.May 1819)¹

From Lamia, Isabella, The Eve of St Agnes, and Other Poems (1820)

1

Thou still unravished bride of quietness,

Thou foster-child of silence and slow time,²

Sylvan historian,³ who canst thus express

A flowery tale more sweetly than our rhyme –

What leaf-fringed legend haunts about thy shape 5

Of deities or mortals, or of both,

Figure 18 This tracing of an engraving of the Sosibios Vase in the Louvre, attributed to Keats, is thought to be one of the influences on his ‘Ode on a Grecian Urn’. (Keats–Shelley Memorial Association, Rome.)

In Tempe or the dales of Arcady?⁴
What men or gods are these? What maidens loath?
What mad pursuit? What struggle to escape?
What pipes and timbrels?⁵ What wild ecstasy? 10

Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard
Are sweeter; therefore, ye soft pipes, play on –
Not to the sensual⁶ ear, but, more endeared,
Pipe to the spirit ditties of no tone:

Fair youth, beneath the trees, thou canst not leave 15
Thy song, nor ever can those trees be bare;
Bold lover, never, never canst thou kiss,
Though winning near the goal – yet do not grieve;
She cannot fade, though thou hast not thy bliss,
For ever wilt thou love, and she be fair! 20

Ah, happy, happy boughs! that cannot shed
Your leaves, nor ever bid the spring adieu;
And, happy melodist, unwearied,
For ever piping songs for ever new;
More happy love, more happy, happy love! 25
For ever warm and still to be enjoyed,
For ever panting and for ever young;
All breathing human passion far above,⁷
That leaves a heart high-sorrowful and cloyed,
A burning forehead, and a parching tongue. 30

Who are these coming to the sacrifice?
To what green altar, oh mysterious priest,
Lead'st thou that heifer lowing at the skies,
And all her silken flanks with garlands dressed?
What little town by river or seashore, 35
Or mountain-built with peaceful citadel,
Is emptied of this folk, this pious morn?
And, little town, thy streets for evermore
Will silent be, and not a soul to tell
Why thou art desolate, can e'er return. 40

Oh Attic⁸ shape! Fair attitude! With brede⁹
 Of marble men and maidens overwrought,¹⁰
 With forest branches and the trodden weed;
 Thou, silent form, dost tease us out of thought
 As doth eternity. Cold Pastoral! 45
 When old age shall this generation waste,
 Thou shalt remain, in midst of other woe
 Than ours, a friend to man, to whom thou say'st,
 'Beauty is truth, truth beauty'; that is all
 Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know. 50

Ode on a Grecian Urn

¹The inspiration for this poem came from a variety of sources, including the Townley Vase at the British Museum and the Elgin Marbles (reproduced in Woof and Hebron, John Keats (Grasmere, 1995), pp. 128–30). See also headnote, p. 1392.

²*foster-child of silence and slow time* The potter who made the vase is dead, leaving it to be fostered by time and silence.

³*Sylvan historian* The vase is a historian because it tells a story; 'sylvan' refers to the pastoral scenes it depicts.

⁴Tempe and Arcadia, places known in classical times for their beauty and the happiness of their inhabitants.

⁵*timbrels* tambourines.

⁶*sensual* of sense.

⁷*All breathing...above* Compare Hazlitt's remarks on Greek statuary, 'On Gusto', pp. 781–2.

⁸*Attic* Grecian.

⁹*brede* braid.

¹⁰*overwrought* fashioned over the surface of the urn.

Ode on Melancholy (composed c.May 1819)¹

From Lamia, Isabella, The Eve of St Agnes, and Other Poems (1820)

1

No, no, go not to Lethe, neither twist

 Wolfsbane,² tight-rooted, for its poisonous wine;
Nor suffer thy pale forehead to be kissed

 By nightshade,³ ruby grape of Proserpine;⁴
Make not your rosary of yew-berries,⁵ 5

 Nor let the beetle, nor the death-moth⁶ be
 Your mournful Psyche, nor the downy owl
A partner in your sorrow's mysteries;

 For shade to shade will come too drowsily,
 And drown the wakeful anguish of the soul. 10

But when the melancholy fit shall fall

 Sudden from heaven like a weeping cloud,
That fosters the droop-headed flowers all,
 And hides the green hill in an April shroud;

Then glut thy sorrow on⁷ a morning rose, 15
 Or on the rainbow of the salt sand-wave,

Or on the wealth of globed peonies;
Or if thy mistress some rich anger shows,
Imprison her soft hand, and let her rave,
And feed deep, deep upon her peerless eyes. 20

She dwells with Beauty – Beauty that must die;
And Joy, whose hand is ever at his lips
Bidding adieu; and aching Pleasure nigh,
Turning to poison while the bee-mouth sips.
Aye, in the very temple of Delight 25
Veiled Melancholy has her sovran shrine,
Though seen of none save him whose strenuous tongue
Can burst Joy's grape against his palate fine;
His soul shall taste the sadness of her might,
And be among her cloudy trophies hung. 30

Ode on Melancholy

¹ Miriam Allott remarks: 'The poem is a characteristic Keatsian statement about the necessary relationship between joy and sorrow. True Melancholy is not to be found among thoughts of oblivion, death and gloom (stanza 1); it descends suddenly and is linked with the perception of beauty and its transience (stanza 2); it is associated with beauty, joy, pleasure and delight and is felt only by those who can experience these intensely (stanza 3).' A cancelled opening stanza in MS reads:

Though you should build a bark of dead men's bones,
And rear a phantom gibbet for a mast,
Stitch creeds together for a sail, with groans
To fill it out, bloodstained and aghast;
Although your rudder be a dragon's tail,
Long severed, yet still hard with agony,
Your cordage large uprootings from the skull
Of bald Medusa, certes you would fail

To find the Melancholy – whether she
Dreameth in any isle of Lethe dull.

Ode on Indolence (composed between 19 March and 9 June 1819; edited from MS)¹

*They toil not, neither do they spin.*²

One morn before me were three figures seen,
With bowed necks and joined hands, side-faced;
And one behind the other stepped serene,
In placid sandals and in white robes graced;
They passed, like figures on a marble urn, 5
When shifted round to see the other side;
They came again, as when the urn once more
Is shifted round, the first-seen shades return –
And they were strange to me, as may betide
With vases, to one deep in Phidian lore.³ 10

How is it, shadows, that I knew ye not?

How came ye muffled in so hush⁴ a masque?⁵
Was it a silent deep-disguised plot
To steal away, and leave without a task
My idle days? Ripe was the drowsy hour; 15
The blissful cloud of summer indolence
Benumbed my eyes; my pulse grew less and less;
Pain had no sting, and pleasure's wreath no flower –
Oh why did ye not melt, and leave my sense
Unhaunted quite of all but – nothingness? 20

A third time passed they by, and, passing, turned
Each one the face a moment whiles to me;
Then faded, and to follow them I burned
And ached for wings, because I knew the three:
The first was a fair maid, and Love her name; 25
The second was Ambition, pale of cheek
And ever watchful with fatigued eye;
The last, whom I love more, the more of blame
Is heaped upon her, maiden most unmeek,
I knew to be my demon Poesy. 30

They faded, and, forsooth, I wanted wings!
Oh folly! What is love? And where is it?
And, for that poor ambition – it springs
From a man's little heart's short fever-fit;⁶
For Poesy! No, she has not a joy – 35
At least for me – so sweet as drowsy noons,
And evenings steeped in honeyed indolence.

Oh for an age so sheltered from annoy,⁷
That I may never know how change the moons,
Or hear the voice of busy common sense! 40

A third time came they by – alas, wherefore?
My sleep had been embroidered with dim dreams;
My soul had been a lawn besprinkled o'er
With flowers, and stirring shades, and baffled beams;
The morn was clouded, but no shower fell, 45
Though in her lids hung the sweet tears of May;
The open casement pressed a new-leaved vine,
Let in the budding warmth and throstle's lay –
Oh shadows, 'twas a time to bid farewell!
Upon your skirts had fallen no tears of mine. 50

So ye three ghosts, adieu! Ye cannot raise
My head cool-bedded in the flowery grass,
For I would not be dieted with praise –
A pet-lamb in a sentimental farce!⁸
Fade softly from my eyes, and be once more 55
In masque-like figures on the dreamy urn;
Farewell! I yet have visions for the night,
And for the day faint visions there is store.
Vanish, ye phantoms, from my idle sprite,
Into the clouds, and never more return! 60

Ode on Indolence

¹ This poem was not included in Keats's 1820 volume.

² Matthew 6:28: ‘Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin.’

³ Phidian lore sculpture; Phidias (born c.500 BCE) may have designed and probably supervised construction of the Elgin marbles.

⁴ hush silent.

⁵ masque procession.

⁶ fever-fit an echo of Macbeth III ii 23: ‘After life’s fitful fever he sleeps well.’

⁷ annoy harm.

⁸ For I would not...farce Keats is saying that praise from reviewers is worthless, as it is as patronizing as the stroking of a lamb.

Lamia (Part I written c.28 June and 11 July 1819, completed 12 August and c.5 September 1819, revised March 1820)¹

From Lamia, Isabella, The Eve of St Agnes, and Other Poems (1820)

Part I

Upon a time, before the fairy broods
Drove nymph and satyr from the prosperous woods,²
Before King Oberon’s bright diadem,
Sceptre, and mantle, clasped with dewy gem,
Frighted away the dryads³ and the fauns 5

From rushes green, and brakes, and cowslipped lawns,⁴
 The ever-smitten Hermes⁵ empty left
 His golden throne, bent warm on amorous theft.
 From high Olympus had he stolen light
 On this side of Jove's clouds, to escape the sight 10
 Of his great summoner, and made retreat
 Into a forest on the shores of Crete,
 For somewhere in that sacred island⁶ dwelt
 A nymph to whom all hoofed satyrs knelt,
 At whose white feet the languid Tritons⁷ poured 15
 Pearls, while on land they withered and adored.
 Fast by the springs where she to bathe was wont,
 And in those meads where sometime she might haunt,
 Were strewn rich gifts, unknown to any muse,⁸
 Though fancy's casket were unlocked to choose. 20
 'Ah, what a world of love was at her feet!'
 So Hermes thought, and a celestial heat
 Burnt from his winged heels to either ear,
 That from a whiteness, as the lily clear,
 Blushed into roses mid his golden hair, 25
 Fallen in jealous curls about his shoulders bare.
 From vale to vale, from wood to wood, he flew,
 Breathing upon the flowers his passion new,
 And wound with many a river to its head
 To find where this sweet nymph prepared her secret bed – 30
 In vain; the sweet nymph might nowhere be found.
 And so he rested on the lonely ground,
 Pensive, and full of painful jealousies
 Of the wood-gods, and even the very trees.
 There as he stood, he heard a mournful voice, 35
 Such as once heard, in gentle heart, destroys
 All pain but pity. Thus the lone voice spake:
 'When from this wreathed tomb shall I awake?
 When move in a sweet body fit for life

And love and pleasure, and the ruddy strife 40
 Of hearts and lips? Ah, miserable me!’
 The god, dove-footed, glided silently
 Round bush and tree, soft-brushing, in his speed,
 The taller grasses and full-flowering weed,
 Until he found a palpitating snake, 45
 Bright, and cirque-couchant⁹ in a dusky brake.
 She was a gordian¹⁰ shape of dazzling hue,
 Vermilion-spotted, golden, green, and blue;
 Striped like a zebra, freckled like a pard,¹¹
 Eyed like a peacock, and all crimson barred; 50
 And full of silver moons that, as she breathed,
 Dissolved, or brighter shone, or interwreathed
 Their lustres with the gloomier tapestries –
 So rainbow-sided, touched with miseries,
 She seemed at once some penanced lady elf, 55
 Some demon’s mistress, or the demon’s self.
 Upon her crest she wore a wannish fire
 Sprinkled with stars, like Ariadne’s tiar;¹²
 Her head was serpent but – ah, bitter-sweet! –
 She had a woman’s mouth with all its pearls complete. 60
 And for her eyes: what could such eyes do there
 But weep and weep, that they were born so fair? –
 As Proserpine¹³ still weeps for her Sicilian air.
 Her throat was serpent, but the words she spake
 Came, as through bubbling honey, for love’s sake, 65
 And thus; while Hermes on his pinions lay,
 Like a stooped falcon ere he takes his prey.
 ‘Fair Hermes, crowned with feathers, fluttering light,
 I had a splendid dream of thee last night:
 I saw thee sitting on a throne of gold 70
 Among the gods upon Olympus old,
 The only sad one – for thou didst not hear
 The soft, lute-fingered Muses chaunting clear,

Nor even Apollo when he sang alone,
 Deaf to his throbbing throat's long, long melodious moan. 75
 I dreamt I saw thee, robed in purple flakes,¹⁴
 Break amorous through the clouds, as morning breaks,
 And, swiftly as a bright Phoebian dart,¹⁵
 Strike for the Cretan isle – and here thou art!
 Too gentle Hermes, hast thou found the maid?' 80
 Whereat the star of Lethe¹⁶ not delayed
 His rosy eloquence, and thus enquired:
 'Thou smooth-lipped serpent, surely high inspired!
 Thou beauteous wreath, with melancholy eyes,
 Possess whatever bliss thou canst devise, 85
 Telling me only where my nymph is fled –
 Where she doth breathe!' 'Bright planet, thou hast said',
 Returned the snake, 'but seal with oaths, fair God!'
 'I swear', said Hermes, 'by my serpent rod,
 And by thine eyes, and by thy starry crown!' 90
 Light flew his earnest words among the blossoms blown.
 Then thus again the brilliance feminine:
 'Too frail of heart! for this lost nymph of thine,
 Free as the air, invisibly she strays
 About these thornless wilds; her pleasant days 95
 She tastes unseen; unseen her nimble feet
 Leave traces in the grass and flowers sweet;
 From weary tendrils and bowed branches green
 She plucks the fruit unseen, she bathes unseen:
 And by my power is her beauty veiled 100
 To keep it unaffronted, unassailed
 By the love-glances of unlovely eyes,
 Of satyrs, fauns, and bleared Silenus'¹⁷ sighs.
 Pale grew her immortality, for woe
 Of all these lovers, and she grieved so 105
 I took compassion on her, bade her steep
 Her hair in weird syrups that would keep

Her loveliness invisible, yet free
 To wander as she loves, in liberty.
 Thou shalt behold her, Hermes, thou alone, 110
 If thou wilt, as thou swearest, grant my boon!’
 Then once again, the charmed god began
 An oath, and through the serpent’s ears it ran
 Warm, tremulous, devout, psalterian.¹⁸
 Ravished, she lifted her Circean¹⁹ head, 115
 Blushed a live damask, and swift-lisping said:
 ‘I was a woman, let me have once more
 A woman’s shape, and charming as before.
 I love a youth of Corinth – oh the bliss!
 Give me my woman’s form, and place me where he is. 120
 Stoop, Hermes, let me breathe upon thy brow,
 And thou shalt see thy sweet nymph even now.’
 The god on half-shut feathers sank serene,
 She breathed upon his eyes, and swift was seen
 Of both the guarded nymph near-smiling²⁰ on the green. 125
 It was no dream – or say a dream it was,
 Real are the dreams of gods, and smoothly pass
 Their pleasures in a long immortal dream.
 One warm, flushed moment, hovering, it might seem
 Dashed by the wood-nymph’s beauty, so he burned; 130
 Then, lighting on the printless verdure, turned
 To the swooned²¹ serpent, and with languid arm
 Delicate, put to proof the lithe caducean charm.²²
 So done, upon the nymph his eyes he bent
 Full of adoring tears and blandishment, 135
 And towards her stepped; she, like a moon in wane,
 Faded before him, cowered, nor could restrain
 Her fearful sobs, self-folding like a flower
 That faints into itself at evening hour.
 But the god fostering her chilled hand, 140
 She felt the warmth, her eyelids opened bland,

And, like new flowers at morning song of bees,
 Bloomed, and gave up her honey to the lees;²³
 Into the green-recessed woods they flew,
 Nor grew they pale, as mortal lovers do. 145
 Left to herself, the serpent now began
 To change; her elfin blood in madness ran,
 Her mouth foamed, and the grass, therewith besprent,²⁴
 Withered at dew so sweet and virulent.
 Her eyes in torture fixed, and anguish drear, 150
 Hot, glazed, and wide, with lid-lashes all sear,²⁵
 Flashed phosphor and sharp sparks, without one cooling tear.
 The colours all inflamed throughout her train,
 She writhed about, convulsed with scarlet pain;
 A deep volcanian yellow took the place 155
 Of all her milder-mooned body's grace,
 And, as the lava ravishes the mead,²⁶
 Spoilt all her silver mail, and golden brede,
 Made gloom of all her frecklings, streaks and bars,
 Eclipsed her crescents, and licked up her stars. 160
 So that in moments few she was undressed
 Of all her sapphires, greens, and amethyst,
 And rubious-argent;²⁷ of all these bereft,
 Nothing but pain and ugliness were left.
 Still shone her crown – that vanished, also she 165
 Melted and disappeared as suddenly,
 And in the air, her new voice luting soft,
 Cried, 'Lycius! Gentle Lycius!' Borne aloft
 With the bright mists about the mountains hoar
 These words dissolved – Crete's forests heard no more. 170
 Whither fled Lamia, now a lady bright,
 A full-born beauty new and exquisite?
 She fled into that valley they pass o'er
 Who go to Corinth from Cenchreas' shore,
 And rested at the foot of those wild hills, 175

The rugged founts of the Peraean rills,
And of that other ridge whose barren back
Stretches, with all its mist and cloudy rack,
South-westward to Cleone. There she stood
About a young bird's flutter from a wood, 180
Fair on a sloping green of mossy tread,
By a clear pool, wherein she passioned
To see herself escaped from so sore ills,
While her robes flaunted²⁸ with the daffodils.
 Ah, happy Lycius! For she was a maid 185
More beautiful than ever twisted braid,
Or sighed, or blushed, or on spring-flowered lea
Spread a green kirtle²⁹ to the minstrelsy –
A virgin purest lipped, yet in the lore
Of love deep learned to the red heart's core; 190
Not one hour old, yet of scintial³⁰ brain
To unperplex bliss from its neighbour pain;
Define their pettish limits, and estrange
Their points of contact, and swift counterchange;
Intrigue with the specious chaos, and dispart 195
Its most ambiguous atoms with sure art,
As though in Cupid's college she had spent
Sweet days a lovely graduate, still unshent,³¹
And kept his rosy terms in idle languishment.
 Why this fair creature chose so fairily 200
By the wayside to linger, we shall see;
But first 'tis fit to tell how she could muse
And dream, when in the serpent prison-house,
Of all she list, strange or magnificent;
How, ever, where she willed, her spirit went – 205
Whether to faint Elysium,³² or where
Down through tress-lifting waves the nereids³³ fair
Wind into Thetis'³⁴ bower by many a pearly stair,

Or where god Bacchus drains his cups divine,
 Stretched out at ease beneath a glutinous³⁰ pine, 210
 Or where in Pluto's³⁶ gardens palatine³⁷
 Mulciber's columns gleam in far piazzian line.³⁸
 And sometimes into cities she would send
 Her dream, with feast and rioting to blend;
 And once, while among mortals dreaming thus, 215
 She saw the young Corinthian Lycius
 Charioting foremost in the envious race
 Like a young Jove with calm uneager face
 And fell into a swooning love of him.
 Now on the moth-time³⁹ of that evening dim 220
 He would return that way, as well she knew,
 To Corinth from the shore – for freshly blew
 The eastern soft wind, and his galley now
 Grated the quaystones with her brazen prow
 In port Cenchreas, from Egina isle 225
 Fresh anchored, whither he had been awhile
 To sacrifice to Jove, whose temple there
 Waits with high marble doors for blood and incense rare.
 Jove heard his vows, and bettered his desire;
 For by some freakful chance he made retire 230
 From his companions, and set forth to walk,
 Perhaps grown wearied of their Corinth talk.
 Over the solitary hills he fared,
 Thoughtless at first, but ere eve's star appeared
 His fantasy was lost where reason fades, 235
 In the calmed twilight of Platonic shades.⁴⁰
 Lamia beheld him coming, near, more near –
 Close to her passing, in indifference drear,
 His silent sandals swept the mossy green;
 So neighbored to him, and yet so unseen 240
 She stood. He passed, shut up in mysteries,
 His mind wrapped like his mantle, while her eyes

Followed his steps, and her neck regal white
 Turned, syllabing thus: 'Ah, Lycius bright,
 And will you leave me on the hills alone? 245
 Lycius, look back, and be some pity shown!'

He did, not with cold wonder fearingly,
 But Orpheus-like at an Eurydice⁴¹ –
 For so delicious were the words she sung,
 It seemed he had loved them a whole summer long. 250
 And soon his eyes had drunk her beauty up,
 Leaving no drop in the bewildering cup,
 And still the cup was full – while he, afraid
 Lest she should vanish ere his lip had paid
 Due adoration, thus began to adore; 255

Her soft look growing coy, she saw his chain⁴² so sure.
 'Leave thee alone! Look back! Ah, goddess, see
 Whether my eyes can ever turn from thee!
 For pity do not this sad heart belie –
 Even as thou vanishest so I shall die. 260
 Stay, though a Naiad of the rivers, stay!
 To thy far wishes will thy streams obey;
 Stay, though the greenest woods be thy domain,
 Alone they can drink up the morning rain!

