Introduction

I perceive that in Germany as well as in Italy there is a great struggle about what they call Classical and Romantic, terms which were not subjects of Classification in England – at least when I left it four or five years ago.

(Byron, in the rejected Dedication to Marino Faliero, dated 14 August 1820)

When Lyrical Ballads first appeared in 1798 the word ‘Romantic’ was no compliment. It meant ‘fanciful’, ‘light’, even ‘inconsequential’.¹ Wordsworth and Coleridge would have resisted its application; twenty years later, the new generation of writers would recognize it only as the counter in a debate conducted among European intellectuals, barely relevant to what they were doing. And that, after all, is the nature of theoretical discourse: even when conducted by practitioners, it may not bear greatly on the creative process.

Romance was originally a descriptive term, used to refer to the verse epics of Tasso and Ariosto. Eighteenth-century critics like Thomas Warton used it in relation to fiction, often European, and in that context Novalis applied it to German literature. The idea didn’t take flight until August Wilhelm Schlegel used it in a lecture course at Berlin, 1801–4, when he made the distinction mentioned by Byron. Romantic literature, he argued, appeared in the Middle Ages with the work of Dante, Petrarch and Boccaccio; in reaction to Classicism it was identified with progressive and Christian views. In another course of lectures in Vienna, 1808–9, he went further: Romanticism was ‘organic’ and ‘plastic’, as against the ‘mechanical’ tendencies of Classicism. By 1821, when Byron dedicated Marino Faliero to Goethe, the debate was in full flood: Schlegel’s ideas had been picked up and extrapolated by Madame de Staël, and in 1818 Stendhal became the first Frenchman to claim himself un romantique – for Shakespeare and against Racine; for Byron and against Boileau. Within a year Spanish and Portuguese critics too were wading in.²

Having originated in disagreement, and largely in the academe, the concept has remained fluid ever since, and although many definitions are suggested, none command universal agreement. In that respect Romanticism is distinct from movements formed by artists, which tend to be more coherent, at least to begin with. When the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood turned themselves into a school, they knew exactly how they wanted to challenge received notions about pictorial representation; the Imagists published a manifesto of sorts in Blast that presented an agreed line of attack. The British Romantic poets could not have done this. Blake, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Byron, Shelley and Keats never met in the same room and, had they done so, would probably have fallen out immediately.

One factor was the generation gap. Byron, Shelley and Keats might have enjoyed the company of Wordsworth as he was in his later twenties and early thirties, but by the time they reached artistic maturity – c.1816 for Shelley and Byron, 1819 for Keats – he was well into middle age, had accepted the job of Distributor of Stamps for Westmorland, and appeared to have abandoned the religious and political views of his youth. His support for the Tory Lord Lonsdale in the 1818 general election confirmed his allegiance to a conservatism they despised. So far as they were concerned, he had betrayed the promise of Tintern Abbey for a sinecure. All this makes it doubly unfortunate that they were unable to read The Prelude, unpublished till 1850, by which time they were dead. Had they done so, they would have seen him differently.

Byron caught up with the critical debate surrounding the concept of Romanticism in 1821, but Coleridge beat him to it by a year. In 1820 the sage of Highgate compiled a list of ‘Romantic’ writers in which the only English poets of the day were Southey, Scott and Byron.³ The oddity of this serves to underline the inbuilt resistance of the concept to satisfactory definition – something that guarantees its usefulness as a critical and pedagogical tool. Critics continue to adapt it to their various needs while teachers use it to make connections between sometimes disparate writers of the period.

The pre-eminence of Blake, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Keats, Byron and Shelley was largely the invention of the twentieth century, and is now superseded by a growing consensus that Charlotte Smith, Hannah More,

Anna Laetitia Barbauld, Helen Maria Williams, Felicia Dorothea Hemans and Letitia Landon be read alongside them. In this introduction, I want to address ways in which they might be considered part of a community for which the concept of Romanticism, however ill-defined, has meaning.

Romanticism: Culture and Society

The Romantic period has an immediacy which earlier ones tend to lack. This is because so many of our own values and preoccupations derive from it. It coincides with the moment at which Britain industrialized itself. Factories sprang up in towns and cities across the country, and the agrarian lives people had known for centuries stopped being taken for granted. Instead labourers began to move into conurbations, working long hours in close proximity to each other. This had a number of consequences, not least that they began to fight for their 'rights'. Today we take our rights for granted, forgetting the length of the intellectual journey working people had to make merely to understand they had such things. For many, something very similar to the feudal system of medieval times continued to dictate their place in society – though things were changing.

The process by which people were awakened to a sense of self-determination was global. It began with the American Revolution and continued with that in France. And the impact of those upheavals cannot be overstated. Whole populations began to question the legitimacy of hereditary monarchs whose right to rule had once been accepted without question. It was not surprising that struggles elsewhere to do away with monarchical government affected the British; in fact, the real surprise is their failure to take the same step – a grim testament to the determination with which their government stifled unrest. By the summer of 1817, it had in place a sophisticated network of spies practised in thwarting popular uprisings in Yorkshire, Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire. A favoured technique was for agents provocateurs to incite revolutionary activity, and for the government to execute its supporters.⁴

Revolution in America and France generated conflict because of the effect on international trade. By the time Wordsworth was in his mid-twenties, Britain was embroiled in nothing less than world war which, unlike those in the twentieth century, would last not for years but for decades. From 1793 to 1802, and then from 1803 until 1815, Britain grappled with France across the globe, often fighting single-handedly against a well-equipped and resourceful enemy who, for much of that time, had the advantage. On an island-bound people like the British, the constant threat of invasion over more than two decades was bound to have a powerful effect. Whatever one's sympathies with the ideals of the American and French Revolutions, it became difficult to express anything other than support for the national cause. Patriotic feeling in its most jingoistic form ran high, something vividly indicated by the caricatures of James Gillray. In The French Invasion; or John Bull bombarding the Bum-boats (1793), he depicts George III, transformed into a map of England and Wales, excreting onto a swarm of French gunboats. In this context the monarch's bowel movements become an emblem of British defiance – one that reveals both contempt for Europe and the centuries-old tendency to insularity. (See Plate 1.)

Then as now, the cost of war was exorbitant and, in order to pay its outstanding debts, the post-war government of Lord Liverpool had to levy higher taxes. On 14 June 1815, additional expenditure arising from Napoleon's escape from Elba and its consequences led Nicholas Vansittart, Chancellor of the Exchequer, to raise £79 million (roughly £3,330 million/US$6.1 billion today) through tax revenues. On 18 March 1816, the government was compelled to repeal income tax altogether, causing the burden disproportionately to fall upon the poor, in the form of duties on tobacco, beer, sugar and tea. This generated intense hardship at a time when jobs were scarce and pay was low.

International conflict, the threat of invasion by Napoleon, social and political discontent – the writers in this book lived with these things, and were shaped by them. To that extent, it is helpful to consider Barbauld, Wordsworth, Williams, Coleridge, Smith, Blake, Keats, Byron, Hemans and Shelley as war poets, surrounded by upheaval and conflict, and passionately engaged with it. That engagement was made possible by another important development: the rise of the media.

This period was the first in history in which the population could keep abreast of political developments through newsprint. Historians have long acknowledged that the French press played an important part in the Revolution, enjoying unprecedented freedom between the fall of the Bastille in July 1789 and that of the monarchy in August 1792.⁵ It was not for nothing that J. L. Carra and Antoine-Joseph Gorsas, both journalists, were among those guillotined by Robespierre. The inventions of the steam-press (by which The Times was produced from 1814 onwards) and the paper-making machine (in 1803) meant it was easier than ever to produce newspapers on an industrial scale. And from around 1810 the boom of the mail-coach, which travelled at the hitherto unimaginable speed of 12 miles per hour, enabled publishers to distribute on a nationwide scale. For the first time, it was possible for Coleridge in Keswick to receive the papers the day after publication before sending them on to Wordsworth in Grasmere;⁶ there is no sense in which those living in the provinces were cut off from world affairs.

Figure 1 Leigh Hunt's Examiner for 14 December 1817, showing the paper's motto which appeared on the front page of every issue: 'Party is the madness of many for the gain of a few'. That Sunday, Hunt wrote about press freedom, increasingly circumscribed by a government anxious about public hostility.

Nor was it only well-educated poets in the Lake District who kept up with the news: bulletins were now available to the poor and illiterate.

Cobbett sold his Political Register at a price that made it accessible to the labouring folk he addressed – twopence (34 pence/US$0.60 today), which led Tory critics to christen it ‘twopenny trash’.⁷ Groups of men would club together and buy a single copy, which would be read aloud. This is the subject of David Wilkie’s masterpiece, The Chelsea Pensioners Reading the Waterloo Dispatch,⁸ which portrays retired soldiers at a haunt near the Chelsea Royal Hospital, one of their number reading to them from the Waterloo gazette (see Plate 3). It’s difficult to imagine such a scene from an earlier time, but by 1822 it seemed so precisely to capture the historical moment that the painting was besieged when put on show, forcing the Royal Academy to place rails in front of it.

The new-found influence of the press was hard to control,⁹ but the government did its utmost to suppress unfavourable comment: Peter Finnerty was imprisoned in October 1797 for his report of the trial and execution of William Orr, which criticized Lord Castlereagh;¹⁰ Cobbett was imprisoned in June 1810 for having condemned the flogging of five English militia-men by German mercenaries; in 1813 John and Leigh Hunt were imprisoned for comments on the indulgent lifestyle of the Prince Regent in The Examiner (see p. 816). All of them received sentences of two years. It could have been worse. There were calls for even stiffer penalties such as transportation, not least from such erstwhile revolutionary sympathizers as Robert Southey, regular contributor to the Quarterly Review. In an article published in February 1817, less than a month prior to the suspension of habeas corpus, he asked:

Why is it that this convicted incendiary [Cobbett], and others of the same stamp, are permitted week after week to sow the seeds of rebellion, insulting the government, and defying the laws of the country? ... Men of this description, like other criminals, derive no lessons from experience. But it behoves the Government to do so, and curb sedition in time; lest it should be called upon to crush rebellion and to punish treason.¹¹ telling him that laws, however repressive, are ‘altogether nugatory while such manifestoes as those of Cobbett, Hone, and the Examiner, &c., are daily and weekly issued, fresh and fresh, and read aloud in every alehouse where the men are quartered, or where they meet together’.¹² This was supported by a typically convoluted letter by that other distinguished former revolutionary, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, who expressed his ‘support of those principles ... of the measures and means, which have at length secured the gratitude and reverence of the wise and good to your Lordship and your Lordship’s fellow-combatants in the long-agonizing contest’¹³ – by which he meant the government’s suppression of dissident opinion. This was not Coleridge at his best, in terms of either sentiment or eloquence, and Liverpool confessed that, despite the distinction of his correspondent, ‘I cannot well understand him.’¹⁴ The Prime Minister felt less threatened by the liberal press than did his correspondents, for he declined to take precisely the steps they urged. Cobbett, however, was taking no risks: believing that suspension of habeas corpus in March 1817 would curtail his freedom, and not relishing the prospect of another spell in prison, he fled to America where he remained for two years.

Not content with this public plea that liberal journalists be arrested when the suspension of habeas corpus allowed it, Southey took it upon himself to write a private memorandum to the Prime Minister, Lord Liverpool,

Time and again, newspaper and journal reports were the means by which authors in this volume learnt of developments at home and abroad: it was how Wordsworth kept up with events in France when he returned from Paris in late 1792, and how Shelley heard of the Peterloo Massacre in 1819. Not only that; many of these writers published their poems (some of which dealt with current events) in newspapers – including Barbauld, Robinson, Coleridge, Southey, Wordsworth, Seward, Williams, Keats and Shelley. Coleridge was invited to write for the Morning Chronicle in early July 1796, and possibly to edit it.¹⁵ In June 1794, avowing his disapproval ‘of monarchical and aristocratical governments’, Wordsworth proposed to his friend William Mathews that they co-edit a journal addressed to ‘the dispassionate advocates of liberty and discussion’.¹⁶ Not only were these writers shaped by their historical moment – they shaped it.

The most obvious evidence of the media’s effect on the populace was the new-found appetite for scandal. As is the case today, the press became particularly excited by stories in which sex and politics were intertwined.

Mary Anne Clarke hit the headlines in early 1809 when it was revealed she had been paid by army officers to commend them for promotion to her lover – Frederick Augustus, Duke of York and Albany, second son of George III, and the army’s commander-in-chief. The matter was raised in the Commons and referred to a select committee, which found the Duke culpable, precipitating his resignation (though he was reappointed in 1811). Eight years later Hazlitt could refer in passing to ‘the droll affair of Mrs Clarke’,¹⁷ confident his readers would remember how much entertainment it had given them.

Another symptom was the cult of celebrity, the first and biggest beneficiary being one of the authors in this volume – Byron. He was colourful enough not to have required the assistance of gossip-columnists, but he had it anyway, and during his years in London, 1812–16, day-to-day reports of his affairs and adventures filled their pages. It is hard to imagine any poet now generating such speculation, or crowds of people following him (or her) in the streets. The world, as Samuel Rogers observed, went ‘stark mad’ about him. Byron found fame both intoxicating and tiresome. And not surprisingly: he was sufficiently indiscreet about his incestuous passion for his half-sister for London to have been ablaze with it in the weeks prior to his exile from Britain. When he died, helping Greece in its fight for independence, scenes of mass hysteria greeted his coffin as it journeyed from London to Nottinghamshire, the like of which had not previously been seen.

The new mass society even had its own entertainment industry – which, more than the media, gripped the imaginations of the writers in this book. Another century would pass before radio would enable performers to address the nation, but in the meantime, the two main theatres in London – Drury Lane and Covent Garden – were capable of accommodating audiences of over 3,000 each, more than three times the size of the Olivier Theatre in London’s National Theatre today. Every night of the working week these theatres drew capacity crowds from across the social spectrum. They quickly learnt how to exercise a collective influence: when the management attempted to increase admission prices in September 1809, they orchestrated sixty-seven nights of riots, making performance impossible – a state of affairs that ended only by negotiation with the management. It is hard to imagine such a thing happening today.

Should there be any doubt as to the importance of theatre to the Romantics, it is worth recalling that one of the distinctions of which Byron was most proud was his seat on the committee of management of Drury Lane Theatre. Along with Wordsworth, Coleridge, Keats, Hazlitt and Lamb, he was an enthusiastic playgoer. Hazlitt collected his theatre reviews into the greatest theatre book of the time – A View of the English Stage (1818). Lamb, Godwin, More, Hemans, Coleridge, Shelley, Wordsworth and Byron wrote for the stage. And Mary Robinson was the most popular Shakespearean actress of her day.

Romantic Poets

For all this, there were reasons for being cynical about the affairs of the world during the Romantic period. The everyday squalor of the lives of working people made it all but impossible to believe they could revolt against the conservative interests that kept them in their place. To Burke, they were ‘a swinish multitude’ (p. 13), while for Shelley, who believed in change, the Dublin poor were ‘one mass of animated filth’ (p. 1071). Extreme poverty and lack of education meant that social and political justice were many years in the making, with no political reform until 1832 (after the deaths of Barbauld, Blake, Smith, Keats, Shelley and Byron). In the meantime there were obstacles aplenty, one being the inherent instability of the monarchy. George III, to whom the British looked for leadership, was subject (1788 onwards) to periodic fits of insanity, and judged totally mad in 1811. This was more serious than it would be today, when the monarch is little more than a figurehead; in those days he had the power to dissolve Parliament, appoint and dismiss governments, and declare wars. Without his consent laws could not be passed. When he suffered relapses, his administration was effectively suspended, arousing the power-hungry tendencies of his son, the Prince of Wales, who (though not himself insane) was a byword for volatility and over-indulgence.

Perhaps we have seen too much in our lifetimes to feel much hope. If so, that is where we differ from the Romantics, whose capacity for belief defines them. They were optimists for human nature. Some were activists, seeking to foment revolution where they could – Shelley during his stay in Ireland, or Byron, willing to die in the cause of Greek independence; others, though not activists, sided with revolution – Helen Maria Williams, who exiled herself to France in 1791; Wordsworth, who lived in France, 1791–2; Paine, who became a member of the French National Assembly in 1791; or Charlotte Smith, who visited Paris to witness the Revolution for herself. Even those who seem to us conservative, such as Hannah More, were prepared to fight the slave trade – a cause that aligned her with such radical temperaments as Barbauld, Coleridge and Wordsworth.

They were products of their time in believing in a more just world than that in which they lived. When Williams wrote that philosophy would ‘renovate the gladdened earth’ (see p. 307), she was thinking first and foremost of the writings of Voltaire and Rousseau, but also of Paine and Price. And if philosophy could generate revolution, so too could poetry. Such a faith cannot have been easy to maintain, especially after the Terror gave rise to the Revolutionary Wars, when it became virtually impossible to hold fast to radical principles without being seen as a traitor. There is little doubt that political (as much as moral) intolerance made Williams, Shelley and Byron reluctant to return home. For those who remained, the government had ways of making life unpleasant: Thelwall was harassed on his lecture-tours by spies and hecklers. When he proposed settling in Somerset in August 1797, Coleridge told him they would be accused of creating ‘plot and damned conspiracy – a school for the propagation of demagoguery and atheism’.¹⁸ Even after the Napoleonic Wars, the government did not relax its grip: the Ely and Littleport bread-riots of 1816 resulted in the execution of five ringleaders, who were no threat to anyone; 600 starving weavers set out from Manchester in March 1817 to petition for help for the ailing cotton trade, but were rounded up by government forces as they crossed from Staffordshire into Derbyshire; and in August 1819, in the worst example, armed militiamen cut down hundreds of men, women and children demonstrating peacefully at St Peter’s Fields, Manchester – a measure that won the public endorsement of the Prince Regent.

In spite of this, the writers in this book refused to succumb to despair, preferring to believe in the possibility of a better, fairer world. It is not just their capacity for optimism that distinguishes them, but the kind of belief to which they clung. Where earlier generations looked to an afterlife, the Romantics tended to reject formalized religion. This was partly because the Church of England then wielded a degree of political power it no longer possesses, and was complicit in the injustice the writers opposed. Typical of this is the reference by Blake’s chimney-sweeper to ‘God and his Priest and King / Who make up a heaven of our misery’.¹⁹

Instead, they thought they could create, through their writing, a promised land in which property was of no consequence and people would live in harmony. It lay neither in the distant future nor in the abstract; to them it was attainable, imminently, in the here and now. Wordsworth's philosophical epic, The Recluse, was supposed to describe how it would be made real.²⁰ Although he sometimes discussed it in biblical terms, he tends at this stage of his career (1797–9) to betray little commitment to Christian theism; instead, he writes of

A presence that disturbs me with the joy
Of elevated thoughts, a sense sublime
Of something far more deeply interfused,
Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
And the round ocean, and the living air,
And the blue sky, and in the mind of man –
A motion and a spirit that impels
All thinking things, all objects of all thought,
And rolls through all things.

(Tintern Abbey 95–103)

The feeling he has while standing on the banks of the Wye is in itself divine, generated by a 'presence' that will redeem humanity from the post-lapsarian 'weariness' encountered earlier in the poem. Wordsworth is famous for having said he had no need of a redeemer;²¹ when he wrote Tintern Abbey, he had little need of God, at least in the generally accepted sense.²² For him, mankind is capable of redemption through an act of self-realization – something that explains the appeal of Tintern Abbey to Shelley and Keats. What excited them was its faith – not in formalized religion, but in the redemptive potential of the mind. It can be traced to The Eolian Harp (1795), in which Coleridge had asked himself whether all living things might be organic harps diversely framed,

That tremble into thought, as o'er them sweeps,
Plastic and vast, one intellectual breeze,
At once the soul of each, and God of all?

(ll. 37–40)

The answer Coleridge receives from his wife-to-be is (in effect) ‘no’, reflecting his awareness of the radical nature of what he asks. Although as a Unitarian he could not accept many aspects of the Anglican faith, Coleridge was emphatically Christian in his poetry, more so than Wordsworth. What they shared was a profound belief in the power of the mind to change the world. The conceit that human beings were instruments waiting to be struck by the divine afflatus of the universe is precisely such a notion, valuable for affirming our susceptibility en masse to God’s will. This was what revolution meant to Coleridge: he reconceived it as a religious event on a universal scale, by which God’s ‘intellectual’ (spiritual) influence would redeem fallen humanity.

Recent critics have accused Wordsworth of suppressing his knowledge of the hardships of working people in his poetry, particularly Tintern Abbey.²³ This is not the occasion for a refutation of that view, but it is worth saying that Wordsworth thought his work engaged fully with life as it was lived; indeed, it was on those grounds he was attacked by reviewers.²⁴ He considered that his millenarian aspirations had to be grounded in an awareness of suffering – the ‘still, sad music of humanity’ (l. 92). When Keats raved about Wordsworth to John Hamilton Reynolds in May 1818, it was to commend his ability to sharpen ‘one’s vision into the heart and nature of man, of convincing one’s nerves that the world is full of misery and heartbreak, pain, sickness, and oppression’.²⁵ And he was right. In that respect, Wordsworth was a crucial influence on how Keats conceived Hyperion: A Fragment – a poem about the aspirations that spring out of dispossession (see p. 1390).

Though in some ways a more abstract writer than Wordsworth, Shelley was no less conscious of the conditions under which people laboured. Perhaps more than any other poet of his class (he was heir to a baronetcy), he wanted to speak to the disenfranchised poor of a future similar to that described by Wordsworth:

Man, oh not men! a chain of linked thought,
Of love and might to be divided not...
Man, one harmonious soul of many a soul,
Whose nature is its own divine control,

Where all things flow to all, as rivers to the sea...

(Prometheus Unbound IV 394–5, 400–2)

In Shelley's promised land, humanity is a 'harmonious soul' redeemed from hatred and hostility by the Christ-like quality of pity and forgiveness. But where Coleridge needed a Unitarian God, and Wordsworth demanded only an unspecific 'presence', Shelley reduces the deity to the 'divine control' deep within the self. In that formulation, God is so marginalized he almost disappears. Shelley isn't consistent about this – and no one has the right to demand intellectual consistency of poetry – but such scepticism is certainly typical. At the end of Mont Blanc, he entertains the possibility that 'Silence and solitude were vacancy'; that is to say, despite his wish to celebrate the 'still and solemn Power' that inheres within the mountain, it might nonetheless be without meaning.

Byron shared the radical aspirations expressed by Wordsworth and Coleridge in their youth, but rejected their philosophizing. For him, the word 'metaphysical' was an insult. He was more practical, something underlined by his readiness to die in the Greek War of Independence (for which he remains a national hero in Greece, with streets and squares named after him). Yet even he is capable of expressing, in Childe Harold's Pilgrimage Canto III, something of Wordsworth's pantheist conviction in the redemptive power of nature:

I live not in myself, but I become Portion of that around me; and to me
High mountains are a feeling, but the hum
Of human cities torture....

(ll. 680–3)

If these lines sound unpersuasive, Byron remained true to himself in that he knew the Wordsworthian response to nature affirmed something he took seriously – inner potential. Frustration with the restrictions of our earthly state permeates his poetry, compelling him to aspire to a level of existence beyond the merely human. Hence his ambiguous praise for that arch-overreacher Napoleon,²⁶ the divinations of Manfred, who can command the spirits, and his admiration for Prometheus, the archetype of the

Byronic hero. As Wordsworth put it, 'We feel that we are greater than we know.'²⁷

In Don Juan, which stands as Byron's greatest achievement in verse, his setting is not the natural world favoured by Shelley and Wordsworth, nor is it the arena of philosophical disquisition to be found in Coleridge's 'Religious Musings'; it is the 'real' world of human affairs, masked balls, the perils of travel, and the passion of men and women. For Byron, the seclusion sought by Wordsworth was little more than a posture, one he was unwilling to adopt. He seeks to understand the random and the everyday in all its meaningless variety. He studies human behaviour, marvels at the follies and foibles of his characters, and addresses his reader in disarmingly familiar style, as if he were speaking from an armchair holding a glass of hock. The life assumed by the poem seems to have surprised even him. 'Confess, you dog', he wrote to his friend Douglas Kinnaird, 'It may be profligate, but is it not life, is it not the thing? Could any man have written it who has not lived in the world? – and tooled in a post-chaise? In a hackney coach? In a gondola? Against a wall? In a court carriage? In a vis-à-vis? On a table – and under it?' (p. 1065).

Blake is sometimes considered the exception to virtually anything one might want to say about other writers of the time – and so, in a sense, he is. He was born in 1757 – and thus is as much an eighteenth-century writer as a Romantic one. And if, like his contemporaries, he read Wordsworth, it was late in life, and without much pleasure.²⁸ However, it was he who, in 1789, on the brink of tumult in France, described the 'son of fire':

Spurning the clouds written with curses, stamps the stony law to dust, loosing the eternal horses from the dens of night, crying, 'Empire is no more! And now the lion and wolf shall cease.' (p. 223)

Revolution as apocalypse: to Blake, events in France were harbingers not merely of political liberation, but of the spiritual millennium predicted in the Bible. And in this he was no less Romantic than the writers who were to follow. For him, as for them, the fallen world was a conundrum the resolution to which led back to paradise. He would spend much of his creative life explaining to the world, in his own distinctive manner, how paradise had been lost, and how it might be reclaimed. And never without grief at the 'Marks of weakness' and 'marks of woe'²⁹ on the faces around him.

It would be remarkable were the poetry of female Romantics not to reflect their natural pragmatism – an inevitable by-product of the fact that they were often (as in the cases of Charlotte Smith and Felicia Hemans) single mothers providing for their children. Yet their work is permeated by the same aspirations to be found in their male contemporaries. After all, Smith's natural milieu is her beloved Sussex Downs, where she draws strength from the flora and fauna that surround her. In Beachy Head she does so in a manner that transcends a purely taxonomic urge, ranging across millennia to speculate on the 'strange ferment' that produced the hills (l. 387), after attempting to recreate the more recent past.

Haunts of my youth!

Scenes of fond daydreams, I behold ye yet,
Where 'twas so pleasant by thy northern slopes
To climb the winding sheep-path...

(Beachy Head 297–300)

These lines exemplify the larger project of Smith's poetry – to reclaim childhood happiness as a means of understanding the troubled context of the present. Her distant relative Wordsworth was attempting something similar in The Prelude, written at around the same time.

None of this is to underestimate the sexual politics of female poetry. Hemans's Records of Woman sequence is a serious attempt to explore the experience of women within a male-dominated society. Some critics have suggested her concerns are primarily 'domestic', but that hardly establishes the terms in which we might speak of a 'female romanticism' – which could be as much the invention of commentators as 'Romanticism' itself. It is true that Records of Woman is concerned with the plight of those lumbered with feckless, unreliable, weak or ineffectual men: Seymour saves himself, but fails to save Arabella Stuart; Werner Stauffacher is saved only by 'the entreaties of his wife, a woman who seems to have been of an heroic spirit'; Properzia Rossi lavishes her love and art on a man unworthy of her; the Indian Woman is deserted by her husband for another woman, and so forth. To that extent the sequence presents a distinctively female perspective, but it would be a mistake to describe Hemans's as a purely feminist agenda, at least in the sense we understand the term.

Critics tend to downplay the value she places on the relationship between the sexes. Gertrude, or Fidelity till Death describes how its heroine nurses her husband in his final tormented hours with what Hemans calls 'the most heroic devotedness', to become the exemplar of a mode of behaviour on which Hemans set great store. Even Juana, notwithstanding her husband's neglect, is praised for wifely devotion after his death: 'Surely that humble, patient love must win back love at last!' ³⁰ These women are models of heroic conduct. It is true that Hemans has her own preoccupation: the limits of human (often female) endeavour. But that cannot of itself define such an all-embracing concept as 'female romanticism'.

Gender is but one factor among many when we analyse a writer's work. Were we to believe it determines subject-matter, genre and poetic form, we would need also to prove that certain subjects, genres and forms were selected only, or at least predominantly, by women. But that is not the case. After all, Southey chose to write about Joan of Arc and her sufferings (one of the subjects of Records of Woman), as did other male writers before him, while More, Yearsley, Barbauld and Williams composed anti-slavery poems alongside those of Cowper, Blake, Southey and Coleridge. ³¹ The obvious conclusion is that Hemans and her contemporaries saw themselves as participating in a literary forum with male writers. And when it came to visionary experience, Hemans could describe it with as much conviction as Blake:

And then a glorious mountain-chain uprose,
Height above spiry height!
A soaring multitude of woods and snows
All steeped in golden light!
(Despondency and Aspiration 75–8)

Figure 3 The title-page of Felicia Hemans's Records of Woman, the complete sequence of which appears on pp. 1298–1359. The two epigraphs are from Wordsworth's 'Laodamia' and Schiller's Wallenstein: 'Das ist das

Los des Schönen auf der Erde!’ (‘That is the lot of the beautiful on earth!’).

It has been argued that ‘male’ romanticism is characterized by a preoccupation with the sublime, but female writers could be just as persuasive in their understanding of it – as in Hemans’s ‘Second Sight’ and ‘The Spirit’s Mysteries’, Barbauld’s ‘A Summer Evening’s Meditation’, or ‘Mrs Robinson to the Poet Coleridge’, all of which are included here. Of course women brought to their art insights deriving from female experience, but it is our duty as readers to appreciate those insights in their historical context, rather than impose on the past assumptions that belong in the present.

Figure 4 The title-page of Hazlitt’s The Spirit of the Age, one of the first (and best) books about Romanticism, published as early as 1825. Its

epigraph, 'To know another well were to know one's self', is from Hamlet V ii 139–40.

Of course, women writers of the period were at times conscious of their sex, and in ways that seem to anticipate gender-based struggles in our own society. Many prided themselves on their ability to articulate the female perspective on political and social issues of the day; one need only consider Hannah More on the slave trade; Helen Maria Williams on the French Revolution; Felicia Hemans on Welsh nationalism. But in none of this were they sectarian, nor did they perceive themselves as antagonistic either to the times in which they lived or to the norms by which they were governed. They were participants in the republic of letters, and it is as members of that larger community – which also included men – that we strive to understand them.

Editor's Note on the Fourth Edition

This is the fourth edition of Romanticism: An Anthology since its first publication in 1994, a decade and a half ago. My aim in producing it, as in previous years, is to provide readers with a comprehensive guide to one of the richest periods in literary history, including as many 'major' and 'essential' texts within the necessary physical constraints. I have striven to achieve this in a manner that reflects the latest developments in critical and scholarly thought. It contains almost everything required for a course on Romantic poetry that focuses on the 'big six' male poets, and a large range of other materials, including important poems by female writers; non-fiction prose by principal essayists; and background works on the politics and philosophy of the 1790s.

Texts are edited for this volume from both manuscript and early printed sources. Typically, readers are not restricted to highlights but have access to complete works, with all their fluctuations of tone, mood and rhythm. Limitations of space compel me to extract from De Quincey's Confessions of an English Opium-Eater and Suspiria de Profundis, although 'On the Knocking at the Gate in Macbeth' is presented whole. No attempt has been made to encompass the rich and extensive corpus of Romantic novel-writing; fiction is best digested whole, and there is no way of extracting from the works of Maturin, Peacock, Mary Shelley, Jane Austen, Fanny Burney, Lewis or Scott without some degree of misrepresentation. I have therefore worked on the assumption that teachers will adopt separate volumes for novels they wish to teach. Texts by European writers are not included either, on the grounds that Romanticism on the Continent is a world to itself, deserving more space than I have to hand. There could be no justice in squeezing highlights from Rousseau, Goethe, Schiller, Friedrich Schlegel, A. W. Schlegel, Novalis, Hölderlin, de Staël, Chateaubriand, Lamartine, Hugo, Leopardi, Manzoni, Zorrilla, José de Espronceda, Larra, or Rosalía Castro, to name but a few, into the Appendix of an anthology of British Romantic writing. They are subjects of their own volume. I continue to regret that limitations of space detain me from including a complete text of Wordsworth's Thirteen-Book Prelude. It was a feature of the first edition of this anthology, but occupied close to 200 pages, and responses from teachers indicated that selections from the poem would be preferable.

In addition to those texts included in the third edition, all of which are included here, readers will find poems of Walter Scott, as well as Shelley's Epipsychidion and Keats's Isabella. Furthermore, editorial materials from the third edition are updated: author headnotes have been rewritten, footnotes throughout revised, and all texts re-examined, with the result that minor revisions, usually of punctuation, have been entered. I hope that readers will find this fourth edition to be as useful a survey of the period, if not more so, as previous ones.

It is my hope that those using the fourth edition of Romanticism: An Anthology will find it helpful, and regard themselves as free to inform me of ways in which it may be further improved. The shaping of this book has been a gradual process that has continued at regular intervals since 1994, and the advice of readers continues to be of paramount importance in determining how it should continue.

Editorial Principles

This edition adopts the policy advocated by Coleridge on New Year's Day 1834, widely accepted as the basis for contemporary scholarly editions: 'After all you can say, I think the chronological order is the best for arranging a poet's works. All your divisions are in particular instances inadequate, and they destroy the interest which arises from watching the progress, maturity, and even the decay of genius.'¹ Authors are introduced successively by their dates of birth; works are placed in order of composition where known and, when not known, by date of publication.

The edition is designed for the use of students and general readers, and textual procedures are geared accordingly. Except for works in dialect or in which archaic effects were deliberately sought, punctuation and orthography are normalized, pervasive initial capitals and italics removed, and contractions expanded except where they are of metrical significance (for instance, Keats's 'charact'ry' is demanded by the exigencies of metre, but 'thro'' is expanded to 'through'). Although the accidental features of late eighteenth- and early nineteenth-century printed texts have their own intrinsic interest, and are of importance in considering the evolution of any given work, it should be noted that most poets were content to leave such matters to the printers or their collaborators. In many cases, therefore, accidental features of early printed texts cannot be assumed to be disposed according to the author's wishes. Conversely, I have taken the view that, on those occasions when capitalization is demonstrably authorial, and consistently applied, it should be allowed to stand – as in the case of Shelley's Adonais and The Mask of Anarchy. The punctuation applied by writers to their own works is another matter, as styles vary from one person to another, are sometimes eccentric, and can mislead the modern reader. I have treated authorial punctuation as a good (though not infallible) guide as to emphasis, meaning and sentence structure, but have not followed it without question.

For this fourth edition I have checked and double-checked many editorial decisions I once took for granted. All texts have been edited for this anthology. I have followed procedures designed to produce a clear reading text. In editing from manuscript, I have aimed to present each draft as it stood on completion. Deletions are accepted only when alternative readings are provided; where they are not, the original is retained. Alternative readings are accepted only when the original has been deleted; where they are not, the original is retained. Where the original reading is deleted but legible, and the alternative fragmentary, illegible or inchoate, the original has been retained. Where, in the rush of composition, words are omitted, they have been supplied from adjacent drafts or manuscripts. As a rule, I have silently corrected scribal errors. Ampersands are expanded to 'and' throughout.

There is, perhaps inevitably, an exception to this: John Clare, for whose texts I am indebted to the editorial labours of Eric Robinson. It should be noted that Robinson's policy of transcribing 'exactly what Clare wrote' with minimal intervention, leaving his spelling and punctuation intact, remains the subject of debate.

Dates of composition, where verifiable, are indicated alongside titles with details of publication. Copy-text details are provided alongside titles, whether early printed sources (usually presented in small capitals over the title of the work), or manuscript. Headnotes are provided for each author, including biographical materials, critical comments on the selection and useful secondary reading. Annotations gloss archaisms, difficult constructions, allusions, echoes, other verbal borrowings, and provide points of information. On occasion they direct the reader to secondary materials with a particular bearing on the work in question.

Third Edition (2004)

I thank all those who have suggested ways in which Romanticism: An Anthology might be revised. The NASSR-List continues to be an invaluable means of communicating with fellow Romanticists, and I am grateful to its subscribers for sending me information on their respective courses, in particular Kevin Binfield, Dan White, Brad Sullivan, Sara Guyer, SueAnn Schatz, Richard Matlak, Charles Snodgrass, Mary Waters, David Latane, Ann R. Hawkins and Patricia Matthew. I wish also to thank the many university professors who responded to the survey conducted by Blackwell Publishers into how this book might be revised. For specific help I thank Jane Stabler, Nicholas Roe, Susan J. Wolfson, Leslie Brisman, Nanora L. Sweet, Lucy Newlyn, Simon Kövesi, Jacqueline M. Labbe, Judith Pascoe, Ronald Tetreault, Hans Werner Breunig, Essaka Joshua, Grant Scott, Monika Class and Kim Wheatley. It has not been possible to adopt all suggestions, but the wealth of information and advice provided by all parties has been the most important single influence on the shape of this new edition.

At Blackwell Publishers I wish for the last time to thank Andrew McNeillie, who commissioned the first edition of this anthology over a decade ago, and who was responsible for commissioning this one. I am indebted to his successors, Al Bertrand and Emma Bennett, for the care they have taken in guiding this edition to the press, and to copy-editor Sandra Raphael and proof-reader Henry Maas, who have saved me from infelicities too numerous to mention.

Fourth Edition (2011)

Preparation of this edition began with a survey of those who use, and do not use, this textbook. I wish to thank those who responded. Their comments have been at hand throughout work, and have been given careful consideration.

I have been greatly assisted by the advice of an editorial board. Their comments have guided me at every turn, and I am much in their debt. For assistance on particular points, I thank Michael O'Neill, Tony Reavell, Nicholas Roe, Jane Stabler, Susan Wolfson, and G. E. Bentley, Jr. Emma Bennett has been a receptive and sensitive editor throughout my labours. I am grateful to her, as well as to her colleagues at Wiley-Blackwell, in particular Brigitte Lee Messenger, who copy-edited this book.

Richard Price (1723–1791)

No man was more thoroughly a product of the Enlightenment than Richard Price – except, perhaps, his friend, Thomas Jefferson. Philosopher, theologian, mathematician, he became an expert on insurance and advised the newly founded Society for Equitable Assurances on Lives and Survivorships on actuarial matters. He also suggested to the Prime Minister, William Pitt the Younger, ways in which to reduce the national debt. A leading Dissenter, he campaigned vigorously for legal recognition of the right to freedom of worship.

It is as a political pamphleteer that Price bears most on our understanding of the Romantics. A believer in liberty and representative government, he supported the American Revolution, and discussed with John Adams and Thomas Jefferson ways in which they might consolidate its achievements. He found the French Revolution no less inspiring and, shortly after the fall of the Bastille (14 July 1789), described it as ‘the commencement of a general reformation in the governments of the world which hitherto have been little better than usurpations on the rights of mankind, impediments to the progress of human improvement, and contrivances for enabling a few grandees to oppress and enslave the rest of mankind’.

Price’s famous Discourse was delivered as a sermon to the London Revolution Society, 4 November 1789, founded in honour not of the recent uprisings in France or America, but of the Glorious Revolution of 1688 (the expulsion of the Catholic James II from England, and the transfer of sovereignty to the Protestant William and Mary). The Society contained members of the established church, and ‘many persons of rank and consequence from different parts of the kingdom’. At annual anniversary meetings it held a religious service in the morning, followed by a more festive gathering at a tavern; it was at the religious service that Price delivered his Discourse. For Price, the Glorious Revolution had established the principles of just and stable government: the right to liberty of conscience in religious matters; the right to resist power when abused; and the right of the people to choose their own governors. His Discourse, with its praise for the French, was received with acclaim by the Society, whose members voted immediately to encourage the establishment of similar groups throughout the country, and to congratulate the National Assembly in Paris on the Revolution. It was sent to the Assembly and read out there on 25 November, when it was greeted with equal enthusiasm. To many in Britain this was an incendiary act, establishing Price as the hate-figure of choice for the Tories, making him the subject of scurrilous caricatures, most famously James Gillray’s brilliant (and funny) Smelling Out a Rat (3 December 1790).

The Discourse sparked off a pamphlet war that inspired some of the most important political works in the language. It began with a scorching response from the great Whig orator Edmund Burke, who offered a conservative reaction in Reflections on the Revolution in France (1790), arguing in support of the monarchy and the existing system of government (see pp. 11–17). Articulated with characteristic brilliance, his Reflections was nonetheless the work of an old man, motivated in part by fear of revolutionary change. It drew responses from a host of younger writers: within a month

Mary Wollstonecraft had published her Vindication of the Rights of Men; her Vindication of the Rights of Woman followed in 1792 (pp. 284–90). Thomas Paine, who was old enough to have fought in the American War of Independence, would publish his great apology for republicanism, The Rights of Man, in 1791–2 (pp. 26–9).

If there was a literary event at the end of the eighteenth century that heralded the cultural, political and social change of the Romantic period, this was it. No one realized that at the time, of course; anxiety about war with the French was uppermost, and would remain so for the next two decades. All the same, Price's declaration of a new world in prospect would be the rallying cry not just for radical fellow-travellers, but the visionaries who would shortly precipitate a literary renaissance the effects of which resonated for many decades to come. Among those following the pamphlet war as it unfolded was a young Cambridge undergraduate called William Wordsworth who, years later in The Thirteen-Book Prelude, would recall having read 'the master pamphlets of the day' (ix 97).

Price was treading dangerously; a few years later his 'ardour for liberty' would have led him and his publisher to be tried for sedition. These two brief extracts from the Discourse offer something of its remarkable courage and energy. When they were composed the storming of the Bastille was still news; less than a month before, 20,000 people had stormed Versailles and 'escorted' the King and Queen to Paris in what many saw as one of the most sinister developments in the Revolution so far. Louis's execution would wait until January 1793, but for many it was prefigured in the events of the summer and autumn of 1789.

[On Representation]

(1789)

When the representation is fair and equal, and at the same time vested with such powers as our House of Commons possesses, a kingdom may be said to govern itself, and consequently to possess true liberty. When the representation is partial, a kingdom possesses liberty only partially; and if extremely partial, it only gives a semblance of liberty. But if not only extremely partial, but corruptly chosen, and under corrupt influence after being chosen, it becomes a nuisance, and produces the worst of all forms of government: a government by corruption, a government carried on and supported by spreading venality and profligacy through a kingdom.

May heaven preserve this kingdom from a calamity so dreadful! It is the point of depravity to which abuses under such a government as ours naturally tend, and the last stage of national unhappiness. We are at present, I hope, at a great distance from it. But it cannot be pretended that there are no advances towards it, or that there is no reason for apprehension and alarm.

The inadequateness of our representation has been long a subject of complaint.¹ This is, in truth, our fundamental grievance, and I do not think that anything is much more our duty (as men who love their country and are grateful for the Revolution)² than to unite our zeal in endeavouring to get it redressed. At the time of the American war, associations were formed for this purpose in London and other parts of the kingdom, and our present Minister himself has, since that war, directed to it an effort which made him a favourite with many of us.³ But all attention to it seems now lost, and the probability is that this inattention will continue and that nothing will be done towards gaining for us this essential blessing till some great calamity again alarms our fears, or till some great abuse of power again provokes our resentment – or perhaps till the acquisition of a pure and equal representation by other countries (while we are mocked with the shadow)⁴ kindles our shame.

On Representation

¹ The inadequateness...complaint Few working people, and no women, had the vote.

² Revolution the Glorious Revolution of 1688, when the Protestant William of Orange displaced the Stuart dynasty that dated back to James I.

⁴ 'A representation chosen principally by the Treasury, and a few thousands of the dregs of the people, who are generally paid for their votes' (Price's footnote).

Prospects for Reform¹

From A Discourse on the Love of our Country (1789)

What an eventful period is this! I am thankful that I have lived to see it, and I could almost say, 'Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation.'² I have lived to see a diffusion of knowledge which has undermined superstition and error; I have lived to see the rights of men better understood than ever, and nations panting for liberty which seemed to have lost the idea of it. I have lived to see thirty millions of people,³ indignant and resolute, spurning at slavery, and demanding liberty with an irresistible voice, their King led in triumph, and an arbitrary monarch surrendering himself to his subjects.⁴

After sharing in the benefits of one revolution, I have been spared to be a witness to two other revolutions, both glorious.⁵ And now, methinks, I see the ardour for liberty catching and spreading; a general amendment beginning in human affairs; the dominion of kings changed for the dominion of laws, and the dominion of priests giving way to the dominion of reason and conscience.

Be encouraged, all ye friends of freedom, and writers in its defence! The times are auspicious. Your labours have not been in vain. Behold kingdoms admonished by you, starting from sleep, breaking their fetters, and claiming justice from their oppressors! Behold the light you have struck out, after setting America free,⁶ reflected to France and there kindled into a blaze that lays despotism in ashes, and warms and illuminates Europe!

Tremble all ye oppressors of the world! Take warning all ye supporters of slavish governments and slavish hierarchies! Call no more (absurdly and wickedly) reformation, innovation. You cannot now hold the world in darkness. Struggle no longer against increasing light and liberality. Restore to mankind their rights, and consent to the correction of abuses, before they and you are destroyed together.

Prospects for Reform

¹ This was one of the most celebrated parts of Price's Discourse, thanks to the fact that the first paragraph of it was quoted by Burke in his Reflections, with the following introduction:

Plots, massacres, assassinations seem to some people a trivial price for obtaining a revolution. Cheap, bloodless reformation, a guiltless liberty appear flat and vapid to their taste. There must be a great change of scene; there must be a magnificent stage effect; there must be a grand spectacle to rouse the imagination grown torpid with the lazy enjoyment of sixty years' security and the still unanimating repose of public prosperity. The preacher found them all in the French Revolution. This inspires a juvenile warmth through his whole frame. His enthusiasm kindles as he advances; and when he arrives at his peroration it is in a full blaze. Then viewing, from the Pisgah of his pulpit, the free, moral, happy, flourishing and glorious state of France as in a bird's-eye landscape of a promised land, he breaks out into the following rapture

2 Lord...thy salvation from Luke 2:29–30.

3 thirty millions of people the population of France.

4 their King...subjects A reference to the storming of Versailles by 20,000 people, and compelled ‘escort’ of the French royal family to Paris, less than a month before.

5 After sharing...glorious Price sees himself as a beneficiary of the Glorious Revolution; he also witnessed (and supported) both the American Revolution, which resulted in independence from Britain in 1776, and the French Revolution.

6 setting America free The Treaty of Paris, confirming the independence of America, was signed on 3 September 1783. Washington was elected first President of the Republic in 1789 (until 1797).

Thomas Warton (1728–1790)

‘Thomas Warton was a man of taste and genius’, Hazlitt wrote. ‘His sonnets I cannot help preferring to any in the language.’¹ It may seem odd to us that Hazlitt preferred Warton to Surrey, Shakespeare, Sidney, Donne, Daniel and Wyatt, but his endorsement is a reminder of Warton’s standing among the Romantics, and should alert us to the qualities they valued in him.

The son of Thomas Warton the elder (c.1688–1745), Warton the Younger was to become one of the foremost poets and literary historians of his time. He studied at Trinity College, Oxford, where he remained as Fellow and Tutor (1751 onwards), Professor of Poetry (1757–67), and Camden Professor of History (1785). Though appointed Poet Laureate in 1785 much of his best verse was by then behind him – and in many ways his most enduring achievement turned out to be his History of Poetry (1774–81). Three volumes were published by the time he died, and although 88 pages of a fourth were printed during his lifetime they were not to be published until it was finished by others in 1824. The History revived interest in medieval and sixteenth-century poetry, and anticipated the Romantic movement in its shift away from the neo-classicism of earlier periods.

Wordsworth and Coleridge were not 21 at his death (Wordsworth was up at Cambridge, Coleridge a schoolboy at Christ’s Hospital in London), but they knew his poetry, and like many young writers found their interest in the sonnet roused by his efforts. They recognized the influence of To the River Lodon on Bowles’s To the Itchin and Smith’s To the River Arun (see p. 99), a tradition which would inform Coleridge’s To the River Otter (p. 618) and Wordsworth’s address to the Derwent in the Two-Part Prelude. David Fairer helpfully observes of Warton’s famous sonnet:

In this meditation on loss, continuity, and gain, the crucial concept is the return to the source, the re-establishing of contact with the ‘native stream’. The gap between past and present selves does not close, but each is thrown into relief by the experience. The ‘sweet native stream’ here is not a Painite originating moment when his identity was inaugurated, but a Burkean recovery of history. ‘Tracing back’ the interval between, Warton recognizes ‘marks’ both of pleasure and of sorrow, but thanks to the river he remains in touch with a sense of his developing life and what it owes to the past.²

Sonnet IX. To the River Lodon¹

From Poems (1777)

Ah! what a weary race my feet have run
Since first I trod thy banks with alders crowned,
And thought my way was all through fairy ground
Beneath thy azure sky and golden sun,
Where first my muse to lisp her notes begun.² 5
While pensive memory traces back the round
Which fills the varied interval between,
Much pleasure, more of sorrow, marks the scene.
Sweet native stream, those skies and suns so pure
No more return to cheer my evening road; 10
Yet still one joy remains – that not obscure,
Nor useless, all my vacant days have flowed,
From youth’s gay dawn to manhood’s prime mature,
Nor with the muse’s laurel³ unbestowed.

To the River Lodon

¹ The River Loddon runs through Basingstoke, where Warton was born, and where his father was vicar and headmaster of the Grammar School.

² Where first...begun Warton lived in Basingstoke until 1744, when he matriculated at Trinity College, Oxford, and his earliest poems were composed there. His earliest known poem is Birds Nesting in Dunsfold Orchard, written when he was 7 or 8.

³ muse's laurel i.e. poetic fame. Warton was well established as a major poet by the time he became Professor of Poetry at Oxford in 1757.

Edmund Burke (1729/30–1797)

Burke founded modern Conservative thought in Britain, and for his intellectual contribution to philosophical and political thought might be regarded as a godfather of Romanticism. He was raised in an atmosphere of religious tolerance – his father was a Protestant, his mother a Catholic. A native of Dublin, he was brought up as a Protestant and graduated from Trinity College (1747–8) before moving to London where he studied law at the Middle Temple. The legal profession was never to his taste, and he was not called to the bar; literary work was more appealing.

He was only 19 when he composed one of his most influential and important books, A Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful (1757), which explores the nature of ‘negative’ pleasures – the mixed experience of pleasure and pain, attraction and terror. Its central innovation was to question the classical ideal of clarity, arguing that vagueness and obscurity were more evocative of the unknown and the infinite. Fear (a desirable sensation for Burke) is diminished by knowledge, but heightened by veiled intimations – something he demonstrates by citing Milton’s description of Death, where ‘all is dark, uncertain, confused, terrible and sublime to the last degree’. Burke’s central conceit, that the instinct for self-preservation was associated with apprehensions of pain and danger and thereby with a sense of the sublime, would strike a chord not merely among intellectuals, but among admirers of the Gothic, a genre that enjoyed its heyday in the decades following the appearance of Horace Walpole’s Castle of Otranto in 1765. The Philosophical Enquiry was a revolution in artistic and literary thought, and besides providing a licence for the popular cult of the Gothic would have a tremendous impact on the Romantic poets; see, for instance, Wordsworth’s climbing of Snowdon (pp. 578–82), De Quincey’s account of opium addiction (pp. 839–41), Byron’s Childe Harold Canto III (p. 890), and Shelley’s Hymn to Intellectual Beauty (pp. 1101–3).

In 1765 Burke was appointed secretary to the Marquis of Rockingham, then Prime Minister, entering Parliament in the same year as MP for Wendover. A Whig, he was not afraid to champion liberal causes. He favoured liberty of commerce and defended the rights of the colonies, especially America – a subject on which he published. He opposed the control exercised over Parliament by allies of George III; supported the cause of Irish Catholics; campaigned for the emancipation of British India and the abolition of the slave trade. His efforts to halt slavery in British colonies won him the admiration and friendship of Hannah More and the Bluestockings. By this time he had acquired the reputation of an orator; it was said ‘he was the most eloquent man of his time: his wisdom was greater than his eloquence’.¹

He was 60 by the time the Bastille fell in July 1789. The storming of Versailles in October, and Price’s Discourse (see pp. 4–6), led him to compose Reflections on the Revolution in France (1790). The selections below include his lament for the age of chivalry and paean to Marie Antoinette, ‘glittering like the morning star, full of life and splendour and joy’. It is interesting to compare his view with that of Charlotte Smith in The Emigrants (see p. 104).

His Whig colleagues (particularly Charles James Fox) were horrified by his abandonment of liberal politics, and Reflections alienated him from them. George III was delighted: he declared it to be ‘a book which every gentleman ought to read!’ (Wu vi 215). In subsequent works, Burke would go further, advising the government to suppress free opinion at home. This apparent inconsistency can be explained by the fact that the American Revolution (which he supported) was, as he saw it, fought on behalf of traditional rights and liberties which the English government had infringed. The French Revolution was intended to introduce a new order of things based on a rationalistic philosophy which he regarded as bogus. To him, it seemed that liberty was championed as a metaphysical abstraction; equality was contrary to nature and therefore impossible to achieve; fraternity was ‘cant and gibberish’.

Burke saw man as essentially evil and in need of strict regulation. He believed not in the egalitarian principles that drove the French revolutionaries, but in judgements derived from the reason of the ages. Released from belief in a divine creator, Burke could regard the wisdom of the human mind as no more than a poor substitute. In his view society depended on safeguards which had stood the test of time – hence his support of Englishness, and the view that the English form of government (for all its faults) was divinely sanctioned. If this seems eccentric, it is worth remembering that the Reflections has remained an enduringly popular work. Priced at three shillings (the equivalent of £10 or US$18 today), it sold 30,000 copies in the first two years of publication. It was quickly translated into both French and German, and its arguments became common currency in ideological discourse of the 1790s. It was in response that Thomas Paine composed his manifesto for republicanism, The Rights of Man (1791–2).

At the time Reflections appeared, Wordsworth was (as he later recalled) ‘hot’ in the radical cause, and reacted with outrage, composing a defence of regicide entitled ‘A Letter to the Bishop of Llandaff’, which fortunately for him was not published. (Had it been, it would almost certainly have precipitated his arrest and trial.) In later years he came to revise his judgement, valuing Burke for his achievement as a conservative thinker, and inserted a tribute to him in The Fourteen-Book Prelude (see pp. 591–2). Though Coleridge seems not to have held Burke in particularly high regard, his later prose works, Lay Sermons (1816–17) and On the Constitution of Church and State (1830), were strongly influenced by him. Of all the Romantics, Hazlitt was perhaps one of the most openly admiring: Burke was one of his heroes, along with Rousseau. He loved his oratory, even if he did not always agree with what he said. ‘I cannot help looking upon him as the chief boast and ornament of the English House of Commons’, he wrote, adding that he was a ‘man of clear understanding, of strong sense, and subtle reasoning’.²

Obscurity

From A Philosophical Enquiry into the Origins of our Ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful (1757)

To make anything very terrible,¹ obscurity seems in general to be necessary. When we know the full extent of any danger, when we can accustom our eyes to it, a great deal of the apprehension vanishes. Everyone will be sensible of this who considers how greatly night adds to our dread in all cases of danger, and how much the notions of ghosts and goblins (of which none can form clear ideas) affect minds, which give credit² to the popular tales concerning such sorts of beings.

Those despotic governments which are founded on the passions of men – and principally upon the passion of fear – keep their chief as much as may be from the public eye. The policy has been the same in many cases of religion; almost all the heathen temples were dark. Even in the barbarous temples of the Americans³ at this day, they keep their idol in a dark part of the hut, which is consecrated to his worship. For this purpose too the druids performed all their ceremonies in the bosom of the darkest woods, and in the shade of the oldest and most spreading oaks.⁴

No person seems better to have understood the secret of heightening, or of setting terrible things (if I may use the expression) in their strongest light by the force of a judicious obscurity, than Milton. His description of

Death in the second Book is admirably studied; it is astonishing with what a gloomy pomp, with what a significant and expressive uncertainty of strokes and colouring he has finished the portrait of the king of terrors.

The other shape
(If shape it might be called) that shape had none
Distinguishable in member, joint, or limb;
Or substance might be called that shadow seemed,
For each seemed either. Black he stood as night,
Fierce as ten furies, terrible as hell,
And shook a deadly dart. What seemed his head
The likeness of a kingly crown had on.

Paradise Lost ii 666–73)

In this description all is dark, uncertain, confused, terrible and sublime to the last degree.

Obscurity

1 terrible terrifying.

2 credit credibility.

3 the Americans Red Indians.

4 For this purpose...spreading oaks In the eighteenth century it was believed, erroneously, that druids performed human sacrifices in woods. They were frequently described doing so in antiquarian or poetic works.

History will record...1

(1790)

History will record that on the morning of the 6th of October 1789, the King and Queen of France, after a day of confusion, alarm, dismay, and slaughter, lay down, under the pledged security of public faith, to indulge nature in a few hours of respite, and troubled, melancholy repose. From this sleep the queen was first startled by the sentinel at her door, who cried out to her to save herself by flight – that this was the last proof of fidelity he could give – that they were upon him, and he was dead. Instantly he was cut down. A band of cruel ruffians and assassins, reeking with his blood, rushed into the chamber of the Queen and pierced with a hundred strokes of bayonets and poniards the bed, from whence this persecuted woman had but just time to fly almost naked and, through ways unknown to the murderers, had escaped to seek refuge at the feet of a King and husband not secure of his own life for a moment.

This King, to say no more of him, and this Queen, and their infant children (who once would have been the pride and hope of a great and generous people) were then forced to abandon the sanctuary of the most splendid palace in the world, which they left swimming in blood, polluted by massacre and strewed with scattered limbs and mutilated carcasses. Thence they were conducted into the capital of their kingdom.

Two had been selected from the unprovoked, unresisted, promiscuous slaughter, which was made of the gentlemen of birth and family who composed the king's bodyguard. These two gentlemen, with all the parade of an execution of justice, were cruelly and publicly dragged to the block and beheaded in the great court of the palace. Their heads were stuck upon spears and led the procession, whilst the royal captives who followed in the train were slowly moved along, amidst the horrid yells, and shrilling screams, and frantic dances, and infamous contumelies, and all the unutterable abominations of the furies of hell in the abused shape of the vilest of women. After they had been made to taste, drop by drop, more than the bitterness of death in the slow torture of a journey of twelve miles, protracted to six hours, they were, under a guard composed of those very soldiers who had thus conducted them through this famous triumph, lodged in one of the old palaces of Paris, now converted into a bastille for kings.²

Is this a triumph to be consecrated at altars? to be commemorated with grateful thanksgiving? to be offered to the divine humanity with fervent prayer and enthusiastic ejaculation? These Theban and Thracian orgies,³ acted in France and applauded only in the Old Jewry,⁴ I assure you, kindle prophetic enthusiasm in the minds but of very few people in this kingdom, although a saint and apostle, who may have revelations of his own and who has so completely vanquished all the mean superstitions of the heart, may incline to think it pious and decorous to compare it with the entrance into the world of the Prince of Peace, proclaimed in a holy temple by a venerable sage, and not long before not worse announced by the voice of angels to the quiet innocence of shepherds.

History will Record

¹ This lurid account of what took place at Versailles, when a mob stormed the royal palace and escorted Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette to Paris, is vividly recounted by Burke.

² one of the...for kings the Tuileries.

³ Theban and Thracian orgies Thebes, the principal city of Boeotia, was associated in Greek legend with Dionysiac orgies, which were commonly believed to have been imported from Thrace. The orgiastic rites of Cotys were also introduced to Athens from Thrace.

The age of chivalry is gone

(1790)

I hear that the august person¹ who was the principal object of our preacher's triumph,² though he supported himself, felt much on that shameful occasion. As a man, it became him to feel for his wife and his children, and the faithful guards of his person that were massacred in cold blood about him; as a prince, it became him to feel for the strange and frightful transformation of his civilized subjects, and to be more grieved for them than solicitous for himself. It derogates little from his fortitude, while it adds infinitely to the honour of his humanity. I am very sorry to say it, very sorry indeed, that such personages are in a situation in which it is not unbecoming in us to praise the virtues of the great.

I hear, and I rejoice to hear, that the great lady,³ the other object of the triumph, has borne that day (one is interested that beings made for suffering should suffer well), and that she bears all the succeeding days, that she bears the imprisonment of her husband, and her own captivity, and the exile of her friends, and the insulting adulation of addresses, and the whole weight of her accumulated wrongs, with a serene patience, in a manner suited to her rank and race, and becoming the offspring of a sovereign distinguished for her piety and her courage; that, like her, she has lofty sentiments; that she feels with the dignity of a Roman matron; that in the last extremity she will save herself from the last disgrace; and that, if she must fall, she will fall by no ignoble hand.

It is now sixteen or seventeen years⁴ since I saw the Queen of France, then the dauphiness,⁵ at Versailles, and surely never lighted on this orb, which she hardly seemed to touch, a more delightful vision. I saw her just above the horizon, decorating and cheering the elevated sphere she just began to move in – glittering like the morning star, full of life and splendour and joy. Oh what a revolution! and what a heart must I have to contemplate without emotion that elevation and that fall! Little did I dream when she added titles of veneration to those of enthusiastic, distant, respectful love, that she should ever be obliged to carry the sharp antidote against disgrace concealed in that bosom; little did I dream that I should have lived to see such disasters fallen upon her in a nation of gallant men, in a nation of men of honour and of cavaliers. I thought ten thousand swords must have leaped from their scabbards to avenge even a look that threatened her with insult. But the age of chivalry is gone.

That of sophisters,⁶ economists, and calculators⁷ has succeeded; and the glory of Europe is extinguished forever. Never, never more shall we behold that generous loyalty to rank and sex, that proud submission, that dignified obedience, that subordination of the heart which kept alive, even in servitude itself, the spirit of an exalted freedom. The unbought grace of life, the cheap defence of nations, the nurse of manly sentiment and heroic enterprise, is gone! It is gone, that sensibility of principle, that chastity of honour which felt a stain like a wound, which inspired courage whilst it mitigated ferocity, which ennobled whatever it touched, and under which vice itself lost half its evil by losing all its grossness.

This mixed system of opinion and sentiment had its origin in the ancient chivalry; and the principle, though varied in its appearance by the varying state of human affairs, subsisted and influenced through a long succession of generations even to the time we live in. If it should ever be totally extinguished, the loss I fear will be great. It is this which has given its character to modern Europe. It is this which has distinguished it under all its forms of government, and distinguished it to its advantage, from the states of Asia and possibly from those states which flourished in the most brilliant periods of the antique world.⁸ It was this which, without confounding ranks, had produced a noble equality and handed it down through all the gradations of social life. It was this opinion which mitigated kings into companions and raised private men to be fellows with kings. Without force or opposition, it subdued the fierceness of pride and power, it obliged sovereigns to submit to the soft collar of social esteem, compelled stern authority to submit to elegance, and gave a domination, vanquisher of laws, to be subdued by manners.

But now all is to be changed. All the pleasing illusions which made power gentle and obedience liberal, which harmonized the different shades of life, and which, by a bland assimilation, incorporated into politics the sentiments which beautify and soften private society, are to be dissolved by this new conquering empire of light and reason. All the decent drapery of life is to be rudely torn off. All the super-added ideas, furnished from the wardrobe of a moral imagination, which the heart owns and the understanding ratifies as necessary to cover the defects of our naked, shivering nature, and to raise it to dignity in our own estimation, are to be exploded as a ridiculous, absurd, and antiquated fashion.

On this scheme of things, a king is but a man, a queen is but a woman; a woman is but an animal, and an animal not of the highest order. All homage paid to the sex in general as such, and without distinct views, is to be regarded as romance and folly. Regicide, and parricide,⁹ and sacrilege are but fictions of superstition, corrupting jurisprudence¹⁰ by destroying its simplicity. The murder of a king, or a queen, or a bishop, or a father are only common homicide; and if the people are by any chance or in any way gainers by it, a sort of homicide much the most pardonable, and into which we ought not to make too severe a scrutiny...

We are but too apt to consider things in the state in which we find them, without sufficiently adverting to the causes by which they have been produced and possibly may be upheld. Nothing is more certain than that our manners, our civilization, and all the good things which are connected with manners and with civilization have, in this European world of ours, depended for ages upon two principles and were, indeed, the result of both combined: I mean the spirit of a gentleman and the spirit of religion. The nobility and the clergy, the one by profession, the other by patronage, kept learning in existence, even in the midst of arms and confusions, and whilst governments were rather in their causes than formed. Learning paid back what it received to nobility and to priesthood, and paid it with usury, by enlarging their ideas and by furnishing their minds. Happy if they had all continued to know their indissoluble union and their proper place! Happy if learning, not debauched by ambition, had been satisfied to continue the instructor, and not aspired to be the master! Along with its natural protectors and guardians, learning will be cast into the mire and trodden down under the hoofs of a swinish multitude.¹¹

On Englishness

From Reflections on the Revolution in France (1790)

I almost venture to affirm that not one in a hundred amongst us participates in the 'triumph' of the Revolution Society.¹ If the King and Queen of France and their children were to fall into our hands by the chance of war in the most acrimonious of all hostilities (I deprecate such an event, I deprecate such hostility), they would be treated with another sort of triumphal entry into London. We formerly have had a king of France in that situation;² you have read how he was treated by the victor in the field, and in what manner he was afterwards received in England. Four hundred years have gone over us, but I believe we are not materially changed since that period.

Thanks to our sullen resistance to innovation, thanks to the cold sluggishness of our national character, we still bear the stamp of our forefathers. We have not (as I conceive) lost the generosity and dignity of thinking of the fourteenth century, nor as yet have we subtilized³ ourselves into savages.⁴ We are not the converts of Rousseau; we are not the disciples of Voltaire; Helvetius has made no progress amongst us.⁵ Atheists are not our preachers; madmen are not our lawgivers. We know that we have made no discoveries, and we think that no discoveries are to be made in morality – nor many in the great principles of government, nor in the ideas of liberty which were understood long before we were born, altogether as well as they will be after the grave has heaped its mould upon our presumption, and the silent tomb shall have imposed its law on our pert loquacity.⁶

In England we have not yet been completely embowelled of our natural entrails; we still feel within us, and we cherish and cultivate, those inbred sentiments⁷ which are the faithful guardians, the active monitors⁸ of our duty, the true supporters of all liberal and manly⁹ morals. We have not been drawn and trussed¹⁰ in order that we may be filled, like stuffed birds in a museum, with chaff and rags and paltry blurred shreds of paper about the rights of man. We preserve the whole of our feelings still native and entire, unsophisticated¹¹ by pedantry and infidelity. We have real hearts of flesh and blood beating in our bosoms. We fear God. We look up with awe to kings, with affection to parliaments, with duty to magistrates, with reverence to priests, and with respect to nobility. Why? Because when such ideas are brought before our minds, it is natural to be so affected; because all other feelings are false and spurious, and tend to corrupt our minds, to vitiate our primary morals, to render us unfit for rational liberty, and (by teaching us a servile, licentious, and abandoned insolence) to be our low sport for a few holidays, to make us perfectly fit for, and justly deserving of slavery, through the whole course of our lives.

You see, sir,¹² that in this enlightened age I am bold enough to confess that we are generally men of untaught¹³ feelings, that instead of casting away all our old prejudices, we cherish them to a very considerable degree and, to take more shame to ourselves, we cherish them because they are prejudices. And the longer they have lasted, and the more generally they have prevailed, the more we cherish them.

We are afraid to put men to live and trade each on his own private stock of reason,¹⁴ because we suspect that this stock in each man is small, and that the individuals would do better to avail themselves of the general bank and capital of nations and of ages. Many of our men of speculation,¹⁵ instead of exploding general prejudices, employ their sagacity to discover the latent wisdom which prevails in them. If they find what they seek (and they seldom fail), they think it more wise to continue the prejudice, with the reason involved, than to cast away the coat of prejudice, and to leave nothing but the naked reason – because prejudice, with its reason, has a motive to give action to that reason, and an affection which will give it permanence. Prejudice is of ready application in the emergency; it previously engages the mind in a steady course of wisdom and virtue, and does not leave the man hesitating in the moment of decision – sceptical, puzzled and unresolved. Prejudice renders a man's virtue his habit, and not a series of unconnected acts. Through just prejudice, his duty becomes a part of his nature.

Society is indeed a contract.¹ Subordinate contracts for objects of mere occasional interest may be dissolved at pleasure, but the state ought not to be considered as nothing better than a partnership agreement in a trade of pepper and coffee, calico or tobacco, or some other such low concern, to be taken up for a little temporary interest, and to be dissolved by the fancy of the parties. It is to be looked on with other reverence because it is not a partnership in things subservient only to the gross animal existence of a temporary and perishable nature.

It is a partnership in all science,² a partnership in all art,³ a partnership in every virtue and in all perfection. As the ends⁴ of such a partnership cannot be obtained in many generations,⁵ it becomes a partnership not only between those who are living, but between those who are living, those who are dead, and those who are to be born. Each contract of each particular state is but a clause in the great primeval contract of eternal society, linking the lower with the higher natures, connecting the visible and invisible world⁶ according to a fixed compact sanctioned by the inviolable oath which holds all physical and all moral natures each in their appointed place. This law is not subject to the will of those who, by an obligation above them and infinitely superior, are bound to submit their will to that law. The municipal corporations of that universal kingdom⁷ are not morally at liberty at their pleasure, and on their speculations of a contingent improvement wholly to separate and tear asunder the bands of their subordinate community, and to dissolve it into an unsocial, uncivil, unconnected chaos of elementary principles.

It is the first and supreme necessity only, a necessity that is not chosen but chooses, a necessity paramount to deliberation, that admits no discussion and demands no evidence, which alone can justify a resort to anarchy. This necessity is no exception to the rule because this necessity itself is a part too of that moral and physical disposition of things to which man must be obedient by consent or force. But if that which is only submission to necessity should be made the object of choice, the law is broken, nature is disobeyed, and the rebellious are outlawed, cast forth, and exiled from this world⁸ of reason, and order, and peace, and virtue, and fruitful penitence, into the antagonist world of madness, discord, vice, confusion, and unavailing sorrow.

These, my dear sir, are, were, and I think long will be the sentiments of not the least learned and reflecting part of this kingdom. They who are included in this description form their opinions on such grounds as such persons ought to form them; the less enquiring receive them from an authority which those whom providence dooms to live on trust need not be ashamed to rely on. These two sorts of men move in the same direction, though in a different place. They both move with the order of the universe. They all know or feel this great ancient truth: ‘Quod illi principi et praepotenti deo qui omnem hunc mundum regit, nihil eorum quae quidem fiant in terris acceptius quam concilia et caetus hominum jure sociati quae civitates appellantur.’⁹ They take this tenet of the head and heart not from the great name which it immediately bears, nor from the greater from whence it is derived, but from that which alone can give true weight and sanction to any learned opinion: the common nature and common relation of men.

Persuaded that all things ought to be done with reference, and referring all to the point of reference to which all should be directed,¹⁰ they think themselves bound (not only as individuals in the sanctuary of the heart, or as congregated in that personal capacity) to renew the memory of their high origin and caste; but also in their corporate character to perform their national homage to the institutor and author and protector of civil society, without which civil society man could not by any possibility arrive at the perfection of which his nature is capable, nor even make a remote and faint approach to it.

They conceive that He who gave our nature to be perfected by our virtue willed also the necessary means of its perfection. He willed therefore the state; He willed its connection with the source and original archetype of all perfection. They who are convinced of this His will (which is the law of laws and the sovereign of sovereigns) cannot think it reprehensible that this our corporate fealty and homage, that this our recognition of a signiory paramount¹¹ (I had almost said this oblation¹² of the state itself), as a worthy offering on the high altar of universal praise, should be performed as all public solemn acts are performed – in buildings, in music, in decoration, in speech, in the dignity of persons, according to the customs of mankind, taught by their nature; that is, with modest splendour, with unassuming state, with mild majesty and sober pomp.

For those purposes they think some part of the wealth of the country is as usefully employed as it can be, in fomenting¹³ the luxury of individuals. It is the public ornament; it is the public consolation; it nourishes the public hope. The poorest man finds his own importance and dignity in it, whilst the wealth and pride of individuals at every moment makes the man of humble rank and fortune sensible of his inferiority, and degrades and vilifies his condition. It is for the man in humble life – and to raise his nature, and to put him in mind of a state¹⁴ in which the privileges of opulence will cease, when he will be equal by nature, and may be more than equal by virtue – that this portion of the general wealth of his country is employed and sanctified.

I assure you I do not aim at singularity.¹⁵ I give you opinions which have been accepted amongst us from very early times to this moment, with a continued and general approbation, and which indeed are so worked into my mind that I am unable to distinguish what I have learned from others from the results of my own meditation.

¹ Society is indeed a contract In his Contrat social (1762), Rousseau had argued that genuine political society could only be formed through a social pact, or free association of intelligent human beings who choose the kind of government to which they will owe allegiance. Burke invokes Rousseau's notion so as to revise it.

² science knowledge.

³ art skill.

4 ends aims, objectives.

5 in many generations i.e. it takes many generations.

6 the visible and invisible world i.e. earth and heaven.

7 The municipal corporations of that universal kingdom i.e. the universe (heaven as well as earth).

8 nature is disobeyed...world Burke's parallel is with Adam and Eve, cast out of Eden for eating the fruit of the tree of knowledge.

9 'To the great and all-powerful God who rules this entire universe, nothing is more pleasing than the unions and gatherings of men bound together by laws that are called states' (Cicero, Dream of Scipio III 5 [13]).

10 the point of reference to which all should be directed God.

11 signiory paramount executive authority.

12 oblation devotional offering.

13 fomenting encouraging.

14 a state heaven.

15 singularity eccentricity.

William Cowper (1731–1800)

Cowper is not a Romantic poet; he was contemporary with George Washington, Joseph Haydn, Catherine the Great of Russia, and Edmund Burke (who was two years his senior). He earns his place here as an innovator in verse, particularly The Task (1785), a blank verse poem which opened up new possibilities to be exploited by Coleridge and Wordsworth.

The loss of his mother when he was 6, and persecution by an older boy at school, led to mental imbalance from which Cowper (pronounced 'Cooper') was to suffer for the rest of his life. He attended Westminster School, where he formed some close friendships, and on leaving was enrolled by his father in the Middle Temple where he was to study the law. It was a profession he came to detest, and though he kept terms before being called to the bar in 1754, he felt no obligation to practise. By this time he had fallen completely in love with his cousin, Theadora. Their relationship was frowned upon by both fathers, which led Cowper to become depressed.

Told by Theadora's father he was in no position to take care of her, Cowper took up his profession as a lawyer, but his heart was not in it. He was more interested in writing poetry, translating, and taking occasional jobs in Grub Street. For years, Theadora was not allowed either to meet William or speak of him, and the strain of this began to take a toll on her health. It became clear to her father that things had to change – but he wanted his future son-in-law to have a reliable income and profession. It was in his gift to offer Cowper the post of clerk of journals of the House of Lords, but in order to qualify, Cowper would have to be examined at the bar of the House. This was the kind of strain to which he was not equal. Crippled by a lack of confidence, he was unable to propose marriage to Theadora, and had what amounted to a nervous breakdown. A week before the examination he bought a half-ounce of laudanum, meaning to commit suicide. Unable to swallow it, he stabbed himself with his penknife, tried to drown himself, and then attempted to hang himself with a garter, which broke just before he lost consciousness. He lost Theadora and the job forever.

Cowper at first sought shelter with Reverend Martin Madan, a Methodist who emphasized original sin and salvation by grace. At this stage he believed himself 'devoted to destruction' by an angry God. After a while he went to stay at the Collegium Insanorum in St Albans run by Dr Nathaniel Cotton, where he remained in a suicidal condition until on 24 July 1764 his mood underwent a miraculous change after reading the Bible. This precipitated a calmer period in his life, and in June 1765 he moved to rural Huntingdon, having decided to leave London forever. There he befriended the Reverend Morley Unwin, a retired evangelical clergyman, and his wife Mary, with whom he decided to lodge. After Unwin's death in 1767 Cowper moved to Olney in Buckinghamshire with Mrs Unwin and her children, where he came under the influence of the former slave-trader turned evangelical pastor John Newton.¹ Newton embroiled Cowper in his scheme to evangelize to the people of Olney, persuading him to contribute most of the 66 devotional poems in Newton's Olney Hymns (1779). Newton also persuaded Cowper to marry Mrs Unwin, for his continuing residence in her house was beginning to attract scandalized comment. But there was a reason why Cowper had not previously proposed to her: years before, he promised Theadora he would marry no one else. Unable to reveal this, he claimed to be androgynous then became suicidal once more, believing in January 1773 he heard a divine voice saying 'Actum est de te, periisti' ('Your case has been decided; you have perished'). For the remainder of his life he believed himself eternally damned and never entered a church again. He found consolation in reading, gardening and rearing three young hares – Puss, Tiney and Bess.

Composed in the ornate couplet style favoured by Pope's successors, a good deal of Cowper's poetry now sounds very much of its time, but The Task (1785) is a different matter. Originally conceived as a sort of a joke, when a friend suggested he write a mock-heroic poem in blank verse on the subject of 'the sofa', it grew into an extended meditation on all manner of subjects close to Cowper's heart, such as the virtues of a rural existence and the evils of the education system. He explained its purpose as being 'to discountenance the modern enthusiasm after a London life, and to recommend rural ease and leisure as friendly to piety and virtue'. This poem of six books and 5,000 lines was innovatory because of its unabashed preoccupation with the self. To us, it is a commonplace that poets draw principally on personal experience for their subject matter; we owe that assumption to the aesthetic revolution brought about by the Romantics. In Cowper's day, it was usual for poets to compose variations on passages from the Bible, or to apostrophize such abstractions as Hope or Fear. In using an epic form for a lengthy meditation on himself, Cowper was doing something original, which was to influence the writers who came after him.

'The Winter Evening' from The Task was one of the first celebrations in verse of 'The mind contemplative'. Distinguished by a refusal to make the kind of claims to which the Romantics would be prone (his is 'a soul that does not always think'), Cowper provides a setting, a state of mind, and an account of the fancy that are reworked in Coleridge's Frost at Midnight (pp. 644–9). Crazy Kate from The Task Book I is the archetype for madwomen in Romantic poetry, including Southey's Hannah (pp. 744–5) and Margaret in Wordsworth's The Ruined Cottage (pp. 431–44).

The Task was a huge success, and it would sell in large quantities well into the next century. William Blake was an early admirer, as were Wordsworth and Coleridge, both of whom read it as schoolboys.

Cowper was deeply troubled by slavery – a controversial issue towards the end of the eighteenth century, when the abolitionist campaign was gaining support, including that of MPs on both sides of the House of Commons. At first he resisted the idea of writing poems on the subject, but after repeated requests he wrote a series of ballads designed for a popular audience of which 'Sweet Meat has Sour Sauce' is the most successful. Written in the persona of the captain of a slave ship, it is inspired by a particular set of circumstances. On 21 May 1788 the House of Commons passed a Bill proposed by Sir William Dolben, MP for the University of Oxford. It aimed to restrict the number of slaves who could be transported from Africa to British colonies in the West Indies. Five days later, merchants and inhabitants of Liverpool presented a petition to the House, complaining that the Bill would put them out of business. They were supported by MPs with slave-owning interests. Fortunately, the Bill was passed in both Houses: progress towards abolition had begun. Cowper's loathing of slavery was shared by Hannah More, Anna Laetitia Barbauld and Ann Yearsley.

In the year he published The Task, Cowper began to translate Homer, starting with a blank verse rendering of The Iliad (1791). There were frequent episodes of depression including another suicide attempt in 1795, and after Mary Unwin's death in December 1796 he became a virtual invalid. He continued to write poetry until shortly before his death on 25 April 1800.

[Crazy Kate]

From The Task (1785) (Book I)

There often wanders one whom better days
Saw better clad, in cloak of satin trimmed 535
With lace, and hat with splendid ribbon bound.
A serving-maid was she, and fell in love
With one who left her, went to sea, and died.
Her fancy followed him through foaming waves
To distant shores, and she would sit and weep 540
At what a sailor suffers; fancy too
(Delusive most where warmest wishes are)
Would oft anticipate his glad return

And dream of transports¹ she was not to know.
She heard the doleful tidings of his death 545
And never smiled again. And now she roams
The dreary waste, there spends the livelong day,
And there, unless when Charity forbids,²
The livelong night. A tattered apron hides,
Worn as a cloak, and hardly hides a gown 550
More tattered still, and both but ill conceal

A bosom heaved with never-ceasing sighs.
She begs an idle pin of all she meets
And hoards them in her sleeve, but needful food,
Though pressed with hunger oft, or comelier clothes, 555
Though pinched with cold, asks never. Kate is crazed.