Though a descended Pleiad,⁴³ will not one 265
 Of thine harmonious sisters keep in tune
 Thy spheres,⁴⁴ and as thy silver proxy shine?
 So sweetly to these ravished ears of mine
 Came thy sweet greeting, that if thou shouldst fade
 Thy memory will waste me to a shade: 270
 For pity do not melt!'

 'If I should stay',
 Said Lamia, 'here, upon this floor of clay,
 And pain my steps upon these flowers too rough,
 What canst thou say or do of charm enough
 To dull the nice remembrance of my home? 275

Thou canst not ask me with thee here to roam
Over these hills and vales, where no joy is –
Empty of immortality and bliss!
Thou art a scholar, Lycius, and must know
That finer spirits cannot breathe below 280
In human climes, and live. Alas, poor youth,
What taste of purer air hast thou to soothe
My essence? What serener palaces,
Where I may all my many senses please,
And by mysterious sleights a hundred thirsts appease? 285
It cannot be. Adieu!’

 So said, she rose
Tiptoe with white arms spread. He, sick to lose
The amorous promise of her lone complain,⁴⁵
Swooned, murmuring of love, and pale with pain.
The cruel lady, without any show 290
Of sorrow for her tender favourite’s woe –
But rather, if her eyes could brighter be,
With brighter eyes and slow amenity,
Put her new lips to his, and gave afresh
The life she had so tangled in her mesh; 295
And as he from one trance was wakening
Into another, she began to sing,
Happy in beauty, life, and love, and everything,
A song of love, too sweet for earthly lyres,
While, like held breath, the stars drew in their panting fires. 300
And then she whispered in such trembling tone,
As those who, safe together met alone
For the first time through many anguished days,
Use other speech than looks – bidding him raise
His drooping head, and clear his soul of doubt, 305
For that she was a woman, and without
Any more subtle⁴⁶ fluid in her veins
Than throbbing blood, and that the self-same pains
Inhabited her frail-strung heart as his.

And next she wondered how his eyes could miss 310
 Her face so long in Corinth, where, she said,
 She dwelt but half retired, and there had led
 Days happy as the gold coin could invent
 Without the aid of love – yet in content
 Till she saw him, as once she passed him by, 315
 Where 'gainst a column he leant thoughtfully
 At Venus' temple porch, mid baskets heaped
 Of amorous herbs and flowers, newly reaped
 Late on that eve, as 'twas the night before
 The Adonian feast;⁴⁷ whereof she saw no more, 320
 But wept alone those days, for why should she adore?
 Lycius from death awoke into amaze
 To see her still, and singing so sweet lays;
 Then from amaze into delight he fell
 To hear her whisper woman's lore so well; 325
 And every word she spake enticed him on
 To unperplexed delight and pleasure known.
 Let the mad poets say whate'er they please
 Of the sweets of fairies, peris,⁴⁸ goddesses;
 There is not such a treat among them all, 330
 Haunters of cavern, lake, and waterfall,
 As a real woman, lineal indeed
 From Pyrrha's pebbles⁴⁹ or old Adam's seed.
 Thus gentle Lamia judged, and judged aright,
 That Lycius could not love in half a fright, 335
 So threw the goddess off, and won his heart
 More pleasantly by playing woman's part
 With no more awe than what her beauty gave,
 That, while it smote, still guaranteed to save.
 Lycius to all made eloquent reply, 340
 Marrying to every word a twinborn sigh;
 And last, pointing to Corinth, asked her sweet,
 If 'twas too far that night for her soft feet.
 The way was short, for Lamia's eagerness

Made, by a spell, the triple league decrease 345
 To a few paces – not at all surmised
 By blinded Lycius, so in her comprised.⁵⁰
 They passed the city gates, he knew not how,
 So noiseless, and he never thought to know.
 As men talk in a dream, so Corinth all, 350
 Throughout her palaces imperial,
 And all her populous streets and temples lewd⁵¹
 Muttered like tempest in the distance brewed
 To the wide-spreaded night above her towers.
 Men, women, rich and poor, in the cool hours, 355
 Shuffled their sandals o'er the pavement white,
 Companioned or alone, while many a light
 Flared here and there from wealthy festivals,
 And threw their moving shadows on the walls,
 Or found them clustered in the corniced shade 360
 Of some arched temple door or dusky colonnade.
 Muffling his face, of greeting friends in fear,
 Her fingers he pressed hard, as one came near
 With curled gray beard, sharp eyes, and smooth bald crown,
 Slow-stepped, and robed in philosophic gown. 365
 Lycius shrank closer as they met and passed
 Into his mantle, adding wings to haste,
 While hurried Lamia trembled. 'Ah', said he,
 'Why do you shudder, love, so ruefully?
 Why does your tender palm dissolve in dew?' 370
 'I'm wearied', said fair Lamia. 'Tell me who
 Is that old man? I cannot bring to mind
 His features. Lycius, wherefore did you blind
 Yourself from his quick eyes?' Lycius replied,
 "'Tis Apollonius⁵² sage, my trusty guide 375
 And good instructor. But tonight he seems
 The ghost of folly haunting my sweet dreams.'
 While yet he spake they had arrived before
 A pillared porch with lofty portal door,

Where hung a silver lamp, whose phosphor⁵³ glow 380
 Reflected in the slabbed steps below,
 Mild as a star in water – for so new
 And so unsullied was the marble hue,
 So through the crystal polish, liquid fine,
 Ran the dark veins, that none but feet divine 385
 Could e'er have touched there. Sounds Aeolian⁵⁴
 Breathed from the hinges, as the ample span
 Of the wide doors disclosed a place unknown
 Some time to any, but those two alone,
 And a few Persian mutes, who that same year 390
 Were seen about the markets; none knew where
 They could inhabit – the most curious
 Were foiled, who watched to trace them to their house.
 And but the flitter-winged verse must tell,
 For truth's sake, what woe afterwards befell; 395
 'Twould humour many a heart to leave them thus,
 Shut from the busy world of more incredulous.

Lamia

¹When the poem was published in 1820, Keats added a note providing the source for this poem: “Philostratus, in his fourth book de Vita Apollonii, hath a memorable instance in this kind, which I may not omit, of one Menippus Lycius, a young man twenty-five years of age, that going betwixt Cenchreas and Corinth, met such a phantasm in the habit of a fair gentlewoman, which taking him by the hand, carried him home to her house in the suburbs of Corinth, and told him she was a Phoenician by birth, and if he would tarry with her, he should hear her sing and play, and drink such wine as never any drank, and no man should molest him; but she, being fair and lovely, would live and die with him, that was fair and lovely to behold. The young man, a philosopher, otherwise staid and discreet, able to moderate his passions, though not this of love, tarried with her a while to his great content, and at last married her, to whose wedding, amongst other guests, came Apollonius; who, by some probable conjectures, found her out to be a serpent, a lamia; and that all her furniture was, like Tantalus' gold, described by Homer, no substance but mere illusions. When she saw herself descried, she wept, and desired Apollonius to be silent, but he would not be moved, and thereupon she, plate, house, and all that was in it, vanished in an instant: many thousands took notice of this fact, for it was done in the midst of Greece.” Burton’s Anatomy of Melancholy Part 3. Sect. 2. Memb. 1. Subs. 1.’ As Gittings has observed, Keats was reading extensively in Burton throughout the spring and summer of 1819; see Robert Gittings, John Keats: The Living Year (1954). As soon as he saw it, Keats knew that the lamia story would fascinate his readers: ‘I am certain there is that sort of fire in it which must take hold of people in some way – give them either pleasant or unpleasant sensation. What they want is a sensation of some sort’ (Rollins ii 189). For more comment see headnote, p. 1393.

2 prosperous woods the woods were more widespread than now.

3 dryads wood-nymphs.

4 before the fairy broods...lawns i.e. before medieval fairy-lore had superseded classical myth.

5 The ever-smitten Hermes or Mercury, messenger of the gods, celebrated for his numerous love affairs.

6 sacred island Crete was sacred as the birthplace of Zeus.

7 Tritons sea-gods – half-man, half-fish.

8 unknown to any muse beyond the imagination of any poet.

9 cirque-couchant lying in circular coils.

10 gordian intricately knotted.

11 pard leopard.

12 Ariadne's tiar Ariadne was loved by Bacchus, god of wine. He gave her a crown of seven stars which, after her death, was made into a constellation. Keats probably has in mind Titian's painting, Bacchus and Ariadne, now in the National Gallery, London.

13 Proserpine, gathering flowers in the Vale of Enna in Sicily, was carried off by Pluto, king of the underworld, to be his queen.

14 purple flakes fleecy clouds, coloured by the sun.

15 Phoeban dart a ray of the sun, Phoebus being god of the sun.

16 the star of Lethe Hermes, so-called because he led the souls of the dead to Hades over Lethe, the river of forgetfulness.

17 Silenus, a demi-god of the woods, was foster-father of Bacchus.

18 psalterian like the sound of a psaltery, an antique stringed instrument.

19 Circean Circe was the enchantress who was capable of turning men into animals.

20 near-smiling smiling nearby.

21 swooned with love.

22 lithe caducean charm an olive staff wound about with two intertwined ('lithe') snakes at one end.

23 gave up her honey to the lees surrendered totally.

24 besprent sprinkled – an archaism even in Keats's day.

25 sear scorched.

26 lava ravishes the mead lava buries and burns the grass.

27 rubious-argent silver embedded with rubies.

28 flaunted waved vigorously.

29 kirtle woman's gown.

30 sciential wise.

31 unshent unspoilt.

32 Elysium paradisaal place of rest where Greek heroes were believed to spend an afterlife revelling and sporting in the sunshine.

33 nerheids water-nymphs.

34 Thetis sea-deity, the daughter of Nereus and Doris.

35 glutinous resinous.

36 Pluto was king of the underworld.

37 palatine palatial.

38 in far piazzian line the construction resembles a piazza – a square or colonnaded walkway surrounded by buildings. Keats is recalling the construction of Pandemonium by Mulciber (Vulcan) in Paradise Lost i 713–15.

39 moth-time early evening.

40 In the calm...shades Lycius begins his walk unthinkingly, but starts to meditate on Plato's mystic philosophy.

41 Orpheus nearly managed to reclaim his wife, Eurydice, from Hades, but lost her forever when he looked back at her out of curiosity.

42 chain the metaphorical 'chain' of love.

43 The Pleiades were the seven daughters of Atlas, who became a constellation after death.

44 Thy spheres reference to the music which the heavenly bodies were believed to make as they circled the earth.

45 complain complaint.

46 subtle rarefied.

47 The Adonian feast a fertility ritual held annually in Venus' temple. Adonis was the beautiful young man in love with Venus, killed by a boar while hunting.

48 peris superhuman beings or good genii from Persian myth.

49 Exasperated by the crimes of humanity, Jupiter is said to have sent a flood that covered the world. The only ones to be saved, Deucalion and Pyrrha, repopulated the world by throwing stones behind them which turned into men and women.

50 comprised absorbed.

51 lewd Keats is thinking of Robert Burton's description of Corinth: 'It was plenty of all things, which made Corinth so infamous of old, and the opportunity of the place to entertain those foreign comers, every day strangers came in, at each gate, from all quarters. In that one temple of Venus a thousand whores did prostitute themselves ... all nations resorted thither as to a school of Venus' (Anatomy of Melancholy III 2 ii 1).

52 Apollonius of Tyana, philosopher of the first century CE, whose life was recorded by Philostratus. He advocated strict moral and religious reform, and was credited with magic powers.

53 phosphor phosphorescent.

54 Sounds Aeolian i.e. like the sounds of an Aeolian harp.

Part II

Love in a hut,¹ with water and a crust,
Is (Love forgive us!) cinders, ashes, dust;
Love in a palace is perhaps at last
More grievous torment than a hermit's fast:
That is a doubtful tale from fairyland, 5
Hard for the non-elect to understand.
Had Lycius lived to hand his story down
He might have given the moral a fresh frown
Or clenched it quite² – but too short was their bliss
To breed distrust and hate, that make the soft voice hiss. 10
Besides, there, nightly, with terrific glare,
Love, jealous³ grown of so complete a pair,
Hovered and buzzed his wings with fearful roar
Above the lintel of their chamber door,
And down the passage cast a glow upon the floor.⁴ 15
 For all⁵ this came a ruin: side by side
They were enthroned in the eventide,
Upon a couch, near to a curtaining
Whose airy texture, from a golden string,
Floated into the room, and let appear 20
Unveiled the summer heaven, blue and clear,
Betwixt two marble shafts.⁶ There they reposed
Where use had made it sweet, with eyelids closed,

Saving a tithe⁷ which love still open kept,
That they might see each other while they almost slept – 25
When, from the slope side of a suburb hill,
Deafening the swallow's twitter, came a thrill
Of trumpets. Lycius started – the sounds fled,
But left a thought, a buzzing in his head.
For the first time, since first he harboured in 30
That purple-lined palace of sweet sin,
His spirit passed beyond its golden bourn⁸
Into the noisy world almost forsworn.
The lady, ever watchful, penetrant,⁹
Saw this with pain, so arguing a want 35
Of something more, more than her empery¹⁰
Of joys; and she began to moan and sigh
Because he mused beyond her, knowing well
That but a moment's thought is passion's passing-bell.
'Why do you sigh, fair creature?' whispered he. 40
'Why do you think?' returned she tenderly;
'You have deserted me; where am I now?
Not in your heart while care weighs on your brow.
No, no, you have dismissed me, and I go
From your breast houseless – aye, it must be so.' 45
He answered, bending to her open eyes,
Where he was mirrored small in paradise:
'My silver planet,¹¹ both of eve and morn!
Why will you plead yourself so sad forlorn
While I am striving how to fill my heart 50
With deeper crimson and a double smart?
How to entangle, trammel up¹² and snare
Your soul in mine, and labyrinth you there
Like the hid scent in an unbudded rose?
Aye, a sweet kiss – you see your mighty woes. 55
My thoughts! Shall I unveil them? Listen then!
What mortal hath a prize, that other men

May be confounded and abashed withal,
But lets it sometimes pace abroad majestic
And triumph, as in thee I should rejoice 60
Amid the hoarse alarm of Corinth's voice?
Let my foes choke, and my friends shout afar,
While through the thronged streets your bridal car
Wheels round its dazzling spokes!'

The lady's cheek

Trembled; she nothing said but, pale and meek, 65
Arose and knelt before him, wept a rain
Of sorrows at his words; at last with pain
Beseeching him, the while his hand she wrung
To change his purpose. He thereat was stung,
Perverse, with stronger fancy to reclaim 70
Her wild and timid nature to his aim –
Besides, for all his love, in self-despite,
Against his better self, he took delight
Luxurious in her sorrows, soft and new.
His passion, cruel grown, took on a hue 75
Fierce and sanguineous¹³ as 'twas possible
In one whose brow had no dark veins to swell.

Fine was the mitigated¹⁴ fury, like
Apollo's presence when in act to strike
The serpent¹⁵ – ha, the serpent! Certes¹⁶ she 80
Was none. She burnt, she loved the tyranny,
And, all subdued, consented to the hour
When to the bridal he should lead his paramour.

Whispering in midnight silence, said the youth:
'Sure some sweet name thou hast, though, by my truth, 85
I have not asked it, ever thinking thee
Not mortal, but of heavenly progeny,
As still I do. Hast any mortal name,
Fit appellation for this dazzling frame?
Or friends or kinsfolk on the citted earth, 90
To share our marriage feast and nuptial mirth?'

‘I have no friends’, said Lamia, ‘no, not one;
 My presence in wide Corinth hardly known.
 My parents’ bones are in their dusty urns
 Sepulchred, where no kindled incense burns, 95
 Seeing all their luckless race are dead, save me –
 And I neglect the holy rite for thee.
 Even as you list invite your many guests;
 But if, as now it seems, your vision rests
 With any pleasure on me, do not bid 100
 Old Apollonius – from him keep me hid.’
 Lycius, perplexed at words so blind and blank,
 Made close enquiry, from whose touch she shrank,
 Feigning a sleep – and he to the dull shade
 Of deep sleep in a moment was betrayed.¹⁷ 105
 It was the custom then to bring away
 The bride from home at blushing shut of day
 Veiled in a chariot, heralded along
 By strewn flowers, torches, and a marriage song,
 With other pageants – but this fair unknown 110
 Had not a friend. So being left alone
 (Lycius was gone to summon all his kin)
 And knowing surely she could never win
 His foolish heart from its mad pompousness,¹⁸
 She set herself, high-thoughted, how to dress 115
 The misery in fit magnificence.
 She did so, but ’tis doubtful how and whence
 Came, and who were her subtle¹⁹ servitors.
 About the halls, and to and from the doors
 There was a noise of wings, till in short space 120
 The glowing banquet-room shone with wide-arched grace.
 A haunting music, sole perhaps and lone
 Supportress of the fairy-roof, made moan
 Throughout, as fearful the whole charm might fade.
 Fresh carved cedar, mimicking a glade 125

Of palm and plantain,²⁰ met from either side
 High in the midst, in honour of the bride –
 Two palms and then two plantains, and so on,
 From either side their stems branched one to one
 All down the aisled place; and beneath all 130
 There ran a stream of lamps straight on from wall to wall.
 So canopied, lay an untasted feast
 Teeming with odours. Lamia, regal dressed,
 Silently paced about, and as she went,
 In pale contented sort of discontent, 135
 Missioned her viewless²¹ servants to enrich
 The fretted²² splendour of each nook and niche.
 Between the tree-stems, marbled plain at first,
 Came jasper panels; then anon there burst
 Forth creeping imagery of slighter trees, 140
 And with the larger wove in small intricacies.
 Approving all, she faded²³ at self-will,
 And shut the chamber up, close, hushed and still,
 Complete and ready for the revels rude,
 When dreadful guests would come to spoil her solitude. 145
 The day appeared, and all the gossip rout.
 Oh senseless Lycius! Madman! Wherefore flout
 The silent-blessing fate, warm cloistered hours,
 And show to common eyes these secret bowers?
 The herd approached – each guest, with busy brain, 150
 Arriving at the portal, gazed amain,
 And entered marvelling, for they knew the street,
 Remembered it from childhood all complete
 Without a gap, yet ne'er before had seen
 That royal porch, that high-built fair demesne.²⁴ 155
 So in they hurried all, mazed, curious and keen,
 Save one who looked thereon with eye severe,
 And with calm-planted steps walked in austere;
 'Twas Apollonius; something too he laughed,

As though some knotty problem, that had daffed²⁵ 160
His patient thought, had now begun to thaw
And solve and melt – 'twas just as he foresaw.

He met within the murmurous vestibule
His young disciple. 'Tis no common rule,
Lycius', said he, 'for uninvited guest 165
To force himself upon you, and infest
With an unbidden presence the bright throng
Of younger friends – yet must I do this wrong,
And you forgive me.' Lycius blushed, and led
The old man through the inner doors broad-spread; 170
With reconciling words and courteous mien
Turning into sweet milk the sophist's²⁶ spleen.

Of wealthy lustre was the banquet-room,
Filled with pervading brilliance and perfume;
Before each lucid²⁷ panel fuming stood 175
A censer fed with myrrh and spiced wood,
Each by a sacred tripod held aloft
Whose slender feet wide-swerved upon the soft
Wool-woofed carpets; fifty wreaths of smoke
From fifty censers their light voyage took 180
To the high roof, still mimicked as they rose
Along the mirrored walls by twin-clouds odorous.
Twelve sphered tables, by silk seats ensphered,
High as the level of a man's breast reared
On libbard's²⁸ paws, upheld the heavy gold 185
Of cups and goblets, and the store thrice told
Of Ceres' horn,²⁹ and, in huge vessels, wine
Come from the gloomy tun³⁰ with merry shine.
Thus loaded with a feast the tables stood,
Each shrining in the midst the image of a god. 190

When in an ante-chamber every guest
Had felt the cold full sponge to pleasure pressed
By minist'ring slaves upon his hands and feet,

And fragrant oils with ceremony meet
Poured on his hair, they all moved to the feast 195
In white robes, and themselves in order placed
Around the silken couches, wondering
Whence all this mighty cost and blaze of wealth could spring.

Soft went the music the soft air along,
While fluent Greek a vowel'd undersong 200
Kept up among the guests, discoursing low
At first, for scarcely was the wine at flow;
But when the happy vintage touched their brains,
Louder they talk, and louder come the strains
Of powerful instruments. The gorgeous dyes, 205
The space, the splendour of the draperies,
The roof of awful richness, nectarous cheer,
Beautiful slaves and Lamia's self appear,
Now, when the wine has done its rosy deed,
And every soul from human trammels freed, 210
No more so strange – for merry wine, sweet wine,
Will make Elysian shades not too fair, too divine.³¹

Soon was god Bacchus at meridian height;
Flushed were their cheeks, and bright eyes double bright.
Garlands of every green, and every scent 215
From vales deflowered, or forest-trees branch-rent,
In baskets of bright osiered³² gold were brought
High as the handles heaped, to suit the thought
Of every guest – that each, as he did please,
Might fancy-fit his brows, silk-pillowed at his ease. 220

What wreath for Lamia? What for Lycius?
What for the sage, old Apollonius?
Upon her aching forehead be there hung
The leaves of willow and of adder's tongue;³³
And for the youth – quick, let us strip for him 225
The thyrsus,³⁴ that his watching eyes may swim
Into forgetfulness; and, for the sage,

Let spear-grass and the spiteful thistle wage
War on his temples. Do not all charms fly
At the mere touch of cold philosophy? 230

There was an awful³⁵ rainbow once in heaven:
We know her woof, her texture – she is given
In the dull catalogue of common things.
Philosophy will clip an angel's wings,
Conquer all mysteries by rule and line, 235
Empty the haunted air, and gnomed mine,
Unweave a rainbow, as it erewhile made
The tender-personed Lamia melt into a shade.

By her glad Lycius sitting in chief place
Scarce saw in all the room another face 240
Till, checking his love trance, a cup he took Full brimmed, and opposite sent forth a look
'Cross the broad table, to beseech a glance
From his old teacher's wrinkled countenance,
And pledge him. The bald-head philosopher 245
Had fixed his eye without a twinkle or stir
Full on the alarmed beauty of the bride,
Brow-beating her fair form, and troubling her sweet pride.
Lycius then pressed her hand, with devout touch,
As pale it lay upon the rosy couch: 250

'Twas icy, and the cold ran through his veins –
Then sudden it grew hot, and all the pains
Of an unnatural heat shot to his heart.
'Lamia, what means this? Wherefore dost thou start?
Know'st thou that man?' Poor Lamia answered not. 255

He gazed into her eyes, and not a jot
Owned they the lovelorn piteous appeal;
More, more he gazed; his human senses reel;
Some hungry spell that loveliness absorbs –
There was no recognition in those orbs. 260

'Lamia!' he cried – and no soft-toned reply.
The many heard, and the loud revelry

Grew hush; the stately music no more breathes;
The myrtle sickened in a thousand wreaths.
By faint degrees, voice, lute, and pleasure ceased; 265
A deadly silence step by step increased
Until it seemed a horrid presence there,
And not a man but felt the terror in his hair.
‘Lamia!’ he shrieked – and nothing but the shriek
With its sad echo did the silence break. 270
‘Begone, foul dream!’ he cried, gazing again
In the bride’s face, where now no azure vein
Wandered on fair-spaced temples; no soft bloom
Misted the cheek; no passion to illumine
The deep-recessed vision – all was blight. 275
Lamia, no longer fair, there sat a deadly white.

‘Shut, shut those juggling³⁶ eyes, thou ruthless man!
Turn them aside, wretch, or the righteous ban
Of all the gods, whose dreadful images
Here represent their shadowy presences, 280
May pierce them on the sudden with the thorn
Of painful blindness – leaving thee forlorn,
In trembling dotage to the feeblest fright
Of conscience, for their long offended might,
For all thine impious proud-heart sophistries, 285
Unlawful magic, and enticing lies.
Corinthians, look upon that gray-beard wretch!
Mark how, possessed, his lashless eyelids stretch
Around his demon eyes! Corinthians, see!
My sweet bride withers at their potency.’ 290

‘Fool!’ said the sophist, in an undertone
Gruff with contempt; which a death-nighing moan
From Lycius answered, as heart-struck and lost,
He sank supine beside the aching ghost.
‘Fool! Fool!’ repeated he, while his eyes still 295
Relented not, nor moved. ‘From every ill
Of life have I preserved thee to this day,

And shall I see thee made a serpent's prey?
Then Lamia breathed death breath; the sophist's eye,
Like a sharp spear, went through her utterly, 300
Keen, cruel, perçant,³⁷ stinging; she, as well
As her weak hand could any meaning tell,
Motioned him to be silent – vainly so,
He looked and looked again a level 'No!'
'A serpent!' echoed he – no sooner said, 305
Than with a frightful scream she vanished,
And Lycius' arms were empty of delight,
As were his limbs of life from that same night.³⁸
On the high couch he lay – his friends came round,
Supported him; no pulse or breath they found, 310
And, in its marriage robe, the heavy body wound.

To Autumn (composed c.19 September 1819)¹

From Lamia, Isabella, The Eve of St Agnes, and Other Poems (1820)

Season of mists and mellow fruitfulness,
Close bosom-friend of the maturing sun,
Conspiring with him how to load and bless
With fruit the vines that round the thatch-eaves run;
To bend with apples the mossed cottage-trees, 5
And fill all fruit with ripeness to the core;
To swell the gourd,² and plump the hazel shells
With a sweet kernel; to set budding more,
And still more, later flowers for the bees,
Until they think warm days will never cease, 10
For summer has o'er-brimmed their clammy cells.

Who hath not seen thee oft amid thy store?
Sometimes whoever seeks abroad may find
Thee sitting careless³ on a granary floor,
Thy hair soft-lifted by the winnowing wind; 15
Or on a half-reaped furrow sound asleep,
Drowsed with the fume of poppies,⁴ while thy hook⁵
Spares the next swath⁶ and all its twined flowers;
And sometimes like a gleaner⁷ thou dost keep
Steady thy laden head across a brook; 20
Or by a cider-press, with patient look,
Thou watchest the last ooziings hours by hours.

Where are the songs of spring? Aye, where are they?
Think not of them, thou hast thy music too –
While barred clouds bloom the soft-dying day, 25
And touch the stubble-plains with rosy hue;
Then in a wailful choir the small gnats mourn
Among the river shallows,⁸ borne aloft

Or sinking as the light wind lives or dies;
And full-grown lambs loud bleat from hilly bourn, 30
Hedge-crickets sing, and now with treble soft
The redbreast whistles from a garden-croft,
And gathering swallows twitter in the skies.

² gourd melon.

³ careless without care.

⁴ Drowsed...poppies poppies are associated with sleep.

⁵ hook blade for reaping corn.

⁶ swath width of corn cut by a scythe.

⁷ gleaner one who gathers stray ears of corn missed by the reapers.

⁸ sallows willows.

The Fall of Hyperion: A Dream (composed between late July and 21 September 1819; edited from MS)¹

Canto I

Fanatics² have their dreams, wherewith they weave
A paradise for a sect; the savage too
From forth the loftiest fashion of his sleep³

Guesses at heaven; pity these have not
 Traced upon vellum or wild Indian leaf 5
 The shadows of melodious utterance.
 But bare of laurel they live, dream and die;
 For Poesy alone can tell her dreams,
 With the fine spell of words alone can save
 Imagination from the sable charm 10
 And dumb enchantment. Who alive can say
 'Thou art no poet; may'st not tell thy dreams'?
 Since every man whose soul is not a clod
 Hath visions, and would speak, if he had loved
 And been well nurtured in his mother tongue. 15
 Whether the dream now purposed to rehearse
 Be poet's or fanatic's will be known
 When this warm scribe my hand is in the grave.
 Methought I stood where trees of every clime,
 Palm, myrtle, oak, and sycamore, and beech, 20
 With plantain,⁴ and spice-blossoms, made a screen;
 In neighbourhood of fountains, by the noise
 Soft-showering in mine ears, and, by the touch
 Of scent, not far from roses. Turning round,
 I saw an arbour with a drooping roof 25
 Of trellis vines, and bells, and larger blooms,
 Like floral censers swinging light in air;
 Before its wreathed doorway, on a mound
 Of moss, was spread a feast of summer fruits,
 Which nearer seen, seemed refuse of a meal 30
 By angel tasted, or our mother Eve;
 For empty shells were scattered on the grass,
 And grape-stalks but half bare, and remnants more,
 Sweet smelling, whose pure kinds I could not know.
 Still was more plenty than the fabled horn⁵ 35
 Thrice emptied could pour forth, at banqueting
 For Proserpine⁶ returned to her own fields,
 Where the white heifers low. And appetite

More yearning than on earth I ever felt
Growing within, I ate deliciously; 40
And, after not long, thirsted, for thereby
Stood a cool vessel of transparent juice
Sipped by the wandered bee, the which I took,
And, pledging all the mortals of the world,
And all the dead whose names are in our lips, 45
Drank. That full draught is parent of my theme.
No Asian poppy nor elixir fine
Of the soon-fading jealous Caliphat,⁷
No poison gendered in close monkish cell
To thin the scarlet conclave of old men,⁸ 50
Could so have rapt⁹ unwilling life away.
Among the fragrant husks and berries crushed,
Upon the grass I struggled hard against
The domineering potion, but in vain –
The cloudy swoon came on, and down I sunk 55
Like a Silenus¹⁰ on an antique vase.
How long I slumbered 'tis a chance to guess.
When sense of life returned, I started up
As if with wings; but the fair trees were gone,
The mossy mound and arbour were no more. 60
I looked around upon the carved sides
Of an old sanctuary with roof august,
Builded so high, it seemed that filmed clouds
Might spread beneath, as o'er the stars of heaven.
So old the place was, I remembered none 65
The like upon the earth – what I had seen
Of grey cathedrals, buttressed walls, rent towers,
The superannuations¹¹ of sunk realms,
Or nature's rocks toiled hard in waves and winds,
Seemed but the faulture¹² of decrepit things 70
To that eternal domed monument.
Upon the marble at my feet there lay

Store of strange vessels, and large draperies
 Which needs had been of dyed asbestos wove,
 Or in that place the moth could not corrupt,¹³ 75
 So white the linen; so, in some, distinct
 Ran imageries¹⁴ from a sombre loom.
 All in a mingled heap confused there lay
 Robes, golden tongs, censer and chafing-dish,¹⁵
 Girdles, and chains, and holy jewelleries. 80
 Turning from these with awe, once more I raised
 My eyes to fathom the space every way;
 The embossed roof, the silent massy range
 Of columns north and south, ending in mist
 Of nothing; then to eastward, where black gates 85
 Were shut against the sunrise evermore.
 Then to the west I looked, and saw far off
 An image,¹⁶ huge of feature as a cloud,
 At level of whose feet an altar slept,
 To be approached on either side by steps, 90
 And marble balustrade, and patient travail
 To count with toil the innumerable degrees.
 Towards the altar sober-paced I went,
 Repressing haste as too unholy there;
 And, coming nearer, saw beside the shrine 95
 One minist'ring;¹⁷ and there arose a flame.
 When in mid-May the sickening east wind
 Shifts sudden to the south, the small warm rain
 Melts out the frozen incense from all flowers,
 And fills the air with so much pleasant health 100
 That even the dying man forgets his shroud;
 Even so that lofty sacrificial fire,
 Sending forth Maian incense,¹⁸ spread around
 Forgetfulness of everything but bliss,
 And clouded all the altar with soft smoke, 105
 From whose white fragrant curtains thus I heard

Language pronounced: 'If thou canst not ascend
 These steps, die on that marble where thou art.
 Thy flesh, near cousin to the common dust,
 Will parch for lack of nutriment; thy bones 110
 Will wither in few years, and vanish so
 That not the quickest eye could find a grain
 Of what thou now art on that pavement cold.
 The sands of thy short life are spent this hour,
 And no hand in the universe can turn 115
 Thy hourglass, if these gummed leaves¹⁹ be burnt
 Ere thou canst mount up these immortal steps.'
 I heard, I looked – two senses both at once,
 So fine, so subtle, felt the tyranny
 Of that fierce threat and the hard task proposed. 120
 Prodigious seemed the toil; the leaves were yet
 Burning, when suddenly a palsied chill
 Struck from the paved level up my limbs,
 And was ascending quick to put cold grasp
 Upon those streams that pulse beside the throat.²⁰ 125
 I shrieked, and the sharp anguish of my shriek
 Stung my own ears – I strove hard to escape
 The numbness, strove to gain the lowest step.
 Slow, heavy, deadly was my pace; the cold
 Grew stifling, suffocating, at the heart; 130
 And when I clasped my hands I felt them not.
 One minute before death, my iced foot touched
 The lowest stair; and as it touched, life seemed
 To pour in at the toes. I mounted up,
 As once fair angels on a ladder flew 135
 From the green turf to heaven. 'Holy Power',
 Cried I, approaching near the hornèd shrine,²¹
 'What am I that should so be saved from death?
 What am I, that another death come not
 To choke my utterance sacrilegious here?' 140

Then said the veiled shadow:²² ‘Thou hast felt
 What ’tis to die and live again before
 Thy fated hour. That thou hadst power to do so
 Is thy own safety; thou hast dated on
 Thy doom.’²³ ‘High Prophetess’, said I, ‘purge off 145
 Benign, if so it please thee, my mind’s film.’²⁴
 ‘None can usurp this height’, returned that shade,
 ‘But those to whom the miseries of the world
 Are misery, and will not let them rest.
 All else who find a haven in the world, 150
 Where they may thoughtless sleep away their days,
 If by a chance into this fane²⁵ they come,
 Rot on the pavement where thou rotted’st half.’
 ‘Are there not thousands in the world’, said I,
 Encouraged by the sooth²⁶ voice of the shade, 155
 ‘Who love their fellows even to the death;
 Who feel the giant agony of the world;
 And more, like slaves to poor humanity,
 Labour for mortal good? I sure should see
 Other men here – but I am here alone.’ 160
 ‘They whom thou spak’st of are no vision’ries,’
 Rejoined that voice, ‘They are no dreamers weak,
 They seek no wonder but the human face,²⁷
 No music but a happy-noted voice,
 They come not here, they have no thought to come – 165
 And thou art here, for thou art less than they.
 What benefit canst thou do, or all thy tribe,
 To the great world? Thou art a dreaming thing,
 A fever of thyself.²⁸ Think of the earth;
 What bliss even in hope is there for thee? 170
 What haven? Every creature hath its home;
 Every sole²⁹ man hath days of joy and pain,
 Whether his labours be sublime or low –

The pain alone; the joy alone; distinct.
 Only the dreamer venoms all his days,³⁰ 175
 Bearing more woe than all his sins deserve.
 Therefore, that happiness be somewhat shared,
 Such things as thou art are admitted oft
 Into like gardens thou didst pass erewhile,
 And suffered in³¹ these temples; for that cause 180
 Thou standest safe beneath this statue's knees.'
 'That I am favoured for unworthiness,
 By such propitious parley medicined
 In sickness not ignoble, I rejoice –
 Aye, and could weep for love of such award.' 185
 So answered I, continuing, 'If it please,
 Majestic shadow, tell me – sure not all
 Those melodies sung into the world's ear
 Are useless? Sure a poet is a sage,
 A humanist,³² physician to all men. 190
 That I am none I feel, as vultures feel
 They are no birds when eagles are abroad.
 What am I then? Thou spakest of my tribe –
 What tribe?' The tall shade veiled in drooping white
 Then spake, so much more earnest, that the breath 195
 Moved the thin linen folds that drooping hung
 About a golden censer from the hand
 Pendent: 'Art thou not of the dreamer tribe?
 The poet and the dreamer are distinct,
 Diverse, sheer opposite, antipodes. 200
 The one pours out a balm upon the world,
 The other vexes it.' Then shouted I
 Spite of myself, and with a Pythia's spleen:³³
 'Apollo!³⁴ Faded, far-flown Apollo!
 Where is thy misty pestilence³⁵ to creep 205
 Into the dwellings, through the door crannies,
 Of all mock lyrists, large self-worshippers,

And careless hectorers in proud bad verse?³⁶
Though I breathe death with them it will be life
To see them sprawl before me into graves. 210

Majestic shadow, tell me where I am;
Whose altar this; for whom this incense curls;
What image this, whose face I cannot see,
For the broad marble knees; and who thou art,
Of accent feminine, so courteous.' 215

Then the tall shade, in drooping linens veiled,
Spake out, so much more earnest, that her breath
Stirred the thin folds of gauze that drooping hung
About a golden censer from her hand
Pendent – and by her voice I knew she shed 220
Long-treasured tears: 'This temple sad and lone

Is all spared³⁷ from the thunder of a war³⁸
Foughten long since by giant hierarchy
Against rebellion. This old image here,
Whose carved features wrinkled as he fell, 225

Is Saturn's; I, Moneta,³⁹ left supreme,
Sole priestess of his desolation.'

I had no words to answer, for my tongue,
Useless, could find about its roofed home
No syllable of a fit majesty 230

To make rejoinder to Moneta's mourn.
There was a silence while the altar's blaze
Was fainting for sweet food. I looked thereon,
And on the paved floor, where nigh were piled
Faggots of cinnamon, and many heaps 235

Of other crisped spice-wood – then again
I looked upon the altar, and its horns
Whitened with ashes, and its lang'rous flame,
And then upon the offerings again;
And so by turns, till sad Moneta cried, 240

'The sacrifice is done, but not the less
Will I be kind to thee for thy goodwill.

My power, which to me is still a curse,
 Shall be to thee a wonder; for the scenes
 Still swooning vivid through my globed brain⁴⁰ 245
 With an electral⁴¹ changing misery,
 Thou shalt with those dull mortal eyes behold,
 Free from all pain, if wonder pain thee not.’
 As near as an immortal’s sphered words
 Could to a mother’s soften, were these last. 250
 But yet I had a terror of her robes,
 And chiefly of the veils, that from her brow
 Hung pale, and curtained her in mysteries,
 That made my heart too small to hold its blood.
 This saw that goddess, and with sacred hand 255
 Parted the veils. Then saw I a wan face,
 Not pined⁴² by human sorrows, but bright-blanch’d
 By an immortal sickness which kills not;
 It works a constant change, which happy death
 Can put no end to; deathwards progressing 260
 To no death was that visage; it had passed
 The lily and the snow; and beyond these
 I must not think now, though I saw that face –
 But for her eyes I should have fled away.
 They held me back with a benignant light, 265
 Soft-mitigated by divinest lids
 Half-closed, and visionless⁴³ entire they seem’d
 Of all external things – they saw me not,
 But in blank splendour beamed like the mild moon,
 Who comforts those she sees not, who knows not 270
 What eyes are upward cast. As I had found
 A grain of gold upon a mountain’s side,
 And twinged with avarice strained out my eyes
 To search its sullen⁴⁴ entrails rich with ore,
 So at the view of sad Moneta’s brow 275
 I ached to see what things the hollow brain

Behind enwombed, what high tragedy
 In the dark secret chambers of her skull
 Was acting, that could give so dread a stress
 To her cold lips, and fill with such a light 280
 Her planetary eyes, and touch her voice
 With such a sorrow. ‘Shade of Memory!’⁴⁵
 Cried I, with act adorant at her feet,
 ‘By all the gloom hung round thy fallen house,
 By this last temple, by the golden age,⁴⁶ 285
 By great Apollo, thy dear foster child,⁴⁷
 And by thyself, forlorn divinity,
 The pale omega⁴⁸ of a withered race,
 Let me behold, according as thou said’st,
 What in thy brain so ferments to and fro.’ 290
 No sooner had this conjuration passed
 My devout lips, than side by side we stood,
 Like a stunt bramble by a solemn pine,
 Deep in the shady sadness of a vale,
 Far sunken from the healthy breath of morn, 295
 Far from the fiery noon and eve’s one star.
 Onward I looked beneath the gloomy boughs,
 And saw what first I thought an image huge,
 Like to the image pedestalled so high
 In Saturn’s temple. Then Moneta’s voice 300
 Came brief upon mine ear: ‘So Saturn sat
 When he had lost his realms.’ Whereon there grew
 A power within me of enormous ken⁴⁹
 To see as a god sees, and take the depth
 Of things as nimbly as the outward eye 305
 Can size and shape pervade. The lofty theme
 At those few words hung vast before my mind,
 With half-unravell’d web. I set myself
 Upon an eagle’s watch, that I might see,
 And seeing ne’er forget. No stir of life 310

Was in this shrouded vale, not so much air
 As in the zoning⁵⁰ of a summer's day
 Robs not one light seed from the feathered grass,
 But where the dead leaf fell there did it rest.
 A stream went voiceless by, still deadened more 315
 By reason of the fallen divinity
 Spreading more shade; the naiad⁵¹ mid her reeds
 Pressed her cold finger closer to her lips.
 Along the margin sand large footmarks went
 No farther than to where old Saturn's feet 320
 Had rested, and there slept – how long a sleep!
 Degraded, cold, upon the sodden ground
 His old right hand lay nerveless,⁵² listless, dead,
 Unsceptred; and his realmless eyes were closed,
 While his bowed head seemed listening to the earth, 325
 His ancient mother,⁵³ for some comfort yet.
 It seemed no force could wake him from his place;
 But there came one who, with a kindred hand
 Touched his wide shoulders, after bending low
 With reverence, though to one who knew it not. 330
 Then came the grieved voice of Mnemosyne,
 And grieved I hearkened: 'That divinity
 Whom thou saw'st step from yon forlornest wood,
 And with slow pace approach our fallen King,
 Is Thea,⁵⁴ softest-natured of our brood.' 335
 I marked the goddess in fair statuary⁵⁵
 Surpassing wan Moneta by the head,
 And in her sorrow nearer woman's tears.
 There was a listening fear in her regard,
 As if calamity had but begun; 340
 As if the vanward clouds of evil days
 Had spent their malice, and the sullen rear
 Was with its stored thunder labouring up.⁵⁶

One hand she pressed upon that aching spot
Where beats the human heart, as if just there, 345

Though an immortal, she felt cruel pain;
The other upon Saturn's bended neck
She laid, and to the level of his hollow ear,
Leaning with parted lips, some words she spake
In solemn tenor and deep organ tune – 350
Some mourning words, which in our feeble tongue
Would come in this-like accenting (how frail
To that large utterance of the early gods!):

'Saturn, look up! And for what, poor lost King?
I have no comfort for thee – no, not one; 355

I cannot cry, "Wherefore thus sleepest thou?"
For heaven is parted from thee, and the earth
Knows thee not, so afflicted, for a god;
And ocean too, with all its solemn noise,
Has from thy sceptre passed, and all the air 360
Is emptied of thine hoary majesty.