[On Slavery]

From The Task (1785) (Book II)

Oh for a lodge in some vast wilderness,
Some boundless contiguity¹ of shade,
Where rumour of oppression and deceit,
Of unsuccessful or successful war
Might never reach me more! My ear is pained, 5
My soul is sick with ev'ry day's report
Of wrong and outrage with which earth is filled.
There is no flesh in man's obdurate heart –
It does not feel for man. The nat'ral bond
Of brotherhood is fevered as the flax 10
That falls asunder at the touch of fire.
He finds his fellow guilty of a skin
Not coloured like his own, and having pow'r
T' enforce the wrong, for such a worthy cause²
Dooms and devotes³ him as his lawful prey. 15
Lands intersected by a narrow frith⁴

Abhor each other. Mountains interposed
 Make enemies of nations who had else
 Like kindred drops been mingled into one.
 Thus man devotes his brother, and destroys; 20
 And worse than all, and most to be deplored
 As human nature's broadest, foulest blot,
 Chains him, and tasks him, and exacts his sweat
 With stripes that Mercy with a bleeding heart
 Weeps when she sees inflicted on a beast. 25
 Then what is man? And what man seeing this,
 And having human feelings, does not blush
 And hang his head to think himself a man?
 I would not have a slave to till my ground,
 To carry me, to fan me while I sleep 30
 And tremble when I wake, for all the wealth
 That sinews bought and sold have ever earned.
 No, dear as freedom is, and in my heart's
 Just estimation prized above all price,
 I had much rather be myself the slave 35
 And wear the bonds, than fasten them on him.
 We have no slaves at home – then why abroad?
 And they themselves, once ferried o'er the wave
 That parts us, are emancipate and loosed.⁵
 Slaves cannot breathe in England; if their lungs 40
 Receive our air, that moment they are free,
 They touch our country and their shackles fall.
 That's noble, and bespeaks a nation proud
 And jealous of the blessing. Spread it then,
 And let it circulate through ev'ry vein 45
 Of all your Empire, that where Britain's power
 Is felt, mankind may feel her mercy too.

² a worthy cause ironic; the cause is completely unworthy

³ devotes condemns.

⁴ frith estuary – perhaps a reference to the English Channel.

⁵ And they...loosed At the trial of the slave James Somerset in 1772 it was deemed that ‘as soon as any slave sets his foot upon English territory, he becomes free.’ This meant that a former slave who arrived in England could not be forcibly removed and returned to slavery elsewhere, and it was seen by many as a step towards complete abolition.

[The Winter Evening]

From The Task (1785) (Book IV)

Just when our drawing-rooms begin to blaze
With lights by clear reflection multiplied
From many a mirror (in which he of Gath,
Goliath,¹ might have seen his giant bulk 270
Whole without stooping, tow’ring crest and all),
My pleasures too begin. But me perhaps
The glowing hearth may satisfy awhile
With faint illumination that uplifts
The shadow to the ceiling, there by fits 275
Dancing uncouthly² to the quiv’ring flame.

Not undelightful³ is an hour to me
So spent in parlour twilight; such a gloom
Suits well the thoughtful or unthinking mind,
The mind contemplative, with some new theme 280
Pregnant,⁴ or indisposed alike to all.
Laugh ye, who boast your more mercurial pow’rs

That never feel a stupor, know no pause
Nor need one. I am conscious, and confess
Fearless, a soul that does not always think. 285
Me oft has fancy ludicrous and wild
Soothed with a waking dream of houses, tow'rs,
Trees, churches, and strange visages expressed
In the red cinders, while with poring eye
I gazed, myself creating what I saw. 290
Nor less amused have I quiescent watched
The sooty films that play upon the bars –
Pendulous, and foreboding in the view
Of superstition, prophesying still,
Though still deceived, some stranger's near approach.⁵ 295
'Tis thus the understanding takes repose
In indolent vacuity of thought,
And sleeps and is refreshed. Meanwhile the face
Conceals the mood lethargic with a mask
Of deep deliberation, as⁶ the man 300
Were tasked to his full strength, absorbed and lost.
Thus oft reclined at ease, I lose an hour
At evening, till at length the freezing blast
That sweeps⁷ the bolted shutter summons home
The recollected powers and, snapping short 305
The glassy threads with which the fancy weaves
Her brittle toys, restores me to myself.
How calm is my recess, and how the frost
Raging abroad, and the rough wind, endear
The silence and the warmth enjoyed within. 310
I saw the woods and fields at close of day,
A variegated show; the meadows green
Though faded, and the lands where lately waved
The golden harvest, of a mellow brown,
Upturned so lately by the forceful share.⁸ 315
I saw far off the weedy fallows⁹ smile

With verdure not unprofitable, grazed
 By flocks fast-feeding and selecting each
 His fav'rite herb; while all the leafless groves
 That skirt th' horizon wore a sable hue 320
 Scarce noticed in the kindred dusk of eve.
 Tomorrow brings a change, a total change
 Which even now – though silently performed,¹⁰
 And slowly, and by most unfelt – the face
 Of universal nature undergoes. 325
 Fast falls a fleecy show'r. The downy flakes
 Descending, and with never-ceasing lapse
 Softly alighting upon all below,
 Assimilate all objects. Earth receives
 Gladly the thick'ning mantle, and the green 330
 And tender blade that feared the chilling blast
 Escapes unhurt beneath so warm a veil.

The Winter Evening

¹ he of Gath, / Goliath The story of how young David slew the giant Goliath is told at I Samuel 17.

² uncouthly strangely.

⁴ pregnant inspired. The usage is Miltonic, recalling Paradise Lost Book I, where the Holy Spirit 'Dovelike satst brooding on the vast abyss/And mad'st it pregnant' (ll. 21–2).

⁵ Cowper alludes to the belief that the films of soot that form on the bars of log fires portend the arrival of an unexpected guest – which Coleridge's Frost at Midnight also recalls (see p. 644 n. 3).

6 as i.e. as if.

7 sweeps sweeps [across].

8 share ploughshare.

9 weedy fallows fields lying fallow, full of weeds.

10 silently performed The starting point for Coleridge's Frost at Midnight: 'The frost performs its secret ministry/Unhelped by any wind.'

A trader I am to the African shore,
But since that my trading is like to be o'er,
I'll sing you a song that you ne'er heard before,
Which nobody can deny, deny,
Which nobody can deny. 5

When I first heard the news it gave me a shock,
Much like what they call an electrical knock,
And now I am going to sell off my stock,
Which nobody can deny.

'Tis a curious assortment of dainty regales,² 10
To tickle the Negroes with when the ship sails –
Fine chains for the neck, and a cat with nine tails,
Which nobody can deny.

Here's supple-jack plenty, and store of rattan³
That will wind itself round the sides of a man 15
As close as a hoop round a bucket or can,
Which nobody can deny.

Here's padlocks and bolts, and screws for the thumbs
That squeeze them so lovingly till the blood comes;
They sweeten the temper like comfits⁴ or plums, 20
Which nobody can deny.

When a Negro his head from his victuals withdraws
And clenches his teeth and thrusts out his paws,
Here's a notable engine to open his jaws,⁵
Which nobody can deny. 25
Thus going to market, we kindly prepare
A pretty black cargo of African ware,
For what they must meet with when they get there,
Which nobody can deny.

'Twould do your heart good to see 'em below 30
Lie flat on their backs all the way as we go,
Like sprats⁶ on a gridiron, scores in a row,⁷
Which nobody can deny.

But ah! if in vain I have studied an art
So gainful to me, all boasting apart, 35
I think it will break my compassionate heart,
Which nobody can deny.

For oh, how it enters my soul like an awl;⁸
This pity, which some people self-pity call,
Is sure the most heart-piercing pity of all, 40
Which nobody can deny.
So this is my song, as I told you before;

Come buy off my stock, for I must no more
Carry Caesars and Pompeys⁹ to sugar-cane shore,
Which nobody can deny, deny, 45
Which nobody can deny.

Sweet Meat has Sour Sauce

¹ For the circumstances that inspired this poem, see headnote p. 19.

² dainty regales choice gifts (ironic).

³ Here's supple-jack plenty...rattan Canes, switches and ropes were made out of supple-jack (stems of creeping or twining shrubs found in the West Indies) and rattan.

⁴ comfits sweetmeat made of some fruit, root, etc., preserved with sugar.

⁵ to open his jaws clamp designed to open the mouths of lockjaw sufferers, used for force-feeding slaves who attempted to starve themselves to death.

⁶ sprats small sea-fish.

⁸ awl small tool for making holes in leather.

⁹ Caesars and Pompeys Slaves were often named after Roman rulers.

Thomas Paine (1737–1809)

Writer, deist, member of the French National Assembly and American revolutionary leader, Thomas Paine was one of the foremost political thinkers of his time. A former corset-maker and customs officer, he emigrated to America at the age of 37 in 1774 to be swept up in what was to become the American War of Independence. Two years later he published Common Sense, the first appeal for independence, to popular acclaim, selling 120,000 copies within three months. His forthright account of British government as a ‘monarchical tyranny’ marked him out as a republican: ‘it is the pride of kings which throws mankind into confusion’, he wrote. Common Sense was an instant bestseller and has never been out of print.

After America’s victory, he returned briefly to England (May–September 1789), and went from there to France, where he became an associate of Thomas Jefferson and member of the Lafayette circle. Burke having published Reflections on the Revolution in France in 1790, Paine composed what was to be one of the most effective responses to it, The Rights of Man (1791–2). Beginning with the idea that good government is founded on reason, Paine argued that democracy – a society in which all men have equal rights and in which leadership depends on talent and wisdom – is better than aristocracy. In the course of his argument he demonstrates that a hereditary monarchy is prone to ‘ignorance and incapacity’; establishes republicanism as the only logical and fair method of government; champions the American experience on the grounds that ‘the nation, through its constitution, controls the whole government’; and proposes the institution of welfare support for the elderly, sick and impoverished.

The Rights of Man is a passionate argument for humane, fair and democratic government, but it is hard not to be struck by how much remains controversial even today. If that is so, it must have seemed rebarbative to Pitt’s increasingly repressive government, particularly given its immediate popularity: it sold 200,000 copies in 1791–3, many in cheap editions designed for working people. Not surprisingly, the government banned it in September 1792 and issued an order for Paine’s arrest. He narrowly escaped and fled to Paris; in his absence he was charged with sedition and sentenced to death – a sentence that would have been carried out had he returned.

Already a member of the National Assembly, he took an active part in the governmental affairs of France. Significantly, he voted against the execution of Louis in January 1793, an act that earned him no friends among those responsible for the Reign of Terror. Imprisoned in the Luxembourg gaol to await execution, his health went into decline. Nonetheless, he composed The Age of Reason, a trenchant attack on Christianity and all organized religions. This work, more than any other, has been responsible for the hostility Paine has attracted, because of the misconception that it promotes atheism. But Paine was no atheist. ‘I believe in one God, and no more’, he wrote, ‘and I hope for happiness beyond this life.’ His quarrel was with institutionalized religion, which (being man-made) he regarded as inherently corrupt.

Eluding the guillotine by the slimmest of accidents, he was released in November 1794 and continued to involve himself in French public affairs. He became the intimate of Napoleon, who claimed to sleep with a copy of The Rights of Man under his pillow and consulted him on plans for an invasion of Britain. In 1802, encouraged by the new Presidency of his friend Thomas Jefferson, Paine returned to America. Jefferson welcomed him, but many of his former allies shunned him, horrified by what they perceived as the irreligion of The Age of Reason. He advised Jefferson on the Louisiana Purchase in 1803 (which doubled the size of the United States), and remained in close touch with him in subsequent years, during which he published pamphlets on American politics. Paine had money troubles throughout his life, which worsened in old age, and his health, damaged by incarceration, never fully recovered. He died at 59 Grove Street, Greenwich Village, New York City, on 8 June 1809, and was buried in New Rochelle. A decade later his remains were disinterred by William Cobbett, who took them back to England, where they promptly disappeared.

Paine's prose, written with a clarity and conviction that surpasses anything to be found in the work of his contemporaries, rings out as an articulate and well-reasoned defence of republicanism. In 'Freedom of Posterity' he refutes Burke's argument that the English are bound to the constitutional monarchy established by their forefathers at the time of the Glorious Revolution of 1688. 'On Revolution' argues that a revolution is needed to abolish 'Monarchical sovereignty' and shift power into the hands of the people. 'Republicanism' argues for what Paine felt to be the only system 'established and conducted for the interest of the public'.

From Common Sense (Philadelphia, 1776)

Some writers have so confounded¹ society with government as to leave little or no distinction between them – whereas they are not only different, but have different origins. Society is produced by our wants, and government by our wickedness; the former promotes our happiness positively by uniting our affections, the latter negatively by restraining our vices. The one encourages intercourse, the other creates distinctions.² The first is a patron, the last a punisher.

Society in every state is a blessing, but government even in its best state is but a necessary evil – in its worst state an intolerable one. For when we suffer, or are exposed to the same miseries by a government which we expect in a country without government, our calamity is heightened by reflecting that we furnish the means by which we suffer.

Government, like dress, is the badge of lost innocence; the palaces of kings are built on the ruins of the bowers of paradise.³ For were the impulses of conscience clear, uniform, and irresistibly obeyed, man would need no other lawgiver. But that not being the case, he finds it necessary to surrender up a part of his property⁴ to furnish means for the protection of the rest – and this he is induced to do by the same prudence which in every other case advises him out of two evils to choose the least. Wherefore, security being the true design and end of government, it unanswerably follows that whatever form thereof appears most likely to ensure it to us, with the least expense and greatest benefit, is preferable to all others.

² The one...distinctions Society encourages social intercourse; government promotes the social hierarchy.

³ the palaces of kings...paradise an idea deriving from Rousseau's concept of the noble savage, outlined in his Discourse on Inequality.

⁴ surrender up a part of his property in taxes – one cause of the American Revolution.

[Freedom of Posterity]

From The Rights of Man Part I (1791)

The English Parliament of 1688 did a certain thing¹ which, for themselves and their constituents, they had a right to do, and which it appeared right should be done. But, in addition to this right (which they possessed by delegation), they set up another right by assumption: that of binding and controlling posterity to the end of time. The case, therefore, divides itself into two parts – the right which they possessed by delegation, and the right which they set up by assumption. The first is admitted but with respect to the second I reply:

There never did, there never will, and there never can, exist a parliament, or any description of men, or any generation of men, in any country, possessed of the right or the power of binding and controlling posterity to the ‘end of time’, or of commanding for ever how the world shall be governed, or who shall govern it. And therefore all such clauses, acts or declarations by which the makers of them attempt to do what they have neither the right nor the power to do – nor the power to execute – are in themselves null and void. Every age and generation must be as free to act for itself, in all cases, as the ages and generations which preceded it.

The vanity and presumption of governing beyond the grave is the most ridiculous and insolent of all tyrannies. Man has no property in man, neither has any generation a property in the generations which are to follow. The parliament or the people of 1688, or of any other period, had no more right to dispose of the people of the present day, or to bind or to control them in any shape whatever, than the parliament or the people of the present day have to dispose of, bind or control those who are to live a hundred or a thousand years hence. Every generation is and must be competent to all the purposes which its occasions require. It is the living, and not the dead, that are to be accommodated. When man ceases to be, his power and his wants cease with him, and having no longer any participation in the concerns of this world, he has no longer any authority in directing who shall be its governors, or how its government shall be organized, or how administered.

Freedom of Posterity

¹ a certain thing i.e. replace the Catholic James II with the Protestant William of Orange. The Glorious Revolution was seen by English radicals as the forerunner of the revolutions in America and, subsequently, France.

[On Revolution]

From The Rights of Man Part I (1791)

When we survey the wretched condition of man under the monarchical and hereditary systems of government, dragged from his home by one power, or driven by another, and impoverished by taxes more than by enemies, it becomes evident that those systems are bad, and that a general revolution in the principle and construction of governments is necessary.

What is government more than the management of the affairs of a nation? It is not, and from its nature cannot be, the property of any particular man or family, but of the whole community at whose expense it is supported. And though by force or contrivance it has been usurped into an inheritance, the usurpation cannot alter the right of things. Sovereignty, as a matter of right, appertains to the nation only, and not to any individual; and a nation has at all times an inherent indefeasible¹ right to abolish any form of government it finds inconvenient, and establish such as accords with its interest, disposition and happiness. The romantic² and barbarous distinction of men into kings and subjects, though it may suit the condition of courtiers, cannot that of citizens – and is exploded by the principle upon which governments are now founded. Every citizen is a member of the sovereignty, and as such can acknowledge no personal subjection, and his obedience can be only to the laws.

When men think of what government is, they must necessarily suppose it to possess a knowledge of all the objects and matters upon which its authority is to be exercised. In this view of government, the republican system as established by America and France operates to embrace the whole of a nation, and the knowledge necessary to the interest of all the parts is to be found in the centre, which the parts by representation form.

But the old governments are on a construction that excludes knowledge as well as happiness – government by monks who know nothing of the world beyond the walls of a convent is as consistent as government by kings.

What were formerly called revolutions were little more than a change of persons or an alteration of local circumstances. They rose and fell like things of course,³ and had nothing in their existence or their fate that could influence beyond the spot that produced them. But what we now see in the world, from the revolutions of America and France, are a renovation of the natural order of things, a system of principles as universal as truth and the existence of man, and combining moral with political happiness and national prosperity.

I. Men are born and always continue free and equal in respect of their rights. Civil distinctions, therefore, can be founded only on public utility.

II. The end⁴ of all political associations is the preservation of the natural and imprescriptible rights of man; and these rights are liberty, property, security, and resistance of oppression.

III. The nation is essentially the source of all sovereignty; nor can any individual or any body of men be entitled to any authority which is not expressly derived from it.

In these principles there is nothing to throw a nation into confusion by inflaming ambition. They are calculated to call forth wisdom and abilities, and to exercise them for the public good, and not for the emolument⁵ or aggrandizement of particular descriptions of men or families. Monarchical sovereignty – the enemy of mankind and the source of misery – is abolished, and sovereignty itself is restored to its natural and original place: the nation. Were this the case throughout Europe, the cause of wars would be taken away.

² romantic impractical, fanciful. It is interesting to find Paine using this word. Unaware of the revolution in literature that would take place within the next decade, he is thinking of Burke's claims that medieval codes of honour were the best means by which human conduct might be regulated.

³ of course as a matter of course; over a course of time.

⁴ end aim.

⁵ emolument financial benefit.

[Republicanism]

From The Rights of Man Part II (1792)

What is called a republic is not any particular form of government. It is wholly characteristical of the purport,¹ matter or object for which government ought to be instituted, and on which it is to be employed: 'res-publica' (the public affairs, or the public good – or, literally translated, the public thing). It is a word of a good original,² referring to what ought to be the character and business of government, and in this sense it is naturally opposed to the word 'monarchy', which has a base original signification – it means arbitrary power in an individual person, in the exercise of which himself (and not the 'res-publica') is the object.

Every government that does not act on the principle of a republic – or, in other words, that does not make the res-publica its whole and sole object – is not a good government. Republican government is no other than government established and conducted for the interest of the public, as well individually as collectively. It is not necessarily connected with any particular form, but it most naturally associates with the representative form, as being best calculated to secure the end for which a nation is at the expense of supporting it.

Various forms of government have affected to style themselves a republic. Poland calls itself a republic, which is an hereditary aristocracy with what is called an elective³ monarchy. Holland calls itself a republic, which is chiefly aristocratical with an hereditary stadtholdership.⁴ But the government of America, which is wholly on the system of representation, is the only real republic in character and in practice that now exists. Its government has no other object than the public business of the nation, and therefore it is properly a republic; and the Americans have taken care that this and no other shall always be the object of their government, by their rejecting everything hereditary, and establishing government on the system of representation only...What Athens was in miniature, America will be in magnitude: the one was the wonder of the ancient world, the other is becoming the admiration, the model of the present. It is the easiest of all the forms of government to be understood, and the most eligible in practice – and excludes at once the ignorance and insecurity of the hereditary mode, and the inconvenience of the simple democracy.

² original meaning, referent.

³ elective elected.

⁴ stadtholdership magistrate-general (abolished 1802).

Anna Seward (1742–1809)

Seward was born in Eyam, Derbyshire, the daughter of Thomas Seward and Elizabeth Hunter, of Lichfield. Her father was headmaster of Lichfield Grammar School, and had taught Samuel Johnson. Under his tutelage she was reading Milton at 2, and composing religious verse by the age of 10. An accident lamed her in childhood. In 1750 her father became a Canon of Lichfield Cathedral, and from 1754 the family resided in the Bishop's Palace. Partly, no doubt, because her brother and two sisters died in infancy, she enjoyed an intensely close relationship with Honora Sneyd, adopted by the Swards as a child, and their close relationship is the subject of some of her finest verse. Honora's marriage to Richard Lovell Edgeworth in 1773 caused Anna profound unhappiness.

Her literary reputation was established with the Elegy on Captain Cook (1780), which had entered its fourth edition by 1784. The hanging of Major André, a suitor of Honora Sneyd, in the American War, provided the occasion for her Monody on Major André (1781), a success both at home and in America. And her popularity was consolidated by Poem to the Memory of Lady Miller (1782) and Louisa, a Poetical Novel, in Four Epistles (1784).

Seward held forth in literary circles as the Swan of Lichfield, unafraid to pass judgement on her contemporaries in print. She wrote a series of letters signed 'Benvolio' to the Gentleman's Magazine in 1786, designed to deflate Dr Johnson's posthumous reputation. Despite her own earlier support for the French Revolution, she reprimanded Helen Maria Williams for her radical attachments, and expressed strong reservations about Charlotte Smith's advocacy of suicide in her translations from Petrarch and Goethe.

Her visit to Lady Eleanor Butler and Sarah Ponsonby, the Ladies of Llangollen, was the occasion for the title poem in Llangollen Vale, and Other Poems (1796); two of the poems here, 'To Time Past' and 'Eyam', are taken from that volume. 'To Time Past', composed in 1788, is one of her finest love poems to Honora Sneyd. Written in anticipation of Sneyd's impending marriage to Edgeworth, it brings anxiety at her own future into painfully sharp focus; the prospect before her is one of loneliness among the 'bare bleak fields' of winter. In the event, Seward's life was a comfortable one; unlike other women writers, she was not compelled to write out of financial necessity. After her father's death in 1790 she lived comfortably on £400 per annum (the equivalent of about £34,000 today). Perhaps because 'Eyam' is about memory, it reminds us of The Prelude; like that work it is confessional, and attempts to describe the emotional attachments of places known to her. But this selection begins with a sonnet of April 1771, edited from manuscript, in which Seward declares how much more she loves Honora when illness increases her concern for her well-being.

Sonnet written from an Eastern Apartment in the Bishop's Palace at Lichfield, which commands a view of Stowe Valley. April 1771 (edited from MS)¹

In this chill morning of a wintry spring
I look into the gloomed and rainy vale;
The sullen clouds, the whistling winds assail,
Lour on the fields, and with their ruffling wing
Disturb the lake. But love and memory cling 5
To their known scene in this cold influence pale;
Yet prized, as when it bloomed in summer's gale,
Tinged by his setting sun. And thus, when fling
The powers of sickness o'er some beauteous form
Their shadowy languors (form devoutly dear 10
As thine to me, Honora²), with more warm
And anxious gaze the eyes of Love sincere
Bend on the charms, dim in their tintless snow,
Than when with health's purpureal³ grace they glow.

Sonnet Written from an Eastern Apartment

¹ This sonnet is edited from a manuscript in the Bodleian Library entitled 'Unpublished Verses Written by Anna Seward'. It is not in her hand, and may date from around 1800. Seward's note to the poem runs as follows: 'The energetic spirit of Milton's sonnets, and the majestic grace of their varied pauses undulating through the lines, induced the author of these to adopt their model rather than the more facile measures of the modern sonnet, viz. three stanzas closing with a couplet.’

² Honora Sneyd, adopted as a child by Seward’s parents, with whom Seward enjoyed a close attachment.

³ purpureal a purple colour that, to Seward, indicates good health.

To Time Past. Written Dec. 1772

From Llangollen Vale, with Other Poems (1796)

Return, blessed years, when not the jocund spring,
Luxuriant summer, nor the amber hours
Calm autumn gives, my heart invoked to bring
Joys whose rich balm o’er all the bosom pours! –
When ne’er I wished might grace the closing day 5

One tint purpureal¹ or one golden ray;
When the loud storms that desolate the bowers
Found dearer welcome than favonian² gales,
And winter’s bare bleak fields, than summer’s flowery vales!

Yet not to deck pale hours with vain parade 10
Beneath the blaze of wide-illumined dome;
Not for the bounding dance; not to pervade
And charm the sense with music; nor, as roam
The mimic passions o’er theatric scene,
To laugh or weep – oh not for these, I ween, 15
But for delights that made the heart their home
Was the grey night-frost on the sounding plain
More than the sun invoked, that gilds the grassy lane.

Yes, for the joys that trivial joys excel,
My loved Honora,³ did we hail the gloom 20
Of dim November’s eve; and, as it fell,

And the bright fires shone cheerful round the room,
Dropped the warm curtains with no tardy hand,
And felt our spirits and our hearts expand,
Listening their steps, who still, where'er they come, 25
Make the keen stars that glaze the settled snows,
More than the sun invoked, when first he tints the rose.

Affection, friendship, sympathy – your throne
Is winter's glowing hearth, and ye were ours;
Thy smile, Honora, made them all our own. 30
Where are they now? Alas, their choicest powers
Faded at thy retreat, for thou art gone!
And many a dark long eve I sigh alone
In thrilled remembrance of the vanished hours,
When storms were dearer than the balmy gales, 35
And winter's bare bleak fields than green luxuriant vales.

To Time Past

² favonian from the west wind – therefore favourable, gentle.

³ Honora Sneyd.

Advice to Mrs Smith. A Sonnet.¹

From Gentleman's Magazine (1786)

Muse of the south, whose soul-enchancing shell
With mournful notes can melt the softened heart,
And to each breast of sympathy impart
The tender sorrow thou describ'st so well!
Ah, never let thy lyre superior dwell 5
On themes thy better judgement must disdain!

It ill befits that verse like thine should tell
Of Petrarch's love, or Werther's frantic pain!
Let not or foreign taste or tales enchain
The genuine freedom of thy flowing line; 10
Nor the dark dreams of suicide² obtain
Deceitful lustre from such tones as thine;
But still, to nature and to virtue given,
Thy heavenly talent dedicate to heaven!

Advice to Mrs Smith

¹ This sonnet was written in response to the translations from Petrarch and Goethe that appeared for the first time in the third edition of Charlotte Smith's Elegiac Sonnets (1786) (pp. 93–5, 97–9).

² Goethe's hero, Werther, commits suicide. Seward's concern was not an over-reaction. The popularity of Goethe's novel led to a rash of suicides throughout Europe.

Eyam¹(composed August 1788)

From Llangollen Vale, with Other Poems (1796)

For one short week I leave, with anxious heart,
Source of my filial cares, the FULL OF DAYS,
Lured by the promise of harmonic art
To breathe her Handel's² soul-exalting lays.
Pensive I trace the Derwent's amber wave,³ 5
Foaming through sylvan banks, or view it lave
The soft, romantic vallies, high o'er-peered
By hills and rocks, in savage grandeur reared.
Not two short miles from thee, can I refrain
Thy haunts, my native Eyam, long unseen? 10

Thou and thy loved inhabitants again
Shall meet my transient gaze. Thy rocky screen,
Thy airy cliffs, I mount, and seek thy shade,
Thy roofs that brow the steep, romantic glade;
But while on me the eyes of Friendship glow, 15
Swell my pained sighs, my tears spontaneous flow.

In scenes paternal, not beheld through years,
Nor viewed till now but by a father's side,
Well might the tender, tributary tears
From keen regrets of duteous fondness glide! 20
Its pastor, to this human flock no more
Shall the long flight of future days restore;
Distant he droops, and that once-gladdening eye
Now languid gleams, e'en when his friends are nigh.⁴

Through this known walk, where weedy gravel lies, 25
Rough and unsightly, by the long, coarse grass
Of the once smooth and vivid green, with sighs
To the deserted rectory I pass,
Stray through the darkened chamber's naked bound
Where childhood's earliest, liveliest bliss I found: 30
How changed since erst, the lightsome walls beneath,
The social joys did their warm comforts breathe!

Ere yet I go, who may return no more,
That sacred pile, mid yonder shadowy trees,
Let me revisit. Ancient, massy door, 35
Thou gratest hoarse! My vital spirits freeze,
Passing the vacant pulpit, to the space
Where humble rails the decent altar grace,
And where my infant sister's ashes sleep,⁵
Whose loss I left the childish sport to weep. 40

Now the low beams, with paper garlands hung,⁶
In memory of some village youth or maid,
Draw the soft tear from thrilled remembrance sprung;

How oft my childhood marked that tribute paid.
The gloves, suspended by the garland's side, 45
White as its snowy flowers, with ribbands tied;
Dear village, long these wreaths funereal spread,
Simple memorials of thy early dead!

But oh, thou blank and silent pulpit! – thou
That with a father's precepts, just and bland, 50
Didst win my ear, as reason's strength'ning glow
Showed their full value, now thou seemst to stand
Before my sad, suffused,⁷ and trembling gaze,
The dreariest relic of departed days;
Of eloquence paternal, nervous, clear, 55
DIM APPARITION THOU – and bitter is my tear.

Eyam

² George Frederic Handel (1685–1759), who became a British subject in 1726 having arrived in London in 1711.

4 Thomas Seward (1708–90) was senile by the time this poem was composed.

5 Seward's brother and two sisters died in infancy.

6 'The ancient custom of hanging a garland of white roses, made of writing paper, and a pair of white gloves, over the pew of the unmarried villagers, who die in the flower of their age, is observed to this day in the village of Eyam, and in most other villages and little towns in the Peak' (Seward's note).

7 suffused tearful.

Anna Laetitia Barbauld (née Aikin) (1743–1825)

Barbauld was born at Kibworth, Leicester, the elder child of Dr John Aikin, a schoolmaster, and Jane Jennings. In 1758 her father became a teacher at the Warrington Academy for Dissenters, where one of his colleagues, Joseph Priestley (friend of Benjamin Franklin, discoverer of oxygen and founder of modern Unitarianism), encouraged her poetic talents. With her brother John (1747–1822), a physician and accomplished author, she published Miscellaneous Pieces in Prose in 1773, the year which also saw publication of her Poems (which included 'A Summer Evening's Meditation'). They were an immediate success, the Poems reaching a fifth edition by 1777.

Despite well-founded doubts, in 1774 she married Rochemont Barbauld, a Dissenting minister educated at the Warrington Academy, with whom she ran a boys' school in Palgrave, Suffolk. They had no children, but in 1777 adopted her nephew, Charles Rochemont Aikin, for whom she composed her popular Lessons for Children (1778) and Hymns in Prose for Children (1781). Visits to London put her in touch with the Bluestocking circle, among whom she is celebrated in More's Sensibility (see pp. 59–69). Despite the success of their school, her husband felt increasingly overwhelmed, and it closed in 1785, allowing them to travel in France and Switzerland for a year.

On their return to England the Barbaulds settled in Hampstead, where she devoted herself to pamphleteering, most notably in defence of Dissenters (1790), democratic government and popular education (1792), and an attack on the newly declared war with France in 1793. Political concerns were never far from her mind, and one of the finest testaments to her convictions is her Epistle to William Wilberforce (1791) (see pp. 41–44), one of the most eloquent anti-slavery poems of the day. It was composed at a moment when the campaign against slavery faltered: on 18 April 1791 Wilberforce (1759–1833) proposed his first Bill urging abolition. Although it had the support of Charles James Fox and the Prime Minister, William Pitt, it was defeated two days later. He tried again a year later, and although that Bill was passed by the House of Commons, it was thrown out by the Lords the following year (this is the struggle recalled by Wordsworth at Thirteen-Book Prelude x 201–10). The slave trade was not outlawed until February 1807.

From 1796 her brother took over editorship of the Monthly Magazine, an important periodical issued under the imprint of the radical publisher Joseph Johnson, and read by Wordsworth and Coleridge among others. She contributed a good deal of poetry to it, including her poem To Mr Coleridge (1797) (see pp. 45–6). Composed shortly after their meeting in Bristol, August 1797, it is distinguished by early recognition of his talents, and her shrewd warning against the 'metaphysic lore' which was to embroil him in later years. Such was her eminence by 1800 that Wordsworth sent her a complimentary copy of the new two-volume Lyrical Ballads, and George Dyer included three of her poems in an anthology of Odes.¹

Figure 5 Anna Laetitia Barbauld (1743–1825), engraved by Chapman after an unknown artist, published 1798. She was hailed by the Bluestockings as an important new talent in the early 1770s and remained prominent in the literary world until her death. (© National Portrait Gallery, London.)

Mrs Barbauld,

Published Sep. 1st 1798. by Vernor & Hood, Foultry.

In 1802 the Barbaulds moved to Stoke Newington. By this time her husband's mental health was increasingly fragile, and in 1808, after several fits of violence, he committed suicide by drowning. Released from the obligation of tending him, she enjoyed a period of vigorous productivity, editing Akenside and Collins, the Letters of Richardson, The British Novelists (50 vols, 1810), and reviewing fiction for the Monthly Review (1809–15). She died in Stoke Newington in 1825.

In addition to the works mentioned above, Barbauld is represented by a complete text of Eighteen Hundred and Eleven (1812) – a passionate, perceptive work about the disastrous state in which the country found itself. Britain had been at war with France since 1793, with a brief hiatus during the Treaty of Amiens in 1802. By the time she was writing, most of Britain's allies had capitulated to the French, whose control over Europe was almost total. As both sides had widespread economic interests, the conflict effectively amounted to a world war, entailing what we would now call economic sanctions – blockades, in fact – and by 1810 Britain's economy was near collapse. The result was to impoverish civilian populations, who bore the brunt of scarcity and high prices, the effects of which were exacerbated by bankruptcies, layoffs, labour revolts and cuts in production. When in 1811 George III declined into permanent dementia, the argument for a negotiated settlement became overwhelming. All the same, the country would remain at war until May 1814.

Eighteen Hundred and Eleven, with its plea for an end to the conflict, constituted a bold statement that made her a prime target of Tory reviewers. Writing anonymously in June 1812, John Wilson Croker² of the Quarterly Review began his attack with two sentences that set the tone for what was to come: 'Our old acquaintance Mrs Barbauld turned satirist! The last thing we should have expected, and, now that we have seen her satire, the last thing that we could have desired.'³ In those days it was acceptable to attack female poets on the grounds of their sex, as Croker proceeded to do:

We had hoped, indeed, that the empire might have been saved without the intervention of a lady-author: we even flattered ourselves that the interests of Europe and of humanity would in some degree have swayed our public councils, without the descent of (dea ex machina) Mrs Anna Laetitia Barbauld in a quarto, upon the theatre where the great European tragedy is now performing. Not such, however, is her opinion; an irresistible impulse of public duty – a confident sense of commanding talents – have induced her to dash down her shagreen spectacles and her knitting needles, and to sally forth, hand in hand with her renowned compatriot,⁴ in the magnanimous resolution of saving a sinking state, by the instrumentality of a pamphlet in prose and a pamphlet in verse.⁵

Croker concluded by 'warning her to desist from satire, which indeed is satire on herself alone; and of entreating, with great earnestness, that she will not, for the sake of this ungrateful generation, put herself to the trouble of writing any more party pamphlets in verse'.⁶ As this was the most influential of the hostile reviews, some of its specific criticisms are quoted in my annotations. Although it's impossible not to be struck by their chauvinism today – and there's no doubt that Barbauld's male reviewers deliberately used her gender as one of many sticks with which to beat her – it's worth remembering that their primary motivation was political. She was by this time well known as a radical Dissenter, and the fact that she was a woman made them all the more determined to respond with the criticism always directed at those who stand up for the poor and disadvantaged in times of war – that she was a traitor. The anonymous reviewer in the Eclectic Review attacked Barbauld's poem for being 'in a most extraordinary degree unkindly and unpatriotic', adding: 'It seems hardly possible that such a poem as this could have been produced, without the concurrence of a peculiarly frigid temperament.'⁷

Although it has been suggested that none of the reviews were positive, the Unitarian Monthly Repository was the exception, whose reviewer, 'M.', commended Eighteen Hundred and Eleven in fulsome terms: 'We lament that this poem is not more extended. . . . Many more reflections of the most impressive nature might, on such a subject, have flowed from the pen of an author, whom every man of poetic and moral taste reveres as a poet, a patriot and a Christian.'⁸ But this was not enough, on its own, to mitigate the ferocity of the onslaught and the pain it must have caused. Perhaps for that reason Barbauld resolved not to publish any more poetry during her lifetime; doubtless those close to her encouraged her to remain silent. Lucy Aikin recalled in her memoir: 'Who indeed, that knew and loved her, could have wished her to expose again that honoured head to the scorns of the unmanly, the malignant, and the base?... She even laid aside the intention which she had entertained of preparing a new edition of her Poems, long out of print and often enquired for in vain.'⁹

A Summer Evening's Meditation

From Poems (1773)

One sun by day, by night ten thousand shine.

(Young)¹

'Tis passed! – the sultry tyrant of the south²
Has spent his short-lived rage. More grateful hours
Move silent on; the skies no more repel
The dazzled sight, but with mild maiden beams
Of tempered light invite the cherished eye 5
To wander o'er their sphere, where, hung aloft,
Dian's bright crescent,³ like a silver bow
New-strung in heaven, lifts high its beamy horns
Impatient for the night, and seems to push
Her brother down the sky. Fair Venus shines 10
Even in the eye of day – with sweetest beam
Propitious shines, and shakes a trembling flood
Of softened radiance from her dewy locks.
The shadows spread apace, while meekened Eve,
Her cheek yet warm with blushes, slow retires 15
Through the Hesperian gardens of the west,⁴
And shuts the gates of day. 'Tis now the hour
When Contemplation from her sunless haunts
(The cool damp grotto or the lonely depth
Of unpierced woods, where, wrapped in solid shade, 20
She mused away the gaudy hours of noon
And fed on thoughts unripened by the sun)⁵
Moves forward, and with radiant finger points
To yon blue concave swelled by breath divine,
Where, one by one, the living eyes of heaven⁶ 25
Awake, quick kindling o'er the face of ether
One boundless blaze – ten thousand trembling fires
And dancing lustres – where th' unsteady eye,
Restless and dazzled, wanders unconfined
O'er all this field of glories: spacious field, 30

And worthy of the Master!⁷ – He whose hand
With hieroglyphics older than the Nile
Inscribed the mystic tablet⁸ hung on high
To public gaze, and said, ‘Adore, oh man,
The finger of thy God!’ From what pure wells 35
Of milky light, what soft o’erflowing urn
Are all these lamps so filled – these friendly lamps
For ever streaming o’er the azure deep
To point our path and light us to our home?
How soft they slide along their lucid spheres, 40
And, silent as the foot of time, fulfil
Their destined courses! Nature’s self is hushed
And, but⁹ a scattered leaf which rustles through
The thick-wove foliage, not a sound is heard
To break the midnight air – though the raised ear, 45
Intensely listening, drinks in every breath.
How deep the silence, yet how loud the praise!
But are they silent all, or is there not
A tongue in every star that talks with man
And woos him to be wise – nor woos in vain? 50
 This dead of midnight is the noon of thought,
And wisdom mounts her zenith with the stars.
At this still hour the self-collected soul
Turns inward, and beholds a stranger there
Of high descent, and more than mortal rank: 55
An embryo God, a spark of fire divine
Which must burn on for ages, when the sun
(Fair transitory creature of a day!)
Has closed his golden eye and, wrapped in shades,
Forgets his wonted journey through the east. 60
 Ye citadels of light and seats of gods!
Perhaps my future home from whence the soul,
Revolving periods past, may oft look back
With recollected tenderness on all
The various busy scenes she left below, 65

Its deep-laid projects and its strange events,
As on some fond and doting tale that soothed
Her infant hours. Oh be it lawful now
To tread the hallowed circle of your courts,
And with mute wonder and delighted awe 70
Approach your burning confines!

Seized in thought,

On fancy's wild and roving wing I sail,¹⁰
From the green borders of the peopled earth
And the pale moon, her duteous fair attendant;
From solitary Mars; from the vast orb 75
Of Jupiter, whose huge gigantic bulk
Dances in ether like the lightest leaf;
To the dim verge, the suburbs of the system¹¹
Where cheerless Saturn midst her wat'ry moons,
Girt with a lucid zone,¹² majestic sits 80
In gloomy grandeur, like an exiled queen
Amongst her weeping handmaids. Fearless thence
I launch into the trackless deeps of space
Where, burning round, ten thousand suns appear
Of elder beam, which ask no leave to shine 85
Of our terrestrial star, nor borrow light
From the proud regent of our scanty day¹³ –
Sons of the morning, first-born of creation,
And only less than Him who marks their track
And guides their fiery wheels. Here must I stop, 90
Or is there aught beyond? What hand unseen
Impels me onward through the glowing orbs
Of habitable nature far remote,
To the dread confines of eternal night,
To solitudes of vast unpeopled space, 95
The deserts of creation, wide and wild,
Where embryo systems and unkindled suns
Sleep in the womb of chaos?

Fancy droops,
 And thought astonished stops her bold career;
 But oh, thou mighty mind, whose powerful word I00
 Said, ‘Thus let all things be’, and thus they were –
 Where shall I seek thy presence? How unblamed¹⁴
 Invoke thy dread perfection?¹⁵
 Have the broad eyelids of the morn¹⁶ beheld thee,
 Or does the beamy shoulder of Orion¹⁷ I05
 Support thy throne? Oh, look with pity down
 On erring, guilty man – not in thy names
 Of terror clad; not with those thunders armed
 That conscious Sinai felt,¹⁸ when fear appalled
 The scattered tribes: Thou hast a gentler voice II0
 That whispers comfort to the swelling heart
 Abashed, yet longing to behold her maker.
 But now my soul, unused to stretch her powers
 In flight so daring, drops her weary wing
 And seeks again the known accustomed spot II5
 Dressed up with sun and shade, and lawns and streams,
 A mansion fair and spacious for its guest,
 And full replete with wonders. Let me here,
 Content and grateful, wait th’ appointed time
 And ripen for the skies: the hour will come I20
 When all these splendours bursting on my sight
 Shall stand unveiled, and to my ravished sense
 Unlock the glories of the world unknown.

A Summer Evening’s Meditation

¹ Edward Young, Night Thoughts ix 748. Though little read today, Young was tremendously influential in the late eighteenth century.

² the sultry tyrant of the south the sun.

3 Dian's bright crescent the moon, of which Diana was goddess.

4 the Hesperian gardens of the west In Greek myth, the daughters of Hesperus (the evening star) guarded the garden in which golden apples grew in the Isles of the Blessed, at the western extremity of the earth.

5 fed on thoughts unripened by the sun cf. Wordsworth, 'These chairs they have no words to utter' 13: 'I have thoughts that are fed by the sun.' Their common source is Paradise Lost iii 37.

6 the living eyes of heaven the stars.

7 the Master God.

8 the mystic tablet on which were written the Ten Commandments.

9 but except.

10 McCarthy and Kraft suggest an antecedent in Hume, Enquiry Concerning Human Understanding: 'the thought can in an instant transport us into the most distant regions of the universe; or even beyond the universe, into the unbounded chaos, where nature is supposed to lie in total confusion.'

11 suburbs of the system outskirts of the solar system.

12 zone belt; a reference to the rings around Saturn.

13 the proud regent of our scanty day the sun.

14 unblamed uncensured (i.e. without doing God an injustice).

15 How unblamed...perfection McCarthy and Kraft note the allusion to Paradise Lost iii 3: 'May I express thee unblamed?'

¹⁶ eyelids of the morn a biblical expression, as McCarthy and Kraft note; cf. Job 41:18.

¹⁷ Orion giant hunter who sprang from the urine of Jupiter, Neptune and Mercury. Anna refers to the constellation of Orion into which he was turned at his death.

¹⁸ those thunders...felt Jehovah delivered the Ten Commandments to Moses on Mount Sinai amidst ‘thunders and lightnings’, Exodus 19.

Epistle to William Wilberforce, Esq.,¹ on the Rejection of the Bill for Abolishing the Slave Trade² (composed by 17 June 1791)

From Poems (1792)

Cease, Wilberforce, to urge thy generous aim –
Thy country knows the sin and stands the shame!
The preacher, poet, senator,³ in vain
Has rattled in her sight the Negro’s chain,
With his deep groans assailed her startled ear 5
And rent the veil that hid his constant tear,
Forced her averted eyes his stripes to scan,
Beneath the bloody scourge laid bare the man,
Claimed pity’s tear, urged conscience’ strong control
And flashed conviction on her shrinking soul. 10
The muse, too soon awaked, with ready tongue
At mercy’s shrine applaudive⁴ paeans rung,
And freedom’s eager sons in vain foretold
A new Astrean⁵ reign, an age of gold!
She knows and she persists – still Afric bleeds; 15
Unchecked, the human traffic still proceeds;

She stamps her infamy to future time
And on her hardened forehead seals the crime.
In vain, to thy white standard gathering round,
Wit, worth, and parts and eloquence are found;⁶ 20
In vain to push to birth thy great design
Contending chiefs and hostile virtues join;⁷
All from conflicting ranks, of power possessed
To rouse, to melt, or to inform the breast.
Where seasoned tools of avarice⁸ prevail, 25
A nation's eloquence, combined, must fail.
Each flimsy sophistry by turns they try –
The plausible⁹ argument, the daring lie,
The artful gloss that moral sense confounds,
Th' acknowledged thirst of gain¹⁰ that honour wounds 30
(Bane of ingenuous minds!), th' unfeeling sneer
Which sudden turns to stone the falling tear.
They search assiduous with inverted skill
For forms of wrong, and precedents of ill;
With impious mockery wrest the sacred page,¹¹ 35
And glean up crimes from each remoter age;
Wrung nature's tortures, shuddering, while you tell,
From scoffing fiends bursts forth the laugh of hell;¹²
In Britain's senate, misery's pangs give birth
To jests unseemly, and to horrid mirth – 40
Forbear! thy virtues but provoke our doom
And swell th' account of vengeance yet to come.
For (not unmarked in Heaven's impartial plan)
Shall man, proud worm, contemn his fellow man?
And injured Afric, by herself redressed, 45
Darts her own serpents at her tyrant's breast.¹³
Each vice, to minds depraved by bondage known,
With sure contagion fastens on his own;
In sickly languors melts his nerveless frame,

And blows to rage impetuous passion's flame; 50
Fermenting swift, the fiery venom gains
The milky innocence of infant veins;
There swells the stubborn will, damps learning's fire,
The whirlwind wakes¹⁴ of uncontrolled desire,
Sears the young heart to images of woe 55
And blasts the buds of virtue as they blow.

Lo! where reclined, pale Beauty courts the breeze,
Diffused on sofas of voluptuous ease;
With anxious awe, her menial train around
Catch her faint whispers of half-uttered sound. 60
See her, in monstrous fellowship, unite
At once the Scythian and the Sybarite;¹⁵
Blending repugnant vices, misallied,
Which frugal nature purposed to divide;
See her, with indolence to fierceness joined, 65
Of body delicate, infirm of mind,
With languid tones imperious mandates urge,
With arm recumbent wield the household scourge,¹⁶
And with unruffled mien, and placid sounds,
Contriving torture and inflicting wounds. 70

Nor in their palmy walks and spicy groves
The form benign of rural pleasure roves;
No milkmaid's song or hum of village talk
Soothes the lone poet in his evening walk;
No willing arm the flail unwearied plies 75
Where the mixed sounds of cheerful labour rise;
No blooming maids and frolic swains are seen
To pay gay homage to their harvest queen;
No heart-expanding scenes their eyes must prove¹⁷
Of thriving industry and faithful love: 80
But shrieks and yells disturb the balmy air,
Dumb sullen looks of woe announce despair
And angry eyes through dusky features glare.

Far from the sounding lash the muses fly
And sensual riot drowns each finer joy. 85

Nor less from the gay east¹⁸ on essenced wings,
Breathing unnamed perfumes, contagion springs;¹⁹
The soft luxurious plague alike pervades
The marble palaces and rural shades;

Hence thronged Augusta²⁰ builds her rosy bowers 90

And decks in summer wreaths her smoky towers;²¹
And hence in summer bow'rs Art's costly hand
Pour courtly splendours o'er the dazzled land.

The manners melt, one undistinguished blaze
O'erwhelms the sober pomp of elder days; 95

Corruption follows with gigantic stride
And scarce vouchsafes his shameless front to hide;
The spreading leprosy taints ev'ry part,
Infects each limb, and sickens at the heart.

Simplicity, most dear of rural maids, 100
Weeping resigns her violated shades;

Stern Independence from his glebe²² retires
And anxious Freedom eyes her drooping fires;
By foreign wealth are British morals changed,
And Afric's sons, and India's, smile avenged. 105

For you whose tempered ardour long has borne
Untired the labour, and unmoved the scorn,

In virtue's fasti²³ be inscribed your fame,
And uttered yours with Howard's honoured name.²⁴

Friends of the friendless – hail, ye generous band 110
Whose efforts yet arrest Heaven's lifted hand,
Around whose steady brows in union bright
The civic wreath and Christian's palm unite!
Your merit stands, no greater and no less,
Without or with the varnish of success; 115
But seek no more to break a nation's fall,

For ye have saved yourselves, and that is all.
Succeeding times your struggles, and their fate,
With mingled shame and triumph shall relate,
While faithful history in her various page, 120
Marking the features of this motley age,
To shed a glory, and to fix a stain,
Tells how you strove, and that you strove in vain.

1 William Wilberforce (1759–1833), leader of the movement for the abolition of the slave trade in Parliament.

2 The Society for the Abolition of the Slave Trade was founded by Thomas Clarkson and a group of Quakers in 1787; Wilberforce was its representative in the House of Commons, and the cause was taken up by a number of Bluestockings, including Hannah More and Barbault. Wilberforce proposed abolition of the slave trade in the House in April 1791, but despite support from Edmund Burke, Charles James Fox and the Prime Minister, his motion was rejected. This poem was composed soon after, and certainly by 17 June.

3 senator politician.

4 applausive applauding.

5 Astrea Astrea, goddess of justice in the Golden Age, abandoned the earth in disgust at the crimes of humanity.

6 Wit, worth, and parts and eloquence are found a tribute to those in the House of Commons who supported the Abolitionist cause.

7 Contending chiefs and hostile virtues join Leaders on both sides of the House supported the measure.

8 seasoned tools of avarice a reference to those who for years had supported the slave trade out of greed.

9 plausible specious.

10 thirst of gain As in the debate of 1788, a central argument of those opposed to abolition was that the slave trade was a lucrative industry.

11 the sacred page According to some opponents of the bill, slavery was divinely sanctioned.

12 From scoffing fiends...hell McCarthy and Kraft note that when William Smith, one of the Abolitionist MPs, described how an African woman had been forced to throw her murdered child from a ship, some of his colleagues in the House of Commons burst into laughter.

13 Darts her own serpents...breast a reference, as McCarthy and Kraft suggest, to the argument that Britons degraded themselves by their participation in the slave trade.

14 wakes trails.

15 The Scythian and the Sybarite the savage and the sensualist. The ancient Scythians were notorious for savagery; the citizens of Sybaris, an ancient Greek city of southern Italy, were renowned for effeminacy and debauchery.

16 pale Beauty...scourge The pale, beautiful mistress of the house reclines lies down ('recumbent') as she whips (scourges) her servants into action.

17 prove experience, witness.

18 east the East Indies, or India.

19 contagion springs it was believed that disease was carried by the wind.

20 Augusta London.

21 decks...towers Pollution generated by the burning of fossil fuels was a major problem in eighteenth-century London.

22 glebe field.

23 fasti annals.

24 John Howard (1726–90), prison reformer and philanthropist.

The Rights of Woman (composed c.1795)¹

From Works (1825)

Yes, injured woman, rise, assert thy right!
Woman! too long degraded, scorned, oppressed;
Oh born to rule in partial law's despite,
Resume thy native empire o'er the breast!

Go forth arrayed in panoply² divine, 5
That angel pureness which admits no stain;
Go bid proud man his boasted rule resign
And kiss the golden sceptre of thy reign.

Go gird thyself with grace, collect thy store
Of bright artillery glancing from afar – 10
Soft melting tones thy thundering cannon's roar,
Blushes and fears thy magazine³ of war.

Thy rights are empire: urge no meaner claim –
Felt, not defined, and, if debated, lost;
Like sacred mysteries which, withheld from fame, 15
Shunning discussion, are revered the most.

Try all that wit and art suggest to bend
Of thy imperial foe the stubborn knee;

Make treacherous man thy subject, not thy friend –
Thou mayst command, but never canst be free. 20

Awe the licentious and restrain the rude;
Soften the sullen, clear the cloudy brow;
Be more than princes' gifts, thy favours sued –
She hazards all, who will the least allow.

But hope not, courted idol of mankind, 25
On this proud eminence secure to stay;
Subduing and subdued, thou soon shalt find
Thy coldness soften, and thy pride give way.

Then, then, abandon each ambitious thought,
Conquest or rule thy heart shall feebly move, 30
In Nature's school, by her soft maxims taught
That separate rights are lost in mutual love.

The Rights of Woman

¹ Apparently an angry response to Mary Wollstonecraft's criticism of Barbauld's poem To a Lady, with some painted Flowers in Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792), chapter 4. Wollstonecraft's central argument was that a male discourse created a 'false system of female manners, which robs the whole sex of its dignity, and classes the brown and fair with the smiling flowers that only adorn the land'. As proof that 'even women of superior sense' have adopted it, she quoted Barbauld's poem in its entirety. Barbauld's answer is complex and subtle; critics remain in doubt as to where it is ironic and where in earnest.

² panoply armour for spiritual warfare.

³ magazine munitions.

To Mr Coleridge¹(composed c.1797)

From The Monthly Magazine (1799)

Midway the hill of science,² after steep
And rugged paths that tire the unpractised feet,
A grove extends, in tangled mazes wrought,
And filled with strange enchantment: dubious shapes
Flit through dim glades, and lure the eager foot 5
Of youthful ardour to eternal chase;
Dreams hang on every leaf; unearthly forms
Glide through the gloom, and mystic visions swim
Before the cheated sense.³ Athwart the mists,
Far into vacant space, huge shadows stretch 10
And seem realities; while things of life,
Obvious to sight and touch, all glowing round,
Fade to the hue of shadows. Scruples⁴ here,
With filmy net, most like the autumnal webs
Of floating gossamer, arrest the foot 15
Of generous enterprise, and palsy⁵ hope
And fair ambition with the chilling touch
Of sickly hesitation and blank fear.
Nor seldom Indolence these lawns among
Fixes her turf-built seat, and wears the garb 20
Of deep philosophy, and museful sits
In dreamy twilight of the vacant mind,
Soothed by the whispering shade – for soothing soft
The shades, and vistas lengthening into air
With moonbeam rainbows tinted. Here each mind 25
Of finer mould,⁶ acute and delicate,
In its high progress to eternal truth⁷
Rests for a space in fairy bowers entranced,
And loves the softened light and tender gloom,
And, pampered with most unsubstantial food, 30
Looks down indignant on the grosser world
And matter's cumbrous shapings.

Youth beloved

Of science, of the muse beloved: not here,
 Not in the maze of metaphysic lore
 Build thou thy place of resting! Lightly tread 35
 The dangerous ground, on noble aims intent;
 And be this Circe⁸ of the studious cell
 Enjoyed but still subservient. Active scenes
 Shall soon with healthful spirit brace thy mind,
 And fair exertion, for bright fame sustained, 40
 For friends, for country, chase each spleenfed fog⁹
 That blots the wide creation:
 Now Heaven conduct thee with a parent's love!

To Mr Coleridge

¹ Barbault met Coleridge in August 1797, on a visit to their mutual friend John Prior Estlin, a fellow Unitarian, in Bristol.

² science knowledge. As McCarthy and Kraft observe, this recalls Coleridge's own Effusion XXXV, in which its author describes himself 'on the midway slope / Of yonder hill' (ll. 26–7), and is based on the Hill Difficulty in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress.

³ A grove extends...sense Barbault correctly discerned in the young Coleridge a tendency to abstract thought; as late as 1800 he concurred with her judgement in a letter to Estlin: 'The more I see of Mrs Barbault the more I admire her – that wonderful propriety of mind! She has great acuteness, very great.... My own subtleties too often lead me into strange (though, God be praised) transient out-of-the-way-nesses' (Griggs i 578).

⁴ Scruples intellectual conundrums.

⁵ palsy paralyse.

7 its high progress...truth Coleridge believed that mankind was ‘progressive’ – constantly improving, morally and spiritually.

8 Circe Greek enchantress who changed men into pigs. Barbauld warns Coleridge not to become a slave of ‘metaphysic lore’, but to subordinate it to his quest for knowledge and poetic talent.

9 spleen-fed fog mood of depression.

Eighteen Hundred and Eleven, A Poem (composed by 1 December 1811; published February 1812)

Still the loud death drum, thundering from afar,
O'er the vexed nations pours the storm of war:1
To the stern call still Britain bends her ear,
Feeds the fierce strife, the alternate hope and fear –
Bravely, though vainly, dares to strive with fate, 5
And seeks by turns to prop each sinking state.2
Colossal Power3 with overwhelming force
Bears down each fort of Freedom in its course;
Prostrate she lies beneath the despot's sway,
While the hushed nations curse him – and obey. 10
 Bounteous in vain, with frantic man at strife,
Glad nature pours the means – the joys of life;
In vain with orange-blossoms scents the gale,
The hills with olives clothes, with corn the vale;
Man calls to Famine, nor invokes in vain, 15
Disease and Rapine follow in her train;
The tramp of marching hosts disturbs the plough,
The sword, not sickle, reaps the harvest now,

And where the soldier gleans the scant supply,
The helpless peasant but retires to die;⁴ 20
No laws his hut from licensed outrage shield,
And war's least horror is the ensanguined field.

Fruitful in vain, the matron counts with pride
The blooming youths that grace her honoured side;
No son returns to press her widowed hand, 25
Her fallen blossoms strew a foreign strand.
Fruitful in vain, she boasts her virgin race,
Whom cultured arts adorn and gentlest grace;
Defrauded of its homage, Beauty mourns,⁵
And the rose withers on its virgin thorns. 30
Frequent, some stream obscure, some uncouth name
By deeds of blood is lifted into fame;
Oft o'er the daily page some soft one bends
To learn the fate of husband, brothers, friends,
Or the spread map with anxious eye explores 35
Its dotted boundaries and pencilled shores,
Asks where the spot that wrecked her bliss is found,
And learns its name but to detest the sound.

And think'st thou, Britain, still to sit at ease,
An island queen amidst thy subject seas, 40
While the vexed billows, in their distant roar,
But soothe thy slumbers, and but kiss thy shore?
To sport in wars, while danger keeps aloof,
Thy grassy turf unbruised by hostile hoof?
So sing thy flatterers – but, Britain, know, 45
Thou who hast shared the guilt must share the woe.⁶
Nor distant is the hour; low murmurs spread,
And whispered fears, creating what they dread;
Ruin, as with an earthquake shock, is here,
There, the heart-witherings of unuttered fear, 50
And that sad death,⁷ whence most affection bleeds,
Which sickness, only of the soul, precedes.

Thy baseless wealth⁸ dissolves in air away
Like mists that melt before the morning ray:
No more on crowded mart or busy street 55
Friends, meeting friends, with cheerful hurry greet;
Sad on the ground thy princely merchants bend
Their altered looks, and evil days portend,
And fold their arms, and watch with anxious breast
The tempest blackening in the distant west.⁹ 60
 Yes, thou must droop; thy Midas dream is o'er;
The golden tide of commerce leaves thy shore,
Leaves thee to prove the alternate ills that haunt
Enfeebling Luxury and ghastly Want;
Leaves thee, perhaps, to visit distant lands, 65
And deal the gifts of Heaven with equal hands.
 Yet, oh my country – name beloved, revered,
By every tie that binds the soul endeared,
Whose image to my infant senses came
Mixed with Religion's light and Freedom's holy flame! 70
If prayers may not avert, if 'tis thy fate
To rank amongst the names that once were great,
Not like the dim, cold crescent¹⁰ shalt thou fade,
Thy debt to Science and the Muse unpaid;
Thine are the laws surrounding states reverse, 75
Thine the full harvest of the mental year,
Thine the bright stars in glory's sky that shine,
And arts that make it life to live are thine.
If westward streams the light that leaves thy shores,
Still from thy lamp the streaming radiance pours. 80
Wide spreads thy race from Ganges to the pole,
O'er half the western world thy accents roll;
Nations beyond the Appalachian hills
Thy hand has planted and thy spirit fills;
Soon as their gradual progress shall impart 85
The finer sense of morals and of art,
Thy stores of knowledge the new states shall know,

And think thy thoughts, and with thy fancy glow;
Thy Lockes, thy Paleys¹¹ shall instruct their youth,
Thy leading star direct their search for truth; 90
Beneath the spreading Platan's¹² tent-like shade,
Or by Missouri's rushing waters laid,
'Old father Thames' shall be the poet's theme,
Of Hagley's woods¹³ the enamoured virgin dream,
And Milton's tones the raptured ear enthrall, 95
Mixed with the roar of Niagara's fall;
In Thomson's glass¹⁴ the ingenuous youth shall learn
A fairer face of Nature to discern;
Nor of the bards that swept the British lyre
Shall fade one laurel, or one note expire. 100
Then, loved Joanna,¹⁵ to admiring eyes
Thy storied groups in scenic pomp shall rise;
Their high-souled strains and Shakespeare's noble rage
Shall with alternate passion shake the stage.
Some youthful Basil from thy moral lay 105
With stricter hand his fond desires shall sway;
Some Ethwald, as the fleeting shadows pass,
Start at his likeness in the mystic glass;
The tragic Muse resume her just control,
With pity and with terror purge the soul, 110
While wide o'er transatlantic realms thy name
Shall live in light, and gather all its fame.

Where wanders Fancy down the lapse of years,
Shedding o'er imaged woes untimely tears?
Fond moody power! As hopes, as fears prevail, 115
She longs, or dreads, to lift the awful veil;
On visions of delight now loves to dwell,
Now hears the shriek of woe or Freedom's knell.
Perhaps, she says, long ages past away,
And set in western waves our closing day, 120
Night, Gothic night, again may shade the plains

Where Power is seated and where Science reigns;
England, the seat of arts, be only known
By the grey ruin and the mouldering stone,
That Time may tear the garland from her brow, I25
And Europe sit in dust, as Asia now.

Yet then the ingenuous youth whom Fancy fires
With pictured glories of illustrious sires,
With duteous zeal their pilgrimage shall take
From the Blue Mountains or Ontario's lake,¹⁶ I30
With fond adoring steps to press the sod
By statesmen, sages, poets, heroes trod;
On Isis' ¹⁷ banks to draw inspiring air,
From Runnymede¹⁸ to send the patriot's prayer;
In pensive thought, where Cam's slow waters wind,¹⁹ I35
To meet those shades that ruled the realms of mind;
In silent halls to sculptured marbles bow
And hang fresh wreaths round Newton's awful brow.²⁰
Oft shall they seek some peasant's homely shed
Who toils unconscious of the mighty dead, I40
To ask where Avon's winding waters stray²¹
And thence a knot of wildflowers bear away;
Anxious enquire where Clarkson,²² friend of man,
Or all-accomplished Jones²³ his race began;
If of the modest mansion aught remains I45
Where Heaven and nature prompted Cowper's strains;²⁴
Where Roscoe,²⁵ to whose patriot breast belong
The Roman virtue and the Tuscan song,
Led Ceres²⁶ to the black and barren moor
Where Ceres never gained a wreath before²⁷ – I50
With curious search their pilgrim steps shall rove
By many a ruined tower and proud alcove,
Shall listen for those strains that soothed of yore

Thy rock, stern Skiddaw, and thy fall, Lodore;²⁸
 Feast with Dun Edin's²⁹ classic brow their sight, I55
 And 'visit Melross by the pale moonlight'.³⁰
 But who their mingled feelings shall pursue
 When London's faded glories rise to view?
 The mighty city, which by every road,
 In floods of people poured itself abroad; I60
 Ungirt by walls, irregularly great,
 No jealous drawbridge, and no closing gate;
 Whose merchants (such the state which commerce brings)
 Sent forth their mandates to dependent kings;
 Streets, where the turbaned Moslem, bearded Jew, I65
 And woolly Afric, met the brown Hindu;
 Where through each vein spontaneous plenty flowed,
 Where Wealth enjoyed, and Charity bestowed.
 Pensive and thoughtful shall the wanderers greet
 Each splendid square, and still, untrodden street; I70
 Or of some crumbling turret, mined by time,
 The broken stair with perilous step shall climb,
 Thence stretch their view the wide horizon round,
 By scattered hamlets trace its ancient bound,
 And, choked no more with fleets, fair Thames survey – I75
 Through reeds and sedge pursue his idle way.
 With throbbing bosoms shall the wanderers tread
 The hallowed mansions of the silent dead,
 Shall enter the long isle and vaulted dome³¹
 Where Genius and where Valour find a home; I80
 Awestruck, midst chill sepulchral marbles breathe,
 Where all above is still as all beneath;
 Bend at each antique shrine, and frequent turn
 To clasp with fond delight some sculptured urn,
 The ponderous mass of Johnson's form to greet, I85
 Or breathe the prayer at Howard's sainted feet.³²
 Perhaps some Briton, in whose musing mind

Those ages live which Time has cast behind,
 To every spot shall lead his wondering guests
 On whose known site the beam of glory rests: 190
 Here Chatham's³³ eloquence in thunder broke,
 Here Fox persuaded, or here Garrick spoke;³⁴
 Shall boast how Nelson, fame and death in view,
 To wonted victory led his ardent crew,
 In England's name enforced, with loftiest tone,³⁵ 195
 Their duty – and too well fulfilled his own;
 How gallant Moore,³⁶ as ebbing life dissolved,
 But hoped his country had his fame absolved;
 Or call up sages whose capacious mind
 Left in its course a track of light behind; 200
 Point where mute crowds on Davy's lips³⁷ reposed,
 And Nature's coyest secrets were disclosed;
 Join with their Franklin, Priestley's injured name,³⁸
 Whom, then, each continent shall proudly claim.
 Oft shall the strangers turn their eager feet 205
 The rich remains of ancient art to greet,
 The pictured walls with critic eye explore,
 And Reynolds³⁹ be what Raphael was before.
 On spoils from every clime their eyes shall gaze,
 Egyptian granites and the Etruscan vase; 210
 And when midst fallen London, they survey
 The stone where Alexander's ashes lay,⁴⁰
 Shall own with humbled pride the lesson just
 By Time's slow finger written in the dust.
 There walks a spirit⁴¹ o'er the peopled earth – 215
 Secret his progress is, unknown his birth;
 Moody and viewless⁴² as the changing wind,
 No force arrests his foot, no chains can bind;
 Where'er he turns, the human brute awakes,
 And, roused to better life, his sordid hut forsakes; 220

He thinks, he reasons, glows with purer fires,
Feels finer wants, and burns with new desires.
Obedient Nature follows where he leads –
The steaming marsh is changed to fruitful meads;
The beasts retire from man's asserted reign, 225
And prove his kingdom was not given in vain.
Then from its bed is drawn the ponderous ore,
Then Commerce pours her gifts on every shore,
Then Babel's towers and terraced gardens rise,
And pointed obelisks invade the skies; 230
The prince commands, in Tyrian purple⁴³ dressed,
And Egypt's virgins weave the linen vest.
Then spans the graceful arch the roaring tide,
And stricter bounds the cultured fields divide.
Then kindles Fancy, then expands the heart, 235
Then blow the flowers of Genius and of Art;
Saints, heroes, sages, who the land adorn,
Seem rather to descend than to be born;
Whilst History, midst the rolls consigned to fame,
With pen of adamant inscribes their name. 240
The genius now forsakes the favoured shore,
And hates, capricious, what he loved before;
Then empires fall to dust, then arts decay,
And wasted realms enfeebled despots sway;
Even Nature's changed; without his fostering smile 245
Ophir⁴⁴ no gold, no plenty yields the Nile;
The thirsty sand absorbs the useless rill,
And spotted plagues from putrid fens distil.
In desert solitudes then Tadmor⁴⁵ sleeps,
Stern Marius then o'er fallen Carthage weeps;⁴⁶ 250
Then with enthusiast love the pilgrim roves
To seek his footsteps in forsaken groves,
Explores the fractured arch, the ruined tower,
Those limbs disjointed of gigantic power;

Still at each step he dreads the adder's sting, 255
 The Arab's javelin, or the tiger's spring;
 With doubtful caution treads the echoing ground,
 And asks where Troy or Babylon⁴⁷ is found.
 And now the vagrant Power no more detains
 The Vale of Tempe⁴⁸ or Ausonian⁴⁹ plains; 260
 Northward he throws the animating ray,
 O'er Celtic nations bursts the mental day –
 And, as some playful child the mirror turns,
 Now here, now there, the moving lustre burns;
 Now o'er his changeful fancy more prevail 265
 Batavia's⁵⁰ dykes than Arno's purple vale,
 And stinted suns, and rivers bound with frost,
 Than Enna's plains⁵¹ or Baia's viny coast;
 Venice the Adriatic weds in vain,
 And Death sits brooding o'er Campania's plain;⁵² 270
 O'er Baltic shores and through Hercynian groves,⁵³
 Stirring the soul, the mighty impulse moves;
 Art plies his tools, and Commerce spreads her sail,
 And wealth is wafted in each shifting gale.
 The sons of Odin⁵⁴ tread on Persian looms, 275
 And Odin's daughters breathe distilled perfumes;
 Loud minstrel bards, in Gothic halls, rehearse
 The Runic rhyme, and 'build the lofty verse';⁵⁵
 The Muse, whose liquid notes were wont to swell
 To the soft breathings of the Aeolian shell, 280
 Submits, reluctant, to the harsher tone,
 And scarce believes the altered voice her own.
 And now, where Caesar saw with proud disdain
 The wattled hut and skin of azure stain,⁵⁶
 Corinthian columns rear their graceful forms, 285
 And light verandas brave the wintry storms,
 While British tongues the fading fame prolong

Of Tully's eloquence and Maro's song.⁵⁷
 Where once Bonduca whirled the scythed car,⁵⁸
 And the fierce matrons raised the shriek of war, 290
 Light forms beneath transparent muslins float,
 And tutored voices swell the artful note.
 Light-leaved acacias and the shady plane
 And spreading cedar grace the woodland reign;
 While crystal walls⁵⁹ the tenderer plants confine, 295
 The fragrant orange and the nectared pine;⁶⁰
 The Syrian grape there hangs her rich festoons,
 Nor asks for purer air, or brighter noons;
 Science and Art urge on the useful toil,
 New mould a climate and create the soil, 300
 Subdue the rigour of the northern bear,⁶¹
 O'er polar climes shed aromatic air,
 On yielding Nature urge their new demands,
 And ask not gifts but tribute at her hands.
 London exults – on London Art bestows 305
 Her summer ices and her winter rose;
 Gems of the east her mural crown adorn,
 And Plenty at her feet pours forth her horn;
 While even the exiles her just laws disclaim,
 People a continent, and build a name.⁶² 310
 August she sits, and with extended hands
 Holds forth the Book of Life to distant lands.⁶³
 But fairest flowers expand but to decay;
 The worm is in thy core, thy glories pass away;
 Arts, arms and wealth destroy the fruits they bring; 315
 Commerce, like beauty, knows no second spring.
 Crime walks thy streets, Fraud earns her unblest bread,
 O'er want and woe thy gorgeous robe is spread,
 And angel charities in vain oppose:
 With grandeur's growth the mass of misery grows. 320

For see, to other climes the genius soars,
He turns from Europe's desolated shores;
And lo! even now, midst mountains wrapped in storm,
On Andes' heights he shrouds his awful form;
On Chimborazo's summits⁶⁴ treads sublime, 325
Measuring in lofty thought the march of Time;
Sudden he calls, "'Tis now the hour!' he cries,
Spreads his broad hand, and bids the nations rise.
La Plata⁶⁵ hears amidst her torrents' roar;
Potosi⁶⁶ hears it, as she digs the ore: 330
Ardent, the genius fans the noble strife,
And pours through feeble souls a higher life,
Shouts to the mingled tribes from sea to sea,
And swears thy world, Columbus, shall be free.⁶⁷

Eighteen Hundred and Eleven

¹ Still the loud...of war Britain and France had been at war for 17 of the previous 19 years (since 1793); see headnote, p. 36 above.

² each sinking state Britain had failed to prevent Russia (1807), Spain (1808) and Austria (1809) from making peace with France.

³ Colossal Power Napoleon.

⁴ The helpless peasant but retires to die Famine was widespread throughout Europe thanks to the disruption of agriculture by armies (l. 17), and seizures of crops to feed them (l. 19).

⁵ No young men survive to marry the beautiful young women who mourn their deaths.

⁶ but, Britain, know...woe Nonetheless, Britain did not experience invasion.

7 that sad death McCarthy and Kraft suggest a reference to the suicide of the financier Abraham Goldsmid in 1810; there were numerous other bankruptcies at this time. A ruined merchant was responsible for the assassination of the Prime Minister, Spencer Perceval, only months after this poem's publication.

8 baseless wealth The government had issued paper currency in excess of its gold reserves, thus rendering it worthless.

9 The tempest blackening in the distant west impending conflict with the United States. Though not declared until June 1812, it had been brewing for years. In large part it was a by-product of the war with France, specifically the damage wrought to American trade, Britain's impressment of American seamen and the Chesapeake affair.

10 the dim, cold crescent The Ottoman empire had been in decline for years.

11 Thy Lockes, thy Paleys Intellectuals. John Locke (1632–1704) and William Paley (1743–1805) were important philosophers.

12 the spreading Platan's sycamore, plane tree.

13 Hagley's woods Hagley was the estate of George, Lord Lyttelton (1709–73), in Worcestershire, near Birmingham; it is praised by James Thomson in Spring (1728) 904 ff. In the 1740s Lyttelton turned it into one of the most admired, and renowned, landscape gardens of the eighteenth century.

14 Thomson's glass his poem, The Seasons (1730).

15 loved Joanna Joanna Baillie (1762–1851), whose Plays on the Passions (1798–1812) met with success (see pp. 313–14); Barbauld refers specifically to Count Basil and Ethwald.

16 Barbould knew of Lake Ontario, the Niagara Falls and the Blue Mountains of Pennsylvania through William Winterbotham's View of the American United States (1795).

17 Isis poetic name for the River Thames in Oxford.

18 Runnymede In 1215 in Runnymede, King John signed the Magna Carta, a major statement of liberties in England.

19 where Cam's slow waters wind The Cam rises in Hertfordshire, flows past Cambridge into the Isle of Ely, and there joins the Ouse.

20 Newton's awful brow Sir Isaac Newton was a Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and Lucasian Professor of Mathematics. He is commemorated by a statue in the antechapel of Trinity, mentioned by Wordsworth, Thirteen-Book Prelude iii 58–9.

21 where Avon's winding waters stray Stratford-on-Avon, Shakespeare's birthplace.

22 Thomas Clarkson (1760–1846), a 'friend of man' in that he was a prominent campaigner for abolition of the slave trade. He was born in Wisbech.

23 Sir William Jones (1746–94), linguist and orientalist. Born in London, he became a judge at the High Court in Calcutta, and published widely on the law and oriental languages. His authoritative translations did much to introduce oriental elements into western literature.

24 William Cowper (1731–1800), author of The Task (1785); see pp. 17–19.

25 William Roscoe (1753–1831), botanist, historian, banker, and (like Barbould) a prominent Unitarian. He had been opposed to the war with France from its outset.

26 Ceres Roman goddess of the growth of food plants.

27 ‘The Historian of the age of Leo has brought into cultivation the extensive tract of Chatmoss’ (Barbauld’s note). She refers to Roscoe’s experiments at Chat Moss in Lancashire in which he reclaimed moorland for the cultivation of high-quality crops. Croker’s review in the Quarterly was scathing about this reference; quoting lines 147–50, he commented: ‘O the unequal dispensations of this poetical providence! Chatham and Nelson empty names! Oxford and Cambridge in ruins! London a desert, and the Thames a sedgy brook! while Mr Roscoe’s barns and piggeries are in excellent repair, and objects not only of curiosity but even of reverence and enthusiasm’ (Quarterly Review 7 (1812) 311–12).

28 Thy rock, stern Skiddaw, and thy fall, Lodore Skiddaw mountain and the Lodore falls in the Lake District were popular tourist attractions.

29 Dun Edin poetical name for Edinburgh.

30 visit Melross by the pale moonlight An allusion to Scott’s popular poem, The Lay of the Last Minstrel (1805), ii 1–2: ‘If thou wouldst view fair Melrose aright, / Go visit it by the pale moonlight.’ Then as now, Melrose Abbey was popular with tourists.

31 the long isle and vaulted dome of St Paul’s Cathedral.

32 The ponderous mass...feet Statues of Samuel Johnson and John Howard (prison reformer) stand in the nave of St Paul’s.

33 Chatham Pitt the elder, first Earl of Chatham (1708–78), Prime Minister during the Seven Years War.

34 Here Fox persuaded, or here Garrick spoke Charles James Fox (1749–1806), Whig leader, and a focus for liberal opinion, particularly during the ministries of Pitt the younger (1783–1801, 1804–6); David Garrick (1717–79), actor-manager.

35 ‘Every reader will recollect the sublime telegraphic dispatch, “England expects every man to do his duty” ’ (Barbauld’s note). Admiral Lord Nelson issued this order prior to the Battle of Trafalgar (21 October 1805), in which he was killed, despite a British victory.

36 “‘I hope England will be satisfied”, were the last words of General Moore’ (Barbauld’s note). General Sir John Moore led the army that failed to prevent Napoleon from taking Madrid. He evacuated his troops at the Battle of Corunna at the expense of his own life.

37 Davy’s lips Sir Humphry Davy (1778–1829), the foremost scientist of his day, lectured on chemistry and physics at the Royal Institution.

38 Join with their Franklin, Priestley’s injured name Benjamin Franklin and Joseph Priestley experimented with electricity in the 1790s. They were also radicals, and Priestley was hounded out of England by a mob drummed up by Tory opponents, because of his support for the French Revolution. He emigrated to America in 1794.

39 Sir Joshua Reynolds was the most distinguished and successful portrait-painter of his day, and had been, from 1768 to 1792, President of the Royal Academy. He published his Discourses from 1769 to 1791, and in 1784 was made Painter-in-Ordinary to the King – an honour which, as he ruefully observed, brought him a stipend less than that of the King’s rat-catcher.

40 The stone where Alexander’s ashes lay Barbauld has in mind the granite sarcophagus on display at the British Museum from 1802 onwards, believed to be that of Alexander the Great.

41 spirit perhaps that of civilization, or at least the spirit that makes civilization possible. In this account of the rise and fall of civilizations Barbauld is probably inspired by Comte de Volney’s The Ruins, or A Survey of the Revolutions of Empires (1792). The ‘spirit’ was a gift to Croker in the Quarterly; quoting lines 215–18, he commented: ‘This extraordinary personage is prodigiously wise and potent, but withal a little fickle, and somewhat, we think, for so wise a being, unjust and partial. He has hitherto resided in this country, and chiefly in London; Mrs Barbauld, however, foresees that he is beginning to be tired of us, and is preparing to go out of town' (Quarterly Review 7 (1812) 312).

42 viewless invisible.

43 Tyrian purple In ancient times, a purple or crimson dye was made at Phoenicia from molluscs.

44 Ophir the land from which Solomon's navy fetched gold; see 1 Kings 9: 26–8.

45 Tadmor a biblical name for the oasis of Palmyra between Syria and Babylon.

46 Stern Marius then o'er fallen Carthage weeps Plutarch relates that, on being denied entry to Carthage by its Roman governor, Sextilius, Gaius Marius remarked: 'Tell him, then, that thou hast seen Gaius Marius a fugitive, seated amid the ruins of Carthage.'

47 Troy or Babylon major cities of ancient times which are no longer to be found. The point is that London will share the same fate.

48 The Vale of Tempe a valley in Thessaly celebrated as a rural paradise; effectively Greece.

49 Ausonian Italian; effectively Rome.

50 Batavia Holland.

51 Enna's plains Enna was a town in the middle of Sicily surrounded by plains of wheat. Baiae was a Roman resort in the Bay of Naples associated with the wines of Campania.

52 Campania's plain Not the Roman campagna but the province of Naples, a centre of bubonic plague.

53 Hercynian groves the Black Forest in Germany.

54 sons of Odin northern Europeans – Danes, Swedes, Germans.

55 build the lofty verse an allusion to Milton's Lycidas: 'Who would not sing for Lycidas? he knew / Himself to sing, and build the lofty rhyme' (ll. 10–11).

56 azure stain Julius Caesar described how the Britons painted themselves with blue war-paint in his Gallic Wars.

57 Tully Cicero; Maro Virgil.

58 scythed car The native British queen, Boudicca, fixed knives to the wheels of her chariot.

59 crystal walls greenhouse.

60 pine pineapple.

61 the northern bear the constellation of the Great Bear, which contains the north star.

62 While even...name Those exiled and disowned by Britain's (un)just and oppressive laws leave for other countries – Australia or America.

63 Holds forth the Book of Life to distant lands a reference to the work of the British and Foreign Bible Society (founded 1804), which distributed cheap Bibles at home and abroad.

64 Chimborazo's summits Chimborazo is the highest peak in the Andes, in present-day Ecuador; first scaled in June 1797.

⁶⁵ La Plata a large river in South America, formed by the union of the great rivers Parana and Uruguay.

⁶⁶ Potosi St Luis de Potosi is a city in Mexico situated in the midst of rich gold mines.

⁶⁷ free Barbauld's optimism about South America stems from news of independence movements among the Spanish colonies there.

¹ Odes ed. George Dyer (Ludlow, 1800) includes her poems To Content, To Wisdom and To Spring.

² Croker was a menace where radical poets were concerned; he was also responsible for one of the harshest attacks on Keats.

Hannah More (1745–1833)

For Dr Johnson, she was ‘the most powerful versificatrix in the English language’; in purely financial terms, Hannah More was one of the most successful writers of her day, having made £30,000 by her publications by 1825 (£1.3 million/US$2,385,000 today). Born at Fishponds in the parish of Stapleton, near Bristol, she was the fourth of five daughters of Mary Grace and Jacob More (d. 1783), a teacher who (unusually for the time) was determined to ensure that his daughters were capable of making an independent living. By the age of 4 she astonished the local clergyman with her recital of the catechism. Her father was apparently ‘frightened by his own success’ at teaching her Latin and mathematics, but the entreaties of his family encouraged him to continue.

She began her career as a playwright, winning praise from the poet John Langhorne for The Search after Happiness (1773). It was through him that she met David Garrick, who would compose the epilogue for her tragedy The Inflexible Captive (1774). He in turn introduced her to Burke, Johnson, Reynolds and, crucially, Elizabeth Montagu, queen of the Bluestockings, of which More quickly became a member. Never as close-knit and exclusive as they are sometimes thought, the group included at various times Anna Laetitia Barbauld, Elizabeth Carter, Mrs Boscawen, the Duchess of Beaufort, Mrs Leveson, Mrs Walsingham and the Duchess of Portland, and received visits from Reynolds, Johnson, Walpole and Lord Lyttelton.

On visits to London More stayed with Garrick and his wife Eva Marie at their riverside villa in Hampton. On one of these visits he encouraged her to work on a new tragedy, Percy, about a woman misjudged and murdered by a jealous husband. It opened in London in 1777 to immediate acclaim and sold 4,000 copies in a fortnight. Mrs Siddons's performance is said to have reduced Charles James Fox, the Whig leader, to tears. But after Garrick died in January 1779 More stopped writing for the stage, his death having prompted her to reassess her future.

Garrick was famous as an exponent of the drama of sensibility, which he must have discussed with her. As a tribute to him, she composed Sensibility, presented here complete in its earliest (and best) text of 1782 (see p. 59). Later versions depersonalize its contents, which has tended to blind readers to the fact that it was written for, and inspired by, a small coterie – among whom it had been circulating for at least a year prior to publication. As such, it contains many in-jokes, as well as a tribute to Garrick that in later versions was toned down and, ultimately, eliminated. Its air of light-heartedness enshrines something of the good humour that made the Bluestockings such a congenial group, but it is useful to bear in mind that they were famous partly for the moral and religious works that several of their number (notably Hester Chapone and Catherine Macaulay) had published, and for campaigning on behalf of universal education. Moreover, as Sylvia Harcstark Myers has argued, Elizabeth Carter claimed that it was ‘unfair to women to keep them from rational conversation with men because it kept them from developing their intellectual capacities’:¹ this is the feminist subtext that underlies More’s portrayal of this group of educated women who wished to rid society of card-playing in exchange for polite conversation. Accordingly, More portrays Sensibility as a female deity, ‘the melancholy muse’ (l. 206) capable of generating pleasure – ‘The sacred rapture of a pain like this!’ (l. 170). In its central passage (ll. 239ff.), she discounts the writings of male writers such as Otway, Rowe and Richardson, arguing that sensibility is the preserve of Bluestockings such as Frances Boscawen, Elizabeth Carter, Hester Chapone, Frances Walsingham, Mary Delany and Anna Laetitia Barbauld. Her view of psychology and literature is gendered: she thinks women have a way of thinking and feeling that better disposes them to sensibility:

. . . where bright imagination reigns,
The fine-wrought spirit feels acuter pains:
Where glow exalted sense, and taste refined,
There keener anguish rankles in the mind;
There feeling is diffused through every part,
Thrills in each nerve, and lives in all the heart.

(ll. 65–70)

Reviews were largely favourable; critics rightly saw that its central point was its critique of debased forms of sentiment. The Monthly Review approved:

In a book ‘chiefly intended for young persons’,² it is not with impropriety that Miss More has introduced the concluding composition, Sensibility, there being nothing of which they are more apt to form mistaken ideas than of that sympathetic tenderness which is supposed to have its source in the amiable affections of the heart. From these mistaken ideas it is that so many, by giving way to the immoderate indulgence of sensibility, destroy their own peace, while a still greater number, by its affectation, render themselves disgusting.³

For similar reasons the European Magazine commended it: ‘It displays a considerable portion of that quality which gives name to the poem, and shows the writer in a very amiable point of view, as an individual. Her candour, friendship, gratitude, and taste, are eminently conspicuous in several parts of the poem.’⁴

More retired to a cottage in Cowslip Green, Somerset, devoting herself to didactic and educational works, one of the most important of which was Slavery: A Poem (1788). The year before, she had written to Elizabeth Carter to tell her of ‘the great object I have so much at heart – the project to abolish the slave trade in Africa. This most important cause has very much occupied my thoughts this summer; the young gentleman who has embarked in it with the zeal of an apostle has been much with me, and engaged all my little interest, and all my affections in it. It is to be brought before parliament in the spring. Above one hundred members have promised their votes.’ The ‘young gentleman’ was William Wilberforce, then in his twenties; she was in her forties. Despite the age difference, and the fact that he was a liberal and she a conservative, they had much in common, and became firm friends. Both were disciples of the reformed slave-trader John Newton, and that no doubt helped bring them together. At the age of 28, Wilberforce was already campaigning in Parliament for measures to be taken to eliminate slavery at home and in the colonies. More believed that slavery was an abomination, and was advising her friends to boycott the use of West Indian sugar in their tea. She even carried about with her Clarkson’s plan of an African slave-ship, showing it to interested and horrified guests at dinner parties.

She was following events closely when on 21 May 1788 Sir William Dolben proposed a Bill to the House of Commons aimed at restricting the number of slaves who could be transported from Africa to British colonies in the West Indies. Though a comparatively small measure, it was the first step towards abolition, and aroused the well-funded opposition of business interests. On 26 May merchants and inhabitants of Liverpool presented a petition to the House, arguing that Dolben’s Bill would cause them financial ruin; fortunately the Bill was passed in both Houses. Slavery: A Poem was written in anticipation, within two weeks (‘too short and too much hurried’, More said), and articulates its author’s impatience with the caution of the proposed measures, arguing instead for complete abolition. One of the most favourable of its reviews appeared in the New Annual Register, which remarked that ‘The sentiments which she expresses are humane and just; her descriptions pathetic and affecting; and her indignation against those who degrade the sable race in the scale of being is delivered in language that is poetical and spirited.’⁵ William Cowper also wrote a poem on the occasion of Dolben’s Bill, satirizing the pleas of those in the slave trade who claimed that it would make them destitute (see p. 19).

One of More’s biggest successes, the Cheap Repository tracts, was the idea of her friend Bishop Porteus. By late 1791 the political radicalism that had crossed the Channel from France was alarming to those who, like Porteus, feared working-class insurrection or, worse still, French invasion. He suggested to More that she ‘write some little thing tending to open their eyes under their present wild impressions of liberty and equality’. The declared agenda of the Cheap Repository was thus to deradicalize working people, encouraging them to accept their lot.

To this end a range of writers composed moral tales and ballads that were published, individually, on single sheets (called ‘broadsides’) under the Cheap Repository imprint; in the end More wrote over fifty. The secret of their success lay partly in their design: each was decked out with rakish titles and woodcuts in the manner of the bawdy songsheets sold in alehouses. As More observed, 'It is as vulgar as heart can wish, but it is only designed for the most vulgar class of readers.'

The first was published on 3 March 1795; over 300,000 copies were sold by 18 April, and two million within the year. In the event few copies were sold to working people, most being purchased in bulk by philanthropic committees and distributed free of charge in schools, workhouses, hospitals and prisons. The Story of Sinful Sally, published in February 1796, is typical: the text is interspersed by woodcuts, each showing its protagonist at a different stage in her journey. The series came to an end when, in 1799, More was compelled to give it up due to ill health.

In later years she enjoyed success with Coelebs in Search of a Wife (1809) which, though published anonymously, went into eleven editions within the year. The enduring popularity of her work during the nineteenth century drew many pilgrims to her door, and she was compelled to reserve two days a week for visitors so that she could spend the remainder in peace. She died peacefully on 7 September 1833, at the age of 88, leaving her fortune to a range of charitable institutions and religious societies.

Sensibility: A Poetical Epistle to the Hon. Mrs Boscawen¹

issues.*²

(Shakespeare)

The following little poem was sent several years ago, as an epistle to the honoured friend to whom it is inscribed. It has since been enlarged, and several passages have been added, or altered, as circumstances required.³

Accept, Boscawen, these unpolished lays,
Nor blame too much the verse you cannot praise;
For you, far other bards have waked the string,
Far other bards for you were wont to sing.
Yet on the gale their parting music steals; 5
Yet your charmed ear the loved impression feels;
You heard the lyres of Lyttelton and Young,⁴
And this a grace, and that a seraph strung.
These are no more! But not with these decline
The Attic chasteness and the flame divine: 10
Still sad Elfrida's poet⁵ shall complain,
And either Warton breathe his classic strain.⁶
Nor fear lest genuine poesy expire
While tuneful Beattie wakes old Spenser's lyre.⁷
His sympathetic lay his soul reveals, 15
And paints the perfect bard from what he feels.

Illustrious Lowth!⁸ For him the muses wove
The fairest garland from their greenest grove.
Though Latian⁹ bards had gloried in his name,
When in full brightness burnt the Latian flame, 20
Yet fired with nobler hopes than transient bays,
He scorned the meed of perishable praise,
Spurned the cheap wreath by human science won,
Borne on the wing sublime of Amos' son;¹⁰
He seized his mantle as the prophet flew,¹¹ 25
And caught some portion of his spirit too.

To snatch bright beauty from devouring fate
And bid it boast with him a deathless date;
To show how genius fires, how taste restrains,

While what both are, his pencil best explains, 30
 Have we not Reynolds?¹² Lives not Jenyns yet,
 To prove his lowest title was a wit?¹³
 Though purer flames thy hallowed zeal inspire
 Than ere were kindled at the muse's fire,
 Thee, mitred Chester,¹⁴ all the Nine¹⁵ shall boast, 35
 And is not Johnson theirs, himself an host?¹⁶
 Yes: still for you your gentle stars dispense
 The charm of friendship and the feast of sense;
 Yours is the bliss, and Heav'n no dearer sends
 To call the wisest, brightest, best, your friends. 40
 With Carter trace the wit to Athens known,¹⁷
 Or find in Montagu¹⁸ that wit our own;
 Or, pleased, attend Chapone's instructive page,¹⁹
 Which charms her own, and forms the rising age;
 Or boast in Walsingham²⁰ the various pow'r 45
 To soothe the lonely, grace the lettered hour –
 To polished life its highest charm she gives,
 Whose song is music, and whose canvas lives.
 Delany shines, in worth serenely bright,
 Wisdom's strong ray, and virtue's milder light; 50
 And she who blessed the friend, and graced the page
 Of Swift, still lends her lustre to our age:²¹
 Long, long protract thy light, oh star benign,
 Whose setting beams with added brightness shine!
 Oh much-loved Barbauld,²² shall my heart refuse 55
 Its tribute to thy virtues and thy muse?
 While round thy brow the poet's wreath I twine,
 This humble merit shall at least be mine,
 In all thy praise to take a gen'rous part,
 Thy laurels bind thee closer to my heart. 60
 My verse thy merits to the world shall teach,
 And love the genius it despairs to reach.

Yet what is wit, and what the poet's art?
Can genius shield the vulnerable heart?
Ah no, where bright imagination reigns, 65
The fine-wrought spirit feels acuter pains:
Where glow exalted sense, and taste refined,
There keener anguish rankles in the mind;
There feeling is diffused through every part,
Thrills in each nerve, and lives in all the heart; 70
And those whose gen'rous souls each tear would keep
From others' eyes, are born themselves to weep.

Say, can the boasted pow'rs of wit and song
Of life one pang remove, one hour prolong?
Presumptuous hope, which daily truths deride – 75
For you, alas, have wept, and Garrick died!²³
Ne'er shall my heart his loved remembrance lose,
Guide, critic, guardian, glory of my muse!
Oh shades of Hampton,²⁴ witness, as I mourn,
Could wit or song elude his destined urn? 80
Though living virtue still your haunts endears,
Yet buried worth shall justify my tears.

Garrick! Those pow'rs which form a friend were thine;
And let me add, with pride, that friend was mine –
With pride! At once the vain emotion's fled, 85
Far other thoughts are sacred to the dead.
Who now with spirit keen, yet judgement cool,
Th' unequal wand'rings of my muse shall rule?
Whose partial praise my worthless verse ensure?
For Candour smiled when Garrick would endure. 90
If harsher critics were compelled to blame,
I gained in friendship what I lost in fame;
And friendship's fost'ring smiles can well repay
What critic rigour justly takes away.
With keen acumen how his piercing eye 95
The fault concealed from vulgar view would spy!
While with a gen'rous warmth he strove to hide –

Nay, vindicate – the fault his judgement spied.
So pleased, could he detect a happy line,
That he would fancy merit ev'n in mine. I00
Oh gen'rous error, when by friendship bred!
His praises flattered me, but not misled.

No narrow views could bound his lib'ral mind;
His friend was man, his party humankind.
Agreed in this, opposing statesmen strove I05
Who most should gain his praise, or court his love.
His worth all hearts as to one centre drew;
Thus Tully's Atticus was Caesar's too.²⁵

His wit so keen, it never missed its end,
So blameless too, it never lost a friend; I10
So chaste, that modesty ne'er learned to fear,
So pure, religion might unwounded hear.

How his quick mind, strong pow'rs, and ardent heart,
Impoverished nature, and exhausted art,

A brighter bard records,²⁶ a deathless muse! I15
But I his talents in his virtues lose:

Great parts are nature's gift; but that he shone
Wise, moral, good and virtuous, was his own.
Though Time his silent hand across has stole,
Soft'ning the tints of sorrow on the soul, I20
The deep impression long my heart shall fill,
And every mellowed trace be perfect still.

Forgive, Boscawen, if my sorrowing heart,
Intent on grief, forget the rules of art;
Forgive, if wounded recollection melt – I25
You best can pardon who have oft'nest felt.
You who for many a friend and hero mourn,
Who bend in anguish o'er the frequent urn;
You who have found how much the feeling heart
Shapes its own wound, and points itself the dart; I30
You who from tender sad experience feel
The wound such minds receive can never heal;

That grief a thousand entrances can find,
Where parts superior dignify the mind;
Would you renounce the pangs those feelings give, I35
Secure in joyless apathy to live?

For though in souls where taste and sense abound,
Pain through a thousand avenues can wound;
Yet the same avenues are open still,
To casual blessings as to casual ill. I40
Nor is the trembling temper more awake
To every wound which misery can make,
Than is the finely-fashioned nerve alive
To every transport pleasure has to give.

For if, when home-felt²⁷ joys the mind elate, I45
It mourns in secret for another's fate;
Yet when its own sad griefs invade the breast,
Abroad, in others' blessings, see it blessed!
Ev'n the soft sorrow of remembered woe,
A not unpleasing sadness may bestow. I50

Let not the vulgar read this pensive strain,
Their jests the tender anguish would profane.
Yet these some deem the happiest of their kind,
Whose low enjoyments never reached the mind;
Who ne'er a pain but for themselves have known, I55
Nor ever felt a sorrow but their own;
Who call romantic every finer thought
Conceived by pity, or by friendship wrought.
Ah, wherefore happy? Where's the kindred mind?
Where the large soul that takes in humankind? I60
Where the best passions of the mortal breast?
Where the warm blessing when another's blessed?
Where the soft lenitives of others' pain,
The social sympathy, the sense humane,
The sigh of rapture and the tear of joy, I65
Anguish that charms, and transports that destroy?
For tender Sorrow has her pleasures too,

Pleasures which prosp'rous Dullness never knew.
 She never knew, in all her coarser bliss,
 The sacred rapture of a pain like this! I70
 Nor think the cautious only are the just;
 Who never was deceived I would not trust.
 Then take, ye happy vulgar, take your part
 Of sordid joy which never touched the heart.
 Benevolence, which seldom stays to choose, I75
 Lest pausing Prudence teach her to refuse;
 Friendship which, once determined, never swerves,
 Weighs ere it trusts, but weighs not ere it serves;
 And soft-eyed Pity, and Forgiveness bland,
 And melting Charity with open hand; I80
 And artless Love, believing and believed,
 And gen'rous Confidence which ne'er deceived;
 And Mercy stretching out, ere Want can speak,
 To wipe the tear from pale Affliction's cheek:
 These ye have never known – then take your part I85
 Of sordid joy, which never touched the heart.
 You who have melted in bright glory's flame
 Or felt the spirit-stirring breath of fame;
 Ye noble few, in whom her promised meed
 Wakes the great thought, and makes the wish the deed; I90
 Ye who have tasted the delight to give,
 And, God's own agents, bid the wretched live;
 Who the chill haunts of Desolation seek,
 Raise the sunk heart, and flush the fading cheek;
 Ye who with pensive Petrarch love to mourn, I95
 Or weave fresh chaplets for Tibullus' urn;
 Who cherish both in Hammond's plaintive lay,²⁸
 The Provence myrtle, and the Roman bay;
 Ye who divide the joys, and share the pains
 Which merit feels, or Heav'n-born Fancy feigns; 200
 Would you renounce such joys, such pains as these,
 For vulgar pleasures, or for selfish ease?

Would you, to 'scape the pain, the joy forego,
 And miss the transport to avoid the woe?
 Would you the sense of real sorrow lose, 205
 Or cease to woo the melancholy muse?
 No, Greville,²⁹ no! Thy song, though steeped in tears,
 Though all thy soul in all thy strain appears,
 Yet wouldst thou all thy well-sung anguish choose,
 And all th' inglorious peace thou begg'st, refuse. 210
 Or you, Boscawen, when you fondly melt
 In raptures none but mothers ever felt;
 And view, enamoured, in your beauteous race,
 All Leveson's sweetness, and all Beaufort's grace;³⁰
 Yet think what dangers each loved child may share, 215
 The youth if valiant, and the maid if fair;
 That perils multiply as blessings flow,
 And constant sorrows on enjoyments grow;
 You who have felt how fugitive is joy,
 That while we clasp the phantom we destroy; 220
 That life's bright sun is dimmed by clouded views,
 And who have most to love have most to lose;
 Yet from these fair possessions would you part,
 To shield from future pain your guarded heart?
 Would your fond mind renounce its tender boast, 225
 Or with their opening bloom of promise lost?
 Yield the dear hopes which break upon your view,
 For all the quiet Dullness ever knew?
 Debase the objects of your tend'rest prayer
 To save the dangers of a distant care? 230
 Consent, to shun the anxious fears you prove,
 They less should merit, or you less should love?
 Yet while I hail the sympathy divine,
 Which makes, oh man, the wants of others thine;
 I mourn heroic Justice, scarcely owned, 235
 And principle for sentiment dethroned.
 While Feeling boasts her ever-tearful eye,

Stern Truth, firm Faith, and manly Virtue fly.
 Sweet sensibility, thou soothing pow'r
 Who shedd'st thy blessings on the natal hour 240
 Like fairy favours! Art can never seize,
 Nor affectation catch thy pow'r to please:
 Thy subtle essence still eludes the chains
 Of definition, and defeats her pains.
 Sweet sensibility, thou keen delight! 245
 Thou hasty moral, sudden sense of right!
 Thou untaught goodness! Virtue's precious seed!
 Thou sweet precursor of the gen'rous deed!
 Beauty's quick relish! Reason's radiant morn,
 Which dawns soft light before Reflection's born! 250
 To those who know thee not, no words can paint,
 And those who know thee, know all words are faint!
 'Tis not to mourn because a sparrow dies,
 To rave in artificial ecstasies;
 'Tis not to melt in tender Otway's fires; 255
 'Tis not to faint when injured Shore expires;
 'Tis not because the ready eye o'erflows
 At Clementina's or Clarissa's woes. 31
 Forgive, oh Richardson, nor think I mean,
 With cold contempt, to blast thy peerless scene; 260
 If some faint love of virtue glow in me,
 Pure spirit, I first caught that flame from thee.
 While soft Compassion silently relieves,
 Loquacious Feeling hints how much she gives;
 Laments how oft her wounded heart has bled, 265
 And boasts of many a tear she never shed.
 As words are but th' external marks to tell
 The fair ideas in the mind that dwell;
 And only are of things the outward sign,
 And not the things themselves they but define; 270
 So exclamations, tender tones, fond tears,
 And all the graceful drapery Pity wears;

These are not Pity's self, they but express
 Her inward sufferings by their pictured dress;
 And these fair marks, reluctant I relate, 275
 These lovely symbols may be counterfeit.
 Celestial Pity, why must I deplore
 Thy sacred image stamped on basest ore?
 There are, who fill with brilliant complaints the page,
 If a poor linnet meet the gunner's rage; 280
 There are, who for a dying fawn display
 The tend' rest anguish in the sweetest lay;³²
 Who for a wounded animal deplore,
 As if friend, parent, country, were no more;
 Who boast quick rapture trembling in their eye, 285
 If from the spider's snare they save a fly;
 Whose well-sung sorrows every breast inflame,
 And break all hearts but his from whom they came;
 Yet scorning life's dull duties to attend,
 Will persecute a wife, or wrong a friend; 290
 Alive to every woe by fiction dressed,
 The innocent he wronged, the wretch distressed,
 May plead in vain; their suff'rings come not near,
 Or he relieves them cheaply with a tear.³³
 Not so the tender moralist of Tweed; 295
 His Man of Feeling is a man indeed.³⁴
 Oh blessed Compassion! Angel Charity!
 More dear one genuine deed performed for thee
 Than all the periods Feeling e'er can turn,
 Than all thy soothing pages, polished Sterne!³⁵ 300
 Not that by deeds alone this love's expressed,
 If so, the affluent only were the blessed;
 One silent wish, one prayer, one soothing word,
 The precious page of Mercy shall record;
 One soul-felt sigh by pow'rless Pity giv'n, 305
 Accepted incense, shall ascend to heav'n!

Since trifles make the sum of human things,
And half our mis'ry from our foibles springs;
Since life's best joys consist in peace and ease,
And few can save or serve, but all may please: 310
Oh let th' ungentle spirit learn from hence,
A small unkindness is a great offence.

Large bounties to bestow we wish in vain,
But all may shun the guilt of giving pain.
To bless mankind with tides of flowing wealth, 315
With pow'r to grace them or to crown with health
Our little lot denies; but Heav'n decrees
To all, the gift of minist'ring to ease.

The gentle offices of patient love,
Beyond all flatt'ry, and all price above; 320
The mild forbearance at another's fault,
The taunting word, suppressed as soon as thought;
On these Heav'n bade the bliss of life depend,
And crushed ill-fortune when he made a friend.

A solitary blessing few can find, 325
Our joys with those we love are intertwined;
And he, whose helpful tenderness removes
Th' obstructing thorn which wounds the breast he loves,
Smooths not another's rugged path alone,
But scatters roses to adorn his own. 330

The hint malevolent, the look oblique,
The obvious satire, or implied dislike;
The sneer equivocal, the harsh reply,
And all the cruel language of the eye;
The artful injury whose venom'd dart 335
Scarce wounds the hearing while it stabs the heart;
The guarded phrase whose meaning kills, yet told,
The list'ner wonders how you thought it cold;
Small slights, contempt, neglect unmixed with hate,
Make up in number what they want in weight. 340
These, and a thousand griefs minute as these,
Corrode our comfort and destroy our ease.

As this strong feeling tends to good or ill,
 It gives fresh pow'r to vice or principle;
 'Tis not peculiar to the wise and good; 345
 'Tis passion's flame, the virtue of the blood.
 But to divert it to its proper course,
 There Wisdom's pow'r appears, there Reason's force;
 If, ill-directed, it pursues the wrong,
 It adds new strength to what before was strong; 350
 Breaks out in wild irregular desires,
 Disordered passions and illicit fires.
 But if the virtuous bias rule the soul,
 This lovely feeling then adorns the whole;
 Sheds its sweet sunshine on the moral part, 355
 Nor wastes on fancy what should warm the heart.
 Cold and inert the mental pow'rs would lie
 Without this quick'ning spark of deity.
 To draw the rich materials from the mine,
 To bid the mass of intellect refine, 360
 To melt the firm, to animate the cold,
 And Heav'n's own impress stamp on nature's gold;
 To give immortal Mind its finest tone,
 Oh sensibility, is all thy own!
 This is th' ethereal flame which lights and warms, 365
 In song transports us, and in action charms.
 'Tis this that makes the pensive strains of Gray³⁶
 Win to the open heart their easy way;
 Makes the touched spirit glow with kindred fire,
 When sweet Serena's³⁷ poet wakes the lyre. 370
 'Tis this, though nature's hidden treasures lie
 Bare to the keen inspection of her eye,
 Makes Portland's³⁸ face its brightest rapture wear,
 When her large bounty smooths the bed of care;
 'Tis this that breathes through Sevigné's sweet page,³⁹ 375
 That nameless grace which soothes a second age;

'Tis this whose charms the soul resistless seize,
 And gives Boscawen half her pow'r to please.
 Yet why those terrors? Why that anxious care,
 Since your last hope⁴⁰ the deathful war will dare? 380
 Why dread that energy of soul which leads
 To dang'rous glory by heroic deeds?
 Why tremble lest his ardent soul aspire?
 You fear the son because you knew the sire.
 Hereditary valour you deplore 385
 And dread, yet wish to find one hero more.

Sensibility

¹ Sensibility was a preoccupation central to the Bluestocking coterie of which More was part. Frances, daughter of William Evelyn Glanville, Esq., married Admiral Edward Boscawen, Viscount Falmouth, in 1742. He was a national hero, having thwarted a French invasion in an important battle in Lagos Bay in August 1759. He died of typhoid fever, 10 January 1761. In 1775, More told her sister that ‘Mrs Boscawen’s life has been a continued series of afflictions that may almost bear a parallel with those of the righteous man of Uz.’

² Measure for Measure I i 35–6.

³ More continued to revise the poem through successive editions.

⁴ Lyttelton and Young At the behest of Elizabeth Montagu and Elizabeth Carter, Edward Young (1683–1765) composed Resignation to console Mrs Boscawen for her husband’s death. George, Lord Lyttelton (1709–73), was introduced to Mrs Boscawen by Mrs Montagu. He had addressed a poem to her husband in September 1747 (‘To the Memory of Capt. Grenville’).

⁵ sad Elfrida’s poet William Mason (1725–97), author of Elfrida: a dramatic poem (1752). ‘Milton calls Euripedes “sad Electra’s poet”’

(More's note); see Milton's Sonnet VIII. When the assault was intended to the City 13.

6 And either Warton breathe his classic strain Joseph Warton (1722–1800) and his brother Thomas Warton the younger (1728–90) were distinguished classicists. Joseph translated and edited Virgil in 1753; Thomas composed poems in Latin.

7 tuneful Beattie wakes old Spenser's lyre More refers to The Minstrel (1771–4) by James Beattie (1735–1803), written in Spenserian stanzas.

8 Robert Lowth, Bishop of London (1710–87), a skilled Latinist and Hebrew scholar. His most famous work was De Sacra Poesi Hebraeorum (1753), translated by Gregory in 1787 as Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews.

9 Latian Latin.

10 Amos' son Isaiah.

11 He seized his mantle as the prophet flew More alludes to Elijah's casting of his mantle (cloak) on Elisha (1 Kings 19: 19).

12 'See his Discourses to the Academy' (More's note). Sir Joshua Reynolds (1723–92) was the most renowned portrait-painter of the age. His first discourse was delivered in 1769, and subsequent lectures became yearly fixtures at the Royal Academy. He met More in 1775, when she described his most recent discourse as 'a masterpiece for matter as well as style'.

13 Later editions of Sensibility carried the note: 'Mr Soame Jenyns had just published his work On the internal Evidence of the Christian Religion.' Soame Jenyns (1704–87), poet and pamphleteer, was much admired by More; she claimed to know someone converted to Christianity by his View of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion (1776).

14 ‘See the Bishop’s admirable Poem on Death’ (More’s note). Beilby Porteus, Bishop of Chester and, later, London (1731–1808), first published the popular Death: A Poetical Essay in 1759. His response to this allusion was an appreciative quatrain:

How potent is thy Muse, oh More,

Whose vivifying breath

Can do what Muse ne’er did before:

Give life and fame to – death!

15 Nine the Muses.

16 And is not Johnson theirs, himself an host? More was a friend of Dr Johnson, whom she met in 1774.

17 With Carter trace the wit to Athens known Elizabeth Carter’s translation, All the Works of Epictetus which are now extant (1758), was a considerable success in its day.

18 Elizabeth Montagu, ‘Queen of the Blue-stockings’ (1720–1800). ‘She is not only the finest genius, but the finest lady I ever saw’, More wrote in 1775.

19 Chapone’s instructive page Hester Chapone (1727–1801), friend and collaborator of Richardson, who called her ‘a little spitfire’. Her best-known work, to which More refers here, was Letters on the Improvement of the Mind (1773), dedicated to Mrs Montagu. It was enormously popular, being reprinted sixteen times by the end of the century.

20 Mrs Boyle Walsingham was a Bluestocking and close friend of More’s.

21 And she who blessed...to our age Mary Delany (1700–88), Bluestocking, had known Pope and Swift. She met Swift in 1733, and enjoyed a correspondence with him. In a letter of 1788, Burke told More that Mrs Delany ‘was almost the only person he ever saw who, at eight-eight, blushed like a girl’. She is now best known for nearly a thousand perfectly accurate plant pictures made from cut paper in her old age, preserved in the Print Room of the British Museum, London. See Ruth Hayden, Mrs Delany and her Flower Collages (2nd edn, London, 1992).

22 Oh much-loved Barbould In 1782 Anna Laetitia Barbould was best known for her first volume of poems, which included Corsica (1773), of which Mrs Montagu was a keen admirer.

23 and Garrick died! David Garrick (1717–79), actor-manager, was More’s principal mentor.

24 Oh shades of Hampton Garrick’s house, Hampton Villa in Middlesex.

25 Atticus, though Cicero’s friend and confidant, was politically neutral and remained friendly with Cicero’s adversaries, Caesar and his followers.

26 ‘Mr Sheridan’s Monody’ (More’s note). Sheridan’s Verses to the Memory of Garrick, spoken as a monody was read at Drury Lane Theatre and published in 1779.

27 Home-felt experienced inwardly. The phrase derives from Milton, Comus 262: ‘a sacred, and home-felt delight’. It occurs also in Pope’s Essay on Man ii 256, and Warton’s translation of Virgil:

Yet calm content, secure from guilty cares,

Yet home-felt pleasure, peace, and rest, are theirs ...

(Warton, Georgics ii 566–7)

29 ‘Beautiful Ode to Indifference’ (More’s note). Frances Macartney (? 1726–89) was the wife of Richard Fulke Greville, godmother of Fanny Burney, and author of ‘A Prayer for Indifference’.

30 Leveson and Beaufort are Mrs Boscawen’s daughters. Frances married Admiral John Leveson-Gower in 1773; Elizabeth married Henry, 5th Duke of Beaufort, in 1766.

32 More apparently disapproved of Marvell’s The Nymph complaining for the death of her faun.

33 More attacks a kind of sensibility that she and the other Bluestockings regarded as debased. In 1782, shortly after Sensibility had been published, she told her sister: ‘Mrs Montagu, Mrs Chapone, and Mrs Carter, are mightily pleased that I have attacked that mock feeling and sensibility which is at once the boast and disgrace of these times, and which is equally deficient in taste and truth.’

34 Henry Mackenzie (1745–1831), native of Edinburgh, published his sentimental novel, The Man of Feeling, in 1771.

36 ‘This is meant of the Elegy in a Country Churchyard, of which exquisite poem sensibility is, perhaps, the characteristic beauty’ (More’s note).

37 ‘Triumphs of Temper’ (More’s note). Serena is the principal character in William Hayley’s The Triumphs of Temper (1781), admired by the Bluestockings.

38 Lady Margaret Cavendish Harley, 2nd Duchess of Portland, prominent among the Bluestockings. She died in 1785.

39 Marie de Rabutin-Chantal, marquise de Sévigné (1626–96), whose letters are an indispensable source of information on life under Louis XIV. Her equally remarkable, but more personal, letters to her daughter were first translated into English in 1727, and gained immediate popularity. These are the ones most admired by More who, in a letter of 1786, commended their ‘excess of maternal tenderness’.

40 ‘Admiral Boscawen’s only remaining son was then in America, and at the Battle of Lexington’ (More’s note). George Evelyn Boscawen, 3rd Viscount Falmouth, born in 1758, survived the American War and died in 1808.

Slavery: A Poem(1788)¹

Oh great design!

*Ye sons of mercy! Oh complete your work;
Wrench from Oppression’s hand the iron rod,
And bid the cruel feel the pains they give.*

(Thomson’s Liberty)²

If Heaven has into being deigned to call
Thy light, oh liberty, to shine on all,
Bright intellectual³ sun, why does thy ray
To earth distribute only partial day?
Since no resisting cause from spirit flows, 5
Thy penetrating essence to oppose;
No obstacles by nature’s hand impressed,
Thy subtle and ethereal beams arrest;
Nor motion’s laws can speed thy active course,
Nor strong repulsion’s pow’rs obstruct thy force – 10

Since there is no convexity in mind,
Why are thy genial beams to parts confined?
While the chill north with thy bright ray is blessed
Why should fell darkness half the south invest?
Was it decreed, fair Freedom, at thy birth, 15
That thou shouldst ne'er irradiate all the earth?
While Britain basks in thy full blaze of light,
Why lies sad Afric quenched in total night?
Thee only, sober goddess, I attest,
In smiles chastised, and decent graces dressed; 20
Not that unlicensed monster of the crowd
Whose roar terrific bursts in peals so loud,
Deaf'ning the ear of Peace; fierce Faction's tool
Of rash Sedition born, and mad Misrule,
Whose stubborn mouth, rejecting Reason's rein, 25
No strength can govern, and no skill restrain;
Whose magic cries the frantic vulgar draw,
To spurn at order, and to outrage law;
To tread on grave Authority and Pow'r,
And shake the work of ages in an hour. 30
Convulsed her voice, and pestilent her breath,
She raves of mercy while she deals out death –
Each blast is fate; she darts from either hand
Red conflagration o'er th' astonished land;
Clamouring for peace, she rends the air with noise, 35
And to reform a part, the whole destroys.

Oh plaintive Southerne,⁴ whose impassioned strain
So oft has waked my languid muse in vain!
Now, when congenial themes her cares engage,
She burns to emulate thy glowing page; 40
Her failing efforts mock her fond desires,
She shares thy feelings, not partakes thy fires.
Strange pow'r of song – the strain that warms the heart
Seems the same inspiration to impart;
Touched by the kindling energy alone, 45

We think the flame which melts us is our own;
Deceived, for genius we mistake delight;
Charmed as we read, we fancy we can write.

Though not to me, sweet bard, thy pow'rs belong,
Fair Truth, a hallowed guide, inspires my song! 50
Here art would weave her gayest flow'rs in vain,
For Truth the bright invention would disdain.
For no fictitious ills these numbers flow,
But living anguish and substantial woe;
No individual griefs my bosom melt, 55
For millions feel what Oroonoko felt:⁵
Fired by no single wrongs, the countless host
I mourn, by rapine dragged from Afric's coast.

Perish th' illiberal thought which would debase
The native genius of the sable race! 60
Perish the proud philosophy which sought
To rob them of the pow'rs of equal thought!
Does then th' immortal principle within
Change with the casual colour of a skin?
Does matter govern spirit, or is mind 65
Degraded by the form to which 'tis joined?

No; they have heads to think, and hearts to feel,
And souls to act, with firm though erring zeal;
For they have keen affections, kind desires,
Love strong as death, and active patriot fires; 70
All the rude energy, the fervid flame
Of high-souled passion and ingenuous shame –
Strong but luxuriant virtues boldly shoot
From the wild vigour of a savage root.

Nor weak their sense of honour's proud control, 75
For pride is virtue in a pagan soul;
A sense of worth, a conscience of desert,
A high, unbroken haughtiness of heart;
That self-same stuff which erst proud empires swayed,
Of which the conquerors of the world were made. 80

Capricious fate of man! That very pride
In Afric scourged, in Rome was deified.

No muse, oh Qua-shi,⁶ shall thy deeds relate,
No statute snatch thee from oblivious fate!
For thou wast born where never gentle muse 85
On valour's grave the flow'rs of genius strews;
And thou wast born where no recording page
Plucks the fair deed from time's devouring rage.
Had fortune placed thee on some happier coast,
Where polished souls heroic virtue boast, 90
To thee, who sought'st a voluntary grave,
Th' uninjured honours of thy name to save,
Whose generous arm thy barbarous master spared,
Altars had smoked, and temples had been reared.

Whene'er to Afric's shores I turn my eyes, 95
Horrors of deepest, deadliest guilt arise;
I see, by more than fancy's mirror shown,
The burning village and the blazing town,
See the dire victim torn from social life,
The shrieking babe, the agonizing wife! 100
She, wretch forlorn, is dragged by hostile hands,
To distant tyrants sold, in distant lands!
Transmitted miseries and successive chains
The sole sad heritage her child obtains!
Ev'n this last wretched boon their foes deny: 105
To weep together, or together die.
By felon hands, by one relentless stroke,
See the fond links of feeling nature broke!
The fibres twisting round a parent's heart,
Torn from their grasp, and bleeding as they part. 110

Hold, murderers, hold! Nor aggravate distress;
Respect the passions you yourselves possess!
Ev'n you, of ruffian heart and ruthless hand,
Love your own offspring, love your native land.
Ah, leave them holy freedom's cheering smile, 115

The Heav'n-taught fondness for the parent soil;
 Revere affections mingled with our frame,
 In every nature, every clime the same;
 In all, these feelings equal sway maintain;
 In all, the love of home and freedom reign – I20
 And Tempe's vale⁷ and parched Angola's sand
 One equal fondness of their sons command.
 Th' unconquered savage laughs at pain and toil,
 Basking in freedom's beams which gild his native soil.
 Does thirst of empire, does desire of fame I25
 (For these are specious crimes), our rage inflame?
 No; sordid lust of gold their fate controls –
 The basest appetite of basest souls;
 Gold, better gained by what their ripening sky,
 Their fertile fields, their arts⁸ and mines supply. I30
 What wrongs, what injuries does Oppression plead,
 To smooth the horror of th' unnatural deed?
 What strange offence, what aggravated sin?
 They stand convicted of a darker skin!
 Barbarians, hold! Th' opprobrious commerce spare, I35
 Respect His sacred image which they bear.
 Though dark and savage, ignorant and blind,
 They claim the common privilege of kind;
 Let malice strip them of each other plea,
 They still are men, and men should still be free. I40
 Insulted reason loathes th' inverted trade –
 Dire change! The agent is the purchase made!
 Perplexed, the baffled muse involves the tale;
 Nature confounded, well may language fail!
 The outraged goddess, with abhorrent eyes, I45
 Sees man the traffic, souls the merchandise!
 Plead not, in reason's palpable abuse,
 Their sense of feeling callous and obtuse;⁹
 From heads to hearts lies nature's plain appeal –
 Though few can reason, all mankind can feel. I50

Though wit may boast a livelier dread of shame,
A loftier sense of wrong, refinement claim;
Though polished manners may fresh wants invent,
And nice¹⁰ distinctions nicer souls torment –
Though these on finer spirits heavier fall, I55
Yet natural evils are the same to all.
Though wounds there are which reason's force may heal,
There needs no logic sure to make us feel.
The nerve, howe'er untutored, can sustain
A sharp, unutterable sense of pain, I60
As exquisitely fashioned in a slave
As where unequal fate a sceptre gave.
Sense is as keen where Congo's sons preside
As where proud Tiber rolls his classic tide.
Rhetoric or verse may point the feeling line – I65
They do not whet sensation, but define.
Did ever slave less feel the galling chain,
When Zeno¹¹ proved there was no ill in pain?
Their miseries philosophic quirks¹² deride;
Slaves groan in pangs disowned by Stoic pride. I70
 When the fierce sun darts vertical his beams,
And thirst and hunger mix their wild extremes;
When the sharp iron wounds his inmost soul,¹³
And his strained eyes in burning anguish roll –
Will the parched negro find, ere he expire, I75
 No pain in hunger, and no heat in fire?
 For him, when fate his tortured frame destroys,
What hope of present fame or future joys?
For this have heroes shortened nature's date;
For that have martyrs gladly met their fate; I80
But him, forlorn, no hero's pride sustains,
No martyr's blissful visions soothe his pains;
Sullen, he mingles with his kindred dust,
For he has learned to dread the Christian's trust.

To him what mercy can that pow'r display, I85
 Whose servants murder, and whose sons betray?
 Savage, thy venial error I deplore –
 They are not Christians who infest thy shore!
 Oh thou sad spirit, whose preposterous yoke
 The great deliverer death at length has broke! I90
 Released from misery, and escaped from care,
 Go meet that mercy man denied thee here.
 In thy dark home, sure refuge of th' oppressed,
 The wicked vex not, and the weary rest.
 And if some notions, vague and undefined, I95
 Of future terrors have assailed thy mind;
 If such thy masters have presumed to teach,
 As terrors only they are prone to preach
 (For should they paint eternal mercy's reign,
 Where were th' oppressor's rod, the captive's chain?); 200
 If, then, thy troubled soul has learned to dread
 The dark unknown thy trembling footsteps tread
 On Him, who made thee what thou art, depend:
 He, who withholds the means, accepts the end.
 Not thine the reckoning dire of light abused, 205
 Knowledge disgraced, and liberty misused;
 On thee no awful judge incensed shall sit
 For parts perverted, and dishonoured wit.
 Where ignorance will be found the surest plea,
 How many learned and wise shall envy thee! 210
 And thou, white savage, whether lust of gold
 Or lust of conquest ruled thee uncontrolled –
 Hero or robber – by whatever name
 Thou plead thy impious claim to wealth or fame;
 Whether inferior mischiefs be thy boast, 215
 A petty tyrant rifling Gambia's coast;
 Or bolder carnage track thy crimson way,
 Kings dispossessed, and provinces thy prey,
 Panting to tame wide earth's remotest bound,

All Cortez¹⁴ murdered, all Columbus found; 220
O'er plundered realms to reign, detested lord,
Make millions wretched, and thyself abhorred;
In reason's eye, in wisdom's fair account,
Your sum of glory boasts a like amount;
The means may differ, but the end's the same: 225
Conquest is pillage with a nobler name.

Who makes the sum of human blessings less,
Or sinks the stock of general happiness,
No solid fame shall grace, no true renown,
His life shall blazon, or his memory crown. 230

Had those advent'rous spirits who explore
Through ocean's trackless wastes the far-sought shore;
Whether of wealth insatiate, or of pow'r,
Conquerors who waste, or ruffians who devour –
Had these possessed, oh Cook,¹⁵ thy gentle mind, 235
Thy love of arts, thy love of humankind;
Had these pursued thy mild and liberal plan,
Discoverers had not been a curse to man!
Then, blessed philanthropy, thy social hands
Had linked dissevered worlds in brothers' bands, 240
Careless if colour or if clime divide;
Then, loved and loving, man had lived and died.

The purest wreaths which hang on glory's shrine,
For empires founded, peaceful Penn,¹⁶ are thine;
No bloodstained laurels crowned thy virtuous toil, 245
No slaughtered natives drenched thy fair-earned soil.

Still thy meek spirit in thy flock survives,¹⁷
Consistent still, their doctrines rule their lives;
Thy followers only have effaced the shame
Inscribed by Slavery on the Christian name. 250

Shall Britain, where the soul of Freedom reigns,
Forge chains for others she herself disdains?
Forbid it, Heaven! Oh let the nations know

The liberty she loves she will bestow;
Not to herself the glorious gift confined, 255
She spreads the blessing wide as humankind;
And, scorning narrow views of time and place,
Bids all be free in earth's extended space.

What page of human annals can record
A deed so bright as human rights restored? 260
Oh may that godlike deed, that shining page,
Redeem our fame, and consecrate our age!
And see, the cherub Mercy from above,
Descending softly, quits the sphere of love!
On feeling hearts she sheds celestial dew, 265
And breathes her spirit o'er th' enlightened few;
From soul to soul the spreading influence steals,
Till every breast the soft contagion feels.
She bears, exulting, to the burning shore,
The loveliest office angel ever bore: 270
To vindicate the pow'r in heaven adored;
To still the clank of chains, and sheathe the sword;
To cheer the mourner, and with soothing hands
From bursting hearts unbind th' oppressor's bands;
To raise the lustre of the Christian name, 275
And clear the foulest blot that dims its fame.

As the mild spirit hovers o'er the coast,
A fresher hue the withered landscapes boast;
Her healing smiles the ruined scenes repair,
And blasted Nature wears a joyous air. 280
She spreads her blessed commission from above,
Stamped with the sacred characters of love;
She tears the banner stained with blood and tears,
And, Liberty, thy shining standard rears!
As the bright ensign's glory she displays, 285
See pale Oppression faints beneath the blaze!
The giant dies, no more his frown appals;
The chain, untouched, drops off; the fetter falls.
Astonished Echo tells the vocal shore,

‘Oppression’s fall’n, and Slavery is no more!’ 290
The dusky myriads crowd the sultry plain,
And hail that mercy long invoked in vain;
Victorious pow’r! She bursts their two-fold bands,
And Faith and Freedom spring from Mercy’s hands.

Slavery: A Poem

1 More’s poem was composed in anticipation of the passing of Sir William Dolben’s Bill restricting the number of slaves who could be transported from Africa to British colonies in the West Indies; see headnote, p. 58. It was published at the same time as Yearsley’s Poem on the Inhumanity of the Slave-Trade (p. 165).

2 More is recalling, though inaccurately, a passage from Thomson’s Winter, which celebrates the labours of a Parliamentary Committee that investigated allegations of torture in prisons in 1729:

O great design! if executed well,
With patient care, and wisdom-tempered zeal..
Ye sons of mercy! yet resume the search;
Drag forth the legal monsters into light,
Wrench from their hands Oppression’s iron rod,
And bid the cruel feel the pains they give.
(ll. 376–81)

3 intellectual spiritual.

4 ‘Author of the tragedy of Oroonoko’ (More’s note). Thomas Southerne’s Oroonoko (1695–6), an adaptation of Aphra Behn’s anti-slavery novel (1688), was enormously popular.

5 what Oroonoko felt The heir to an African king, Oroonoko is taken as a slave to Surinam, an English colony.

6 “‘It is a point of honour among negroes of a high spirit to die rather than to suffer their glossy skin to bear the mark of the whip. Qua-shi had somehow offended his master, a young planter with whom he had been bred up in the endearing intimacy of a playfellow. His services had been faithful; his attachment affectionate. The master resolved to punish him, and pursued him for that purpose. In trying to escape, Qua-shi stumbled and fell; the master fell upon him. They wrestled long with doubtful victory. At length, Qua-shi got uppermost, and being firmly seated on his master's breast, he secured his legs with one hand, and with the other drew a sharp knife; then said, 'Master, I have been bred up with you from a child; I have loved you as myself; in return, you have condemned me to a punishment, of which I must ever have borne the marks – thus only I can avoid them.' So saying, he drew the knife with all his strength across his own throat, and fell down dead, without a groan, on his master's body." Ramsay's Essay on the Treatment of African Slaves' (More's note). More refers to James Ramsay (1733–89), An Essay on the Treatment and Conversion of African Slaves in the British Sugar Colonies (1784).

7 Tempe's vale idyllic valley in Thessaly, praised by Virgil, Georgics ii 469.

8 'Besides many valuable productions of the soil, cloths and carpets of exquisite manufacture are brought from the coast of Guinea' (More's note).

9 'Nothing is more frequent than this cruel and stupid argument, that they do not feel the miseries inflicted on them as Europeans would do' (More's note). This was one of the arguments of the merchants who claimed that regulation of the slave trade would put them out of business; see headnote p. 58.

10 nice subtle.

11 Zeno Zeno of Citium (c.335–c.263 BC) founded the Stoic school of philosophy.

12 quirks quibbles, subtle or evasive arguments.

13 ‘This is not said figuratively. The writer of these lines has seen a complete set of chains, fitted to every separate limb of these unhappy, innocent men, together with instruments for wrenching open the jaws, contrived with such ingenious cruelty as would shock the humanity of an inquisitor’ (More’s notes).

14 Hernán Cortez (1485–1547), Spanish conquistador, overthrew the Aztec empire, killing and enslaving its people, winning Mexico for Spain.

15 James Cook (1728–79) circumnavigated the world in the Endeavour, 1768–71.

Cheap Repository: The Story of Sinful Sally. Told by Herself(1796)

Showing how, from being Sally of the Green, she was first led to become Sinful Sally, and afterwards Drunken Sal, and how at last she came to a most melancholy and almost hopeless end, being therein a warning to all young women both in town and country. Price one halfpenny.

Come each maiden lend an ear,
Country lass and London belle!
Come and drop a mournful tear
O’er the tale that I shall tell!

I that ask your tender pity, 5
Ruined now and all forlorn,
Once like you was young and pretty,
And as cheerful as the morn.

In yon distant cottage sitting,
Far away from London town, 10
Once you might have seen me knitting
In my simple kersey¹ gown.

Where the little lambkins leap,
Where the meadow looks so gay,
Where the drooping willows weep, 15
Simple Sally used to stray.

Then I tasted many a blessing,
Then I had an honest fame;
Father, mother, me caressing,
Smiled and thought me free from blame. 20

Then amid my friends so dear,
Life it speeded fast away;
Oh, it moves a tender tear
To think how peaceful was the day!

From the villages surrounding, 25
Ere I well had reached eighteen,
Came the modest youths abounding,
All to Sally of the Green.

Courting days were thus beginning,
And I soon had proved a wife; 30
Oh, if I had kept from sinning,
Now how blessed had been my life!

Come each maiden, lend an ear,
Country lass and London belle!
Come ye now and deign to hear 35
How poor sinful Sally fell.

Where the hill begins inclining,
Half a furlong from the road,
o'er the village white and shining
Stands Sir William's great abode. 40

Near his meadow I was tripping,
Vainly² wishing to be seen,
When Sir William met me skipping,
And he spoke me on the Green;

Bid me quit my cloak of scarlet,³ 45
Blamed my simple kersey gown,
Eyed me then, so like a varlet
Such as live in London town.

With his presents I was loaded,
And bedecked in ribbons gay; 50
Thus my ruin was foreboded –
Oh how crafty was his way!

Vanished now from cottage lowly,
My poor parents' heart I break,
Enter on a state unholy, 55
Turn a mistress to a rake.

Now no more by morning light
Up to God my voice I raise;
Now no shadows of the night
Call my thoughts to prayer and praise. 60

Hark! A well known sound I hear!
'Tis the church's Sunday bell;
No, I dread to venture near;
No, I'm now the child of hell.

Now I lay my Bible by, 65
Choose that impious book so new;
Love the bold blaspheming lie,
And that filthy novel too.

Next to London town I pass
(Sinful Sally is my name), 70

There to gain a front of brass⁴
And to glory in my shame.

Powdered well, and puffed, and painted,
Rivals all I there outshine;
With skin so white and heart so tainted, 75
Rolling in my chariot fine.

In the park I glitter daily,
Then I dress me for the play,
Then to masquerade so gaily,
All London hears me tear away. 80

When I meet some meaner⁵ lass,
Then I toss with proud disdain;
Laugh and giggle as I pass,
As if I never knew a pain.

But amidst my peals of laughter 85
Horror seizes oft my frame;
Pleasure now, damnation after,
And a never-dying flame.⁶

‘Save me, save me, Lord!’ I cry,
‘Save my soul from Satan’s chain!’ 90
Now I see salvation nigh,
Now I turn to sin again.

By a thousand ills o’ertaken
See me now quite sinking down,
Till so lost and so forsaken 95
Sal is cast upon the town.

At the dusk of evening grey,
Forth I step from secret cell,
Roaming like a beast of prey
Or some hateful imp of hell. 100

Ah, how many youths so blooming
By my wanton looks I've won;
Then by vices all consuming
Left them ruined and undone!

Thus the cruel spider stretches I05
Wide his web for every fly;
Then each victim that he catches
Straight he poisons till he die.

Now no more by conscience troubled,
Deep I plunge in every sin; II0
True, my sorrows are redoubled,
But I drown them all in gin.

See me next with front so daring
Band of ruffian rogues among;
Fighting, cheating, drinking, swearing – II5
And Sal's the vilest of the throng.

Mark that youngest of the thieves;
Taught by Sal he ventures further;
What he filches Sal receives –
'Tis for Sal he does the murder. I20

See me then attend my victim
To the fatal gallows tree,
Pleased to think how I have nicked⁷ him,
Made him swing while I am free.

Jack I laughing see depart, I25
While with Dick I drink and sing;
Soon again I'll fill the cart,
Make this present lover swing.

But while thus with guilt surprising,
Sal pursues her bold career, I30
See God's dreadful wrath arising
And the day of vengeance near.

Fierce disease my body seizes,
Racking pain afflicts my bones;⁸
Dread of death my spirit freezes, I35
Deep and doleful are my groans.

Here with face so shrunk and spotted
On the clay-cold ground I lie;
See how all my flesh is rotted –
Stop, oh stranger, see me die! I40

Conscience, as my breath's departing,
Plunges too his arrow deep,
With redoubled fury starting
Like some giant from his sleep.

In this pit of ruin lying I45
Once again before I die,
Fainting, trembling, weeping, sighing –
Lord, to thee I'll lift mine eye.

Thou canst save the vilest harlot,
Grace I've heard is free and full, I50
Sins that once were red as scarlet
Thou canst make as white as wool.

Saviour, whom I've pierced so often,
Deeper still my guilt imprint!
Let thy mighty spirit soften I55
This my hardened heart of flint!

Vain, alas, is all my groaning,
For I fear the die is cast;
True, thy blood is all atoning,
But my day of grace is past. I60

Saviour, hear me or I perish!
None who lives is quite undone;
Still a ray of hope I'll cherish
Till eternity's begun.

Charlotte Smith (née Turner) (1749–1806)

Wordsworth was one of her greatest admirers. In 1836 he remembered her as ‘my old friend ... who was the first Modern distinguished in that [form of] composition’¹ (that is, the sonnet), a huge compliment from a poet who was no mean sonneteer himself. The reference to her as a ‘Modern’ indicates his recognition that she was well ahead of her time in writing a poetry close to his own, something on which he elaborated when he remarked that ‘She wrote little, and that little unambitiously, but with true feeling for rural nature, at a time when nature was not much regarded by English poets.’²

Charlotte Smith was born in London on 4 May 1749, the elder daughter of Nicholas Turner of Stoke House, Guildford, and Bignor Park, Sussex, and Anna Towers. She and her sister were brought up by a kindly aunt after their mother’s death when she was 3, spending time at their father’s estate of Bignor Park, on the banks on the River Arun in Sussex, as she recalled in The Emigrants (1793):

There (where from hollows fringed with yellow broom,
The birch with silver rind, and fairy leaf,
Aslant the low stream trembles) I have stood
And meditated how to venture best
Into the shallow current, to procure
The willow-herb of glowing purple spikes,
Or flags whose sword-like leaves concealed
 the tide,
Startling the timid reed-bird from her nest,
As with aquatic flowers I wove the wreath,
Such as, collected by the shepherd girls,
Deck in the villages the turfy shrine,
And mark the arrival of propitious May.
(The Emigrants ii 335–46)

The freshness and intensity of these recollections are validated by their precise detail. Smith’s ability to perceive nature in this way was partly a gift, but also a skill taught to her at the age of 6 by the landscape painter George Smith, then in his early forties, who lived in Chichester. He encouraged her to think of landscapes as greater than the mere sum of their parts – possessing atmosphere even to the point of being enchanted. Short sight led her to specialize in painting botanical specimens, with which the South Downs were (and still are) well provided. The precise, sensitive documentation of the flora around her was to be a consistent feature of her poems.

Of this engraving, made for the eighth edition of her Elegiac Sonnets (1797), Smith remarked: ‘I think Mr Condé has done all that could be done save only that my family say what I do not venture to suggest myself: that there is a want of spirit in the eyes.’ (© National Portrait Gallery, London.)

Dove Cottage

Unusually for the time, she enjoyed for several years a good education at boarding-school in Kensington, London, where she first learnt to read Italian and write sonnets. Her father's career as a gambler was going badly, however, and she was withdrawn at the age of 12 because of his increasing debt. Within a few years, things were so bad that Turner was compelled to marry a rich heiress, Miss Henrietta Meriton. And when that had happened, he arranged for his eldest daughter to marry a wealthy West India merchant of his acquaintance, Benjamin Smith. Two months short of 16, she was (in her words) 'sold, a legal prostitute', and began a child-bearing career that would span the next twenty-two years, producing twelve children. To make matters worse, her new husband was not what he appeared: besides turning out to be a spendthrift, he would behave abusively and violently towards wife and daughters. The first sign of real trouble came in December 1783 when litigation over his father's will led to his imprisonment at the King's Bench prison in London for embezzlement. He was there for seven months, some of which his wife shared, as was customary. It was at this time that she decided to publish a book in order to raise funds, and began writing sonnets.

She contributed to the European Magazine from 1782 onwards; two years later, with the encouragement of William Hayley (friend of Cowper and patron of Blake), she published her Elegiac Sonnets. It was an immediate success, perhaps because readers identified with the resigned melancholy of its author. By the time it reached its third edition in 1786, reviewers were openly expressing concern on her behalf. 'We are sorry to see the eye which can shine with so much poetic fire sullied with a tear', wrote the Critical Review, 'and we hope the soothing of the favoured muse may wipe it from her cheek.'³ For its part, the Gentleman's Magazine proclaimed her a better sonneteer than either Shakespeare or Milton, before continuing:

We cannot, however, forbear expressing a hope that the misfortunes she so often hints at, are all imaginary. We must have perused her very tender and exquisite effusions with diminished pleasure, could we have supposed her sorrows to be real. It would be hard indeed if a lady, who has so much contributed to the delight of others, should feel any want of happiness herself.⁴

Her poems are distinctive for the way in which her hardships, though never detailed, colour her observations, producing an intriguing blend of the confessional and the sentimental. It is a poetry that gives a remarkably precise account of the author's inner and outer worlds. The sonnet was a fashionable form in which to be writing, and Smith had a happy knack of exploiting popular taste, not least with translations from Goethe's Werther, which was enjoying immense popularity; in so doing, she aroused the envious criticisms of Anna Seward, who accused her of promoting 'dark dreams of suicide' (see p. 32). This volume contains the complete text of Elegiac Sonnets (3rd edn, 1786).

Despite literary success, the debts were huge, and creditors still knocking at the door. In summer 1784 the family was forced into exile in Normandy for six months, where they rented a ruined chateau. This cannot have been easy for someone who, like Smith, loved her native countryside, and helps explain her sympathy with the exiles from Revolutionary France whom she saw wandering Brighton beach eight years later: 'I mourn your sorrows, for I too have known / Involuntary exile.'⁵ During these months she became increasingly impatient with her abusive, unfaithful husband, and decided to leave him as soon as she could.

In 1785, leaving her husband in France, she took her children back to Sussex to settle at Woolbeding House. Here she continued to write sonnets, including the translations from Petrarch and Metastasio that would appear in the third edition. Benjamin returned to England and for a while continued to make a nuisance of himself – partly because he had a legal entitlement to his wife’s earnings, and was not above demanding them from her publishers. He finally announced in early 1788 that he was leaving for Barbados: at last, she was free.

His departure was a relief, but she remained in debt and had no choice but to keep writing. In 1788 she worked hard on a successful novel, Emmeline, and a fifth edition of Elegiac Sonnets, one of the subscribers to which was the young William Wordsworth, then an undergraduate at St John’s College, Cambridge. It was symptomatic of the Sonnets’ popularity that the fifth edition, published New Year’s Day 1789, made her £180 (£12,600/US$23,500 today).

Later that year she moved to the fashionable Regency town of Brighton, where she wrote more bestselling novels, most notably Ethelinde (1790) and Celestina (1791) – the second of which earned £200 (£14,000/US$25,600 today) from its first edition alone. During 1791, partly out of solidarity with the Revolution, she visited Paris, where she met Helen Maria Williams (p. 291). The 21-year-old William Wordsworth was aware of that connection when he visited Smith in Brighton in November, Paris-bound, requesting a letter of introduction to Williams. His interest in Smith, which dated from his schooldays,⁶ stemmed partly from the fact that they were distantly related.⁷ At this moment Wordsworth was on his way to France where he would remain until late 1792, and meet other Revolutionary sympathizers. Smith took a shine to the young man with a Cumbrian accent, and showed him two poems in manuscript which he copied into the back of his copy of Elegiac Sonnets.⁸ ‘She received me in the politest manner’, Wordsworth told his brother Richard, ‘and showed me every possible civility.’⁹ He would never forget her kindness.

With the execution of Louis XVI in January 1793, and the resulting outbreak of war, radicals at home found themselves torn between outrage inspired by events in Paris and loyalty to the Revolution. This is evident in The Emigrants which is in the first place a political work. For Smith, the point about the French clergy and nobility who found safety from the horrors of the Revolution through exile in rural Sussex is that experience has revealed to them the injustice of both their former conduct towards the poor, and the assumptions on which it was based (i 244–95). Smith’s point is that the injustices of which they were guilty continue in England (i 315–46). In Book II her radical indignation is offset by horror at the execution of Louis and uncertain fate of his family (Marie Antoinette had not been guillotined at the time Smith was writing). His execution in January 1793 led Smith to reassess her earlier sympathies, a reaction experienced by many who nonetheless shared its republican aims.

The composition of such a poem was an act of bravery, particularly coming from a woman; to have published it, even more so. It was also an expression of profound personal and political self-analysis, inspired by Smith’s first-hand knowledge of French emigrants – not just from having seen them in Brighton, but because she offered them shelter for several months in her own home, and helped them find long-term accommodation elsewhere. Her sympathy for them is evident from the way in which she writes (see i 153–61); with Marie Antoinette she identifies as a ‘mother, petrified with grief’ (ii 152):

Ah, who knows,
From sad experience, more than I, to feel
For thy desponding spirit, as it sinks
Beneath procrastinated fears for those
More dear to thee than life!

(ii 169–73)

Smith’s mastery of the strict form of the sonnet stood her in good stead when it came to blank verse: she avoids monotony by constant variation of tone and rhythm, run-on lines, and stretching the rules of syntax to the limit (see, for instance, i 169–95). Her frequent use of personification should not blind us to her passion, most notably in the culminating account of her sufferings, making this autobiographical poem a worthy precursor to The Prelude.

One reason why Wordsworth was reluctant to publish The Prelude was that autobiography was even in his day a largely undiscovered genre liable to cause bemusement, if not hostility, among readers. That’s one factor that makes The Emigrants such a forward-looking work; the other is its author’s evident radicalism. For reviewers in such conservative journals as the British Critic, these were compelling obstacles to a sympathetic reading.

As philanthropists, we feel compassion at the sad allusion to sorrows, which the writer, in her own person, tells us she has suffered: but as critics, we cannot approve of the egotism which occupies too large a portion of her present work. In sonnets, and elegy, the poet is allowed to pour forth his complaints, and may appear as the principal person: in a poem like The Emigrants, the writer should have brought forward a greater number of other characters, and have been herself more concealed.

To genius we pay the most unbounded tribute of admiration and respect, when it is employed on subjects that become a good and great mind: but when fine talents descend to propagate popular cant against order, tending to excite discontent; or when they become the instruments by which ‘to stab at once the morals of a land’ (Cowper) ... by treating with petulant and unseasonable scoffs the institutions of religion, we lament that the gifted powers of imagination should be so grossly perverted.... The virtuous and pious, no less than ingenious Cowper, is everywhere the advocate of the Christian religion and its sacred ordinances: and it is an indecency ill-becoming Mrs Smith to sneer at usages manifestly tending to public utility and general piety.¹⁰

The reviewer could not have known it, but Smith had some cause for resenting some of the practices of Catholic clerics in France: while resident there during the 1780s, one of her children had been forcibly taken away in deep snow for baptism. The point, though, is that the reviewer had difficulty accepting Smith’s ‘egotistical’ perspective; this criticism was reiterated by the Critical Review:

We will not say that we are entirely disappointed: there is in this poem good scenery and well-discriminated groups of figures, but there is too much of mere reflection, verging towards humble prose, and the pathos is weakened by the author’s adverting too often to perplexities in her own situation.... Herself, and not the French emigrant, fills the foreground; begins and ends the piece; and the pity we should naturally feel for those overwhelming and uncommon distresses she describes, is lessened by their being brought into parallel with the inconveniences of a narrow income or a protracted law-suit.¹¹

Smith would have found little cheer in the European Magazine which commended the poem as a whole but criticized it on the grounds that ‘some of the expressions are very hazardées’.¹² A page was then taken up with enumerating some of the usages and constructions that offended the reviewer – her use of ‘innumeros’ for ‘innumerable’ (line 5), for instance, and the elision of the particle in ‘cause thy creatures [to] cease’ (line 422).

Despite literary success, Smith faced constant pressure to provide for her large family (which included nine people by 1794), and produced books at a breathtaking rate: The Old Manor House (1793), D’Arcy (1793), The Banished Man (1794), Rural Walks (1795), Montalbert (1795), Rambles Farther (1796), Marchmont (1796), The Young Philosopher (1798), What is she? (1799), Letters of a Solitary Wanderer (1799), History of England (1806) and The Natural History of Birds (1807). Such a pace of work took a calamitous toll. Rheumatism was a severe problem by 1794, when she was induced to visit Bath in the hope that the waters might help. By 1804 she was suffering from pleurisy and an accelerated heartbeat that woke her in the night, leaving her unable to breathe. Shortly after, she contracted the uterine cancer that was to kill her late in 1806.

She was buried at St John’s Church, Stoke, near Guildford, close to her family home, leaving behind a mass of manuscripts, many of which were promptly burnt. Of the few that survived, most seemed to have provided copy for Beachy Head, and Other Poems (1807). Beachy Head is an extraordinary, heroic work, all of which is included here (pp. 126–46). It is an attempt to preserve the life and times of the region in a manner similar to White’s Natural History of Selborne (1789). The fact that she did not live to complete it cannot detract from what Stuart Curran calls its ‘multitudinous, uncanny particularity’¹³ – the sharp and sensitive detail with which she describes the natural world. That ‘particularity’ extends beyond a close knowledge of local flora and fauna to include an intense and pervasive awareness of the history of southeast England from prehistoric times onwards, local traditions and folklore, and notable inhabitants. Its achievement resides in its unpredictability and inventiveness, the product of many years’ labour, her imagination as vigorous as ever. It is also her testament.

Reviewers used its posthumous appearance as an opportunity to pay tribute to its author. The Universal Magazine found in it ‘the quaint moralizing of Cowper, and the plaintive tenderness of Gray’,¹⁴ while the Literary Panorama commended her close observation of the natural world: ‘the notes which accompany these poems are proofs of her general attention and accuracy.’¹⁵ Even the British Critic, so snuffy about The Emigrants, thought Beachy Head ‘distinguished by great vigour and, by what was the characteristic of the author’s mind, a sweet and impressive tenderness of melancholy’.¹⁶ The Monthly Review most accurately summarized the critical consensus:

The same tenderness and sensibility, the same strain of moral reflection, and the same enthusiastic love of nature, pervade all her effusions. It appears also as if the wounded feelings of Charlotte Smith had found relief and consolation, during her latter years, in an accurate observation not only of the beautiful effect produced by the endless diversity of natural objects that daily solicit our regard, but also in a careful study of their scientific arrangement, and their more minute variations.¹⁷

Elegiac Sonnets: The Third Edition. With Twenty Additional Sonnets (1786)

*To William Hayley, Esq.*¹

Sir,

While I ask your protection for these essays, I cannot deny having myself some esteem for them. Yet permit me to say that did I not trust to your candour and sensibility, and hope they will plead for the errors your judgement must discover, I should never have availed myself of the liberty I have obtained – that of dedicating these simple effusions to the greatest modern master of that charming talent, in which I can never be more than a distant copyist.

I am,

Sir,

Your most obedient and obliged servant,
Charlotte Smith

Elegiac Sonnets

¹William Hayley (1745–1820), poet, biographer, translator, friend of Blake, Anna Seward, Cowper and others. To date his most successful poem, at least in commercial terms, was The Triumphs of Temper, to which Smith alludes in Sonnet XIX, below. Hayley and Smith were neighbours in Sussex, and Hayley was instrumental in helping her publish the Elegiac Sonnets in 1784. On reading the first of the sonnets, he was inspired to write his own ‘Sonnet to Mrs Smith’:

Thou whose chaste song simplicity inspires,
Attractive poetess of plaintive strain!
Speak not unjustly of poetic fires,
Nor the pure bounty of thy Muse arraign:
No, not the source, the soother she of pain.
If thy soft breast the thorns of anguish knew,
Ah! think what myriads with thy truth complain
Of fortune’s thorny paths! and think how few
Of all those myriads know thy magic art,
The fiercer pangs of sorrow to subdue,
By those melodious tears that ease thy heart,
And bid the breath of fame thy life renew;
Sure to excite, till nature’s self decays,
Her lasting sympathy, her endless praise!

Preface to the First Edition

The little poems which are here called sonnets have, I believe, no very just claim to that title, but they consist of fourteen lines, and appear to me no improper vehicle for a single sentiment. I am told, and I read it as the opinion of very good judges, that the legitimate sonnet is ill-calculated for our language. The specimens Mr Hayley has given, though they form a strong exception, prove no more than that the difficulties of the attempt vanish before uncommon powers.

Some very melancholy moments have been beguiled by expressing in verse the sensations those moments brought. Some of my friends, with partial indiscretion, have multiplied the copies they procured of several of these attempts, till they found their way into the prints of the day in a mutilated state, which, concurring with other circumstances, determined me to put them into their present form. I can hope for readers only among the few who, to sensibility of heart, join simplicity of taste.

Preface to the Third Edition

The reception given by the public, as well as my particular friends, to the two first editions of these small poems, has induced me to add to the present such other sonnets as I have written since, or have recovered from my acquaintance, to whom I had given them without thinking well enough of them at the time to preserve any copies myself. A few of those last written I have attempted on the Italian model, with what success I know not, but I am persuaded that to the generality of readers those which are less regular will be more pleasing.

As a few notes were necessary, I have added them at the end. I have there quoted such lines as I have borrowed, and, even where I am conscious the ideas were not my own, I have restored them to their original possessors.

Woolbeding,² 22 March 1786

Elegiac Sonnets

² Woolbeding village in the South Downs in West Sussex; Smith resided at Woolbeding House from early 1785. The house still stands and is owned by the National Trust, though only the gardens are open to the public at the time of writing.

Sonnet I

The partial¹ muse has, from my earliest hours,
Smiled on the rugged path I'm doomed to tread,
And still with sportive hand has snatched wildflowers
To weave fantastic garlands for my head; 5
But far, far happier is the lot of those
Who never learned her dear delusive art,
Which, while it decks the head with many a rose,
Reserves the thorn to fester in the heart.²
For still she bids soft Pity's melting eye
Stream o'er the ills she knows not to remove, 10
Points every pang, and deepens every sigh
Of mourning Friendship or unhappy Love.
Ah then, how dear the muse's favours cost
*If those paint sorrow best who feel it most!*³

² Philomel was seduced, according to Ovid, by her brother-in-law, Tereus, King of Thrace. She was turned into a nightingale, and her sad song was said to be caused by a thorn in her breast.

³ In a note Smith acknowledges an echo of Pope, Eloisa to Abelard 365–6: 'The well sung woes shall soothe my pensive ghost; / He best can paint them who shall feel them most.' The italics are Smith's.

Sonnet II. Written at the Close of Spring

The garlands fade that spring so lately wove –
Each simple flower, which she had nursed in dew;
Anemonies¹ that spangled every grove,
The primrose wan, and harebell, mildly blue.
No more shall violets linger in the dell, 5

Or purple orchis variegate the plain,
Till spring again shall call forth every bell,
And dress with humid hands her wreaths again.
Ah, poor humanity! So frail, so fair
Are the fond visions of thy early day, 10
Till tyrant Passion and corrosive Care
Bid all thy fairy colours fade away!
Another May new buds and flowers shall bring;
Ah, why has happiness no second spring?

Sonnet II

¹ ‘Anemone nemorosa: the wood-anemone’ (Smith’s note).

*Sonnet III. To a Nightingale*¹

Poor melancholy bird, that all night long
Tell’st to the moon thy tale of tender woe;
From what sad cause can such sweet sorrow flow,
And whence this mournful melody of song?
Thy poet’s musing fancy would translate 5
What mean the sounds that swell thy little breast,
When still at dewy eve thou leav’st thy nest,
Thus to the listening night to sing thy fate.
Pale Sorrow’s victims wert thou once among,
Though now released in woodlands wild to rove; 10
Say, hast thou felt from friends some cruel wrong,
Or diedst thou – martyr of disastrous love?
Ah, songstress sad, that such my lot might be:
To sigh and sing at liberty, like thee!

Sonnet III

¹ ‘The idea from the 43rd sonnet of Petrarch. Seconda parte: Quel rosignioul, che si soave piagne’ (Smith’s note).

Sonnet IV. To the Moon

Queen of the silver bow,¹ by thy pale beam,
Alone and pensive, I delight to stray
And watch thy shadow trembling in the stream,
Or mark the floating clouds that cross thy way.
And while I gaze, thy mild and placid light 5
Sheds a soft calm upon my troubled breast;
And oft I think, fair planet of the night,
That in thy orb the wretched may have rest.
The sufferers of the earth perhaps may go,
Released by death, to thy benignant sphere, 10
And the sad children of Despair and Woe
Forget in thee their cup of sorrow here.
Oh, that I soon may reach thy world serene,
Poor wearied pilgrim, in this toiling scene!

Sonnet IV

Sonnet V. To the South Downs

Ah, hills beloved! – where once, an happy child,
Your beechen shades, ‘your turf, your flowers among’,¹
I wove your bluebells into garlands wild,
And woke your echoes with my artless song.
Ah, hills beloved! your turf, your flowers remain; 5
But can they peace to this sad breast restore,
For one poor moment soothe the sense of pain,
And teach a breaking heart to throb no more?

And you, Aruna,² in the vale below,
As to the sea your limpid waves you bear, 10
Can you one kind Lethean³ cup bestow
To drink a long oblivion to my care?
Ah no! When all, e'en Hope's last ray, is gone,
There's no oblivion but in death alone!

Sonnet V

¹ Smith notes a borrowing from Gray's Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College 8: 'Whose turf, whose shades, whose flowers among'.

² 'The River Arun' (Smith's note).

³ Lethean water from the River Lethe, river of forgetfulness in Hades, which enabled souls to forget their previous existence.

Sonnet VI. To Hope

Oh Hope, thou soother sweet of human woes!
How shall I lure thee to my haunts forlorn?
For me wilt thou renew the withered rose,
And clear my painful path of pointed thorn?
Ah, come, sweet nymph, in smiles and softness dressed, 5
Like the young hours¹ that lead the tender year;
Enchantress come, and charm my cares to rest!
Alas, the flatterer flies, and will not hear;
A prey to fear, anxiety, and pain,
Must I a sad existence still deplore? 10
Lo! the flowers fade, but all the thorns remain,
'For me the vernal garland blooms no more'.²
Come then, 'pale Misery's love',³ be thou my cure,
And I will bless thee, who though slow art sure.

Sonnet VI

¹ the young hours The Horae were three daughters of Jupiter representing spring, summer and winter.

² For me the vernal garland blooms no more Smith notes the borrowing from Pope, Imitation of the first Ode of the fourth Book of Horace 32.

³ pale Misery's love This is, Smith notes, a borrowing from Shakespeare, King John III iv 35.

Sonnet VII. On the Departure of the Nightingale

Sweet poet of the woods, a long adieu!

Farewell, soft minstrel of the early year!

Ah, 'twill be long ere thou shalt sing anew

And pour thy music on the 'night's dull ear'.¹

Whether on spring thy wandering flights await,² 5

Or whether silent in our groves you dwell,

The pensive muse shall own thee for her mate,³

And still protect the song she loves so well.

With cautious step, the love-lorn youth shall glide

Through the lone brake⁴ that shades thy mossy nest; 10

And shepherd girls from eyes profane shall hide

The gentle bird, who sings of pity best.

For still thy voice shall soft affections move,

And still be dear to sorrow and to love!

Sonnet VII

² 'Alludes to the supposed migration of the nightingale' (Smith's note).

³ The pensive muse...mate Smith notes the allusion to Milton, Sonnet I 13–14: ‘Whether the muse or love call thee his mate,/Both them I serve, and of their train am I.’

⁴ brake clump of bushes, thicket (rather than bracken).

Sonnet VIII. To Spring

Again the wood, and long withdrawing vale,
In many a tint of tender green are dressed,
Where the young leaves unfolding scarce conceal
Beneath their early shade the half-formed nest
Of finch or woodlark; and the primrose pale 5
And lavish cowslip, wildly scattered round,
Give their sweet spirits to the sighing gale.
Ah, season of delight, could aught be found
To soothe awhile the tortured bosom’s pain,
Of sorrow’s rankling shaft to cure the wound 10
And bring life’s first delusions once again,
’Twere surely met in thee! Thy prospect fair,
Thy sounds of harmony, thy balmy air,
Have power to cure all sadness but despair.¹

Sonnet VIII

¹ all sadness but despair an allusion, as Smith notes, to Paradise Lost iv 155–6: ‘Vernal delight and joy, able to drive/All sadness but despair’.

Sonnet IX

Blessed is yon shepherd on the turf reclined,
Who on the varied clouds which float above
Lies idly gazing, while his vacant mind
Pours out some tale antique of rural love!
Ah, he has never felt the pangs that move 5

Th' indignant spirit when, with selfish pride,
Friends on whose faith the trusting heart relied
Unkindly shun th' imploring eye of woe;
The ills they ought to soothe with taunts deride,
And laugh at tears themselves have forced to flow! 10
Nor his rude bosom those fine feelings melt,
Children of Sentiment and Knowledge born,
Through whom each shaft with cruel force is felt,
Empoisoned by deceit, or barbed with scorn.

*Sonnet X. To Mrs G.*¹

Ah, why will Mem'ry with officious care
The long lost visions of my days renew?
Why paint the vernal landscape green and fair
When life's gay dawn was opening to my view?
Ah, wherefore bring those moments of delight, 5
When with my Anna,² on the southern shore,
I thought the future, as the present, bright?
Ye dear delusions, ye return no more!
Alas, how different does the truth appear
From the warm picture youth's rash hand portrays! 10
How fades the scene, as we approach it near,
And pain and sorrow strike how many ways!
Yet of that tender heart, ah, still retain
A share for me, and I will not complain!

Sonnet X

¹ Mrs G. has not been identified, but was presumably a childhood friend.

² Anna probably a reference to Catherine Anne Dorset, Smith's sister, who wrote children's stories of animals in human dress.

Sonnet XI. To Sleep

Come, balmy sleep, tired nature's soft resort,
On these sad temples all thy poppies shed,
And bid gay dreams from Morpheus'¹ airy court
Float in light vision round my aching head!²
Secure of all thy blessings, partial power, 5
On his hard bed the peasant throws him down;
And the poor sea-boy, in the rudest hour,
Enjoys thee more than he who wears a crown.³
Clasped in her faithful shepherd's guardian arms,
Well may the village girl sweet slumbers prove; 10
And they, oh gentle sleep, still taste thy charms
Who wake to labour, liberty, and love.
But still thy opiate aid dost thou deny
To calm the anxious breast, to close the streaming eye.

Sonnet XI

¹ Morpheus was the Greek god of sleep.

² In later editions of Elegiac Sonnets, Smith noted the borrowing from William Mason, Elegy V. On the Death of a Lady 12: 'Float in light vision round the poet's head'.

³ As she notes, Smith is recalling 2 Henry IV III i 18–20:

Wilt thou upon the high and giddy mast
Seal up the shipboy's eyes, and rock his brains
In cradle of the rude impetuous surge?

*Sonnet XII. Written on the Seashore. October 1784*¹

On some rude fragment of the rocky shore,
Where on the fractured cliff the billows break,
Musing, my solitary seat I take,
And listen to the deep and solemn roar.

O'er the dark waves the winds tempestuous howl; 5
The screaming seabird quits the troubled sea,
But the wild gloomy scene has charms for me,²
And suits the mournful temper of my soul.³

Already shipwrecked by the storms of fate,
Like the poor mariner methinks I stand, 10
Cast on a rock; who sees the distant land
From whence no succour comes – or comes too late;
Faint and more faint are heard his feeble cries,
Till in the rising tide th' exhausted sufferer dies.

Sonnet XII

¹ When she composed this, Smith was resident at Bignor Park, West Sussex, about four miles south of Petworth, close to the south coast of England. The house is still to be seen and may be visited.

² For echoes by Smith and Wordsworth see Emigrants i 157 and n. 21 below.

³ 'This line is not my own, but I know not where to look for it' (Smith's note). In later editions of the volume Smith replaced this with the annotation, 'Young'. As Curran notes, her source is in fact Edward Young's The Revenge (1721):

Rage on, ye winds, burst clouds, and waters roar!
You bear a just resemblance of my fortune,
And suit the gloomy habit of my soul.