Thy thunder, captious⁵⁷ at the new command,
Rumbles reluctant o'er our fallen house;
And thy sharp lightning in unpractised hands
Scorches and burns our once serene domain.⁵⁸ 365

With such remorseless speed still come new woes
That unbelief has not a space to breathe.

Saturn, sleep on. Me thoughtless, why should I
Thus violate thy slumbrous solitude?
Why should I ope thy melancholy eyes? 370

Saturn, sleep on, while at thy feet I weep.'

As when, upon a tranced summer night,
Forests, branch-charmed by the earnest stars,
Dream, and so dream all night, without a noise,
Save from one gradual solitary gust 375
Swelling upon the silence, dying off,
As if the ebbing air had but one wave;
So came these words, and went, the while in tears

She pressed her fair large forehead to the earth,
Just where her fallen hair might spread in curls, 380
A soft and silken mat for Saturn's feet.
Long, long those two were postured motionless,
Like sculpture builded up upon the grave
Of their own power. A long awful time
I looked upon them; still they were the same, 385
The frozen god still bending to the earth,
And the sad goddess weeping at his feet;
Moneta silent. Without stay or prop
But my own weak mortality, I bore
The load of this eternal quietude, 390
The unchanging gloom, and the three fixed shapes
Ponderous upon my senses a whole moon.
For by my burning brain I measured sure
Her silver seasons shedded on the night,
And every day by day methought I grew 395
More gaunt and ghostly; oftentimes I prayed
Intense, that death would take me from the vale
And all its burdens; gasping with despair
Of change, hour after hour I cursed myself –
Until old Saturn raised his faded eyes, 400
And looked around and saw his kingdom gone,
And all the gloom and sorrow of the place,
And that fair kneeling goddess at his feet.
As the moist scent of flowers, and grass, and leaves
Fills forest dells with a pervading air 405
Known to the woodland nostril, so the words
Of Saturn filled the mossy glooms around,
Even to the hollows of time-eaten oaks,
And to the windings in the foxes' hole,
With sad low tones, while thus he spake, and sent 410
Strange musings to the solitary Pan: 59
'Moan, brethren, moan, for we are swallowed up
And buried from all godlike exercise

Of influence benign on planets pale,
 And peaceful sway above man's harvesting, 415
 And all those acts which deity supreme
 Doth ease its heart of love in. Moan and wail.
 Moan, brethren, moan, for lo! the rebel spheres
 Spin round, the stars their ancient courses keep,
 Clouds still with shadowy moisture haunt the earth, 420
 Still suck their fill of light from sun and moon,
 Still buds the tree, and still the seashores murmur.
 There is no death in all the universe,
 No smell of death – there shall be death. Moan, moan,
 Moan, Cybele, 60 moan, for thy pernicious babes 425
 Have changed a god into a shaking palsy.
 Moan, brethren, moan, for I have no strength left,
 Weak as the reed – weak – feeble as my voice –
 Oh, oh, the pain, the pain of feebleness.
 Moan, moan, for still I thaw – or give me help: 430
 Throw down those imps, 61 and give me victory.
 Let me hear other groans, and trumpets blown
 Of triumph calm, and hymns of festival
 From the gold peaks of heaven's high-piled clouds;
 Voices of soft proclaim, and silver stir 435
 Of strings in hollow shells; and let there be
 Beautiful things made new, for the surprise
 Of the sky-children.' So he feebly ceased,
 With such a poor and sickly sounding pause,
 Methought I heard some old man of the earth 440
 Bewailing earthly loss; nor could my eyes
 And ears act with that pleasant unison of sense
 Which marries sweet sound with the grace of form,
 And dolorous accent from a tragic harp
 With large-limbed visions. More I scrutinized: 445
 Still fixed he sat beneath the sable trees,
 Whose arms spread straggling in wild serpent forms,
 With leaves all hushed; his awful presence there

Now all was silent, gave a deadly lie
 To what I erewhile heard – only his lips 450
 Trembled amid the white curls of his beard.
 They told the truth, though, round the snowy locks
 Hung nobly, as upon the face of heaven
 A midday fleece of clouds. Thea arose
 And stretched her white arm through the hollow dark, 455
 Pointing some whither, whereat he too rose
 Like a vast giant seen by men at sea
 To grow pale from the waves at dull midnight.
 They melted from my sight into the woods;
 Ere I could turn, Moneta cried, ‘These twain 460
 Are speeding to the families of grief,
 Where roofed in by black rocks they waste in pain
 And darkness for no hope.’ And she spake on,
 As ye may read who can unwearied pass
 Onward from the antechamber of this dream, 465
 Where even at the open doors awhile
 I must delay, and glean my memory
 Of her high phrase – perhaps no further dare.

The Fall of Hyperion

¹This much revised version of ‘Hyperion’ was first published in 1857. Keats gave it up because ‘there were too many Miltonic inversions in it. Miltonic verse cannot be written but in an artful or rather artist’s humour. I wish to give myself up to other sensations. English ought to be kept up. It may be interesting to you to pick out some lines from Hyperion and put a mark X to the false beauty proceeding from art, and one || to the true voice of feeling. Upon my soul ’twas imagination; I cannot make the distinction. Every now and then there is a Miltonic intonation – but I cannot make the division properly’ (Rollins ii 167). For further comment see headnote, p. 1395.

Canto II

‘Mortal, that thou may’st understand aright,
I humanize my sayings to thine ear,
Making comparisons of earthly things;
Or thou might’st better listen to the wind,
Whose language is to thee a barren noise,
Though it blows legend-laden through the trees.
In melancholy realms big tears are shed,
More sorrow like to this, and suchlike woe
Too huge for mortal tongue, or pen of scribe.
The Titans¹ fierce, self-hid or prison-bound,
Groan for the old allegiance once more,
Listening in their doom for Saturn’s voice.
But one of our whole eagle-brood still keeps
His sov’rignty, and rule, and majesty;
Blazing Hyperion on his orb’d fire²
Still sits, still snuffs the incense teeming up
From man to the sun’s god – yet unsecure.
For as upon the earth dire prodigies³
Fright and perplex, so also shudders he;
Nor at dog’s howl, or gloom-bird’s even screech,⁴
Or the familiar visitings of one
Upon the first toll of his passing-bell,⁵
But horrors, portioned⁶ to a giant nerve,
Make great Hyperion ache. His palace bright,
Bastioned with pyramids of glowing gold,
And touched with shade of bronzed obelisks,
Glares a blood-red through all the thousand courts,
Arches, and domes, and fiery galleries;
And all its curtains of aurean⁷ clouds
Flush angerly⁸ – when he would taste the wreaths
Of incense breathed aloft from sacred hills,

Instead of sweets, his ample palate takes
Savour of poisonous brass and metals sick.
Wherefore, when harboured in the sleepy west,
After the full completion of fair day,
For rest divine upon exalted couch
And slumber in the arms of melody,
He paces through the pleasant hours of ease
With strides colossal, on from hall to hall,
While far within each aisle and deep recess
His winged minions in close clusters stand
Amazed, and full of fear; like anxious men
Who on a wide plain gather in sad troops
When earthquakes jar their battlements and towers.
Even now, while Saturn, roused from icy trance,
Goes step for step with Thea from yon woods,
Hyperion, leaving twilight in the rear,
Is sloping to the threshold of the west.
Thither we tend.' Now in clear light I stood,
Relieved from the dusk vale. Mnemosyne
Was sitting on a square-edged polished stone,
That in its lucid depth reflected pure
Her priestess-garments. My quick eyes ran on
From stately nave to nave, from vault to vault,
Through bowers of fragrant and enwreathed light
And diamond-paved lustrous long arcades.
Anon rushed by the bright Hyperion;
His flaming robes streamed out beyond his heels,
And gave a roar, as if of earthly fire,
That scared away the meek ethereal hours⁹
And made their dove-wings tremble. On he flared...

[Bright star, would I were steadfast as thou art](composed October–December 1819;
edited from MS)¹

Bright star, would I were steadfast as thou art –
Not in lone splendour hung aloft the night
And watching, with eternal lids apart,
Like nature's patient, sleepless eremite,²
The moving waters³ at their priestlike task
Of pure ablution⁴ round earth's human shores,
Or gazing on the new soft-fallen mask
Of snow upon the mountains and the moors;
No – yet still steadfast, still unchangeable,
Pillowed upon my fair love's ripening breast,
To feel for ever its soft swell and fall,
Awake for ever in a sweet unrest,

Still, still to hear her tender-taken breath,
And so live ever – or else swoon to death.

Bright star, would I were steadfast as thou art

¹ This sonnet was published first in 1838. It has traditionally been thought of as Keats's last poem, but editors now place it in late 1819.

² eremite anchorite, hermit.

³ The moving waters cf. Wordsworth, The Excursion ix 9: 'The moving waters and the invisible air.'

⁴ ablution cleansing. The ebb and flow of the waters are like a religious ritual.

[This living hand, now warm and capable] (composed towards the end of 1819)¹

This living hand, now warm and capable
Of earnest grasping, would, if it were cold
And in the icy silence of the tomb,
So haunt thy days and chill thy dreaming nights
That thou would wish thine own heart dry of blood
So in my veins red life might stream again,
And thou be conscience-calmed. See, here it is –
I hold it towards you.

This living hand, now warm and capable

Hartley Coleridge (1796–1849)

Thoroughly mythologized by some of the greatest poetry of the age (see Coleridge's 'The Nightingale', 'Frost at Midnight', the conclusion to 'Christabel' and Wordsworth's 'To H. C., Six Years Old' and 'Ode'), Hartley no doubt felt he had a great deal to live up to. Born on 19 September 1796, he was gifted with a prodigious intelligence, but, thanks partly to his father's abandonment of his family, his early education was erratic and irregular. He was elected to a Fellowship at Oriel College, Oxford, 16 April 1819, but his academic career was blighted from the start by drunkenness. After the College Dean found him lying in the gutter of Oriel Lane one evening, Hartley was asked to resign.

He went to London to pursue a journalistic career, but his best works were his poems. His first published verses appeared in the London Magazine in 1823. As a journalist his main problem was that he was unproductive. By the summer of 1823 he was in Ambleside, working as a schoolteacher. That lasted only a short time, and he moved to Leeds, where he published Biographia Borealis; or, Lives of Distinguished Northerners in 1833. In the same year he published a volume of Poems. In 'Long time a child', he addressed the mythologized self of 'Frost at Midnight'; there is pathos in the reckoning, more pronounced in 'When I review the course that I have run', posthumously published in 1851. 'To Wordsworth', however, is a moving tribute to the poet who first described him as a 'Seer blessed' ('Ode' 114).

Sonnet IX

From Poems (1833)

Long time a child, and still a child, when years
Had painted manhood on my cheek, was I;
For yet I lived like one not born to die;
A thriftless prodigal of smiles and tears,
No hope I needed, and I knew no fears.
But sleep, though sweet, is only sleep, and waking,
I waked to sleep no more, at once o'ertaking
The vanguard of my age, with all arrears
Of duty on my back. Nor child, nor man,
Nor youth, nor sage, I find my head is grey,
For I have lost the race I never ran,
A rathe¹ December blights my lagging May;
And still I am a child, though I be old –
Time is my debtor for my years untold.

Sonnet: 'When I review the course that I have run'

From Essays and Marginalia (1851)

When I review the course that I have run,
And count the loss of all my wasted days,
I find no argument for joy or praise
In whatsoever my soul hath thought or done.
I am a desert, and the kindly sun
On me hath vainly spent his fertile rays.
Then wherefore do I tune my idle lays,
Or dream that haply I may be the one
Of the vain thousands, that shall win a place

Among the poets – that a single rhyme
Of my poor wit's devising may find grace
To breed high memories in the womb of time?
But to confound the time the muse I woo;
Then 'tis but just that time confound me too.

To Wordsworth

From Essays and Marginalia (1851)

There have been poets that in verse display
The elemental forms of human passions;
Poets have been, to whom the fickle fashions
And all the wilful humours of the day
Have furnished matter for a polished lay;
And many are the smooth elaborate tribe
Who, emulous of thee, the shape describe,
And fain would every shifting hue portray
Of restless nature. But, thou mighty seer!
'Tis thine to celebrate the thoughts that make
The life of souls, the truths for whose sweet sake
We to ourselves and to our God are dear.
Of nature's inner shrine thou art the priest,
Where most she works when we perceive her least.

Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley (née Godwin)

(1797–1851)

Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin could hardly have had a more distinguished lineage, her parents being William Godwin (p. 155) and Mary Wollstonecraft (p. 281). Ten days after she was born on 30 August 1797, her mother died of postnatal septicaemia, leaving her to be raised by her father and stepmother, Mary Jane Clairmont – who had two children of her own, Charles and Jane (later known as Claire). William Godwin knew virtually everyone in literary London, and enjoyed entertaining, so that throughout her girlhood Mary watched the comings and goings of such luminaries as Samuel Taylor Coleridge, Charles Lamb and William Hazlitt.

Godwin's father had been conducting a mutually admiring correspondence with the young Percy Bysshe Shelley for almost two years by the time she met him at dinner on 11 November 1812. Shelley was married to Harriet Westbrook, but over the next eighteen months unresolvable strains developed; Mary and Percy began seeing more of each other in June and July 1814, fell in love, and ran away to the Continent with Claire Clairmont on 28 July. They toured France and Switzerland, returning to England in the autumn. In 1816 they set out for the Continent again, with Claire again in tow, and spent the summer in Geneva, where they made the acquaintance of Byron. This was one of those remarkable moments in literary history where the unique chemistry of the various personalities was conducive to the production of great literature: under Shelley's influence, Byron composed Childe Harold's Pilgrimage III (pp. 878–912) and Manfred, and Shelley composed two of his greatest poems, Hymn to Intellectual Beauty (pp. 1101–3) and Mont Blanc (pp. 1104–7). But perhaps the most enduringly popular work of that summer was Mary's great novel Frankenstein, inspired by a ghost-story competition organized by Byron. Something of the flavour of the summer of 1816 is captured in the first of the journal entries below.

In November 1816 Harriet Shelley committed suicide, and Percy and Mary were married on 30 December. She completed Frankenstein in May 1817, and it was published the following year. The Shelleys lived a nomadic and difficult life, residing successively in Venice, Rome, Naples, Florence and Pisa. In May 1822 they settled in Lerici, and Percy was drowned in July when sailing in a storm in a dangerously unstable boat. She was almost as devastated by Byron's death two years later, as her journal entry, reproduced below, shows.

She published more novels, including Mathilda (1819), Valperga (1823), The Last Man (1826), Perkin Warbeck (1830), Lodore (1835) and Falkner (1837). And in 1839 she supervised the production of what remains the definitive edition of her husband's Poetical Works, which included her own commentary. It was an extraordinary act of scholarship, and her note on Prometheus Unbound, below, remains an essential tool in the study of that challenging work.

Her life after Percy's death was difficult. She was often impoverished, ostracized from society, and encountered much opposition from her late husband's father over the maintenance and custody of Percy Florence Shelley (her only surviving child). However, she persevered and established herself, at least in Bohemian circles, as a novelist and reviewer. Her health was never good, and in 1846 she fell seriously ill. She died on 1 February 1851 at the age of 53.

From Journals (edited from MS)

28 May 1817. I am melancholy with reading the third Canto of Childe Harold. Do you not remember, Shelley, when you first read it to me, one evening after returning from Diodati?¹ It was in our little room at Chapuis;² the lake was before us and the mighty Jura. That time is past and this will also pass, when I may weep to read these words and again moralize on the flight of time.

Dear Lake! I shall ever love thee. How a powerful mind³ can sanctify past scenes and recollections! His is a powerful mind, one that fills me with melancholy yet mixed with pleasure, as is always the case when intellectual energy is displayed. To think of our excursions on the Lake; how we saw him when he came down to us or welcomed our arrival with a good-humoured smile.⁴ How very vividly does each verse of his poem recall some scene of this kind to my memory.

This time will soon also be a recollection. We may see him again and again, enjoy his society, but the time will also arrive when that which is now an anticipation will be only in the memory. Death will at length come and in the last moment all will be a dream.

From Journals

¹ Byron was resident at Villa Diodati, on the shores of Lake Geneva, during the summer of 1816.

² On 3 June 1816 the Shelleys moved into a small cottage near Coligny in the region of Montalègre, known as Campagne Chappuis; they moved out on 29 August. Their reading of Childe Harold III is likely to have taken place between c.14 August (when Claire Clairmont produced a fair copy) and the end of the month. Percy took a copy of the poem to Byron's publisher in London the following month.

³ a powerful mind She is thinking of Byron's comments on Lake Geneva in Childe Harold III st. 68ff.

⁴ Shelley's cottage was a mere eight-minute walk down the slope from Diodati.

15 May 1824. This then was the 'coming event' that cast its shadow on my last night's miserable thoughts. Byron has become one of the people of the grave¹ – that innumerable conclave to which the beings I best loved belong. I knew him in the bright days of youth, when neither care or fear had visited me; before death had made me feel my mortality and the earth was the scene of my hopes. Can I forget our evening visits to Diodati, our excursions of the lake when he sang the Tyrolese hymn, and his voice was harmonized with winds and waves? Can I forget his attentions and consolations to me during my deepest misery? Never. Beauty sat on his countenance and power beamed from his eye; his faults being for the most part weaknesses, induced one readily to pardon them. Albe,² the dear capricious fascinating Albe has left this desert world.

What do I do here? Why am I doomed to live on seeing all expire before me? God grant I may die young. A new race is springing about me. At the age of twenty six I am in the condition of an aged person. All my friends are gone; I have no wish to form new. I cling to the few remaining, but they slide away and my heart fails when I think by how few ties I hold to the world. Albe, dearest Albe, was knit by long associations. Each day I repeat with bitterer feelings, ‘Life is the desert and the solitude, how populous the grave’³ – and that region, to the dearer and best beloved beings which it has torn from me, now adds that resplendent spirit, whose departure leaves the dull earth dark as midnight.

On Reading Wordsworth’s Lines on Peele Castle (composed 8 December 1825; edited from MS)

It is with me, as erst with you,
Oh poet, nature’s chronicler,
The summer seas have lost their hue
And storm sits brooding everywhere.

The gentlest rustling of the deep
Is but the dirge of him I lost,
And when waves raise their furrows steep,
And bring foam in which is tossed.

A voice I hear upon the wind
Which bids me haste to join him there,
And woo the tempest's breath unkind
Which gives to me a kindred bier.

And when all smooth are ocean's plains
And sails afar are glittering,
The fairest skiff his form contains
To my poor heart's fond picturing.

Then wildly to the beach I rush,
And fain would seize the frailest boat,
And from dull earth the slight hull push,
On dancing waves towards him to float.

'Nor may I e'er again behold
The sea, and be as I have been;
My bitter grief will ne'er grow old,
Nor say I this with mind serene.'¹

For oft I weep in solitude
And shed so many bitter tears,
While on past joys I vainly brood
And shrink in fear from coming years.

A Dirge (composed November 1827; edited from MS)

To the air of 'My Phillida, adieu, love!'

This morn thy gallant bark, love,
Sailed on a sunny sea;
'Tis noon, and tempests dark, love,
Have wrecked it on the lee.
 Ah woe! Ah woe! Ah woe!
By spirits of the deep
He's cradled on the billow
To his unwaking sleep.

Thou liest upon the shore, love,
Beside the knelling surge,
But sea-nymphs evermore, love,
Shall sadly chaunt thy dirge.
 Oh come! Oh come! Oh come!
Ye spirits of the deep,
While near his seaweed pillow
My lonely watch I keep.

From far across the sea, love,
I hear a wild lament,
By Echo's voice for thee, love,
From ocean's caverns sent:
 Oh list! Oh list! Oh list!
The spirits of the deep –
Loud sounds their wail of sorrow,
While I for ever weep.

[Oh listen while I sing to thee] (composed 12 March 1838; edited from MS)

Oh listen while I sing to thee,
My song is meant for thee alone;
My thought imparts its melody,
And gives the soft impassioned tone.

I sing of joy, and see thy smile
That to the swelling note replies;
I sing of love, and feel the while
The gaze of thy love-beaming eyes.

If thou wert far, my voice would die
In murmurs faint and sorrowing;
If thou wert fake – in agony
My heart would break, I could not sing.

Then listen while I sing to thee,
My song is meant for thee alone;
And now that thou art near to me
I pour a full impassioned tone.

Note on the ‘Prometheus Unbound’ (extracts)

From The Poetical Works of Percy Bysshe Shelley, ed. Mary Shelley (4 vols, 1839)

The prominent feature of Shelley’s theory of the destiny of the human species was that evil is not inherent in the system of the creation, but an accident that might be expelled. This also forms a portion of Christianity: God made earth and man perfect, till he, by his fall, ‘Brought death into the world, and all our woe’.¹ Shelley believed that mankind had only to will that there should be no evil, and there would be none. It is not my part in these notes to notice the arguments that have been urged against this opinion, but to mention the fact that he entertained it, and was indeed attached to it with fervent enthusiasm. That man could be so perfectionized as to be able to expel evil from his own nature and from the greater part of the creation, was the cardinal point of his system. And the subject he loved best to dwell on, was the image of One warring with the Evil Principle, oppressed not only by it, but by all – even the good who were deluded into considering evil a necessary portion of humanity.

A victim full of fortitude and hope, and the spirit of triumph emanating from a reliance in the ultimate omnipotence of good: such he had depicted in his last poem,² when he made Laon the enemy and the victim of tyrants. He now took a more idealized image of the same subject. He followed certain classical authorities in figuring Saturn as the good principle, Jupiter the usurping evil one, and Prometheus as the regenerator, who, unable to bring mankind back to primitive innocence, used knowledge as a weapon to defeat evil, by leading mankind beyond the state wherein they are sinless through ignorance, to that in which they are virtuous through wisdom. Jupiter punished the temerity of the Titan by chaining him to a rock of Caucasus, and causing a vulture to devour his still renewed heart. There was a prophecy afloat in heaven portending the fall of Jove, the secret of averting which was known only to Prometheus – and the god offered freedom from torture on condition of its being communicated to him. According to the mythological story, this referred to the offspring of Thetis, who was destined to be greater than his father. Prometheus at last bought pardon for his crime of enriching mankind with his gifts, by revealing the prophecy. Hercules killed the vulture and set him free, and Thetis was married to Peleus, the father of Achilles.

Shelley adapted the catastrophe of this story to his peculiar views. The son, greater than his father, born of the nuptials of Jupiter and Thetis, was to dethrone Evil, and bring back a happier reign than that of Saturn. Prometheus defies the power of his enemy, and endures centuries of torture till the hour arrives when Jove, blind to the real event, but darkly guessing that some great good to himself will flow, espouses Thetis. At the moment, the primal power of the world drives him from his usurped throne, and strength, in the person of Hercules, liberates humanity, typified in Prometheus, from the tortures generated by evil done or suffered. Asia, one of the Oceanides, is the wife of Prometheus (she was, according to other mythological interpretations, the same as Venus and nature). When the benefactor of mankind is liberated, nature resumes the beauty of her prime, and is united to her husband, the emblem of the human race, in perfect and happy union. In the fourth Act, the poet gives further scope to his imagination and idealizes the forms of creation, such as we know them, instead of such as they appeared to the Greeks. Maternal Earth, the mighty parent, is superseded by the Spirit of the Earth – the guide of our planet through the realms of sky – while his fair and weaker companion and attendant, the Spirit of the Moon, receives bliss from the annihilation of Evil in the superior sphere.

Shelley develops (more particularly in the lyrics of this drama) his abstruse and imaginative theories with regard to the creation. It requires a mind as subtle and penetrating as his own to understand the mystic meanings scattered throughout the poem. They elude the ordinary reader by their abstraction and delicacy of distinction, but they are far from vague.

It was his design to write prose metaphysical essays on the nature of man, which would have served to explain much of what is obscure in his poetry; a few scattered fragments of observations and remarks alone remain. He considered these philosophical views of mind and nature to be instinct with the intensest spirit of poetry.

More popular poets clothe the ideal with familiar and sensible imagery. Shelley loved to idealize the real – to gift the mechanism of the material universe with a soul and a voice, and to bestow such also on the most delicate and abstract emotions and thoughts of the mind. Sophocles was his great master in this species of imagery....

In the ‘Prometheus Unbound’, Shelley fulfils the promise quoted from a letter in the note on The Revolt of Islam. The tone of the composition is calmer and more majestic, the poetry more perfect as a whole, and the imagination displayed at once more pleasingly beautiful and more varied and daring. The description of the Hours as they are seen in the cave of Demogorgon, is an instance of this – it fills the mind as the most charming picture; we long to see an artist at work to bring to our view the cars drawn by rainbow-winged steeds

Which trample the dim winds; in each there stands
A wild-eyed charioteer urging their flight.
Some look behind, as fiends pursued them there,
And yet I see no shapes but the keen stars;
Others, with burning eyes, lean forth, and drink
With eager lips the wind of their own speed,
As if the thing they loved fled on before,

And now, even now, they clasped it. Their bright locks
Stream like a comet's flashing hair – they all
Sweep onward.

(Prometheus Unbound II iv 130–40)

Through the whole poem there reigns a sort of calm and holy spirit of love; it soothes the tortured, and is hope to the expectant, till the prophecy is fulfilled, and love, untainted by any evil, becomes the law of the world.

England had been rendered a painful residence to Shelley, as much by the sort of persecution with which in those days all men of liberal opinions were visited, and by the injustice he had lately endured in the Court of Chancery,³ as by the symptoms of disease which made him regard a visit to Italy as necessary to prolong his life. An exile, and strongly impressed with the feeling that the majority of his countrymen regarded him with sentiments of aversion (such as his own heart could experience towards none), he sheltered himself from such disgusting and painful thoughts in the calm retreats of poetry, and built up a world of his own, with the more pleasure, since he hoped to induce some one or two to believe that the earth might become such, did mankind themselves consent. The charm of the Roman climate helped to clothe his thoughts in greater beauty than they had ever worn before. And as he wandered among the ruins, made one with nature in their decay, or gazed on the Praxitelean shapes⁴ that throng the Vatican, the Capitol, and the palaces of Rome, his soul imbibed forms of loveliness which became a portion of itself.⁵ There are many passages in the 'Prometheus' which show the intense delight he received from such studies, and give back the impression with a beauty of poetical description peculiarly his own. He felt this, as a poet must feel when he satisfies himself by the result of his labours, and he wrote from Rome: 'My "Prometheus Unbound" is just finished, and in a month or two I shall send it. It is a drama, with characters and mechanism of a kind yet unattempted, and I think the execution is better than any of my former attempts.'

Letitia Elizabeth Landon (1802–1838)

Letitia Elizabeth Landon was born on 14 August 1802 at 25 Hans Place, Chelsea. Catherine Jane Bishop, her mother, was of Welsh ancestry; her father, John Landon, had been an explorer in Africa, and returned to London to become a partner in Adair's army agency in Pall Mall. Her education was fragmented and unsystematic; she was taught to read by an invalid neighbour, and at 5 sent for a few months to Miss Rowden's Chelsea school where Lady Caroline Lamb and Mary Russell Mitford had been pupils.

She was 7 when her family moved to Coventry Farm, an ill-advised investment by her father at East Barnet, and the source of his later financial difficulties. Here she was educated by her cousin Elizabeth, who by her own admission was less well-informed than her pupil: 'When I asked Letitia any question relating either to history, geography, grammar – to Plutarch's Lives, or to any book we had been reading, I was pretty certain her answers would be perfectly correct; still, not exactly recollecting, and unwilling she should find out just then that I was less learned than herself, I used thus to question her: "Are you quite certain?" ... I never knew her to be wrong.'¹

Landon was a voracious reader, at an early age devouring between 100 and 150 volumes of Cooke's Poets and Novelists, in addition to 'Rollin's Ancient History, Hume and Smollett; then come Plutarch's Lives, the Fables of Gay and Aesop, Life of Josephus, Montesquieu's Spirit of the Laws, Dobson's Life of Petrarch, and many others, more or less adapted to the young reader.'² Also by this time she was composing poetry. 'I cannot remember the time when composition in some shape or other was not a habit', she later told S. C. Hall. 'I used to invent long stories, which I was only too glad if I could get my mother to hear. These soon took a metrical form, and I used to walk about the grounds and lie awake half the night, reciting my verses aloud.'³

When she was 13 the family moved back to Fulham and then to Old Brompton, largely because of her father's troubled finances. It was there, while still a teenager, that she came to the notice of William Jerdan, editor of the Literary Gazette: 'My first recollection of the future poetess is that of a plump girl, grown enough to be almost mistaken for a woman, bowling a hoop round the walks, with the hoop-stick in one hand and a book in the other, reading as she ran, and as well as she could manage both exercise and instruction at the same time.'⁴

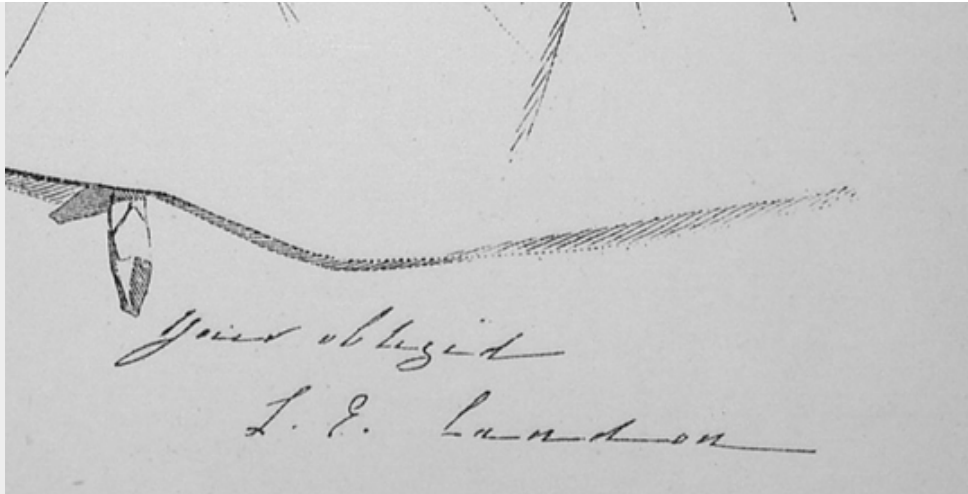

At the age of 18 she began contributing to the Literary Gazette under the initials 'L.E.L.', and soon attracted a following. The intrigue that surrounded her enigmatic initials was evoked in a poem of February 1822 by the Quaker poet, Bernard Barton:

I know not who or what thou art,
Nor do I seek to know thee,
Whilst thou, performing thus thy part,
Such banquets can bestow me.
Then be, as long as thou shalt list,
My viewless, nameless, melodist.

At first she had great difficulty finding a publisher for a long poem she had written, The Improvisatrice; it was, she later recalled, rejected by every publisher in London. But as the Literary Gazette brought her recognition it became comparatively easy to find a publisher for it in 1824. She later told Alaric Watts that 'I wrote the Improvisatrice in less than five weeks, and during that time I often was for two or three days without touching it. I never saw the MS till in proof-sheets a year afterwards, and I made no additions, only verbal alterations.'⁵ Her publishers paid her £300 for it, and it was an instant success, going through six editions within the year. Reviews were generally favourable, including an outrageous puff by Jerdan in the Literary Gazette; it began by describing Letitia as 'the English Sappho', and went on:

If true poetry consist in originality of conception, fineness of imagination, beautiful fitness and glow of expression, genuine feeling, and the outpourings of fresh and natural thoughts in all the force of fresh and natural language, it is pre-eminently conspicuous in the writings of L.E.L. Neither are her subjects nor mode of treating them, borrowed from others; but simplicity, gracefulness, fancy and pathos seem to gush forth in spontaneous and sweet union, whatever may be the theme.⁶

Jerdan wanted to present Letitia as an improvisatrice herself, gifted with spontaneous poetic utterance: ‘What may spring from the continued cultivation of such promise, it is not easy to predicate; but if the author never excels what she has already done, we can confidently give her the assurance of what the possessor of such talents must most earnestly covet – Immortality.’⁷

Jerdan was hardly a disinterested party, and the puff attracted the attentions of other reviewers. Alaric Watts in the Literary Magnet ridiculed him at length before reminding his readers of a recent hoax in which Jerdan was implicated: ‘We remember that some time since, a report was spread of the premature death of this same interesting young lady, and the Literary Gazette joined in the solemn foolery, lamenting her timeless decease as if it really happened.’⁸ Despite this, Watts contributed his share of praise to the new star on the literary horizon:

We are no hermits, nor have we reached that sober decline of life, when the heyday of the blood attends upon the judgement; and, indeed, if we had, the verses of our ‘English Sappho’ would go far in heating us again. Her descriptions are sufficiently warm and luxurious: she appears to be the very creature of passionate inspiration; and the wild and romantic being whom she describes as the Improvisatrice seems to be the very counterpart of her sentimental self. Her poetical breathing appears to proceed from a soul whose very essence is love; and seared hearts – withered hopes – broken lutes – blighted flowers – music and moonlight, sing their melancholy changes through all her verses.⁹

Jerdan’s encomium also drew fire from the Westminster Review, which commented: ‘If we are to trust the Literary Gazette and common gossip, authorities pretty much on a par on this subject, poets are as plenty as mushrooms, and start up, in the present day, as rapidly as they do after a shower. We cannot walk the streets of London without jostling a poet; and our provincial towns and country places equally abound in them.'¹⁰ Although the reviewer had praise for the poem, it nonetheless contained 'much that is mere verbiage, and pages filled with puny and sickly thoughts clothed in glittering language that draws the eye off from their real character and value'.¹¹ Others had kinder words and fewer reservations: the Gentleman's Magazine claimed seldom to have 'seen a volume more conspicuous for vivid imagination, felicity of diction, vigorous condensation of language, and passionate intensity of sentiment'.¹² In rather a patronizing account of the work, Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine conceded that 'Miss L. has a good command of language, and a fair store of poetical ideas, with a great deal of taste in arrangement, and an ear tuned to the varied melodies of the language.'¹³ And the New Monthly Magazine commented: 'There is scarcely a line which does not glow with some ray of warm or bright feeling; scarcely an image which is not connected with the heart by some fine and secret association ... in ardent and impassioned feeling, clothed in language most befitting, The Improvisatrice and the poems which follow it have been seldom surpassed.'¹⁴

This was, of course, business. By 1824 women poets were not just acceptable to the literary marketplace – they were positively fashionable. Hungry for new talent, publishers were willing to take anything saleable and feed it to the ever-open maw of the reading public. Felicia Hemans had colluded with the process because, as a single parent with five children, she had little choice; she burned herself out and died young. Landon may have been unaware of the pressure of the publishing machine that was about to chew her into a pulp, and Alaric Watts sounded an appropriately admonitory note when, in his review, he remarked that 'She possesses taste, sweetness, and a high poetical feeling; and we only regret she should have fallen into interested hands, by which her talents are prematurely thrust upon the world, and rated so far beyond their merits.'¹⁵ That shrewd observation is amplified by Germaine Greer: 'The reality of her life was daily work, endless deadlines, poor pay and no power whatsoever, even to express what she really believed. Grub Street destroyed her personal integrity, worked her to exhaustion and then turned on her.'¹⁶ To some extent, Landon's own testimony to S. C. Hall corroborates this, although she seems to have been grateful for the opportunity to make a living from her writing:

I certainly am not one of the authors who complain of the booksellers. My whole life has been one of constant labour. My contributions to various periodicals – whether tales, poetry, or criticism – amount to far more than my published volumes. I have been urged to this by the necessity of aiding those nearly connected with me, whom my father's death left entirely destitute.¹⁷

Jerdan calculated that Landon earned £2,585 in total from her work, about £250 a year.¹⁸ That made her one of the highest earning poetesses of her day, partly because of her furious rate of productivity: besides The Improvisatrice, she published The Troubadour (1825), The Golden Violet (1827) and The Venetian Bracelet (1829), among many other titles.

The real hardship in her literary life was embroilment in scandal – first through association with the dissolute William Maginn, and then through friendship with Daniel Maclise, the artist. Despite the fuss that surrounded her private life, Germaine Greer is right to observe that ‘There is no proof that L.E.L. ever had a lover by day or night, let alone several.’¹⁹ All the same, her vulnerability as an object of scandal intensified the desire for domestic stability, and on 7 June 1838, at St Mary’s, Bryanston Square, she married George Maclean, governor of Cape Coast Castle in Africa who, according to S. C. Hall, ‘neither knew, felt, nor estimated her value. He wedded her, I am sure, only because he was vain of her celebrity.’²⁰

Landon sailed for Africa on 5 July, and arrived on 15 August. Life on the Gold Coast was not what she expected; she found herself cut off from the metropolitan society to which she was accustomed, and on 15 October wrote to Anna Maria Hall, ‘I do not wish to form new friends, and never does a day pass without thinking most affectionately of my old ones.’²¹ Later that day she was found dead, a bottle of prussic acid in her hand. She was only 36. Suspicions about her husband, and the failure of the coroner to perform a post-mortem, led to much speculation about the causes and means of her death:

The wildest rumours were immediately set afloat by the hapless lady’s female friends in England – each pretending to have been in her confidence, and each affecting to know the facts of the case better than anybody else. One averred that a cup of coffee had been given her by a black boy, which had been drugged by a native woman who had lived with the Governor as his mistress; others denied that she had ever employed hydrocyanic acid, or taken any poison with her; and the rest accused Mr Maclean of cruelty and adultery, and even of being accessory to the murder of his wife.²²

It would be difficult, today, to claim Letitia as a neglected genius; she had talent and facility, and the best of her poems contain energy and charm, but her work was wildly variable, even within single works. The Improvisatrice remains her quintessential poem, featuring Lorenzo, its Byronic hero, who pursues its thwarted heroine, dark and passionate (like its author), doomed to be jilted for a vacuous blonde. But even her admirers tend to agree that she worked too rapidly for there to have been much polish to her work:

The injury that resulted from the rule of rapidity – breathless and reckless rapidity – is shown throughout the various poems that compose the overwrought richness, the beautiful excess, the melodious confusion of the Improvisatrice. If the superfluities, amounting to at least one third of the poem had been cut away, all that is obscure would have been clear – all that is languid, strong – all that is incongruous, harmonised.²³

It is easier to value her verse for precisely the qualities Laman Blanchard singled out – its ‘breathless rapidity’, richness, and, indeed, confusion. Letitia had, as she rightly observed, ‘a soul of romance’, but if she represented in any sense the spirit of romanticism, it was of a transitional, even decadent, kind. True, she is capable of writing about Lake District beauty spots, such as Airey Force and Scale Force, in a decidedly Wordsworthian manner, and even her poem about Piccadilly Circus is reminiscent of Composed upon Westminster Bridge, 3 September 1802.²⁴ She is, after all, strongly influenced by Wordsworth, as she admits in her tribute, On Wordsworth's Cottage, near Grasmere Lake. But the kind of subject matter that appealed most to her was romantic not in the sense of the sublime set-pieces of The Prelude, but in its melancholy preoccupation with thwarted or deceived love.

Sappho's Song from The Improvisatrice, which many critics singled out for praise, is a good example. For Landon, Sappho was the exemplar not just of the female poet, but of the jilted lover. Though no more than twenty lines long, Landon's poem is cleverly evocative of the compulsive intensity of love. That fascination is the distinctive preoccupation that drives Letitia's poetic vision. Even when writing about Airey Force, it is to imagine herself as a hermit no longer susceptible to such betrayals.²⁵

In content, she is an inheritor of the romantic tradition of Hemans, Scott and Byron; in manner, she is one of the first Victorians: 'Her imaginary tableaux are dense and dramatic, all the space crowded like a Pre-Raphaelite painting with flowers and luxury effects.'²⁶ Less pronounced in the poems and extracts selected here, the profusion of descriptive detail in the entirely imaginary account of Florence in The Improvisatrice is decadent by the standards of high Romanticism. Her attitudes presaged those of the Victorian era in another sense: unlike many of the poets here, she was one of the first truly urban poets. 'I have lived almost wholly in London', she told S. C. Hall, 'and though very susceptible to the impressions produced by the beauty of the country, certainly never felt at home but on the pavement.'²⁷ In a letter to Laman Blanchard she was even more emphatic: 'I have such a horror of living in the country: hawthorn hedges and unhappy attachments always go together in my mind.'²⁸

She looks forward, quite literally, in The Princess Victoria, to the era that was about to dawn – one divorced from the depravity and indolence in which George IV had wallowed. The poem is a curious one, in that it features a heroine – the future Queen and Empress – who is not doomed in the manner of the heroines in the poems of Felicia Hemans. Instead, her 'fair young face' gazes fearlessly into a future in which her throne will be the source of 'knowledge, power, and liberty'. To describe such sentiments as conservative is to miss the point; for Landon it is important that the next monarch is a woman whose status is such that she is not just preserved from the disappointment to which her other heroines are subject, but capable of redeeming others. It is a form of transcendence – and if we are looking for some way of defining what is romantic in Letitia's poetry, that is as good as any.

Her most impressive single work may be her lament, Felicia Hemans. Like much of her writing, it was composed to order, for Fisher's Drawing Room Scrap Book. The idea behind this annual publication was that Letitia would compose verses to accompany engravings – the main reason for buying the volume. Three years before, she had composed her elegiac Stanzas on the Death of Mrs Hemans for the periodical to which both had contributed, the New Monthly Magazine. In 1838, she still had much to say about her former colleague. 'Thy name was lovely and thy song was dear', she wrote:

Was not this purchased all too dearly? – never
Can fame atone for all that fame hath cost.
We see the goal but know not the endeavour,
Nor what fond hopes have on the way been lost.

What do we know of the unquiet pillow
By the worn cheek and tearful eyelids pressed,
When thoughts chase thoughts like the tumultuous billow
Whose very light and foam reveal unrest?
We say the song is sorrowful, but know not
What may have left that sorrow on the song.