(I i 5–7)

*Sonnet XIII. From Petrarch*¹

Oh place me where the burning noon
 Forbids the withered flower to blow;
Or place me in the frigid zone
 On mountains of eternal snow;
Let me pursue the steps of fame, 5
 Or poverty's more tranquil road;
Let youth's warm tide my veins inflame,
 Or sixty winters chill my blood:
Though my fond soul to heaven were flown,
 Or though on earth 'tis doomed to pine, 10
Prisoner or free, obscure or known,
 My heart, oh Laura, still is thine.
Whate'er my destiny may be,
That faithful heart still burns for thee!

Sonnet XIII

*Sonnet XIV. From Petrarch*¹

Loose to the wind her golden tresses streamed,
 Forming bright waves with amorous Zephyr's sighs;²
And though averted now, her charming eyes
Then with warm love and melting pity beamed.
Was I deceived? Ah surely, nymph divine, 5
 That fine suffusion on thy cheek was love!
What wonder then those lovely tints should move,
Should fire this heart, this tender heart of mine?
Thy soft melodious voice, thy air, thy shape,
 Were of a goddess, not a mortal maid; 10
Yet though thy charms, thy heavenly charms should fade,

My heart, my tender heart could not escape,
Nor cure for me in time or change be found:
The shaft extracted does not cure the wound.

Sonnet XIV

¹ ‘Erano i capelli all ‘aura sparsi. Sonnetto 69. Parte prima’ (Smith’s note).

² amorous Zephyr’s sighs Zephyr, the west wind of myth, married Flora, goddess of flowers and gardens, who lived an eternal spring.

*Sonnet XV. From Petrarch*¹

Where the green leaves exclude the summer beam,
And softly bend as balmy breezes blow,
And where, with liquid lapse, the lucid stream
Across the fretted rock is heard to flow,
Pensive I lay; when she whom earth conceals, 5
As if still living, to my eyes appears,
And pitying Heaven her angel form reveals,
To say, ‘Unhappy Petrarch, dry your tears!
Ah why, sad lover, thus before your time,
In grief and sadness should your life decay, 10
And like a blighted flower, your manly prime
In vain and hopeless sorrow fade away?
Ah, wherefore should you mourn, that her you love,
Snatched from a world of woe, survives in bliss above!’

Sonnet XV

*Sonnet XVI. From Petrarch*¹

Ye vales and woods, fair scenes of happier hours!
Ye feathered people,² tenants of the grove!
And you, bright stream, befringed with shrubs and flowers,
Behold my grief, ye witnesses of love!
For ye beheld my infant passion rise, 5
And saw through years unchanged my faithful flame;
Now cold in dust, the beauteous object lies,
And you, ye conscious scenes, are still the same!
While busy Memory still delights to dwell
On all the charms these bitter tears deplore, 10
And with a trembling hand describes too well
The angel form I shall behold no more,
To heaven she's fled, and nought to me remains
But the pale ashes which her urn contains.

Sonnet XVI

(Smith's note).

² Ye feathered people i.e. birds.

*Sonnet XVII. From the Thirteenth Cantata of Metastasio*¹

On thy grey bark, in witness of my flame,
I carve Miranda's cipher, beauteous tree;
Graced with the lovely letters of her name,
Henceforth be sacred to my love and me!
Though the tall elm, the oak, and sombre pine, 5
With broader arms may noon's fierce ardours break,

To shelter me and her I love, be thine;
And thine to see her smile and hear her speak.

No bird, ill-omened, round thy graceful head
Shall clamour harsh, or wave his heavy wing, 10
But fern and flowers arise beneath thy shade,
Where the wild bees their lullabies shall sing;
And in thy boughs the murmuring ring-dove rest,
And there the nightingale shall build her nest.

Sonnet XVII

¹ ‘Scrivo in te l’amato nome/Di colei, per cui, mi moro. I do not mean this as a translation; the original is much longer, and full of images which could not be introduced in a sonnet – and some of them, though very beautiful in the Italian, would I believe not appear to advantage in an English dress’ (Smith’s note).

*Sonnet XVIII. To the Earl of Egremont*¹

Wyndham, ’tis not thy blood, though pure it runs
Through a long line of glorious ancestry,
Percys and Seymours, Britain’s boasted sons,
Who trust the honours of their race to thee;
’Tis not thy splendid domes, where Science loves 5
To touch the canvas, and the bust to raise;
Thy rich domains, fair fields, and spreading groves –
’Tis not all these the muse delights to praise.
In birth and wealth and honours, great thou art,
But nobler in thy independent mind; 10
And in that liberal hand and feeling heart
Given thee by Heaven – a blessing to mankind!
Unworthy oft may titled fortune be;
A soul like thine is true nobility!

Sonnet XVIII

¹ Sir George O'Brien Wyndham, third Earl of Egremont (1751–1837), Sussex philanthropist, liberal and patron of the arts. Smith was introduced to him by William Hayley. In politics he was a Whig. His home, Petworth House, was a nursery of art and a college of agriculture. In later years he was a patron of Turner and Haydon (for whom see p. 858).

Sonnet XIX. To Mr Hayley. On Receiving some Elegant Lines from Him¹

For me the muse a simple band designed
Of 'idle'² flowers that bloom the woods among,
Which, with the cypress and the willow joined,
A garland formed as artless as my song;
And little dared I hope its transient hours 5
So long would last, composed of buds so brief,
Till Hayley's hand, among the vagrant flowers,
Threw from his verdant crown a deathless leaf.
For high in fame's bright fane has judgement placed
The laurel wreath Serena's poet³ won, 10
Which, wov'n with myrtles by the hands of Taste,
The muse decreed for this her favourite son.
And those immortal leaves his temples shade,
Whose fair eternal verdure shall not fade!

Sonnet XIX

¹ The 'elegant lines' may have been the sonnet which Hayley was inspired to write on reading the first of the elegiac sonnets, quoted p. 87 n. 1.

² idle The quotation marks are puzzling; possibly Smith is thinking of the sermon on the mount, Luke 12: 27.

³ Serena's poet Serena is the protagonist of William Hayley's The Triumphs of Temper (1781).

Sonnet XX. To the Countess of Abergavenny.
Written on the Anniversary of her Marriage¹

On this blessed day may no dark cloud or shower
With envious shade the sun's bright influence hide;
But all his rays illumine the favoured hour
That saw thee, Mary, Henry's lovely bride!

With years revolving may it still arise, 5
Blessed with each good approving Heaven can lend;
And still with ray serene, shall those blue eyes
Enchant the husband, and attach the friend.

For you, fair friendship's amaranth² shall blow,³
And love's own thornless roses bind your brow; 10
And when, long hence, to happier worlds you go,
Your beauteous race shall be what you are now;
And future Nevills through long ages shine,
With hearts as good, and forms as fair as thine.

Sonnet XX

¹ Mary, Lady Abergavenny (1760–96) married Henry Nevill, Earl of Abergavenny (1755–1843) on 3 October 1781. She was the daughter of Smith's brother-in-law.

² amaranth a mythical unfading flower.

³ blow bloom.

Sonnet XXI. Supposed to be Written by Werther¹

Go, cruel tyrant of the human breast,
To other hearts thy burning arrows bear!
Go where fond hope and fair illusion rest –
Ah, why should Love inhabit with Despair?
Like the poor maniac² I linger here, 5
Still haunt the scene where all my treasure lies,
Still seek for flowers where only thorns appear,
And drink delicious poison from her eyes.³
Towards the deep gulf that opens on my sight
I hurry forward, Passion's helpless slave, 10
And, scorning Reason's mild and sober light,
Pursue the path that leads me to the grave:
So round the flame the giddy insect flies,
And courts the fatal fire by which it dies.

Sonnet XXI

² 'See the story of the lunatic: "Is this the destiny of man? Is he only happy before he possesses his reason, or after he has lost it? Full of hope you go to gather flowers in winter, and are grieved not to find any – and do not know why they cannot be found." Sorrows of Werther, Volume 2' (Smith's note).

³ In later editions Smith added a footnote acknowledging a borrowing from Pope, Eloisa to Abelard:

Still on thy breast enamoured let me lie,
Still drink delicious poison from thy eye,
Pant on thy lip, and to thy heart be pressed.
(ll. 121–3)

Sonnet XXII. By the Same. To Solitude*¹

Oh Solitude, to thy sequestered vale
I come to hide my sorrow and my tears,
And to thy echoes tell the mournful tale
Which scarce I trust to pitying friendship's ears.
Amidst thy wild woods and untrodden glades, 5
No sounds but those of melancholy move;
And the low winds that die among thy shades
Seem like soft Pity's sighs for hopeless love.
And sure some story of despair and pain
In yon deep copse thy murm'ring doves relate; 10
And hark, methinks in that long plaintive strain,
Thine own sweet songstress² weeps my wayward fate;
Ah, nymph, that fate assist me to endure,
And bear awhile what death alone can cure!

Sonnet XXII

¹ ‘ “I climb steep rocks, I break my way through copses, among thorns and briars, which tear me to pieces, and I feel a little relief.” Sorrows of Werther, Volume 1’ (Smith’s note).

² songstress the nightingale.

Sonnet XXIII. By the Same. To the North Star*¹

Towards thy bright beams I turn my swimming eyes,
Fair, fav’rite planet,² which in happier days
Saw my young hopes (ah, faithless hopes!) arise,

And on my passion shed propitious rays;
Now nightly wandering mid the tempests drear 5
That howl the woods and rocky steeps among,
I love to see thy sudden light appear
Through the swift clouds driv'n by the wind along;
Or in the turbid³ water, rude and dark,
O'er whose wild stream the gust of winter raves, 10
Thy trembling light with pleasure still I mark,
Gleam in faint radiance on the foaming waves:
So o'er my soul short rays of reason fly,
Then fade – and leave me to despair and die!

Sonnet XXIII

¹ ‘ “The greater bear, favourite of all the constellations; for when I left you of an evening it used to shine opposite your window.” Sorrows of Werther, Volume 2’ (Smith’s note).

² Fair, fav’rite planet The planet Venus, the evening star, is the brightest in the sky.

³ turbid cloudy, opaque.

Sonnet XXIV. By the Same

Make there my tomb, beneath the lime-tree’s shade,¹
Where grass and flowers in wild luxuriance wave;
Let no memorial mark where I am laid,
Or point to common eyes the lover’s grave!
But oft at twilight morn, or closing day, 5
The faithful friend with falt’ring step shall glide,
Tributes of fond regret by stealth to pay,
And sigh o’er the unhappy suicide.
And sometimes, when the sun with parting rays
Gilds the long grass that hides my silent bed, 10

The tear shall tremble in my Charlotte's eyes;²
Dear, precious drops – they shall embalm the dead.
Yes! Charlotte o'er the mournful spot shall weep,
Where her poor Werther and his sorrows sleep.

Sonnet XXIV

¹ ‘ “At the corner of the churchyard which looks towards the fields, there are two lime-trees. It is there I wish to rest.” Sorrows of Werther, Volume 2’ (Smith’s note).

² Werther was hopelessly in love with Charlotte.

*Sonnet XXV. By the Same. Just before his Death*¹

Why should I wish to hold in this low sphere
‘A frail and feverish being?’² Wherefore try
Poorly, from day to day, to linger here,
Against the powerful hand of Destiny?
By those who know the force of hopeless care 5
On the worn heart, I sure shall be forgiven;
If to elude dark guilt, and dire despair,
I go uncalled to mercy and to heaven!
Oh thou, to save whose peace I now depart,
Will thy soft mind thy poor lost friend deplore, 10
When worms shall feed on this devoted heart,
Where even thy image shall be found no more?
Yet may thy pity mingle not with pain,
For then thy hapless lover dies in vain.

Sonnet XXV

¹ ‘ “May my death remove every obstacle to your happiness. Be at peace, I entreat you; be at peace.” Sorrows of Werther, Volume 2’

(Smith's note).

2 A frail and feverish being from Milton, Comus 8.

Sonnet XXVI. To the River Arun

On thy wild banks, by frequent torrents worn,
No glittering fanes or marble domes appear,
Yet shall the mournful muse thy course adorn,
And still to her thy rustic waves be dear.
For with the infant Otway,¹ lingering here, 5
Of early woes she bade her votary² dream,
While thy low murmurs soothed his pensive ear,
And still the poet consecrates the stream.
Beneath the oak and birch that fringe thy side,
The first-born violets of the year shall spring, 10
And in thy hazels, bending o'er the tide,
The earliest nightingale delight to sing,
While kindred spirits, pitying, shall relate
Thy Otway's sorrows, and lament his fate!

Sonnet XXVI

1 'Otway was born at Trotten, a village in Sussex. Of Woolbeding, another village on the banks of the Arun (which runs through them both), his father was rector. Here it was, therefore, that he probably passed many of his early years. The Arun is here an inconsiderable stream, winding in a channel deeply worn, among meadow, heath and wood' (Smith's note). Smith moved to Woolbeding House in her native Sussex in 1785, where this sonnet was composed. Thomas Otway (1652–85), dramatist, was known chiefly for his tragedy, Venice Preserved (1681).

2 votary ardent follower (of the 'mournful muse').

Sonnet XXVII

Sighing I see yon little troop at play,
By Sorrow yet untouched, unhurt by Care,
While free and sportive they enjoy today
‘Content and careless of tomorrow’s fare!’¹
Oh happy age, when hope’s unclouded ray 5
Lights their green path, and prompts their simple mirth,
Ere yet they feel the thorns that lurking lay
To wound the wretched pilgrims of the earth,
Making them rue the hour that gave them birth,
And threw them on a world so full of pain 10
Where prosperous folly treads on patient worth,
And to deaf Pride, Misfortune pleads in vain!
Ah, for their future fate, how many fears
Oppress my heart – and fill mine eyes with tears!

Sonnet XXVII

¹ ‘Thomson’ (Smith’s note). This line is borrowed from Thomson’s Autumn 191, where it refers to ‘the gay birds that sung them to repose’.

Sonnet XXVIII. To Friendship

Oh thou, whose name too often is profaned,
Whose charms celestial few have hearts to feel!
Unknown to Folly and by Pride disdained,
To thy soft solace may my sorrows steal!
Like the fair moon, thy mild and genuine ray 5
Through life’s long evening shall unclouded last;
While the frail summer friendship fleets away
As fades the rainbow from the northern blast.
’Tis thine, oh nymph, with ‘balmy hands to bind’¹
The wounds inflicted in misfortune’s storm, 10
And blunt severe Affliction’s sharpest dart;

'Tis thy pure spirit warms my Anna's mind,
Beams through the pensive softness of her form,
And holds its altar on her spotless heart.

Sonnet XXVIII

¹ balmy hands to bind 'Collins' (Smith's note). Collins's Ode to Pity begins: 'Oh thou, the friend to man assigned,/With balmy hands his wounds to bind'.

*Sonnet XXIX. To Miss C———. On being Desired to Attempt Writing a Comedy*¹

Wouldst thou then have me tempt the comic scene
Of laughing Thalia² – used so long to tread
The gloomy paths of sorrow's cypress shade,
And the lorn lay with sighs and tears to stain?
Alas, how much unfit her sprightly vein! 5
Arduous to try and seek the sunny mead,
And bowers of roses, where she loves to lead
The sportive subjects of her golden reign!
Enough for me if still, to soothe my days,
Her fair and pensive sister³ condescend 10
With tearful smile to bless my simple lays;
Enough if her soft notes she sometimes lend,
To gain for me, of feeling hearts, the praise,
And chiefly thine, my ever partial friend!

Sonnet XXIX

² Thalia muse of comedy.

³ sister Erato, muse of lyric poetry.

Sonnet XXX. To the River Arun

Be the proud Thames of trade the busy mart!
Arun, to thee will other praise belong;
Dear to the lover's and the mourner's heart,
And ever sacred to the sons of song!

Thy shadowy rocks unhappy love shall seek, 5
Where mantling loose, the green clematis¹ flaunts,
And sorrow's drooping form and faded cheek
Choose on thy willowed shore her lonely haunts.

Banks which inspired thy Otway's plaintive strain!
Wilds whose lorn echoes learned the deeper tone 10
Of Collins' powerful shell!² Yet once again
Another poet, Hayley, is thine own!
Thy classic stream anew shall hear a lay
Bright as its waves and various as its way!

Sonnet XXX.

¹ 'Clematis: the plant bindwith, or virgin's bower, which towards the end of June begins to cover the hedges and sides of rocky hollows with its beautiful foliage, and flowers of a yellowish white and of an agreeable fragrance, which are succeeded by seed-pods, that bear some resemblance to feathers or hair, whence it is sometimes called Old Man's Beard' (Smith's note).

² 'Collins, as well as Otway, was a native of this country, and I should imagine at some period of his life an inhabitant of this neighbourhood, since, in his beautiful Ode on the Death of Colonel Ross, he says:

The muse shall still, with social aid,
Her gentlest promise keep,
E'en humble Harting's cottaged vale
Shall learn the sad repeated tale
And bid her shepherds weep.
And in the Ode to Pity:
Wild Arun too has heard thy strains,
And Echo, midst my native plains,
Been soothed with Pity's lute.' (Smith's note)

Sonnet XXXI. Written on Farm Wood, South
Downs, in May 1784¹

Spring's dewy hand on this fair summit weaves
The downy grass with tufts of Alpine flowers,²
And shades the beechen slopes with tender leaves,
And leads the shepherd to his upland bowers,
Strewn with wild thyme; while slow-descending showers 5
Feed the green ear,³ and nurse the future sheaves.
Ah, blessed the hind⁴ whom no sad thought bereaves
Of the gay season's pleasures! All his hours
To wholesome labour given, or thoughtless mirth;
No pangs of sorrow past or coming dread 10
Bend his unconscious spirit down to earth,
Or chase calm slumbers from his careless head.
Ah, what to me can those dear days restore,
When scenes could charm that now I taste no more!

Sonnet XXXI

¹ At this period Smith was sharing her husband's incarceration at the King's Bench Prison for debt. As her imprisonment was voluntary, she was able to visit her nine children who remained at Bignor Park. This sonnet must have been written on one such visit.

² ‘An infinite variety of plants are found on these hills, particularly about this spot. Many sorts of orchis and cistus of singular beauty, with several others with which I am but imperfectly acquainted’ (Smith’s note).

³ green ear of corn, which in due course will ripen into sheaves.

⁴ hind peasant.

Sonnet XXXII. To Melancholy. Written on the Banks of the Arun, October 1785

When latest autumn spreads her evening veil,
 And the grey mists from these dim waves arise,
 I love to listen to the hollow sighs
Through the half-leafless wood that breathes the gale.
For at such hours the shadowy phantom, pale, 5
 Oft seems to fleet before the poet’s eyes;
 Strange sounds are heard, and mournful melodies,
As of night-wanderers who their woes bewail;
Here, by his native stream, at such an hour,
 Pity’s own Otway I methinks could meet, 10
 And hear his deep sighs swell the saddened wind.
Oh melancholy, such thy magic power,
 That to the soul these dreams are often sweet,
 And soothe the pensive visionary mind!

Sonnet XXXIII. To the Naiad of the Arun

Go, rural naiad, wind thy stream along
 Through woods and wilds, then seek the ocean caves
Where sea-nymphs meet their coral rocks among,
 To boast the various honours of their waves!
’Tis but a little, o’er thy shallow tide, 5

That toiling trade her burdened vessel leads;
But laurels grow luxuriant on thy side,
And letters live along thy classic meads.
Lo, where mid British bards¹ thy natives shine!
And now another poet helps to raise 10
Thy glory high – the poet of *The Mine*² –
Whose brilliant talents are his smallest praise:
And who, to all that genius can impart,
Adds the cool head and the unblemished heart!

Sonnet XXXIII

¹ British bards ‘Otway, Collins, Hayley’ (Smith’s note).

² the poet of The Mine John Sargent, author of The Mine (1785), was MP for Seaford, and a mutual friend of Smith and Hayley.

Sonnet XXXIV. To a Friend

Charmed by thy suffrage¹ shall I yet aspire
(All inauspicious as my fate appears,
By troubles darkened, that increase with years)
To guide the crayon, or to touch the lyre?
Ah me! the sister muses still require 5
A spirit free from all intrusive fears,
Nor will they deign to wipe away the tears
Of vain regret that dim their sacred fire.
But when thy sanction crowns my simple lays,
A ray of pleasure lights my languid mind, 10
For well I know the value of thy praise;
And to how few the flattering meed² confined,
That thou, their highly favoured brows to bind,
Wilt weave green myrtle and unfading bays!

Sonnet XXXIV

² meed reward, tribute.

Sonnet XXXV. To Fortitude

Nymph of the rock, whose dauntless spirit braves
The beating storm, and bitter winds that howl
Round thy cold breast; and hear'st the bursting waves
And the deep thunder with unshaken soul;
Oh come and show how vain the cares that press 5
On my weak bosom, and how little worth
Is the false fleeting meteor, Happiness,
That still misleads the wanderers of the earth!¹
Strengthened by thee, this heart shall cease to melt
O'er ills that poor humanity must bear; 10
Nor friends estranged, or ties dissolved be felt
To leave regret, and fruitless anguish there.
And when at length it heaves its latest sigh,
Thou and mild hope shall teach me how to die!

Sonnet XXXV

Sonnet XXXVI

Should the lone wanderer, fainting on his way,
Rest for a moment of the sultry hours,
And though his path through thorns and roughness lay,
Pluck the wild rose, or woodbine's gadding¹ flowers;
Weaving gay wreaths beneath some sheltering tree, 5

The sense of sorrow he awhile may lose;
So have I sought thy flowers, fair Poesy,
So charmed my way with friendship and the muse!
But darker now grows life's unhappy day,
Dark with new clouds of evil yet to come, 10
Her pencil sickening Fancy throws away,
And weary Hope reclines upon the tomb;
And points my wishes to that tranquil shore
Where the pale spectre Care pursues no more.

Sonnet XXXVI

¹ gadding straggling. Smith may be recalling William Mason, The English Garden (1772):

There smiles in varied tufts the velvet rose,

There flaunts the gadding woodbine ...

The Emigrants: A Poem in Two Books(1793)

*Dedication: To William Cowper, Esq.*¹

Dear Sir,

There is, I hope, some propriety in my addressing a composition to you, which would never perhaps have existed had I not, amid the heavy pressure of many sorrows, derived infinite consolation from your poetry, and some degree of animation and of confidence from your esteem.²

The following performance is far from aspiring to be considered as an imitation of your inimitable poem, The Task; I am perfectly sensible that it belongs not to a feeble and feminine hand to draw the bow of Ulysses.³

The force, clearness, and sublimity of your admirable poem; the felicity, almost peculiar to your genius, of giving to the most familiar objects dignity and effect, I could never hope to reach – yet, having read The Task almost incessantly from its first publication⁴ to the present time, I felt that kind of enchantment described by Milton when he says

The angel ended, and in Adam's ear
So charming left his voice, that he awhile
Thought him still speaking.

(Paradise Lost viii 1–3)

And from the force of this impression, I was gradually led to attempt, in blank verse, a delineation of those interesting objects which happened to excite my attention, and which even pressed upon an heart that has learned, perhaps from its own sufferings, to feel with acute though unavailing compassion the calamity of others.

A dedication usually consists of praises and of apologies; my praise can add nothing to the unanimous and loud applause of your country. She regards you with pride as one of the few who, at the present period, rescue her from the imputation of having degenerated in poetical talents; but in the form of apology I should have much to say, if I again dared to plead the pressure of evils, aggravated by their long continuance, as an excuse for the defects of this attempt.

Whatever may be the faults of its execution, let me vindicate myself from those that may be imputed to the design. In speaking of the emigrant clergy,⁵ I beg to be understood as feeling the utmost respect for the integrity of their principles, and it is with pleasure I add my suffrage to that of those who have had a similar opportunity of witnessing the conduct of the emigrants of all descriptions during their exile in England – which has been such as does honour to their nation, and ought to secure to them in ours the esteem of every liberal mind.⁶

Your philanthropy, dear sir, will induce you, I am persuaded, to join with me in hoping that this painful exile may finally lead to the extirpation of that reciprocal hatred so unworthy of great and enlightened nations; that it may tend to humanize both countries, by convincing each that good qualities exist in the other; and at length annihilate the prejudices that have so long existed to the injury of both.

Yet it is unfortunately but too true that with the body of the English, this national aversion has acquired new force by the dreadful scenes which have been acted in France during the last summer⁷ – even those who are the victims of the Revolution have not escaped the odium which the undistinguishing multitude annex to all the natives of a country where such horrors have been acted. Nor is this the worst effect those events have had on the minds of the English: by confounding the original cause with the wretched catastrophes that have followed its ill management, the attempts of public virtue with the outrages that guilt and folly have committed in its disguise – the very name of liberty has not only lost the charm it used to have in British ears, but many who have written or spoken in its defence have been stigmatized as promoters of anarchy, and enemies to the prosperity of their country.⁸ Perhaps even the author of The Task, with all his goodness and tenderness of heart, is in the catalogue of those who are reckoned to have been too warm in a cause which it was once the glory of Englishmen to avow and defend. The exquisite poem, indeed, in which you have honoured liberty by a tribute highly gratifying to her sincerest friends, was published some years before the demolition of regal despotism in France – which, in the fifth Book, it seems to foretell.⁹ All the truth and energy of the passage to which I allude must have been strongly felt when, in the Parliament of England, the greatest orator of our time quoted the sublimest of our poets – when the eloquence of Fox¹⁰ did justice to the genius of Cowper.

I am, dear sir,
With the most perfect esteem,
Your obliged and obedient servant,
CHARLOTTE SMITH

Brighthelmstone,¹¹ 10 May 1793

The Emigrants

1 By the time Smith dedicated The Emigrants to Cowper, he was a famous author for The Task, which was one of the bestselling poems of its time. Having finished an early version of her poem in April 1793, she sent it to Cowper, who suggested some alterations to it. From what she says here, it would appear that he also assured her that it should be published.

2 your esteem Cowper praised Smith's abilities when introduced to her by William Hayley in early August 1792.

3 the bow of Ulysses Ulysses acquired, when young, a bow which he never used, valuing it so highly that he left it at home. The contest to draw its string and win the hand of Penelope forms the culmination of the homecoming which ends the Odyssey.

4 The Task was first published in 1785; like The Emigrants, it is written in blank verse.

5 the emigrant clergy On 26 May 1792 the French government decided that priests who refused to join the Constitutional Church were traitors and should be deported. With the end of the monarchy on 10 August that decree became effective, precipitating the exile of many clergymen to England. The presence of three bishops and 220 priests among the victims of the September massacres underlined the dangers to the clergy at that moment.

6 Smith was courageous in writing about the plight of French émigrés. The outbreak of war between England and France (declared in February 1793) led most people to regard French people of any description as 'the enemy'.

7 the dreadful scenes...last summer The storming of the Tuileries (10 August 1792) was followed by the imprisonment of the King and his family, and the September massacres of royalist and other prisoners in Paris (2–7 September).

8 many who have written...their country Pitt's government had embarked on a campaign to repress radical activity following the outbreak of war with France in February 1793. The most obvious evidence of this was the treason trials of 1794 (see pp. 322–3).

9 Task Book V includes a passage in praise of liberty (ll. 446ff.), and one contrasting the monarchy in England and France (to the detriment of the latter) (ll. 331–62).

10 the eloquence of Fox Charles James Fox, Whig leader in the House of Commons.

11 Brighthelmstone Smith moved to Brighton in summer 1789, where she would be based for the next three and a half years.

Book I

Scene: on the cliffs to the eastward of the town of Brighthelmstone in Sussex

Time: a morning in November 1792

Slow in the wintry morn, the struggling light
Throws a faint gleam upon the troubled waves;
Their foaming tops, as they approach the shore,
And the broad surf that, never ceasing, breaks 5
On the innumerable¹ pebbles, catch the beams
Of the pale sun, that with reluctance gives
To this cold northern isle its shortened day.
Alas, how few the morning wakes to joy!
How many murmur at oblivious night
For leaving them so soon; for bearing thus 10
Their fancied bliss (the only bliss they taste!)
On her black wings away; changing the dreams
That soothed their sorrows; for calamities
(And every day brings its own sad proportion);
For doubts, diseases, abject dread of death, 15

And faithless friends, and fame and fortune lost,
Fancied or real wants, and wounded pride
That views the daystar but to curse his beams.
Yet He whose Spirit into being called
This wondrous world of waters; He who bids 20
The wild wind lift them till they dash the clouds,
And speaks to them in thunder; or whose breath,
Low murmuring o'er the gently heaving tides,
When the fair moon, in summer night serene,
Irradiates with long trembling lines of light 25
Their undulating surface; that great Power,
Who, governing the planets, also knows
If but a sea-mew falls,² whose nest is hid
In these incumbent cliffs; He surely means
To us, his reasoning creatures, whom He bids 30
Acknowledge and revere his awful hand,
Nothing but good. Yet man, misguided man,
Mars the fair work that he was bid enjoy,
And makes himself the evil he deplores.
How often, when my weary soul recoils 35
From proud oppression, and from legal crimes
(For such are in this land, where the vain boast
Of equal law is mockery, while the cost
Of seeking for redress is sure to plunge
Th' already injured to more certain ruin, 40
And the wretch starves before his counsel³ pleads) –
How often do I half abjure society
And sigh for some lone cottage, deep embowered
In the green woods that these steep chalky hills
Guard from the strong south-west;⁴ where round their base 45
The beech wide flourishes, and the light ash
With slender leaf half hides the thymy turf!
There do I wish to hide me, well content
If on the short grass, strewn with fairy flowers,

I might repose thus sheltered;⁵ or, when eve 50
In orient crimson lingers in the west,
Gain the high mound, and mark these waves remote
(Lucid though distant), blushing with the rays
Of the far-flaming orb that sinks beneath them.
For I have thought that I should then behold 55
The beauteous works of God unspoiled by man
And less affected then by human woes
I witnessed not; might better learn to bear
Those that injustice and duplicity
And faithlessness and folly fix on me: 60
For never yet could I derive relief,
When my swoln heart was bursting with its sorrows,
From the sad thought that others like myself
Live but to swell affliction's countless tribes!
Tranquil seclusion I have vainly sought; 65
Peace, who delights in solitary shade,
No more will spread for me her downy wings,
But, like the fabled Danaïds or the wretch
Who ceaseless up the steep acclivity
Was doomed to heave the still rebounding rock,⁶ 70
Onward I labour – as the baffled wave
Which yon rough beach repulses, that returns
With the next breath of wind, to fail again.
Ah, mourner, cease these wailings! Cease and learn
That not the cot sequestered where the briar 75
And woodbine wild embrace the mossy thatch
(Scarce seen amid the forest gloom obscure),
Or more substantial farm, well-fenced and warm,
Where the full barn and cattle foddered round
Speak rustic plenty; nor the statelier dome 80
By dark firs shaded, or the aspiring pine
Close by the village church (with care concealed
By verdant foliage, lest the poor man's grave
Should mar the smiling prospect of his lord);

Where offices well-ranged, or dovecote stocked, 85
Declare manorial residence – not these
Or any of the buildings new and trim,
With windows circling towards the restless sea,
Which, ranged in rows,⁷ now terminate my walk,
Can shut out for an hour the spectre care 90
That, from the dawn of reason, follows still Unhappy mortals, till the friendly grave
(Our sole secure asylum) ‘ends the chase’.⁸
Behold, in witness of this mournful truth
A group approach me, whose dejected looks 95
(Sad heralds of distress!) proclaim them men
Banished for ever and for conscience sake
From their distracted country, whence the name
Of freedom misapplied, and much abused
By lawless anarchy, has driven them far 100
To wander – with the prejudice they learned
From bigotry (the tut’ress of the blind)
Through the wide world unsheltered; their sole hope
That German spoilers through that pleasant land
May carry wide the desolating scourge 105
Of war and vengeance.⁹ Yet unhappy men,
Whate’er your errors, I lament your fate;
And, as disconsolate and sad ye hang
Upon the barrier of the rock, and seem
To murmur your despondence, waiting long 110
Some fortunate reverse that never comes,
Methinks in each expressive face I see
Discriminated anguish. There droops¹⁰ one
Who in a moping cloister long consumed
This life inactive, to obtain a better,¹¹ 115
And thought that meagre abstinence, to wake
From his hard pallet with the midnight bell,
To live on eleemosynary bread,¹²

And to renounce God's works, would please that God.
And now the poor pale wretch receives, amazed, 120
The pity strangers give to his distress
(Because these strangers are, by his dark creed, Condemned as heretics), and with sick heart
Regrets his pious prison and his beads.¹³
Another, of more haughty port,¹⁴ declines 125
The aid he needs not, while in mute despair
His high indignant thoughts go back to France,
Dwelling on all he lost – the Gothic¹⁵ dome
That vied with splendid palaces,¹⁶ the beds
Of silk and down, the silver chalices, 130
Vestments with gold enwrought for blazing altars,
Where, amid clouds of incense, he held forth
To kneeling crowds the imaginary bones
Of saints supposed, in pearl and gold enchased,¹⁷
And still with more than living monarchs' pomp 135
Surrounded; was believed by mumbling bigots
To hold the keys of heaven, and to admit
Whom he thought good to share it. Now, alas,
He to whose daring soul and high ambition
The world seemed circumscribed – who, wont to dream 140
Of Fleuri, Richelieu, Alberoni,¹⁸ men
Who trod on empire, and whose politics
Were not beyond the grasp of his vast mind –
Is, in a land once hostile, still profaned
By disbelief and rites unorthodox, 145
The object of compassion. At his side,
Lighter of heart than these, but heavier far¹⁹
Than he was wont, another victim comes –
An Abbé who with less contracted brow
Still smiles and flatters, and still talks of hope, 150
Which, sanguine as he is, he does not feel,

And so he cheats the sad and weighty pressure
Of evils present. Still, as men misled
By early prejudice (so hard to break),
I mourn your sorrows, for I too have known 155
Involuntary exile²⁰ and, while yet
England had charms for me,²¹ have felt how sad
It is to look across the dim cold sea
That melancholy rolls its refluent²² tides
Between us and the dear regretted land 160
We call our own – as now ye pensive wait
On this bleak morning, gazing on the waves
That seem to leave your shore, from whence the wind
Is loaded to your ears with the deep groans
Of martyred saints and suffering royalty,²³ 165
While to your eyes the avenging power of Heaven
Appears in awful anger to prepare
The storm of vengeance, fraught with plagues and death.
Even he of milder heart, who was indeed
The simple shepherd in a rustic scene, 170
And mid the vine-clad hills of Languedoc
Taught to the barefoot peasant, whose hard hands
Produced the nectar he could seldom taste,²⁴
Submission to the Lord for whom he toiled –
He, or his brethren, who to Neustria's sons²⁵ 175
Enforced religious patience, when, at times,
On their indignant hearts Power's iron hand
Too strongly struck, eliciting some sparks
Of the bold spirit of their native north –
Even these parochial priests, these humbled men 180
Whose lowly undistinguished cottages
Witnessed a life of purest piety,
While the meek tenants were, perhaps, unknown
Each to the haughty lord of his domain,
Who marked them not (the noble scorning still 185

The poor and pious priest, as with slow pace
He glided through the dim-arched avenue
Which to the castle led, hoping to cheer
The last sad hour of some laborious life
That hastened to its close) – even such a man 190
Becomes an exile, staying not to try
By temperate zeal to check his madd'ning flock,
Who at the novel sound of liberty
(Ah, most intoxicating sound to slaves!)
Start into licence. Lo! dejected now, 195
The wandering pastor mourns, with bleeding heart,
His erring people, weeps and prays for them,
And trembles for the account that he must give
To Heaven for souls entrusted to his care.
Where the cliff, hollowed by the wintry storm, 200
Affords a seat with matted seaweed strewn,
A softer form reclines; around her run,
On the rough shingles or the chalky bourn,²⁶
Her gay unconscious children, soon amused,
Who pick the fretted stone or glossy shell 205
Or crimson plant marine, or they contrive
The fairy vessel with its ribband sail
And gilded paper pennant; in the pool
Left by the salt wave on the yielding sands,
They launch the mimic navy. Happy age, 210
Unmindful of the miseries of man!
Alas, too long a victim to distress,
Their mother, lost in melancholy thought,
Lulled for a moment by the murmurs low
Of sullen billows, wearied by the task 215
Of having here, with swoln and aching eyes,
Fixed on the grey horizon, since the dawn
Solicitously watched the weekly sail
From her dear native land – now yields awhile
To kind forgetfulness, while fancy brings, 220

In waking dreams, that native land again!
Versailles appears, its painted galleries
And rooms of regal splendour, rich with gold,
Where, by long mirrors multiplied,²⁷ the crowd
Paid willing homage – and, united there, 225
Beauty gave charms to empire. Ah! too soon
From the gay visionary pageant roused,
See the sad mourner start, and, drooping, look
With tearful eyes and heaving bosom round
On drear reality, where dark'ning waves, 230
Urged by the rising wind, unheeded foam
Near her cold rugged seat. To call her thence
A fellow-sufferer comes: dejection deep
Checks, but conceals not quite, the martial air
And that high consciousness of noble blood 235
Which he has learned from infancy to think
Exalts him o'er the race of common men.
Nursed in the velvet lap of luxury
And fed by adulation, could he learn
That worth alone is true nobility, 240
And that the peasant who, 'amid the sons
Of Reason, Valour, Liberty, and Virtue,
Displays distinguished merit, is a noble
Of Nature's own creation'?²⁸ If even here,
If in this land of highly-vaunted freedom 245
Even Britons controvert the unwelcome truth,
Can it be relished by the sons of France –
Men who derive their boasted ancestry
From the fierce leaders of religious wars,
The first in chivalry's emblazoned page, 250
Who reckon Gueslin, Bayard or De Foix²⁹
Among their brave progenitors? Their eyes,
Accustomed to regard the splendid trophies
Of heraldry (that with fantastic hand
Mingles, like images in feverish dreams, 255

‘Gorgons and hydras and chimeras dire’³⁰
With painted puns, and visionary shapes),
See not the simple dignity of virtue,
But hold all base, whom honours such as these
Exalt not from the crowd³¹ – as one who long 260
Has dwelt amid the artificial scenes
Of populous city³² deems that splendid shows,
The theatre, and pageant pomp of courts,
Are only worth regard; forgets all taste
For nature’s genuine beauty; in the lapse 265
Of gushing waters hears no soothing sound,
Nor listens with delight to sighing winds
That on their fragrant pinions waft the notes
Of birds rejoicing in the tangled copse;
Nor gazes pleased on ocean’s silver breast, 270
While lightly o’er it sail the summer clouds
Reflected in the wave that, hardly heard,
Flows on the yellow sands: so to his mind
That long has lived where Despotism hides
His features harsh, beneath the diadem³³ 275
Of worldly grandeur, abject slavery seems,
If by that power imposed, slavery no more.
For luxury wreathes with silk the iron bonds,
And hides the ugly rivets with her flowers,
Till the degenerate triflers, while they love 280
The glitter of the chains, forget their weight.
But more, the men whose ill-acquired wealth³⁴
Was wrung from plundered myriads by the means
Too often legalised by power abused,
Feel all the horrors of the fatal change, 285
When their ephemeral greatness, marred at once
(As a vain toy that Fortune’s childish hand Equally joyed to fashion or to crush),
Leaves them exposed to universal scorn

For having nothing else, not even the claim 290
To honour, which respect for heroes past
Allows to ancient titles – men like these
Sink even beneath the level whence base arts
Alone had raised them, unlamented sink,
And know that they deserve the woes they feel. 295

Poor wand'ring wretches,³⁵ whosoe'er ye are
That hopeless, houseless, friendless, travel wide
O'er these bleak russet downs, where, dimly seen,
The solitary shepherd shiv'ring tends
His dun discoloured flock (shepherd unlike 300
Him whom in song the poet's fancy crowns
With garlands, and his crook with vi'lets binds) –
Poor vagrant wretches! Outcasts of the world
Whom no abode receives, no parish owns,
Roving, like nature's commoners, the land 305
That boasts such general plenty – if the sight
Of wide-extended misery softens yours
Awhile, suspend your murmurs, here behold
The strange vicissitudes of fate, while thus
The exiled nobles from their country driven, 310
Whose richest luxuries were theirs, must feel
More poignant anguish than the lowest poor,
Who, born to indigence, have learned to brave
Rigid Adversity's depressing breath!
Ah, rather Fortune's worthless favourites 315
Who feed on England's vitals – pensioners
Of base corruption, who, in quick ascent
To opulence unmerited, become
Giddy with pride, and as ye rise, forgetting
The dust ye lately left, with scorn look down 320
On those beneath ye (though your equals once
In fortune, and in worth superior still,
They view the eminence on which ye stand
With wonder, not with envy, for they know

The means by which ye reached it, have been such 325
As in all honest eyes degrade ye far
Beneath the poor dependent, whose sad heart
Reluctant pleads for what your pride denies) –
Ye venal, worthless hirelings of a court!
Ye pampered parasites whom Britons pay 330
For forging fetters for them! – rather here
Study a lesson that concerns ye much,
And, trembling, learn that if oppressed too long
The raging multitude, to madness stung,
Will turn on their oppressors and no more 335
By sounding titles and parading forms
Bound like tame victims, will redress themselves!
Then swept away by the resistless torrent
Not only all your pomp may disappear,
But in the tempest lost, fair Order sink 340
Her decent head, and lawless Anarchy
O’erturn celestial Freedom’s radiant throne –
As now in Gallia, where Confusion, born
Of party rage and selfish love of rule,
Sully the noblest cause that ever warmed 345
The heart of patriot virtue.³⁶ There arise
The infernal passions: Vengeance, seeking blood,
And Avarice, and Envy’s harpy fangs
Pollute the immortal shrine of Liberty,
Dismay her votaries, and disgrace her name. 350
Respect is due to principle, and they
Who suffer for their conscience have a claim,
Whate’er that principle may be, to praise.
These ill-starred exiles then who bound by ties
To them the bonds of honour; who resigned 355
Their country to preserve them, and now seek
In England an asylum, well deserve
To find that (every prejudice forgot
Which pride and ignorance teaches) we for them

Feel as our brethren, and that English hearts 360
 Of just compassion ever own the sway
 As truly as our element, the deep,
 Obeys the mild dominion of the moon.
 This they have found, and may they find it still!
 Thus mayst thou, Britain, triumph! May thy foes, 365
 By Reason's gen'rous potency subdued,
 Learn that the God thou worshippest delights
 In acts of pure humanity! May thine
 Be still such bloodless laurels, nobler far
 Than those acquired at Cressy or Poitiers³⁷ – 370
 Or of more recent growth, those well bestowed
 On him³⁸ who stood on Calpe's blazing height
 Amid the thunder of a warring world,
 Illustrious rather from the crowds he saved
 From flood and fire, than from the ranks who fell 375
 Beneath his valour! Actions such as these,
 Like incense rising to the throne of Heaven,
 Far better justify the pride that swells
 In British bosoms, than the deafening roar
 Of victory from a thousand brazen throats, 380
 That tell with what success wide-wasting war
 Has by our brave compatriots thinned the world.

² If but a sea-mew falls a reference to Matthew 10:29: 'Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father.' The passage was popular among eighteenth-century writers, thanks perhaps to Pope's Essay on Man:

Who sees with equal eye, as God of all,

A hero perish, or a sparrow fall ...

(i 87–8)

3 counsel lawyer. Having paid her husband's legal fees, Smith was well placed to criticize the exorbitant sums charged by lawyers for their services.

4 the strong south-west wind.

5 I might repose thus sheltered a reworking of Virgil's topos: 'o qui me gelidis in vallibus Haemi / Sostat, et ingenti ramorum protegat umbra!' (Georgics ii 488–9).

6 Lines 68–70 refer to the fifty daughters of Danaus, King of Argos, who ordered them to kill their fifty husbands, whom he suspected of plotting against him. The daughters were punished by having eternally to draw water into leaking pots in Hades. Sisyphus was condemned in hell to roll uphill a huge stone which perpetually rolled down again.

7 ranged in rows recently built Georgian terraces, erected during Brighton's heyday as a social centre.

8 ends the chase 'I have a confused notion that this expression, with nearly the same application, is to be found in Young, but I cannot refer to it' (Smith's note). Smith is actually quoting Thomas Cooke, Simonides on Human Life Paraphrased (1742): 'Death ends the chase, and all the farce is o'er' (l. 32).

9 war and vengeance Many French emigrants had joined the Prussian army on the borders, which had been attempting to invade France since May 1792.

10 droops The diction is Miltonic; cf. Samson Agonistes 594: 'So much I feel my genial spirits droop.'

11 a better i.e. a better life.

12 eleemosynary bread alms.

13 ‘Lest the same attempts at misrepresentation should now be made, as have been made on former occasions, it is necessary to repeat that nothing is farther from my thoughts than to reflect invidiously on the emigrant clergy, whose steadiness of principle excites veneration, as much as their sufferings compassion. Adversity has now taught them the charity and humility they perhaps wanted when they made it a part of their faith that salvation could be obtained in no other religion than their own’ (Smith’s note).

14 port demeanour.

15 Gothic used here in the architectural sense, referring to a style common in Western Europe between the twelfth and sixteenth centuries.

16 ‘Let it not be considered as an insult to men in fallen fortune, if these luxuries (undoubtedly inconsistent with their profession) be here enumerated. France is not the only country where the splendour and indulgences of the higher, and the poverty and depression of the inferior clergy, have alike proved injurious to the cause of religion’ (Smith’s note).

17 enchased set.

18 Fleuri, Richelieu, Alberoni André-Hercule de Fleury (1653–1743), French cardinal and chief minister who controlled the government of Louis XV from 1726 to 1743; Armand-Jean du Plessis, cardinal and duke de Richelieu (1585–1642), chief minister to Louis XIII from 1624 to 1642; Giulio Alberoni (1664–1752), Italian cardinal and de facto premier of Spain, 1716 to 1719.

19 heavier far an echo of Michael’s consoling words to Adam and Eve, who are told that they shall ‘possess/A paradise within thee, happier far’ (Paradise Lost xii 586–7).

20 Involuntary exile Smith and her family were compelled to live near Dieppe, 1784–5, so as to elude her husband’s creditors.

21 had charms for me Smith echoes herself; cf. Sonnet XII. Written on the Sea Shore 7: ‘But the wild gloomy scene has charms for me’. In later years Wordsworth would echo Smith in his Lines Left upon a Seat in a Yew-Tree 21: ‘Stranger! these gloomy boughs / Had charms for him.’

22 refluent flowing back.

23 suffering royalty After the storming of the Tuileries by the Paris mob on 10 August 1792 the royal family sought refuge at the Legislative Assembly; they were imprisoned at the Temple on 12 August.

24 ‘See the finely descriptive verses written at Montauban in France in 1750 by Dr Joseph Warton, printed in Dodsley’s Miscellanies iv. 203’ (Smith’s note). Warton’s Verses written at Montauban in France, 1750 appeared in Robert Dodsley’s Collection of Poems vol. 4 (1755), pp. 207–8, and was reprinted in the London Magazine 24 (1755) 183–4. It laments that the French peasants pick grapes without being able to afford the wine they produce: ‘No cups nectareous shall their toils repay’ (l. 5).

25 Neustria’s sons inhabitants of Normandy.

26 bourne stream, brook. In Sussex, streams flow out of the chalky rock, harbouring unique communities of plants, insects and other wildlife.

27 by long mirrors multiplied The Palace of Versailles is famous for its lengthy chamber lined by mirrors.

28 ‘These lines are Thomson’s, and are among those sentiments which are now called (when used by living writers) not commonplace declamation but sentiments of dangerous tendency’ (Smith’s note). Smith quotes from Thomson, Coriolanus (1749), III iii.

29 Gueslin, Bayard or De Foix Bertrand du Guesclin (or du Gueselin) (c.1320–80), known as the Eagle of Brittany, was a Breton knight, military commander during the Hundred Years War, and Constable of France from 1370 until his demise; Pierre Terrail, seigneur de Bayard (1473–1524), sixteenth-century war hero known as le chevalier sans peur et sans reproche ('the knight without fear and without reproach'); Gaston de Foix, Duc de Nemours (1489–1512), known as the 'Thunderbolt of Italy', French commander known for his Italian campaign (1511–12) during the War of the League of Cambrai.

30 Gorgons and hydras and chimeras dire from Paradise Lost ii 628.

31 'It has been said, and with great appearance of truth, that the contempt in which the nobility of France held the common people was remembered, and with all that vindictive asperity which long endurance of oppression naturally excites, when, by a wonderful concurrence of circumstances, the people acquired the power of retaliation. Yet let me here add what seems to be in some degree inconsistent with the former charge – that the French are good masters to their servants, and that in their treatment of their negro slaves they are allowed to be more mild and merciful than other Europeans' (Smith's note).

32 populous city cf. Satan in Paradise Lost, 'As one who long in populous city pent' (ix 445).

33 diadem crown.

34 'The financiers and fermiers généraux are here intended. In the present moment of clamour against all those who have spoken or written in favour of the first Revolution of France, the declaimers seem to have forgotten that under the reign of a mild and easy-tempered monarch, in the most voluptuous court in the world, the abuses by which men of this description were enriched had arisen to such height that their prodigality exhausted the immense resources of France, and, unable to supply the exigencies of government, the ministry were compelled to call le tiers état – a meeting that gave birth to the Revolution which has since been so ruinously conducted' (Smith's note).

35 Poor wand'ring wretches Susan Wolfson points out the echo of King Lear III iv 28.

36 'This sentiment will probably renew against me the indignation of those who have an interest in asserting that no such virtue anywhere exists' (Smith's note).

37 Cressy or Poitiers important battles fought by Edward III in his attempt to conquer the French throne.

38 him George Augustus Eliott, first Baron Heathfield (1717–90), who maintained British rule of Gibraltar throughout a four-year siege, by sea and land, from the Spanish (1779–83). He was a local hero, as Heathfield was in East Sussex, and was buried at the church in the village. Gibraltar was originally a Phoenician trading-post called Calpe.

Book II

*Quippe ubi fas versum atque nefas: tot bella per orbem
Tam multae scelerum facies; non ullus aratro
Dignus honos: squalent abductis arva colonis,
Et curvae rigidum falces conflantur in ensem.
Hinc movet Euphrates, illinc Germania bellum;
Vicinae ruptis inter se legibus urbes
Arma ferunt: saevit toto Mars impius orbe.*

(Virgil, Georgics i 505–11)1

Scene: on an eminence on one of those downs, which afford to the south a view of the sea; to the north of the weald of Sussex

Time: an afternoon in April 17932

Long wintry months are past;3 the moon that now
Lights her pale crescent even at noon has made
Four times her revolution, since with step

Mournful and slow,⁴ along the wave-worn cliff,
Pensive I took my solitary way⁵ 5
Lost in despondence, while contemplating
Not my own wayward destiny alone
(Hard as it is, and difficult to bear!),
But in beholding the unhappy lot
Of the lorn exiles who amid the storms 10
Of wild disastrous anarchy are thrown,
Like shipwrecked sufferers, on England's coast,
To see, perhaps, no more their native land
Where Desolation riots.⁶ They, like me,
From fairer hopes and happier prospects driven, 15
Shrink from the future, and regret the past.
But on this upland scene, while April comes
With fragrant airs to fan my throbbing breast,
Fain would I snatch an interval from care
That weighs my wearied spirit down to earth, 20
Courting, once more, the influence of hope
(For 'Hope' still waits upon the flowery prime)⁷
As here I mark Spring's humid hand unfold
The early leaves that fear capricious winds,
While, even on sheltered banks, the timid flowers 25
Give, half-reluctantly, their warmer hues
To mingle with the primroses' pale stars.
No shade the leafless copses yet afford,
Nor hide the mossy labours of the thrush
That, startled, darts across the narrow path; 30
But quickly reassured, resumes his task,
Or adds his louder notes to those that rise
From yonder tufted brake, where the white buds
Of the first thorn are mingled with the leaves
Of that which blossoms on the brow of May.⁸ 35
Ah, 'twill not be! so many years have passed
Since, on my native hills, I learned to gaze

On these delightful landscapes, and those years
Have taught me so much sorrow that my soul
Feels not the joy reviving nature brings, 40
But, in dark retrospect, dejected dwells
On human follies, and on human woes.
What is the promise of the infant year,
The lively verdure, or the bursting blooms,
To those who shrink from horrors such as war 45
Spreads o'er the affrighted world? With swimming eye,
Back on the past they throw their mournful looks,
And see the temple which they fondly hoped
Reason would raise to Liberty, destroyed
By ruffian hands; while, on the ruined mass, 50
Flushed with hot blood, the fiend of discord sits
In savage triumph, mocking every plea
Of policy and justice, as she shows
The headless corse of one whose only crime
Was being born a monarch.⁹ Mercy turns 55
From spectacle so dire her swoln eyes,
And Liberty, with calm unruffled brow
Magnanimous, as conscious of her strength
In reason's panoply, scorns to distain¹⁰
Her righteous cause with carnage, and resigns 60
To fraud and anarchy the infuriate crowd.

What is the promise of the infant year
To those who (while the poor but peaceful hind
Pens, unmolested, the increasing flock
Of his rich master in this sea-fenced isle) 65
Survey, in neighbouring countries, scenes that make
The sick heart shudder, and the man who thinks
Blush for his species? There the trumpet's voice
Drowns the soft warbling of the woodland choir;
And violets, lurking in their turfy beds 70
Beneath the flow'ring thorn, are stained with blood.
There fall, at once, the spoiler and the spoiled,

While war, wide-ravaging, annihilates
The hope of cultivation, gives to fiends,
The meagre, ghastly fiends of Want and Woe, 75
The blasted land. There, taunting in the van¹¹
Of vengeance-breathing armies, Insult stalks,
And, in the ranks, 'Famine, and Sword, and Fire,
Crouch for employment.'¹² Lo! the suffering world,
Torn by the fearful conflict, shrinks amazed 80
From Freedom's name, usurped and misapplied,
And, cow'ring to the purple tyrant's rod,
Deems that the lesser ill. Deluded men!
Ere ye profane her ever-glorious name,
Or catalogue the thousands that have bled 85
Resisting her, or those who greatly died
Martyrs to liberty, revert awhile
To the black scroll that tells of regal crimes
Committed to destroy her; rather count
The hecatombs¹³ of victims who have fallen 90
Beneath a single despot, or who gave
Their wasted lives for some disputed claim
Between anointed robbers – monsters both!¹⁴
'Oh polished perturbation – golden care!'¹⁵ –
So strangely coveted by feeble man 95
To lift him o'er his fellows – toy for which Such showers of blood have drenched th' affrighted earth.
Unfortunate his lot, whose luckless head
Thy jewelled circlet, lined with thorns, has bound;
And who, by custom's laws, obtains from thee 100
Hereditary right to rule, unchecked,
Submissive myriads: for untempered power,
Like steel ill-formed, injures the hand
It promised to protect. Unhappy France!
If e'er thy lilies, trampled now in dust 105
And blood-bespotted, shall again revive

In silver splendour, may the wreath be wov'n
By voluntary hands,¹⁶ and freemen, such
As England's self might boast, unite to place
The guarded diadem¹⁷ on his fair brow, 110
Where Loyalty may join with Liberty
To fix it firmly. In the rugged school
Of stern adversity so early trained,
His future life, perchance, may emulate
That of the brave Bernois,¹⁸ so justly called 115
The darling of his people, who revered
The warrior less than they adored the man!
But ne'er may party rage, perverse and blind,
And base venality, prevail to raise
To public trust a wretch¹⁹ whose private vice 120
Makes even the wildest profligate recoil,
And who, with hireling ruffians leagued, has burst
The laws of nature and humanity,
Wading beneath the patriot's specious mask
And in equality's illusive name, 125
To empire through a stream of kindred blood!
Innocent prisoner, most unhappy heir
Of fatal greatness,²⁰ who art suffering now
For all the crimes and follies of thy race,
Better for thee, if o'er thy baby brow 130
The regal mischief never had been held –
Then, in an humble sphere, perhaps content,
Thou hadst been free and joyous on the heights
Of Pyrennean mountains shagged with woods
Of chestnut, pine and oak; as on these hills 135
Is yonder little thoughtless shepherd lad
Who, on the slope abrupt of downy turf
Reclined in playful indolence, sends off
The chalky ball, quick bounding far below,
While, half-forgetful of his simple task, 140

Hardly his length'ning shadow, or the bells'
Slow tinkling of his flock, that supping tend
To the brown fallows in the vale beneath,
Where nightly it is folded, from his sport
Recall the happy idler. While I gaze 145
On his gay vacant countenance, my thoughts
Compare with his obscure, laborious lot,
Thine, most unfortunate, imperial boy –
Who round thy sullen prison daily hear'st
The savage howl of Murder as it seeks 150
Thy unoffending life; while sad within
Thy wretched mother, 21 petrified with grief,
Views thee with stony eyes, and cannot weep!
Ah, much I mourn thy sorrows, hapless Queen,
And deem thy expiation made to Heaven 155
For every fault to which prosperity
Betrayed thee when it placed thee on a throne
Where boundless power was thine, and thou wert raised
High (as it seemed) above the envious reach
Of destiny! Whate'er thy errors were, 160
Be they no more remembered, though the rage
Of party swelled them to such crimes as bade
Compassion stifle every sigh that rose
For thy disastrous lot. More than enough
Thou hast endured, and every English heart, 165
Ev'n those that highest beat in Freedom's cause,
Disclaim as base, and of that cause unworthy,
The vengeance or the fear that makes thee still
A miserable prisoner! Ah, who knows,
From sad experience, more than I, to feel 1
For thy desponding spirit, as it sinks
Beneath procrastinated fears for those
More dear to thee than life! But eminence
Of misery is thine, as once of joy;
And as we view the strange vicissitude 175

We ask anew where happiness is found.
Alas, in rural life, where youthful dreams
See the Arcadia that romance describes,
Not even content resides! In yon low hut
Of clay and thatch, where rises the grey smoke 180
Of smould'ring turf cut from the adjoining moor,
The labourer, its inhabitant, who toils
From the first dawn of twilight till the sun
Sinks in the rosy waters of the west,
Finds that with poverty it cannot dwell – 185
For bread, and scanty bread, is all he earns
For him and for his household. Should disease
Born of chill wintry rains arrest his arm,²²
Then, through his patched and straw-stuffed casement,²³ peeps
The squalid figure of extremest Want, 190
And from the parish the reluctant dole,
Dealt by th' unfeeling farmer, hardly saves
The ling'ring spark of life from cold extinction;
Then the bright sun of spring, that smiling bids
All other animals rejoice, beholds, 195
Crept from his pallet, the emaciate wretch
Attempt with feeble effort to resume
Some heavy task above his wasted strength,
Turning his wistful looks (how much in vain!)
To the deserted mansion where no more 200
The owner (gone to gayer scenes) resides,
Who made even luxury virtue; while he gave
The scattered crumbs to honest Poverty.
But, though the landscape be too oft deformed
By figures such as these, yet peace is here, 205
And o'er our vallies, clothed with springing corn,
No hostile hoof shall trample, nor fierce flames
Wither the wood's young verdure, ere it form
Gradual the laughing May's luxuriant shade;
For by the rude sea guarded we are safe, 210

And feel not evils such as with deep sighs
The emigrants deplore, as they recall
The summer past, when nature seemed to lose
Her course in wild distemperature,²⁴ and aid,
With seasons all reversed, destructive war. 215
Shuddering, I view the pictures they have drawn
Of desolated countries where the ground,
Stripped of its unripe produce, was thick strewn
With various death – the warhorse falling there
By famine, and his rider by the sword. 220
The moping clouds sailed heavy charged with rain,
And bursting o'er the mountain's misty brow
Deluged, as with an inland sea, the vales;²⁵
Where through the sullen evening's lurid gloom,
Rising like columns of volcanic fire, 225
The flames of burning villages illumed
The waste of water; and the wind that howled
Along its troubled surface brought the groans
Of plundered peasants, and the frantic shrieks
Of mothers for their children; while the brave, 230
To pity still alive, listened aghast
To these dire echoes, hopeless to prevent
The evils they beheld, or check the rage
Which ever, as the people of one land
Meet in contention, fires the human heart 235
With savage thirst of kindred blood, and makes Man lose his nature, rendering him more fierce
Than the gaunt monsters of the howling waste.
Oft have I heard the melancholy tale
Which, all their native gaiety forgot, 240
These exiles tell – how hope impelled them on,
Reckless of tempest, hunger or the sword,
Till, ordered to retreat they knew not why
From all their flattering prospects, they became
The prey of dark suspicion and regret:²⁶ 245

Then in despondence sunk the unnerved²⁷ arm
Of gallant Loyalty. At every turn
Shame and Disgrace appeared, and seemed to mock
Their scattered squadrons – which the warlike youth,
Unable to endure, often implored, 250
As the last act of friendship, from the hand
Of some brave comrade, to receive the blow
That freed the indignant spirit from its pain.
To a wild mountain, whose bare summit hides
Its broken eminence in clouds, whose steep 255
Are dark with woods, where the receding rocks
Are worn by torrents of dissolving snow,
A wretched woman, pale and breathless, flies,
And gazing round her, listens to the sound
Of hostile footsteps. No, it dies away! 260
Nor noise remains but of the cataract,²⁸
Or surly breeze of night that mutters low
Among the thickets where she trembling seeks
A temporary shelter, clasping close
To her hard-heaving heart her sleeping child, 265
All she could rescue of the innocent group
That yesterday surrounded her. Escaped
Almost by miracle, fear, frantic fear,
Winged her weak feet! Yet half-repentant now
Her headlong haste, she wishes she had stayed 270
To die with those affrighted Fancy paints
The lawless soldier's victims. Hark, again
The driving tempest bears the cry of Death!
And with deep sudden thunder, the dread sound
Of cannon vibrates on the tremulous earth, 275
While, bursting in the air, the murderous bomb
Glares o'er her mansion. Where the splinters fall
Like scattered comets, its destructive path
Is marked by wreaths of flame! Then, overwhelmed
Beneath accumulated horror, sinks 280

The desolate mourner, yet in death itself,
True to maternal tenderness, she tries
To save the unconscious infant from the storm
In which she perishes, and to protect
This last dear object of her ruined hopes 285
From prowling monsters, that from other hills
More inaccessible, and wilder wastes,
Lured by the scent of slaughter, follow fierce
Contending hosts, and to polluted fields
Add dire increase of horrors. But, alas, 290
The mother and the infant perish both!

The feudal chief whose Gothic battlements
Frown on the plain beneath, returning home
From distant lands, alone and in disguise,
Gains at the fall of night his castle walls, 295
But at the vacant gate no porter sits
To wait his lord's admittance. In the courts
All is drear silence. Guessing but too well
The fatal truth, he shudders as he goes
Through the mute hall where, by the blunted light 300
That the dim moon through painted casements lends,
He sees that devastation has been there.
Then, while each hideous image to his mind
Rises terrific, o'er a bleeding corpse
Stumbling he falls; another interrupts 305
His staggering feet – all, all who used to rush
With joy to meet him, all his family
Lie murdered in his way! And the day dawns
On a wild raving maniac whom a fate
So sudden and calamitous has robbed 310
Of reason, and who round his vacant walls
Screams unregarded and reproaches Heaven!
Such are thy dreadful trophies, savage War,
And evils such as these, or yet more dire,
Which the pained mind recoils from – all are thine! 315
The purple pestilence that to the grave

Sends whom the sword has spared is thine, and thine
The widow's anguish and the orphan's tears!
Woes such as these does man inflict on man,
And by the closet murderers whom we style 320
Wise politicians are the schemes prepared
Which, to keep Europe's wavering balance even,
Depopulate her kingdoms, and consign
To tears and anguish half a bleeding world!

Oh could the time return when thoughts like these 325
Spoiled not that gay delight which vernal suns
Illuminating hills, and woods, and fields,
Gave to my infant spirits! Memory come,
And from distracting cares that now deprive
Such scenes of all their beauty, kindly bear 330
My fancy to those hours of simple joy,
When, on the banks of Arun, which I see
Make its irriguous²⁹ course through yonder meads,
I played, unconscious then of future ill!
There (where from hollows fringed with yellow broom, 335
The birch with silver rind, and fairy leaf,
Aslant the low stream trembles) I have stood
And meditated how to venture best
Into the shallow current, to procure
The willow-herb of glowing purple spikes, 340
Or flags³⁰ whose sword-like leaves concealed the tide,
Startling the timid reed-bird from her nest,
As with aquatic flowers I wove the wreath,
Such as, collected by the shepherd girls,
Deck in the villages the turfey shrine, 345
And mark the arrival of propitious May.
How little dreamed I then the time would come
When the bright sun of that delicious month
Should, from disturbed and artificial sleep,
Awaken me to never-ending toil, 350
To terror and to tears – attempting still

With feeble hands and cold desponding heart
To save my children from the o'erwhelming wrongs
That have for ten long years been heaped on me!³¹
The fearful spectres of chicanery and fraud 355
Have, Proteus-like, still changed their hideous forms
(As the law lent its plausible disguise),
Pursuing my faint steps, and I have seen
Friendship's sweet bonds (which were so early formed,
And once I fondly thought of amaranth³² 360
Inwove with silver seven times tried) give way
And fail, as these green fan-like leaves of fern
Will wither at the touch of autumn's frost.
Yet there are those whose patient pity still
Hears my long murmurs, who unwearied try 365
With lenient hands to bind up every wound
My wearied spirit feels, and bid me go
'Right onward'³³ – a calm votary of the nymph
Who from her adamant rock points out
To conscious rectitude the rugged path 370
That leads at length to peace! Ah yes, my friends,
Peace will at last be mine, for in the grave
Is peace – and pass a few short years, perchance
A few short months, and all the various pain
I now endure shall be forgotten there, 375
And no memorial shall remain of me
Save in your bosoms; while even your regret
Shall lose its poignancy, as ye reflect
What complicated woes that grave conceals!
But if the little praise that may await 380
The mother's efforts should provoke the spleen
Of priest or Levite,³⁴ and they then arraign
The dust that cannot hear them, be it yours
To vindicate my humble fame, to say
That not in selfish sufferings absorbed 385

‘I gave to misery all I had, my tears.’³⁵
And if, where regulated sanctity
Pours her long orisons to heaven, my voice
Was seldom heard, that yet my prayer was made
To him who hears even silence – not in domes 390
Of human architecture filled with crowds,
But on these hills, where boundless yet distinct,
Even as a map, beneath are spread the fields
His bounty clothes, divided here by woods
And there by commons rude³⁶ or winding brooks, 395
While I might breathe the air perfumed with flowers
Or the fresh odours of the mountain turf,
And gaze on clouds above me, as they sailed
Majestic, or remark the reddening north
When bickering arrows of electric fire 400
Flash on the evening sky;³⁷ I made my prayer
In unison with murmuring waves that now
Swell with dark tempests, now are mild and blue
As the bright arch above, for all to me
Declare omniscient goodness, nor need I 405
Declamatory essays to incite
My wonder or my praise, when every leaf
That spring unfolds, and every simple bud
More forcibly impresses on my heart
His power and wisdom. Ah, while I adore 410
That goodness, which designed to all that lives
Some taste of happiness, my soul is pained
By the variety of woes that man
For man creates, his blessings often turned
To plagues and curses: saint-like Piety, 415
Misled by Superstition, has destroyed
More than Ambition, and the sacred flame
Of Liberty becomes a raging fire
When Licence and Confusion bid it blaze.
From thy high throne above yon radiant stars, 420

Oh power omnipotent, with mercy view
 This suffering globe, and cause thy creatures cease,³⁸
 With savage fangs, to tear her bleeding breast;
 Restrain that rage for power that bids a man,
 Himself a worm, desire unbounded rule 425
 O'er beings like himself; teach the hard hearts
 Of rulers that the poorest hind who dies
 For their unrighteous quarrels in thy sight
 Is equal to the imperious lord that leads
 His disciplined destroyers to the field. 430
 May lovely Freedom in her genuine charms,
 Aided by stern but equal Justice, drive
 From the ensanguined earth the hell-born fiends
 Of Pride, Oppression, Avarice and Revenge
 That ruin what thy mercy made so fair! 435
 Then shall these ill-starred wanderers, whose sad fate
 These desultory lines lament, regain
 Their native country; private vengeance then
 To public virtue yield, and the fierce feuds
 That long have torn their desolated land 440
 May (even as storms that agitate the air
 Drive noxious vapours from the blighted earth)
 Serve, all tremendous as they are, to fix
 The reign of Reason, Liberty, and Peace!

Book II

¹ 'For here right and wrong are confounded: there are so many wars throughout the world: so many sorts of wickedness: the due honours are not paid to the plough: the husbandmen are carried away and the fields lie neglected, and the crooked sickles are beaten into cruel swords. Here Euphrates, and there Germany, makes war: the neighbouring cities break their leagues, and wage war with each other: impious Mars rages all over the globe' (John Martyn's translation, 1741).

2 After the execution of Louis XVI, 21 January 1793, violence in Paris intensified. War broke out between Britain and France in February.

3 Long wintry months are past Wordsworth may have been echoing this line when he began Tintern Abbey: ‘Five years have passed.’

4 step/Mournful and slow

With how sad steps, ô Moone, thou climb’st the skies,

How silently, and with how wan a face ...

(Sidney, Astrophil and Stella, sonnet 31, 1–2)

5 my solitary way A recollection of the closing lines of Paradise Lost, in which Adam and Eve ‘with wandering steps and slow, / Through Eden took their solitary way’.

6 Where Desolation riots Counter-revolutionary disturbances had been going on in France for a long time; the Vendée was particularly badly affected in March 1793.

7 ‘Shakespeare’ (Smith’s note). As Curran points out, the allusion is not to Shakespeare but Edmund Waller, To my young Lady Lucy Sidney 13: ‘Hope waits upon the flowery prime.’

8 Smith refers firstly to blackthorn, the buds of which appear before the leaves, and secondly to hawthorn (or may-tree), the leaves of which come first, in mid to late May.

9 a monarch a reference to Louis XVI, beheaded 21 January 1793.

10 distain stain, sully.

11 the van vanguard.

12 ‘Shakespeare’ (Smith’s note). Henry V, Prologue 7–8. Wordsworth has the same allusion in a similar passage of Descriptive Sketches, also published in 1793: ‘Like lightnings eager for th’ almighty word, / Look up for sign of havoc, Fire and Sword’ (ll. 802–3).

13 hecatombs mass graves.

14 ‘Such was the cause of quarrel between the Houses of York and Lancaster, and of too many others with which the page of history reproaches the reason of man’ (Smith’s note).

15 ‘Shakespeare’ (Smith’s note). From 2 Henry IV IV v 23.

16 If e’er thy lilies...voluntary hands If France ever again revives the monarchy, let it be voluntary.

17 diadem crown.

18 ‘Henry the Fourth of France. It may be said of this monarch that, had all the French sovereigns resembled him, despotism would have lost its horrors; yet he had considerable failings, and his greatest virtues may be chiefly imputed to his education in the school of adversity’ (Smith’s note).

19 wretch almost certainly Marat, editor of L’ami du peuple, an energetically pro-revolutionary paper; assassinated by Charlotte Corday, 13 July 1793.

20 Innocent prisoner...greatness the Dauphin, Louis XVII, then 7 years old, who is thought to have died in June 1795.

21 Thy wretched mother Marie Antoinette, with whom Louis XVII was imprisoned. At the time of writing she was still alive, only to be executed on 16 October 1793.

22 Should disease...his arm i.e. If he should be prevented from working by disease brought on by exposure to wintry rain.

23 his patched and straw-stuffed casement Gaps in the window-frame are patched and stuffed with straw to keep out draughts; the poor person ('extremest Want') looks through it.

24 distemperature extreme heat.

25 'From the heavy and incessant rains during the last campaign, the armies were often compelled to march for many miles through marshes overflowed, suffering the extremities of cold and fatigue. The peasants frequently misled them and, after having passed these inundations at the hazard of their lives, they were sometimes under the necessity of crossing them a second and a third time. Their evening quarters after such a day of exertion were often in a wood without shelter, and their repast, instead of bread, unripe corn, without any other preparation than being mashed into a sort of paste' (Smith's note).

26 'It is remarkable that, notwithstanding the excessive hardships to which the army of the emigrants was exposed, very few in it suffered from disease till they began to retreat; then it was that despondence consigned to the most miserable death many brave men who deserved a better fate, and then despair impelled some to suicide, while others fell by mutual wounds, unable to survive disappointment and humiliation' (Smith's note).

27 unnerved weakened.

28 cataract waterfall.

29 irriguous irrigating. Milton refers to 'the flowery lap / Of some irriguous valley' (Paradise Lost iv 254–5).

30 flags wild iris.

31 the o'erwhelming wrongs...on me! In thinking of herself as having suffered for a decade Smith is casting her mind back to her husband's imprisonment for debt in December 1783; see headnote, p. 83.

32 amaranth imaginary unfading plant.

33 'Milton, Sonnet 22d' (Smith's note); see To Mr Cyriack Skinner Upon his Blindness 8–9: 'but still bear up and steer / Right onward'.

34 Levite contemptuous term for a clergyman.

35 'Gray' (Smith's note); see Elegy 123.

36 commons rude coarse common land.

37 bickering arrows...sky the aurora borealis or northern lights.

38 cause thy creatures cease cause thy creatures [to] cease. Such syntactical liberties irritated some reviewers; see headnote p. 86.

Beachy Head

*From Beachy Head: with Other Poems (1807)*¹

On thy stupendous summit, rock sublime,
That o'er the channel reared, halfway at sea
The mariner at early morning hails,²
I would recline; while Fancy should go forth
And represent the strange and awful hour 5
Of vast concussion when the Omnipotent
Stretched forth his arm and rent the solid hills,³
Bidding the impetuous main flood rush between
The rifted shores, and from the continent
Eternally divided this green isle. 10

Imperial lord of the high southern coast,
From thy projecting headland I would mark
Far in the east the shades of night disperse,
Melting and thinned, as from the dark blue wave
Emerging, brilliant rays of arrowy light 15
Dart from the horizon, when the glorious sun
Just lifts above it his resplendent orb.
Advances now, with feathery silver touched,
The rippling tide of flood; glisten the sands,
While, inmates of the chalky clefts that scar 20
Thy sides precipitous, with shrill harsh cry,
Their white wings glancing in the level beam,
The terns, and gulls, and tarrocks,⁴ seek their food,
And thy rough hollows echo to the voice
Of the gray choughs⁵ and ever-restless daws, 25
With clamour not unlike the chiding hounds,
While the lone shepherd and his baying dog
Drive to thy turfy crest his bleating flock.
The high meridian⁶ of the day is past,
And ocean now, reflecting the calm heaven, 30
Is of cerulean hue, and murmurs low
The tide of ebb upon the level sands.
The sloop, her angular canvas shifting still,
Catches the light and variable airs
That but a little crisp the summer sea, 35
Dimpling its tranquil surface. Afar off,
And just emerging from the arch immense
Where seem to part the elements, a fleet
Of fishing vessels stretch their lesser sails,⁷
While more remote, and like a dubious spot 40
Just hanging in the horizon, laden deep,
The ship of commerce, richly freighted, makes
Her slower progress on her distant voyage,
Bound to the orient climates where the sun

Matures the spice within its odorous shell, 45
And, rivalling the grey worm's filmy toil,
Bursts from its pod the vegetable down,⁸
Which, in long turbaned wreaths,⁹ from torrid heat
Defends the brows of Asia's countless castes.
There the earth hides within her glowing breast 50
The beamy adamant¹⁰ and the round pearl
Enchased¹¹ in rugged covering, which the slave,
With perilous and breathless toil, tears off
From the rough sea-rock deep beneath the waves.
These are the toys of nature, and her sport 55
Of little estimate in Reason's eye;
And they who reason, with abhorrence see
Man, for such gauds¹² and baubles, violate
The sacred freedom of his fellow man –
Erroneous estimate! As heaven's pure air, 60
Fresh as it blows on this aërial height,
Or sound of seas upon the stony strand,
Or inland, the gay harmony of birds,
And winds that wander in the leafy woods,
Are to the unadulterate taste more worth 65
Than the elaborate harmony brought out
From fretted stop, or modulated airs
Of vocal science.¹³ So the brightest gems
Glancing resplendent on the regal crown,
Or trembling in the high-born beauty's ear, 70
Are poor and paltry to the lovely light
Of the fair star¹⁴ that, as the day declines
Attendant on her queen, the crescent moon
Bathes her bright tresses in the eastern wave.
For now the sun is verging to the sea, 75
And as he westward sinks, the floating clouds
Suspended move upon the evening gale,

And gathering round his orb, as if to shade
The insufferable brightness, they resign
Their gauzy whiteness and, more warmed, assume 80
All hues of purple. There transparent gold
Mingles with ruby tints and sapphire gleams
And colours such as nature through her works
Shows only in the ethereal canopy.¹⁵
Thither aspiring fancy fondly soars, 85
Wandering sublime through visionary vales
Where bright pavilions rise, and trophies fanned
By airs celestial, and adorned with wreaths
Of flowers that bloom amid Elysian bowers.
Now bright and brighter still the colours glow, 90
Till half the lustrous orb within the flood
Seems to retire, the flood reflecting still
Its splendour, and in mimic glory dressed;
Till the last ray, shot upward, fires the clouds
With blazing crimson, then in paler light 95
Long lines of tenderer radiance lingering yield
To partial darkness, and on the opposing side
The early moon distinctly rising throws
Her pearly brilliance on the trembling tide.
The fishermen who at set seasons pass 100
Many a league off at sea their toiling night
Now hail their comrades from their daily task
Returning, and make ready for their own
With the night-tide commencing. The night tide
Bears a dark vessel on, whose hull and sails 105
Mark her a coaster from the north. Her keel
Now ploughs the sand, and sidelong now she leans,
While with loud clamours her athletic crew
Unload her, and resounds the busy hum
Along the wave-worn rocks. Yet more remote, 110
Where the rough cliff hangs beetling¹⁶ o'er its base,
All breathes repose; the water's rippling sound

Scarce heard, but now and then the sea-snipe's cry¹⁷
Just tells that something living is abroad;
And sometimes crossing on the moon-bright line 115
Glimmers the skiff, faintly discerned awhile,
Then lost in shadow.

Contemplation here,
High on her throne of rock, aloof may sit
And bid recording Memory¹⁸ unfold
Her scroll voluminous, bid her retrace 120
The period when from Neustria's hostile shore¹⁹
The Norman launched his galleys, and the bay
O'er which that mass of ruin²⁰ frowns even now
In vain and sullen menace, then received
The new invaders – a proud martial race, 125
Of Scandinavia the undaunted sons
Whom Dogon, Fier-a-bras, and Humfroi led
To conquest, while Trinacria to their power
Yielded her wheaten garland, and when thou,
Parthenope, within thy fertile bay 130
Received the victors.²¹

In the mailed ranks
Of Normans landing on the British coast
Rode Taillefer, and with astounding voice
Thundered the war-song daring Roland sang
First in the fierce contention; vainly brave, 135
One not inglorious struggle England made,
But failing, saw the Saxon heptarchy²²
Finish for ever. Then the holy pile,
Yet seen upon the field of conquest, rose,²³
Where to appease Heaven's wrath for so much blood, 140
The conqueror bade unceasing prayers ascend,
And requiems for the slayers and the slain.
But let not modern Gallia form from hence

Presumptuous hopes that ever thou again,
Queen of the isles, shalt crouch to foreign arms.²⁴ 145
The enervate²⁵ sons of Italy may yield,
And the Iberian,²⁶ all his trophies torn
And wrapped in Superstition's monkish weed,
May shelter his abasement, and put on
Degrading fetters. Never, never thou, 150
Imperial mistress of the obedient sea!
But thou, in thy integrity secure,
Shalt now undaunted meet a world in arms.

England, 'twas where this promontory rears
Its rugged brow above the channel wave, 155
Parting the hostile nations, that thy fame,
Thy naval fame, was tarnished, at what time
Thou, leagued with the Batavian, gavest to France
One day of triumph – triumph the more loud
Because even then so rare.²⁷ Oh well redeemed, 160
Since, by a series of illustrious men
Such as no other country ever reared,
To vindicate her cause. It is a list
Which, as Fame echoes it, blanches²⁸ the cheek
Of bold Ambition, while the despot feels 165
The extorted sceptre tremble in his grasp.