(ll. 33–42)

The verse is moving because Letitia identifies so strongly with her subject, and it indicates how drastically things had changed since Hannah More had first been admitted into the male-dominated world of letters back in the 1770s. By force of numbers, women now had the right to be accepted as poets, providing they stuck to certain ‘feminine’ themes – but only at a price: in finding an audience for their work, they were sucked into an industry that exploited them mercilessly before destroying them.

‘Was not this purchased all too dearly?’ Letitia poses the question she must already have been asking about her own career. Within months of publishing this tribute, she was dead. As the years passed, a host of writers would pay tribute to her in verse, including John Greenleaf Whittier, Elizabeth Barrett (see p. 1534), Christina Rossetti and Walter Savage Landor.

The Improvisatrice: Introduction

From The Improvisatrice; and Other Poems (1824)

I am a daughter of that land
Where the poet’s lip and the painter’s hand
Are most divine, where the earth and sky

Are picture both and poetry –
 I am of Florence. Mid the chill 5
 Of hope and feeling – oh, I still
 Am proud to think to where I owe
 My birth, though but the dawn of woe!
 My childhood passed mid radiant things,
 Glorious as hope's imaginings; 10
 Statues but known from shapes of the earth
 By being too lovely for mortal birth;¹
 Paintings whose colours of life were caught
 From the fairy tints in the rainbow wrought;
 Music whose sighs had a spell like those 15
 That float on the sea at the evening's close;
 Language so silvery that every word
 Was like the lute's awakening chord;
 Skies half sunshine and half starlight,
 Flowers whose lives were a breath of delight, 20
 Leaves whose green pomp knew no withering,
 Fountains bright as the skies of our spring,
 And songs whose wild and passionate line
 Suited a soul of romance like mine.
 My power was but a woman's power, 25
 Yet in that great and glorious dower
 Which genius gives, I had my part;
 I poured my full and burning heart
 In song, and on the canvas made
 My dreams of beauty visible; 30
 I knew not which I loved the most –
 Pencil or lute, both loved so well.

The Improvisatrice: Introduction

¹ Lines 9–12 bear a general resemblance to Wordsworth's Ode, including the use of the birth/earth rhyme from Ode 16–18.

[Sappho's Song]

From The Improvisatrice; and Other Poems (1824)

Farewell, my lute, and would that I
Had never waked thy burning chords!
Poison has been upon thy sigh,
And fever has breathed in thy words.

Yet wherefore, wherefore should I blame 145
Thy power, thy spell, my gentlest lute?
I should have been the wretch I am
Had every chord of thine been mute.

It was my evil star above,
Not my sweet lute that wrought me wrong; 150
It was not song that taught me love,
But it was love that taught me song.

If song be past, and hope undone,
And pulse, and head, and heart, are flame;
It is thy work, thou faithless one¹ – 155
But no, I will not name thy name!

Sun-god, lute, wreath are vowed to thee!
Long be their light upon my grave,
My glorious grave – yon deep blue sea;
I shall sleep calm beneath its wave!² 160

Sappho's Song

² Sappho committed suicide by jumping into the sea from the Leucadian rock.

Stanzas on the Death of Mrs Hemans

*From New Monthly Magazine (1835)*¹

The rose – the glorious rose is gone.

(Felicia Hemans, Lays of Many Lands)²

Bring flowers to crown the cup and lute,
Bring flowers, the bride is near;
Bring flowers to soothe the captive's cell,
Bring flowers to strew the bier!

Bring flowers! – thus said the lovely song;³ 5
And shall they not be brought
To her who linked the offering
With feeling and with thought?

Bring flowers, the perfumed and the pure,
Those with the morning dew, 10
A sigh in every fragrant leaf,
A tear on every hue.
So pure, so sweet thy life has been,
So filling earth and air
With odours and with loveliness 15
Till common scenes grew fair.

Thy song around our daily path
Flung beauty born of dreams,
That shadows on the actual world
The spirit's sunny gleams. 20
Mysterious influence, that to earth
Brings down the heaven above,
And fills the universal heart
With universal love.

Such gifts were thine – as from the block, 25
The unformed and the cold,

The sculptor calls to breathing life
Some shape of perfect mould;
So thou from common thoughts and things
Didst call a charmed song, 30
Which on a sweet and swelling tide
Bore the full soul along.

And thou from far and foreign lands
Didst bring back many a tone,
And giving such new music still, 35
A music of thine own.

A lofty strain of generous thoughts,
And yet subdued and sweet –
An angel's song, who sings of earth,
Whose cares are at his feet. 40

And yet thy song is sorrowful,
Its beauty is not bloom;
The hopes of which it breathes are hopes
That look beyond the tomb.
Thy song is sorrowful as winds 45
That wander o'er the plain,
And ask for summer's vanished flowers,
And ask for them in vain.

Ah, dearly purchased is the gift,
The gift of song like thine; 50
A fated doom is hers who stands
The priestess of the shrine.
The crowd – they only see the crown,
They only hear the hymn –
They mark not that the cheek is pale, 55
And that the eye is dim.

Wound to a pitch too exquisite,
The soul's fine chords are wrung;
With misery and melody
They are too highly strung. 60

The heart is made too sensitive
Life's daily pain to bear;
It beats in music, but it beats
Beneath a deep despair.

It never meets the love it paints, 65
The love for which it pines;
Too much of heaven is in the faith
That such a heart enshrines.
The meteor wreath the poet wears
Must make a lonely lot; 70
It dazzles only to divide
From those who wear it not.

Didst thou not tremble at thy fame
And loathe its bitter prize,
While what to others triumph seemed, 75
To thee was sacrifice?
Oh flower brought from paradise
To this cold world of ours,
Shadows of beauty such as thine
Recall thy native bowers. 80

Let others thank thee – 'twas for them
Thy soft leaves thou didst wreath;
The red rose wastes itself in sighs
Whose sweetness others breathe!
And they have thanked thee – many a lip 85
Has asked of thine for words,
When thoughts, life's finer thoughts, have touched
The spirit's inmost chords.

How many loved and honoured thee
Who only knew thy name; 90
Which o'er the weary working world
Like starry music came!
With what still hours of calm delight
Thy songs and image blend;

I cannot choose but think thou wert 95
An old familiar friend.

The charm that dwelt in songs of thine
My inmost spirit moved;
And yet I feel as thou hadst been
Not half enough beloved. 100
They say that thou wert faint and worn
With suffering and with care;
What music must have filled the soul
That had so much to spare!

Oh weary one! since thou art laid 105
Within thy mother's breast –
The green, the quiet mother earth –
Thrice blessed be thy rest!
Thy heart is left within our hearts
Although life's pang is o'er; 110
But the quick tears are in my eyes,
And I can write no more.

Stanzas on the Death of Mrs Hemans

¹ Later in 1835, Landon would contribute an essay 'On the Character of Mrs Hemans's Writings' to the New Monthly, in which she commented on Hemans's poetry: 'Nothing can be more pure, more feminine and exalted, than the spirit which pervades the whole: it is the intuitive sense of right, elevated and strengthened into a principle. It is a glorious and a beautiful memory to bequeath; but she who left it is little to be envied. Open the volumes which she has left, legacies from many various hours, and what a record of wasted feelings and disappointed hopes may be traced in their sad and sweet complainings!'

² The quotation is from 'The Nightingale's Death-Song' 3–4: 'The rose, the glorious rose is gone, / And I, too, will depart.'

³ thus said the lovely song 'Bring Flowers' was one of the miscellaneous poems included in Hemans's Lays of Many Lands (1825).

Felicia Hemans

*From Fisher's Drawing Room Scrap-Book (1838)*¹

No more, no more, oh never more returning
Will thy beloved presence gladden earth;
No more wilt thou with sad, yet anxious, yearning
Cling to those hopes which have no mortal birth.
Thou art gone from us, and with thee departed 5
How many lovely things have vanished too;
Deep thoughts² that at thy will to being started,
And feelings, teaching us our own were true.
Thou hast been round us like a viewless spirit
Known only by the music on the air; 10
The leaf or flowers which thou hast named inherit
A beauty known but from thy breathing there,
For thou didst on them fling thy strong emotion,
The likeness from itself the fond heart gave,
As planets from afar look down on ocean 15
And give their own sweet image to the wave.³

And thou didst bring from foreign lands their treasures,⁴
As floats thy various melody along;
We know the softness of Italian measures,⁵
And the grave cadence of Castilian song. 20
A general bond of union is the poet,
By its immortal verse is language known,
And for the sake of song do others know it –
One glorious poet makes the world his own.
And thou, how far thy gentle sway extended – 25

The heart's sweet empire over land and sea;
Many a stranger and far flower was blended
In the soft wreath that glory bound for thee.
The echoes of the Susquehanna's waters
Paused in the pine-woods, words of thine to hear,⁶ 30
And to the wide Atlantic's younger daughters⁷
Thy name was lovely and thy song was dear.
Was not this purchased all too dearly? – never
Can fame atone for all that fame hath cost.
We see the goal but know not the endeavour,⁸ 35
Nor what fond hopes have on the way been lost.
What do we know of the unquiet pillow
By the worn cheek and tearful eyelid pressed,
When thoughts chase thoughts like the tumultuous billow
Whose very light and foam reveals unrest? 40
We say the song is sorrowful, but know not
What may have left that sorrow on the song;
However mournful words may be, they show not
The whole extent of wretchedness and wrong.
They cannot paint the long sad hours passed only 45
In vain regrets o'er what we feel we are.⁹
Alas, the kingdom of the lute is lonely –
Cold is the worship coming from afar.
Yet what is mind in woman but revealing
In sweet clear light the hidden world below, 50
By quicker fancies and a keener feeling
Than those around, the cold and careless, know?
What is to feed such feeling, but to culture¹⁰
A soil whence pain will never more depart?
The fable of Prometheus and the vulture¹¹ 55
Reveals the poet's and the woman's heart.
Unkindly are they judged, unkindly treated

By careless tongues and by ungenerous words,¹²
While cruel sneer and hard reproach repeated
Jar the fine music of the spirit's chords. 60

Wert thou not weary, thou whose soothing numbers¹³
Gave other lips the joy thine own had not?
Didst thou not welcome thankfully the slumbers
Which closed around thy mourning human lot?

What on this earth could answer thy requiring, 65
For earnest faith – for love, the deep and true,
The beautiful, which was thy soul's desiring,
But only from thyself its being drew!

How is the warm and loving heart requited
In this harsh world, where it awhile must dwell; 70
Its best affections wronged, betrayed and slighted –
Such is the doom of those who love too well.

Better the weary dove should close its pinion,
Fold up its golden wings and be at peace;
Enter, oh ladye, that serene dominion 75
Where earthly cares and earthly sorrows cease.
Fame's troubled hour has cleared, and now replying,
A thousand hearts their music ask of thine;
Sleep with a light, the lovely and undying,
Around thy grave – a grave which is a shrine. 80

Felicia Hemans

² Deep thoughts possibly an echo of Wordsworth's 'Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears' (Ode 206).

3 The leaf or flowers...to the wave Felicia Hemans conferred beauty on the natural world through her emotional portrayal of it, just as the stars, by their reflection, beautify the sea.

4 Hemans produced a volume of translations, Translations from Camoens, and Other Poets, with Original Poetry (1818), and experimented with foreign metres, subjects and verse forms, in Lays of Many Lands (1826).

5 measures metres.

6 Landon alludes to Hemans's popularity with American readers. Collected editions of her poetry appeared there before publication in England.

7 the wide Atlantic's younger daughters American women.

8 endeavour effort, pains.

9 what we feel we are perhaps an echo of Wordsworth, Duddon Afterthought 14: 'We feel that we are greater than we know.'

10 culture cultivate.

11 The fable of Prometheus and the vulture apparently a reference to the story of how Jupiter nailed Prometheus to a rock where, for 3,000 years, an eagle incessantly devoured his liver. Hercules finally freed him and killed the bird. Landon means that woman's fate is, like Prometheus, forever to have her passions exposed and tormented.

12 By careless tongues and by ungenerous words Landon certainly experienced this in the wake of her scandalous associations with William Maginn and Daniel Maclise (see headnote).

13 numbers poetry.

Scenes in London: Piccadilly

From The Works of L. E. Landon (Philadelphia, 1838)

The sun is on the crowded street,
It kindles those old towers
Where England's noblest memories meet
Of old historic hours.

Vast, shadowy, dark and indistinct, 5
Tradition's giant fane
Whereto a thousand years are linked
In one electric chain.

So stands it when the morning light
First steals upon the skies, 10
And shadowed by the fallen night
The sleeping city lies.

It stands with darkness round it cast,
Touched by the first cold shine;
Vast, vague, and mighty as the past 15
Of which it is the shrine.

'Tis lovely when the moonlight falls
Around the sculptured stone,
Giving a softness to the walls
Like love that mourns the gone. 20

Then comes the gentlest influence
The human heart can know,
The mourning over those gone hence
To the still dust below.

The smoke, the noise, the dust of day 25
Have vanished from the scene;

The pale lamps¹ gleam with spirit ray
O'er the park's sweeping green.

Sad shining on her lonely path,
The moon's calm smile above 30
Seems as it lulled life's toil and wrath
With universal love.

Past that still hour, and its pale moon,
The city is alive;
It is the busy hour of noon 35
When man must seek and strive.

The pressure of our actual life
Is on the waking brow;
Labour and care, endurance, strife,
These are around him now. 40

How wonderful the common street,
Its tumult and its throng,
The hurrying of the thousand feet
That bear life's cares along.

How strongly is the present felt 45
With such a scene beside;
All sounds in one vast murmur melt
The thunder of the tide.

All hurry on – none pause to look
Upon another's face; 50
The present is an open book
None read, yet all must trace.

The poor man hurries on his race,
His daily bread to find;
The rich man has yet wearier chase, 55
For pleasure's hard to bind.²

All hurry, though it is to pass
For which they live so fast –
What doth the present but amass
The wealth that makes the past? 60

The past is round us, those old spires
That glimmer o'er our head;
Not from the present are their fires,
Their light is from the dead.

But for the past, the present's powers 65
Were waste of toil and mind,
But for those long and glorious hours
Which leave themselves behind.

Scenes in London: Piccadilly

¹ lamps Gas lighting was commonly used to illuminate public places by 1820.

² bind retain, keep.

The Princess Victoria¹

From The Works of L. E. Landon (Philadelphia, 1838)

A fair young face o'er which is only cast
The delicate hues of spring,
Though round her is the presence of the past,
And the stern future gathers darkly fast;
As yet no heavy shadow loads their wing. 5

A little while hast thou to be a child,
Thy lot is all too high;

Thy face is very fair, thine eyes are mild,
But duties on thine arduous path are piled –
A nation's hopes and fears blend with thy destiny. 10

Change is upon thy world – it may be thine
To soothe its troubled way,
To make thy throne a beacon and a shrine
Whence knowledge, power, and liberty may shine,
As yet they have not shone on mortal day. 15

There is much misery on this worn earth,
But much that may be spared;
Of great and generous thought there is no dearth,
And highest hopes of late have had their birth,
Hopes for the many, what the few have shared.² 20

The wind that bears our flag³ from soil to soil
Teaches us as it flies;
It carries in its breath a summer spoil,⁴
And seeds spring up to stimulate man's toil –
So should our mind spread round its rich supplies. 25

Thou royal child, the future is thine own,
May it be blessed in thee!
May peace that smiles on all be round thy throne,
And universal truth, whose light alone
Gives golden records unto history. 30

The Princess Victoria

¹ Princess Victoria (1819–1901) became Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, 1837–1901. By 1837 the monarchy had been brought into disrepute; her reign was to restore its dignity, and may even have saved the institution of the monarchy from oblivion.

² And highest hopes...have shared A reference to the reforms of the 1830s, e.g. Factory Act (1833).

³ The wind that bears our flag Ships were the primary means of international trade.

⁴ spoil reward, booty; Landon is probably recalling Paradise Lost iv 156–8: ‘now gentle gales dispense / Native perfumes, and whisper whence they stole / Those balmy spoils.’

On Wordsworth's Cottage, near Grasmere Lake

From The Zenana, and Minor Poems of L.E.L. (1839)

Not for the glory on their heads
Those stately hilltops wear,
Although the summer sunset sheds
Its constant crimson there;
Not for the gleaming lights that break 5
The purple of the twilight lake,
Half dusky and half fair,
Does that sweet valley seem to be
A sacred place on earth to me.

The influence of a moral spell 10
Is found around the scene,
Giving new shadows to the dell,
New verdure to the green.
With every mountain-top is wrought
The presence of associate thought, 15
A music that has been;

Calling that loveliness to life,
With which the inward world is rife.

His home, our English poet's home,
Amid these hills is made; 20
Here with the morning hath he come,
There, with the night delayed.
On all things is his memory cast,
For every place wherein he passed
Is with his mind arrayed – 25
That, wandering in a summer hour,
Asked wisdom of the leaf and flower.

Great poet, if I dare to throw
My homage at thy feet,
'Tis thankfulness for hours which thou 30
Hast made serene and sweet;
As wayfarers have incense thrown
Upon some mighty altar-stone
Unworthy, and yet meet –
The human spirit longs to prove 35
The truth of its uplooking love.

Until thy hand unlocked its store,
What glorious music slept!
Music that can be hushed no more
Was from our knowledge kept. 40

But the great Mother¹ gave to thee
The poet's universal key,
And forth the fountains swept –
A gushing melody for ever,
The witness of thy high endeavour. 45

Rough is the road which we are sent,
Rough with long toil and pain;
And when upon the steep ascent,
A little way we gain,

Vexed with our own perpetual care, 50
Little we heed what sweet things are
 Around our pathway blent;
With anxious steps we hurry on,
The very sense of pleasure gone.

But thou dost in this feverish dream 55
 Awake a better mood,
With voices from the mountain stream,
 With voices from the wood.
And with their music dost impart
Their freshness to the world-worn heart, 60
 Whose fever is subdued
By memories sweet with other years,
By gentle hopes, and soothing tears.

A solemn creed is thine, and high,
 Yet simple as a child, 65
Who looketh hopeful to yon sky
 With eyes yet undefiled
By all the glitter and the glare
This life's deceits and follies wear,
 Exalted, and yet mild, 70
Conscious of those diviner powers
Brought from a better world than ours.

Thou hast not chosen to rehearse
 The old heroic themes;
Thou hast not given to thy verse 75
 The heart's impassioned dreams.
Forth flows thy song as waters flow,
So bright above – so calm below,
 Wherein the heaven seems
Eternal as the golden shade 80
Its sunshine on the stream hath laid.

The glory which thy spirit hath
 Is round life's common things,

And flingeth round our common path,
As from an angel's wings, 85
A light that is not of our sphere,
Yet lovelier for being here,
Beneath whose presence springs
A beauty never marked before,
Yet once known, vanishing no more. 90

How often with the present sad,
And weary with the past,
A sunny respite have we had,
By but a chance look cast
Upon some word of thine that made 95
The sullenness forsake the shade,
Till shade itself was past:
For hope divine, serene and strong,
Perpetual lives within thy song.

Eternal as the hills thy name, 100
Eternal as thy strain;
So long as ministers of fame
Shall love and hope remain.
The crowded city in its streets,
The valley, in its green retreats, 105
Alike thy words retain.
What need hast thou of sculptured stone?
Thy temple is thy name alone.

The Poet's Lot

From Life and Literary Remains of L.E.L. (1841)

The poet's lovely faith creates
The beauty he believes;
The light which on his footsteps waits,
He from himself receives.

His lot may be a weary lot, 5
His thrall a heavy thrall,
And cares and griefs the crowd know not,
His heart may know them all.

But still he hath a mighty dower,
The loveliness that throws 10
Over the common thought and hour
The beauty of the rose.¹

Notes

¹ There seems to be a general reminiscence of Wordsworth's Ode, and perhaps an echo of ll. 10–11: 'The rainbow comes and goes / And lovely is the rose.'

Death in the Flower

From Life and Literary Remains of L.E.L. (1841)

'Tis a fair tree, the almond tree; there spring¹
Shows the first promise of her rosy wreath,
Or ere the green leaves venture from the bud,
Those fragile blossoms light the winter bough
With delicate colours heralding the rose, 5
Whose own aurora² they might seem to be.
What lurks beneath their faint and lovely red?
What the dark spirit in those fairy flowers?
'Tis death!

The Poet's Lot

¹ The almond tree flowers in April.

² aurora dawn.

Experience Too Late

From Life and Literary Remains of L.E.L. (1841)

It is the past that maketh my despair;
The dark, the sad, the irrevocable past.
Alas, why should our lot in life be made
Before we know that life? Experience comes,
But comes too late. If I could now recall¹ 5
All that I now regret, how different
Would be my choice – at best a choice of ill,
But better than my miserable past.
Loathed yet despised, why must I think of it?

Death in the Flower

¹ recall bring back, as at Paradise Lost ix 926: 'But past who can recall, or done, undo?'