From even the proudest roll by glory filled,
How gladly the reflecting mind returns
To simple scenes of peace and industry
Where, bosomed in some valley of the hills, 1
Stands the lone farm, its gate with tawny ricks
Surrounded, and with granaries and sheds
Roofed with green mosses, and by elms and ash
Partially shaded; and not far removed
The hut of sea-flints built – the humble home 175
Of one who sometimes watches on the heights
When hid in the cold mist of passing clouds

The flock, with dripping fleeces, are dispersed
O'er the wide down; then from some ridged point
That overlooks the sea, his eager eye 180
Watches the bark²⁹ that for his signal waits
To land its merchandise. Quitting for this
Clandestine traffic his more honest toil,
The crook abandoning, he braves himself
The heaviest snowstorm of December's night, 185
When with conflicting winds the ocean raves,
And on the tossing boat unfearing mounts
To meet the partners of the perilous trade
And share their hazard.³⁰ Well it were for him
If no such commerce of destruction known, 190
He were content with what the earth affords
To human labour, even where she seems
Reluctant most. More happy is the hind³¹
Who with his own hands rears on some black moor
Or turbary³² his independent hut 195
Covered with heather, whence the slow white smoke
Of smouldering peat arises. A few sheep,
His best possession, with his children share
The rugged shed when wintry tempests blow;
But when with spring's return the green blades rise 200
Amid the russet heath, the household live
Joint tenants of the waste throughout the day,
And often, from her nest among the swamps,
Where the gemmed sun-dew³³ grows, or fringed buck-bean,³⁴
They scare the plover³⁵ that with plaintive cries 205
Flutters, as sorely wounded,³⁶ down the wind.
Rude, and but just removed from savage life,
Is the rough dweller among scenes like these (Scenes all unlike the poet's fabling dreams
Describing Arcady).³⁷ But he is free; 210

The dread that follows on illegal acts
 He never feels, and his industrious mate
 Shares in his labour. Where the brook is traced
 By crowding osiers,³⁸ and the black coot³⁹ hides
 Among the plashy reeds her diving brood, 215
 The matron wades, gathering the long green rush⁴⁰
 That well prepared hereafter lends its light
 To her poor cottage, dark and cheerless else
 Through the drear hours of winter. Otherwhile
 She leads her infant group where charlock⁴¹ grows 220
 'Unprofitably gay',⁴² or to the fields
 Where congregate the linnet and the finch
 That on the thistles so profusely spread
 Feast in the desert, the poor family
 Early resort, extirpating⁴³ with care 225
 These and the gaudier mischief of the ground;
 Then flames the high-raised heap, seen afar off
 Like hostile war-fires flashing to the sky.⁴⁴
 Another task is theirs. On fields that show
 As⁴⁵ angry Heaven had rained sterility 230
 Stony and cold, and hostile to the plough,
 Where, clamouring loud, the evening curlew⁴⁶ runs
 And drops her spotted eggs among the flints,
 The mother and the children pile the stones
 In rugged pyramids, and all this toil 235
 They patiently encounter, well content
 On their flock bed⁴⁷ to slumber undisturbed
 Beneath the smoky roof they call their own.
 Oh little knows the sturdy hind who stands
 Gazing, with looks where envy and contempt 240
 Are often strangely mingled, on the car⁴⁸
 Where prosperous Fortune sits; what secret care
 Or sick satiety is often hid

Beneath the splendid outside. He knows not
How frequently the child of luxury, 245
Enjoying nothing, flies from place to place
In chase of pleasure that eludes his grasp,
And that content is e'en less found by him
Than by the labourer whose pick-axe smooths
The road before his chariot, and who doffs 250
What was an hat; and, as the train pass on,
Thinks how one day's expenditure like this
Would cheer him for long months, when to his toil
The frozen earth closes her marble breast.

Ah, who is happy? Happiness! A word 255
That like false fire⁴⁹ from marsh effluvia born
Misleads the wanderer, destined to contend
In the world's wilderness with want or woe.
Yet they are happy who have never asked
What good or evil means: the boy 260
That on the river's margin gaily plays
Has heard that death is there; he knows not death,
And therefore fears it not, and venturing in
He gains a bullrush or a minnow – then,
At certain peril, for a worthless prize, 265
A crow's or raven's nest, he climbs the boll⁵⁰
Of some tall pine, and of his prowess proud
Is for a moment happy. Are your cares,
Ye who despise him, never worse applied?
The village girl is happy who sets forth 270
To distant fair, gay in her Sunday suit,
With cherry-coloured knots and flourished shawl,
And bonnet newly-purchased. So is he,
Her little brother, who his mimic drum
Beats till he drowns her rural lovers' oaths 275
Of constant faith and still-increasing love.
Ah, yet a while, and half those oaths believed,
Her happiness is vanished, and the boy,

While yet a stripling, finds the sound he loved
Has led him on till he has given up 280
His freedom and his happiness together.⁵¹
I once was happy, when while yet a child,⁵²
I learned to love these upland solitudes,
And, when elastic⁵³ as the mountain air,
To my light spirit care was yet unknown, 285
And evil unforeseen. Early it came,
And childhood scarcely passed, I was condemned,
A guiltless exile,⁵⁴ silently to sigh,
While Memory with faithful pencil drew
The contrast, and, regretting, I compared 290
With the polluted smoky atmosphere
And dark and stifling streets, the southern hills
That to the setting sun their graceful heads
Rearing, o'erlook the frith⁵⁵ where Vecta⁵⁶ breaks
With her white rocks the strong impetuous tide, 295
When western winds the vast Atlantic urge
To thunder on the coast. Haunts of my youth!
Scenes of fond daydreams, I behold ye yet,
Where 'twas so pleasant by thy northern slopes
To climb the winding sheep-path, aided oft 300
By scattered thorns whose spiny branches bore
Small woolly tufts, spoils of the vagrant lamb
There seeking shelter from the noonday sun;
And pleasant, seated on the short soft turf,
To look beneath upon the hollow way 305
While heavily upward moved the labouring wain
And, stalking slowly by, the sturdy hind,
To ease his panting team,⁵⁷ stopped with a stone
The grating wheel.

Advancing higher still

The prospect widens, and the village church 310
But little, o'er the lowly roofs around

Rears its gray belfry and its simple vane;
Those lowly roofs of thatch are half-concealed
By the rude arms of trees, lovely in spring⁵⁸
When on each bough the rosy-tinctured bloom 315
Sits thick and promises autumnal plenty.⁵⁹
For even those orchards round the Norman farms
Which, as their owners mark the promised fruit,
Console them for the vineyards of the south,
Surpass not these. 320

Where woods of ash and beech
And partial copses fringe the green hill-foot,
The upland shepherd rears his modest home,
There wanders by a little nameless stream
That from the hill wells forth, bright now and clear,
Or after rain with chalky mixture gray, 325
But still refreshing in its shallow course
The cottage garden – most for use designed,
Yet not of beauty destitute. The vine
Mantles the little casement,⁶⁰ yet the briar
Drops fragrant dew among the July flowers; 330
And pansies rayed and freaked,⁶¹ and mottled pinks
Grow among balm, and rosemary and rue;
There honeysuckles flaunt, and roses blow
Almost uncultured – some with dark green leaves
Contrast their flowers of pure unsullied white; 335
Others, like velvet robes of regal state
Of richest crimson, while in thorny moss
Enshrined and cradled, the most lovely, wear
The hues of youthful beauty's glowing cheek.
With fond regret I recollect e'en now 340
In spring and summer what delight I felt
Among these cottage gardens, and how much
Such artless nosegays, knotted with a rush
By village housewife or her ruddy maid,

Were welcome to me, soon and simply pleased. 345
 An early worshipper at Nature's shrine,
 I loved her rudest scenes – warrens and heaths,
 And yellow commons, and birch-shaded hollows,
 And hedgerows, bordering unfrequented lanes
 Bowered with wild roses, and the clasping woodbine 350
 Where purple tassels of the tangling vetch⁶²
 With bittersweet⁶³ and bryony⁶⁴ inweave,
 And the dew fills the silver bindweed's⁶⁵ cups –
 I loved to trace the brooks whose humid banks
 Nourish the harebell and the freckled pagil,⁶⁶ 355
 And stroll among o'ershadowing woods of beech,
 Lending in summer, from the heats of noon,
 A whispering shade; while haply there reclines
 Some pensive lover of uncultured⁶⁷ flowers
 Who from the tumps⁶⁸ with bright green mosses clad 360
 Plucks the wood sorrel⁶⁹ with its light thin leaves,
 Heart-shaped and triply folded, and its root
 Creeping like beaded coral; or who there
 Gathers the copse's pride, anémones⁷⁰
 With rays like golden studs on ivory laid 365
 Most delicate, but touched with purple clouds –
 Fit crown for April's fair but changeful brow.
 Ah, hills so early loved, in fancy still
 I breathe your pure keen air, and still behold
 Those widely spreading views, mocking alike 370
 The poet and the painter's utmost art.
 And still, observing objects more minute,
 Wondering remark the strange and foreign forms
 Of sea-shells, with the pale calcareous⁷¹ soil
 Mingled, and seeming of resembling substance⁷² – 375
 Though surely the blue ocean (from the heights

Where the Downs westward trend,⁷³ but dimly seen)
Here never rolled its surge. Does Nature then
Mimic, in wanton mood, fantastic shapes
Of bivalves⁷⁴ and inwreathed volutes⁷⁵ that cling 380
To the dark sea-rock of the wat'ry world?
Or did this range of chalky mountains once
Form a vast basin where the ocean waves
Swelled fathomless?⁷⁶ What time these fossil shells,
Buoyed on their native element, were thrown 385
Among the embedding calx;⁷⁷ when the huge hill
Its giant bulk heaved, and in strange ferment
Grew up a guardian barrier 'twixt the sea
And the green level of the sylvan weald?⁷⁸

Ah, very vain is Science'⁷⁹ proudest boast, 390
And but a little light its flame yet lends
To its most ardent votaries; since from whence
These fossil forms are seen is but conjecture,
Food for vague theories or vain dispute,
While to his daily task the peasant goes 395
Unheeding such inquiry – with no care
But that the kindly change of sun and shower
Fit for his toil the earth he cultivates.

As little recks⁸⁰ the herdsman of the hill,
Who, on some turfy knoll idly reclined, 400
Watches his wether⁸¹ flock, that deep beneath
Rest the remains of men, of whom is left
No traces in the records of mankind
Save what these half-obliterated mounds
And half-filled trenches doubtfully impart 405
To some lone antiquary who on times remote,
Since which two thousand years have rolled away,
Loves to contemplate.⁸² He perhaps may trace,
Or fancy he can trace, the oblong square

Where the mailed legions under Claudius⁸³ reared 410
The rampire⁸⁴ or excavated fossé⁸⁵ delved;
What time the huge unwieldy elephant
Auxiliary reluctant, hither led
From Afric's forest glooms and tawny sands,
First felt the northern blast, and his vast frame 415
Sunk useless – whence in after-ages found,
The wondering hinds on those enormous bones
Gazed;⁸⁶ and in giants dwelling on the hills
Believed and marvelled.⁸⁷

Hither, ambition, come!
Come and behold the nothingness of all 420
For which you carry through the oppressed earth
War and its train of horrors – see where tread
The innumerable hoofs of flocks above the works
By which the warrior sought to register
His glory, and immortalize his name. 425
The pirate Dane, who from his circular camp
Bore in destructive robbery fire and sword
Down through the vale,⁸⁸ sleeps unremembered here;
And here, beneath the greensward, rests alike
The savage native who his acorn meal 430
Shared with the herds that ranged the pathless woods,⁸⁹
And the centurion who, on these wide hills
Encamping, planted the Imperial Eagle.⁹⁰
All, with the lapse of time, have passed away,
Even as the clouds, with dark and dragon shapes,⁹¹ 435
Or, like vast promontories crowned with towers,
Cast their broad shadows on the Downs, then sail
Far to the northward, and their transient gloom
Is soon forgotten.

But from thoughts like these,
By human crimes suggested, let us turn 440

To where a more attractive study courts
The wanderer of the hills; while shepherd girls
Will from among the fescue⁹² bring him flowers
Of wondrous mockery, some resembling bees
In velvet vest, intent on their sweet toil;⁹³ 445
While others mimic flies that lightly sport
In the green shade, or float along the pool,
But here seem perched upon the slender stalk
And gathering honey-dew;⁹⁴ while in the breeze
That wafts the thistle's plumed seed along, 450
Bluebells wave tremulous. The mountain thyme⁹⁵
Purples the hassock of the heaving mole,⁹⁶
And the short turf is gay with tormentil⁹⁷
And birdsfoot trefoil, and the lesser tribes
Of hawkweed,⁹⁸ spangling it with fringed stars. 455
Near where a richer tract of cultured land
Slopes to the south, and burnished by the sun,
Bend in the gale of August floods of corn;
The guardian of the flock, with watchful care,⁹⁹
Repels by voice and dog the encroaching sheep, 460
While his boy visits every wired trap¹⁰⁰
That scars the turf, and from the pitfalls takes
The timid migrants¹⁰¹ who, from distant wilds,
Warrens, and stone quarries, are destined thus
To lose their short existence. But unsought 465
By luxury yet, the shepherd still protects
The social bird¹⁰² who, from his native haunts
Of willowy current or the rushy pool,
Follows the fleecy crowd,¹⁰³ and flirts and skims
In fellowship among them. 470
Where the knoll
More elevated takes the changeful winds,

The windmill rears its vanes, and thitherward,
With his white load, the master travelling
Scares the rooks rising slow on whispering wings,
While o'er his head, before the summer sun 475
Lights up the blue expanse, heard more than seen,
The lark sings matins¹⁰⁴ and, above the clouds
Floating, embathes his spotted breast in dew.
Beneath the shadow of a gnarled thorn
Bent by the sea-blast,¹⁰⁵ from a seat of turf 480
With fairy nosegays¹⁰⁶ strewn, how wide the view!¹⁰⁷ –
Till in the distant north it melts away
And mingles indiscriminate with clouds;
But if the eye could reach so far, the mart
Of England's capital, its domes and spires 485
Might be perceived. Yet hence the distant range
Of Kentish hills¹⁰⁸ appear in purple haze,
And nearer undulate the wooded heights
And airy summits¹⁰⁹ that above the Mole¹¹⁰
Rise in green beauty, and the beaconed ridge 490
Of Blackdown¹¹¹ shagged with heath, and swelling rude
Like a dark island from the vale, its brow
Catching the last rays of the evening sun
That gleam between the nearer park's old oaks,
Then lighten up the river and make prominent 495
The portal and the ruined battlements
Of that dismantled fortress, raised what time
The Conqueror's successors fiercely fought,
Tearing with civil feuds the desolate land.¹¹²
But now a tiller of the soil dwells there, 500
And of the turret's looped and rafted halls
Has made an humbler homestead where he sees,
Instead of armed foemen, herds that graze
Along his yellow meadows, or his flocks

At evening from the upland driv'n to fold. 505
In such a castellated mansion once
A stranger chose his home, and where hard by
In rude disorder fallen, and hid with brushwood,
Lay fragments gray of towers and buttresses,
Among the ruins often he would muse. 510
His rustic meal soon ended, he was wont
To wander forth, listening the evening sounds
Of rushing milldam¹¹³ or the distant team,¹¹⁴
Or nightjar chasing fern-flies;¹¹⁵ the tired hind
Passed him at nightfall, wondering he should sit 515
On the hilltop so late; they¹¹⁶ from the coast
Who sought bye-paths with their clandestine load,
Saw with suspicious doubt the lonely man
Cross on their way; but village maidens thought
His senses injured, and with pity say 520
That he, poor youth, must have been crossed in love –
For often, stretched¹¹⁷ upon the mountain turf
With folded arms, and eyes intently fixed
Where ancient elms and firs obscured a grange¹¹⁸
Some little space within the vale below, 525
They heard him as complaining of his fate,
And to the murmuring wind of cold neglect
And baffled hope he told. The peasant girls
These plaintive sounds remember, and even now
Among them may be heard the stranger's songs. 530

Were I a shepherd on the hill,
And ever as the mists withdrew
Could see the willows of the rill
Shading the footway to the mill
Where once I walked with you; 535

And as away night's shadows sail,
And sounds of birds and brooks arise,

Believe that from the woody vale
I hear your voice upon the gale
In soothing melodies; 540

And viewing from the Alpine height
The prospect dressed in hues of air,
Could say, while transient colours bright
Touched the fair scene with dewy light,
'Tis that her eyes are there!' 545

I think I could endure my lot
And linger on a few short years,
And then, by all but you forgot,
Sleep where the turf that clothes the spot
May claim some pitying tears. 550

For 'tis not easy to forget
One who through life has loved you still,
And you, however late, might yet
With sighs to memory giv'n, regret
The shepherd of the hill. 555

Yet otherwhile it seemed as if young Hope
Her flattering pencil gave to Fancy's hand,
And in his wanderings reared to soothe his soul
Ideal bowers of pleasure. Then, of solitude
And of his hermit life still more enamoured, 560
His home was in the forest, and wild fruits
And bread sustained him. There in early spring
The barkmen¹¹⁹ found him ere the sun arose;
There at their daily toil, the wedgcutters¹²⁰
Beheld him through the distant thicket move. 565
The shaggy dog following the truffle-hunter¹²¹
Barked at the loiterer, and perchance at night
Belated villagers from fair or wake,
While the fresh night-wind let the moonbeams in Between the swaying boughs, just saw him pass – 570

And then in silence, gliding like a ghost
He vanished, lost among the deepening gloom!
But near one ancient tree, whose wreathed roots
Formed a rude couch, love-songs and scattered rhymes,
Unfinished sentences, or half-erased, 575
And rhapsodies like this, were sometimes found:

Let us to woodland wilds repair
While yet the glittering night-dews seem
To wait the freshly-breathing air
Precursive of the morning beam 580
That, rising with advancing day,
Scatters the silver drops away.

An elm uprooted by the storm,
The trunk with mosses gray and green
Shall make for us a rustic form 585
Where lighter grows the forest scene;
And far among the bowery shades
Are ferny lawns and grassy glades.

Retiring May to lovely June
Her latest garland now resigns; 590
The banks with cuckoo-flowers¹²² are strewn,
The woodwalks blue with columbines,¹²³
And with its reeds the wandering stream
Reflects the flag-flower's¹²⁴ golden gleam.

There, feathering down the turf to meet, 595
Their shadowy arms the beeches spread,
While high above our sylvan seat
Lifts the light ash its airy head;
And later leaved, the oaks between
Extend their boughs of vernal green. 600

The slender birch its paper rind
Seems offering to divided love,

And shuddering even without a wind
Aspines their paler foliage move
As if some spirit of the air 605
Breathed a low sigh in passing there.

The squirrel in his frolic mood
Will fearless bound among the boughs;
Yaffils¹²⁵ laugh loudly through the wood,
And murmuring ring-doves tell their vows; 610
While we, as sweetest woodscent rise,
Listen to woodland melodies.

And I'll contrive a sylvan room
Against the time of summer heat,
Where leaves, inwoven in nature's loom, 615
Shall canopy our green retreat,
And gales that 'close the eye of day'¹²⁶
Shall linger ere they die away.

And when a sear and sallow hue
From early frost the bower receives, 620
I'll dress the sand rock cave for you,
And strew the floor with heath and leaves,
That you, against the autumnal air
May find securer shelter there.

The nightingale will then have ceased 625
To sing her moonlight serenade,
But the gay bird with blushing breast¹²⁷
And woodlarks still will haunt the shade,¹²⁸
And by the borders of the spring
Reed-wrens will yet be carolling.¹²⁹ 630

The forest hermit's lonely cave
None but such soothing sounds shall reach,
Or hardly heard, the distant wave
Slow breaking on the stony beach, 635

Or winds that now sigh soft and low
Now make wild music as they blow.

And then before the chilling north
The tawny foliage falling light
Seems as it flits along the earth
The footfall of the busy sprite 640
Who, wrapped in pale autumnal gloom,
Calls up the mist-born mushroom.

Oh, could I hear your soft voice there,
And see you in the forest green
All beauteous as you are, more fair 645
You'd look amid the sylvan scene,
And in a wood-girl's simple guise
Be still more lovely in mine eyes.

Ye phantoms of unreal delight,
Visions of fond delirium born, 650
Rise not on my deluded sight,
Then leave me drooping and forlorn
To know such bliss can never be,
Unless Amanda¹³⁰ loved like me.

The visionary, nursing dreams like these, 655
Is not indeed unhappy. Summer woods
Wave over him, and whisper as they wave
Some future blessings he may yet enjoy.
And as above him sail the silver clouds,
He follows them in thought to distant climes 660
Where, far from the cold policy of this,
Dividing him from her he fondly loves,
He in some island of the southern sea
May haply build his cane-constructed bower
Beneath the breadfruit or aspiring palm 665
With long green foliage rippling in the gale.¹³¹
Oh, let him cherish his ideal bliss –

For what is life, when Hope has ceased to strew
Her fragile flowers along its thorny way?
And sad and gloomy are his days who lives 670
Of Hope abandoned!

Just beneath the rock
Where Beachy overpeers the Channel wave,
Within a cavern mined by wintry tides
Dwelt one who, long disgusted with the world
And all its ways, appeared to suffer life 675
Rather than live; 132 the soul-reviving gale
Fanning the beanfield 133 or the thymy heath
Had not for many summers breathed on him;
And nothing marked to him the season's change
Save that more gently rose the placid sea, 680
And that the birds which winter on the coast
Gave place to other migrants; save that the fog,
Hovering no more above the beetling cliffs,
Betrayed not then the little careless sheep
On the brink grazing, while their headlong fall 134 685
Near the lone hermit's flint-surrounded home
Claimed unavailing pity – for his heart
Was feelingly alive to all that breathed;
And outraged as he was, in sanguine youth,
By human crimes, he still acutely felt 690
For human misery.

Wandering on the beach,
He learned to augur from the clouds of heaven,
And from the changing colours of the sea
And sullen murmurs of the hollow cliffs,
Or the dark porpoises 135 that near the shore 695
Gambolled and sported on the level brine
When tempests were approaching; then at night
He listened to the wind, and as it drove
The billows with o'erwhelming vehemence,

He, starting from his rugged couch, went forth 700
And hazarding a life too valueless
He waded through the waves with plank or pole
Towards where the mariner in conflict dread
Was buffeting for life the roaring surge –
And now just seen, now lost in foaming gulfs, 705
The dismal gleaming of the clouded moon
Showed the dire peril. Often he had snatched
From the wild billows some unhappy man
Who lived to bless the hermit of the rocks.
But if his generous cares were all in vain, 710
And with slow swell the tide of morning bore
Some blue-swoln corse to land, the pale recluse
Dug in the chalk a sepulchre – above
Where the dank sea-wrack marked the utmost tide,
And with his prayers performed the obsequies¹³⁶ 715
For the poor helpless stranger.

One dark night

The equinoctial wind¹³⁷ blew south by west
Fierce on the shore; the bellowing cliffs were shook
Even to their stony base, and fragments fell
Flashing and thundering on the angry flood. 720
At daybreak, anxious for the lonely man,
His cave the mountain shepherds visited,
Though sand and banks of weeds had choked their way:
He was not in it, but his drowned corse,
By the waves wafted, near his former home 725
Received the rites of burial. Those who read,
Chiselled within the rock these mournful lines,
Memorials of his sufferings, did not grieve
That, dying in the cause of charity,
His spirit, from its earthly bondage freed, 730
Had to some better region fled for ever

Beachy Head

1 The ‘Advertisement’ to this posthumous volume states: ‘The poem entitled Beachy Head is not completed according to the original design. That the increasing debility of its author has been the cause of its being left in an imperfect state will, it is hoped, be a sufficient apology.’ See also headnote, p. 86.

2 ‘In crossing the Channel from the coast of France, Beachy Head is the first land made’ (Smith’s note).

3 ‘Alluding to the idea that this island was once joined to the continent of Europe, and torn from it by some convulsion of nature. I confess I never could trace the resemblance between the two countries. Yet the cliffs about Dieppe resemble the chalk cliffs on the southern coast. But Normandy has no likeness whatever to the parts of England opposite to it’ (Smith’s note).

4 ‘Terns: Sterna hirundo, or sea swallow; gulls: Larus canus; tarrocks: Larus tridactylus’ (Smith’s note).

5 ‘Gray choughs: Corvus graculus. Cornish choughs, or, as these birds are called by the Sussex people, saddle-backed crows, build in great numbers on this coast’ (Smith’s note).

6 high meridian noon.

7 lesser sails as they drag their nets, the fishing vessels proceed slowly through the sea, dependent only on their smaller sails.

8 ‘Cotton: Gossypium herbaceum’ (Smith’s note).

9 long turbaned wreaths The Indiaman on the horizon carries cotton which will be used in the production of turbans. Lines 41–9 are inspired by Paradise Lost ii 636–42.

10 ‘Diamonds, the hardest and most valuable of precious stones. For the extraordinary exertions of the Indians in diving for the pearl oysters, see the account of the pearl fisheries in Percival's View of Ceylon' (Smith's note). Robert Percival's An Account of Ceylon was first published in 1803.

11 Enchased set.

12 gauds showy ornaments, finery.

13 Lines 57–68 are an attack on slavery. To reasonable people, the enslavement of men in exchange for jewels is an unequal transaction; just as, to the unadulterated sensibility, the delights of nature are worth more than the elaborate harmonies of music or the sound of the human voice.

14 fair star Venus.

15 ethereal canopy sky.

16 beetling Beetling (overhanging) cliffs recollect Thomson, Spring 454, who describes the hawk 'High, in the beetling Cliff'.

17 'In crossing the Channel this bird is heard at night, uttering a short cry, and flitting along near the surface of the waves. The sailors call it the sea-snipe, but I can find no species of sea-bird of which this is the vulgar name. A bird so called inhabits the Lake of Geneva' (Smith's note).

18 recording Memory i.e. history.

19 Neustria's hostile shore Normandy.

20 ruin Pevensey Castle.

21 'The Scandinavians (modern Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Lapland, etc.) and other inhabitants of the north, began towards the end of the eighth century to leave their inhospitable climate in search of the produce of more fortunate countries.

The north-men made inroads on the coasts of France and, carrying back immense booty, excited their compatriots to engage in the same piratical voyages; and they were afterwards joined by numbers of necessitous and daring adventurers from the coasts of Provence and Sicily.

In 844 these wandering innovators had a great number of vessels at sea and, again visiting the coasts of France, Spain, and England, the following year they penetrated even to Paris; and the unfortunate Charles the Bald, King of France, purchased at a high price the retreat of the banditti he had no other means of repelling.

These successful expeditions continued for some time till Rollo (otherwise Raoul) assembled a number of followers and, after a descent on England, crossed the Channel, and made himself master of Rouen, which he fortified. Charles the Simple, unable to contend with Rollo, offered to resign to him some of the northern provinces, and to give him his daughter in marriage. Neustria, since called Normandy, was granted to him, and afterwards Brittany. He added the more solid virtues of the legislator to the fierce valour of the conqueror; converted to Christianity, he established justice, and repressed the excesses of his Danish subjects, till then accustomed to live only by plunder. His name became the signal for pursuing those who violated the laws, as well as the cry of Haro, still so usual in Normandy. The Danes and Franks produced a race of men celebrated for their valour, and it was a small party of these that in 983, having been on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, arrived on their return at Salerno, and found the town surrounded by Mahometans, whom the Salernians were bribing to leave their coast. The Normans represented to them the baseness and cowardice of such submission and, notwithstanding the inequality of their numbers, they boldly attacked the Saracen camp and drove the infidels to their ships. The Prince of Salerno, astonished at their successful audacity, would have loaded them with the marks of his gratitude but, refusing every reward, they returned to their own country from whence, however, other bodies of Normans passed into Sicily (anciently called Trinacria); and many of them entered into the service of the Emperor of the east, others of the Pope, and the Duke of Naples was happy to engage a small party of them in defence of his newly founded duchy. Soon afterwards three brothers of Coutance, the sons of Tancred de Hauteville – Guillaume Fier-a-bras, Drogon, and Humfroi – joining the Normans established at Aversa, became masters of the fertile island of Sicily and, Robert Guiscard joining them, the Normans became sovereigns both of Sicily and Naples (Parthenope). How William, the natural son of Robert, Duke of Normandy, possessed himself of England, is too well-known to be repeated here. William, sailing from St Valori, landed in the bay of Pevensey and at the place now called Battle met the English forces under Harold – an esquire (ecuyer) called Taillefer, mounted on an armed horse, led on the Normans, singing in a thundering tone the war song of Rollo. He threw himself among the English and was killed on the first onset. In a marsh not far from Hastings, the skeletons of an armed man and horse were found a few years since, which are believed to have belonged to the Normans, as a party of their horse, deceived in the nature of the ground, perished in the morass’ (Smith’s note).

22 Saxon heptarchy the seven kingdoms established by the Angles and Saxons in Britain.

23 ‘Battle Abbey was raised by the Conqueror, and endowed with an ample revenue, that masses might be said night and day for the souls of those who perished in battle’ (Smith’s note).

24 But let not...foreign arms The principal anxiety in Britain at this period was of invasion from France (‘Gallia’).

25 enervate weak, effeminate.

26 Smith is thinking of Spain’s defeat at the hands of the French in 1794.

27 ‘In 1690, King William being then in Ireland, Tourville, the French admiral, arrived on the coast of England. His fleet consisted of 78 large ships, and 22 fire-ships. Lord Torrington, the English admiral, lay at St Helens with only 40 English and a few Dutch ships, and, conscious of the disadvantage under which he should give battle, he ran up between the enemy’s fleet and the coast, to protect it. The Queen’s Council, dictated to by Russell, persuaded her to order Torrington to venture a battle. The orders Torrington appears to have obeyed reluctantly: his fleet now consisted of 22 Dutch and 34 English ships. Evertson, the Dutch admiral, was eager to obtain glory; Torrington, more cautious, reflected on the importance of the stake. The consequence was that the Dutch rashly sailing on were surrounded, and Torrington, solicitous to recover this false step, placed himself with difficulty between the Dutch and the French. But three Dutch ships were burnt, two of their admirals killed, and almost all their ships disabled. The English and Dutch, declining a second engagement, retired towards the mouth of the Thames. The French, from ignorance of the coast and misunderstanding among each other, failed to take all the advantage they might have done of this victory’ (Smith’s note).

28 blanches whitens.

29 bark ship.

30 ‘The shepherds and labourers of this tract of country, a hardy and athletic race of men, are almost universally engaged in the contraband trade, carried on for the coarsest and most destructive spirits, with the opposite coast. When no other vessel will venture to sea, these men hazard their lives to elude the watchfulness of the Revenue officers, and to secure their cargoes’ (Smith’s note).

31 hind peasant, farm labourer.

32 turbary peat bog.

33 ‘sun-dew: Drosera rotundifolia’ (Smith’s note).

34 ‘buck-bean: Menyanthes trifoliatum’ (Smith’s note).

35 ‘plover: Tringa vanellus’ (Smith’s note).

36 as sorely wounded i.e. as if sorely wounded, so as to distract attention from her nest.

37 Arcady the mountainous central Peloponnesus, named after Arcas, son of Zeus, who reigned here; the people were shepherd-musicians. Although the Greeks regarded it as barbaric, the Romans idealized it into a paradise of nymphs and shepherds. The ‘poet’ Smith has in mind is probably Virgil, who celebrates Arcadia at Eclogues x 31ff.

38 osiers willow trees.

39 ‘coot: Fulica aterrima’ (Smith’s note).

40 the long green rush Rushes could be burnt for long periods; they served, effectively, as candles.

41 charlock wild mustard.

42 ‘ “With blossomed furze, unprofitably gay”, Goldsmith’ (Deserted Village 194) (Smith’s note).

43 extirpating rooting out.

44 ‘The beacons formerly lighted up on the hills to give notice of the approach of an enemy. These signals would still be used in case of alarm, if the telegraph now substituted could not be distinguished on account of fog or darkness’ (Smith’s note). The semaphore, an upright post with movable arms, was invented in 1792, and a chain of them linked with London in 1795.

45 As i.e. as if.

46 ‘Curlew: Charadrius oediconemus’ (Smith’s note).

47 flock bed mattress stuffed with wool.

48 car coach; the peasant looks at a rich man (‘Fortune’) in the carriage drawn by horses.

49 false fire The ignis fatuus, a phosphorescent light seen hovering over marshy ground, believed to be produced by the spontaneous combustion of inflammable gas produced by decaying organic matter; it was often blamed for leading travellers astray. Smith’s point is that the pursuit of happiness is similarly perilous.

50 boll trunk.

51 the boy...his happiness together the boy becomes a soldier with a real drum.

52 I once...child Smith echoes her own Sonnet V. To the South Downs 1: ‘Ah hills beloved, where once, an happy child ...’ See also line 368.

53 elastic buoyant.

54 A guiltless exile probably a reference to enforced residence in France during the 1780s, to escape her husband’s numerous creditors.

55 frith the English Channel.

56 ‘Vecta: the Isle of Wight, which breaks the force of the waves when they are driven by south-west winds against this long and open coast. It is somewhere described as “Vecta shouldering the western waves” ’ (Smith’s note).

57 panting team of oxen, which are pulling a large open wagon (‘wain’) laden with hay or some other produce. The farm labourer (‘hind’) places stones against the wheels so that the wain will not roll back down the hill while they all take a rest.

58 ‘Every cottage in this country has its orchard, and I imagine that not even those of Herefordshire or Worcestershire exhibit a more beautiful prospect, when the trees are in bloom, and the Primavera candida e vermiglia is everywhere so enchanting’ (Smith’s note). As Curran notes, Smith alludes to Petrarch, Sonnet 310, line 4 (‘pure and rosy spring’).

59 autumnal plenty as Curran notes, apple harvests.

60 casement window; the vine shelters it from the sun.

61 pansies rayed and freaked a recollection of Lycidas 144: ‘the pansy freaked with jet’ (‘freaked’ is Milton’s coinage).

62 ‘vetch: Vicia sylvatica’ (Smith’s note).

63 ‘bittersweet: Solanum dulcamara’ (Smith’s note).

64 ‘bryony: Bryonia alba’ (Smith’s note).

65 ‘bindweed: Convolvulus sepium’ (Smith’s note).

66 ‘harebell: Hyacinthus non scriptus; pagil: Primula veris’ (Smith’s note). The preceding line echoes Wordsworth, ‘Ode’ 195: ‘I love the brooks which down their channels fret.’

67 uncultured uncultivated; i.e. wildflowers.

68 tumps humps.

69 ‘sorrel: Oxalis acetosella’ (Smith’s note).

70 ‘anémones: Anemone nemorosa. It appears to be settled on late and excellent authorities that this word should not be accented on the second syllable, but on the penultima. I have however ventured the more known accentuation as more generally used, and suiting better the nature of my verse' (Smith's note).

71 calcareous containing lime.

72 'Among the crumbling chalk I have often found shells, some quite in a fossil state and hardly distinguishable from chalk. Others appeared more recent – cockles, mussels, and periwinkles, I well remember, were among the number, and some whose names I do not know. A great number were like those of small land-snails. It is now many years since I made these observations. The appearance of sea-shells so far from the sea excited my surprise, though I then knew nothing of natural history. I have never read any of the late theories of the earth, nor was I ever satisfied with the attempts to explain many of the phenomena which call forth conjecture in those books I happened to have had access to on this subject' (Smith's note).

73 trend stretch.

74 bivalves double-shelled molluscs; e.g. oyster, mussel.

75 volutes spiral-shelled molluscs; e.g. periwinkles.

76 'The theory here slightly hinted at is taken from an idea started by Mr White' (Smith's note). Gilbert White's Natural History of Selborne (1789) documents the countryside of southeast England.

77 calx lime.

78 sylvan weald wooded tract between the North and South Downs, including parts of Surrey, Sussex and Kent.

79 Science' The possessive case is indicated, but Smith elides the final 's' on account of the metre.

80 recks cares.

81 wether castrated male sheep.

82 ‘These Downs are not only marked with traces of encampments, which from their forms are called Roman or Danish, but there are numerous tumuli among them – some of which, having been opened a few years ago, were supposed by a learned antiquary to contain the remains of the original natives of the country’ (Smith’s note).

83 ‘That the legions of Claudius were in this part of Britain appears certain, since this Emperor received the submission of Cantii, Atrebates, Irenobates, and Regni, in which latter denomination were included the people of Sussex’ (Smith’s note).

84 rampire rampart, barrier.

85 fossé ditch, trench.

86 ‘In the year 1740 some workmen digging in the park at Burton in Sussex discovered, nine feet below the surface, the teeth and bones of an elephant. Two of the former were seven feet eight inches in length. There were, besides these, tusks, one of which broke in removing it, a grinder not at all decayed, and a part of the jaw-bone, with bones of the knee and thigh, and several others. Some of them remained very lately at Burton House, the seat of John Biddulph, Esq. Others were in possession of the Revd Dr Langrish, minister of Petworth at that period, who was present when some of these bones were taken up, and gave it as his opinion that they had remained there since the universal deluge. The Romans under the Emperor Claudius probably brought elephants into Britain. Milton, in the second Book of his History, in speaking of the expedition, says that “He, like a great eastern king, with armed elephants, marched through Gallia.” This is given on the authority of Dion Cassius, in his Life of the Emperor Claudius. It has therefore been conjectured that the bones found at Burton might have been those of one of these elephants, who perished there soon after its landing, or, dying on the high downs (one of which, called Duncton Hill, rises immediately above Burton Park), the bones might have been washed down by the torrents of rain and buried deep in the soil. They were not found together but scattered at some distance from each other. The two tusks were twenty feet apart. I had often heard of the elephant's bones at Burton, but never saw them, and I have no books to refer to. I think I saw, in what is now called the National Museum at Paris, the very large bones of an elephant, which were found in North America – though it is certain that this enormous animal is never seen in its natural state, but in the countries under the torrid zone of the old world. I have, since making this note, been told that the bones of the rhinoceros and hippopotamus have been found in America' (Smith's note).

87 'The peasants believe that the large bones sometimes found belonged to giants who formerly lived on the hills. The devil also has a great deal to do with the remarkable forms of hill and vale: the Devil's Punchbowl, the Devil's Leaps, and the Devil's Dyke, are names given to deep hollows, or high and abrupt ridges, in this and the neighbouring county' (Smith's note). The 'neighbouring county' is Surrey.

88 'The incursions of the Danes were for many ages the scourge of this island' (Smith's note).

89 'The aborigines of this country lived in woods, unsheltered but by trees and caves, and were probably as truly savage as any of those who are now termed so' (Smith's note).

90 the Imperial Eagle emblematic of the Roman empire. Roman remains are to be found across the southeast of England.

91 the clouds, with dark and dragon shapes There may be a general reminiscence in these lines of Hamlet's discussion with Polonius as to the shapes of the clouds: 'Do you see yonder cloud that's almost in shape of a camel?' (Hamlet III ii 376–7).

92 'The grass called sheep's fescue (Festuca ovina) clothes these downs with the softest turf' (Smith's note).

93 ‘Ophrys apifera, bee ophrys, or orchis, found plentifully on the hills, as well as the next’ (Smith’s note).

94 ‘Ophrys muscifera, fly orchis. Linnaeus, misled by the variations to which some of this tribe are really subject, has perhaps too rashly esteemed all those which resemble insects as forming only one species, which he terms ophrys insectifera. See English Botany’ (Smith’s note).

95 ‘Bluebells: Campanula rotundifolia; mountain thyme: Thymus serpyllum. “It is a common notion that the flesh of sheep which feed upon aromatic plants, particularly wild thyme, is superior in flavour to other mutton. The truth is that sheep do not crop these aromatic plants unless, now and then, by accident, or when they are first turned on hungry to downs, heaths, or commons; but the soil and situations favourable to aromatic plants produce a short sweet pasturage, best adapted to feeding sheep, whom nature designed for mountains and not for turnip grounds and rich meadows. The attachment of bees to this, and other aromatic plants, is well known.” Martyn’s Miller’ (Smith’s note). Smith quotes Thomas Martyn, The Gardener’s and Botanist’s Dictionary ... by the late Philip Miller ... To which are now added a complete enumeration and description of all plants (1797–1807).

96 hassock of the heaving mole molehill.

97 ‘Tormentil: Tormentilla reptans’ (Smith’s note).

98 ‘Birdsfoot trefoil: Trifolium ornithopoides; hawkweed: Hieracium, many sorts’ (Smith’s note).

99 ‘The Downs, especially to the south, where they are less abrupt, are in many places under the plough, and the attention of the shepherds is there particularly required to keep the flocks from trespassing’ (Smith’s note).

100 ‘Square holes cut in the turf, into which a wire noose is fixed, to catch wheatears. Mr White says that these birds (Motacilla oenanthe) are never taken beyond the River Adur, and Beding Hill – but this is certainly a mistake’ (Smith’s note).

101 ‘These birds are extremely fearful and, on the slightest appearance of a cloud, run for shelter to the first rut, or heap of stones, that they see’ (Smith’s note).

102 ‘The yellow wagtail: Motacilla flava. It frequents the banks of rivulets in winter, making its nest in meadows and cornfields. But after the breeding season is over, it haunts downs and sheepwalks, and is seen constantly among the flocks, probably for the sake of the insects it picks up. In France the shepherds call it la bergeronette, and say it often gives them, by its cry, notice of approaching danger’ (Smith’s note).

103 the fleecy crowd of sheep.

104 matins technically, a morning prayer that is sung; in this case it refers to the lark’s song at dawn.

105 ‘The strong winds from the south-west occasion almost all the trees, which on these hills are exposed to it, to grow the other way’ (Smith’s note).

106 nosegays perfumes, scents.

107 ‘So extensive are some of the views from these hills, that only the want of power in the human eye to travel so far, prevents London itself being discerned. Description falls so infinitely short of the reality, that only here and there distinct features can be given’ (Smith’s note).

108 ‘A scar of chalk in a hill beyond Sevenoaks in Kent is very distinctly seen of a clear day’ (Smith’s note).

109 ‘The hills about Dorking in Surrey, over almost the whole extent of which county the prospect extends’ (Smith’s note).

110 The River Mole rises on the borders of Sussex and flows north to Dorking.

111 ‘This is an high ridge extending between Sussex and Surrey. It is covered with heath and has almost always a dark appearance. On it is a telegraph’ (Smith’s note).

112 ‘In this country there are several of the fortresses or castles built by Stephen of Blois in his contention for the kingdom, with the daughter of Henry I, the Empress Matilda. Some of these are now converted into farmhouses’ (Smith’s note).

113 milldam dam constructed across a stream so as to raise its level, enabling it to power a mill-wheel.

114 the distant team of horses.

115 ‘Dr Aikin remarks, I believe, in his essay “On the Application of Natural History to the Purposes of Poetry”, how many of our best poets have noticed the same circumstance, the hum of the dor beetle (Scaraboeus stercorarius) among the sounds heard by the evening wanderer. I remember only one instance in which the more remarkable, though by no means uncommon noise, of the fern owl, or goatsucker, is mentioned. It is called the nighthawk, the jar bird, the churn owl, and the fern owl, from its feeding on the Scaraboeus solstitialis, or fern chafer, which it catches while on the wing with its claws, the middle toe of which is long and curiously serrated, on purpose to hold them. It was this bird that was intended to be described in the 42nd sonnet (Smith’s Sonnets). I was mistaken in supposing it as visible in November; it is a migrant, and leaves this country in August. I had often seen and heard it, but I did not then know its name or history. It is called goatsucker (Caprimulgus) from a strange prejudice taken against it by the Italians, who assert that it sucks their goats; and the peasants of England still believe that a disease in the backs of their cattle, occasioned by a fly which deposits its egg under the skin and raises a boil, sometimes fatal to calves, is the work of this bird, which they call a puckeridge. Nothing can convince them that their beasts are not injured by this bird, which they therefore hold in abhorrence' (Smith's note). Smith refers to An Essay on the Application of Natural History to Poetry (1777) by John Aikin, brother of Anna Laetitia Barbauld.

116 they smugglers.

117 stretched A verbal echo connects Smith's solitary with the melancholic poet of Gray's Elegy: 'His listless length at noontide would he stretch, / And pore upon the brook that babbles by' (ll. 103–4).

118 grange granary.

119 'As soon as the sap begins to rise, the trees intended for felling are cut and barked. At which time the men who are employed in that business pass whole days in the woods' (Smith's note).

120 'The wedges used in ship-building are made of beech wood, and great numbers are cut every year in the woods near the Downs' (Smith's note).

121 'Truffles are found under the beech woods by means of small dogs trained to hunt them by the scent' (Smith's note).

122 'Cuckoo-flowers: Lychnis dioica. Columbines: Aquilegia vulgaris. Shakespeare describes the cuckoo buds as being yellow. He probably meant the numerous ranunculi, or March marigolds (Caltha palustris) which so gild the meadows in spring; but poets have never been botanists. The cuckoo-flower is the Lychnis flos-cuculi' (Smith's note). Smith refers to Love's Labour's Lost V ii 896: 'And cuckoo-buds of yellow hue'.

123 'Columbines: Aquilegia vulgaris' (Smith's note).

124 'Flag-flower: Iris pseudacorus' (Smith's note).

125 ‘Yaffils: woodpeckers (picus); three or four species in Britain’ (Smith’s note).

126 ‘ “And liquid notes that close the eye of day”. Milton. The idea here meant to be conveyed is of the evening wind, so welcome after a hot day of summer, and which appears to soothe and lull all nature into tranquillity’ (Smith’s note). The quotation is from Sonnet I 5.

127 ‘The robin (Motacilla rubecula), which is always heard after other songsters have ceased to sing’ (Smith’s note).

128 ‘The woodlark (Alauda nemorosa) sings very late’ (Smith’s note).

129 ‘Reed-wrens (Motacilla arundinacea) sing all the summer and autumn, and are often heard during the night’ (Smith’s note).

130 Amanda Smith leaves a blank at this point in the printed text; the present reading is conjectural.

131 ‘An allusion to the visionary delights of the new discovered islands where it was at first believed men lived in a state of simplicity and happiness, but where, as later enquiries have ascertained, that exemption from toil, which the fertility of the country gives them, produces the grossest vices, and a degree of corruption that late navigators think will end in the extirpation of the whole people in a few years’ (Smith’s note).

132 ‘In a cavern almost immediately under the cliff called Beachy Head, there lived, as the people of the country believed, a man of the name of Darby, who for many years had no other abode than this cave, and subsisted almost entirely on shellfish. He had often administered assistance to shipwrecked mariners, but venturing into the sea on this charitable mission during a violent equinoctial storm, he himself perished. As it is above thirty years since I heard this tradition of Parson Darby (for so I think he was called), it may now perhaps be forgotten’ (Smith’s note).

133 the soul-reviving gale...beanfield Smith may have in mind Coleridge, Eolian Harp 9–10: ‘How exquisite the scents/ Snatched from yon beanfield!’

134 ‘Sometimes in thick weather the sheep, feeding on the summit of the cliff, miss their footing and are killed by the fall’ (Smith’s note).

135 ‘Dark porpoises: Delphinus phocoena’ (Smith’s note). Porpoises are still to be seen in the waters off the south coast of England.

136 obsequies funeral rites.

137 equinoctial wind Smith refers to the winds prevailing at the time of the autumnal equinox (22 or 23 September).

George Crabbe (1754–1832)

A native of Aldeburgh in Suffolk, Crabbe set up in practice as a surgeon in 1775. He decided to try his fortunes as a writer in 1780 and went to London, where he secured the patronage of Edmund Burke. Returning to Aldeburgh as a curate after publication of his poem The Library (1781), he became chaplain to the Duke of Rutland in 1782. He published The Village in 1783 and The Newspaper in 1785. Then, for twenty-two years, he published nothing until Poems (1807), The Borough (1810), Tales (1812) and Tales of the Hall (1819). These works won him the admiration and friendship of a new generation: Jeffrey, Byron, Scott, Rogers, Moore and Campbell. As Byron told Murray in 1817, ‘Crabbe’s the man’ (Marchand v 266).

One reason for this was Crabbe’s mastery of the post-Popean manner so popular towards the end of the eighteenth century; Byron and like-minded readers regarded him as free of what they saw as the misguided notions advocated by Wordsworth and Coleridge. And unlike the Romantics, Crabbe saw himself as working in the realist tradition of Shakespeare and Chaucer. These qualities may help to explain his comparative unpopularity now. All the same, the fact that he took little part in the dominant literary movement of the day should not blind us to his genius, seen at its most striking in Peter Grimes, a complete text of which appears below. There is no other poem in the canon so persuasive in its analysis of the psychology of the child murderer (and abuser). Its uncompromisingly hard edge would be toned down and sentimentalized in Benjamin Britten’s opera (1945), by which it is best known.

Crabbe’s most perceptive critic remains Hazlitt who, in The Spirit of the Age, described him as ‘a repulsive writer’:

He takes the most trite, the most gross and obvious and revolting part of nature for the subject of his elaborate descriptions; but it is Nature still, and Nature is a great and mighty Goddess! It is well for the Reverend Author that it is so. . . . Whoever makes an exact image of any thing on the earth, however deformed or insignificant, according to him, must succeed – and he himself has succeeded.

(Wu vii 148)

In a less sympathetic assessment Wordsworth observed that ‘19 out of 20 of Crabbe’s pictures are mere matters of fact with which the Muses have just about as much to do as they have with a collection of medical reports, or of law cases.’ All the same, he liked Crabbe personally, and commemorated him in the ‘Extempore Effusion on the Death of James Hogg’ (pp. 593–5).

Peter Grimes¹

From The Borough (1810) Letter XXII: The Poor of the Borough

Old Peter Grimes made fishing his employ;
His wife he cabined with him and his boy,
And seemed that life laborious to enjoy:
To town came quiet Peter with his fish,
And had of all a civil word and wish. 5
He left his trade upon the Sabbath-day
And took young Peter in his hand to pray;
But soon the stubborn boy from care broke loose –
At first refused, then added his abuse.
His father's love he scorned, his power defied, 10
But being drunk, wept sorely when he died.

Yes, then he wept, and to his mind there came
Much of his conduct, and he felt the shame!
How he had oft the good old man reviled,
And never paid the duty of a child; 15
How when the father in his Bible read,
He in contempt and anger left the shed:
'It is the Word of life!' the parent cried –
'This is the life itself!' the boy replied;
And while old Peter in amazement stood, 20
Gave the hot spirit to his boiling blood:
How he, with oath and furious speech, began

To prove his freedom and assert the man;
And when the parent checked his impious rage
How he had cursed the tyranny of age – 25
Nay, once had dealt the sacrilegious² blow
On his bare head and laid his parent low!
The father groaned – ‘If thou art old’, said he,
‘And hast a son, thou wilt remember me:
Thy mother left me in an happy time, 30
Thou kill’dst not her – Heav’n spares the double crime.’

On an inn settle³ in his maudlin grief,
This he revolved and drank for his relief.

Now lived the youth in freedom, but debarred
From constant pleasure, and he thought it hard – 35
Hard that he could not every wish obey,
But must awhile relinquish ale and play –
Hard that he could not to his cards attend,
But must acquire the money he would spend.
With greedy eye he looked on all he saw, 40
He knew not justice, and he laughed at law;
On all he marked, he stretched his ready hand –
He fished by water and he filched by land.
Oft in the night has Peter dropped his oar,
Fled from his boat and sought for prey on shore; 45
Oft up the hedgerow glided, on his back
Bearing the orchard’s produce in a sack,
Or farmyard load tugged fiercely from the stack.
And as these wrongs to greater numbers rose,
The more he looked on all men as his foes. 50

He built a mud-walled hovel where he kept
His various wealth, and there he oft-times slept;
But no success could please his cruel soul –
He wished for one to trouble and control;
He wanted some obedient boy to stand 55
And bear the blow of his outrageous hand,
And hoped to find in some propitious hour

A feeling creature subject to his power.
Peter had heard there were in London then
(Still have they being?) workhouse-clearing men 60
Who, undisturbed by feelings just or kind,
Would parish-boys to needy tradesmen bind.
They in their want a trifling sum would take,
And toiling slaves of piteous orphans make.⁴

Such Peter sought, and when a lad was found, 65
The sum was dealt him and the slave was bound.
Some few in town observed in Peter's trap
A boy, with jacket blue and woollen cap;
But none enquired how Peter used the rope,
Or what the bruise that made the stripling stoop; 70
None could the ridges on his back behold,
None sought him shiv'ring in the winter's cold,
None put the question, 'Peter, dost thou give
The boy his food? – What, man? The lad must live!
Consider, Peter, let the child have bread, 75
He'll serve thee better if he's stroked and fed.'
None reasoned thus – and some, on hearing cries,
Said calmly, 'Grimes is at his exercise.'

Pinned,⁵ beaten, cold, pinched, threatened and abused,
His efforts punished and his food refused, 80
Awake tormented, soon aroused from sleep,
Struck if he wept, and yet compelled to weep,
The trembling boy dropped down and strove to pray,
Received a blow and trembling turned away,
Or sobbed and hid his piteous face, while he, 85
The savage master, grinned in horrid glee!
He'd now the power he ever loved to show,
A feeling being subject to his blow.

Thus lived the lad in hunger, peril, pain,
His tears despised, his supplications vain; 90
Compelled by fear to lie, by need to steal,
His bed uneasy and unblessed his meal.

For three sad years the boy his tortures bore,
And then his pains and trials were no more.

‘How died he, Peter?’ – when the people said, 95
He growled, ‘I found him lifeless in his bed’;
Then tried for softer tone, and sighed, ‘Poor Sam is dead.’
Yet murmurs were there and some questions asked –
How he was fed, how punished and how tasked?
Much they suspected but they little proved, 100
And Peter passed untroubled and unmoved.

Another boy with equal ease was found,
The money granted and the victim bound;
And what his fate? One night it chanced he fell
From the boat’s mast and perished in her well 105
Where fish were living kept, and where the boy
(So reasoned men) could not himself destroy.
‘Yes, so it was!’, said Peter, ‘in his play;
For he was idle both by night and day!
He climbed the main mast and then fell below’ – 110
Then showed his corpse and pointed to the blow.
What said the jury? They were long in doubt,
But sturdy Peter faced the matter out.
So they dismissed him, saying at the time,
‘Keep fast your hatchway when you’ve boys who climb.’ 115
This hit the conscience, and he coloured more
Than for the closest questions put before.
Thus all his fears the verdict set aside,
And at the slave-shop Peter still applied.

Then came a boy, of manners soft and mild – 120
Our seamen’s wives with grief beheld the child;
All thought (though poor themselves) that he was one
Of gentle blood, some noble sinner’s son
Who had, belike, deceived some humble maid
Whom he had first seduced and then betrayed. 125
However this, he seemed a gracious lad,
In grief submissive and with patience sad.
Passive he laboured, till his slender frame

Bent with his loads, and he at length was lame;
Strange that a frame so weak could bear so long I30
The grossest insult and the foulest wrong.
But there were causes – in the town they gave
Fire, food and comfort to the gentle slave;
And though stern Peter, with a cruel hand
And knotted rope, enforced the rude command, I35
Yet he considered what he'd lately felt,
And his vile blows with selfish pity dealt.

One day such draughts the cruel fisher made,
He could not vend them in his borough trade
But sailed for London mart: the boy was ill, I40
But ever humbled to his master's will.
And on the river, where they smoothly sailed,
He strove with terror and awhile prevailed;
But new to danger on the angry sea,
He clung affrightened to his master's knee; I45
The boat grew leaky and the wind was strong,
Rough was the passage and the time was long;
His liquor failed, and Peter's wrath arose...
No more is known – the rest we must suppose
Or learn of Peter. Peter, says he, spied I50
The stripling's danger and for harbour tried;
Meantime the fish and then th' apprentice died.

The pitying women raised a clamour round,
And weeping said, 'Thou hast thy 'prentice drowned!'
Now the stern man was summoned to the hall, I55
To tell his tale before the burghers all:
He gave th' account, professed the lad he loved,
And kept his brazen features all unmoved.
The Mayor himself with tone severe replied,
'Henceforth with thee shall never boy abide; I60
Hire thee a freeman whom thou durst not beat,
But who, in thy despite, will sleep and eat.
Free thou art now! – again shouldst thou appear,
Thou'lt find thy sentence, like thy soul, severe.'

Alas for Peter! not an helping hand, I65
So was he hated, could he now command;
Alone he rowed his boat, alone he cast
His nets beside, or made his anchor fast;
To hold a rope or hear a curse was none –
He toiled and railed, he groaned and swore alone. I70
Thus by himself compelled to live each day,
To wait for certain hours the tide's delay;
At the same times the same dull views to see,
The bounding marsh-bank and the blighted tree;
The water only, when the tides were high, I75
When low, the mud half-covered and half-dry;
The sunburnt tar that blisters on the planks,
And bankside stakes in their uneven ranks;
Heaps of entangled weeds that slowly float
As the tide rolls by the impeded boat. I80

When tides were neap, and in the sultry day,
Through the tall bounding mud-banks made their way,⁶
Which on each side rose swelling, and below
The dark warm flood ran silently and slow;
There anchoring, Peter chose from man to hide, I85
There hang his head, and view the lazy tide
In its hot slimy channel slowly glide –
Where the small eels that left the deeper way
For the warm shore, within the shallows play;
Where gaping mussels, left upon the mud, I90
Slope their slow passage to the fallen flood.
Here dull and hopeless he'd lie down and trace
How sidelong crabs had scrawled their crooked race,
Or sadly listen to the tuneless cry
Of fishing gull or clanging golden-eye;⁷ I95
What time the seabirds to the marsh would come,
And the loud bittern, from the bullrush home,
Gave from the salt-ditch side the bellowing boom.
He nursed the feelings these dull scenes produce,

And loved to stop beside the opening sluice, 200
Where the small stream, confined in narrow bound,
Ran with a dull, unvaried, sad'ning sound –
Where all presented to the eye or ear
Oppressed the soul with misery, grief and fear.

Besides these objects there were places three 205
Which Peter seemed with certain dread to see;
When he drew near them he would turn from each,
And loudly whistle till he passed the reach.⁸

A change of scene to him brought no relief:
In town, 'twas plain, men took him for a thief; 210
The sailors' wives would stop him in the street
And say, 'Now, Peter, thou'st no boy to beat!'
Infants at play, when they perceived him, ran,
Warning each other, 'That's the wicked man!'
He growled an oath, and in an angry tone 215
Cursed the whole place and wished to be alone.

Alone he was, the same dull scenes in view,
And still more gloomy in his sight they grew.
Though man he hated, yet employed alone
At bootless labour, he would swear and groan, 220
Cursing the shoals that glided by the spot,
And gulls that caught them when his arts could not.

Cold nervous tremblings shook his sturdy frame,
And strange disease (he couldn't say the name);
Wild were his dreams, and oft he rose in fright, 225
Waked by his view of horrors in the night –
Horrors that would the sternest minds amaze,
Horrors that demons might be proud to raise.
And though he felt forsaken, grieved at heart
To think he lived from all mankind apart, 230
Yet if a man approached, in terrors he would start.

A winter passed since Peter saw the town,
And summer lodgers were again come down;
These, idly curious, with their glasses spied

The ships in bay as anchored for the tide – 235
The river's craft, the bustle of the quay,
And sea-port views which landmen love to see.
One, up the river, had a man and boat
Seen day by day – now anchored, now afloat.
Fisher he seemed, yet used no net nor hook; 240
Of sea fowl swimming by no heed he took,
But on the gliding waves still fixed his lazy look.
At certain stations he would view the stream
As if he stood bewildered in a dream,
Or that some power had chained him for a time 245
To feel a curse or meditate on crime.

This known, some curious, some in pity went,
And others questioned, 'Wretch, dost thou repent?'
He heard, he trembled, and in fear resigned
His boat: new terror filled his restless mind. 250
Furious he grew and up the country ran,
And there they seized him – a distempered man.
Him we received, and to a parish bed,
Followed and cursed, the groaning man was led.
Here when they saw him whom they used to shun – 255
A lost lone man, so harassed and undone –
Our gentle females (ever prompt to feel)
Perceived compassion on their anger steal;
His crimes they couldn't from their memories blot,
But they were grieved and trembled at his lot. 260
A priest too came to whom his words are told,
And all the signs they shuddered to behold.

'Look, look!' they cried, 'his limbs with horror shake,
And as he grinds his teeth, what noise they make!
How glare his angry eyes, and yet he's not awake! 265
See what cold drops upon his forehead stand,
And how he clenches that broad bony hand!'
The priest attending found he spoke at times
As one alluding to his fears and crimes:
'It was the fall', he muttered, 'I can show 270

The manner how – I never struck a blow!’
And then aloud, ‘Unhand me, free my chain!
On oath, he fell – it struck him to the brain!
Why ask my father? That old man will swear
Against my life – besides he wasn’t there! 275
What, all agreed? Am I to die today?
My Lord, in mercy, give me time to pray!’
Then as they watched him, calmer he became,
And grew so weak he couldn’t move his frame,
But murmuring spake, while they could see and hear 280
The start of terror and the groan of fear;
See the large dew-beads on his forehead rise
And the cold death-drop glaze his sunken eyes.
Nor yet he died, but with unwonted force
Seemed with some fancied being to discourse. 285
He knew not us, or with accustomed art
He hid the knowledge, yet exposed his heart;
’Twas part confession and the rest defence –
A madman’s tale, with gleams of waking sense.
‘I’ll tell you all,’ he said, ‘the very day 290
When the old man first placed them in my way –
My father’s spirit (he who always tried
To give me trouble when he lived and died)!
When he was gone, he could not be content
To see my days in painful labour spent, 295
But would appoint his meetings, and he made
Me watch at these, and so neglect my trade.
’Twas one hot noon – all silent, still, serene;
No living being had I lately seen.
I paddled up and down and dipped my net 300
But (such his pleasure) I could nothing get;
A father’s pleasure! – when his toil was done,
To plague and torture thus an only son.
And so I sat and looked upon the stream,
How it ran on – and felt as in a dream: 305
But dream it was not. No – I fixed my eyes

On the midstream and saw the spirits rise:
I saw my father on the water stand
And hold a thin pale boy in either hand,
And there they glided ghastly on the top 310
Of the salt flood, and never touched a drop.
I would have struck them, but they knew th' intent,
And smiled upon the oar, and down they went.
Now from that day, whenever I began
To dip my net, there stood the hard old man, 315
He and those boys. I humbled me and prayed
They would be gone – they heeded not but stayed.
Nor could I turn, nor would the boat go by,
But gazing on the spirits, there was I;
They bade me leap to death, but I was loath to die. 320
And every day, as sure as day arose,
Would these three spirits meet me ere the close:
To hear and mark them daily was my doom,
And “Come”, they said with weak sad voices, “come!”
To row away with all my strength I tried, 325
But there were they, hard by me in the tide,
The three unbodied forms – and “Come”, still “come!”, they cried.
Fathers should pity, but this old man shook
His hoary locks and froze me by a look.
Thrice, when I struck them, through the water came 330
An hollow groan that weakened all my frame.
“Father”, said I, “have mercy!” He replied
I know not what – the angry spirit lied:
“Didst thou not draw thy knife?” said he. 'Twas true,
But I had pity and my arm withdrew; 335
He cried for mercy, which I kindly gave,
But he has no compassion in his grave.
There were three places where they ever rose –
The whole long river has not such as those –
Places accursed where, if a man remain, 340
He'll see the things which strike him to the brain.
And there they made me on my paddle lean

And look at them for hours – accursed scene!
When they would glide to that smooth eddy space,
Then bid me leap and join them in the place; 345
And at my groans each little villain sprite
Enjoyed my pains and vanished in delight.

In one fierce summer day, when my poor brain
Was burning hot, and cruel was my pain,
Then came this father-foe, and there he stood 350
With his two boys again upon the flood.
There was more mischief in their eyes, more glee
In their pale faces when they glared at me.

Still did they force me on the oar to rest,
And when they saw me fainting and oppressed, 355
He with his hand (the old man) scooped the flood,
And there came flame about him mixed with blood;
He bade me stoop and look upon the place,
Then flung the hot red liquor in my face –
Burning it blazed, and then I roared for pain – 360
I thought the demons would have turned my brain!
Still there they stood, and forced me to behold
A place of horrors – they cannot be told:
Where the flood opened, there I heard the shriek
Of tortured guilt no earthly tongue can speak. 365
“All days alike for ever!” did they say,
“And unremitted torments every day!”
Yes, so they said...’

But here he ceased and gazed
On all around, affrightened and amazed;
And still he tried to speak and looked in dread 370
Of frightened females gathering round his bed,
Then dropped exhausted and appeared at rest,
Till the strong foe the vital powers possessed.
Then with an inward, broken voice he cried,
‘Again they come!’ and muttered as he died. 375

Peter Grimes

1 ‘The original of Peter Grimes was an old fisherman of Aldborough while Mr. Crabbe was practising there as a surgeon. He had a succession of apprentices from London, and a certain sum with each. As the boys all disappeared under circumstances of strong suspicion, the man was warned that if another followed in like manner he should certainly be charged with murder’ (note in 1834 edition of Crabbe’s Works).

2 sacrilegious because he was disobeying the fifth commandment, to honour thy father and mother.

3 settle bench.

4 In order to reduce the poor-rate in London, it was customary towards the end of the eighteenth century to farm out children of paupers to ‘masters’ in other parishes, who would be given about £5 in return for maintaining them and teaching them a trade.

5 Pinned pinned down by force.

6 When tides...way When the tide is neap, the high-water level is at its lowest point, leaving a larger area of mud exposed than at other times.

7 golden-eye a sea duck.

8 reach portion of the river between two bends.

William Godwin (1756–1836)

When Godwin published Political Justice in February 1793, only days after France had declared war on England, the British government was as sensitive to radical dissent as America was to communism during the McCarthy era. For the next decade, he would be regarded as one of the main enemies of the state, and an icon of radical thought.

It was a curious fate for the son of a strict Calvinist clergyman. Only religious texts were read in his father's house, and when he was 11 he was boarded out with a violently puritanical Sandemanian minister, Samuel Newton, who whipped him for the slightest deviation from strict religious practice or thought. The followers of Robert Sandeman were more extreme than the Scottish Calvinists against whom they were reacting; two central tenets were that religious faith was rational, and should not be 'sullied' by emotion, and that an individual's property should always be at the disposal of the church, because wealth was inherently sinful. Those tenets were to exert a strong influence on Godwin's master-work, Political Justice (1793).

By the time he graduated from the Hoxton Dissenting Academy in 1778, he was a staunch Tory Calvinist. But religion had made his childhood too unremittingly joyless, and he was too intelligent a freethinker, to refrain from questioning the assumptions of his teachers. After reading Holbach and Helvétius, the deist thinkers who influenced the French Revolution, Godwin abandoned the church, became an atheist, and went to London to earn his living as a writer. Political Justice was ostensibly a reply to Burke, though it came out three years after the Reflections, and was considerably more ambitious as a work of philosophy. Godwin was remarkably fortunate in the timing of its publication: on 21 January 1793 Louis XVI was guillotined; on 1 February the French National Assembly declared war on Britain; Britain entered the war on 11 February; and Political Justice was published three days later. For radicals it was a welcome rallying-cry at the moment when they felt most embattled. Because it was priced at £1.16s.0d. (the equivalent of £120 today), the government decided not to take Godwin to court, although the possibility was discussed. As Pitt declared, 'a three guinea book could never do much harm amongst those who had not three shillings to spare.' This was a miscalculation: the first edition was purchased by subscription and read aloud to meetings of working people; cheap pirated editions packed the booksellers' shops.

Godwin founded his vision of a better society in a philosophical belief in the moral perfectibility of mankind, attainable through the exercise of reason. When all were governed by rationality, he believed, human institutions, including that of marriage (which was derived from property laws), would wither away. He described a world stripped of property, social inequalities and political strife, which would justify his reputation as one of the first philosophical anarchists and proto-Marxists. His ideas may seem absurd today, but in 1793 they seemed to many to be the only logical response to the derailing of the Revolution under Robespierre. Among them was Wordsworth, recently returned from France; years later, he remembered that Godwinism had been a 'dream':

flattering to the young ingenuous mind
Pleased with extremes, and not the least with that
Which makes the human reason's naked self
The object of its fervour.

(Thirteen-Book Prelude × 815–18)

Wordsworth was for a time strongly attached to the ideas in Political Justice, perhaps because of its enormous faith in the powers of the individual (also a feature of his own thought). He regularly breakfasted with Godwin, whose ideas would influence Adventures on Salisbury Plain (1795), The Borderers (1797–9) and The Convict (1796–8), but soon tired of a creed that so emphatically denied the importance of the emotions. ‘There was the rub that made philosophy of so short life,’ Hazlitt wrote, ‘reason without passion’ (Wu vii 90). (Coleridge, by contrast, was consistently hostile to Godwinism because, as a devout Unitarian, he detested its atheism.)

For the moment, however, Godwin was one of the most influential radical thinkers of the day – never more so than during the treason trials of 1794. Increasingly alarmed by unrest at their increasingly repressive measures, the government tried a number of known radical sympathizers for treason – Thomas Hardy, John Horne Tooke and John Thelwall. Had they been found guilty they would have been hanged, drawn and quartered, and the government would have issued as many as 800 more arrest warrants. But Godwin intervened with an anonymous article in the Morning Chronicle entitled ‘Cursory Strictures on the Charge Delivered by Lord Chief Justice Eyre’ that was completely to alter the course of events. It dealt logically and calmly with the case against the beleaguered radicals, exposing it as completely unfounded. At that point it became impossible for the government successfully to pursue the case, and within days the first of the accused had been found not guilty. The others were discharged shortly after. It was a major victory for English radicals in the midst of an ongoing war with Pitt’s government.

Ten days after completing Political Justice, Godwin began writing a novel, Caleb Williams (1794), the plot of which effectively subverted the philosophy he had just explicated. But its achievement lies in that very fact: had it followed its original course, which was intended to illustrate Godwinian rationalism, it would have been a far less compelling and disturbing story. What he cannot have expected as he began it was that the characters would take on their own lives to the point at which they wrested control of the narrative from his grasp, turning it into one of the great fictional works in the language. The first psychological thriller we would recognize as such, it remains a powerful influence on fiction – not least his daughter’s Frankenstein (1818).¹ Godwin’s influence as a philosopher would continue into the nineteenth century (even on his son-in-law, Percy Bysshe Shelley), but none of his later writings had an impact equal to those published in the 1790s, and by the time Hazlitt published The Spirit of the Age in 1825 it could be said that Godwin ‘is to all intents and purposes dead and buried’ (Wu vii 87), even though he was still writing and publishing.

All the same, Godwin was a central figure in literary London for over four decades, during which time he came to know many of the writers in this book, and others besides. Although a product of the eighteenth century, his life and work place him in the centre of Romantic culture, on which he exerted a formative influence. Wordsworth, Coleridge,

Hazlitt and Lamb were all at various times close to him; he was the husband of Mary Wollstonecraft and the father of Mary Shelley, author of one of the greatest novels in the language. His diary documents meetings with many noteworthy figures of his time, and it has recently been edited, transcribed, and put online; see <http://godwindiary.politics.ox.ac.uk/>.

The extracts below come from the first edition of Political Justice, the one best known to Wordsworth and Coleridge. 'On Property' provides Godwin's most concise account of the world he would ideally like to live in; 'Love of Justice' outlines his belief that humanity is motivated by an innate sense of moral good; 'On Marriage' observes that marriage is a branch of the property system, and suggests that in a rational society propagation would be motivated not by lust but 'by the dictates of reason and duty'.

[On Property]

From Political Justice (2 vols, 1793)

Accumulated property treads the powers of thought in the dust, extinguishes the sparks of genius, and reduces the great mass of mankind to be immersed in sordid cares – beside depriving the rich (as we have already said) of the most salubrious and effectual motives to activity.

If superfluity were banished, the necessity for the greater part of the manual industry of mankind would be superseded, and the rest (being amicably shared among all the active and vigorous members of the community) would be burdensome to none. Every man would have a frugal yet wholesome diet; every man would go forth to that moderate exercise of his corporal functions that would give hilarity to the spirits – none would be made torpid with fatigue, but all would have leisure to cultivate the kindly and philanthropical¹ affections of the soul, and to let loose his faculties in the search of intellectual improvement.

What a contrast does this scene present us with the present state of human society, where the peasant and the labourer work till their understandings are benumbed with toil, their sinews contracted and made callous by being forever on the stretch, and their bodies invaded with infirmities and surrendered to an untimely grave! What is the fruit of this disproportioned and unceasing toil? At evening they return to a family, famished with hunger, exposed half-naked to the inclemencies of the sky, hardly sheltered, and denied the slenderest instruction (unless in a few instances, where it is dispensed by the hands of ostentatious charity, and the first lesson communicated is unprincipled servility). All this while their rich neighbour – but we visited him before.

[Love of Justice]

From Political Justice (2 vols, 1793)

All men love justice. All men are conscious that man is a being of one common nature, and feel the propriety of the treatment they receive from one another being measured by a common standard. Every man is desirous of assisting another, whether we should choose to ascribe this to an instinct implanted in his nature which renders this conduct a source of personal gratification, or to his perception of the reasonableness of such assistance. So necessary a part is this of the constitution of mind that no man perpetrates any action, however criminal, without having first invented some sophistry, some palliation, by which he proves to himself that it is best to be done.

Hence it appears that offence, the invasion of one man upon the security of another, is a thought alien to mind, and which nothing could have reconciled to us but the sharp sting of necessity. To consider merely the present order of human society, it is evident that the first offence must have been his who began a monopoly, and took advantage of the weakness of his neighbours to secure certain exclusive privileges to himself. The man on the other hand who determined to put an end to this monopoly, and who peremptorily demanded what was superfluous to the possessor and would be of extreme benefit to himself, appeared to his own mind to be merely avenging the violated laws of justice. Were it not for the plausibleness of this apology, it is to be presumed that there would be no such thing as crime in the world.

[On Marriage]

From Political Justice (2 vols, 1793)

It is absurd to expect that the inclinations and wishes of two human beings should coincide through any long period of time. To oblige them to act and to live together is to subject them to some inevitable portion of thwarting, bickering, and unhappiness. This cannot be otherwise so long as man has failed to reach the standard of absolute perfection. The supposition that I must have a companion for life is the result of a complication of vices. It is the dictate of cowardice, and not of fortitude. It flows from the desire of being loved and esteemed for something that is not desert.¹

But the evil of marriage as it is practised in European countries lies deeper than this. The habit is for a thoughtless and romantic youth of each sex to come together, to see each other for a few times and under circumstances full of delusion, and then to vow to each other eternal attachment.

What is the consequence of this? In almost every instance they find themselves deceived. They are reduced to make the best of an irretrievable mistake. They are presented with the strongest imaginable temptation to become the dupes of falsehood. They are led to conceive it their wisest policy to shut their eyes upon realities, happy if by any perversion of intellect they can persuade themselves that they were right in their first crude opinion of their companion. The institution of marriage is a system of fraud – and men who carefully mislead their judgements in the daily affairs of their life must always have a crippled judgement in every other concern.

We ought to dismiss our mistake as soon as it is detected, but we are taught to cherish it. We ought to be incessant in our search after virtue and worth, but we are taught to check our enquiry and shut our eyes upon the most attractive and admirable objects. Marriage is law, and the worst of all laws. Whatever our understandings may tell us of the person from whose connection we should derive the greatest improvement – of the worth of one woman and the demerits of another – we are obliged to consider what is law, and not what is justice.

Add to this that marriage is an affair of property, and the worst of all properties. So long as two human beings are forbidden by positive institution to follow the dictates of their own mind, prejudice is alive and vigorous. So long as I seek to engross one woman to myself, and to prohibit my neighbour from proving his superior desert and reaping the fruits of it, I am guilty of the most odious of all monopolies. Over this imaginary prize men watch with perpetual jealousy, and one man will find his desires and his capacity to circumvent as much excited, as the other is excited to traverse his projects and frustrate his hopes. As long as this state of society continues, philanthropy will be crossed and checked in a thousand ways, and the still augmenting stream of abuse will continue to flow.

The abolition of marriage will be attended with no evils. We are apt to represent it to ourselves as the harbinger of brutal lust and depravity. But it really happens (in this as in other cases) that the positive laws which are made to restrain our vices, irritate and multiply them – not to say that the same sentiments of justice and happiness which in a state of equal property would destroy the relish for luxury, would decrease our inordinate appetites of every kind, and lead us universally to prefer the pleasures of intellect to the pleasures of sense.

The intercourse² of the sexes will in such a state fall under the same system as any other species of friendship. Exclusively of all groundless and obstinate attachments, it will be impossible for me to live in the world without finding one man of a worth superior to that of any other whom I have an opportunity of observing. To this man I shall feel a kindness in exact proportion to my apprehension of his worth. The case will be precisely the same with respect to the female sex. I shall assiduously cultivate the intercourse of that woman whose accomplishments shall strike me in the most powerful manner. ‘But it may happen that other men will feel for her the same preference that I do’: this will create no difficulty. We may all enjoy her conversation, and we shall all be wise enough to consider the sensual intercourse as a very trivial object. This, like every other affair in which two persons are concerned, must be regulated in each successive instance by the unforced consent of either party.

It is a mark of the extreme depravity of our present habits that we are inclined to suppose the sensual intercourse any wise material to the advantages arising from the purest affection. Reasonable men now eat and drink not from the love of pleasure, but because eating and drinking are essential to our healthful existence. Reasonable men then will propagate their species not because a certain sensible pleasure is annexed to this action, but because it is right the species should be propagated. And the manner in which they exercise this function will be regulated by the dictates of reason and duty.

¹ Novels of our own time which betray Godwin’s influence include Melvyn Bragg, The Maid of Buttermere (1987).

Ann Yearsley (née Cromartie) (1756–1806)

In December 1784 the Gentleman's Magazine published a letter 'from a gentleman, residing on Clifton Hill near Bristol, to a friend in London, dated 30 November 1784':

We have a phenomenon upon this hill: a poor woman, about the age of thirty, who has led hitherto the painful life of a milkmaid; has shown the most pious cares to a mother lately deceased; has proved a most excellent wife to a husband of no vice, but of very little capacity; and who has taken, and still takes, the care of her five children. In the midst of so laborious and so anxious a life, her passion for books, that began at the age of five years, has been supported, and has enabled her to show a taste in poetry, particularly in blank verse.... Her countenance bespeaks sense. She is gifted with a clear voice, and, I believe, of much compass. She warbles wild notes in a style that makes me believe (though, indeed, I am no judge) that, with instruction, she might have become a siren.¹

Yearsley's passion for books may not have been supported by a formal education, but her brother taught her to read, and her mother borrowed books on her behalf. She married John Yearsley in June 1774 by whom, within six years, she had as many children. During this time she managed to read and write poetry, some of which found its way to Hannah More, the leavings from whose table provided scraps for Yearsley's pig. It was as a result of Hannah's patronage that the letter appeared in the Gentleman's Magazine and that, in April 1785, one of Yearsley's poems appeared in its pages with the note: 'A collection of the poems of this extraordinary woman has been advertised for publication, by a 5 shilling subscription.'² In the preface to Ann's first book, Hannah related her 'discovery', made after visiting Elizabeth Montagu in Berkshire:

On my return from Sandleford, a copy of verses was shown me, said to be written by a poor illiterate woman in this neighbourhood, who sells milk from door to door. The story did not engage my faith, but the verses excited my attention; for, though incorrect, they breathed the genuine spirit of poetry and were rendered still more interesting by a certain natural and strong expression of misery which seemed to fill the heart and mind of the author.³

With Montagu, Hannah organized a subscription list for Yearsley's Poems, on Several Occasions. It was an extraordinarily successful enterprise: over a thousand contributors were enrolled, including seven duchesses, sixteen countesses, Reynolds, Walpole, Burney and most of the Bluestocking set. Hannah even sent her protégée on tour to meet her society friends; as she told a correspondent: 'Do you know that my poor milkwoman has been sent for to Stoke, to visit the Duchess of Beaufort and the Duchess of Rutland; and to Bath, to Lady Spencer, Mrs Montagu, etc.? I hope all these honours will not turn her head, and indispose her for her humble occupations.'⁴

Yearsley's first volume was published in June 1785 to considerable acclaim, and it might have stood as an exemplar of the way in which women writers could help each other towards literary distinction in a male world were it not for the rapid souring of their friendship. Hannah had placed the subscription money in a trust fund and appointed herself and Elizabeth Montagu as its trustees in order to prevent Ann's husband from gaining access to it – effectively making Yearsley and her children dependent on More. Within a few months of the book's publication Yearsley's gratitude had turned to resentment. She agreed that she and her husband should not have access to the principal sum that had been collected, but thought they should get the interest, and wanted all the money divided among the children when they reached the age of 21. She told her side of the story in an 'Autobiographical Narrative' added to the fourth edition of her Poems in 1786. The literary world was shocked, and reviewers made great play with the hostilities between the two poets; the European Magazine reprinted all of the 'Narrative', commenting:

With good intentions, as we trust, on both sides, something appears to have been wanting. There seems to have been too much hauteur and too little delicacy on the part of the patroness, and perhaps too much jealousy and too little confidence on the part of the client. To use the words of Miss Betty More to Miss Yearsley, 'There is a manner in speaking', and, we may add, in acting, in which both the ladies seem to have erred.⁵

By reprinting all of the 'Narrative', the reviewer implicitly sided with Yearsley, and a number of others gave their support: 'if we are to believe what is here related, and we know not that it has ever been contradicted, Miss More's conduct to the poetical ward, since the first publication of her Poems, has cancelled every prior obligation, and what would otherwise have been deemed base ingratitude, and unwarrantable petulance, now appears a proper spirit, and just resentment.'⁶ There was bitterness on both sides. Hannah commented that 'vanity, luxury, idleness, and pride, have entered the cottage the moment poverty vanished',⁷ and told Mrs Montagu: 'Mrs Yearsley's conceit that you can envy her talents gives me comfort – for as it convinces me that she is mad, I build upon it a hope that she is not guilty in the all-seeing eye.'⁸ She and Montagu hung on as trustees for a while but were eventually persuaded to resign, and the money passed to Yearsley through various intermediaries.

By 1786 she had a new patron, Frederick Augustus Hervey, Bishop of Derry and Earl of Bristol, who contributed £50 towards the costs of the fourth edition of the Poems, and to whom she dedicated her Poem on the Inhumanity of the Slave-Trade (1788), presented here complete. This was an important moment, as it marked the beginning of the numerous laws that led to abolition. On 21 May 1788, Sir William Dolben proposed a Bill to the House of Commons that limited the number of slaves which could be transported from Africa to British colonies in the West Indies. There was a good deal of opposition even to this comparatively mild proposal. On 26 May merchants and inhabitants of Liverpool presented a petition to the House, saying that Dolben's Bill would cause them financial ruin; all the same, the Bill was passed in both Houses. Yearsley's poem on the slave trade was composed and published in direct competition with Hannah More's Slavery: A Poem (see pp. 69–76).

Yearsley had discovered within herself a fierce, passionate, independent voice that felt powerfully the pain of injustice, whether on a domestic or a political level. But the Poem on the Inhumanity of the Slave-Trade is also of its time, in so far as it contains many stylistic mannerisms which she had picked up from Milton and Young, whose work she knew well; this is what the Critical Review meant when it observed that it is ‘frequently rather turgid than sublime, but her sentiments are liberal, and often expressed with peculiar energy’.⁹

Another aspect of Yearsley’s political personality emerges in the poems she wrote after the execution of Louis XVI. Wordsworth’s response to this important moment in the French Revolution was to write a pamphlet in defence of regicide;¹⁰ Yearsley’s was to write a lament on behalf of ‘Ill-fated Louis’, whose slaughter she regarded as unjust. Shortly after, she composed a similar poem lamenting the imprisonment of Marie Antoinette, who was to be executed in October. Her attitude compares with that of Charlotte Smith in The Emigrants, also published in 1793 (see pp. 104–26), as against that of more committed radicals such as Helen Maria Williams. Both poems on the French royal family were sold at Ann’s circulating library, which she opened in 1793. Her final volume of poems was The Rural Lyre (1796), a sizeable collection which shows her deploying a variety of metres and stanza forms with considerable virtuosity; one of its subscribers was Charlotte Smith.

Addressed to Sensibility¹

From Poems on various subjects (1787)

Oh Sensibility! Thou busy nurse
Of inj’ries once received, why wilt thou feed
Those serpents in the soul, their stings more fell
Than those which writhed round Priam’s priestly son?²
I feel them here! They rend my panting breast, 5
But I will tear them thence – ah, effort vain!

Disturbed they grow rapacious, while their fangs
Strike at poor memory; wounded she deplores
Her ravished joys, and murmurs o'er the past.

Why shrinks my soul within these prison walls³ 10
Where wretches shake their chains? Ill-fated youth,
Why does thine eye run wildly o'er my form,
Pointed with fond enquiry? 'Tis not me
Thy restless thought would find; the silent tear
Steals gently down his cheek. Ah, could my arms 15
Afford thee refuge, I would bear thee hence
To a more peaceful dwelling! Vain the wish;
Thy pow'rs are all unhinged, and thou wouldst sit
Insensible to sympathy: farewell.
Lamented being, ever lost to hope, 20
I leave thee, yea, despair myself of cure.

For oh, my bosom bleeds, while griefs like thine
Increase the recent pang. Pensive I rove,
More wounded than the hart whose side yet holds
The deadly arrow. Friendship, boast no more 25
Thy hoard of joys o'er which my soul oft hung
Like the too-anxious miser o'er his gold.
My treasures all are wrecked; I quit the scene
Where haughty Insult cut the sacred ties
Which long had held us. Cruel Julius, take 30
My last adieu! The wound thou gav'st is death,
Nor canst e'en thou recall my frightened sense
With friendship's pleasing sound; yet will I clasp
Thy valued image to my aching mind,
And, viewing that, forgive thee; will deplore 35
The blow that severed two congenial souls!

Officious Sensibility, 'tis thine
To give the finest anguish, to dissolve
The dross of spirit till all essence, she
Refines on real woe; from thence extracts 40
Sad unexisting phantoms, never seen.

Yet, dear ideal mourner, be thou near
When on Lysander's⁴ tears I silent gaze;
Then, with thy viewless pencil, form his sigh,
His deepest groan, his sorrow-tinged thought, 45
Wish immature, impatience, cold despair,
With all the tort'ring images that play,
In sable hue, within his wasted mind.

And when this dreary group shall meet my thought,
Oh throw my pow'rs upon a fertile space 50
Where mingles ev'ry varied soft relief.
Without thee, I could offer but the dregs
Of vulgar consolation; from her cup
He turns the eye, nor dare it soil his lip!
Raise thou my friendly hand; mix thou the draught 55
More pure than ether, as ambrosia⁵ clear,
Fit only for the soul; thy chalice fill
With drops of sympathy, which swiftly fall
From my afflicted heart: yet – yet beware,
Nor stoop to seize from passion's warmer clime 60
A pois'nous sweet. Bright cherub, safely rove
Through all the deep recesses of the soul!
Float on her raptures, deeper tinge her woes,
Strengthen emotion, higher waft her sigh,
Sit in the tearful orb, and ardent gaze 65
On joy or sorrow. But thy empire ends
Within the line of spirit. My rough soul,
Oh Sensibility, defenceless hails
Thy feelings most acute. Yet ye who boast
Of bliss I ne'er must reach, ye who can fix 70
A rule for sentiment, if rules there are
(For much I doubt, my friends, if rule e'er held Capacious sentiment), ye sure can point
My mind to joys that never touched the heart.
What is this joy? Where does its essence rest? 75
Ah, self-confounding sophists, will ye dare

Pronounce that joy which never touched the heart?
Does education give the transport keen,
Or swell your vaunted grief? No, nature feels
Most poignant, undefended; hails with me 80
The pow'rs of Sensibility untaught.

Addressed to Sensibility

² Priam's priestly son a reference to Laocoön, Trojan priest of Apollo, who attempted to dissuade the Trojans from admitting the wooden horse. For this, his sons were killed by sea-serpents, and he died in extreme agony while trying to save them.

³ 'Bedlam' (Yearsley's note). The Hospital of St Mary of Bethlehem in London opened as a hospital for lunatics in 1402. As Yearsley indicates, treatment of the insane was, in the eighteenth century, little different from that of convicts.

⁴ Lysander is a classical name for an inmate of Bedlam.

⁵ ambrosia in Greek myth, the food of gods and immortals.

A Poem on the Inhumanity of the Slave- Trade (1788)¹

*Go seek the soul refined and strong:
Such aids my wildest pow'r of song:*

For those I strike the rustic lyre

*Who share the transports they inspire.*²

*To the Right Hon. and Right Revd Frederick, Earl of Bristol, Bishop of Derry,*³*etc., etc.*

My Lord,

Being convinced that your ideas of justice and humanity are not confined to one race of men,⁴ I have endeavoured to lead you to the Indian coast. My intention is not to cause that anguish in your bosom which powerless compassion ever gives; yet my vanity is flattered when I but fancy that your Lordship feels as I do.

With the highest reverence, I am,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's much obliged,

And obedient servant,

ANN YEARSLEY

Bristol, thine heart hath throbb'd to glory: slaves,
E'en Christian slaves, have shook their chains, and gazed

With wonder and amazement on thee.⁵ Hence,
Ye grov'ling souls, who think the term I give
Of Christian slave, a paradox! To you 5
I do not turn, but leave you to conception
Narrow; with that be blessed, nor dare to stretch
Your shackled souls along the course of freedom.

Yet, Bristol, list! nor deem Lactilla's⁶ soul
Lessened by distance; snatch her rustic thought, I0
Her crude ideas, from their panting state,
And let them fly in wide expansion; lend
Thine energy, so little understood
By the rude million, and I'll dare the strain
Of Heav'n-born Liberty till Nature moves I5
Obedient to her voice. Alas, my friend,
Strong rapture dies within the soul, while pow'r
Drags on his bleeding victims. Custom, law,

Ye blessings and ye curses of mankind,
What evils do ye cause? We feel enslaved, 20
Yet move in your direction. Custom, thou
Wilt preach up filial piety; thy sons
Will groan, and stare with impudence at heav'n,
As if they did abjure the act, where Sin
Sits full on Inhumanity; the church 25
They fill with mouthing, vap'rous sighs and tears,
Which, like the guileful crocodile's, oft fall,
Nor fall but at the cost of human bliss.

 Custom, thou hast undone us, led us far
From godlike probity, from truth, and heaven. 30

 But come, ye souls who feel for human woe,
Though dressed in savage guise! Approach, thou son,
Whose heart would shudder at a father's chains,
And melt o'er thy loved brother as he lies
Gasping in torment undeserved. Oh sight 35
Horrid and insupportable, far worse
Than an immediate, an heroic death!

Yet to this sight I summon thee. Approach,
Thou slave of avarice, that canst see the maid
Weep o'er her inky sire! Spare me, thou God 40
Of all-indulgent mercy, if I scorn

This gloomy wretch, and turn my tearful eye
To more enlightened beings. Yes, my tear
Shall hang on the green furze, like pearly dew
Upon the blossom of the morn. My song 45

Shall teach sad Philomel a louder note,
When Nature swells her woe. O'er suff'ring man
My soul with sorrow bends! Then come, ye few
Who feel a more than cold, material essence;
Here ye may vent your sighs, till the bleak north 50
Find its adherents aided. Ah, no more!

The dingy youth comes on, sullen in chains;
He smiles on the rough sailor who aloud
Strikes at the spacious heav'n, the earth, the sea,

In breath too blasphemous – yet not to him 55
Blasphemous, for he dreads not either. Lost
In dear internal imag'ry, the soul
Of Indian Luco rises to his eyes,
Silent, not inexpressive; the strong beams
With eager wildness yet drink in the view 60
Of his too-humble home where he had left
His mourning father and his Incilanda.

Curse on the toils spread by a Christian hand
To rob the Indian of his freedom! Curse
On him who from a bending parent steals 65
His dear support of age, his darling child –
Perhaps a son, or a more tender daughter –
Who might have closed his eyelids as the spark
Of life gently retired. Oh thou poor world,
Thou fleeting good to individuals! See 70
How much for thee they care, how wide they ope
Their helpless arms to clasp thee! Vapour thou,
More swift than passing wind! Thou leav'st them nought
Amid th' unreal scene, but a scant grave.

I know the crafty merchant will oppose 75
The plea of nature to my strain, and urge
His toils are for his children; the soft plea
Dissolves my soul – but when I sell a son,
Thou God of nature, let it be my own!

Behold that Christian! See what horrid joy 80
Lights up his moody features, while he grasps
The wished-for gold, purchase of human blood!
Away, thou seller of mankind! Bring on
Thy daughter to this market, bring thy wife,
Thine aged mother (though of little worth), 85
With all thy ruddy boys! Sell them, thou wretch,
And swell the price of Luco! Why that start?
Why gaze as thou wouldst fright me from my challenge
With look of anguish? Is it nature strains
Thine heart-strings at the image? Yes, my charge 90

Is full against her, and she rends thy soul,
While I but strike upon thy pitiless ear,
Fearing her rights are violated. Speak,
Astound the voice of Justice! Bid thy tears
Melt the unpitying pow'r, while thus she claims 95
The pledges of thy love. Oh, throw thine arm
Around thy little ones, and loudly plead
Thou canst not sell thy children. Yet beware
Lest Luco's groan be heard; should that prevail,
Justice will scorn thee in her turn, and hold 100
Thine act against thy pray'r. 'Why clasp', she cries,
'That blooming youth? Is it because thou lov'st him?'
Why, Luco was beloved: then wilt thou feel,
Thou selfish Christian, for thy private woe,
Yet cause such pangs to him that is a father? 105
Whence comes thy right to barter for thy fellows?
Where are thy statutes? Whose the iron pen
That gave thee precedent? Give me the seal
Of virtue or religion for thy trade,
And I will ne'er upbraid thee; but if force 110
Superior, hard brutality alone
Become thy boast, hence to some savage haunt,
Nor claim protection from my social laws.

Luco is gone; his little brothers weep,
While his fond mother climbs the hoary rock 115
Whose point o'erhangs the main. No Luco there,
No sound, save the hoarse billows. On she roves,
With love, fear, hope, holding alternate rage
In her too-anxious bosom. Dreary main!
Thy murmurs now are riot, while she stands 120
List'ning to ev'ry breeze, waiting the step
Of gentle Luco. Ah return, return,
Too hapless mother; thy indulgent arms
Shall never clasp thy fettered Luco more.
See Incilanda – artless maid, my soul 125
Keeps pace with thee and mourns. Now o'er the hill

She creeps, with timid foot, while Sol embrowns
The bosom of the isle, to where she left
Her faithful lover: here the well-known cave,
By nature formed amid the rock, endears I30
The image of her Luco; here his pipe,
Formed of the polished cane, neglected lies,
No more to vibrate; here the useless dart,
The twanging bow, and the fierce panther's skin,
Salute the virgin's eye. But where is Luco? I35
He comes not down the steep though he had vowed,
When the sun's beams at noon should sidelong gild
The cave's wide entrance, he would swift descend
To bless his Incilanda. Ten pale moons
Had glided by, since to his generous breast I40
He clasped the tender maid and whispered love.

Oh mutual sentiment, thou dang'rous bliss,
So exquisite that Heav'n had been unjust
Had it bestowed less exquisite of ill;
When thou art held no more, thy pangs are deep, I45
Thy joys convulsive to the soul; yet all
Are meant to smooth th' uneven road of life.

For Incilanda, Luco ranged the wild,
Holding her image to his panting heart;
For her he strained the bow, for her he stripped I50
The bird of beauteous plumage – happy hour,
When with these guiltless trophies he adorned
The brow of her he loved. Her gentle breast
With gratitude was filled, nor knew she aught
Of language strong enough to paint her soul, I55
Or ease the great emotion, whilst her eye
Pursued the gen'rous Luco to the field
And glowed with rapture at his wished return.

Ah sweet suspense, betwixt the mingled cares
Of friendship, love, and gratitude – so mixed, I60
That ev'n the soul may cheat herself. Down, down,
Intruding memory! Bid thy struggles cease

At this soft scene of innate war. What sounds
Break on her ear? She, starting, whispers 'Luco?'
Be still, fond maid; list to the tardy step I65
Of leaden-footed woe. A father comes,
But not to seek his son who, from the deck,
Had breathed a last adieu; no, he shuts out
The soft, fallacious gleam of hope, and turns
Within upon the mind. Horrid and dark I70
Are his wild, unenlightened pow'rs; no ray
Of forced philosophy to calm his soul,
But all the anarchy of wounded nature.
Now he arraigns his country's gods, who sit,
In his bright fancy, far beyond the hills, I75
Unriveting the chains of slaves; his heart
Beats quick with stubborn fury, while he doubts
Their justice to his child. Weeping old man,
Hate not a Christian's God, whose record holds
Thine injured Luco's name. Frighted he starts, I80
Blasphemes the deity whose altars rise
Upon the Indian's helpless neck, and sinks,
Despising comfort, till by grief and age
His angry spirit is forced out. Oh guide,
Ye angel-forms, this joyless shade to worlds I85
Where the poor Indian, with the sage, is proved
The work of a Creator. Pause not here,
Distracted maid! Ah, leave the breathless form
On whose cold cheek thy tears so swiftly fall,
Too unavailing! 'On this stone', she cries, I90
'My Luco sat, and to the wand'ring stars
Pointed my eye, while from his gentle tongue
Fell old traditions of his country's woe.'
Where now shall Incilanda seek him? Hence,
Defenceless mourner, ere the dreary night I95
Wrap thee in added horror. Oh despair,
How eagerly thou rend'st the heart! She pines
In anguish deep and sullen: Luco's form

Pursues her, lives in restless thought, and chides
Soft consolation. Banished from his arms, 200
She seeks the cold embrace of death; her soul
Escapes in one sad sigh. Too hapless maid! –
Yet happier far than he thou lov’dst; his tear,
His sigh, his groan avail not, for they plead
Most weakly with a Christian. Sink, thou wretch, 205
Whose act shall on the cheek of Albion’s sons
Throw shame’s red blush; thou who hast frightened far
Those simple wretches from thy God, and taught
Their erring minds to mourn his partial love,⁷
Profusely poured on thee, while they are left 210
Neglected to thy mercy. Thus deceived,
How doubly dark must be their road to death!

Luco is borne around the neighb’ring isles,
Losing the knowledge of his native shore
Amid the pathless wave, destined to plant 215
The sweet luxuriant cane.⁸ He strives to please,
Nor once complains, but greatly smothers grief.
His hands are blistered, and his feet are worn,
Till ev’ry stroke dealt by his mattock⁹ gives
Keen agony to life; while from his breast 220
The sigh arises, burdened with the name
Of Incilanda. Time inures the youth,
His limbs grow nervous, strained by willing toil,
And resignation, or a calm despair
(Most useful either) lulls him to repose. 225

A Christian renegade that from his soul
Abjures the tenets of our schools, nor dreads
A future punishment, nor hopes for mercy,
Had fled from England to avoid those laws
Which must have made his life a retribution 230
To violated justice, and had gained,
By fawning guile, the confidence (ill-placed)
Of Luco’s master. O’er the slave he stands

With knotted whip, lest fainting nature shun
The task too arduous, while his cruel soul 235
Unnat'ral, ever feeds, with gross delight,
Upon his suff'rings. Many slaves there were,
But none who could suppress the sigh and bend
So quietly as Luco. Long he bore
The stripes that from his manly bosom drew 240
The sanguine stream (too little prized); at length
Hope fled his soul, giving her struggles o'er,
And he resolved to die. The sun had reached
His zenith; pausing faintly, Luco stood,
Leaning upon his hoe, while mem'ry brought, 245
In piteous imag'ry, his aged father,
His poor fond mother, and his faithful maid.
The mental group in wildest motion set
Fruitless imagination. Fury, grief,
Alternate shame, the sense of insult, all 250
Conspire to aid the inward storm – yet words
Were no relief; he stood in silent woe.

Gorgon, remorseless Christian, saw the slave
Stand musing mid the ranks and, stealing soft
Behind the studious Luco, struck his cheek 255
With a too-heavy whip that reached his eye,
Making it dark for ever. Luco turned
In strongest agony, and with his hoe
Struck the rude Christian on the forehead. Pride,
With hateful malice, seized on Gorgon's soul, 260
By nature fierce, while Luco sought the beach
And plunged beneath the wave. But near him lay
A planter's barge, whose seamen grasped his hair,
Dragging to life a wretch who wished to die.

Rumour now spreads the tale, while Gorgon's breath 265
Envenomed aids her blast. Imputed crimes
Oppose the plea of Luco, till he scorns
Even a just defence, and stands prepared.
The planters, conscious that to fear alone

They owe their cruel pow'r, resolve to blend 270
New torment with the pangs of death, and hold
Their victims high in dreadful view, to fright
The wretched number left. Luco is chained
To a huge tree, his fellow-slaves are ranged
To share the horrid sight; fuel is placed 275
In an increasing train, some paces back,
To kindle slowly, and approach the youth,
With more than native terror. See, it burns!
He gazes on the growing flame, and calls
For 'Water, water!' The small boon's denied. 280
E'en Christians throng each other to behold
The different alterations of his face
As the hot death approaches. (Oh shame, shame
Upon the followers of Jesus! Shame
On him that dares avow a God!) He writhes, 285
While down his breast glide the unpitied tears,
And in their sockets strain their scorched balls.
'Burn, burn me quick! I cannot die!' he cries,
'Bring fire more close!' The planters heed him not,
But still prolonging Luco's torture, threat 290
Their trembling slaves around. His lips are dry,
His senses seem to quiver ere they quit
His frame for ever, rallying strong, then driv'n
From the tremendous conflict. Sight no more
Is Luco's, his parched tongue is ever mute; 295
Yet in his soul his Incilanda stays,
Till both escape together. Turn, my muse,
From this sad scene; lead Bristol's milder soul
To where the solitary spirit roves,
Wrapped in the robe of innocence, to shades 300
Where pity breathing in the gale dissolves
The mind, when fancy paints such real woe.

Now speak, ye Christians (who for gain enslave
A soul like Luco's, tearing her from joy
In life's short vale – and if there be a hell, 305

As ye believe, to that ye thrust her down,
A blind, involuntary victim), where
Is your true essence of religion? Where
Your proofs of righteousness, when ye conceal
The knowledge of the Deity from those 310
Who would adore him fervently? Your God
Ye rob of worshippers, his altars keep
Unhailed, while driving from the sacred font
The eager slave, lest he should hope in Jesus.

Is this your piety? Are these your laws, 315
Whereby the glory of the Godhead spreads
O'er barb'rous climes? Ye hypocrites, disown
The Christian name, nor shame its cause; yet where Shall souls like yours find welcome? Would the Turk,
Pagan, or wildest Arab, ope their arms 320
To gain such proselytes? No. He that owns
The name of Mussulman¹⁰ would start, and shun
Your worse than serpent touch; he frees his slave
Who turns to Mahomet.¹¹ The Spaniard stands 325
Your brighter contrast; he condemns the youth
For ever to the mine, but ere the wretch
Sinks to the deep domain, the hand of Faith
Bathes his faint temples in the sacred stream,
Bidding his spirit hope.¹² Briton, dost thou
Act up to this? If so, bring on thy slaves 330
To Calv'ry's mount, raise high their kindred souls
To him who died to save them:¹³ this alone
Will teach them calmly to obey thy rage,
And deem a life of misery but a day,
To long eternity. Ah, think how soon 335
Thine head shall on earth's dreary pillow lie
With thy poor slaves, each silent, and unknown
To his once furious neighbour. Think how swift
The sands of time ebb out, for him and thee.

Why groans that Indian youth, in burning chains 340
 Suspended o'er the beach? The lab'ring sun
 Strikes from his full meridian on the slave
 Whose arms are blistered by the heated iron
 Which, still corroding, seeks the bone. What crime
 Merits so dire a death? Another gasps 345
 With strongest agony, while life declines
 From recent amputation.¹⁴ Gracious God!
 Why thus in mercy let thy whirlwinds sleep
 O'er a vile race of Christians, who profane
 Thy glorious attributes? Sweep them from earth, 350
 Or check their cruel pow'r; the savage tribes
 Are angels when compared to brutes like these.
 Advance, ye Christians, and oppose my strain;
 Who dares condemn it? Prove from laws divine,
 From deep philosophy, or social love, 355
 That ye derive your privilege. I scorn
 The cry of Av'rice, or the trade that drains
 A fellow-creature's blood; bid Commerce plead
 Her public good, her nation's many wants,
 Her sons thrown idly on the beach, forbade 360
 To seize the image of their God and sell it.
 I'll hear her voice, and Virtue's hundred tongues
 Shall sound against her. Hath our public good
 Fell rapine¹⁵ for its basis? Must our wants
 Find their supply in murder? Shall the sons 365
 Of Commerce shiv'ring stand, if not employed
 Worse than the midnight robber? Curses fall
 On the destructive system that shall need
 Such base supports! Doth England need them? No;
 Her laws, with prudence, hang the meagre thief 370
 That from his neighbour steals a slender sum,
 Though famine drove him on. O'er him the priest,
 Beneath the fatal tree,¹⁶ laments the crime,
 Approves the law, and bids him calmly die.

Say, doth this law that dooms the thief protect 375
The wretch who makes another's life his prey,
By hellish force to take it at his will?
Is this an English law, whose guidance fails
When crimes are swelled to magnitude so vast,
That Justice dare not scan them? Or does Law 380
Bid Justice an eternal distance keep
From England's great tribunal, when the slave
Calls loud on Justice only? Speak, ye few
Who fill Britannia's senate, and are deemed
The fathers of your country! Boast your laws, 385
Defend the honour of a land so fall'n
That Fame from ev'ry battlement is flown,
And heathens start e'en at a Christian's name.

Hail, social love!¹⁷ True soul of order, hail!
Thy softest emanations – pity, grief, 390
Lively emotion, sudden joy, and pangs
Too deep for language – are thy own: then rise,
Thou gentle angel! Spread thy silken wings
O'er drowsy man, breathe in his soul, and give
Her godlike pow'rs thy animating force 395
To banish inhumanity. Oh loose
The fetters of his mind, enlarge his views,
Break down for him the bound of avarice, lift
His feeble faculties beyond a world
To which he soon must prove a stranger! Spread 400
Before his ravished eye the varied tints
Of future glory; bid them live to Fame
Whose banners wave for ever. Thus inspired,
All that is great, and good, and sweetly mild,
Shall fill his noble bosom. He shall melt – 405
Yea, by thy sympathy unseen, shall feel
Another's pang; for the lamenting maid
His heart shall heave a sigh; with the old slave
(Whose head is bent with sorrow) he shall cast

His eye back on the joys of youth, and say, 410
 ‘Thou once couldst feel, as I do, love’s pure bliss;
 Parental fondness, and the dear returns
 Of filial tenderness were thine, till torn
 From the dissolving scene.’ Oh, social love,
 Thou universal good, thou that canst fill 415
 The vacuum of immensity, and live
 In endless void! Thou that in motion first
 Set’st the long lazy atoms, by thy force
 Quickly assimilating, and restrained
 By strong attraction – touch the soul of man; 420
 Subdue him; make a fellow-creature’s woe
 His own by heartfelt sympathy, whilst wealth
 Is made subservient to his soft disease.
 And when thou hast to high perfection wrought
 This mighty work, say, ‘Such is Bristol’s soul.’ 425

A Poem on the Inhumanity of the Slave-Trade

¹ This poem was published in competition with Hannah More’s Slavery: A Poem (see p. 69), and was inspired by Sir William Dolben’s Bill.

² The source of the epigraph is not known; Yearsley may have written it herself.

³ Frederick Augustus Hervey, 4th Earl of Bristol and 5th Baron Howard de Walden, Bishop of Derry (1730–1803), very active in Irish politics, was Yearsley’s patron.

⁴ i.e. the Irish.

⁵ Bristol was deeply implicated in the slave trade. For years it had been one of the main ports which handled newly arrived slaves from abroad.

⁶ Lactilla name for a milkmaid.

7 ‘Indians have been often heard to say, in their complaining moments, “God Almighty no love us well; he be good to buckera; he bid buckera burn us; he no burn buckera” ’ (Yearsley’s note). ‘Buckera’, Yearsley explains in a further note, means ‘white man’.

8 cane sugar-cane.

9 mattock tool for loosening hard ground.

10 Mussulman Muslim.

11 ‘The Turk gives freedom to his slave on condition that he embraces Mahometism’ (Yearsley’s note).

12 ‘The Spaniard, immediately on purchasing an Indian, gives him baptism’ (Yearsley’s note).

13 him who died to save them Christ, crucified on Calvary.

14 ‘A Coromantin slave in Jamaica (who had frequently escaped to the mountains) was, a few years since, doomed to have his leg cut off. A young practitioner from England (after the surgeon of the estate had refused to be an executioner) undertook the operation, but after the removal of the limb, on the slave’s exclaiming, “You buckera! God Almighty made dat leg; you cut it off! You put it on again?” was so shocked, that the other surgeon was obliged to take up the vessels, apply the dressings, etc. The negro suffered without a groan, called for his pipe, and calmly smoked till the absence of his attendant gave him an opportunity of tearing off his bandages, when he bled to death in an instant. Many will call this act of the negro’s stubbornness; under such circumstances, I dare give it a more glorious epithet, and that is fortitude’ (Yearsley’s note). Coromantin slaves came from the eastern coast of Madras.

15 rapine plunder, robbery.

¹⁶ fatal tree from which he is to be hanged.

¹⁷ Hail, social love! Moira Ferguson suggests that in this final apostrophe to social love, Yearsley implicitly criticizes Hannah More for religious hypocrisy and lack of love.

William Blake (1757–1827)

He was a native Londoner, one of seven children born to a London hosier, James Blake, and his wife, Catherine Hermitage, on 28 November 1757 in Soho, London. They were Dissenting Whigs (James Blake voted for Charles James Fox), and seem to have given Blake and his siblings a pious and devout upbringing. All the same, the Blake children had some odd propensities. His older brother claimed to have encountered Moses and Abraham, and young Blake was almost beaten by his father for saying he had seen angels in the treetops on Peckham Rye. On another occasion he said he had seen the prophet Ezekiel beneath a tree and was beaten by his mother for it.

Blake's formal education began at the age of 10 when he was sent to Henry Pars's Drawing School in the Strand to become a draughtsman. At 14 he was apprenticed to James Basire, engraver to the Society of Antiquaries. During the next seven years he learnt the basic skills that would provide him with a living – etching onto prepared copperplates. Through the authors who passed through Basire's workshop, Blake also became acquainted with the natural sciences, philology and archaeology. At this period he was also inducted into the English Gothic tradition, partly by drawing the monuments in Westminster Abbey. There he saw a vision of monks, priests, choristers and censer-bearers marching in procession. Blake began his career as a journeyman copy engraver in 1779, at the same time enrolling at the Royal Academy of Arts to train as an artist. His many sketches of classical sculpture indicate he wanted to be a 'historical' painter.

The summer of 1780 is famous for the Gordon Riots, an anti-Catholic demonstration whipped up by Protestant sectarians in London. Blake found himself embroiled in them, and witnessed the burning of Newgate Prison. At around this time, Blake befriended Catherine Boucher, the daughter of a market-gardener, and married her on 18 August 1782 at the Church of St Mary, Battersea. Soon after, they moved into 23 Green Street, near Leicester Square. Though childless, the marriage was a close one, and would serve both partners well throughout their lives.

His first volume of poems, Poetical Sketches (1783), was the first and last to use traditional letterpress; from then on his books were produced using his own 'infernal' printing method with which he experimented when producing All Religions Are One and There Is No Natural Religion, etched around 1788. He would inscribe design and text, in reverse, directly onto a copper plate using a varnish resistant to the acid bath into which it would be immersed.¹ Once the plate was removed, the areas left in relief could be inked and printed with low pressure. Each page was individually watercoloured by him or his wife: by this method no two books were identical. He did not care that they could not be mass produced; the gain in artistic control was worth it. No other technique would have allowed him so completely to shape the reading experience. Because each character of each word was the work of his own hand, it was susceptible to variation and emphasis as he saw fit. He was also in charge of page layout – integral to the meaning of the work, as it incorporated ornament and illustration that complemented or counterpointed the text. Indeed, the interweaving of word and image is essential to a full understanding of his poems and prophecies; serious readers will wish to make use of the Blake Trust / Tate Gallery editions (listed under 'Further Reading', p. 180), which combine colour reproductions of his books with detailed commentaries.

It is worth bearing in mind that, although known today for his own works, Blake depended for an income on his commercial labours, which used traditional printing methods, commissioned by publishers such as Joseph Johnson. Johnson engaged Blake to illustrate works by Mary Wollstonecraft and Erasmus Darwin, and introduced Blake to Henry Fuseli, the volatile Swiss-German artist, as well as Thomas Paine and Joseph Priestley. An apocryphal story has it that Blake warned Paine of his imminent arrest in 1792.

Thel (1789) is a sustained attempt to examine the 'fall' into the physical world and sexual experience. Only Blake would have approached such a subject through a narrative that concerns a girl's encounters with a curious series of characters – lily, cloud, clod of clay, and worm – loaded with allegorical significance never precisely spelt out. Much hinges on the virgin's return to the Vales of Har, which signifies reluctance to submit to the descent into experience. Some readers take this to reflect badly on her, while others question the advice dispensed by those she encounters. Thel is a good place to begin one's study of Blake's way of thinking: it takes us into a world in which, as in life, judgements as to meaning and morality are anything but straightforward. The parallel world, fall from grace, and concern with sexual initiation are to be revisited subsequently.

Songs of Innocence (1789) and its companion volume, Songs of Experience (1794), contain Blake's most popular and influential poems. Although their titles imply a binary opposition, Blake was resistant to easy formulations, and it is typical that when producing joint copies of Songs of Innocence and of Experience, he transferred poems from one to the other. Moreover, it is possible to read such works as 'Holy Thursday' (Innocence) ironically, just as its corresponding poem in Experience can be read with positive connotations. Rather than assuming some kind of thematic opposition (which Blake would have disavowed), it is more appropriate to think of the two groups as engaging in dialogue.

'Every child may joy to hear', Blake wrote – but though composed for children, the Songs contain some sophisticated verse. Blakean innocence entails a complex mixture of qualities including unfettered energy, simplicity, love and spontaneity. Steering clear of sin and divine punishment (often incorporated into didactic works aimed at children), such poems as 'The Lamb' and 'Spring' emphasize the intensity and purity of childhood vision, laying emphasis on the god-like qualities in man. There is a political subtext too: publication of Innocence in 1789 coincided with the beginning of the Revolution in France; Experience with the events that led to the execution of Louis XVI and the Reign of Terror. This is most obvious in 'London', 'Holy Thursday' (Experience) and 'The Chimney Sweeper' (Experience), which are primarily works of social and political protest.

When in the early 1790s he reconceived the two volumes of Songs as a single one, he composed a motto which in the end he decided not to use:

The good are attracted by men's perceptions,
And think not for themselves –
Till experience teaches them to catch
And to cage the fairies and elves.

And then the knave begins to snarl,
And the hypocrite to howl –
And all his good friends show their private ends,
And the eagle is known from the owl.

It may have been grief at the death of his brother Robert that impelled Blake to study the writings of Emanuel Swedenborg, the theologian and philosopher who theorized that the spirits of the dead rise from the body and assume physical form in another world. Though Swedish, Swedenborg died in London in 1772, when he was 84 and Blake 14. Such was the popularity of his work that, in the 1780s, his followers formed the New Church, or Church of the New Jerusalem (which continues today). A visionary who conversed with angels and spirits, Swedenborg's brand of religion for a short while possessed a powerful appeal for Blake, who identified with his spiritual experiences. Moreover, Swedenborg was capable of remarking that 'God is a man, all angels and spirits are men in a perfect form' – the kind of sentiment that recurs in Blake's writings (see Plate 5).

As time went on, the Swedenborgian faith became increasingly institutionalized. It ordained ministers with their own robes and rituals, and was taken over by conservatives who pledged loyalty to king and country, adhering to such doctrines as predestination (in favour of which Swedenborg had written). Blake quickly became disillusioned, and a year after joining scribbled in his copy of Swedenborg's Divine Providence: 'Lies and Priestcraft', 'Predestination . . . more abominable than Calvin's' and 'Cursed Folly!' He came to loathe the systematizing tendencies of all religious beliefs, and composed a satire on Swedenborgianism, The Marriage of Heaven and Hell (which echoes the title of Swedenborg's own Heaven and Hell).

The argument of the Marriage is that Swedenborg, though pretending to the status of a radical, had become a stooge for the forces of reaction. This is most explicitly articulated in Plate 11, where Blake explains how the systems generated by institutionalized religions exiled the true poets of ancient times who were also, by implication, true priests; the result has been to make people forget that 'All deities reside in the human breast'. Despite appearances to the contrary, he argues, Swedenborg is a type of the kind of clerical impostor. Blake aims to prove this by imitating his literary mannerisms, such as the 'correspondences' and 'memorable relations', in order to expose the underlying complacency of his thought. To this end, Blake condenses Swedenborgian ideas and literary techniques in a helter-skelter manner, producing a comically distorted version of them. For instance, the title of Blake's work echoes Swedenborg's opposition of heaven and hell, proposing a relationship that most theologians would have found either inappropriate or nonsensical.

Being of an older generation than other major poets of the Romantic period, as well as an exception to many of the defining features singled out by commentators, Blake was for years regarded as a madman operating outside the normal boundaries of literature. As late as the 1950s, it was possible to teach a course on Romanticism without mentioning him. All that has changed, and if Blake has a claim to be regarded not just as a Romantic, but as a herald of the movement, it is never stronger than in the Marriage, when he declares his faith in a spiritual world: 'If the doors of perception were cleansed, everything would appear to man as it is: Infinite' (Plate 14). Neither Wordsworth nor Coleridge read those words at the time they were written, but had they done so, they would probably have been exhilarated by the politicizing of its message in 'A Song of Liberty' (Plate 25), the great apocalyptic finale of the Marriage, which some scholars suggest originated as a separate work. Even if they are right, it resolves the Marriage in a way that could not be more appropriate – extending Blake's argument into the historical moment, whereby he finds the 'outing' of such false prophets as Swedenborg (and, more generally, institutionalized religions as a whole) to be liberating on a spiritual plane and on the ideological: as the harbinger of worldwide revolution. Imagination is thus seen not just as the agent of artistic creation, but as the vehicle of revolutionary change in the 'real' world.

In autumn 1790 the Blakes moved to Lambeth in south London, where they produced a series of books now referred to as the Lambeth prophecies, which include Visions of the Daughters of Albion (1793). This work takes us straight into Blake's mythical universe. On her way to her beloved Theotormon, Oothoon is raped by Bromion. Having impregnated her, he casts her off; they are nonetheless bound back to back. Theotormon refuses to marry her, and sits weeping on the threshold of Bromion's cave. The rest of the poem consists of their lamentations. Thematically, it extends Blake's preoccupation with the journey from innocence to experience in Thel, but the obvious distinction is that where Thel retreats from the body and all it entails, returning to the Vales of Har, Oothoon accepts it. The extent to which Oothoon is a feminist or a tool of the male ideology remains a bone of contention among critics. All the same, it is worth bearing in mind that Blake probably knew Mary Wollstonecraft² and would have read her Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792). He may even have been aware of her proposal to Henry Fuseli's wife that she move into their home and form a platonic ménage à trois, a scenario that may have inspired aspects of the Visions.

While working on Visions of the Daughters, Blake continued to pursue his career as an engraver, supplying a number of illustrations to John Gabriel Stedman's Narrative of a Five Years' Expedition against the Revolted Negroes of Surinam (1796), one of the best known of which is an image of a captured black man hanging by the ribs from a gallows. Stedman's text left its mark on Visions of the Daughters: Bromion is a slave-owner – 'Stamped with my signet are the swarthy children of the sun' (line 29) – and Theotormon hears the 'voice of slaves' (line 39). For Blake the plight of women and slaves was the result of the failure to comprehend fully what the eye sees.

In each of these books, Blake worries at the nagging question: why did God permit the Fall? He attempts an answer in The Book of Urizen (1794), which contains the kernel of the mythology elaborated in subsequent works such as Jerusalem, Milton and The Four Zoas. Urizen was Blake's first attempt to rewrite the Scriptures,³ and it is on one level a parody of Genesis. His central innovation is to postulate a primal unity before the act of creation when heaven and earth were one. The Fall thus occurs concurrently with the creation of the known universe, rather than at the later stage claimed by the Bible and Milton. In Blake's retelling, the act of creation – 'An activity unknown and horrible' – cannot avoid destroying an original unity more perfect than anything generated by its breakdown. Creation of the physical world is only the first in a series of repressive acts responsible for enslavement of the human spirit. It culminates with the imposition of a tyranny Blake's readers understood only too well: 'One king, one God, one law.'

The myth is rehearsed three times. In the first, Urizen's story is told beginning at the moment he splits off from 'eternity' (chapter I). In the second, Urizen recalls the moment before creation as 'The heavens / Awoke' (chapter II). After creation of Los (and Death), the 'changes of Urizen' are codified as a series of 'Ages' in a parody of the Bible. During the course of what follows, time, institutionalized religion, and the human body itself are seen as different kinds of tyranny imposed on humanity in the aftermath of the Fall. If Blake's sceptical attitude towards the Bible seems extreme, it is as well to bear in mind that he was one of a number of radicals (including Paine) who questioned the political and social control exercised by government and clergy through biblical texts; as David Worrall contends, Urizen is one of Blake's 'most politically interventionist works of the 1790s'.

Blake would compose other visionary works, including Vala, or the Four Zoas (first version, 1797, revised 1802, 1807), Milton (1804–?8) and Jerusalem (1804–?20), none of which has the clarity or (comparative) simplicity of Urizen. They are all, nonetheless, masterpieces, and should be read complete – preferably in the Blake Trust editions, which reproduce the plates.

Blake encountered severe financial difficulties at the beginning of the new century, in part because Johnson stopped commissioning him. He became more dependent on patrons such as William Hayley, who housed the Blakes in a cottage in the Sussex village of Felpham, on the south coast. This was a happier situation than the confines of the city, and it was here that Blake wrote much of Milton. A strong-willed artist with a determined need to follow his own path, he found it distasteful to work to Hayley's prescription, and tensions began to form in their relationship. In 1803 Blake had a vigorous altercation with a soldier who he thought had trespassed in his garden; Blake manhandled him off his property and onto the road. A few days later, he was accused in court of assault against the soldier, and of seditious remarks favouring of the French, and damning the King of England. These were serious charges, and he was fortunate to be acquitted of them.

Blake moved back to London and continued to work less on commissions than on watercolour illustrations, often at the behest of Thomas Butts, a clerk to the commissary general of musters, the office in charge of military pay. It was Butts who walked into the Blakes' summer house one day to find them both completely naked. 'Come in!', said Blake, 'It's only Adam and Eve, you know.' In that state they had been reciting passages from Paradise Lost. Butts thought highly of Blake and remained a chief patron for years. It must have taken considerable discrimination, for this was a period in which Blake's prowess as an artist had yet to be recognized. The Royal Academy tended to reject his paintings, and in response Blake mounted an exhibition at the family home, 28 Broad Street, from May 1809 until around June 1810. During that period Charles and Mary Lamb came to view his work, leading Charles to describe him as 'extraordinary': 'He paints in watercolours, marvelous strange pictures, visions of his brain which he asserts that he has seen. They have great merit.' It speaks well for Lamb that he held such a high opinion of a man whose genius was all but unrecognized, the sole review of Blake's exhibition, in Leigh Hunt's Examiner, having branded the artist 'an unfortunate lunatic'.

His final years were revitalized by the friendship of artists such as John Linnell and John Varley. For Varley, Blake sketched a series of visionary faces, his subjects being historical personages such as Julius Caesar, William Wallace and 'the man who built the pyramids'. Blake claimed that these people, though spiritual beings, were in the room as he worked, and Varley believed him. Linnell was an enthusiastic patron and commissioned Blake's Illustrations of the Book of Job and watercolours of Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained. He also introduced Blake to Samuel Palmer in 1824; Palmer was only 19, and the experience was a formative one for him. 'Do you work with fear and trembling?' Blake asked him. Having walked to Linnell's Hampstead retreat, Blake would sing old ballads or songs of his own devising to tunes he had invented.

Those who honoured Blake at this period tended to be young artists. Linnell, Varley, Palmer, George Richmond, Edward Calvert, Frederick Tatham and Welby Sherman were among those who called themselves 'The Ancients', venerating Blake as if he were a prophet or sage. He remained as creative as ever in his final years, engraving the Laocoön in 1826, and illustrating Dante's Divine Comedy and Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress. He died on 12 August 1827 at Fountain Court in London, perhaps from cirrhosis contracted from inhalation of poisonous fumes while etching, and was buried at Bunhill Fields, now in the City of London.

The apparent hermeticism of Blakean myth can tempt us to think of its creator as if he lived in a social vacuum, detached from the maelstrom of activity that surrounded him. But even a cursory glance at his works reveals that no one was more engaged with the ideological, religious and intellectual currents of the day. He emerges out of the bedrock of eighteenth-century culture, well known to the many thousands of writers and artists that thronged metropolitan London. And other Romantic writers, once considered as somehow distinct, admired him and his work. When he read the Songs in 1812, Wordsworth 'considered Blake as having the elements of poetry a thousand times more than either Byron or Scott' – high praise from someone not known for admiring other people's poetry. When he caught up with an illuminated copy of the Songs in 1818, Coleridge bestowed on Blake the ultimate compliment:

He is a man of Genius – and I apprehend, a Swedenborgian – certainly, a mystic emphatically. You perhaps smile at my calling another Poet, a Mystic; but verily I am in the very mire of common-place common-sense compared with Mr Blake, apo- or rather ana-calyptic Poet, and Painter! (Griggs iv 834)

Texts of Blake's work are problematic, and there are respects in which I have diverged from procedures used in the rest of this edition. I have retained Blake's capitals, and though punctuation remains editorial, it is based on that used in his published texts, which often allows for nuances and ambiguities which would otherwise be lost. There are several occasions (though not many) on which I have retained Blake's orthography, usually in cases where it might be argued to bear on interpretation – as in the cases of 'Tyger', 'appalls' and 'ecchoing'. As they did not reach the same finished state as those published by Blake, works edited from manuscript are treated in the same way as other such works elsewhere in this volume. As ever, I am indebted to the labours of those responsible for the Blake Trust/Tate Gallery editions; their datings and bibliographical observations are accepted here as authoritative.

All Religions Are One (composed c.1788)

*The voice of one crying in the wilderness.*¹

The Argument. As the true method of knowledge is experiment, the true faculty of knowing must be the faculty which experiences. This faculty I treat of.

Principle 1st. That the Poetic Genius is the true Man, and that the body or outward form of Man is derived from the Poetic Genius. Likewise that the forms of all things are derived from their Genius which, by the Ancients, was called an Angel and Spirit and Demon.

Principle 2d. As all men are alike in outward form, so (and with the same infinite variety) all are alike in the Poetic Genius.

Principle 3d. No man can think, write or speak from his heart, but he must intend truth. Thus all sects of Philosophy are from the Poetic Genius adapted to the weaknesses of every individual.

Principle 4. As none by travelling over known lands can find out the unknown, so, from already acquired knowledge, man could not acquire more. Therefore an universal Poetic Genius exists.

Principle 5. The Religions of all Nations are derived from each Nation's different reception of the Poetic Genius, which is everywhere called the Spirit of Prophecy.

Principle 6. The Jewish and Christian Testaments are an original derivation from the Poetic Genius. This is necessary from the confined nature of bodily sensation.

Principle 7th. As all men are alike (though infinitely various), so all Religions and as all similars have one source.

The true Man is the source, he being the Poetic Genius.

All Religions Are One

There is no Natural Religion(composed c.1788)¹

The Argument. Man has no notion of moral fitness but from Education. Naturally he is only a natural organ subject to Sense.

I Man cannot naturally Perceive but through his natural or bodily organs.

II Man by his reasoning power can only compare and judge of what he has already perceived.

III From a perception of only 3 senses or 3 elements none could deduce a fourth or fifth.

IV None could have other than natural or organic thoughts if he had none but organic perceptions.

V Man's desires are limited by his perceptions; none can desire what he has not perceived.

VI The desires and perceptions of man, untaught by anything but organs of sense, must be limited to objects of sense.

I Man's perceptions are not bounded by organs of perception. He perceives more than sense (though ever so acute) can discover.

II Reason, or the ratio of all we have already known, is not the same that it shall be when we know more.

III [missing]²

IV The bounded is loathed by its possessor. The same dull round, even of a universe, would soon become a mill with complicated wheels.

V If the many become the same as the few when possessed, 'More! More!' is the cry of a mistaken soul; less than all cannot satisfy Man.

VI If any could desire what he is incapable of possessing, despair must be his eternal lot.

VII The desire of man being Infinite, the possession is Infinite, and himself Infinite.

Conclusion. If it were not for the Poetic or Prophetic character, the Philosophic and Experimental would soon be at the ratio of all things, and stand still, unable to do other than repeat the same dull round over again.

Application. He who sees the infinite in all things, sees God. He who sees the Ratio only, sees himself only.

Therefore God becomes as we are, that we may be as He is.

There is no Natural Religion

¹ This has traditionally been presented as two separate and distinct works, featuring the (a) and (b) series of plates; however, recent editorial discoveries have led to its being regarded as one work consisting of two parts, the second answering the first. Accordingly, it is presented here as a single work. The first six principles present apparently straightforward statements of Lockean thought, and are refuted by the seven statements that follow.

Thel's Motto

Does the Eagle know what is in the pit?
Or wilt thou go ask the Mole:
Can Wisdom be put in a silver rod?
Or Love in a golden bowl?¹

[Plate 3]

Thel²

The daughters of Mne Seraphim³ led round their sunny flocks,
All but the youngest; she in paleness sought the secret air,
To fade away like morning beauty from her mortal day;
Down by the river of Adona⁴ her soft voice is heard,
And thus her gentle lamentation falls like morning dew. 5

‘Oh life of this our spring! Why fades the lotus of the water?
Why fade these children of the spring, born but to smile and fall?
Ah! Thel is like a wat’ry bow, and like a parting cloud,
Like a reflection in a glass, like shadows in the water,
Like dreams of infants, like a smile upon an infant’s face, 10
Like the dove’s voice, like transient day, like music in the air:
Ah! gentle may I lay me down, and gentle rest my head;
And gentle sleep the sleep of death, and gentle hear the voice
Of him that walketh in the garden in the evening time.’⁵

The Lily of the valley⁶ breathing in the humble grass 15
Answered the lovely maid and said, ‘I am a wat’ry weed,
And I am very small, and love to dwell in lowly vales;
So weak, the gilded butterfly scarce perches on my head.
Yet I am visited from heaven, and he that smiles on all
Walks in the valley, and each morn over me spreads his hand 20
Saying, “Rejoice, thou humble grass, thou new-born lily flower,
Thou gentle maid of silent valleys, and of modest brooks;
For thou shalt be clothed in light and fed with morning manna,⁷
Till summer’s heat melts thee beside the fountains and the springs
To flourish in eternal vales!” Then why should Thel complain? 25

[Plate 4]

Why should the mistress of the vales of Har⁸ utter a sigh?
She ceased and smiled in tears, then sat down in her silver shrine.

Thel answered: ‘Oh thou little virgin of the peaceful valley,
Giving to those that cannot crave – the voiceless, the o’ertired;
Thy breath doth nourish the innocent lamb, he smells thy milky garments, 30

He crops⁹ thy flowers while thou sittest smiling in his face,

Wiping his mild and meekin¹⁰ mouth from all contagious taints.
Thy wine doth purify the golden honey; thy perfume,
Which thou dost scatter on every little blade of grass that springs,
Revives the milked cow, and tames the fire-breathing steed. 35
But Thel is like a faint cloud kindled at the rising sun:

I vanish from my pearly throne, and who shall find my place?’¹¹

‘Queen of the vales’, the Lily answered, ‘ask the tender cloud¹²
And it shall tell thee why it glitters in the morning sky,
And why it scatters its bright beauty through the humid air: 40
Descend, oh little cloud, and hover before the eyes of Thel.’

The Cloud descended, and the Lily bowed her modest head
And went to mind her numerous charge among the verdant grass.

[Plate 5]

II

‘Oh little Cloud’, the virgin said, ‘I charge thee tell to me
Why thou complainest not when in one hour thou fade away; 45
Then we shall seek thee but not find. Ah, Thel is like to thee:
I pass away – yet I complain, and no one hears my voice.’

The Cloud then showed his golden head and his bright form emerged,
Hovering and glittering on the air before the face of Thel.

‘Oh virgin, know’st thou not our steeds drink of the golden springs¹³ 50

Where Luvah¹⁴ doth renew his horses? Look’st thou on my youth,
And fearest thou because I vanish and am seen no more.
Nothing remains; oh maid, I tell thee, when I pass away,
It is to tenfold life – to love, to peace, and raptures holy;
Unseen descending, weigh my light wings upon balmy flowers, 55
And court the fair-eyed dew to take me to her shining tent:
The weeping virgin trembling kneels before the risen sun
Till we arise linked in a golden band, and never part,
But walk united, bearing food to all our tender flowers.’

‘Dost thou, oh little Cloud? I fear that I am not like thee; 60

For I walk through the vales of Har and smell the sweetest flowers,
But I feed not the little flowers; I hear the warbling birds,
But I feed not the warbling birds – they fly and seek their food.
But Thel delights in these no more because I fade away,
And all shall say, “Without a use this shining woman lived – 65
Or did she only live to be at death the food of worms.”
The Cloud reclined upon his airy throne and answered thus:
‘Then if thou art the food of worms, oh virgin of the skies,
How great thy use, how great thy blessing; everything that lives
Lives not alone, nor for itself: fear not and I will call 70
The weak worm from its lowly bed, and thou shalt hear its voice.
Come forth, worm of the silent valley, to thy pensive queen.’
The helpless worm arose and sat upon the Lily’s leaf,
And the bright Cloud sailed on, to find his partner in the vale.
[\[Plate 6\]](#)

III

Then Thel, astonished, viewed the Worm upon its dewy bed. 75
‘Art thou a Worm? Image of weakness, art thou but a Worm?
I see thee like an infant wrapped in the Lily’s leaf;
Ah, weep not, little voice, thou canst not speak¹⁵ but thou canst weep.
Is this a Worm? I see thee lay helpless and naked – weeping,
And none to answer, none to cherish thee with mother’s smiles.’ 80
The Clod of Clay¹⁶ heard the Worm’s voice and raised her pitying head;
She bowed over the weeping infant, and her life exhaled
In milky fondness, then on Thel she fixed her humble eyes.
‘Oh beauty of the vales of Har, we live not for ourselves.
Thou seest me the meanest thing, and so I am indeed; 85
My bosom of itself is cold, and of itself is dark,
[\[Plate 7\]](#)

But he that loves the lowly pours his oil upon my head,
And kisses me, and binds his nuptial bands around my breast,

And says, "Thou mother of my children, I have loved thee,
And I have given thee a crown that none can take away."¹⁷ 90
But how this is, sweet maid, I know not and I cannot know;
I ponder and I cannot ponder; yet I live and love.'

The daughter of beauty wiped her pitying tears with her white veil
And said, 'Alas! I knew not this, and therefore did I weep.
That God would love a Worm I knew, and punish the evil foot 95
That, wilful, bruised its helpless form. But that he cherished it
With milk and oil I never knew; and therefore did I weep,
And I complained in the mild air because I fade away,
And lay me down in thy cold bed, and leave my shining lot.'
'Queen of the vales', the matron Clay answered, 'I heard thy sighs, 100
And all thy moans flew o'er my roof, but I have called them down.
Wilt thou, oh Queen, enter my house?¹⁸ 'Tis given thee to enter
And to return; fear nothing, enter with thy virgin feet.'

[Plate 6]

IV

The eternal gate's terrific porter lifted the northern bar;¹⁹
Thel entered in and saw the secrets of the land unknown; 105
She saw the couches of the dead, and where the fibrous roots
Of every heart on earth infixes deep its restless twists:
A land of sorrows and of tears where never smile was seen.
She wandered in the land of clouds through valleys dark, list'ning
Dolours and lamentations; waiting oft beside a dewy grave 110
She stood in silence, list'ning to the voices of the ground,
Till to her own grave-plot she came, and there she sat down²⁰
And heard this voice of sorrow breathed from the hollow pit:
'Why cannot the Ear be closed to its own destruction?
Or the glist'ning Eye, to the poison of a smile? 115
Why are Eyelids stored with arrows ready drawn,
Where a thousand fighting men in ambush lie?

Or an Eye of gifts and graces, show'ring fruits and coined gold?

Why a Tongue impressed with honey from every wind?²¹

Why an Ear, a whirlpool fierce to draw creations in? I20

Why a Nostril wide inhaling terror, trembling and affright?

Why a tender curb upon the youthful burning boy?

Why a little curtain of flesh²² on the bed of our desire?

The virgin started from her seat, and with a shriek

Fled back unhindered till she came into the vales of Har. I25

The End

The Book of Thel

¹ The first two lines of the motto question the perspective from which knowledge can be gained; the second two question the containers of knowledge, either as verbal metaphor or the incarnation of spirit in body. Silver rod...golden bowl in Ecclesiastes 12: 6 a 'silver cord' and 'golden bowl' are images of mortality.

² Thel Various meanings have been suggested, including 'will', 'wish' or 'desire'.

⁴ Adona related to Adonis, a figure in Greek myth associated with the cycles of the vegetable world.

⁵ hear the voice...time cf. Genesis 3: 8: 'And they heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden in the cool of the day.'

⁶ Lily of the valley flower of innocence, symbol of Thel's virginity. Cf. Song of Solomon 2:1: 'the lily of the valleys'.

7 morning manna God provided the Israelites with manna (food) in the wilderness, Exodus 16:14–26.

8 Har another character of Blake's, the father of Tiriel. His valley is a place of innocence.

9 crops eats.

10 meekin meek.

11 But Thel...place cf. Job 7:9: 'As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away: so he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more.'

12 the tender cloud the male principle, the fructifier.

13 Oh virgin...springs cf. Shakespeare, Cymbeline II iii 21–2: 'and Phoebus gins arise, / His steeds to water at those springs.'

14 Luvah god of desire, Prince of Love; one of Blake's Four Zoas (the four principles which rule human life).

15 thou canst not speak a pun on the word 'infant', which means 'without speech' (in-fans).

16 The worm and the clod are the baby and its mother.

17 a crown that none can take away cf. I Peter 5:4: 'a crown of glory that fadeth not away'; see also Revelation 3.

18 my house cf. Job 17:13: 'the grave is mine house: I have made my bed in the darkness.'

19 The eternal gate's...bar The exact meaning is unclear, although many interpretations have been offered. The porter is variously identified as Pluto, god of the underworld, or as Death, among others.

20 there she sat down cf. Psalm 137:1: ‘By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down, yea, we wept.’

21 Why a Tongue...wind probably a recollection of Spenser, Faerie Queene I ix st. 31, 5: ‘His subtile tongue, like dropping honny’.

22 a little curtain of flesh the hymen.

Songs of Innocence(1789)

Introduction

Piping down the valleys wild,
Piping songs of pleasant glee,
On a cloud I saw a child
And he laughing said to me:

‘Pipe a song about a Lamb!’ 5
So I piped with a merry cheer;
‘Piper, pipe that song again!’
So I piped, he wept to hear.

‘Drop thy pipe, thy happy pipe,
Sing thy songs of happy cheer!’ 10
So I sung the same again
While he wept with joy to hear.

‘Piper, sit thee down and write
In a book, that all may read.’
So he vanished from my sight 15
And I plucked a hollow reed.

And I made a rural pen,
And I stained the water clear,

And I wrote my happy songs
Every child may joy to hear. 20

The Shepherd

How sweet is the Shepherd's sweet lot,
From the morn to the evening he strays;
He shall follow his sheep all the day
And his tongue shall be filled with praise.

For he hears the lambs innocent call,¹ 5
And he hears the ewes tender reply;
He is watchful while they are in peace,
For they know when their Shepherd is nigh.

The Shepherd

¹ the lambs innocent call the stray sheep is a biblical symbol; see, for instance, Psalm II9:176; Isaiah 53:6; Matthew I8:12.

The Ecchoing Green

The Sun does arise,
And make happy the skies;
The merry bells ring
To welcome the Spring; 5
The skylark and thrush,
The birds of the bush,
Sing louder around
To the bells' cheerful sound,
While our sports shall be seen
On the Ecchoing Green. 10

Old John with white hair
Does laugh away care,

Sitting under the oak
Among the old folk.
They laugh at our play 15
And soon they all say,
'Such, such were the joys
When we all, girls and boys,
In our youth-time were seen
On the Ecchoing Green.' 20

Till the little ones weary
No more can be merry,
The sun does descend
And our sports have an end:
Round the laps of their mothers, 25
Many sisters and brothers
Like birds in their nest
Are ready for rest,
And sport no more seen
On the darkening Green. 30

The Lamb

Little Lamb who made thee?
Dost thou know who made thee?
Gave thee life and bid thee feed
By the stream and o'er the mead; 5
Gave thee clothing of delight,
Softest clothing woolly bright;
Gave thee such a tender voice,
Making all the vales rejoice:
Little Lamb who made thee?
Dost thou know who made thee? 10

Little Lamb I'll tell thee,
Little Lamb I'll tell thee;
He is called by thy name,

For he calls himself a Lamb;
He is meek and he is mild, 15
He became a little child:
I a child and thou a lamb,
We are called by his name,¹
 Little Lamb God bless thee,
 Little Lamb God bless thee. 20

The Lamb

¹ I a child...his name Critics note the child's identification with Christ and the lamb.

*The Little Black Boy*¹

My mother bore me in the southern wild
And I am black, but O! my soul is white.
White as an angel is the English child,
But I am black as if bereaved of light.

My mother taught me underneath a tree, 5
And sitting down before the heat of day,
She took me on her lap and kissed me,
And pointing to the east began to say,

‘Look on the rising sun: there God does live²
And gives his light, and gives his heat away; 10
And flowers and trees and beasts and men receive
Comfort in morning, joy in the noonday.

And we are put on earth a little space
That we may learn to bear the beams of love;
And these black bodies and this sunburnt face 15
Is but a cloud, and like a shady grove.

For when our souls have learned the heat to bear
The cloud will vanish; we shall hear his voice
Saying, "Come out from the grove, my love and care,
And round my golden tent like lambs rejoice." 20

Thus did my mother say and kissed me;
And thus I say to little English boy,
When I from black and he from white cloud free,
And round the tent of God like lambs we joy,

I'll shade him from the heat till he can bear 25
To lean in joy upon our Father's knee;
And then I'll stand and stroke his silver hair,
And be like him, and he will then love me.

The Little Black Boy

¹ Blake was aware of the passing of a Bill proposed in the House of Commons on 21 May 1788 by Sir William Dolben MP, which restricted the number of slaves who could be transported from Africa to British colonies in the West Indies.

² Look on the rising sun...live The association of God with the rising sun echoes Isaiah 45:6; 59:19: 'So shall they fear the name of the Lord from the west, and his glory from the rising of the sun.'

The Blossom

Merry Merry Sparrow
Under leaves so green,
A happy Blossom
Sees you swift as arrow;
Seek your cradle narrow 5
Near my Bosom.

Pretty Pretty Robin

Under leaves so green,
A happy Blossom
Hears you sobbing sobbing, 10
Pretty Pretty Robin
Near my bosom.

*The Chimney Sweeper*¹

When my mother died I was very young,
And my father sold me while yet my tongue
Could scarcely cry weep weep weep weep,²
So your chimneys I sweep, and in soot I sleep.

There's little Tom Dacre, who cried when his head 5
That curled like a lamb's back, was shaved; so I said,
'Hush Tom never mind it, for when your head's bare
You know that the soot cannot spoil your white hair.'

And so he was quiet, and that very night,
As Tom was a-sleeping he had such a sight, 10
That thousands of sweepers – Dick, Joe, Ned and Jack –
Were all of them locked up in coffins of black,

And by came an Angel who had a bright key,
And he opened the coffins and set them all free.
Then down a green plain leaping laughing they run 15
And wash in a river and shine in the Sun.

Then naked and white, all their bags left behind,
They rise upon clouds and sport in the wind;
And the Angel told Tom, if he'd be a good boy;
He'd have God for his father and never want joy. 20

And so Tom awoke and we rose in the dark
And got with our bags and our brushes to work.

Though the morning was cold, Tom was happy and warm
So if all do their duty, they need not fear harm.

The Chimney Sweeper

¹ Blake knew that an attempt was made in 1788 to improve the conditions of child chimney-sweeps: 8 was the proposed minimum age; hours of work would be limited; regulations were proposed to ensure that sweeps were properly washed every week; and a ban proposed on the use of children in chimneys on fire. In the event, the Porter's Act was not passed.

² weep weep weep weep suggestive of both the child's cry as he touts for work, as well as his grief.

The Little Boy Lost

'Father, father, where are you going?
Oh do not walk so fast.
Speak, father, speak to your little boy
Or else I shall be lost.'

The night was dark, no father was there, 5
The child was wet with dew;
The mire was deep,¹ and the child did weep,
And away the vapour flew.²

The Little Boy Lost

¹ The mire was deep a biblical image; e.g. Psalm 69:2: 'I sink in deep mire.'

² away the vapour flew the boy is led astray by a will-o'-the-wisp.

The Little Boy Found

The little boy lost in the lonely fen,
Led by the wand'ring light,¹
Began to cry, but God ever nigh,
Appeared like his father in white.²

He kissed the child and by the hand led 5
And to his mother brought,
Who in sorrow pale through the lonely dale
Her little boy weeping sought.

The Little Boy Found

¹ the wand'ring light will-o'-the-wisp.

² like his father in white cf. the transfigured Christ; Matthew 17:2; Luke 9:29: 'And as he prayed, the fashion of his countenance was altered, and his raiment was white and glistering.'

Laughing Song

When the green woods laugh with the voice of joy
And the dimpling stream runs laughing by,
When the air does laugh with our merry wit,
And the green hill laughs with the noise of it.

When the meadows laugh with lively green 5
And the grasshopper laughs in the merry scene;
When Mary and Susan and Emily
With their sweet round mouths sing, 'Ha, ha, he!'

When the painted birds laugh in the shade
Where our table with cherries and nuts is spread, 10
Come live and be merry and join with me
To sing the sweet chorus of 'Ha, ha, he!'

A Cradle Song

Sweet dreams form a shade
O'er my lovely infant's head;
Sweet dreams of pleasant streams
By happy silent moony beams.

Sweet sleep with soft down 5
Weave thy brows an infant crown;
Sweet sleep Angel mild,
Hover o'er my happy child.

Sweet smiles in the night
Hover over my delight; 10
Sweet smiles, Mother's smiles
All the livelong night beguiles.

Sweet moans, dovelike sighs,
Chase not slumber from thy eyes;
Sweet moans, sweeter smiles, 15
All the dovelike moans beguiles.

Sleep sleep happy child,
All creation slept and smiled;
Sleep sleep, happy sleep,
While o'er thee thy mother weep. 20

Sweet babe in thy face,
Holy image I can trace;
Sweet babe once like thee
Thy maker lay and wept for me,

Wept for me, for thee, for all, 25
When he was an infant small;
Thou his image ever see,
Heavenly face that smiles on thee –

Smiles on thee, on me, on all,
Who became an infant small: 30
Infant smiles are his own smiles;
Heaven and earth to peace beguiles.¹

A Cradle Song

¹ Heaven and earth...beguiles perhaps an echo of Milton's On the Morning of Christ's Nativity, where Christ's birth is accompanied by a divine harmony which 'alone / Could hold all heaven and earth in happier union' (ll. 107–8).

The Divine Image

To Mercy, Pity, Peace and Love
All pray in their distress;
And to these virtues of delight
Return their thankfulness.

For Mercy, Pity, Peace and Love 5
Is God our Father dear;
And Mercy, Pity, Peace and Love
Is Man his child and care.

For Mercy has a human heart,
Pity a human face; 10
And Love, the human form divine,
And Peace, the human dress.

Then every man of every clime
That prays in his distress,
Prays to the human form divine 15
Love, Mercy, Pity, Peace.

And all must love the human form
In heathen, turk or jew;
Where Mercy, Love and Pity dwell
There God is dwelling too.¹ 20

The Divine Image

¹ Where mercy...dwelling too cf. I John 4:16: ‘God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him.’

*Holy Thursday*¹

’Twas on a Holy Thursday, their innocent faces clean,
The children walking two and two in red and blue and green,
Grey-headed beadles walked before with wands as white as snow
Till into the high dome of Paul’s they like Thames’ waters flow.

Oh what a multitude they seemed, these flowers of London town, 5
Seated in companies they sit with radiance all their own;
The hum of multitudes was there but multitudes of lambs –
Thousands of little boys and girls raising their innocent hands.

Now like a mighty wind they raise to heaven the voice of song,
Or like harmonious thunderings the seats of heaven among; 10
Beneath them sit the aged men, wise guardians of the poor –
Then cherish pity, lest you drive an angel from your door.

Holy Thursday

¹ Blake describes the service for 6,000 or so of the poorest children in the charity schools of London, held in St Paul’s Cathedral on the first Thursday in May from 1782 onwards. They would be marched there by their beadles (parish officers) for what Keynes called ‘a compulsory exhibition of their piety and gratitude to their patrons’.

Night

The sun descending in the west,
The evening star does shine;
The birds are silent in their nest
And I must seek for mine.
The moon like a flower 5
In heaven's high bower
With silent delight
Sits and smiles on the night.

Farewell green fields and happy groves,
Where flocks have took delight; 10
Where lambs have nibbled, silent moves
The feet of angels bright;
Unseen they pour blessing
And joy without ceasing
On each bud and blossom 15
And each sleeping bosom.

They look in every thoughtless nest
Where birds are covered warm,
They visit caves of every beast
To keep them all from harm; 20
If they see any weeping
That should have been sleeping
They pour sleep on their head
And sit down by their bed.

When wolves and tygers howl for prey 25
They pitying stand and weep,
Seeking to drive their thirst¹ away
And keep them from the sheep.
But if they rush dreadful,
The angels most heedful 30

Receive each mild spirit,
New worlds to inherit.

And there the lion's ruddy eyes
Shall flow with tears of gold,
And pitying the tender cries, 35
And walking round the fold,
Saying, 'Wrath by his² meekness,
And by his health sickness
Is driven away
From our immortal day. 40

And now beside thee bleating lamb,
I can lie down and sleep,
Or think on him who bore thy name,
Graze after thee and weep.
For, washed in life's river,³ 45
My bright mane for ever
Shall shine like the gold
As I guard o'er the fold.'

Night

² his i.e. Christ's.

³ life's river the River of Life is biblical; see Revelation 22:I-2.

Spring

Sound the flute!
Now it's mute.
Birds delight
Day and Night;

Nightingale 5
In the dale,
Lark in Sky
Merrily
Merrily Merrily to welcome in the Year.

Little boy 10
Full of joy;
Little girl
Sweet and small;
Cock does crow,
So do you; 15
Merry voice,
Infant noise –
Merrily Merrily to welcome in the Year.

Little Lamb
Here I am,¹ 20
Come and lick
My white neck!
Let me pull
Your soft Wool,
Let me kiss 25
Your soft face;
Merrily Merrily we welcome in the Year.

Spring

¹ Here I am frequently used in the Bible; see Genesis 22:I, II; 31:II.

Nurse's Song

When the voices of children are heard on the green
And laughing is heard on the hill,
My heart is at rest within my breast

And everything else is still.

‘Then come home my children, the sun is gone down 5
And the dews of night arise;
Come come, leave off play, and let us away
Till the morning appears in the skies.’

‘No no let us play, for it is yet day
And we cannot go to sleep; 10
Besides in the sky, the little birds fly
And the hills are all covered with sheep.’

‘Well well, go and play till the light fades away
And then go home to bed.’
The little ones leaped and shouted and laughed 15
And all the hills echoed.

Infant Joy

‘I have no name
I am but two days old.’ –
What shall I call thee?
‘I happy am,
Joy is my name.’ – 5
Sweet joy befall thee!

Pretty joy!
Sweet joy but two days old,
Sweet joy I call thee;
Thou dost smile, 10
I sing the while,¹
Sweet joy befall thee.

Infant Joy

¹ When he read this poem in February 1818, Coleridge marked it as one of his favourites, while proposing a new reading of lines 9–10: ‘O smile, O smile! / I’ll sing the while’ – ‘For a babe two days old does not, cannot smile – and innocence and the very truth of Nature must go together’ (Griggs iv 837).

A Dream

Once a dream did weave a shade
O’er my Angel-guarded bed,
That an Emmet¹ lost its way
Where on grass methought I lay.

Troubled wildered and forlorn 5
Dark benighted travel-worn,
Over many a tangled spray,
All heart-broke I heard her say,

‘Oh my children! Do they cry,
Do they hear their father sigh? 10
Now they look abroad to see;
Now return and weep for me.’

Pitying I dropped a tear;
But I saw a glow-worm near
Who replied, ‘What wailing wight 15
Calls the watchman of the night?’

I am set to light the ground
While the beetle goes his round;
Follow now the beetle’s hum,
Little wanderer hie thee home.’² 20

A Dream

1 Emmet ant.

2 Little wanderer, hie thee home The dor-beetle, which flies after sunset with a humming sound, was known as 'the watchman'. The glow-worm was said, in a folk-song, to light people 'home to bed' on moonless nights.

On Another's Sorrow

Can I see another's woe
And not be in sorrow too?
Can I see another's grief
And not seek for kind relief?

Can I see a falling tear 5
And not feel my sorrow's share?
Can a father see his child
Weep, nor be with sorrow filled?

Can a mother sit and hear
An infant groan, an infant fear? 10
No no never can it be,
Never never can it be.

And can he who smiles on all
Hear the wren with sorrows small,
Hear the small bird's grief and care, 15
Hear the woes that infants bear –

And not sit beside the nest
Pouring pity in their breast?
And not sit the cradle near
Weeping tear on infant's tear? 20

And not sit both night and day
Wiping all our tears away?

O! no never can it be,
Never never can it be.

He doth give his joy to all, 25
He becomes an infant small;
He becomes a man of woe,
He doth feel the sorrow too.

Think not thou canst sigh a sigh
And thy maker is not by; 30
Think not thou canst weep a tear
And thy maker is not near.

O! he gives to us his joy,
That our grief he may destroy;
Till our grief is fled and gone 35
He doth sit by us and moan.

Songs of Experience(1794)

Introduction

Hear the voice of the Bard!
Who Present, Past and Future sees;
Whose ears have heard
The Holy Word
That walked among the ancient trees 5

Calling the lapsed Soul,¹
And weeping in the evening dew;
That might control
The starry pole,
And fallen fallen light renew! 10

‘Oh Earth oh Earth return!
Arise from out the dewy grass;
Night is worn,
And the morn
Rises from the slumberous mass. 15

Turn away no more:
Why wilt thou turn away?
The starry floor
The wat’ry shore
Is giv’n thee till the break of day.’ 20

Introduction

¹ Whose ears have heard...Soul cf. Genesis 3:8, where Adam and Eve, now fallen, ‘heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden in the cool of the day: and Adam and his wife hid themselves from the presence of the Lord God amongst the trees of the garden.’

Earth’s Answer

Earth raised up her head
From the darkness dread and drear;
Her light fled,
Stony dread!
And her locks covered with grey despair. 5

‘Prisoned on wat’ry shore
Starry Jealousy¹ does keep my den
Cold and hoar,
Weeping o’er,
I hear the father of the ancient men. 10

Selfish father of men
Cruel jealous selfish fear

Can delight
Chained in night
The virgins of youth and morning bear? 15

Does spring hide its joy
When buds and blossoms grow?
Does the sower
Sow by night,
Or the ploughman in darkness plough? 20

Break this heavy chain
That does freeze my bones around!
Selfish! vain!
Eternal bane!
That free Love with bondage bound.' 25

Earth's Answer

¹ Starry Jealousy The idea of God as jealous is biblical; see Exodus 20:5; 34:14, and Deuteronomy 4:24: 'For the Lord thy God is a consuming fire, even a jealous God.'

The Clod and the Pebble

'Love seeketh not Itself to please,
Nor for itself hath any care;
But for another gives its ease
And builds a Heaven in Hell's despair.'

So sung a little Clod of Clay 5
Trodden with the cattle's feet,
But a Pebble of the brook
Warbled out these metres meet:

'Love seeketh only Self to please,

To bind another to Its delight; 10
Joys in another's loss of ease,
And builds a Hell in Heaven's despite.'

Holy Thursday

Is this a holy thing to see
In a rich and fruitful land,
Babes reduced to misery,
Fed with cold and usurous hand?

Is that trembling cry a song? 5
Can it be a song of joy?
And so many children poor?
It is a land of poverty!

And their sun does never shine,
And their fields are bleak and bare, 10
And their ways are filled with thorns,
It is eternal winter there.

For where'er the sun does shine
And where'er the rain does fall,
Babe can never hunger there, 15
Nor poverty the mind appall.

The Little Girl Lost*¹

In futurity
I prophetic see
That the earth from sleep
(Grave the sentence deep)

Shall arise and seek 5
For her maker meek,
And the desert wild

Become a garden mild.

In the southern clime,
Where the summer's prime 10
Never fades away,
Lovely Lyca lay.

Seven summers old
Lovely Lyca told;
She had wandered long 15
Hearing wild birds' song.

'Sweet sleep, come to me
Underneath this tree;
Do father, mother weep?
Where can Lyca sleep? 20

Lost in desert wild
Is your little child;
How can Lyca sleep
If her mother weep?

If her heart does ache 25
Then let Lyca wake;
If my mother sleep
Lyca shall not weep.

Frowning, frowning night,
O'er this desert bright, 30
Let thy moon arise
While I close my eyes.'

Sleeping Lyca lay
While the beasts of prey,
Come from caverns deep, 35
Viewed the maid asleep.

The kingly lion stood
And the virgin viewed,
Then he gambolled round
O'er the hallowed ground. 40

Leopards, tygers play
Round her as she lay,
While the lion old
Bowed his mane of gold,

And her bosom lick, 45
And upon her neck
From his eyes of flame
Ruby tears there came;

While the lioness
Loosed her slender dress, 50
And naked they conveyed
To caves the sleeping maid.²

The Little Girl Lost

¹ This poem, and The Little Girl Found, originally appeared in Songs of Innocence; in some respects they are counterparts to The Little Boy Lost and The Little Boy Found.

² The obvious parallel is with Daniel in the lions' den; cf Daniel 6:16–22, though compare also Isaiah 11:6: 'The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them.'

The Little Girl Found

All the night in woe
Lyca's parents go;
Over valleys deep,
While the deserts weep.

Tired and woe-begone, 5
Hoarse with making moan,
Arm in arm seven days
They traced the desert ways.

Seven nights they sleep
Among shadows deep, 10
And dream they see their child
Starved in desert wild.

Pale through pathless ways
The fancied image strays –
Famished, weeping, weak, 15
With hollow piteous shriek.

Rising from unrest,
The trembling woman pressed
With feet of weary woe;
She could no further go. 20

In his arms he bore
Her, armed with sorrow sore;
Till before their way
A couching lion lay.

Turning back was vain; 25
Soon his heavy mane
Bore them to the ground:
Then he stalked around

Smelling to his prey.

But their fears allay 30
When he licks their hands,
And silent by them stands.

They look upon his eyes
Filled with deep surprise,
And wondering behold 35
A spirit armed in gold.

On his head a crown,
On his shoulders down
Flowed his golden hair;
Gone was all their care. 40

‘Follow me’, he said,
‘Weep not for the maid;
In my palace deep
Lyca lies asleep.’

Then they followed 45
Where the vision led,
And saw their sleeping child
Among tygers wild.

To this day they dwell 50
In a lonely dell;
Nor fear the wolvish howl,
Nor the lion’s growl.

The Chimney Sweeper

A little black thing among the snow,
Crying weep, weep, in notes of woe!
‘Where are thy father and mother, say?’
‘They are both gone up to the church to pray.’

Because I was happy upon the heath 5
And smiled among the winter's snow,
They clothed me in the clothes of death,
And taught me to sing the notes of woe.

And because I am happy and dance and sing,¹
They think they have done me no injury, 10
And are gone to praise God and his Priest and King
Who make up a heaven of our misery.'

The Chimney Sweeper

¹ And because...sing Erdman suggests a reference to May Day, when sweeps and milkmaids danced in the streets of London in return for alms.

Nurse's Song

When the voices of children are heard on the green
And whisp'rings are in the dale,
The days of my youth rise fresh in my mind,
My face turns green and pale.

Then come home, my children, the sun is gone down, 5
And the dews of night arise;
Your spring and your day are wasted in play,
And your winter and night in disguise.

The Sick Rose

Oh Rose thou art sick;
The invisible worm
That flies in the night
In the howling storm

Has found out thy bed 5
Of crimson joy,
And his dark secret love
Does thy life destroy.

The Fly

Little Fly
Thy summer's play
My thoughtless hand
Has brushed away.¹

Am not I 5
A fly like thee?
Or art not thou
A man like me?

For I dance
And drink and sing, 10
Till some blind hand
Shall brush my wing.

If thought is life
And strength and breath,
And the want 15
Of thought is death,

Then am I
A happy fly,
If I live
Or if I die. 20

The Fly

1 In his notebook, Blake drafted another stanza at this point:

The cut worm
Forgives the plough
And dies in peace
And so do thou.

The Angel

I dreamt a Dream! What can it mean?
And that I was a maiden Queen
Guarded by an Angel mild:
Witless woe was ne'er beguiled!

And I wept both night and day, 5
And he wiped my tears away,
And I wept both day and night,
And hid from him my heart's delight.

So he took his wings and fled,
Then the morn blushed rosy red; 10
I dried my tears, and armed my fears
With ten thousand shields and spears.

Soon my Angel came again;
I was armed, he came in vain:
For the time of youth was fled 15
And grey hairs were on my head.

The Tyger 1

Tyger Tyger burning bright
In the forests of the night;
What immortal hand or eye
Could frame thy fearful symmetry?

In what distant deeps or skies 5

Burnt the fire of thine eyes?
On what wings dare he aspire?
What the hand dare seize the fire?

And what shoulder and what art
Could twist the sinews of thy heart? 10
And when thy heart began to beat,
What dread hand and what dread feet?

What the hammer? What the chain?
In what furnace was thy brain?
What the anvil? What dread grasp 15
Dare its deadly terrors clasp?

When the stars threw down their spears
And watered heaven with their tears
Did he smile his work to see?
Did he who made the Lamb make thee? 20

Tyger Tyger burning bright
In the forests of the night:
What immortal hand or eye
Dare frame thy fearful symmetry?

The Tyger

¹ This is regarded as the contrary poem to ‘The Lamb’ in Songs of Innocence. Charles Lamb read it in 1824, and memorized its opening two lines, describing them as ‘glorious, but alas! I have not the book; for the man is flown, whither I know not – to Hades or a madhouse. But I must look on him as one of the most extraordinary persons of the age.’

My Pretty Rose-Tree

A flower was offered to me,
Such a flower as May never bore;
But I said, 'I've a Pretty Rose-tree',
And I passed the sweet flower o'er.