The Farewell

From Life and Literary Remains of L.E.L. (1841)

Farewell,
Shadows and scenes that have, for many hours,
Been my companions; I part from ye like friends –

Dear and familiar ones – with deep sad thoughts,
And hopes, almost misgivings! 5

Elizabeth Barrett Browning (1806–1861)

Elizabeth Barrett was the eldest of eleven children born to Edward and Mary Moulton Barrett, at Coxhoe Hall, Durham, 6 March 1806. As a child, she was a precocious scholar, sharing her brother's lessons and overtaking him in Greek and Latin. She later taught herself Hebrew. An illness in her teens (still not adequately explained) left her a semi-invalid for the rest of her life, and led to dependence on laudanum.

She was composing poetry by 11, when she wrote The Battle of Marathon, privately printed three years later. Her first published poem appeared in a magazine when she was 15, and in 1826 she published a second volume, An Essay on Mind, with Other Poems. Prometheus Bound (1833) and The Seraphim, and Other Poems (1838) were fairly well received and led to a volume of collected poems in 1844. Her courtship with Robert Browning began a year later, and they married clandestinely, against her father's wishes, on 12 September 1845. A week later they eloped to Italy.

For most of her life she remained there, returning to London for occasional visits. Her major poetical works are Casa Guidi Windows (1851) and Aurora Leigh (1857). She died in Florence on 29 June 1861, and was buried in the Protestant Cemetery in Florence.

Although Barrett's most important work marks her as Victorian, she grew up a Romantic. One of her earliest idols was Byron, and as a teenager she enjoyed dressing as his page, perhaps having heard of Lady Caroline Lamb's antics (see p. 866). Her 'Stanzas on the Death of Lord Byron', among her earliest published poems, shows a deft control of the Spenserian stanza, the essentially slow tempo of which was suited to elegy (more so, perhaps, than to Childe Harold's Pilgrimage). It can be read as a farewell to Romanticism itself. Another elegy, 'Stanzas Addressed to Miss Landon', responds to Landon's lament for Felicia Hemans, advising her to take comfort from Christian consolation. It is underpinned in part by Barrett's reservations about Landon's verse; as she told Lady Margaret Cocks on 9 December 1835, Landon 'is deficient in energy and condensation, as well as in variety.... There is a vividness and a naturalness, both in the ideas and the expression of them – yes! And a pathos too! She is like a bird of few notes.

They are few – but nature gave them!' ¹ Barrett's concerns are sharply focused in the elegy she composed a year later for Landon, 'L.E.L.'s Last Question', which deals with Landon's mysterious death, apparently by prussic acid poisoning. Barrett's best work was yet to come, but her originality and unique abilities are evident in these early writings.

Stanzas on the Death of Lord Byron
(composed shortly after 14 May 1824)

From The Globe and Traveller No. 6733 (30 June 1824)

*λέγε πάσιν ἀπώλετο.*¹

*I am not what I have been.*²

He was, and is not! Graecia's trembling shore,
Sighing through all her palmy groves, shall tell
That Harold's pilgrimage at last is o'er;
Mute the impassioned tongue, and tuneful shell,
That erst was wont in noblest strains to swell! 5
Hushed the proud shouts that rode th' Aegean wave,
For lo! the great deliv'rer breathes farewell!
Gives to the world his mem'ry, and a grave –
And dies amidst the land he lived and fought to save!

Mourn, Hellas,³ mourn! and o'er thy widowed brow, 10
For aye the cypress wreath of sorrow twine;
And in thy new-formed beauty, desolate, throw
The fresh-culled flowers on his sepulchral shrine.
Yes, let that heart, whose fervour was all thine,
In consecrated urn lamented be! 15
That generous heart whose genius thrilled divine
Hath spent its last most glorious throb for thee –
Then sank amidst the storm that made thy children free.

Britannia's poet, Graecia's hero, sleeps!
And Freedom, bending o'er the breathless clay, 20
Lifts up her voice, and in her wildness weeps!
For us, a night hath clouded o'er our day
And hushed the lips that breathed our fairest lay.
Alas! and must the British lyre resound

A requiem, while the spirit wings away 25
Of him who on her strings such music found,
And taught her startling chords to breathe so sweet a sound?

The theme grows sadder – and my soul shall find
A language in these tears. No more, no more!
Soon, midst the shrieking of the tossing wind, 30

The ‘dark blue depths’⁴ he sang of shall have bore
Our all of Byron to his native shore!⁵
His grave is thick with voices, murm’ring here
The awful tale of greatness swiftly o’er;
But mem’ry strives with death and, ling’ring near, 35
Shall consecrate the dust of Harold’s lonely bier!

Stanzas Addressed to Miss Landon, and suggested by her ‘Stanzas on the Death of Mrs Hemans’ (signed ‘B.’)¹

From New Monthly Magazine (1835)

Thou bay-crowned living one,² who o'er
The bay-crowned dead³ art bowing,
And o'er the shadeless, moveless brow
Thy human shadow throwing;
And o'er the sighless, songless lips 5
The wail and music wedding,
Dropping o'er the tranquil eyes
Tears not of their shedding⁴ –

Go take thy music from the dead,
Whose silentness is sweeter; 10
Reserve thy tears for living brows,
For whom such tears are meeter;
And leave the violets in the grass
To brighten where thou treadest –
No flowers for her – oh, bring no flowers, 15
Albeit 'Bring flowers',⁵ thou saidest.

But bring not near her solemn corse
A type of human seeming;
Lay only dust's stern verity
Upon her dust undreaming. 20
And while the calm perpetual stars
Shall look upon it solely,
Her sphered soul shall look on them
With eyes more bright and holy.

Nor mourn, oh living one, because 25
Her part in life was mourning:
Would she have lost the poet's flame
For anguish of the burning?
The minstrel harp, for the strained string?
The tripod,⁶ for th' afflated⁷ 30
Woe? Or the vision, for those tears
Through which it shone dilated?

Perhaps she shuddered while the world's
Cold hand her brow was wreathing,
But wronged she ne'er that mystic breath 35
Which breathed in all her breathing;
Which drew from rocky earth and man
Abstractions high and moving –
Beauty, if not the beautiful,
And love, if not the loving. 40

Such visionings have paled in sight
The Saviour she descrieth,
And little recks who wreathed the brow
That on His bosom lieth.
The whiteness of His innocence 45
O'er all her garments flowing –
There learneth she that sweet 'new song'
She will not mourn in knowing.

Be blessed, crowned and living one,
And when thy dust decayeth, 50
May thine own England say for thee
What now for her it sayeth –
'Albeit softly in our ears
Her silver song was ringing,
The footsteps of her parting soul 55
Were softer than her singing.'

Stanzas Addressed to Miss Landon, and suggested

¹ In a letter to Mary Russell Mitford of 23 November 1842, Barrett wrote of Hemans: 'I admire her genius, love her memory, respect her piety and high moral tone. But she always does seem to me a lady rather than a woman, and so, much rather than a poetess – her refinement, like the prisoner's iron, enters into her soul. She is polished all over to one smoothness and one level, and is monotonous in her best qualities' (Felicia Hemans ed. Susan J. Wolfson (Princeton, 2000), p. 590).

L.E.L.’s Last Question

From The Athenaeum (26 January 1839)

‘Do you think of me as I think of you,
My friends, my friends?’¹ She said it from the sea,
The English minstrel in her minstrelsy,
While under brighter skies than erst she knew²
Her heart grew dark, and gropèd as the blind, 5
To touch, across the waves, friends left behind –
‘Do you think of me as I think of you?’

It seemed not much to ask – ‘as I of you?’
We all do ask the same – no eyelids cover
Within the meekest eyes that question over; 10
And little in this world the loving do
But sit (among the rocks?) and listen for
The echo of their own love evermore;
Do you think of me as I think of you?

Love-learned, she had sung of only love, 15
And as a child asleep (with weary head
Dropped on the fairy book he lately read),
Whatever household noises round him move,
Hears in his dream some elfin turbulence –
Even so, suggestive to her inward sense, 20
All sounds of life assumed one tune of love.

And when the glory of her dream withdrew,
When knightly gestes³ and courtly pageantries
Were broken in her visionary eyes
By tears, the solemn seas attested true – 25
Forgetting that sweet lute beside her hand,
She asked not, ‘Do you praise me, oh my land?’
But ‘Think ye of me, friends, as I of you?’

True heart to love, that poured many a year
Love’s oracles for England, smooth and well – 30
Would God thou hadst an inward oracle
In that lone moment, to confirm thee dear!
For when thy questioned friends in agony
Made passionate response, ‘We think of thee’,
Thy place was in the dust – too deep to hear! 35

Could she not wait to catch the answering breath?
Was she content with that drear ocean’s sound,
Dashing his mocking infinite around
The craver of a little love, beneath
Those stars, content – where last her song had gone? 40
They, mute and cold in radiant life, as soon
Their singer was to be, in darksome death!

Bring your vain answers, cry, ‘We think of thee!’
How think ye of her? In the long ago
Delights, or crowned by new bays? Not so; 45
None smile, and none are crowned where lyeth she,
With all her visions unfulfilled – save one,

Her childhood's, of the palm-trees in the sun:
And lo, their shadow on her sepulchre!

Do you think of me as I think of you? 50

Oh friends, oh kindred, oh dear brotherhood
Of the whole world, what are we that we should
For covenants of long affection sue?
Why press so near each other, when the touch
Is barred by graves? Not much, and yet too much, 55
This 'Think upon me as I think of you.'
But while on mortal lips I shape anew
A sigh to mortal issues, verily
Above th' unshaken stars that see us die,
A vocal pathos rolls – and He who drew 60
All life from dust, and for all tasted death,
By death, and life, and love appealing, saith,
'Do you think of me as I think of you?'

L.E.L.'s Last Question

¹ Barrett's sister, Arabella, explained to Hugh Stuart Boyd on 28 January 1839: 'I daresay you heard of Miss Landon's last letter that she wrote to some friend in England, a day or two before her death ... the question upon which these lines are written were the last words of her letter.'

² under brighter skies...knew Landon died on the Gold Coast, where she resided with her husband, George Maclean, Governor of Cape Coast Castle.

³ gestes brave deeds.

Sonnet on Mr Haydon's Portrait of Mr Wordsworth¹

From The Athenaeum (29 October 1842)

Wordsworth upon Helvellyn! Let the cloud
Ebb audibly along the mountain wind,
Then break against the rock, and show behind
The lowland valleys floating up to crowd
The sense with beauty. He with forehead bowed 5
And humble-lidded eyes, as one inclined
Before the sovran thoughts of his own mind,
And very meek with inspirations proud,
Takes here his rightful place as poet-priest,
By the high altar, singing prayer and prayer 10
To the yet higher heav'ns. A vision free
And noble, Haydon, hath thine art released² –
No portrait this, with academic air!
This is the poet and his poetry.

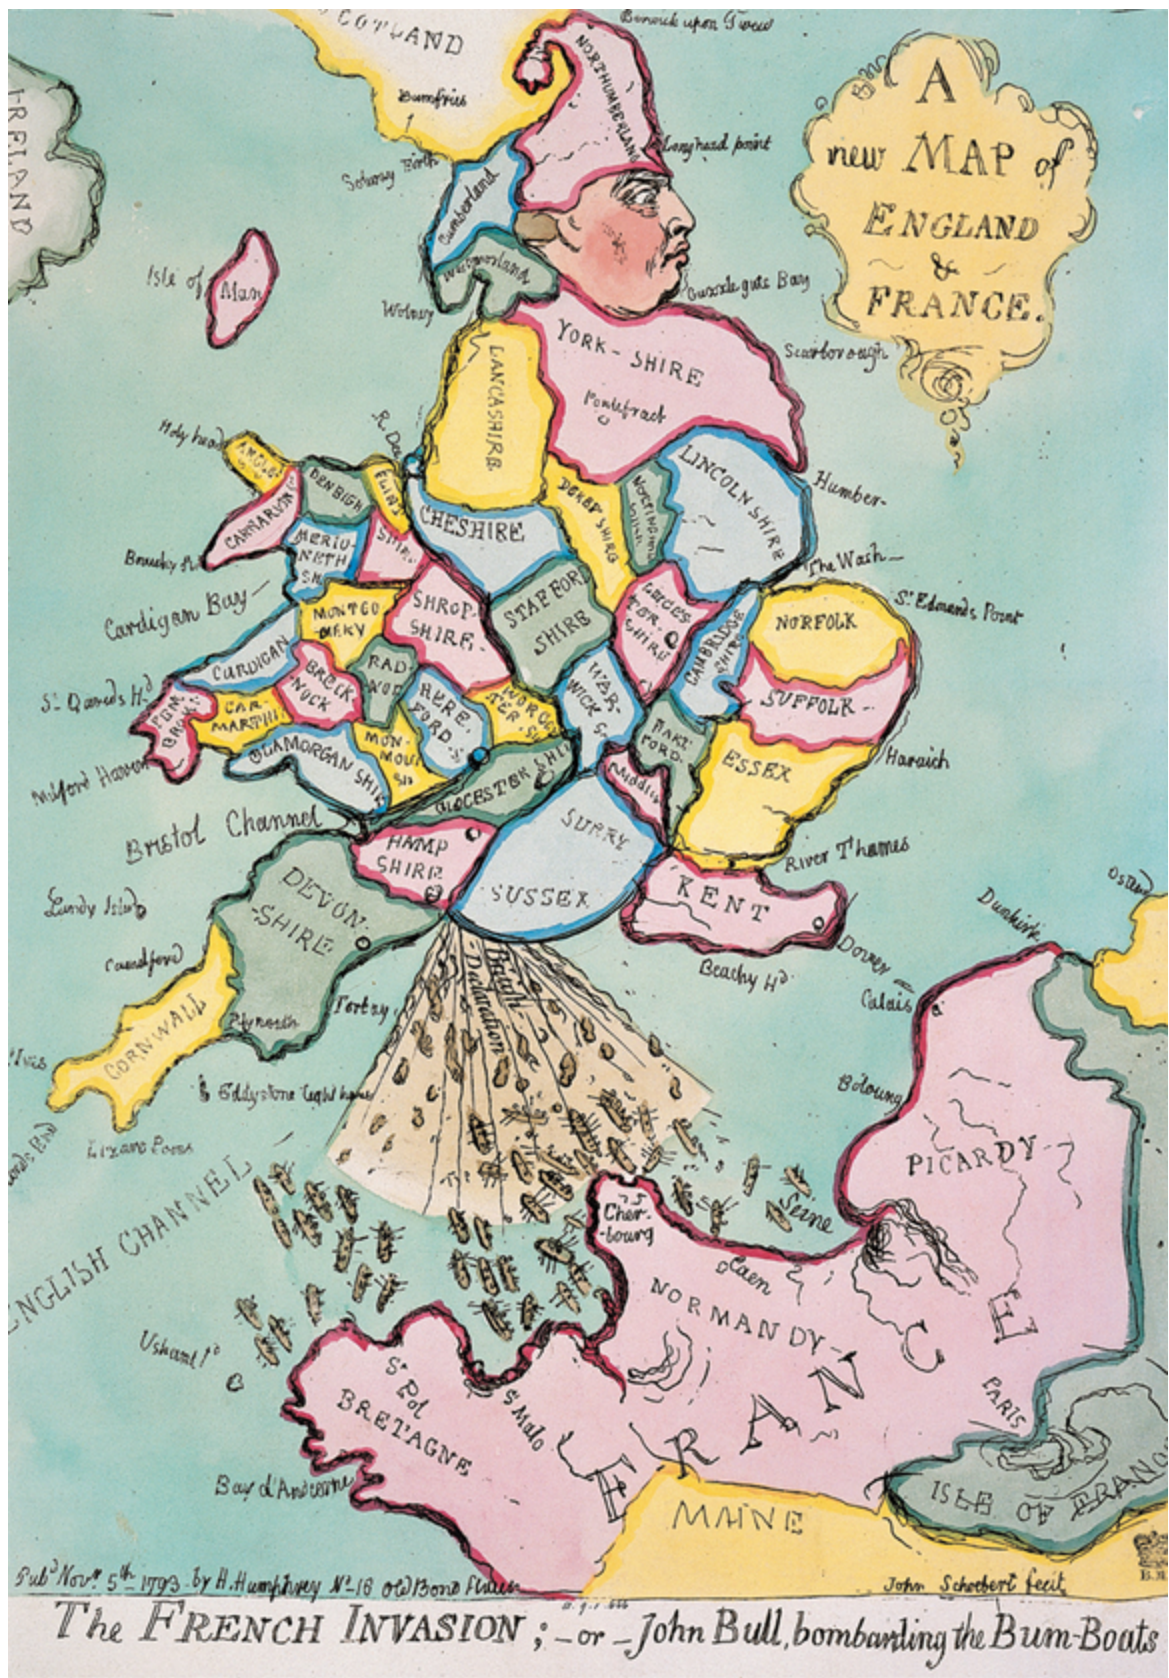

Sonnet on Mr Haydon's Portrait of Mr Wordsworth

¹ Haydon's painting, Wordsworth on Helvellyn, was completed in 1842 and is now at the National Gallery, London. It is reproduced by Gill, William Wordsworth: A Life (Oxford, 1989), Plate 17. Haydon and Barrett enjoyed a warm and friendly correspondence, but never met; they were brought together by a mutual admiration for Wordsworth.

² Haydon forwarded a copy of the sonnet to Wordsworth on 19 October 1842. In an appreciative letter to her of 26 October, Wordsworth suggested a revision to lines 11–12: 'By a vision free / And noble, Haydon, is thine art released' (LY iv 384–5).

Plate 1 The French Invasion; or John Bull bombarding the Bum-boats, hand-coloured etching by James Gillray, 5 November 1793. Britain goes to war in the shape of George III, defecating gunboats onto the French coastline. The image is a gross one that aptly encapsulates British defiance in the face of a threatened French invasion. (© Courtesy of the Warden and Scholars of New College, Oxford/The Bridgeman Art Library.)

Plate 2 The Blood of the Murdered Crying for Vengeance, hand-coloured etching by James Gillray, published 16 February 1793. Louis XVI had been guillotined in Paris on 21 January, precipitating what was effectively a world war that would continue until the final defeat of Napoleon in 1815. Gillray depicts the King, seconds after his head has been severed; his blood rises heavenwards bearing imagined lamentations of him. (© Courtesy of the Warden and Scholars of New College, Oxford/The Bridgeman Art Library.)

Plate 3 The Chelsea Pensioners reading the Waterloo Dispatch, oil on wood, by Sir David Wilkie (1785–1841). A sensation at the Royal Academy in 1822, Wilkie's masterpiece shows army veterans at a pub near the Chelsea Royal Hospital, receiving news of Wellington's victory at Waterloo. At the focal point of the picture, a man reads the Waterloo gazette aloud to his friends. The image would exercise a powerful influence on other artists, including Géricault, who saw it in Wilkie's studio. (Apsley House, The Wellington Museum, London/The Bridgeman Art Library.)

Plate 4 William Cowper (1731–1800) painted by George Romney, 1792. Cowper was 61 when this was painted; it inspired a complimentary sonnet from the sitter to the artist. (© National Portrait Gallery, London.)

Plate 5 William Blake (1757–1827) painted by Thomas Phillips, 1807. While sitting for this portrait, Blake told Phillips of a visiting angel who claimed to have been painted by Michelangelo, perhaps accounting for the rapt expression on his face. (© National Portrait Gallery, London.)

Plate 6 'The Sick Rose' from Blake's Songs of Experience. A caterpillar feeds on a leaf, while a worm enters the heart of a rosebud. (King's College Library. By permission of the Provost and Scholars of King's College, Cambridge.)

The SICK ROSE

O Rose thou art sick.
The invisible worm,
That flies in the night,
In the howling storm:
Has found out thy bed
Of crimson joy:
And his dark secret love
Does thy life destroy.

Plate 7 'The Lamb' from Blake's Songs of Innocence. 'The Lamb' and 'The Tyger' are regarded as companion poems. In this illustration, the child converses with the lamb in front of a cottage and a spreading oak tree. (Courtesy of the Library of Congress, Rosenwald Collection.)

Plate 8 'The Tyger' from Blake's Songs of Experience. 'Did he who made the lamb make thee?' Critics note that Blake's illustrated tiger appears less threatening than the one evoked by the poem. (Etching, ink and w/c by William Blake; Fitzwilliam Museum, University of Cambridge/The Bridgeman Art Library.)