Then I went to my Pretty Rose-tree 5
To tend her by day and by night;
But my Rose turned away with jealousy:
And her thorns were my only delight.

Ah, Sunflower!

Ah, sunflower! weary of time,
Who countest the steps of the Sun,
Seeking after that sweet golden clime
Where the traveller's journey is done;

Where the Youth pined away with desire, 5
And the pale Virgin shrouded in snow,
Arise from their graves and aspire
Where my Sunflower wishes to go.

The Lily

The modest Rose puts forth a thorn,
The humble Sheep a threat'ning horn;
While the Lily white shall in Love delight,
Nor a thorn nor a threat stain her beauty bright.

The Garden of Love

I went to the Garden of Love
And saw what I never had seen:
A Chapel was built in the midst
Where I used to play on the green.¹

And the gates of this Chapel were shut, 5
And 'Thou shalt not' writ over the door;
So I turned to the Garden of Love
That so many sweet flowers bore,

And I saw it was filled with graves
And tombstones where flowers should be; 10
And Priests in black gowns² were walking their rounds,
And binding with briars my joys and desires.

The Garden of Love

¹ A chapel...green Possibly a reference to the building of a chapel on South Lambeth green in 1793. Members of the congregation were required to pay for their places.

² black gowns In his notebook Blake originally wrote 'black gounds', a Cockney pronunciation, thus giving the line an internal rhyme.

The Little Vagabond

Dear Mother, dear Mother, the Church is cold
But the Alehouse is healthy and pleasant and warm;
Besides I can tell where I am used well –
Such usage in heaven will never do well.

But if at the Church they would give us some Ale, 5
And a pleasant fire our souls to regale,
We'd sing and we'd pray all the livelong day,
Nor ever once wish from the Church to stray.

Then the Parson might preach and drink and sing,
And we'd be as happy as birds in the spring; 10
And modest dame Lurch, who is always at Church,
Would not have bandy¹ children nor fasting nor birch.

And God like a father rejoicing to see
His children as pleasant and happy as he,
Would have no more quarrel with the Devil or the Barrel, 15
But kiss him and give him both drink and apparel.

The Little Vagabond

1 bandy bandy legs are a symptom of rickets, caused by vitamin deficiency.

Figure 8 Blake's 'London', Plate 46 from Songs of Innocence and Experience (c.1815–26). On a 'midnight street' a young boy leads an old man on crutches – 'Marks of weakness, marks of woe'. Further down the page, to the right of the text, a naked vagabond warms his hands over a glowing fire. (Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge/ The Bridgeman Art Library.)

London

I wander through each chartered¹ street
Near where the chartered Thames does flow,
And mark in every face I meet
Marks of weakness, marks of woe.

In every cry of every Man, 5
In every Infant's cry of fear,
In every voice, in every ban,
The mind-forged manacles² I hear.

How the Chimney-sweeper's cry
Every black'ning church appalls, 10
And the hapless Soldier's sigh
Runs in blood down Palace walls.

But most through midnight streets I hear
How the youthful Harlot's curse
Blasts the new born Infant's tear, 15
And blights with plagues the Marriage hearse.³

London

¹ chartered mapped, but also owned by corporations (by the terms of a charter). In Blake's notebook, this originally read, 'dirty'.

² mind-forged manacles The original MS reading is 'German-forged links' – a reference to the House of Hanover, which provided Britain with its monarchs.

³ blights with plagues the Marriage hearse apparently a reference to the passing on of sexually transmitted diseases by mothers to their children.

*The Human Abstract*¹

Pity would be no more
If we did not make somebody Poor;
And Mercy no more could be,
If all were as happy as we.

And mutual fear brings peace 5
Till the selfish loves increase;
Then Cruelty knits a snare
And spreads his baits with care.

He sits down with holy fears
And waters the ground with tears; 10
Then Humility takes its root
Underneath his foot.

Soon spreads the dismal shade

Of Mystery over his head,
And the Caterpillar and Fly 15
Feed on the Mystery.

And it bears the fruit of Deceit,
Ruddy and sweet to eat;
And the Raven his nest has made
In its thickest shade. 20

The Gods of the earth and sea
Sought through Nature to find this Tree,
But their search was all in vain:
There grows one in the Human Brain.

The Human Abstract

¹ This song is a counterpart of 'The Divine Image'. Above it in Blake's notebook appear some lines related to it:

How came pride in Man
From Mary it began
How contempt and scorn

Infant Sorrow

My mother groaned! my father wept,
Into the dangerous world I leapt:
Helpless, naked, piping loud:
Like a fiend hid in a cloud.

Struggling in my father's hands, 5
Striving against my swaddling bands,
Bound and weary I thought best
To sulk upon my mother's breast.

A Poison Tree¹

I was angry with my friend;
I told my wrath, my wrath did end.
I was angry with my foe;
I told it not, my wrath did grow.

And I watered it in fears, 5
Night and morning with my tears;
And I sunned it with smiles,
And with soft deceitful wiles.

And it grew both day and night
Till it bore an apple bright; 10
And my foe beheld it shine,
And he knew that it was mine.

And into my garden stole
When the night had veiled the pole –
In the morning glad I see 15
My foe outstretched beneath the tree.

¹ In Blake's notebook this poem was originally entitled 'Christian Forbearance'.

A Little Boy Lost

'Nought loves another as itself
Nor venerates another so,
Nor is it possible to Thought
A greater than itself to know.

And Father, how can I love you 5
Or any of my brothers more?
I love you like the little bird
That picks up crumbs around the door.'

The Priest sat by and heard the child,

In trembling zeal he seized his hair; 10
He led him by his little coat
And all admired the Priestly care.

And standing on the altar high,
'Lo, what a fiend is here!' said he,
'One who sets reason up for judge 15
Of our most holy Mystery.'

The weeping child could not be heard,
The weeping parents wept in vain;
They stripped him to his little shirt
And bound him in an iron chain, 20

And burned him in a holy place¹
Where many had been burned before.
The weeping parents wept in vain –
Are such things done on Albion's shore?

A Little Boy Lost

¹ a holy place biblical name for the sanctuary in the Temple.

A Little Girl Lost

*Children of the future Age
Reading this indignant page,
Know that in a former time
Love! sweet Love! was thought a crime.*

In the Age of Gold, 5
Free from winters cold,
Youth and maiden bright
To the holy light,
Naked in the sunny beams delight.

Once a youthful pair 10
Filled with softest care
Met in garden bright
Where the holy light
Had just removed the curtains of the night.

There in rising day 15
On the grass they play;
Parents were afar,
Strangers came not near,
And the maiden soon forgot her fear.

Tired with kisses sweet, 20
They agree to meet
When the silent sleep
Waves o'er heavens deep,
And the weary tired wanderers weep.

To her father white 25
Came the maiden bright,
But his loving look,
Like the holy book
All her tender limbs with terror shook.

'Ona! pale and weak! 30
To thy father speak:
Oh the trembling fear!
Oh the dismal care!
That shakes the blossoms of my hoary hair!'

To Tirzah¹

Whate'er is Born of Mortal Birth
Must be consumed with the Earth
To rise from Generation free;

Then what have I to do with thee?

The Sexes sprung from Shame and Pride – 5
Blowed in the morn, in evening died;
But Mercy changed Death into Sleep –
The Sexes rose to work and weep.

Thou Mother of my Mortal part,
With cruelty didst mould my Heart 10
And with false self-deceiving tears
Didst bind my Nostrils Eyes and Ears;

Didst close my Tongue in senseless clay
And me to Mortal Life betray:
The Death of Jesus set me free – 15
Then what have I to do with thee?²

It is Raised
a Spiritual Body³

To Tirzah

¹ This poem does not appear in early copies of the Songs. Tirzah was the first capital of the northern kingdom of Israel, a counterpart of Jerusalem in the south; cf. Song of Solomon 6:4: ‘Thou art beautiful, O my love, as Tirzah, comely as Jerusalem, terrible as an army with banners.’ See also Numbers 27:I–II; Blake associated Tirzah with the fallen realm of the senses, a power that confines humanity within a vision of the human body as finite and corrupt.

² Then what...thee cf. Jesus to his mother, John 2:4: ‘what have I to do with thee? Mine hour is not yet come.’

³ It is...Body On Blake’s plate, these words appear on the garment of an old man ministering to a dead body; they come from I Corinthians

15:44: 'It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body.'

*The Schoolboy*¹

I love to rise in a summer morn
When the birds sing on every tree;
The distant huntsman winds his horn,
And the skylark sings with me –
Oh what sweet company! 5

But to go to school in a summer morn,
Oh! it drives all joy away;
Under a cruel eye outworn,
The little ones spend the day
In sighing and dismay. 10

Ah! then at times I drooping sit
And spend many an anxious hour;
Nor in my book can I take delight,
Nor sit in learning's bower,
Worn through with the dreary shower. 15

How can the bird that is born for joy
Sit in a cage and sing?
How can a child, when fears annoy,
But droop his tender wing
And forget his youthful spring? 20

Oh! father and mother, if buds are nipped
And blossoms blown away,
And if the tender plants are stripped
Of their joy in the springing day
By sorrow and care's dismay, 25

How shall the summer arise in joy
Or the summer fruits appear?

Or how shall we gather what griefs destroy,
Or bless the mellowing year
When the blasts of winter appear? 30

The Schoolboy

¹ This song was originally included in Songs of Innocence.

The Voice of the Ancient Bard¹

Youth of delight come hither
And see the opening morn –
Image of truth new-born;
Doubt is fled and clouds of reason,
Dark disputes and artful teasing. 5
Folly is an endless maze,
Tangled roots perplex her ways –
How many have fallen there!
They stumble all night over bones of the dead,
And feel they know not what but care, 10
And wish to lead others, when they should be led.

The Voice of the Ancient Bard

¹ This song was originally included in Songs of Innocence.

A Divine Image¹

Cruelty has a Human Heart
And Jealousy a Human Face;
Terror the Human Form Divine,
And Secrecy the Human Dress.

The Human Dress is forged Iron, 5
The Human Form a fiery Forge,

The Human Face a Furnace sealed,
The Human Heart its hungry Gorge.

A Divine Image

¹ This poem is known to us only through a print made after Blake's death; it appears in one copy of the Songs, and was not usually included in the volume. It was apparently composed as a counterpart to 'The Divine Image' in Songs of Innocence (p. 191). Blake's design shows a blacksmith hammering at a wall round the sun.

The Argument

Rintrah³ roars and shakes his fires in the burdened air;⁴
Hungry clouds swag⁵ on the deep.

Once meek, and in a perilous path,
The just man kept his course along
The vale of death; 5
Roses are planted where thorns grow,
And on the barren heath
Sing the honey bees.
Then the perilous path was planted;
And a river, and a spring 10
On every cliff and tomb;
And on the bleached bones⁶
Red clay⁷ brought forth.

Till the villain left the paths of ease

To walk in perilous paths, and drive 15
The just man into barren climes.

Now the sneaking serpent walks
In mild humility
And the just man rages in the wilds
Where lions roam. 20

Rintrah roars and shakes his fires in the burdened air;
Hungry clouds swag on the deep.

[Plate 3]

As a new heaven is begun, and it is now thirty-three years since its advent: the Eternal Hell revives.⁸ And lo! Swedenborg is the Angel sitting at the tomb; his writings are the linen clothes folded up.⁹ Now is the dominion of Edom,¹⁰ and the return of Adam into Paradise; see Isaiah 34 and 35.¹¹

Without Contraries is no progression. Attraction and Repulsion, Reason and Energy, Love and Hate, are necessary to Human existence.¹²

From these contraries spring what the religious call Good and Evil. Good is the passive that obeys Reason. Evil is the active springing from Energy.¹³

Good is Heaven. Evil is Hell.

The Voice of the Devil

All Bibles or sacred codes have been the causes of the following errors.

1. That man has two real existing principles, viz. a Body and a Soul.
2. That Energy,¹⁴ called Evil, is alone from the Body, and that Reason, called Good, is alone from the Soul.
3. That God will torment man in eternity for following his Energies.

But the following Contraries to these are True

1. Man has no Body distinct from his Soul, for that called Body is a portion of Soul discerned by the five Senses (the chief inlets of Soul in this age).

2. Energy is the only life and is from the Body, and Reason is the bound or outward circumference of Energy.

3. Energy is Eternal Delight.

[Plate 5]

Those who restrain desire do so because theirs is weak enough to be restrained; and the restrainer (or Reason) usurps its place and governs the unwilling.

And, being restrained, it by degrees becomes passive, till it is only the shadow of desire.

The history of this is written in Paradise Lost, and the Governor (or Reason) is called Messiah.

And the original Archangel, or possessor of the command of the heavenly host, is called the Devil or Satan, and his children are called Sin and Death.^{15}

But in the Book of Job, Milton's Messiah is called Satan.^{16}

For this history has been adopted by both parties.

It indeed appeared to Reason as if Desire was cast out, but the Devil's account is that the Messi- [Plate 6] -ah fell, and formed a heaven of what he stole from the Abyss.

This is shown in the Gospel, where he prays to the Father to send the comforter, or Desire,^{17} that Reason may have Ideas to build on, the Jehovah of the Bible being no other than he^{18} who dwells in flaming fire.

Know that after Christ's death he became Jehovah.

But in Milton the Father is Destiny, the Son a Ratio of the five senses, and the Holy Ghost, Vacuum!

Note: The reason Milton wrote in fetters when he wrote of Angels and God, and at liberty when of Devils and Hell, is because he was a true Poet and of the Devil's party without knowing it.

A Memorable Fancy^{19} [The Five Senses]

As I was walking among the fires of hell,²⁰ delighted with the enjoyments of Genius (which to Angels look like torment and insanity), I collected some of their Proverbs, thinking that as the sayings used in a nation mark its character, so the Proverbs of Hell show the nature of infernal wisdom better than any description of buildings or garments.

When I came home,²¹ on the abyss of the five senses, where a flat-sided steep frowns over the present world,²² I saw a mighty Devil²³ folded in black clouds hovering on the sides of the rock; with cor- [Plate 7] -roding fires²⁴ he wrote the following sentence, now perceived by the minds of men, and read by them on earth.

How do you know but ev'ry Bird that cuts the airy way,
Is an immense world of delight, closed by your senses five?²⁵

*Proverbs of Hell*²⁶

In seed-time learn, in harvest teach, in winter enjoy.
Drive your cart and your plough over the bones of the dead.
The road of excess leads to the palace of wisdom.
Prudence is a rich ugly old maid courted by Incapacity.
He who desires but acts not breeds pestilence.
The cut worm forgives the plough.
Dip him in the river who loves water.
A fool sees not the same tree that a wise man sees.
He whose face gives no light shall never become a star.
Eternity is in love with the productions of time.
The busy bee has no time for sorrow.
The hours of folly are measured by the clock, but of wisdom: no clock can measure.
All wholesome food is caught without a net or a trap.
Bring out number, weight and measure in a year of dearth.
No bird soars too high, if he soars with his own wings.
A dead body revenges not injuries.
The most sublime act is to set another before you.
If the fool would persist in his folly he would become wise.

Folly is the cloak of knavery.
Shame is Pride's cloak.

The ancient Poets animated all sensible objects with Gods or Geniuses, calling them by the names and adorning them with the properties of woods, rivers, mountains, lakes, cities, nations, and whatever their enlarged and numerous senses could perceive.

And particularly they studied the genius of each city and country, placing it under its mental deity.

Till a system was formed, which some took advantage of, and enslaved the vulgar by attempting to realize or abstract the mental deities from their objects: thus began Priesthood.

Choosing forms of worship from poetic tales.

And at length they pronounced that the Gods had ordered such things.

Thus men forgot that All deities reside in the human breast.

A Memorable Fancy [Isaiah and Ezekiel]

The Prophets Isaiah and Ezekiel dined with me, and I asked them how they dared so roundly to assert that God spake to them, and whether they did not think at the time that they would be misunderstood, and so be the cause of imposition?

Isaiah answered, ‘I saw no God, nor heard any, in a finite organical perception.²⁹ But my senses discovered the infinite in everything, and, as I was then persuaded, and remain confirmed, that the voice of honest indignation³⁰ is the voice of God, I cared not for consequences, but wrote.’

Then I asked, ‘Does a firm persuasion that a thing is so, make it so?’

He replied, ‘All poets believe that it does, and in ages of imagination this firm persuasion removed mountains;³¹ but many are not capable of a firm persuasion of anything.’

Then Ezekiel said, ‘The philosophy of the east taught the first principles of human perception. Some nations held one principle for the origin and some another. We of Israel taught that the Poetic Genius (as you now call it) was the first principle and all the others merely derivative, which was the cause of our despising the Priests and Philosophers of other countries, and prophesying that all Gods would [Plate 13] at last be proved to originate in ours and to be the tributaries of the Poetic Genius. It was this that our great poet King David³² desired so fervently, and invokes so pathetic'ly,³³ saying by this he conquers enemies and governs kingdoms. And we so loved our God that we cursed in his name all the deities of surrounding nations,³⁴ and asserted that they had rebelled. From these opinions the vulgar came to think that all nations would at last be subject to the jews.

'This', said he, 'like all firm persuasions, is come to pass, for all nations believe the jews' code and worship the jews' god, and what greater subjection can be?'

I heard this with some wonder, and must confess my own conviction. After dinner I asked Isaiah to favour the world with his lost works; he said none of equal value was lost. Ezekiel said the same of his.

I also asked Isaiah what made him go naked and barefoot three years? He answered, 'The same that made our friend Diogenes the Grecian.'³⁵

I then asked Ezekiel why he ate dung, and lay so long on his right and left side?³⁶ He answered, 'The desire of raising other men into a perception of the infinite: this the North American tribes practise, and is he honest who resists his genius or conscience, only for the sake of present ease or gratification?'

[\[Plate 14\]](#)

The ancient tradition that the world will be consumed in fire at the end of six thousand years is true,³⁷ as I have heard from Hell.

For the cherub with his flaming sword is hereby commanded to leave his guard at the tree of life;³⁸ and when he does, the whole creation will be consumed and appear infinite and holy, whereas it now appears finite and corrupt.

This will come to pass by an improvement of sensual enjoyment.

But first the notion that man has a body distinct from his soul is to be expunged. This I shall do by printing in the infernal method, by corrosives,³⁹ which in Hell are salutary and medicinal, melting apparent surfaces away, and displaying the infinite which was hid.

If the doors of perception were cleansed, everything would appear to man as it is: Infinite.

For man has closed himself up till he sees all things through narrow chinks of his cavern.

[Plate 15]

A Memorable Fancy [A Printing-House in Hell]⁴⁰

I was in a printing-house in Hell and saw the method in which knowledge is transmitted from generation to generation.

In the first chamber was a Dragon-Man, clearing away the rubbish from a cave's mouth; within, a number of Dragons were hollowing the cave.

In the second chamber was a Viper⁴¹ folding round the rock and the cave, and others adorning it with gold, silver, and precious stones.

In the third chamber was an Eagle with wings and feathers of air⁴² – he caused the inside of the cave to be infinite; around were numbers of Eagle-like men, who built palaces in the immense cliffs.

In the fourth chamber were Lions of flaming fire, raging around and melting the metals into living fluids.

In the fifth chamber were unnamed forms, which cast the metals into the expanse.⁴³

There they were received by Men who occupied the sixth chamber, and took the forms of books and were arranged in libraries.

[Plate 16]

The Giants who formed this world into its sensual existence and now seem to live in it in chains are, in truth, the causes of its life and the sources of all activity;⁴⁴ but the chains are the cunning of weak and tame minds, which have power to resist energy. According to the proverb, the weak in courage is strong in cunning.

Thus one portion of being is the Prolific; the other, the Devouring. To the devourer it seems as if the producer was in his chains, but it is not so: he only takes portions of existence and fancies that the whole.

But the Prolific would cease to be Prolific unless the Devourer as a sea received the excess of his delights.

Some will say, 'Is not God alone the Prolific?' I answer, 'God only acts and is in existing beings or men.'

These two classes of men are always upon earth, and they should be enemies; whoever tries [Plate 17] to reconcile them seeks to destroy existence.

Religion is an endeavour to reconcile the two.

Note: Jesus Christ did not wish to unite, but to separate them (as in the parable of sheep and goats),⁴⁵ and he says, 'I came not to send Peace but a Sword.'⁴⁶⁴⁶

Messiah or Satan or Tempter was formerly thought to be one of the Antediluvians who are our Energies.

A Memorable Fancy [The Vanity of Angels]⁴⁷

An Angel came to me and said, 'Oh pitiable foolish young man! Oh horrible! Oh dreadful state! Consider the hot burning dungeon thou art preparing for thyself to all eternity, to which thou art going in such career.'

I said, 'Perhaps you will be willing to show me my eternal lot, and we will contemplate together upon it and see whether your lot or mine is most desirable.'

So he took me through a stable, and through a church, and down into the church-vault, at the end of which was a mill.⁴⁸ Through the mill we went, and came to a cave. Down the winding cavern we groped our tedious way, till a void, boundless as a nether sky, appeared beneath us, and we held by the roots of trees and hung over this immensity. But I said, 'If you please, we will commit ourselves to this void, and see whether providence is here also; if you will not, I will'. But he answered, 'Do not presume, oh young man; but as we here remain, behold thy lot which will soon appear when the darkness passes away.'

So I remained with him, sitting in the twisted [Plate 18] root of an oak. He was suspended in a fungus which hung with the head downward into the deep.

By degrees we beheld the infinite Abyss,⁴⁹ fiery as the smoke of a burning city; beneath us, at an immense distance, was the sun, black but shining; round it were fiery tracks on which revolved vast spiders, crawling after their prey, which flew, or rather swum, in the infinite deep, in the most terrific shapes of animals sprung from corruption. And the air was full of them, and seemed composed of them. These are Devils, and are called Powers of the air. I now asked my companion which was my eternal lot? He said, ‘Between the black and white spiders.’⁵⁰

But now, from between the black and white spiders, a cloud and fire burst and rolled through the deep, black’ning all beneath so that the nether deep grew black as a sea, and rolled with a terrible noise: beneath us was nothing now to be seen but a black tempest, till, looking east⁵¹ between the clouds and the waves, we saw a cataract of blood mixed with fire; and, not many stones’ throw from us, appeared and sunk again the scaly fold of a monstrous serpent. At last, to the east, distant about three degrees,⁵² appeared a fiery crest above the waves. Slowly it reared, like a ridge of golden rocks, till we discovered two globes of crimson fire from which the sea fled away in clouds of smoke. And now we saw it was the head of Leviathan.⁵³ His forehead was divided into streaks of green and purple, like those on a tiger’s forehead; soon we saw his mouth and red gills hang just above the raging foam, tinging the black deep with beams of blood, advancing toward us [Plate 19] with all the fury of a spiritual existence.

My friend the Angel climbed up from his station into the mill; I remained alone, and then this appearance was no more, but I found myself sitting on a pleasant bank beside a river by moonlight, hearing a harper who sung to the harp.⁵⁴ And his theme was, ‘The man who never alters his opinion is like standing water, and breeds reptiles of the mind.’

But I arose and sought for the mill, and there I found my Angel who, surprised, asked me how I escaped.

I answered, ‘All that we saw was owing to your metaphysics. For when you ran away, I found myself on a bank by moonlight hearing a harper. But now we have seen my eternal lot, shall I show you yours?’ He laughed at my proposal, but I by force suddenly caught him in my arms, and flew westerly through the night, till we were elevated above the earth’s shadow.⁵⁵ Then I flung myself with him directly into the body of the sun; here I clothed myself in white, and, taking in my hand Swedenborg’s volumes, sunk from the glorious clime, and passed all the planets till we came to Saturn. Here I stayed to rest, and then leaped into the void between saturn and the fixed stars.⁵⁶

‘Here’, said I, ‘is your lot – in this space (if space it may be called).’⁵⁷ Soon we saw the stable and the church, and I took him to the altar, and opened the Bible, and lo! it was a deep pit, into which I descended, driving the angel before me. Soon we saw seven houses of brick.⁵⁸ One we entered; in it were a [Plate 20] number of monkeys, baboons, and all of that species, chained by the middle, grinning and snatching at one another, but withheld by the shortness of their chains. However, I saw that they sometimes grew numerous, and then the weak were caught by the strong, and, with a grinning aspect, first coupled with, and then devoured, by plucking off first one limb and then another, till the body was left a helpless trunk. This, after grinning and kissing it with seeming fondness, they devoured too. And here and there I saw one savourily picking the flesh off of his own tail. As the stench terribly annoyed us both, we went into the mill, and I in my hand brought the skeleton of a body, which in the mill was Aristotle’s Analytics.⁵⁹

So the Angel said, ‘Thy fantasy has imposed upon me and thou oughtest to be ashamed.’

I answered, ‘We impose on one another, and it is but lost time to converse with you whose works are only Analytics.’

Opposition is true friendship.

[Plate 21]

I have always found that Angels have the vanity to speak of themselves as the only wise; this they do with a confident insolence sprouting from systematic reasoning.

Thus Swedenborg boasts that what he writes is new, though it is only the contents or index of already published books.

A man carried a monkey about for a show, and, because he was a little wiser than the monkey, grew vain, and conceived himself as much wiser than seven men. It is so with Swedenborg: he shows the folly of churches and exposes hypocrites, till he imagines that all are religious, and himself the single [Plate 22] one on earth that ever broke a net.

Now hear a plain fact: Swedenborg has not written one new truth. Now hear another: he has written all the old falsehoods.

And now hear the reason: he conversed with Angels, who are all religious, and conversed not with Devils who all hate religion, for he was incapable through his conceited notions.

Thus Swedenborg's writings are a recapitulation of all superficial opinions, and an analysis of the more sublime – but no further.

Have now another plain fact: any man of mechanical talents may, from the writings of Paracelsus or Jacob Behmen,⁶⁰ produce ten thousand volumes of equal value with Swedenborg's – and, from those of Dante or Shakespeare, an infinite number.

But when he has done this, let him not say that he knows better than his master, for he only holds a candle in sunshine.

A Memorable Fancy [A Devil, My Friend]

Once I saw a Devil in a flame of fire, who arose before an Angel that sat on a cloud, and the Devil uttered these words:

‘The worship of God is honouring his gifts in other men, each according to his genius, and loving the [Plate 23] greatest men best. Those who envy or calumniate great men hate God, for there is no other God.’

The Angel hearing this became almost blue; but, mastering himself, he grew yellow, and, at last, white, pink and smiling. And then replied:

‘Thou idolater! Is not God One? And is not he visible in Jesus Christ? And has not Jesus Christ given his sanction to the law of ten commandments, and are not all other men fools, sinners and nothings?’

The Devil answered, ‘Bray a fool in a mortar with wheat, yet shall not his folly be beaten out of him.⁶¹ If Jesus Christ is the greatest man, you ought to love him in the greatest degree; now hear how he has given his sanction to the law of ten commandments. Did he not mock at the Sabbath, and so mock the Sabbath’s God? Murder those who were murdered because of him? Turn away the law from the woman taken in adultery? Steal the labour of others to support him? Bear false witness when he omitted making a defence before Pilate? Covet when he prayed for his disciples, and when he bid them shake off the dust of their feet against such as refused to lodge them? I tell you, no virtue can exist without breaking these ten commandments: Jesus was all virtue and acted from impulse, [Plate 24] not from rules.’

When he had so spoken, I beheld the Angel who stretched out his arms embracing the flame of fire, and he was consumed and arose as Elijah.⁶²

Note: This Angel, who is now become a Devil, is my particular friend: we often read the Bible together in its infernal or diabolical sense, which the world shall have if they behave well.

I have also the Bible of Hell:⁶³ which the world shall have whether they will or no.

One law for the lion and ox is oppression.⁶⁴

[Plate 25]

*A Song of Liberty*⁶⁵

1. The Eternal Female groaned!⁶⁶ It was heard over all the Earth:
2. Albion’s⁶⁷ coast is sick, silent; the American meadows faint!
3. Shadows of Prophecy shiver along by the lakes and the rivers, and mutter across the ocean! France, rend down thy dungeon;⁶⁸
4. Golden Spain, burst the barriers of old Rome;⁶⁹
5. Cast thy keys,⁷⁰ oh Rome, into the deep down falling, even to eternity down falling,
6. And weep!⁷¹

7. In her trembling hands, she took the new-born terror howling;
8. On those infinite mountains of light now barred out by the Atlantic sea,⁷² the new-born fire stood before the starry king!⁷³
9. Flagged⁷⁴ with grey-browed snows and thunderous visages, the jealous wings⁷⁵ waved over the deep.
10. The speary hand burned aloft, unbuckled was the shield, forth went the hand of jealousy among the flaming hair, and [Plate 26] hurled the new-born wonder⁷⁶ through the starry night.
11. The fire, the fire, is falling!
12. Look up! Look up! Oh citizen of London, enlarge thy countenance! Oh Jew, leave counting gold, return to thy oil and wine! Oh African! Black African! (Go, winged thought, widen his forehead.)⁷⁷
13. The fiery limbs, the flaming hair, shot like the sinking sun into the western sea.
14. Waked from his eternal sleep, the hoary element⁷⁸ roaring fled away;
15. Down rushed, beating his wings in vain the jealous king;⁷⁹ his grey-browed counsellors, thunderous warriors, curled veterans, among helms and shields and chariots, horses, elephants: banners, castles, slings and rocks,
16. Falling, rushing, ruining! buried in the ruins, on Urthona's⁸⁰ dens.
17. All night beneath the ruins; then their sullen flames faded emerge round the gloomy king.
18. With thunder and fire: leading his starry hosts through the waste wilderness [Plate 27] he promulgates his ten commands,⁸¹ glancing his beamy eyelids over the deep in dark dismay,
19. Where the son of fire⁸² in his eastern cloud, while the morning plumes her golden breast,
20. Spurning the clouds written with curses, stamps the stony law⁸³ to dust, loosing the eternal horses from the dens of night, crying, 'Empire is no more! And now the lion and wolf shall cease.'⁸⁴

Chorus

Let the priests of the Raven of dawn no longer, in deadly black, with hoarse note, curse the sons of joy; nor his accepted brethren (whom, tyrant, he calls free) lay the bound or build the roof; nor pale religious lechery call that virginity that wishes but acts not!

For everything that lives is Holy.⁸⁵

The Marriage of Heaven and Hell

² Various datings have been suggested over the years, but the editors of the Blake Trust/Tate Gallery edition settle on 1790.

³ Rintrah the just wrath of the prophet, presaging revolution.

⁴ Rintrah...air cf. Amos 1: 2: 'The Lord will roar from Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem.'

⁵ swag sway, sag.

⁶ bleached bones a valley of dry bones symbolizes the exiled 'house of Israel', Ezekiel 37:3–4.

⁷ Red clay sometimes taken to mean Adam, the first man, formed from the dust of the ground.

9 his writings...folded up Jesus' body was wrapped in a linen shroud, laid in a sepulchre, and closed with a rock (Mark 15:46). When three women came to anoint the body, they found the stone rolled aside and the body gone.

10 Edom Esau, cheated of his birthright by his brother Jacob (Genesis 25:29–34); his dominion is foreseen by his father, Isaac (Genesis 27:40). The dominion of Edom is a time when the just man has restored to him what is his due – effectively, a time of revolution.

11 Isaiah 34 and 35 Isaiah 34 prophesies the 'day of the Lord's vengeance' against the enemies of Israel; Isaiah 35 concerns the restoration of power to Israel. Blake may have interpreted them as being about the French Revolution.

12 Without contraries...existence a swipe at Swedenborg's theory of correspondence and equilibrium.

13 Good is...Energy cf. Blake's marginalia in Lavater's Aphorisms: 'Active evil is better than passive good.'

14 Energy a term associated with revolutionary action, particularly in discussions of current events in Revolutionary France; Burke commented on 'this dreadful and portentous energy' in 1790.

15 The history...Death a deliberate inversion of the plan of Milton's poem, by which it becomes the story of how desire and energy are usurped by restraint and reason. Blake casts Jesus as Reason and Satan as the hero. In Paradise Lost Satan's daughter, Sin, is born from his head, and Death is the product of their incestuous union.

16 But in the Book...Satan In Job, Satan accuses and torments Job (as God's agent); likewise, 'Milton's Messiah' accuses and torments Adam and Eve.

17 This is shown...Desire a reference to John 14:16–17, 26, where Jesus tells his disciples that he will pray to the ‘Father’ to ‘give you another Comforter’, which is ‘the Spirit of truth’ and ‘the Holy Ghost’.

18 he Blake originally etched ‘the Devil’.

19 The ‘Memorable Fancy’ parodies Swedenborg’s ‘Memorable Relations’ – short tales used to underline particular ideas.

20 As I was walking...Hell parodic of Swedenborg’s excursions in the spiritual world.

21 home various interpretations have been suggested: the world of daily business; Blake’s workshop; or England.

22 on the abyss...world In Blake’s metaphor the abyss is the head, where all five senses are located, and the cliff is the face.

23 a mighty Devil Blake himself, who has hell inside his head. He sees himself reflected in the copper plate.

24 With corroding fires acids; Blake etched sentences into copper plates with acids.

25 How do you know...five an echo of Chatterton, Bristowe Tragedie, or the Dethe of Syr Charles Bawdin (1768): ‘How dydd I knowe thatt ev’ry darte / That cutte the airie waie / Myghte nott fynde passage toe my harte / And close myne eyes for aie?’

26 The proverb or aphorism was a widely employed literary form; Blake knew the biblical Book of Proverbs and Lavater’s Aphorisms on Man (1788), among others.

27 fell skin.

28 Cf. ‘The Garden of Love’ 11–12.

29 I saw no God...perception Though appropriated for the priesthood by the religious, Isaiah is here reclaimed for the just man. The statement is highly subversive of the Bible, where Isaiah is inclined to say such things as ‘Moreover the Lord said unto me’ (Isaiah 8:1).

30 honest indignation at, for instance, social or political injustice. In the Bible indignation is attributed, by contrast, to God: ‘his lips are full of indignation’ (Isaiah 30:27).

31 removed mountains an allusion to Jesus, who withers a fig tree with his words, and tells his disciples, ‘if ye have faith, and doubt not ... if ye shall say unto this mountain, Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea; it shall be done’ (Matthew 21:21).

32 our great poet King David second king of Judah and Israel, author of the Psalms.

33 pathetic ’ly movingly.

34 And we so loved...nations ironic; Isaiah and Ezekiel curse the deities of other nations, and predict their destruction (Isaiah 19; Ezekiel 29–32).

35 Diogenes the Grecian Greek philosopher of the Cynic school (d. 320 BC), said to have wandered through Athens with a lantern searching for one honest person; also said to have lived in a barrel.

36 I then asked Ezekiel...side Ezekiel lay 390 days on his left side, 40 on his right. He did not eat dung but cooked with it (Ezekiel 4).

37 The ancient tradition...true In the fashion of Swedenborg, Blake predicts the end of the world. It was widely believed, at the end of the eighteenth century, that the 6,000 year lifespan of the world was about to end.

38 For the cherub...life At Genesis 3:22, 24, cherubim are commanded to guard the way of the tree of life with a flaming sword.

39 corrosives Blake's printing technique involved the use of acid.

40 This memorable fancy picks up the metaphor of body as cave, in order to show how the 'doors of perception' can be cleansed by 'a printing-house in hell' with five chambers (one for each sense) and a sixth where men receive the products of the first five. The printing-house produces imaginative ('infernal') thoughts.

41 Viper perhaps a brush or pen, or the lines made by such implements.

42 feathers of air Blake used feathers in his printing process, perhaps to stir the acid over his plates.

43 cast the metals...expanse probably copper plates 'cast ... into the expanse' of paper, during the printing process.

44 The Giants...activity By contrast, Swedenborg condemned the antediluvian giants at Genesis 6:4 for self-love and sensuality.

45 Matthew 25:32-3.

46 Matthew 10:34. See also Luke 12:51, where Jesus asks: 'Suppose ye that I am come to give peace on earth? I tell you, nay; but rather division.'

47 This memorable fancy is based on an episode in Swedenborg's Conjugal Love in which an angel shows a young man various contrary visions by alternately opening his internal, and closing his external sight. Blake satirizes Swedenborg by giving his narrator the energy and wisdom to challenge his angelic guide.

48 So he took me...mill The church is entered through a stable of rationalism and leads to the mill of mechanistic philosophy that Blake so thoroughly despised.

49 the infinite Abyss presumably hell.

50 Between the black and white spiders In Swedenborgian terms, an existence between false reasoners, perhaps between false contraries such as good and evil.

51 east In Swedenborg the Lord is always ‘to the east’.

52 distant...degrees Paris, centre of the French Revolution, is three degrees in longitude from London.

53 Leviathan huge sea-dragon associated with eclipses of sun and moon, who threatens the natural order; see Isaiah 27:1 and Revelation 13:2, for instance. Blake probably has in mind the prophecy in Revelation that the Leviathan will be cast in a pit for a thousand years before being loosed – effectively turning him into a version of the just man whose time has come (Revelation 11:7; 20:1–3).

54 and then this...harp The abrupt transition mimics, and to some extent parodies, that at Revelation 13–14, where the vision of the beast suddenly gives way to a vision of the Lamb where John hears ‘the voice of harpers harping with their harps’ (Revelation 14:2–3).

55 I by force...shadow a parody of Swedenborgian space travel.

56 into the void...stars i.e. into an intellectual vacuum.

57 if space it may be called The phrasing echoes Milton’s description of Death.

58 seven houses of brick houses in Swedenborg signify states of mind; possibly also a reference to the seven churches of Asia castigated by John, Revelation 1:4.

59 Analytics Aristotle wrote two volumes of Analytics, which serve to symbolize an inhuman rationality. Its transformation from the monkey skeleton parodies similar transformations in Swedenborg.

60 Paracelsus or Jacob Behmen Philippus Aureolus Theophrastus Bombastus von Hohenheim, known as Paracelsus (1493–1541), a Swiss-German physician and alchemist; Jakob Boehme (1575–1624), German cobbler and mystic. Blake placed Paracelsus and Boehme alongside Shakespeare among his closest spiritual friends.

61 Bray a fool...him cf. Proverbs 27:22: ‘Though thou shouldest bray [crush] a fool in a mortar among wheat with a pestle, yet will not his foolishness depart from him.’

62 I beheld...Elijah Elijah is taken up to heaven in a chariot of fire, 2 Kings 2:11.

63 the Bible of Hell possibly a work projected by Blake, which might have included the Proverbs of Hell and Urizen.

64 Above this motto in Blake’s plate, a bearded man, looking at the reader with an expression of anguish, crawls along the ground on all fours, naked.

65 Some have argued that this originated as a separate work from the Marriage.

66 The Eternal Female groaned This momentous birth (of Revolution) heralds an apocalypse.

67 Albion England.

68 France, rend down thy dungeon The Bastille prison was stormed by the mob, and demolished, in July 1789. It was a powerful symbol of liberation.

69 Rome the Roman Catholic Church.

70 keys keys of St Peter, symbolic of papal power.

71 This line originally read: 'And weep and bow thy reverend locks.'

72 On those...sea the mythical ancient kingdom of Atlantis.

73 the starry king Urizen, the primeval priest, in this case a type of the oppressive ruler.

74 Flagged covered.

75 the jealous wings of Urizen; cf. 'Earth's Answer' 7 and n.

76 the new-born wonder Orc, spirit of revolution.

77 Oh, citizen...forehead Blake foresees revolution across the world, from England to the Middle East and Africa.

78 the hoary element The sea retreats, in preparation for the re-emergence of Atlantis. The disappearance of the sea is prophesied Revelation 21:1.

79 the jealous king Urizen, who is falling.

80 Urthona is the creative, imaginative principle.

81 ten commands cf. God's handing down to Moses of the Ten Commandments, Exodus 20.

82 the son of fire a Christ-like anti-Moses, anti-Jehovah figure, who is to liberate mankind.

83 the stony law The Ten Commandments were inscribed on tablets of stone.

84 And now...cease cf. Isaiah's prophecy of a new heaven and new earth where 'the wolf and the lamb shall feed together (Isaiah 65:25).

85 For everything...Holy a parodic reversal of Revelation 15:4: 'For thou [God] only art holy: for all nations shall come and worship before thee.'

Visions of the Daughters of Albion(1793)

[\[Plate 1\]](#)

The Eye sees more than the Heart knows.1

[\[Plate 3\]](#)

The Argument

I loved Theotormon^{2}
And I was not ashamed;
I trembled in my virgin fears
And I hid in Leutha's vale!

I plucked Leutha's flower,^{3} 5
And I rose up from the vale;
But the terrible thunders tore
My virgin mantle^{4} in twain.

Visions

Enslaved,^{5} the Daughters of Albion^{6} weep: a trembling lamentation
Upon their mountains, in their valleys, sighs toward America. 10

For the soft soul of America,^{7} Oothoon wandered in woe
Along the vales of Leutha seeking flowers to comfort her;

And thus she spoke to the bright Marigold of Leutha's vale:

‘Art thou a flower? Art thou a nymph? I see thee now a flower,
Now a nymph! I dare not pluck thee from thy dewy bed!’ 15

The golden nymph replied, ‘Pluck thou my flower, Oothoon the mild;

Another flower shall spring, because the soul of sweet delight
Can never pass away.’ She ceased and closed her golden shrine.

Then Oothoon plucked the flower, saying, ‘I pluck thee from thy bed,
Sweet flower, and put thee here to glow between my breasts;⁸ 20
And thus I turn my face to where my whole soul seeks.’

Over the waves she went in winged exulting swift delight,
And over Theotormon's reign⁹ took her impetuous course.

Lay the faint maid, and soon her woes appalled his thunders hoarse. 25

Bromion spoke: ‘Behold this harlot here on Bromion's bed,
And let the jealous dolphins¹¹ sport around the lovely maid.
Thy soft American plains are mine, and mine thy north and south.

Stamped with my signet are the swarthy children of the sun¹² –
They are obedient, they resist not, they obey the scourge; 30
Their daughters worship terrors and obey the violent.

[Plate 5]

Now thou may'st marry Bromion's harlot, and protect the child
Of Bromion's rage that Oothoon shall put forth in nine moons' time.’

Then storms rent Theotormon's limbs; he rolled his waves around
And folded his black jealous waters round the adulterate pair. 35

Bound back to back in Bromion's caves,¹³ terror and meekness dwell.

At entrance Theotormon sits wearing the threshold hard

With secret tears; beneath him sound like waves on a desert shore

The voice of slaves beneath the sun, and children bought with money
That shiver in religious caves beneath the burning fires 40

Of lust, that belch incessant from the summits of the earth.

Oothoon weeps not – she cannot weep! Her tears are locked up

But she can howl incessant writhing her soft snowy limbs,
And calling Theotormon's Eagles to prey upon her flesh. 14

'I call with holy voice, kings of the sounding air! 45
Rend away this defiled bosom that I may reflect
The image of Theotormon on my pure transparent breast.'
The Eagles at her call descend and rend their bleeding prey:
Theotormon severely smiles – her soul reflects the smile
As the clear spring mudded with feet of beasts grows pure and smiles. 50

The Daughters of Albion hear her woes, and echo back her sighs.

'Why does my Theotormon sit weeping upon the threshold,
And Oothoon hovers by his side, persuading him in vain? 15
I cry, "Arise, oh Theotormon, for the village dog
Barks at the breaking day; the nightingale has done lamenting; 55
The lark does rustle in the ripe corn, and the Eagle returns
From nightly prey, and lifts his golden beak to the pure east,
Shaking the dust from his immortal pinions to awake
The sun that sleeps too long. Arise, my Theotormon, I am pure
Because the night is gone that closed me in its deadly black." 60
They told me that the night and day were all that I could see;
They told me that I had five senses to enclose me up,
And they enclosed my infinite brain into a narrow circle,
And sunk my heart into the Abyss, a red round globe hot burning,
Till all from life I was obliterated and erased. 65

Instead of morn arises a bright shadow like an eye
In the eastern cloud; instead of night, a sickly charnel house,
That Theotormon hears me not! To him the night and morn
Are both alike: a night of sighs, a morning of fresh tears –

[\[Plate 6\]](#)

And none but Bromion can hear my lamentations. 70

With what sense is it that the chicken shuns the ravenous hawk?
With what sense does the tame pigeon measure out the expanse?
With what sense does the bee form cells? Have not the mouse and frog
Eyes and ears and sense of touch? Yet are their habitations

And their pursuits as different as their forms and as their joys. 75
Ask the wild ass why he refuses burdens; and the meek camel
Why he loves man – is it because of eye, ear, mouth or skin
Or breathing nostrils? No, for these the wolf and tiger have.
Ask the blind worm the secrets of the grave, and why her spires
Love to curl round the bones of death; and ask the rav'nous snake 80

Where she gets poison; and the winged eagle why he loves the sun –
And then tell me the thoughts of man that have been hid of old.

Silent I hover all the night, and all day could be silent
If Theotormon once would turn his loved eyes upon me.
How can I be defiled when I reflect thy image pure? 85
Sweetest the fruit that the worm feeds on, and the soul preyed on by woe,

The new-washed lamb tinged with the village smoke, and the bright swan

By the red earth of our immortal river! I bathe my wings
And I am white and pure to hover round Theotormon's breast.'

Then Theotormon broke his silence, and he answered. 90
'Tell me what is the night or day to one o'erflowed with woe?
Tell me what is a thought, and of what substance is it made?
Tell me what is a joy, and in what gardens do joys grow?
And in what rivers swim the sorrows, and upon what mountains
[\[Plate 7\]](#)

Wave shadows of discontent? And in what houses dwell the wretched 95

Drunken with woe forgotten, and shut up from cold despair?
Tell me where dwell the thoughts forgotten till thou call them forth?
Tell me where dwell the joys of old, and where the ancient loves?

And when will they renew again, and the night of oblivion past? 16
That I might traverse times and spaces far remote, and bring 100
Comforts into a present sorrow and a night of pain.

Where goest thou, oh thought? To what remote land is thy flight?
If thou returnest to the present moment of affliction
Wilt thou bring comforts on thy wings, and dews and honey and balm?

Or poison from the desert wilds, from the eyes of the envier?' 105

Then Bromion said (and shook the cavern with his lamentation),
'Thou knowest that the ancient trees seen by thine eyes have fruit,
But knowest thou that trees and fruits flourish upon the earth
To gratify senses unknown? Trees, beasts and birds unknown?
Unknown, not unperceived, spread in the infinite microscope, 110
In places yet unvisited by the voyager, and in worlds
Over another kind of seas, and in atmospheres unknown.

Ah, are there other wars, beside the wars of sword and fire?
And are there other sorrows, beside the sorrows of poverty?
And are there other joys, beside the joys of riches and ease? 115
And is there not one law for both the lion and the ox?
And is there not eternal fire, and eternal chains
To bind the phantoms of existence from eternal life?'

Then Oothoon waited silent all the day and all the night,

[\[Plate 8\]](#)

But when the morn arose, her lamentation renewed – 120
The Daughters of Albion hear her woes, and echo back her sighs.
'Oh Urizen!¹⁷ Creator of men! mistaken Demon of heaven!
Thy joys are tears, thy labour vain – to form men to thine image.
How can one joy absorb another? Are not different joys
Holy, eternal, infinite? And each joy is a Love! 125
Does not the great mouth laugh at a gift, and the narrow eyelids mock
At the labour that is above payment? And wilt thou take the ape
For thy counsellor? Or the dog, for a schoolmaster to thy children?
Does he who contemns poverty, and he who turns with abhorrence
From usury, feel the same passion? Or are they moved alike? 130
How can the giver of gifts experience the delights of the merchant?
How the industrious citizen the pains of the husbandman?
How different far the fat-fed hireling with hollow drum
Who buys whole cornfields into wastes,¹⁸ and sings upon the heath –
How different their eye and ear! How different the world to them! 135

With what sense does the parson claim the labour of the farmer?¹⁹

What are his nets and gins and traps, and how does he surround him
With cold floods of abstraction, and with forests of solitude,
To build him castles and high spires where kings and priests may dwell?

Till she who burns with youth, and knows no fixed lot, is bound 140

In spells of law to one she loathes. And must she drag the chain
Of life in weary lust?²⁰ Must chilling murderous thoughts obscure
The clear heaven of her eternal spring? – to bear the wintry rage
Of a harsh terror, driv'n to madness, bound to hold a rod²¹
Over her shrinking shoulders all the day, and all the night 145
To turn the wheel of false desire? – and longings that wake her womb
To the abhorred birth of cherubs in the human form
That live a pestilence and die a meteor, and are no more?
Till the child dwell with one he hates, and do the deed he loathes,
And the impure scourge force his seed into its unripe birth 150
Ere yet his eyelids can behold the arrows of the day.

Does the whale worship at thy footsteps as the hungry dog?
Or does he scent the mountain prey because his nostrils wide
Draw in the ocean? Does his eye discern the flying cloud
As the raven's eye? Or does he measure the expanse like the vulture? 155

Does the still spider view the cliffs where eagles hide their young?
Or does the fly rejoice because the harvest is brought in?
Does not the eagle scorn the earth and despise the treasures beneath?
But the mole knoweth what is there, and the worm shall tell it thee.
Does not the worm erect a pillar in the mouldering churchyard, 160

[Plate 9]

And a palace of eternity in the jaws of the hungry grave?
Over his porch these words are written: “Take thy bliss O Man!
And sweet shall be thy taste, and sweet thy infant joys renew!”

Infancy, fearless, lustful, happy! – nestling for delight
In laps of pleasure; Innocence! honest, open, seeking 165
The vigorous joys of morning light, open to virgin bliss –

Who taught thee modesty, subtle modesty, child of night and sleep?
When thou awakest, wilt thou dissemble all thy secret joys
Or wert thou not awake when all this mystery was disclosed?
Then com'st thou forth a modest virgin knowing to dissemble²² 170

With nets found under thy night pillow, to catch virgin joy,
And brand it with the name of whore, and sell it in the night²³
In silence, ev'n without a whisper, and in seeming sleep.
Religious dreams and holy vespers light thy smoky fires;
Once were thy fires lighted by the eyes of honest morn. 175

And does my Theotormon seek this hypocrite modesty,
This knowing, artful, secret, fearful, cautious, trembling hypocrite?
Then is Oothoon a whore indeed! and all the virgin joys
Of life are harlots, and Theotormon is a sick man's dream,
And Oothoon is the crafty slave of selfish holiness. 180

But Oothoon is not so: a virgin filled with virgin fancies,
Open to joy and to delight wherever beauty appears.
If in the morning sun I find it, there my eyes are fixed
[\[Plate 10\]](#)

In happy copulation; if in evening mild, wearied with work,
Sit on a bank and draw the pleasures of this free-born joy. 185

The moment of desire! the moment of desire! The virgin
That pines for man shall awaken her womb to enormous joys
In the secret shadows of her chamber;²⁴ the youth shut up from
The lustful joy shall forget to generate, and create an amorous image
In the shadows of his curtains and in the folds of his silent pillow.²⁵ 190

Are not these the places of religion? The rewards of continence?
The self-enjoyings of self-denial? Why dost thou seek religion?
Is it because acts are not lovely that thou seekest solitude
Where the horrible darkness is impressed with reflections of desire?

Father of Jealousy,²⁶ be thou accursed from the earth! 195
Why hast thou taught my Theotormon this accursed thing?

Till beauty fades from off my shoulders, darkened and cast out,
A solitary shadow wailing on the margin of nonentity.

I cry, "Love! Love! Love! happy, happy Love! Free as the mountain wind!"

Can that be Love, that drinks another as a sponge drinks water? 200

That clouds with jealousy his nights, with weepings all the day?

To spin a web of age around him, grey and hoary, dark,

Till his eyes sicken at the fruit that hangs before his sight?²⁷

Such is self-love that envies all! – a creeping skeleton

With lamp-like eyes, watching around the frozen marriage bed. 205

But silken nets and traps of adamant will Oothoon spread,

And catch for thee girls of mild silver, or of furious gold;

I'll lie beside thee on a bank and view their wanton play

In lovely copulation, bliss on bliss, with Theotormon;

Red as the rosy morning, lustful as the first-born beam, 210

Oothoon shall view his dear delight, nor e'er with jealous cloud

Come in the heaven of generous love, nor selfish blightings bring.

Does the sun walk in glorious raiment on the secret floor

[\[Plate 11\]](#)

Where the cold miser spreads his gold? Or does the bright cloud drop

On his stone threshold? Does his eye behold the beam that brings 215

Expansion to the eye of pity? Or will he bind himself

Beside the ox to thy hard furrow? Does not that mild beam blot

The bat, the owl, the glowing tiger, and the king of night?

The sea-fowl takes the wintry blast for a cov'ring to her limbs

And the wild snake the pestilence to adorn him with gems and gold; 220

And trees and birds and beasts and men behold their eternal joy.

Arise, you little glancing wings, and sing your infant joy!

Arise and drink your bliss, for every thing that lives is holy!

Thus every morning wails Oothoon, but Theotormon sits
Upon the margined ocean, conversing with shadows dire. 225

The Daughters of Albion hear her woes, and echo back her sighs.

The End

Notes

1 The motto appears on the poem's title-page.

2 Theotormon Blake's coinage; the speaker in the argument is Oothoon, who represents thwarted love. The name Theotormon probably means 'tormented of god' or 'tormented of law'.

3 I plucked Leutha's flower symbolic of an attempt to acquire sexual experience.

4 My virgin mantle the hymen.

6 Enslaved Wollstonecraft had described women as 'the slaves of injustice'.

7 America has been 'raped' by European exploitation.

8 between my breasts In Homer's Iliad, Juno places the 'bridle' (girdle) of Venus between her breasts as a sign of sexual awakening.

9 Theotormon's reign the sea.

10 Bromion...thunders On her way to her beloved Theotormon, Oothoon is raped by Bromion. Bromion also embodies the cruelty of slave-owners (lines 29–30). His name means 'roarer' in Greek.

11 jealous dolphins representative of the feelings of Theotormon, whom Bromion is addressing.

12 Stamped...sun Newly bought slaves were branded with their owner's name.

13 Bound back to back...caves Oothoon and Bromion are bound back to back in Theotormon's cave, while he guards its entrance. This is depicted in one of the most famous, and impressive, of Blake's illustrations (see Blake, Early Illuminated Books 268–9).

14 And calling...flesh When Zeus chained Prometheus on the mountain-top (when he refused to reveal the prophecy of Zeus' fall), an eagle preyed on Prometheus' liver.

15 Theotormon's ineffectual response to the rape of Oothoon by Bromion is probably suggested by the behaviour of J. G. Stedman (see headnote, p. 178), who wrote of how he fell in love with Joanna, a slave. After a brief affair, he failed to buy her freedom and returned to England without her. He remembered how 'I fancied I saw her tortured, insulted, and bowing under the weight of her chains, calling aloud, but in vain, for my assistance.' Although he disapproved of the treatment of female slaves, Stedman did nothing to prevent the cruelty he witnessed.

16 And when...past? i.e. when will the thoughts, joys, and loves renew; when will the night of oblivion be past?

17 Urizen ('your reason') the creator of the fallen, fragmented world.

18 cornfields into wastes Expenditure of harvests and men on war is associated with enclosure and agricultural decline. The enlistment of young men in the army left a dearth of farmers to till the land, which in turn led to food shortages.

19 With what sense...farmer a reference to tithes, taxes paid by peasants to the church.

20 And must...lust Wollstonecraft probably inspired the notion of marriage as slavery.

21 rod yoke for bearing burdens over the shoulders; though perhaps also the rod or whip of her slave-driving husband.

22 a modest virgin...dissemble Wollstonecraft lamented the tendency of women to spend so much time in front of mirrors, ‘for this exercise of cunning is only an instinct of nature to enable them to obtain indirectly a little of that power of which they are unjustly denied a share’.

23 sell it in the night prostitution.

24 The virgin...chamber female masturbation.

25 the youth...pillow male masturbation.

26 Father of jealousy Urizen.

27 Till his eyes...sight cf. Tantalus who, in Hades, has delicious fruit growing just beyond reach in Greek myth.

The First Book of Urizen¹(1794)

[Plate 2]

Preludium to the First Book of Urizen

Of the primeval Priest’s assumed power,²
When Eternals spurned back his³ religion
And gave him a place in the north –
Obscure, shadowy, void, solitary.

Eternals, I hear your call gladly⁴ – 5
Dictate swift-winged words, and fear not
To unfold your dark visions of torment.

[Plate 3]

Chapter I

1. Lo, a shadow of horror is risen
In Eternity! Unknown, unprolific!
Self-closed, all-repelling; what Demon 10
Hath formed this abominable void,⁵
This soul-shudd'ring vacuum? Some said,
'It is Urizen'.⁶ But unknown, abstracted,
Brooding secret,⁷ the dark power hid.

2. Times on times he divided,⁸ and measured 15
Space by space in his ninefold darkness,⁹
Unseen, unknown; changes appeared
In his desolate mountains,¹⁰ rifted furious
By the black winds of perturbation.

3. For he strove in battles dire, 20
In unseen conflicts, with shapes
Bred from his forsaken wilderness,
Of beast, bird, fish, serpent and element,
Combustion, blast, vapour and cloud.¹¹

4. Dark, revolving in silent activity, 25
Unseen in tormenting passions,
An activity unknown and horrible;
A self-contemplating shadow
In enormous labours occupied.

5. But Eternals beheld his vast forests. 30
Age on ages he lay, closed, unknown,
Brooding, shut in the deep; all avoid
The petrific¹² abominable chaos.

6. His cold horrors silent, dark Urizen
Prepared: his ten thousands of thunders 35

Ranged in gloomed array stretch out across
The dread world, and the rolling of wheels,
As of swelling seas, sound in his clouds,
In his hills of stored snows, in his mountains
Of hail and ice; voices of terror 40
Are heard, like thunders of autumn,
When the cloud blazes over the harvests.

*Chapter II*¹³

1. Earth was not, nor globes of attraction.¹⁴
The will of the Immortal¹⁵ expanded
Or contracted his all-flexible senses. 45
Death was not, but eternal life sprung.

2. The sound of a trumpet! The heavens
Awoke, and vast clouds of blood rolled
Round the dim rocks of Urizen (so named
That solitary one in Immensity). 50

3. Shrill the trumpet, and myriads of Eternity
[Plate 4]
Muster around the bleak deserts
Now filled with clouds darkness and waters
That rolled perplexed, lab'ring, and uttered
Words articulate, bursting in thunders 55
That rolled on the tops of his mountains.

4. 'From the depths of dark solitude,¹⁶ From
The eternal abode in my holiness,
Hidden, set apart in my stern counsels,
Reserved for the days of futurity, 60
I have sought for a joy without pain,

For a solid without fluctuation.

Why will you die oh Eternals?¹⁷

Why live in unquenchable burnings?

5. First I fought with the fire, consumed 65

Inwards, into a deep world within:

A void immense, wild dark and deep

Where nothing was; Nature's wide womb.

And self-balanced, stretched o'er the void

I alone, even I! the winds merciless 70

Bound; but condensing in torrents

They fall and fall; strong, I repelled

The vast waves, and arose on the waters –

A wide world of solid obstruction.

6. Here alone I, in books formed of metals, 75

Have written the secrets of wisdom,¹⁸

The secrets of dark contemplation,

By fightings and conflicts dire

With terrible monsters sin-bred,

Which the bosoms of all inhabit, 80

Seven deadly sins of the soul.

7. Lo! I unfold my darkness: and on

This rock place with strong hand the Book

Of eternal brass, written in my solitude.

8. Laws of peace, of love, of unity, 85

Of pity,¹⁹ compassion, forgiveness.

Let each choose one habitation,

His ancient infinite mansion.

One command, one joy, one desire,

One curse, one weight, one measure, 90

One King, one God, one Law.²⁰

Chapter III

1. The voice ended. They saw his pale visage
Emerge from the darkness, his hand
On the rock of eternity unclasping
The Book of brass. Rage seized the strong, 95

2. Rage, fury, intense indignation,
In cataracts of fire blood and gall,
In whirlwinds of sulphurous smoke
And enormous forms of energy;
All the seven deadly sins of the soul 100

[\[Plate 5\]](#)

In living creations appeared
In the flames of eternal fury.

3. Sund'ring, dark'ning, thund'ring!
Rent away with a terrible crash,
Eternity rolled wide apart, 105
Wide asunder rolling
Mountainous all around
Departing; departing; departing:
Leaving ruinous fragments of life,
Hanging frowning cliffs, and all between 110
An ocean of voidness unfathomable.

4. The roaring fires ran o'er the heav'ns
In whirlwinds and cataracts of blood,
And o'er the dark deserts of Urizen
Fires pour through the void on all sides 115
On Urizen's self-begotten armies.

5. But no light from the fires: all was darkness
In the flames of Eternal fury.

6. In fierce anguish and quenchless flames
To the deserts and rocks he ran raging 120
To hide, but he could not: combining,
He dug mountains and hills in vast strength,
He piled them in incessant labour,
In howlings and pangs and fierce madness
Long periods in burning fires labouring 125
Till hoary and age-broke and aged,
In despair and the shadows of death.

7. And a roof vast, petrific, around,
On all sides he framed, like a womb
Where thousands of rivers in veins 130
Of blood pour down the mountains to cool
The eternal fires beating without
From Eternals; and, like a black globe
Viewed by sons of Eternity, standing
On the shore of the infinite ocean, 135
Like a human heart struggling and beating,
The vast world of Urizen appeared.

8. And Los²¹ round the dark globe of Urizen
Kept watch for Eternals to confine
The obscure separation alone; 140
For Eternity stood wide apart
[\[Plate 7\]](#)

As the stars are apart from the earth.

9. Los wept, howling around the dark Demon
And cursing his lot; for in anguish
Urizen was rent from his side:²² 145
And a fathomless void for his feet,
And intense fires for his dwelling.

10. But Urizen laid in a stony sleep
Unorganized, rent from Eternity.

11. The Eternals said: ‘What is this? Death.^{23} 150
Urizen is a clod of clay.’
[Plate 9]

12. Los howled in a dismal stupor,
Groaning! Gnashing! Groaning!
Till the wrenching apart was healed.

13. But the wrenching of Urizen healed not; 155
Cold, featureless, flesh or clay,
Rifted with direful changes
He lay in a dreamless night.

14. Till Los roused his fires, affrighted
At the formless unmeasurable death. 160
[Plate 10]

Chapter IVa

1. Los, smitten with astonishment,
Frightened at the hurtling bones,

2. And at the surging sulphureous
Perturbed Immortal mad-raging

3. In whirlwinds and pitch and nitre 165
Round the furious limbs of Los;

4. And Los formed nets and gins^{24}
And threw the nets round about.

5. He watched in shudd’ring fear

The dark changes, and bound every change 170
With rivets of iron and brass;

6. And these were the changes of Urizen.

[\[Plate 12\]](#)

Chapter IVb

1. Ages on ages rolled over him!
In stony sleep ages rolled over him!
Like a dark waste stretching changeable 175
By earthquakes riv'n, belching sullen fires,
On ages rolled ages in ghastly
Sick torment; around him in whirlwinds
Of darkness, the Eternal Prophet^{25} howled,
Beating still on his rivets of iron, 180
Pouring sodor^{26} of iron, dividing
The horrible night into watches.

2. And Urizen (so his eternal name)
His prolific delight obscured more and more
In dark secrecy, hiding in surging 185
Sulphureous fluid his fantasies.
The Eternal Prophet heaved the dark bellows
And turned restless the tongs, and the hammer
Incessant beat, forging chains new and new,
Numb'ring with links, hours, days, and years.^{27} 190

3. The Eternal Mind bounded began to roll
Eddies of wrath ceaseless round and round,
And the sulphureous foam surging thick
Settled – a lake, bright and shining clear,
White as the snow on the mountains cold. 195

4. Forgetfulness, dumbness, necessity!

In chains of the mind locked up
Like fetters of ice shrinking together
Disorganized, rent from Eternity.
Los beat on his fetters of iron, 200
And heated his furnaces, and poured
Iron sodor and sodor of brass.

5. Restless turned the Immortal enchained,
Heaving dolorous! Anguished! Unbearable
Till a roof shaggy wild enclosed 205
In an orb²⁸ his fountain of thought.

6. In a horrible dreamful slumber
Like the linked infernal chain
A vast spine writhed in torment
Upon the winds, shooting pained 210
Ribs, like a bending cavern,
And bones of solidness froze
Over all his nerves of joy.
And a first Age passed over
And a state of dismal woe. 215
[Plate 13]

7. From the caverns of his jointed Spine
Down sunk with fright a red
Round globe²⁹ hot burning, deep
Deep down into the abyss:
Panting, conglobing, trembling, 220
Shooting out ten thousand branches
Around his solid bones.
And a second Age passed over
And a state of dismal woe.

8. In harrowing fear rolling round; 225
His nervous brain shot branches

Round the branches of his heart
On high into two little orbs;³⁰
And fixed in two little caves
Hiding carefully from the wind, 230
His eyes beheld the deep,
And a third Age passed over:
And a state of dismal woe.

9. The pangs of hope began,
In heavy pain striving, struggling; 235
Two Ears in close volutions³¹
From beneath his orbs of vision
Shot spiring out and petrified
As they grew. And a fourth Age passed
And a state of dismal woe. 240

10. In ghastly torment sick;
Hanging upon the wind;
[Plate 15]
Two Nostrils bent down to the deep.
And a fifth Age passed over,
And a state of dismal woe. 245

11. In ghastly torment sick;
Within his ribs bloated round,
A craving hungry cavern;
Thence arose his channelled Throat,
And like a red flame a Tongue 250
Of thirst and of hunger appeared.
And a sixth Age passed over:
And a state of dismal woe.

12. Enraged and stifled with torment,
He threw his right Arm to the north, 255
His left Arm to the south,

Shooting out in anguish deep;
And his Feet stamped the nether Abyss
In trembling and howling and dismay.
And a seventh Age passed over 260
And a state of dismal woe.

Chapter V

1. In terrors Los shrunk from his task –
His great hammer fell from his hand;
His fires beheld and, sickening,
Hid their strong limbs in smoke. 265
For with noises ruinous loud
With hurtlings and clashings and groans
The Immortal endured his chains
Though bound in a deadly sleep.

2. All the myriads of Eternity 270
All the wisdom and joy of life
Roll like a sea around him,
Except what his little orbs
Of sight by degrees unfold.

3. And now his eternal life, 275
Like a dream, was obliterated.

4. Shudd'ring, the Eternal Prophet smote
With a stroke, from his north to south region.
The bellows and hammer are silent now,
A nerveless silence; his prophetic voice 280
Seized; a cold solitude and dark void
The Eternal Prophet and Urizen closed.

5. Ages on ages rolled over them,
Cut off from life and light, frozen

Into horrible forms of deformity. 285
Los suffered his fires to decay,
Then he looked back with anxious desire,
But the space undivided by existence
Struck horror into his soul.

6. Los wept obscured with mourning; 290
His bosom earthquaked with sighs;
He saw Urizen, deadly black,
In his chains bound, and Pity began,

7. In anguish dividing and dividing
(For pity divides the soul),³² 295
In pangs, eternity on eternity,
Life in cataracts poured down his cliffs.
The void shrunk the lymph into Nerves
Wand'ring wide on the bosom of night,
And left a round globe of blood 300
Trembling upon the void.

[\[Plate 16\]](#)

Thus the Eternal Prophet was divided
Before the death-image of Urizen;
For in changeable clouds and darkness
In a winterly night beneath, 305
The Abyss of Los stretched immense.
And now seen, now obscured, to the eyes
Of Eternals the visions remote
Of the dark separation appeared.
As glasses discover Worlds 310
In the endless Abyss of space,
So the expanding eyes of Immortals
Beheld the dark visions of Los,
And the globe of life-blood trembling.

[\[Plate 18\]](#)

8. The globe of life-blood trembled 315
Branching out into roots:
Fibrous, writhing upon the winds:
Fibres of blood, milk, and tears:33
In pangs, eternity on eternity.
At length, in tears and cries embodied, 320
A female form trembling and pale
Waves before his deathly face.

9. All Eternity shuddered at sight
Of the first female now separate,34
Pale as a cloud of snow 325
Waving before the face of Los.

10. Wonder, awe, fear, astonishment,
Petrify the eternal myriads
At the first female form now separate.

[\[Plate 19\]](#)

They called her Pity, and fled. 330

11. ‘Spread a tent,35 with strong curtains around them;
Let cords and stakes bind in the Void,36
That Eternals may no more behold them!’

12. They began to weave curtains of darkness;
They erected large pillars round the Void 335
With golden hooks fastened in the pillars.
With infinite labour the Eternals
A woof wove, and called it ‘Science’.

Chapter VI

1. But Los saw the female and pitied;
He embraced her, she wept, she refused. 340

In perverse and cruel delight
She fled from his arms, yet he followed.

2. Eternity shuddered when they saw
Man begetting his likeness
On his own divided image. 345

3. A time passed over, the Eternals
Began to erect the tent;
When Enitharmon sick,
Felt a Worm³⁷ within her womb.

4. Yet helpless it lay like a Worm 350
In the trembling womb
To be moulded into existence.

5. All day the worm lay on her bosom;
All night within her womb
The worm lay till it grew to a serpent, 355
With dolorous hissings and poisons
Round Enitharmon's loins folding.

6. Coiled within Enitharmon's womb,
The serpent grew, casting its scales;
With sharp pangs the hissings began 360
To change to a grating cry;
Many sorrows and dismal throes,
Many forms of fish, bird and beast,
Brought forth an Infant form³⁸
Where was a worm before. 365

7. The Eternals their tent finished
Alarmed with these gloomy visions,
When Enitharmon groaning
Produced a man Child to the light.

8. A shriek ran through Eternity: 370
And a paralytic stroke
At the birth of the Human shadow.

9. Delving earth in his resistless way,
Howling, the Child with fierce flames
Issued from Enitharmon. 375

10. The Eternals closed the tent.
They beat down the stakes, the cords
[Plate 20]

Stretched for a work of eternity;
No more Los beheld Eternity.

11. In his hands he seized the infant, ³⁹ 380
He bathed him in springs of sorrow,
He gave him to Enitharmon.

Chapter VII

1. They named the child Orc, he grew
Fed with milk of Enitharmon.

2. Los awoke her; oh sorrow and pain! 385
A tight'ning girdle grew
Around his bosom. In sobbings
He burst the girdle in twain,
But still another girdle
Oppressed his bosom. In sobbings 390

Again he burst it. Again
Another girdle succeeds;
The girdle was formed by day,
By night was burst in twain.

3. These falling down on the rock 395
Into an iron chain
In each other link by link locked.
4. They took Orc to the top of a mountain –
Oh how Enitharmon wept!
They chained his young limbs to the rock⁴⁰ 400
With the Chain of Jealousy
Beneath Urizen's deathful shadow.
5. The dead heard the voice of the child
And began to awake from sleep;
All things heard the voice of the child 405
And began to awake to life.
6. And Urizen craving with hunger
Stung with the odours of Nature
Explored his dens around.
7. He formed a line and a plummet 410
To divide the Abyss beneath.
He formed a dividing rule;
8. He formed scales to weigh;
He formed massy weights;
He formed a brazen quadrant; 415
He formed golden compasses
And began to explore the Abyss,
And he planted a garden of fruits.
9. But Los encircled Enitharmon
With fires of Prophecy 420
From the sight of Urizen and Orc.
10. And she bore an enormous race.

Chapter VIII

1. Urizen explored his dens –
Mountain, moor and wilderness,
With a globe of fire lighting his journey, 425
A fearful journey, annoyed
By cruel enormities, forms
[Plate 22]

Of life on his forsaken mountains.

2. And his world teemed vast enormities
Fright'ning, faithless, fawning 430
Portions of life; similitudes
Of a foot, or a hand, or a head,
Or a heart, or an eye, they swam, mischievous
Dread terrors! delighting in blood.

3. Most Urizen sickened to see 435
His eternal creations appear –
Sons and daughters of sorrow on mountains
Weeping! wailing! First Thiriël appeared,
Astonished at his own existence
Like a man from a cloud born; and Utha 440
From the waters emerging, laments;
Groda rent the deep earth howling
Amazed! his heavens immense cracks
Like the ground parched with heat; then Fuzon
Flamed out! – first begotten, last born. 41 445
All his eternal sons in like manner,
His daughters from green herbs and cattle,
From monsters and worms of the pit;

4. He, in darkness closed, viewed all his race
And his soul sickened! 42 He cursed 450

Both sons and daughters, for he saw
That no flesh nor spirit could keep
His iron laws one moment.

5. For he saw that life lived upon death;
[Plate 25]

The ox in the slaughterhouse moans, 455
The dog at the wintry door.
And he wept, and he called it 'Pity',
And his tears flowed down on the winds.

6. Cold he wandered on high, over their cities
In weeping and pain and woe; 460
And wherever he wandered in sorrows
Upon the aged heavens
A cold shadow followed behind him
Like a spider's web – moist, cold and dim,
Drawing out from his sorrowing soul 465
The dungeon-like heaven dividing,
Wherever the footsteps of Urizen
Walked over the cities in sorrow.

7. Till a Web dark and cold throughout all
The tormented element stretched 470
From the sorrows of Urizen's soul;
And the Web is a Female in embryo.
None could break the Web, no wings of fire,

8. So twisted the cords and so knotted
The meshes: twisted like to the human brain. 475

9. And all called it The Net of Religion.

Chapter IX

1. Then the inhabitants of those Cities⁴³
Felt their Nerves change into Marrow,
And hardening bones began
In swift diseases and torments, 480
In throbbings and shootings and grindings
Through all the coasts; till weakened
The Senses inward rushed, shrinking,
Beneath the dark net of infection;
2. Till the shrunken eyes, clouded over, 485
Discerned not the woven hypocrisy.
But the streaky slime in their heavens
Brought together by narrowing perceptions
Appeared transparent air; for their eyes
Grew small like the eyes of a man 490
And in reptile forms shrinking together
Of seven feet stature they remained.
3. Six days they shrunk up from existence
And on the seventh day they rested;
And they blessed the seventh day, in sick hope, 495
And forgot their eternal life.
4. And their thirty cities divided
In form of a human heart;
No more could they rise at will
In the infinite void, but bound down 500
To earth by their narrowing perceptions
[Plate 27]
They lived a period of years
Then left a noisome⁴⁴ body
To the jaws of devouring darkness.
5. And their children wept, and built 505
Tombs in the desolate places,

And formed laws of prudence, and called them
The eternal laws of God.

6. And the thirty cities remained
Surrounded by salt floods, now called 510
Africa; its name was then Egypt.

7. The remaining sons of Urizen
Beheld their brethren shrink together
Beneath the net of Urizen:
Persuasion was in vain 515
For the ears of the inhabitants
Were withered and deafened and cold!
And their eyes could not discern
Their brethren of other cities.

8. So Fuzon called all together 520
The remaining children of Urizen:
And they left the pendulous earth:⁴⁵
They called it Egypt, and left it.⁴⁶

9. And the salt ocean rolled englobed.
The End of the first book of Urizen

Notes

¹ The title is designed to contrast Blake's poem with the title of Genesis in the Authorized Version of the Bible – 'The First Book of Moses'. Perhaps Urizen was intended to be the first part of Blake's 'Bible of Hell' mentioned in The Marriage of Heaven and Hell. Urizen himself has been aligned in the past with Reason – 'your reason'. Blake was no admirer of reason in its purest state; it is, in the present context, the force of division and separation, responsible for the making of unjust laws.

2 Of the...power Blake imitates the usual opening to an epic poem (e.g. ‘Of arms and the man I sing ...’, ‘Of man’s first disobedience ...’). It echoes the anti-clericalism of The Marriage of Heaven and Hell.

3 his Urizen’s.

4 I hear your call gladly Blake, the poet, receives the dictation of the Eternals.

5 What demon...void cf. Genesis 1:2: ‘And the earth was without form, and void.’

6 Some said...Urizen the first act of naming in the poem.

7 Brooding secret an allusion to the moment of creation in Paradise Lost i 21–2, where the Holy Spirit ‘Dove-like sat’st brooding on the vast abyss / And madest it pregnant’.

8 divided The Creation begins with Urizen’s splitting away from the Eternals into selfhood.

9 ninefold darkness Milton’s Satan lay for nine days in the abyss of hell.

10 mountains Urizen becomes a landscape: Creation and the Fall are one and the same.

11 Of beast . . . cloud The elements (l. 24) are accompanied by emblematic beasts (l. 23).

12 petrific a Miltonic coinage meaning stony, static (see Paradise Lost x 294). The point is that chaos is static when compared to all-flexible eternity.

13 In this chapter Blake tells the story of the Creation a second time.

14 globes of attraction solar systems; planets held together by gravity. In Blake's plate, 'attraction' is split into two parts, 'attrac-/-tion', with the second part hovering above the first, mimicking a gravity-less state.

15 the Immortal Urizen.

16 Lines 57–91 comprise Urizen's account of the Creation.

17 Why will you die, oh Eternals? an echo of Ezekiel 18:31: 'why will ye die, oh house of Israel?'

18 Here alone...wisdom parodic of God's handing down to Moses of the Ten Commandments, Exodus 20.

19 pity not, for Blake, a desirable quality, as it consolidates division.

20 One King, one God, one Law Blake regarded the imposition of these things as tyranny.

21 Los the imagination, now separated from Urizen.

22 Urizen was rent from his side cf. the creation of Eve from Adam's rib, Genesis 2:21.

23 What is...Death the second act of naming in the poem.

24 gins snares, traps.

25 the Eternal Prophet Los.

26 sodor solder – which, like rivets, is used to join metal components.

27 Numb'ring...years Los constructs a calendar.

28 an orb the skull.

29 a red / Round globe the heart.

30 two little orbs the eyes.

31 close volutions inner ear.

32 For pity divides the soul Pity is a divisive – and therefore unfavourable – quality for Blake, since it is allied to fear and selfishness. It leads Los to split into two parts, a fallen Los (or Adam) and Enitharmon (or Eve).

33 Fibrous...tears Blake's description of blood seems strange to us, but was up-to-date at the time of writing. Blood was thought to contain fibres and red globules. Other vessels were believed to carry blood, milk, chyle and tears.

34 All Eternity...separate The Eternals are horrified at the creation of the first female because it implies infinite human division.

35 a tent the sky, the firmament.

36 Spread a tent...Void Blake recalls Isaiah 54:2: 'Enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of thine habitations: spare not, lengthen thy cords, and strengthen thy stakes.'

37 a Worm 'seminal worms' were believed to be the seed of the human nervous system.

38 Brought forth an Infant form The apocalyptic tone is heightened by the echo of Revelation 12:5, where the 'woman clothed with the sun' 'brought forth a man child'.

39 he seized the infant cf. the child of the 'woman clothed with the sun' in Revelation, which 'was caught up unto God, and to his throne' (Revelation 12:5).

40 They chained...rock cf. Abraham's binding of Isaac to the altar (Genesis 22:9); Laius' piercing of Oedipus' ankles when abandoning him to the wolves; and Jupiter's nailing of Prometheus to the rock of the Caucasus.

41 Thiriell (air), Utha (water), Grodna (earth) and Fuzon (fire) correspond to the four elements.

42 He...sickened There is no way the fall from a state of original innocence can be reversed, as Urizen realizes.

43 the inhabitants of those Cities an allusion to the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah, Genesis 19:25: 'And he overthrew those cities, and all the plain, and all the inhabitants of those cities, and that which grew upon the ground.'

44 noisome noxious, foul, rotten.

45 the pendulous earth cf. Paradise Lost iv 1000: 'The pendulous round earth with balanced air'.

46 They called it Egypt, and left it a reworking of the story of how the Israelites were conducted out of Egypt by God, commemorated in the Passover: 'Remember this day, in which ye came out from Egypt, out of the house of bondage; for by strength of hand the Lord brought you out from this place' (Exodus 18:3).

Letter from William Blake to the Revd Dr Trusler, ¹23 August 1799(extract)

Reverend Sir,

I really am sorry that you are fall'n out with the spiritual world, especially if I should have to answer for it. I feel very sorry that your ideas and mine on moral painting differ so much as to have made you angry with my method of study. If I am wrong, I am wrong in good company. I had hoped your plan comprehended all species of this art, and especially that you would not regret that species which gives existence to every other – namely, visions of eternity. You say that I want somebody to elucidate my ideas, but you ought to know that what is grand is necessarily obscure to weak men. That which can be made explicit to the idiot is not worth my care. The wisest of the ancients considered what is not too explicit as the fittest for instruction because it rouses the faculties to act – I name Moses, Solomon, Aesop, Homer, Plato...

I have therefore proved your reasonings ill-proportioned, which you can never prove my figures to be. They are those of Michelangelo, Raphael, and the antique, and of the best living models. I perceive that your eye is perverted by caricature prints, which ought not to abound so much as they do. Fun I love, but too much fun is, of all things, the most loathsome. Mirth is better than fun, and happiness is better than mirth. I feel that a man may be happy in this world. And I know that this world is a world of imagination and vision. I see everything I paint in this world, but everybody does not see alike. To the eyes of a miser, a guinea² is more beautiful than the sun, and a bag worn with the use of money has more beautiful proportions than a vine filled with grapes. The tree which moves some to tears of joy is, in the eyes of others, only a green thing that stands in the way. Some see nature all ridicule and deformity (and by these I shall not regulate my proportions), and some scarce see nature at all. But to the eyes of the man of imagination, nature is imagination itself. As a man is, so he sees; as the eye is formed, such are its powers.