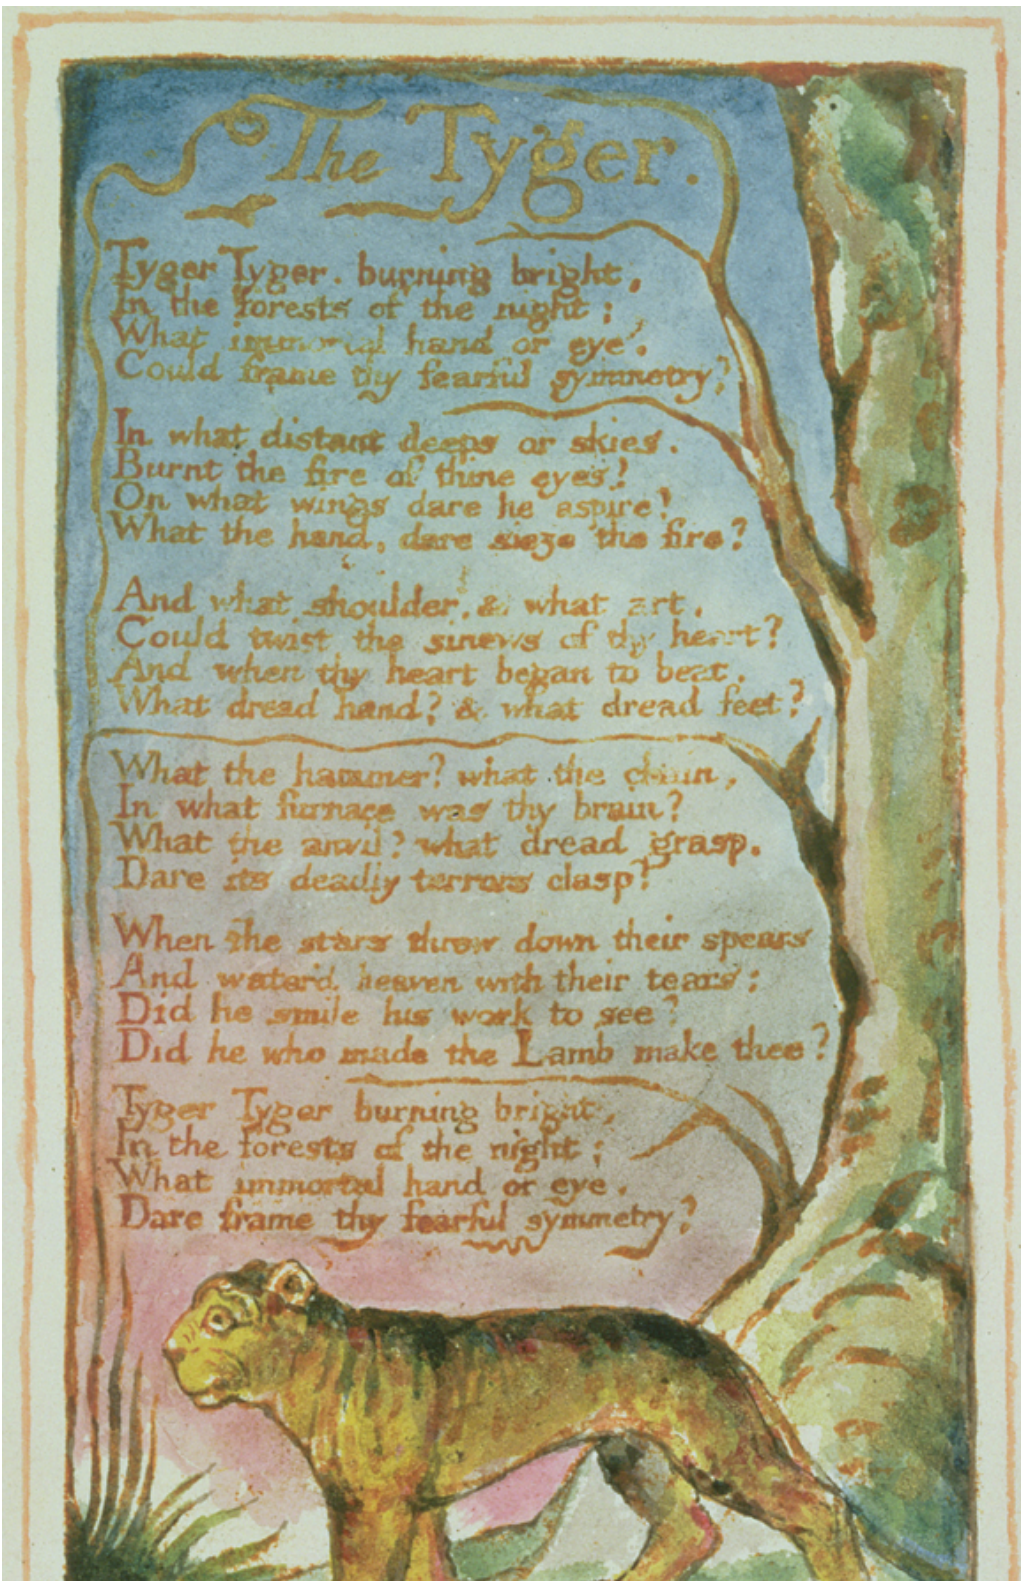

Plate 9 Mary Wollstonecraft (1759–97) by an unknown artist, 1791. The ‘Amazon’ portrait, painted when its sitter was 32, just before she wrote A Vindication of the Rights of Woman. (Courtesy National Museums Liverpool.)

Plate 10 The Inside of Tintern Abbey, by J. M. W. Turner, 1794. A view of the crossing, chancel and east window of the abbey, seen from the nave. Although Wordsworth visited the ruins in July 1798, his poem was written ‘a few miles above’ it – that is to say, further up the Wye Valley. (Ashmolean Museum, University of Oxford.)

Plate 12 Charles Lamb (1775–1834), dressed in the manner of Velazquez's Philip IV, by William Hazlitt, 1804. One of Hazlitt's last works before he gave up painting, this portrait shows Lamb dressed as Velazquez's Philip IV. For Henry Crabb Robinson, who was a friend of both men, it was 'certainly the only painting by Hazlitt that I ever saw with pleasure'. (© National Portrait Gallery, London.)

Plate 13 William Hazlitt (1778–1830) by William Hazlitt, 1802. Hazlitt is at his most intensely self-analytical in this self-portrait made when he was 23, still hoping to become an artist. (Maidstone Museum and Art Gallery/The Bridgeman Art Library.)

Plate 14 George Gordon, 6th Lord Byron (1788–1824) by Thomas Phillips, 1835 (after an original of 1813). Byron in the costume he acquired in Albania in 1809, in a portrait he commissioned. ‘I have some very “magnifique” Albanian dresses,’ he told his mother in November 1809, ‘the only expensive articles in this country.’ The original, fuller-length portrait is now in the British Embassy in Athens. (© National Portrait Gallery, London.)

Plate 15 The Finding of Don Juan by Haidée, by Ford Madox Brown, 1873. Scenes from Byron's poems provided artists throughout the nineteenth century with provocative subject-matter. (Birmingham Museums and Art Gallery.)

Plate 16 Percy Bysshe Shelley (1792–1822) by Joseph Severn. This painting, entitled Shelley at the Baths of Caracalla and made after Shelley's death by Keats's friend, Joseph Severn, shows the poet at the Baths of Caracalla in Rome, where he composed much of Prometheus Unbound. (Keats–Shelley Memorial Association, Rome.)

Plate 17 Shelley's Funeral Rites (16 August 1822), as imagined by Louis-Edouard Fournier. The figures watching Shelley's funeral pyre are, from the left, Trelawny, Leigh Hunt and Byron. The heart, as Trelawny recorded, 'would not take the flame', and it was preserved by him along with the ashes and some unconsumed bones. Leigh Hunt was given the heart, and the remainder buried in a tomb designed by Trelawny in the Protestant Cemetery in Rome, having been stored for several months in a mahogany chest in the British Consul's wine-cellar. (Courtesy National Museums Liverpool.)

Plate 18 John Clare (1793–1864) by William Hilton, 1820. This portrait was probably commissioned by Clare’s publisher, John Taylor, at the height of the poet’s success, shortly after publication of his Poems Descriptive of Rural Life and Scenery. (© National Portrait Gallery, London.)

Plate 19 John Keats (1795–1821) by Benjamin Robert Haydon, signed and dated ‘Nov 1816 BRH’. Keats and Haydon became close friends in 1816, having been introduced by Charles Cowden Clarke. At the bottom of the page Haydon has written: ‘Keats was a spirit that in passing over the Earth came within its attraction and expired in fruitless struggles to make its dull inhabitants comprehend the beauty of its soarings –’ (© National Portrait Gallery, London.)

Index of First Lines

A fair young face o'er which is only cast
A flower was offered to me
A green and silent spot amid the hills!
A knot of military officers
A little black thing among the snow
A mournful gift is mine, oh friends
A simple child, dear brother Jim
A slumber did my spirit seal
A thing of beauty is a joy for ever:
A trader I am to the African shore
A youth rode forth from his childhood's home
Accept, Boscawen, these unpolished lays
Again the wood, and long withdrawing vale
Ah, hills beloved! – where once, an happy child
Ah, sunflower! weary of time
Ah! what a weary race my feet have run
Ah, why will Mem'ry with officious care
All the night in woe
Along the starlit Seine went music swelling
Among that band of officers was one
An old, mad, blind, despised, and dying king
And did those feet in ancient time
And has the remnant of my life
And now when sheering of the flocks are done
And this place our forefathers made for man!
And thou art dead, as young and fair
Ariel to Miranda – Take
Art thou then desolate?
As I lay asleep in Italy

As one who after long and far-spent years
At times like these the princess tried to shun
Away, away – it is the air
Be the proud Thames of trade the busy mart!
Before I see another day
Behold her, single in the field
Blessed is yon shepherd on the turf reclined
Bob Southey! You're a poet – Poet Laureate
Breathes there the man, with soul so dead
Bright star, would I were steadfast as thou art –
Bring flowers to crown the cup and lute
Bristol, thine heart hath throbb'd to glory: slaves
By Derwent's side my father's cottage stood
Can I see another's woe
Cease, Wilberforce, to urge thy generous aim –
Charmed by thy suffrage shall I yet aspire 102 Children of the future Age
Come, balmy sleep, tired nature's soft resort
Come each maiden lend an ear
Cruelty has a Human Heart
Day of my double birth! who gave me first
Dear Mother, dear Mother, the Church is cold
Dear native brook, wild streamlet of the west!
Dear object of defeated care!
Deep in the shady sadness of a vale
Do you think of me as I think of you
Down a broad river of the western wilds
Drear cell, along whose lonely bounds
Earth has not any thing to show more fair:
Earth, ocean, air, beloved brotherhood!
Earth raised up her head
Elia, thy reveries and visioned themes
Enslaved, the Daughters of Albion weep: a trembling lamentation
Ere I had known the world and understood

Ere on my bed my limbs I lay, (1816)
Fair Isabel, poor simple Isabel!
Fanatics have their dreams, wherewith they weave
Fare thee well! and if for ever –
Farewell, my lute, and would that I
Farewell, shadows and scenes that have, for many hours
Father, father, where are you going?
Fear! I'm a Greek, and how should I fear death?
Five years have passed; five summers, with the length
For me the muse a simple band designed
For one short week I leave, with anxious heart
Genius of Burke! forgive the pen seduced
Go, cruel tyrant of the human breast
Go, rural naiad, wind thy stream along
Great men have been among us; hands that penned
Great spirits now on earth are sojourning:
Green little vaulter in the sunny grass
Hail to thee, blithe spirit!
Hast thou a charm to stay the morning star
He stopped: it surely was a groan
He was, and is not! Graecia's trembling shore
Hear the voice of the Bard!
Her eyes are wild, her head is bare
Her hands were clasped, her dark eyes raised
Him had I seen the day before, alone
Hitherto in progress through this verse, my mind hath looked
How awful, how sublime this view
How calm, how quiet all! still, or at times
How rich the wave in front, impressed
How sweet is the Shepherd's sweet lot
I am a daughter of that land
I am – yet what I am, none cares or knows
I dreamt a Dream! What can it mean?

I grieved for Buonaparte, with a vain
I had a dream, which was not all a dream.
I have a boy of five years old
I have no name
I heard a thousand blended notes
I lay on that rock where the storms have their dwelling
I lost the love, of heaven above
I love to rise in a summer morn
I love to walk
I loved Theotormon
I met a traveller from an antique land
I never saw the man whom you describe.
I stood beside thy lowly grave
I stood on Brocken's sovran height, and saw
I thought of thee, my partner and my guide
I travelled among unknown men
I travelled through a land of men
I wander through each chartered street
I wandered lonely as a cloud
I want a hero – an uncommon want
I was angry with my friend
I was thy neighbour once, thou rugged pile!
I weep for Adonais – he is dead!
I went to the Garden of Love
If from the public way you turn your steps
If Heaven has into being deigned to call
If thou wert here, these tears were 'tears of light'!
If thou wouldst view fair Melrose aright
In distant countries I have been
In futurity
In one of these excursions, travelling then
In the sweet shire of Cardigan
In this chill morning of a wintry spring

In Xanadu did Kubla Khan (1816)
In Xannadù did Cubla Khan (1797)
Is this a holy thing to see
Is thy face like thy mother's, my fair child
It had pleased God to form poor Ned
It is a beauteous evening, calm and free
It is an ancient mariner
It is an ancyent marinere
It is the first mild day of March
It is the past that maketh my despair
It is with me, as erst with you
It seems a day, one of those heavenly days which cannot die
It stands where northern willows weep
It was a summer evening
It was the time when children bound to meet
Itchin, when I behold thy banks again
I've left my own old home of homes
Just when our drawing-rooms begin to blaze
Lift not the painted veil which those who live
Little Fly
Little Lamb who made thee?
Little trotty wagtail he went in the rain
Long time a child, and still a child, when years
Long wintry months are past; the moon that now
Look not thou on beauty's charming
Loose to the wind her golden tresses streamed
Love seeketh not Itself to please
Lover of swamps
Low was our pretty cot; our tallest rose
Make there my tomb, beneath the lime-tree's shade
Many a green isle needs must be
Merry Merry Sparrow
Midway the hill of science, after steep

Milton, thou shouldst be living at this hour
Monarch of Gods and Daemons, and all spirits
Mother and child, whose blending tears
Much have I travelled in the realms of gold
Muse of the south, whose soul-enchancing shell
Music, when soft voices die
My child, my child, thou leav'st me! I shall hear
My eyes make pictures, when they are shut:
My father confessor is strict and holy
My heart aches, and a drowsy numbness pains
My heart leaps up when I behold
My mother groaned! my father wept
My mother bore me in the southern wild
My pensive Sara, thy soft cheek reclined (Effusion XXXV)
My pensive Sara, thy soft cheek reclined (Eolian Harp)
My sister, my sweet sister – if a name
My soul was mantled with dark shadows born
Mystery of God! thou brave and beauteous world
Nay, traveller, rest! This lonely yew-tree stands
No cloud, no relic of the sunken day
No more, no more, oh never more returning
No, no, go not to Lethe, neither twist
Not a breath of air ruffles the bosom of this leafy glen.
Not for the glory on their heads
Not useless do I deem
Nought loves another as itself
Nymph of the rock, whose dauntless spirit braves
O could I be as I have been
Of smiles spontaneous, and mysterious fears
Of the primeval Priest's assumed power
Oh for a lodge in some vast wilderness
Oh friend! Oh teacher! God's great gift to me!
Oh friend, one feeling was there which belonged

Oh goddess! Hear these tuneless numbers, wrung
Oh golden-tongued Romance, with serene lute!
Oh Hope, thou soother sweet of human woes!
Oh listen while I sing to thee
Oh my love's like the red, red rose
Oh place me where the burning noon
Oh Rose thou art sick
Oh Sensibility! Thou busy nurse
Oh Solitude, to thy sequestered vale
Oh spirit land, thou land of dreams!
Oh spirit of the days gone by
Oh there is blessing in this gentle breeze
Oh thou, whose fancies from afar are brought
Oh thou, whose name too often is profaned
Oh what can ail thee, knight-at-arms
Oh what's the matter? What's the matter?
Oh wild west wind, thou breath of autumn's being
Oh ye who teach the ingenuous youth of nations –
Oh, young Lochinvar is come out of the west
Old Peter Grimes made fishing his employ
On man, on nature, and on human life
On some rude fragment of the rocky shore
On this blessed day may no dark cloud or shower
On thy grey bark, in witness of my flame
On thy stupendous summit, rock sublime
On thy wild banks, by frequent torrents worn
Once a dream did weave a shade
One dream of passion and of beauty more
One morn before me were three figures seen
Peaceful our valley, fair and green
Piping down the valleys wild
Pity would be no more
Poet of nature, thou hast wept to know

Poor melancholy bird, that all night long
Preceptress stern, that didst instruct me next –
Pressed with conflicting thoughts of love and fear
Queen of the silver bow, by thy pale beam
Rapt in the visionary theme
Rarely, and with reluctance, would I stoop
Return, blessed years, when not the jocund spring
Rintrah roars and shakes his fires in the burdened air
Rise, winds of night! Relentless tempests rise!
River that rollest by the ancient walls
Royal in splendour went down the day
Season of mists and mellow fruitfulness
She dwelt among th' untrodden ways
She knelt in prayer. A stream of sunset fell
She walks in beauty like the night
Short is perhaps our date of life
Should the lone wanderer, fainting on his way
Sighing I see yon little troop at play
Since all that beat about in Nature's range
Slow in the wintry morn, the struggling light
So we'll go no more a-roving
Sound the flute!
Spirit of Light, whose eye unfolds
Spring's dewy hand on this fair summit weaves
St. Agnes' Eve – ah, bitter chill it was!
Still the loud death drum, thundering from afar
Strange fits of passion I have known
Surprised by joy – impatient as the wind
Sweet dreams form a shade
Sweet poet of the woods, a long adieu!
Sweet spirit, sister of that orphan one
Sweet spring, while others hail thy op'ning flowers
Tell me no more, no more

That day we first beheld the summit of Mont Blanc, and grieved
That was a joyous day in Rheims of old
The awful shadow of some unseen Power
The badger grunting on his woodland track
The coffin, as I crossed the common lane
The champions had come from their fields of war
The daughters of Mne Seraphim led round their sunny flocks
The dew it trembles on the thorn
The everlasting universe of things
The frost performs its secret ministry (1798)
The frost performs its secret ministry (1834)
The garlands fade that spring so lately wove –
The glory of evening was spread through the west –
The lamp must be replenished, but even then
The little boy lost in the lonely fen
The little hedgerow birds
The maiden caught me in the wild
The modest Rose puts forth a thorn
The night-wind shook the tapestry round an ancient palace-room
The partial muse has, from my earliest hours
The poetry of earth is never dead:
The poet's lovely faith creates
The power that dwelleth in sweet sounds to waken
The serpent is shut out from Paradise –
The sky is overspread
The stately homes of England
The sun descending in the west
The Sun does arise
The sun is on the crowded street
The sun is warm, the sky is clear
The woods – oh, solemn are the boundless woods
The world is too much with us; late and soon
There have been poets that in verse display

There is a change – and I am poor
There is a thorn, it looks so old
There is an active principle alive
There is one cottage in our dale
There is one Mind, one omnipresent Mind
There often wanders one whom better days
There was a boy – ye knew him well, ye cliffs
There was a roaring in the wind all night
There was a time when meadow, grove, and stream
There went a warrior's funeral through the night
These chairs they have no words to utter
These tourists, Heaven preserve us, needs must live
They grew in beauty, side by side
Thine is a strain to read among the hills
This morn thy gallant bark, love
This was the time when all things tended fast
Thou art like night, oh sickness, deeply stilling
Thou bay-crowned living one, who o'er
Thou still unravished bride of quietness
Though the day of my destiny's over
Three years she grew in sun and shower
Through weeds and thorns, and matted underwood
Time may come when some dramatic story may afford
'Tis a fair tree, the almond tree; there spring
'Tis eight o'clock, a clear March night
'Tis passed! – the sultry tyrant of the south
'Tis the middle of night by the castle clock
'Tis time this heart should be unmoved
'Tis well you think me truly one of those
Titan! to whose immortal eyes
To Mercy, Pity, Peace and Love
Toussaint, the most unhappy man of men!
Towards thy bright beams I turn my swimming eyes

'Twas but a dream! I saw the stag leap free
'Twas in the mazes of a wood
'Twas on a Holy Thursday, their innocent faces clean
'Twas summer and the sun was mounted high
Tyger Tyger burning bright
Up, up, my friend, and clear your looks!
Upon a lonely desert beach
Upon a time, before the fairy broods
Was it for this that one, the fairest of all rivers, loved
We had a fellow-passenger who came
We have the myrtle's breath around us here
Wee, sleeket, cowran, tim'rous beastie
Well! if the bard was weather-wise who made (April 1802)
Well! if the bard was weather-wise who made (July 1802)
Well, they are gone; and here must I remain, (1797)
Well, they are gone; and here must I remain, (1834)
What crowd is this? What have we here? We must not pass it by
What wonder, Percy, that with jealous rage
What you are stepping westward?' 'Yea.'
Whate'er is Born of Mortal Birth
When I review the course that I have run
When chapman billies leave the street
When chill November's surly blast
When first, descending from the moorlands
When first I saw that dear abode
When I have fears that I may cease to be
When latest autumn spreads her evening veil
When my mother died I was very young
When on my bed my limbs I lay, (1803)
When passion's trance is overpast
When the green woods laugh with the voice of joy
When the voices of children are heard on the green 194
When we two parted

Where are they gone, the old familiar faces?
Where silent zephyrs sported with the dust
Where the green leaves exclude the summer beam
While briars an' woodbines budding green
Who has not waked to list the busy sounds
Why should I wish to hold in this low sphere
Why, William, on that old grey stone
Wildly and mournfully the Indian drum
Wilt thou go with me sweet maid
Wordsworth upon Helvellyn! Let the cloud
Wouldst thou then have me tempt the comic scene
Wyndham, 'tis not thy blood, though pure it runs
Ye clouds, that far above me float and pause
Ye vales and woods, fair scenes of happier hours!
Yes, injured woman, rise, assert thy right!
Yet, Percy, not for this, should he whose eye
Youth of delight come hither