You certainly mistake when you say that the visions of fancy are not to be found in this world. To me, this world is all one continued vision of fancy or imagination, and I feel flattered when I am told so. What is it that sets Homer, Virgil, and Milton in so high a rank of art? Why is the Bible more entertaining and instructive than any other book? Is it not because they are addressed to the imagination (which is spiritual sensation), and but mediately to the understanding or reason? Such is true painting, and such was alone valued by the Greeks and the best modern artists. Consider what Lord Bacon says: ‘Sense sends over to imagination before reason have judged, and reason sends over to imagination before the decree can be acted' (see Advancement of Learning Part 2, p. 47 of first edition).³

But I am happy to find a great majority of fellow mortals who can elucidate my visions – and particularly they have been elucidated by children, who have taken a greater delight in contemplating my pictures than I even hoped. Neither youth nor childhood is folly or incapacity; some children are fools and so are some old men. But there is a vast majority on the side of imagination or spiritual sensation...

Letter From William Blake

¹ Blake had been introduced to John Trusler with a view to his illustrating some of his works, but they fell out when Trusler told him that 'Your fancy seems to be in the other world, or the world of spirits, which accords not with my intentions.' Trusler wrote on this letter the comment: 'Blake, dimmed with superstition'.

The Mental Traveller

From The Pickering Manuscript (composed 1800–

4)

I travelled through a land of men,
A land of men and women too,
And heard and saw such dreadful things
As cold earth-wanderers never knew.

For there the babe is born in joy 5
That was begotten in dire woe;
Just as we reap in joy the fruit
Which we in bitter tears did sow.

And, if the babe is born a boy,
He's given to a woman old 10
Who nails him down upon a rock,
Catches his shrieks in cups of gold.

She binds iron thorns around his head,
She pierces both his hands and feet,
She cuts his heart out at his side 15
To make it feel both cold and heat.

Her fingers number every nerve
Just as a miser counts his gold,
She lives upon his shrieks and cries,
And she grows young as he grows old. 20

Till he becomes a bleeding youth
And she becomes a virgin bright;
Then he rends up his manacles
And binds her down for his delight.

He plants himself in all her nerves 25
Just as a husbandman¹ his mould,²
And she becomes his dwelling-place,
And garden fruitful seventy-fold.

An aged shadow soon he fades,
Wand'ring round an earthly cot,³ 30
Full filled all with gems and gold
Which he by industry had got.

And these are the gems of the human soul,
The rubies and pearls of a lovesick eye,
The countless gold of the aching heart, 35
The martyr's groan and the lover's sigh.

They are his meat, they are his drink;
He feeds the beggar and the poor,
And the wayfaring traveller –
Forever open is his door. 40

His grief is their eternal joy;
They make the roofs and walls to ring,
Till from the fire on the hearth
A little female babe does spring.

And she is all of solid fire, 45
And gems and gold, that none his hand
Dares stretch to touch her baby form
Or wrap her in his swaddling-band.

But she comes to the man she loves,
If young or old, or rich or poor. 50
They soon drive out the aged host –
A beggar at another's door.

He wanders weeping far away
Until some other take him in;
Oft blind and age-bent, sore distressed, 55
Until he can a maiden win.

And to allay his freezing age
The poor man takes her in his arms;
The cottage fades before his sight,
The garden and its lovely charms; 60

The guests are scattered through the land.
For the eye altering, alters all;
The senses roll themselves in fear
And the flat earth becomes a ball;

The stars, sun, moon – all shrink away, 65
A desert vast without a bound;
And nothing left to eat or drink,
And a dark desert all around.

The honey of her infant lips,
The bread and wine of her sweet smile, 70
The wild game⁴ of her roving eye
Does him to infancy beguile.

For as he eats and drinks he grows
Younger and younger every day,
And on the desert wild they both 75
Wander in terror and dismay.

Like the wild stag she flees away,
Her fear plants many a thicket wild;
While he pursues her night and day,
By various arts of love beguiled, 80

By various arts of love and hate;
Till the wide desert planted o'er
With labyrinths of wayward love,
Where roams the lion, wolf, and boar;

Till he becomes a wayward babe 85
And she a weeping woman old.
Then many a lover wanders here;
The sun and stars are nearer rolled;

The trees bring forth sweet ecstasy
To all who in the desert roam – 90
Till many a city there is built,
And many a pleasant shepherd's home.

But when they find the frowning babe,
Terror strikes through the region wide;
They cry, 'The babe, the babe is born!' 95
And flee away on every side.

For who dare touch the frowning form –
His arm is withered to its root;
Lions, boars, wolves, all howling flee
And every tree does shed its fruit. 100

And none can touch that frowning form
Except it be a woman old;
She nails him down upon the rock
And all is done as I have told.

The Crystal Cabinet

From The Pickering Manuscript (composed 1800–

4)

The maiden caught me in the wild
Where I was dancing merrily,
She put me into her cabinet
And locked me up with a golden key.

This cabinet is formed of gold 5
And pearl and crystal, shining bright,
And within it opens into a world
And a little lovely moony night.

Another England there I saw,
Another London with its Tower, 10
Another Thames and other hills
And another pleasant Surrey bower,

Another maiden like herself,
Translucent, lovely, shining clear –
Threefold each in the other closed: 15
Oh, what a pleasant trembling fear!

Oh, what a smile, a threefold smile
Filled me that like a flame I burned;
I bent to kiss the lovely maid
And found a threefold kiss returned. 20

I strove to seize the inmost form
With ardour fierce and hands of flame,
But burst the crystal cabinet
And like a weeping babe became –

A weeping babe upon the wild 25
And weeping woman, pale, reclined.
And in the outward air again
I filled with woes the passing wind.

[And did those feet in ancient time ¹]

From Milton (composed 1803–8)

And did those feet in ancient time
Walk upon England's mountains green?
And was the holy lamb of God
On England's pleasant pastures seen?

And did the countenance divine 5
Shine forth upon our clouded hills?
And was Jerusalem builded here,
Among these dark Satanic mills?

Bring me my bow of burning gold!
Bring me my arrows of desire! 10
Bring me my spear – oh clouds unfold!
Bring me my chariot of fire!²

I will not cease from mental fight
Nor shall my sword sleep in my hand,
Till we have built Jerusalem 15
In England's green and pleasant land.

And did those feet in ancient time

¹ This poem is best known today as a hymn, 'Jerusalem', having been set to music by Hubert Parry in 1916 and arranged by Edward Elgar in 1922.

² Bring me my chariot of fire a reference to the chariot of fire that carried Elijah to heaven, 2 Kings 2:11.

1 The process is fully explained by Joseph Viscomi, Blake and the Idea of the Book (Princeton, 1993), part III.

2 Wollstonecraft probably met Blake when he engraved the illustrations for her Original Stories from Real Life in 1791.

3 Blake considered the Bible ‘a state trick, through which though the people at all times could see they never had the power to throw off’. Its rewriting was therefore a revolutionary act.

Mary Robinson (née Darby) (1758–1800)

‘She is a woman of undoubted genius’, Coleridge told Southey in January 1800. ‘She overloads everything, but I never knew a human being with so full a mind – bad, good, and indifferent, I grant you, but full and overflowing.’¹ It was not an unfair account, and certainly more charitable than that of many of her contemporaries.

Mary Robinson was born and brought up in Bristol, the younger daughter of John Darby, a whaling captain from America, and Mary Seys. Her first school was that run in Bristol by Hannah More’s sisters. When her father absconded to Labrador, ostensibly to set up a whaling station, her mother moved her to a school in Chelsea, where she was taught by the gifted but alcoholic Meribah Lorington. In later years Robinson described her as ‘the most extensively accomplished female that I ever remember to have met with.... All that I ever learned I acquired from this extraordinary woman.’² At a time when women were seldom educated, Lorington was remarkably erudite; besides knowing Latin, French and Italian, she was, according to Robinson, ‘a perfect arithmetician and astronomer’.³

She concluded her formal education at a finishing school in Marylebone. Her dancing-master introduced her to David Garrick, who encouraged her interest in acting. ‘He would sometimes dance a minuet with me, sometimes request me to sing the favourite ballads of the day’, she later recalled. She remembered him as tremendously charismatic: ‘he appeared to me as one who possessed more power, both to awe and to attract, than any man I ever met with.’⁴

In April 1774 she married Thomas Robinson, an articled clerk at Lincoln’s Inn, who was thought to be comfortably off. This was not, alas, the case, and within months he was driven out of the capital to evade his creditors. Robinson gave birth to their daughter, Mary Elizabeth, in Wales, November 1774. In 1775 Robinson was imprisoned for debt and, like Charlotte Smith, Robinson partook of her husband’s punishment, nursing her daughter in the cells. During her incarceration she began to write; her first volume, Poems (1775), was partly funded by Georgiana Cavendish, Duchess of Devonshire, one of the few women to respond to her requests for assistance. She went on to publish Captivity: A Poem (1777).

On release from prison, thanks to Garrick and Sheridan, she found employment as an actress at Drury Lane theatre and became famous overnight for her portrayal of Juliet. Success continued with the roles of Ophelia, Viola, Rosalind, Lady Macbeth and Perdita. It was while playing Perdita, in 1779, that she caught the attention of the 17-year-old Prince of Wales. Their first assignation was, allegedly, in Kew Gardens: ‘She had been concealed in the island opposite, and on a signal that the coast was clear, stepped into a boat, and was rowed across.’⁵ She became his mistress in return for a promised £20,000 (the equivalent of £1.7 million today), which never materialized. He abandoned her a year later, exposing her to a storm of ridicule that compelled her to retire from the stage. After lengthy negotiations she managed to coax £5,000 out of the royal family.

Subsequent lovers included Charles James Fox, who secured an annuity for her of £500, and Colonel Bastre Tarleton, a war hero and veteran of the American War, who became the recipient of many letters and poems. Tarleton was the father of the child she was carrying when, at the age of 24, she suffered the miscarriage that left her paralysed from the waist down.

After spending several years on the Continent with Tarleton, she returned to England in 1788. By this time she relied increasingly on her writing for income, and in succeeding years her productivity was remarkable. Between 1775 and 1800 she produced six volumes of poetry, eight novels and two plays, with remarkable success. Her Gothic chiller Vancenza, or The Dangers of Credulity (1792) sold out in a day. She often published her poetry in newspapers such as the World and the Oracle, usually under the names of 'Laura' and 'Laura Maria'. Her talent for engaging in poetical dialogues with Hannah Cowley, Hester Piozzi and Robert Merry aligned her for a while with the Della Cruscan – a group known for affected, sentimental and highly ornamented verse. For a while they were very popular, and her biographer in the Memoirs records that 'During her poetical disguise, many complimentary poems were addressed to her: several ladies of the bluestocking club, while Mrs Robinson remained unknown, even ventured to admire – nay, more, to recite her productions in their learned and critical coterie.'⁶ But the popularity of the Della Cruscan did not endure, and by the mid-1790s the public had tired of their mannered style.

She was best known to the first-generation Romantics as a contributor of verse to the Morning Post, where her poems appeared under the name 'Tabitha Bramble'. Coleridge, Southey and Wordsworth were fellow contributors, and it was Coleridge who engaged in dialogue with her, in both verse and prose. They met several times in London during January and February 1800, and besides admiring her poetry Coleridge found he had sympathy with her political views. After her death he told her daughter that 'I cultivated your Mother's acquaintance, thrice happy if I could have soothed her sorrows, or if the feeble Lamp of my Friendship could have yielded her one ray of Hope & Guidance.'⁷ They kept in touch even after Coleridge moved with his family to Keswick in the Lake District in July 1800. He gave her a manuscript copy of Kubla Khan, which prompted Mrs Robinson to the Poet Coleridge (p. 259). In addition, her The Snow-Drop prompted Coleridge's poem of the same name, and her celebratory ode to the new-born Derwent Coleridge, Ode Inscribed to the Infant Son of S. T. Coleridge (p. 257), sent to Coleridge in manuscript, inspired his address to her, A Stranger Minstrel (which he later told Robinson's daughter was 'excessively silly'). Her Lyrical Tales (1800) were influenced by Lyrical Ballads, and almost persuaded Wordsworth to change the title of the second edition of his work.⁸

Robinson's reputation did not die with her. It was kept alive by her daughter, Mary Elizabeth Robinson, who collected together some of her fugitive verses, along with those of other poets, in The Wild Wreath (1804), and edited a complete edition of the Poetical Works (1806). Mary Robinson is one of the most important poets of her time, and readers seeking a fuller selection of her works should seek out Judith Pascoe's Broadview edition (2000) listed below. Robinson possessed a unique and original voice, and transcended her Della Cruscan roots to create something with the power to impress the up-and-coming Romantics. Even the influence of Wordsworth and Coleridge is transmuted, in Lyrical Tales, into something which, though reminiscent of Lyrical

Ballads, is distinct from it. This is precisely how Coleridge felt when he first read The Haunted Beach in the Morning Post, where it appeared on 28 February 1800. He wrote immediately to Southey, advising him to include it in his forthcoming Annual Anthology: ‘if you should not have received that day’s paper, write immediately that I may transcribe it – it falls off sadly to the last – wants tale and interest; but the images are new and very distinct – that “silvery carpet” is so just that it is unfortunate it should seem so bad, for it is really good – but the metre – aye, that woman has an ear!’⁹ It is not hard to see why Coleridge enjoyed the poem so much. Like some of his own, it plays on our susceptibility to the uncanny, the sinister, the spooky; the Gothicism is, perhaps, a little crude next to Christabel or The Ancient Mariner, but it works. The anonymous author of the biography appended to her Memoirs recounted the circumstances of its composition:

On one of these nights of melancholy inspiration, she discovered from her window a small boat struggling in the spray, which dashed against the wall of her garden. Presently two fishermen brought on shore in their arms a burden which, notwithstanding the distance, Mrs Robinson perceived to be a human body, which the fishermen, after covering it with a sail from their boat, left on the land and disappeared. But a short time elapsed before the men returned, bringing with them fuel, with which they vainly endeavoured to reanimate their unfortunate charge. Struck with a circumstance so affecting, which the stillness of the night rendered yet more impressive, Mrs Robinson remained for some time at her window, motionless with horror. At length, recovering her recollection, she alarmed the family, but before they could gain the beach, the men had again departed. The morning dawned, and day broke in upon the tragical scene. The bathers passed and repassed with little concern, while the corpse continued, extended on the shore, not twenty yards from the Steine. During the course of the day many persons came to look on the body, which still remained unclaimed and unknown. Another day wore away, and the corpse was unburied, the lord of the manor having refused to a fellow-being a grave in which his bones might decently repose, alleging as an excuse that he did not belong to that parish. Mrs Robinson, humanely indignant at the scene which passed, exerted herself, but without success, to procure by subscription a small sum for performing the last duties to a wretched outcast. Unwilling, by an ostentatious display of her name, to offend the higher and more fastidious powers, she presented to the fishermen her own contribution, and declined further to interfere. The affair dropped, and the body of the stranger, being dragged to the cliff, was covered by a heap of stones without the ceremony of a prayer.

These circumstances made on the mind of Mrs Robinson a deep and lasting impression; even at a distant period she could not repeat them without horror and indignation. This incident gave rise to the poem entitled The Haunted Beach, written but a few months before her death.¹⁰

A London Summer Morning (composed 1794)

From The Wild Wreath (1804)

Who has not waked to list the busy sounds
Of summer morning in the sultry smoke¹
Of noisy London? On the pavement hot
The sooty chimney-boy, with dingy face
And tattered covering, shrilly bawls his trade,² 5
Rousing the sleepy housemaid. At the door
The milk-pail rattles, and the tinkling bell

Proclaims the dustman's office, while the street
Is lost in clouds imperious.³ Now begins
The din of hackney coaches,⁴ wagons, carts; 10
While tinmen's shops, and noisy trunk-makers,
Knife-grinders, coopers, squeaking cork-cutters,
Fruit-barrows, and the hunger-giving cries
Of vegetable vendors, fill the air.
Now ev'ry shop displays its varied trade, 15
And the fresh-sprinkled pavement cools the feet
Of early walkers. At the private door
The ruddy housemaid twirls the busy mop,
Annoying the smart 'prentice,⁵ or neat⁶ girl
Tripping with bandbox⁷ lightly. Now the sun 20
Darts burning splendour on the glitt'ring pane,
Save where the canvas awning throws a shade
On the gay merchandise. Now spruce and trim
In shops where beauty smiles with industry,
Sits the smart damsel, while the passenger 25
Peeps through the window, watching ev'ry charm.
Now pastry dainties catch the eyes minute
Of hummy insects, while the slimy snare⁸
Waits to enthrall them. Now the lamp-lighter
Mounts the slight ladder, nimbly venturous, 30
To trim the half-filled lamp,⁹ while at his feet
The pot-boy¹⁰ yells discordant. All along
The sultry pavement, the old-clothes man cries
In tone monotonous, and sidelong views
The area for his traffic. Now the bag 35
Is silyly opened, and the half-worn suit
(Sometimes the pilfered treasure of the base
Domestic spoiler) for one half its worth
Sinks in the green abyss. The porter now
Bears his huge load along the burning way, 40

And the poor poet wakes from busy dreams
To paint the summer morning.

A London Summer Morning

1 sultry smoke Though not a problem today, smog was a pervasive feature of eighteenth-century London due to the burning of wood fires and fossil fuels – a necessity even during the summer.

2 shrilly bawls his trade He would have been crying out ‘Sweep, sweep’, like his colleague in Blake’s ‘The Chimney Sweeper’ (p. 189).

3 clouds imperious commanding, or obscuring clouds of dust; the effect is of course mock-heroic. Note the Miltonic inversion of noun and adjective.

4 hackney coaches four-wheeled coaches, drawn by two horses, with seats for six passengers.

5 ‘prentice apprentice, probably a lawyer’s clerk.

6 neat smart, well-dressed.

7 bandbox cardboard box for hats.

8 the slimy snare fly-traps of some kind.

9 trim the half-filled lamp The lamp-lighter’s first task, in the morning, is to refill the lamp with fuel and to trim its wick, so that it will burn brightly when it is reignited that evening.

10 pot-boy boy who serves beer to customers in a tavern.

The Haunted Beach¹

From Lyrical Tales (1800)

Upon a lonely desert beach
Where the white foam was scattered,
A little shed upreared its head,
Though lofty barks were shattered.
The seaweeds gath'ring near the door 5
A sombre path displayed,
And all around, the deaf'ning roar
Re-echoed on the chalky shore,
By the green billows made.

Above, a jutting cliff was seen 10
Where seabirds hovered, craving,
And all around the crags were bound
With weeds, forever waving;
And here and there, a cavern wide
Its shad'wy jaws displayed, 15
And near the sands, at ebb of tide,
A shivered mast was seen to ride
Where the green billows strayed.

And often, while the moaning wind
Stole o'er the summer ocean, 20
The moonlight scene was all serene,
The waters scarce in motion;
Then while the smoothly slanting sand
The tall cliff wrapped in shade,
The fisherman beheld a band 25
Of spectres gliding hand in hand,
Where the green billows played.

And pale their faces were as snow,
And sullenly they wandered;
And to the skies, with hollow eyes, 30
They looked, as though they pondered.

And sometimes from their hammock shroud
They dismal howlings made;
And while the blast blew strong and loud
The clear moon marked the ghastly crowd 35
Where the green billows played.

And then above the haunted hut,
The curlews, screaming, hovered;
And the low door, with furious roar,
The frothy breakers covered. 40
For in the fisherman's lone shed
A murdered man was laid,
With ten wide gashes on his head;
And deep was made his sandy bed
Where the green billows played. 45

A shipwrecked mariner was he,
Doomed from his home to sever,
Who swore to be, through wind and sea,
Firm and undaunted ever;
And when the wave resistless rolled, 50
About his arm he made
A packet rich of Spanish gold,
And, like a British sailor bold,
Plunged where the billows played.

The spectre band, his messmates brave, 55
Sunk in the yawning ocean,
While to the mast he lashed him fast
And braved the storm's commotion.
The winter moon upon the sand
A silv'ry carpet² made, 60
And marked the sailor reach the land,
And marked his murd'rer wash his hand,
Where the green billows played.

And since that hour the fisherman
Has toiled and toiled in vain; 65
For all the night, the moony light
Gleams on the spectred main.
And when the skies are veiled in gloom,
The murd'rer's liquid way
Bounds o'er the deeply yawning tomb, 70
And flashing fires the sands illumine
Where the green billows play.

Full thirty years his task has been,
Day after day more weary;
For Heaven designed his guilty mind 75
Should feed on prospects dreary.
Bound by a strong and mystic chain,
He has not pow'r to stray,
But destined mis'ry to sustain,
He wastes, in solitude and pain, 80
A loathsome life away.

From The Poetical Works of the Late Mrs
Robinson (1806)

Spirit of Light, whose eye unfolds
The vast expanse of Nature's plan;
And from thy eastern throne¹ beholds
The mazy paths of the lorn traveller – man!
To thee I sing, Spirit of Light, to thee 5
Attune the varying strain of wood-wild minstrelsy!²

Oh pow'r creative, but for thee
Eternal chaos all things would enfold,
And black as Erebus³ this system be,
In its ethereal space, benighted, rolled. 10
But for thy influence, e'en this day
Would slowly, sadly, pass away;
Nor proudly mark the mother's tear of joy,⁴
The smile seraphic of the baby boy,
The father's eyes, in fondest transport taught 15
To beam with tender hope, to speak the enraptured thought.

To thee I sing, Spirit of Light, to thee
Attune the strain of wood-wild minstrelsy!
Thou sail'st o'er Skiddaw's⁵ heights sublime,
Swift borne upon the wings of joyous time! 20
The sunny train, with widening sweep,
Rolls blazing down the misty-mantled steep;
And far and wide its rosy ray
Flushes the dewy-silvered breast of day!
Hope-fost'ring day, which Nature bade impart 25
Heav'n's proudest rapture to the parent's heart.

Day! First ordained to see the baby pressed
Close to its beauteous mother's throbbing breast,
While instinct, in its laughing eyes, foretold
The mind susceptible, the spirit bold, 30
The lofty soul, the virtues prompt to trace

The wrongs that haunt mankind o'er life's tempestuous space.

Romantic mountains,⁶ from whose brows sublime

Imagination might to frenzy turn,

Or to the starry worlds in fancy climb, 35

Scorning this low earth's solitary bourn;⁷

Bold cataracts,⁸ on whose headlong tide

The midnight whirlwinds howling ride;

Calm-bosomed lakes that, trembling, hail

The cold breath of the morning gale, 40

And on your lucid mirrors wide display,

In colours rich, in dewy lustre gay;

Mountains and woodlands, as the dappled dawn

Flings its soft pearl-drops on the summer lawn;

Or paly moonlight, rising slow, 45

While o'er the hills the ev'ning zephyrs blow –

Ye all shall lend your wonders, all combine

To bless the baby boy with harmonies divine.

Oh baby, when thy unchained tongue

Shall, lisping, speak thy fond surprise; 50

When the rich strain thy father sung

Shall from thy imitative accents rise;

When through thy soul rapt Fancy shall diffuse

The mightier magic of his loftier muse –

Thy wakened spirit, wond'ring, shall behold 55

Thy native mountains capped with streamy gold,

Thy native lakes, their cloud-topped hills among,

Oh hills made sacred by thy parent's song!⁹

Then shall thy soul, legitimate,¹⁰ expand,

And the proud lyre quick throb at thy command! 60

And Wisdom, ever watchful, o'er thee smile,

His white locks waving to the blast the while;

And pensive Reason, pointing to the sky,

Bright as the morning star her clear broad eye,
Unfold the page of Nature's book sublime – 65
The lore of ev'ry age, the boast of ev'ry clime!

Sweet baby boy, accept a stranger's song;
An untaught minstrel joys to sing of thee!
And, all alone, her forest haunts among,
Courts the wild tone of mazy harmony! 70
A stranger's song, babe of the mountain wild,
Greets thee as Inspiration's darling child!
Oh may the fine-wrought spirit of thy sire
Awake thy soul and breathe upon thy lyre!
And blessed, amid thy mountain haunts sublime, 75
Be all thy days, thy rosy infant days,
And may the never-tiring steps of time
Press lightly on with thee o'er life's disastrous maze.

Ye hills, coeval¹¹ with the birth of time!
Bleak summits, linked in chains of rosy light! 80
Oh may your wonders many a year invite
Your native son the breezy path to climb
Where, in majestic pride of solitude,
Silent and grand, the hermit thought shall trace,
Far o'er the wild infinity of space, 85
The sombre horrors of the waving wood;
The misty glen; the river's winding way;
The last deep blush of summer's ling'ring day;
The winter storm that, roaming unconfined,
Sails on the broad wings of the impetuous wind. 90

Oh, whether on the breezy height
Where Skiddaw greets the dawn of light,
Ere the rude sons of labour homage pay
To summer's flaming eye or winter's banner grey;
Whether Lodore¹² its silver torrent flings 95

The mingling wonders of a thousand springs;
Whether smooth Bassenthwaite,¹³ at eve's still hour,
Reflects the young moon's crescent pale,
Or meditation seeks her silent bow'r
Amid the rocks of lonely Borrowdale¹⁴ – 100
Still may thy name survive, sweet boy, till Time
Shall bend to Keswick's vale thy Skiddaw's brow sublime!

¹ eastern throne the sun rises in the east.

² wood-wild minstrelsy cf. Shakespeare, who in Milton's L'Allegro is said to 'Warble his native wood-notes wild' (l. 134).

³ Erebus In Greek cosmology, Erebus (darkness) and Nyx were the offspring of Chaos.

⁴ the mother's tear of joy Pascoe notes that Mrs Coleridge was in correspondence with Mrs Robinson.

⁵ Skiddaw oldest and fourth highest peak in the Lake District (3,053 ft). Robinson never saw the Lakes, and is dependent on Coleridge's descriptions. She had written to him at around the time she composed this poem: 'Oh Skiddaw! I think, if I could but once contemplate thy summit, I should never quit the prospect it would present till my eyes were closed for ever' (Griggs ii 669).

⁶ Romantic mountains Robinson had not visited the Lake District, but probably had a good knowledge of it through picturesque guidebooks and engravings.

⁷ boorn limit, boundary.

⁸ cataracts waterfalls.

⁹ thy parent's song probably a reference to Frost at Midnight 59–63.

10 legitimate genuine, intense.

11 coeval the same age as; as old as.

12 Lodore large waterfall on the banks of Derwentwater, near Keswick.

13 Bassenthwaite large lake, at one end of which is Keswick.

14 Borrowdale the valley at the opposite end of Derwentwater from Keswick.

Mrs Robinson to the Poet Coleridge (composed October 1800)¹

From Memoirs of the Late Mrs Robinson (1801)

Rapt in the visionary theme,
Spirit divine, with thee I'll wander,
Where the blue, wavy, lucid stream
Mid forest glooms shall slow meander!
With thee I'll trace the circling bounds 5
Of thy new paradise, extended,
And listen to the varying sounds
Of winds and foamy torrents blended!

Now by the source, which lab'ring heaves
The mystic fountain, bubbling, panting, 10
While gossamer its network weaves²
Adown the blue lawn, slanting –
I'll mark thy 'sunny dome' and view
Thy 'caves of ice',³ thy fields of dew,
Thy ever-blooming mead, whose flow'r 15
Waves to the cold breath of the moonlight hour!

Or, when the day-star,⁴ peering bright
On the grey wing of parting night;
While more than vegetating pow'r
Throbs, grateful to the burning hour, 20
As summer's whispered sighs unfold
Her million million buds of gold! –
Then will I climb the breezy bounds
 Of thy new paradise, extended,
And listen to the distant sounds 25
 Of winds and foamy torrents blended!

Spirit divine, with thee I'll trace
Imagination's boundless space!
With thee, beneath thy 'sunny dome'
 I'll listen to the minstrel's lay 30
 Hymning the gradual close of day;
In 'caves of ice' enchanted roam,
Where on the glitt'ring entrance plays
The moon's beam with its silv'ry rays;⁵
 Or when the glassy stream 35
 That through the deep dell flows,
 Flashes the noon's hot beam –
 The noon's hot beam that midway shows
Thy flaming temple, studded o'er
With all Peruvia's lustrous store!⁶ 40
There will I trace the circling bounds
 Of thy new paradise, extended,
And listen to the awful sounds
 Of winds and foamy torrents blended.

And now I'll pause to catch the moan 45
 Of distant breezes, cavern-pent;
Now, ere the twilight tints are flown,
Purpling the landscape far and wide,
On the dark promontory's side

I'll gather wild-flow'rs, dew-besprent, 50
And weave a crown for thee,
Genius of heav'n-taught poesy!
While, op'ning to my wond'ring eyes,
Thou bid'st a new creation rise,
I'll raptured trace the circling bounds 55
Of thy rich paradise, extended,
And listen to the varying sounds
Of winds and foamy torrents blended.

And now, with lofty tones inviting,
Thy nymph, her dulcimer swift-smiting, 60
Shall wake me in ecstatic measures
Far, far removed from mortal pleasures,
In cadence rich, in cadence strong,
Proving the wondrous witcheries of song!
I hear her voice – thy 'sunny dome', 65
Thy 'caves of ice' aloud repeat –
Vibrations, madd'ning sweet,
Calling the visionary wand'rer home!
She sings of thee, oh favoured child
Of minstrelsy, sublimely wild! – 70
Of thee whose soul can feel the tone
Which gives to airy dreams a magic all thy own!

Mrs Robinson to the Poet Coleridge

¹ This poem is a tribute to Coleridge's Kubla Khan (see p. 640), and contains numerous allusions to it.

² While gossamer...weaves fine filmy substance, consisting of cobwebs, spun by small spiders, seen spread over the lawn.

³ Kubla Khan 36.

⁴ day-star morning star.

⁵ silv'ry rays As Robinson was aware, Coleridge had admired the 'silv'ry carpet' in 'The Haunted Beach'; see p. 252.

⁶ With all...store Peru had long been celebrated for its natural reserves of gold, silver and precious stones.

The Savage of Aveyron*(composed October 1800)¹

From The Wild Wreath (1804)

'Twas in the mazes of a wood,

The lonely wood of Aveyron,

I heard a melancholy tone:

 It seemed to freeze my blood!

A torrent near was flowing fast, 5

And hollow was the midnight blast

As o'er the leafless woods it passed

 While terror-fraught I stood!

Oh mazy woods of Aveyron,

 Oh wilds of dreary solitude! 10

 Amid thy thorny alleys rude

I thought myself alone!

 I thought no living thing could be

 So weary of the world as me,

While on my winding path the pale moon shone. 15

 Sometimes the tone was loud and sad,

And sometimes dulcet, faint, and slow;

And then a tone of frantic woe:

 It almost made me mad.

The burden was 'Alone! Alone!' 20
And then the heart did feebly groan;
Then suddenly a cheerful tone
Proclaimed a spirit glad!
Oh mazy woods of Aveyron,
Oh wilds of dreary solitude! 25
Amid your thorny alleys rude
I wished myself a traveller alone.

'Alone!' I heard the wild boy say,
And swift he climbed a blasted oak;
And there, while morning's herald woke, 30
He watched the opening day.
Yet dark and sunken was his eye,
Like a lorn maniac's, wild and shy,
And scowling like a winter sky,
Without one beaming ray! 35
Then, mazy woods of Aveyron
Then, wilds of dreary solitude,
Amid thy thorny alleys rude
I sighed to be a traveller alone.

'Alone! Alone!' I heard him shriek – 40
'Twas like the shriek of dying man!
And then to mutter he began,
But oh, he could not speak!
I saw him point to heav'n and sigh,
The big drop trembled in his eye; 45
And slowly from the yellow sky
I saw the pale morn break.
I saw the woods of Aveyron
Their wilds of dreary solitude;
I marked their thorny alleys rude, 50
And wished to be a traveller alone!

His hair was long and black, and he

From infancy alone had been;
For since his fifth year he had seen,
 None marked his destiny! 55
No mortal ear had heard his groan,
For him no beam of hope had shone;
While sad he sighed, 'Alone! Alone!'
 Beneath the blasted tree.

And then, oh woods of Aveyron, 60
 Oh wilds of dreary solitude,
 Amid your thorny alleys rude
I thought myself a traveller alone.

 And now upon the blasted tree
He carved three notches broad and long, 65
And all the while he sang a song
 Of nature's melody!

And though of words he nothing knew,
And though his dulcet tones were few,
Across the yielding bark he drew, 70
 Deep sighing, notches three.

Oh mazy woods of Aveyron,
 Oh wilds of dreary solitude,
 Amid your thorny alleys rude
Upon this blasted oak no sunbeam shone. 75

 And now he pointed one, two, three;
Again he shrieked with wild dismay;
And now he paced the thorny way,
 Quitting the blasted tree.

It was a dark December morn, 80
The dew was frozen on the thorn,
But to a wretch so sad, so lorn,
 All days alike would be!

Yet mazy woods of Aveyron,
 Yet wilds of dreary solitude, 85
 Amid your frosty alleys rude

I wished to be a traveller alone.

He followed me along the wood
To a small grot his hands had made,
Deep in a black rock's sullen shade, 90
Beside a tumbling flood.

Upon the earth I saw him spread
Of withered leaves a narrow bed,
Yellow as gold, and streaked with red –
They looked like streaks of blood! 95

Pulled from the woods of Aveyron
And scattered o'er the solitude
By midnight whirlwinds strong and rude,
To pillow the scorched brain that throbbed alone.

Wild berries were his winter food, 100
With them his sallow lip was dyed;
On chestnuts wild he fed beside,
Steeped in the foamy flood.
Chequered with scars his breast was seen,
Wounds streaming fresh with anguish keen, 105
And marks where other wounds had been Torn by the brambles rude.

Such was the boy of Aveyron,
The tenant of that solitude,
Where still, by misery unsubdued, 110
He wandered nine long winters all alone.

Before the step of his rude throne,
The squirrel sported, tame and gay,
The dormouse slept its life away
Nor heard his midnight groan. 115
About his form a garb he wore,
Ragged it was, and marked with gore,
And yet where'er 'twas folded o'er
Full many a spangle shone!

Like little stars, oh Aveyron, 120
 They gleamed amid thy solitude;
 Or like, along thy alleys rude,
The summer dewdrops sparkling in the sun.

 It once had been a lady's vest,
White as the whitest mountain's snow, 125
Till ruffian hands had taught to flow
 The fountain of her breast!
Remembrance bade the wild boy trace
Her beauteous form, her angel face,
Her eye that beamed with heavenly grace, 130
 Her fainting voice that blessed,
When in the woods of Aveyron
 Deep in their deepest solitude,
 Three barb'rous ruffians shed her blood,
And mocked, with cruel taunts, her dying groan. 135

 Remembrance traced the summer bright,
When all the trees were fresh and green,
When lost the alleys long between,
 The lady passed the night;
She passed the night, bewildered wild, 140
She passed it with her fearless child
Who raised his little arms and smiled
 To see the morning light.
While in the woods of Aveyron
 Beneath the broad oak's canopy, 145
 She marked aghast the ruffians three
Waiting to seize the traveller alone!

 Beneath the broad oak's canopy
The lovely lady's bones were laid;
But since that hour no breeze has played 150
 About the blasted tree!
The leaves all withered ere the sun

His next day's rapid course had run,
And ere the summer day was done
 It winter seemed to be. 155
And still, oh woods of Aveyron,
 Amid thy dreary solitude
 The oak a sapless trunk has stood,
To mark the spot where murder foul was done!

 From her the wild boy learned 'Alone!' 160
She tried to say, 'My babe will die!'
But angels caught her parting sigh,
 The babe her dying tone.
And from that hour the boy has been
Lord of the solitary scene, 165
Wand'ring the dreary shades between,
 Making his dismal moan!
Till, mazy woods of Aveyron,
 Dark wilds of dreary solitude,
 Amid your thorny alleys rude 170
I thought myself alone.
 And could a wretch more wretched be,
 More wild or fancy-fraught than he,
Whose melancholy tale would pierce an heart of stone?

The Savage of Aveyron

¹ Pascoe points out that this poem was probably inspired by reports in the Morning Post of the wild boy of Aveyron: 'He lived on potatoes, chestnuts, and acorns.... His features are regular, but without expression; every part of his body is covered with scars; these scars attest the cruelty of the persons by whom, it is presumed, he has been abandoned; or perhaps they are attributable only to the dangers of a solitary existence at a tender age, and in a rude tract of country' (Morning Post 3 October 1800).

Robert Burns (1759–1796)

Scotland's greatest poet did not live to see the birth of the new literary movement (if one dates it from publication of Lyrical Ballads in 1798), but his work was such a powerful influence on its authors that many would claim him as its godfather, if not its progenitor – titles he deserves to share with Cowper. His finest single poem, included here in its earliest published form, exemplifies the element of the picaresque that runs through Romanticism, articulated in 'The Idiot Boy', 'Peter Bell', 'The Ancient Mariner' and Don Juan; as Wordsworth once said, 'Who but some impenetrable dunce, or narrow-minded puritan in works of art, ever read without delight the picture which [Burns] has drawn of the convivial exaltation of the rustic adventurer, Tam o' Shanter?' (Owen and Smyser iii 124).

Robert Burns was the oldest child of Agnes Broun and William Burnes, a tenant farmer. His father's rejection of Calvinism in favour of a less prescriptive, humanist faith was an act of defiance that helped forge Burns's personality. In due course, he took over as chief labourer when his father's health went into decline. William Burnes died in 1784, leaving his son head of a large family at the age of 25. For some reason that event unleashed a period of remarkable creativity, including many of the poems published in his first book-length publication, Poems Chiefly in the Scottish Dialect (1786). It was an immediate success: 612 copies were printed and sold at three shillings each (the equivalent of £11 today). It sold out within a month of publication on 31 July 1786.

One of its most successful poems, 'Epistle to J. Lapraik, an old Scotch bard', shows Burns' colloquial, lyric style at its most engaging. To gauge its impact, you have to imagine a time when the poetry pages of magazines and newspapers were filled with Popean imitations in decasyllabic couplets; odes to fear, hope and other abstract entities, and versifications of biblical episodes. The idea that someone could write something like the 'Epistle' was shocking enough, but that they should deploy an energetic folk stanza brimming with unfamiliar usages drawn from idiomatic lowland Scots was well nigh unprecedented, at least in polite circles. Not only that, but, as English readers swiftly discovered, Burns had no trouble in turning poems that initially must have seemed alienatingly avant-garde into meditations on the nature of human relationships; in this case its power derives from his kinship with a man he had never met. For some English readers the use of dialect words was an obstacle, but it did not hinder Burns' growing popularity – and certainly not among readers in the north of England, who also used them. Among these was the 16-year-old William Wordsworth, who borrowed a copy of the Kilmarnock poems from the library in Penrith, close to the border. Burns' newness and freshness struck him immediately, and exerted a strong influence on the new poetic forged by the lyrical ballads just over a decade later; mindful of those qualities, Coleridge once described Burns as 'the only always-natural poet in our language'.

Burns' fearless appetite for the everyday must have seemed almost improper to readers brought up on poems that spouted pieties about personified virtues. Instead he writes about working people in taverns or describes detailed observations made at the plough – things as trivial as daisies, for instance, or mice; one is called 'To a Louse, On

Seeing one on a Lady's Bonnet at Church'. How did that go down with the literary coteries of London? Very well, if the reviews are anything to go by: the New London Magazine remarked: 'We do not recollect to have ever met with a more signal instance of true and uncultivated genius than in the author of these poems.'

Part of his success lay in his versatility, for alongside the 'Epistle' and 'To a Mouse', Burns gave his public 'Man was Made to Mourn', non-dialect meditations on the more melancholy aspects of human existence so beloved of late eighteenth-century readers. It may be less daring than the dialect works, but he excels in it, and in doing so provided readers like Wordsworth with a model on which to base their own excursions in the genre, such as 'Simon Lee', 'The Last of the Flock' and 'Resolution and Independence'.

It is right that 'Tam o' Shanter' remains Burns' most important single work – not just for its obvious merits, but because it best exemplifies his strengths. It has endured both for its comedic appeal (and Burns is one of the funniest poetic talents in the literature) and his expert handling of the mock-Gothic storyline. No one could better have managed the orgiastic excesses of the witches' sabbath into which Tam drunkenly rides:

The dancers quick and quicker flew –
They reeled, they set, they crossed, they cleekit,
Till ilka carlin swat and reekit
And coost her duddies on the wark,
And linket at it in her sark.

(ll. 150–4)

You don't need to know that this is a description of the 'rigwoodie hags' dancing round a fire in order to find it both funny and compelling. Burns' language is imbued with a momentum of its own that induces laughter and exhilaration – an effect unstaled by familiarity. In his Lectures on the English Poets (1818) Hazlitt described it as a 'masterpiece': 'Burns has given the extremes of licentious eccentricity and convivial enjoyment in the story of this scape-grace, and of patriarchal simplicity and gravity in describing the old national character of the Scottish peasantry' (Wu ii 292). When writing to Burns, the critic Alexander Fraser Tytler was no less enthusiastic: 'I have seldom in my life tasted of higher enjoyment from any work of genius than I have received from this composition; and I am much mistaken if this poem alone, had you never written another syllable, would not have been sufficient to have transmitted your name down to posterity with high reputation.'¹

Epistle to J. Lapraik,¹ an old Scotch bard, 1 April 1785

From Poems, Chiefly in the Scottish Dialect (1786)

While briers an' woodbines budding green,
An' pairicks² scaichan loud at e'en,
And morning poossie³ whiddan⁴ seen,
Inspire my muse,
This freedom, in an unknown frien', 5
I pray excuse.

On Fasteneen⁵ we had a rockin,⁶
To ca' the crack⁷ and weave our stockin;
And there was muckle fun and jokin,
Ye need na doubt; 10
At length we had a hearty yokin,⁸
At sang about.⁹

There was ae sang¹⁰ amang the rest,
Aboon them a' it pleased me best,
That some kind husband had addressed 15
To some sweet wife:
It thirled the heart-strings through the breast,
A' to the life.
I've scarce heard aught described¹¹ sae weel

What gen'rous,¹² manly bosoms feel; 20
Thought I, 'Can this be Pope or Steele
Or Beattie's wark?'¹³

They tald me 'twas an odd kind chiel¹⁴
About Muirkirk.¹⁵

It pat me fidgean-fain¹⁶ to hear't, 25
An' sae about him there I spier't;¹⁷
Then a' that kent him round declared
He had ingine,¹⁸
That nane excelled it, few cam near't,
It was sae fine. 30

That set him to a pint of ale,
An' either douse¹⁹ or merry tale,
Or rhymes an' sangs he'd made himsel,
Or witty catches –
'Tween Inverness and Tiviotdale²⁰ 35
He had few matches.

Then up I gat, an swoor an aith,²¹
Though I should pawn my pleugh an' graith,²²
Or die a cadger pownie's²³ death
At some dyke-back,²⁴ 40
A pint an' gill I'd gie them baith
To hear your crack.²⁵

But first an' foremost, I should tell,
Amaist as soon as I could spell,
I to the crambo-jingle²⁶ fell, 45
Though rude an' rough,

Yet crooning to a body's sel²⁷
Does weel eneugh.

I am nae poet, in a sense,
But just a rhymer like by chance, 50
An' hae to learning nae pretence –
Yet what the matter?
Whene'er my muse does on me glance,
I jingle at her.

Your critic-folk may cock their nose 55
And say, 'How can you e'er propose
You wha ken²⁸ hardly verse frae prose,
To mak a sang?'
But by your leaves, my learned foes,
Ye're maybe wrang. 60

What's a' your jargon o' your schools,
Your Latin names for horns an' stools?
If honest nature made you fools,
What sairs²⁹ your Grammars?
Ye'd better taen up spades and shoos³⁰ 65
Or knappin-hammers.³¹

A set o' dull, conceited hashes³²
Confuse their brains in College classes!
They gang in stirks³³ and come out asses,³⁴
Plain truth to speak; 70
An' syne³⁵ they think to climb Parnassus
By dint o' Greek!

Gie me ae spark o' nature's fire,
That's a' the learning I desire;

Then, though I drudge through dub³⁶ an' mire 75
At pleugh or cart,
My muse, though hamely in attire,
May touch the heart.³⁷

Oh for a spunk³⁸ o' Allan's glee,
Or Ferguson's, the bauld an' slee,³⁹ 80
Or bright Lapraik's, my friend to be,⁴⁰
If I can hit it!
That would be lear⁴¹ eneugh for me,
If I could get it.

Now sir, if ye hae friends enow, 85
Though real friends I b'lieve are few,
Yet, if your catalogue be fow,⁴²
I'se no insist;
But gif ye want ae friend that's true,
I'm on your list. 90

I winna blaw⁴³ about mysel,
As ill I like my fauts to tell;
But friends an' folk that wish me well,
They sometimes roose⁴⁴ me –
Though I maun own as monie still 95
As far abuse me.

There's ae wee faut they whiles lay to me:
I like the lasses (Gude forgie me!);
For monie a plack⁴⁵ they wheedle frae me 100
At dance or fair –
Maybe some ither thing they gie me
They weel can spare.

But Mauchline Race⁴⁶ or Mauchline Fair,
I should be proud to meet you there;
We'se gie ae night's discharge to care 105
If we forgather,
An' hae a swap o' rhymin-ware
Wi' ane anither.

The four-gill chap,⁴⁷ we'se gar him clatter,
An' kirs'n⁴⁸ him wi' reekin⁴⁹ water; 110
Syne we'll sit down an' tak our whitter⁵⁰
To cheer our heart;
An' faith, we'se be acquainted better
Before we part.

Awa ye selfish, warly⁵¹ race, 115
Wha think that havins, sense an' grace,
Ev'n love an' friendship should give place
To 'catch-the-plack'!⁵²
I dinna like to see your face,
Nor hear your crack. 120

But ye whom social pleasure charms,
Whose hearts the tide of kindness warms,
Who hold your being on the terms,
'Each aid the others' –
Come to my bowl, come to my arms, 125
My friends, my brothers!

But to conclude my lang epistle,
As my auld pen's worn to the grissle;⁵³
Twa lines frae you wad gar me fistle,⁵⁴
Who am, most fervent, 130

While I can either sing or whistle,
Your friend and servant.

Man was Made to Mourn, A Dirge (composed August 1785)

I

When chill November’s surly blast
Made fields and forests bare,
One ev’ning, as I wand’red forth
Along the banks of Aire,¹
I spied a man whose aged step 5
Seemed weary, worn with care;²
His face was furrowed o’er with years
And hoary was his hair.

II

‘Young stranger, whither wand’rest thou?’
Began the rev’rend sage, 10
‘Does thirst of wealth thy step constrain,
Or youthful pleasure’s rage?
Or haply, pressed with cares and woes,
Too soon thou hast began
To wander forth, with me to mourn 15
The miseries of man.

III

The sun that overhangs yon moors,
Out-spreading far and wide,
Where hundreds labour to support
A haughty lordling’s pride; 20
I’ve seen yon weary winter sun
Twice forty times return,
And ev’ry time has added proofs
That man was made to mourn.

IV

Oh man, while in thy early years, 25
How prodigal of time!
Misspending all thy precious hours,
Thy glorious, youthful prime!
Alternate follies take the sway,
Licentious passions burn, 30
Which tenfold force gives nature’s law
That man was made to mourn.

V

Look not alone on youthful prime
Or manhood’s active might;
Man then is useful to his kind, 35
Supported is his right:
But see him on the edge of life,
With cares and sorrows worn,

Then age and want (oh, ill-matched pair!)
Show man was made to mourn. 40

VI

A few seem favourites of fate,
In pleasure's lap caressed;
Yet think not all the rich and great
Are likewise truly blessed.
But oh! what crowds in ev'ry land, 45
All wretched and forlorn,
Through weary life this lesson learn –
That man was made to mourn!

VII

Many and sharp the num'rous ills
Enwoven with our frame! 50
More pointed still we make ourselves
Regret, remorse and shame!
And man, whose heav'n-erected face
The smiles of love adorn,
Man's inhumanity to man³ 55
Makes countless thousands mourn!

VIII

See yonder poor, o'erlaboured wight,
So abject, mean and vile,
Who begs a brother of the earth
To give him leave to toil;⁴ 60
And see his lordly fellow-worm
The poor petition spurn –
Unmindful, though a weeping wife
And helpless offspring mourn.

IX

If I'm designed yon lordling's slave, 65
By nature's law designed,
Why was an independent wish

E'er planted in my mind?
If not, why am I subject to
His cruelty or scorn? 70
Or why has man the will and pow'r
To make his fellow mourn?

X

Yet let not this too much, my son,
Disturb thy youthful breast;
This partial view of humankind 75
Is surely not the last!
The poor, oppressed, honest man
Had never, sure, been born,
Had there not been some recompense
To comfort those that mourn! 80

XI

Oh death – the poor man's dearest friend,
The kindest and the best!
Welcome the hour, my aged limbs
Are laid with thee at rest!
The great, the wealthy, fear thy blow, 85
From pomp and pleasure torn;
But oh, a blessed relief for those
That weary-laden mourn!'

Man was Made to Mourn

¹ The River Ayr rises on the western border of Scotland and flows east to the sea.

² I spied a man...care This solitary was an influence on Wordsworth's leech-gatherer in Resolution and Independence.

³ Man's inhumanity to man Donald Low notes an allusion to Edward Young, Night Thoughts viii 104–5: 'Man's ... endless inhumanities to man’.

⁴ To give him leave to toil As Low notes, De Quincey refers to ‘those groans which ascended to heaven from [Burns’s] over-burdened heart – those harrowing words, “To give him leave to toil”, which record almost a reproach to the ordinances of God’ (Masson ii 137).

To a Mouse, on turning her up in her nest, with the plough, November 1785¹

Wee, sleeket,² cowran,³ tim’rous beastie,
Oh what a panic’s in thy breastie!⁴
Thou need na start awa sae hasty
Wi’ bickering brattle!⁵
I wad be laith⁶ to rin⁷ an’ chase thee 5
Wi’ murd’ring pattle!⁸

I’m truly sorry man’s dominion
Has broken nature’s social union,
An’ justifies that ill opinion
Which makes thee startle 10
At me, thy poor earth-born companion
An’ fellow mortal!

I doubt na, whyles, but thou mayst thieve;
What then? Poor beastie, thou maun live!
A daimen-icker in a thrave⁹ 15
’S a sma’ request:
I’ll get a blessing wi’ the lave,¹⁰
An’ never miss’t!

Thy wee-bit housie, too, in ruin!

It's silly wa's¹¹ the win's are strewin! 20
An' naething, now, to big¹² a new ane
O' foggage¹³ green!
An' bleak December's winds ensuin,
Baith snell¹⁴ an' keen!

Thou saw the fields laid bare an' wast,¹⁵ 25
An' weary winter comin fast,
An' cozie here, beneath the blast,
Thou thought to dwell;
Till crash! the cruel coulter¹⁶ passed
Out through thy cell. 30

That wee-bit heap o' leaves an' stibble¹⁷
Has cost thee monie a weary nibble!
Now thou's turned out, for a' thy trouble,
But¹⁸ house or hald,
To thole¹⁹ the winter's sleety dribble, 35
An' cranreuch²⁰ cauld!

But mousie, thou art no thy-lane²¹
In proving foresight may be vain:
The best-laid schemes o' mice an' men
Gang aft agley,²² 40
An' lea'e us nought but grief an' pain
For promised joy!

Still, thou art blessed compared wi' me!²³
The present only toucheth thee:
But och! I backward cast my e'e 45
On prospects drear!

An' forward, though I canna see,
I guess an' fear!

To a Mouse

1 According to Burns's brother Gilbert, the poem was composed 'while the author was holding the plough'. John Blane, who worked on the plough with Burns, later recalled that he had chased the mouse with the intention of killing it, but was stopped by the poet, who then became 'thoughtful and abstracted'.

2 sleeket smooth, sleek.

3 cowran cowering.

4 breastie little breast.

5 bickering brattle scampering sounds.

6 laith loath.

7 rin run.

8 pattle spade used to clear mud from the plough.

9 A daimen-icker in a thrave the occasional ear of corn in a couple of stooks.

10 lave rest, remainder. Low notes the allusion to Deuteronomy 24:19: 'When thou cuttest down thine harvest in thy field, and hast forgot a sheaf in the field, thou shalt not go again to fetch it; it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow: that the Lord thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hands.'

11 silly wa's helpless walls.

12 big build.

13 foggage rank grass.

14 snell sharp, severe.

15 wast waste.

16 coulter cutting blade of the plough.

17 stibble stubble.

18 But without.

19 thole endure.

20 cranreuch hoar-frost.

21 no thy-lane not alone.

22 agley awry.

23 Donald Low notes the allusion to Rasselas chapter 2: ‘As he passed through the fields, and saw the animals around him, “Ye”, said he, “are happy, and need not envy me that walk thus among you, burdened with myself; nor do I, ye gentle beings, envy your felicity, for it is not the felicity of man. I have many distresses from which ye are free; I fear pain when I do not feel it; I sometimes shrink at evils recollected, and sometimes start at evils anticipated. Surely the equity of Providence has balanced peculiar sufferings with peculiar enjoyments.” ’

Tam o’ Shanter. A Tale (composed late 1790)

From Francis Grose, The Antiquities of Scotland (1791)

When chapman billies¹ leave the street,
And drouthy² neebors, neebors meet,
As market-days are wearing late,
And folk begin to tak the gate;³
While we sit bowsing at the nappy,⁴ 5
And gettin fou, and unco⁵ happy,
We think na on the lang Scots miles,⁶
The waters, mosses, slaps⁷ and styles
That lie between us and our hame,
Where sits our sulky sullen dame, 10
Gathering her brows like gathering storm,
Nursing her wrath to keep it warm.

This truth fand honest Tam o' Shanter,
As he frae Ayr ae night did canter
(Auld Ayr, whom ne'er a town surpasses 15
For honest men and bonnie lasses).

Oh Tam, hadst thou but been sae wise
As taen thy ain wife Kate's advice!
She tauld thee weel, thou was a skellum,⁸
A bletherin, blusterin, drunken blellum;⁹ 20
That frae November till October,
Ae market-day thou was na sober;
That ilka melder¹⁰ wi' the miller,
Thou sat as long as thou had siller;¹¹
That every naig was ca'd a shoe on, 25
The smith and thee gat roarin fou¹² on;
That at the L—d's house, even on Sunday,
Thou drank wi' Kirkton Jean till Monday.
She prophesied that late or soon,

Thou wad be found deep drowned in Doon;¹³ 30
Or caught wi' warlocks in the mirk,
By Alloway's auld haunted kirk.

Ah, gentle dames, it gars me greet,¹⁴
To think how mony counsels sweet,
How mony lengthened sage advices, 35
The husband frae the wife despises!

But to our tale: ae market-night
Tam had got planted¹⁵ unco right,
Fast by an ingle bleezing¹⁶ finely,
Wi' reamin swats¹⁷ that drank divinely; 40
And at his elbow, souter¹⁸ Johnie,
His ancient, trusty, drouthy crony -
Tam lo'ed him like a vera brither,
They had been fou for weeks tegither.
The night drave on wi' sangs and clatter, 45
And ay the ale was growing better;
The landlady and Tam grew gracious
With favours secret, sweet and precious;
The souter tauld his queerest stories,
The landlord's laugh was ready chorus; 50
The storm without might rair and rustle,
Tam did na mind the storm a whistle.

Care, mad to see a man sae happy,
E'en drowned himsel amang the nappy;
As bees flee hame wi' lades o' treasure, 55
The minutes winged their way wi' pleasure -
Kings may be blessed, but Tam was glorious,
O'er a' the ills o' life victorious!¹⁹

But pleasures are like poppies spread:
You seize the flower, its bloom is shed; 60
Or like the snow-falls in the river,
A moment white, then melts for ever;²⁰

Or like the borealis race²¹
 That flit ere you can point their place;
 Or like the rainbow's lovely form, 65
 Evanishing amid the storm.
 Nae man can tether time or tide,
 The hour approaches Tam maun²² ride;
 That hour, o' night's black arch the keystone,²³
 That dreary hour he mounts his beast in; 70
 And sic a night he taks the road in,
 As ne'er poor sinner was abroad in.
 The wind blew as 'twad blawn its last,
 The rattling showers rose on the blast,
 The speedy gleams the darkness swallowed, 75
 Loud, deep and lang, the thunder bellowed:
 That night, a child might understand,
 The Deil had business on his hand.
 Weel mounted on his grey mare, Meg
 (A better never lifted leg), 80
 Tam skelpit²⁴ on through dub²⁵ and mire,
 Despising wind and rain and fire,
 Whyles²⁶ holding fast his gude blue bonnet,
 Whyles crooning o'er an auld Scots sonnet,
 Whyles glowing round wi' prudent cares 85
 Lest bogles²⁷ catch him unawares:
 Kirk Alloway²⁸ was drawing nigh,
 Whare ghaists and houlets nightly cry.
 By this time he was cross the ford
 Where in the snaw the chapman smoored,²⁹ 90
 And past the birks and meikle stane³⁰
 Where drunken Charlie brak's neck-bane;³¹
 And through the whins and by the cairn
 Where hunters fand the murdered bairn;
 And near the tree aboon the well 95

Whare Mungo's mither hanged hersel.
Before him, Doon³² pours all his floods;
The doubling storm roars through the woods;
The lightnings flash from pole to pole;
Near and more near, the thunders roll: 100
When, glimmering through groaning trees,
Kirk Alloway seemed in a bleeze³³ –
Through ilka bore³⁴ the beams were glancing,
And loud resounded mirth and dancing.
Inspiring, bold John Barleycorn,³⁵ 105
What dangers thou canst make us scorn!
Wi' tippeny,³⁶ we fear nae evil;
Wi' usquabae,³⁷ we'll face the Devil!
The swats sae reamed in Tammie's noddle,
Fair play, he cared na deils a boddle.³⁸ 110
But Maggie stood right sair astonished
Till, by the heel and hand admonished,
She ventured forward on the light,
And, wow, Tam saw an unco sight!
Warlocks and witches in a dance, 115
Nae cotillon brent new frae France,
But hornpipes, jigs, strathspeys and reels
Put life and mettle in their heels.
A winnock-bunker in the east,³⁹
There sat auld Nick in shape o' beast: 120
A towzie tyke,⁴⁰ black, grim and large –
To gie them music was his charge.
He screwed the pipes and gart them skirl⁴¹
Till roof and rafters a' did dirl!⁴²
Coffins stood round like open presses 125
That shawed the dead in their last dresses,
And by some devilish cantraip⁴³ slight

Each in its cauld hand held a light
 By which heroic Tam was able
 To note upon the haly table⁴⁴ 130
 A murderer's banes in gibbet airns;⁴⁵
 Twa span-lang,⁴⁶ wee, unchirstened bairns;
 A thief new-cuttet frae a rape,
 Wi' his last gasp his gab did gape;
 Five tomahawks, wi' blood red-rusted; 135
 Five scymitars, wi' murder crusted;
 A garter which a babe had strangled;
 A knife a father's throat had mangled,
 Whom his ain son of life bereft,
 The grey hairs yet stak to the heft; 140
 Wi' mair of horrible and awefu',
 That even to name wad be unlawfu':
 Three lawyers' tongues turned inside out,
 Wi' lies seamed like a beggar's clout;
 Three priests' hearts, rotten, black as muck, 145
 Lay stinking, vile, in every neuk.⁴⁷
 As Tammie glow' red, amazed and curious,
 The mirth and fun grew fast and furious.
 The piper loud and louder blew;
 The dancers quick and quicker flew – 150
 They reeled, they set, they crossed, they cleekit,
 Till ilka carlin swat and reekit⁴⁸
 And coost her duddies⁴⁹ on the wark,
 And linket⁵⁰ at it in her sark.⁵¹
 Now Tam, oh Tam! had thae been queans⁵² 155
 A' plump and strappin in their teens,
 Their sarks, instead o' creeshie flainen,
 Been snaw-white seventeen-hunder linen⁵³ –
 Thir breeks o' mine, my only pair,
 That ance were plush, o' gude blue hair, 160

I wad hae gien them off my hurdies⁵⁴
 For ae blink o' the bonie burdies!
 But withered beldams, auld and droll,
 Rigwoodie⁵⁵ hags wad spean a foal,
 Loupin and flingin on a crumock – 165
 I wonder didna turn thy stomach.
 But Tam kend what was what fu' brawlie,
 There was ae winsome wench and walie⁵⁶
 That night enlisted in the core
 (Lang after kend⁵⁷ on Carrick shore,⁵⁸ 170
 For mony a beast to dead she shot
 And perished mony a bonnie boat,
 And shook baith meikle corn and bear,
 And kept the countryside in fear);
 Her cutty sark o' Paisley harn,⁵⁹ 175
 That while a lassie she had worn,
 In longitude though sorely scanty,
 It was her best, and she was vauntie.⁶⁰
 Ah, little thought thy reverend graunie,
 That sark she coft⁶¹ for her wee Nannie, 180
 Wi' twa pund Scots ('twas a' her riches)
 Should ever graced a dance o' witches!
 But here my muse her wing maun cour
 (Sic flights are far beyond her power)
 To sing how Nannie lap and flang⁶² – 185
 A souple jad⁶³ she was, and strang –
 And how Tam stood, like ane bewitched,
 And thought his very een enriched;
 Even Satan glow' red and fided fu' fain,
 And hotched, and blew wi' might and main;⁶⁴ 190
 Till first ae caper – syne anither –
 Tam lost his reason a' thegither
 And roars out, 'Weel done, Cutty Sark!'

And in an instant all was dark:
 And scarcely had he Maggie rallied, 195
 When out the hellish legion sallied.
 As bees bizz out wi' angry fyke
 When plundering herds assail their byke;⁶⁵
 As open pussie's⁶⁶ mortal foes,
 When, pop! she starts before their nose; 200
 As eager rins the market-croud,
 When 'Catch the thief!' resounds aloud;
 So Maggie rins, the witches follow,
 Wi' mony an eldritch⁶⁷ shout and hollo.
 Ah Tam, ah Tam, thou'll get thy fairin! 205
 In hell they'll roast thee like a herrin!
 In vain thy Kate awaits thy comin,
 Kate soon will be a woefu' woman!!!
 Now do thy speedy utmost, Meg,
 And win the keystone o' the brig;⁶⁸ 210
 There at them thou thy tail may toss –
 A running stream they dare na cross!
 But ere the keystone she could make,
 The fient a tail she had to shake;
 For Nannie, far before the rest, 215
 Hard upon noble Maggy pressed,
 And flew at Tam with furious ettle⁶⁹ –
 But little kend she Maggy's mettle!
 Ae spring brought off her master hale,
 But left behind her ain grey tail: 220
 The carlin⁷⁰ claught her by the rump
 And left poor Maggy scarce a stump.
 Now wha this tale o' truth shall read,
 Ilk man and mother's son, take heed:
 Whene'er to drink you are inclined, 225
 Or cutty sarks rin in your mind –

Think, ye may buy the joys o'er dear,
Remember Tam o' Shanter's mare!

20 Or like...ever In a letter of 1814 Byron described these lines as ‘very graceful and pleasing’ (Marchand iv 56). Coleridge, in his Lectures on Shakespeare and Milton, described Burns as ‘a person who balances sameness with difference – and triteness with novelty – who reconciles judgement with enthusiasm and vehemence with feeling – Art with Nature – the manner with the matter, and our admiration of the poem with the sympathy with the characters and incidents of the poem.’

Song (composed by November 1793, published 1796, edited from MS)

Oh my love's like the red, red rose,
That's newly sprung in June;
My love's like the melody
That's sweetly played in tune.

As fair art thou, my bonny lass, 5
So deep in love am I;
And I can love thee still, my dear,
Till a' the seas gang dry.

Till a' the seas gang dry, my dear,
And the rocks melt wi' the sun; 10
I will love thee still, my dear,
While the sands o' life shall run.

And fare thee weel, my only love,
Oh fare thee weel awhile!
And I will come again, my love, 15
Though 'twere ten thousand mile.

Mary Wollstonecraft (1759–1797)

Prolific lady of letters, moral writer and novelist, her most influential single work was A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792), which used the egalitarian ideals of the French Revolution as the basis for a sustained appeal for women's rights. She is now regarded as the mother of modern feminism.

Mary Wollstonecraft was the second of seven children, the first daughter of Edward John Wollstonecraft and Elizabeth Dickson. Home life was difficult: her father was abusive and prone to drink; her mother doted on the eldest of her brothers, Ned. She left home at 19 to support herself as a writer – a remarkably brave and daring decision for a woman at that time.

In 1784, she, her sister Eliza and her 'soul-mate' Fanny Blood opened a school in the London suburb of Islington, later moving to Newington Green; two years later it was in financial trouble and closed. By this time Wollstonecraft was becoming known in intellectual circles, and was among those published by the Unitarian, Joseph Johnson (others included Anna Laetitia Barbauld, Blake, Wordsworth, Cowper and Paine); early works include Thoughts on the Education of Daughters (1786), Original Stories from Real Life (1787) and Mary: A Fiction (1788). In 1788 she began contributing to Johnson's periodical, the Analytical Review.

A Vindication of the Rights of Men was issued anonymously, 29 November 1790, within a month of Burke's Reflections, to which it was the first major response. It was an unflinching attack on the hereditary system on behalf of which Burke had written. In the extract below Wollstonecraft deplores the poverty and oppression that led to the French Revolution, and criticizes Burke's dependence on rhetoric.

A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792) argues that true political freedom can only be attained with equality of the sexes. Her principal precursors were the Bluestockings (see p. 55) – Hannah More, Anna Laetitia Barbauld and Ann Yearsley – but none would have ventured as far as she did. Indeed, she criticizes Barbauld's 'To a Lady, with Some Painted Flowers' for writing, of women, 'Your best and sweetest empire is – to please.' Wollstonecraft observed that femininity was socially constructed – over-refinement, sensibility, concern with appearances, and seductiveness being parts of a false consciousness imposed by a male culture. To prove this she traced the cultivation in women of a series of unnatural and crippling inversions: reputation favoured over genuine modesty; looks over reason and understanding; sensibility over physical and mental vigour; and deceit and cunning over love. Finally, and perhaps most devastatingly, she argues that the legal disempowerment of women encourages them to become social outlaws – the theme of her last novel, Maria, or the Wrongs of Woman (1798).

She flouted convention fearlessly in her personal life. Rejected by the painter Fuseli and his wife when she proposed a platonic ménage, she went to France in December 1792 to witness the Revolution. There she fell in love with Gilbert Imlay, the traveller and writer, by whom she had a daughter, Fanny, 14 May 1794. The following year she twice attempted suicide on finding that Imlay was now living with an actress. In 1796 she and William Godwin became lovers; despite criticisms of marriage made by them both in their various works, they were married on 29 March 1797. She gave birth to her second daughter Mary (the future Mary Shelley) on 30 August that year, but thanks to inadequate hygiene on the part of those attending her, she contracted an infection and died of puerperal fever on 10 September.

For years afterwards Wollstonecraft remained the target of frequent attacks by Tory critics. A year after her death, Robert Bisset in the Anti-Jacobin Review used the appearance of Godwin's Memoirs of the Author of A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1798) as an excuse for remarking that, 'Although they married, yet, as the philosopher himself bears testimony, they lived for several months in a state of illicit commerce.'¹ Bisset went on to criticize Vindication of the Rights of Woman, 'which the superficial fancied to be profound, and the profound knew to be superficial: it indeed had very little title to the character of ingenuity.'² And the European Magazine noted that Godwin's Memoirs will be read with disgust by every female who has any pretensions to delicacy; with detestation by everyone attached to the interests of religion and morality; and with indignation by anyone who might feel any regard for the unhappy woman whose frailties should have been buried in oblivion. Licentious as the times are, we trust it will obtain no imitators of the heroine in this country.³

It has never been easy to be a freethinker in England, and Wollstonecraft had the added disadvantage of being imprisoned within a series of gender-based prejudices of which she was a tireless opponent. Over a century would pass before that achievement would be fully credited.

[On Poverty]

From A Vindication of the Rights of Men (1790)

In this great city¹ that proudly rears its head and boasts of its population and commerce, how much misery lurks in pestilential corners, whilst idle mendicants assail, on every side, the man who hates to encourage impostors, or repress, with angry frown, the complaints of the poor! How many mechanics,² by a flux of trade or fashion, lose their employment – whom misfortunes (not to be warded off) lead to the idleness that vitiates their character and renders them afterwards averse to honest labour! Where is the eye that marks these evils, more gigantic than any of the infringements of property which you piously deprecate? Are these remediless evils? And is the human heart satisfied in turning the poor over to another world to receive the blessings this could afford?

If society was regulated on a more enlarged plan; if man was contented to be the friend of man, and did not seek to bury the sympathies of humanity in the servile appellation of master; if, turning his eyes from ideal regions of taste and elegance, he laboured to give the earth he inhabited all the beauty it is capable of receiving, and was ever on the watch to shed abroad all the happiness which human nature can enjoy – he who, respecting the rights of men, wishes to convince or persuade society that this is true happiness and dignity, is not the cruel oppressor of the poor, nor a short-sighted philosopher – he fears God and loves his fellow-creatures. Behold the whole duty of man! The citizen who acts differently is a sophisticated being.

Surveying civilized life, and seeing with undazzled eye the polished vices of the rich, their insincerity, want of natural affections, with all the specious train that luxury introduces, I have turned impatiently to the poor to look for man undebauched by riches or power. But alas, what did I see? A being scarcely above the brutes over which it tyrannized – a broken spirit, worn-out body, and all those gross vices which the example of the rich, rudely copied, could produce. Envy built a wall of separation that made the poor hate, whilst they bent to their superiors who, on their part, stepped aside to avoid the loathsome sight of human misery.

What were the outrages of a day³ to these continual miseries? Let those sorrows hide their diminished head before the tremendous mountain of woe that thus defaces our globe! Man preys on man – and you⁴ mourn for the idle tapestry that decorated a gothic pile, and the dronish bell that summoned the fat priest to prayer. You mourn for the empty pageant of a name, when slavery flaps her wing, and the sick heart retires to die in lonely wilds far from the abodes of man. Did the pangs you felt for insulted nobility, the anguish that rent your heart when the gorgeous robes were torn off the idol human weakness had set up, deserve to be compared with the long-drawn sigh of melancholy reflection, when misery and vice thus seem to haunt our steps, and swim on the top of every cheering prospect? Why is our fancy to be appalled by terrific perspectives of a hell beyond the grave? Hell stalks abroad: the lash resounds on the slave's naked sides, and the sick wretch, who can no longer earn the sour bread of unremitting labour, steals to a ditch to bid the world a long goodnight – or, neglected in some ostentatious hospital, breathes its last amidst the laugh of mercenary attendants.

Such misery demands more than tears. I pause to recollect myself, and smother the contempt I feel rising for your rhetorical flourishes and infantine sensibility.

From A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792)

Introduction

After considering the historic page, and viewing the living world with anxious solicitude, the most melancholy emotions of sorrowful indignation have depressed my spirits, and I have sighed when obliged to confess that either nature has made a great difference between man and man, or that the civilization which has hitherto taken place in the world has been very partial. I have turned over various books written on the subject of education, and patiently observed the conduct of parents and the management of schools; but what has been the result? – a profound conviction that the neglected education of my fellow-creatures is the grand source of the misery I deplore; and that women in particular are rendered weak and wretched by a variety of concurring causes, originating from one hasty conclusion. The conduct and manners of women, in fact, evidently prove that their minds are not in a healthy state; for, like the flowers which are planted in too rich a soil, strength and usefulness are sacrificed to beauty; and the flaunting leaves, after having pleased a fastidious eye, fade, disregarded on the stalk, long before the season when they ought to have arrived at maturity. One cause of this barren blooming I attribute to a false system of education, gathered from the books written on this subject by men who, considering females rather as women than human creatures, have been more anxious to make them alluring mistresses than wives; and the understanding of the sex has been so bubbled¹ by this specious homage, that the civilized women of the present century, with a few exceptions, are only anxious to inspire love, when they ought to cherish a nobler ambition, and by their abilities and virtues exact respect.

In a treatise, therefore, on female rights and manners, the works which have been particularly written for their improvement must not be overlooked; especially when it is asserted, in direct terms, that the minds of women are enfeebled by false refinement; that the books of instruction, written by men of genius, have had the same tendency as more frivolous productions; and that, in the true style of Mahometanism, they are only considered as females, and not as a part of the human species, when improvable reason is allowed to be the dignified distinction which raises men above the brute creation, and puts a natural sceptre in a feeble hand.

Yet because I am a woman, I would not lead my readers to suppose that I mean violently to agitate the contested question respecting the equality or inferiority of the sex; but as the subject lies in my way, and I cannot pass it over without subjecting the main tendency of my reasoning to misconstruction, I shall stop a moment to deliver, in a few words, my opinion. In the government of the physical world it is observable that the female in point of strength is, in general, inferior to the male. The male pursues, the female yields – this is the law of nature; and it does not appear to be suspended or abrogated in favour of woman. This physical superiority cannot be denied – and it is a noble prerogative! But not content with this natural pre-eminence, men endeavour to sink us still lower, merely to render us alluring objects for a moment; and women, intoxicated by the adoration which men, under the influence of their senses, pay them, do not seek to obtain a durable interest in their hearts, or to become the friends of the fellow creatures who find amusement in their society.

I am aware of an obvious inference: from every quarter have I heard exclamations against masculine women; but where are they to be found? If by this appellation men mean to inveigh against their ardour in hunting, shooting, and gaming, I shall most cordially join in the cry; but if it be against the imitation of manly virtues or, more properly speaking, the attainment of those talents and virtues, the exercise of which ennobles the human character, and which raises females in the scale of animal being, when they are comprehensively termed mankind; all those who view them with a philosophical eye must, I should think, wish with me, that they may every day grow more and more masculine.

This discussion naturally divides the subject. I shall first consider women in the grand light of human creatures who, in common with men, are placed on this earth to unfold their faculties; and afterwards I shall more particularly point out their peculiar designation.

I wish also to steer clear of an error which many respectable writers have fallen into; for the instruction which has hitherto been addressed to women, has rather been applicable to ladies, if the little indirect advice, that is scattered through Sandford and Merton be excepted;² but, addressing my sex in a firmer tone, I pay particular attention to those in the middle class, because they appear to be in the most natural state. Perhaps the seeds of false refinement, immorality, and vanity, have ever been shed by the great. Weak, artificial beings, raised above the common wants and affections of their race, in a premature unnatural manner, undermine the very foundation of virtue, and spread corruption through the whole mass of society! As a class of mankind they have the strongest claim to pity; the education of the rich tends to render them vain and helpless, and the unfolding mind is not strengthened by the practice of those duties which dignify the human character. They only live to amuse themselves, and by the same law which in nature invariably produces certain effects, they soon only afford barren amusement.

But as I purpose taking a separate view of the different ranks of society, and of the moral character of women, in each, this hint is, for the present, sufficient; and I have only alluded to the subject, because it appears to me to be the very essence of an introduction to give a cursory account of the contents of the work it introduces.

My own sex, I hope, will excuse me, if I treat them like rational creatures, instead of flattering their fascinating graces, and viewing them as if they were in a state of perpetual childhood, unable to stand alone. I earnestly wish to point out in what true dignity and human happiness consists – I wish to persuade women to endeavour to acquire strength, both of mind and body, and to convince them that the soft phrases, susceptibility of heart, delicacy of sentiment, and refinement of taste, are almost synonymous with epithets of weakness, and that those beings who are only the objects of pity and that kind of love, which has been termed its sister, will soon become objects of contempt.

Dismissing then those pretty feminine phrases, which the men condescendingly use to soften our slavish dependence, and despising that weak elegance of mind, exquisite sensibility, and sweet docility of manners, supposed to be the sexual characteristics of the weaker vessel, I wish to show that elegance is inferior to virtue, that the first object of laudable ambition is to obtain a character as a human being, regardless of the distinction of sex; and that secondary views should be brought to this simple touchstone.

This is a rough sketch of my plan; and should I express my conviction with the energetic emotions that I feel whenever I think of the subject, the dictates of experience and reflection will be felt by some of my readers. Animated by this important object, I shall disdain to cull my phrases or polish my style; I aim at being useful, and sincerity will render me unaffected; for, wishing rather to persuade by the force of my arguments, than dazzle by the elegance of my language, I shall not waste my time in rounding periods,³ nor in fabricating the turgid bombast of artificial feelings, which, coming from the head, never reach the heart. I shall be employed about things, not words! – and, anxious to render my sex more respectable members of society, I shall try to avoid that flowery diction⁴ which has slid from essays into novels, and from novels into familiar letters and conversation.

These pretty nothings, these caricatures of the real beauty of sensibility, dropping glibly from the tongue, vitiate the taste, and create a kind of sickly delicacy that turns away from simple unadorned truth; and a deluge of false sentiments and overstretched feelings, stifling the natural emotions of the heart, render the domestic pleasures insipid, that ought to sweeten the exercise of those severe duties, which educate a rational and immortal being for a nobler field of action.

The education of women has, of late, been more attended to than formerly; yet they are still reckoned a frivolous sex, and ridiculed or pitied by the writers who endeavour by satire or instruction to improve them. It is acknowledged that they spend many of the first years of their lives in acquiring a smattering of accomplishments: meanwhile strength of body and mind are sacrificed to libertine notions of beauty, to the desire of establishing themselves – the only way women can rise in the world – by marriage. And this desire making mere animals of them, when they marry they act as such children may be expected to act: they dress; they paint, and nickname God's creatures.⁵ Surely these weak beings are only fit for a seraglio! Can they govern a family, or take care of the poor babes whom they bring into the world?

If then it can be fairly deduced from the present conduct of the sex, from the prevalent fondness for pleasure which takes place of ambition and those nobler passions that open and enlarge the soul; that the instruction which women have received has only tended, with the constitution of civil society, to render them insignificant objects of desire – mere propagators of fools! – if it can be proved that in aiming to accomplish them, without cultivating their understandings, they are taken out of their sphere of duties, and made ridiculous and useless when the short-lived bloom of beauty is over,⁶ I presume that rational men will excuse me for endeavouring to persuade them to become more masculine and respectable.

Indeed the word masculine is only a bugbear: there is little reason to fear that women will acquire too much courage or fortitude; for their apparent inferiority with respect to bodily strength, must render them, in some degree, dependent on men in the various relations of life; but why should it be increased by prejudices that give a sex to virtue, and confound simple truths with sensual reveries?

Women are, in fact, so much degraded by mistaken notions of female excellence, that I do not mean to add a paradox when I assert, that this artificial weakness produces a propensity to tyrannize, and gives birth to cunning, the natural opponent of strength, which leads them to play off those contemptible infantile airs that undermine esteem even whilst they excite desire. Do not foster these prejudices, and they will naturally fall into their subordinate, yet respectable station, in life.

It seems scarcely necessary to say, that I now speak of the sex in general. Many individuals have more sense than their male relatives; and, as nothing preponderates where there is a constant struggle for an equilibrium, without⁷ it has naturally more gravity, some women govern their husbands without degrading themselves, because intellect will always govern.

[On the Lack of Learning]

Many are the causes that, in the present corrupt state of society, contribute to enslave women by cramping their understandings and sharpening their senses. One, perhaps, that silently does more mischief than all the rest, is their disregard of order.

To do everything in an orderly manner is a most important precept which women who, generally speaking, receive only a disorderly kind of education, seldom attend to with that degree of exactness that men, who from their infancy are broken into method, observe. This negligent kind of guesswork (for what other epithet can be used to point out the random exertions of a sort of instinctive common sense never brought to the test of reason?) prevents their generalizing matters of fact, so they do today what they did yesterday, merely because they did it yesterday.

This contempt of the understanding in early life has more baneful consequences than is commonly supposed, for the little knowledge which women of strong minds attain is, from various circumstances, of a more desultory kind than the knowledge of men, and it is acquired more by sheer observations on real life than from comparing what has been individually observed with the results of experience generalized by speculation. Led by their dependent situation and domestic employments more into society, what they learn is rather by snatches; and as learning is with them, in general, only a secondary thing, they do not pursue any one branch with that persevering ardour necessary to give vigour to the faculties and clearness to the judgement.

In the present state of society, a little learning⁸ is required to support the character of a gentleman, and boys are obliged to submit to a few years of discipline. But in the education of women, the cultivation of the understanding is always subordinate to the acquirement of some corporeal accomplishment. Even while enervated by confinement and false notions of modesty, the body is prevented from attaining that grace and beauty which relaxed half-formed limbs never exhibit. Besides, in youth their faculties are not brought forward by emulation, and having no serious scientific study, if they have natural sagacity it is turned too soon on life and manners. They dwell on effects and modifications without tracing them back to causes, and complicated rules to adjust behaviour are a weak substitute for simple principles.

As a proof that education gives this appearance of weakness to females, we may instance the example of military men, who are, like them, sent into the world before their minds have been stored with knowledge or fortified by principles. The consequences are similar: soldiers acquire a little superficial knowledge snatched from the muddy current of conversation; and, from continually mixing with society, they gain what is termed a knowledge of the world; and this acquaintance with manners and customs has frequently been confounded with a knowledge of the human heart.

But can the crude fruit of casual observation, never brought to the test of judgement, formed by comparing speculation and experience, deserve such a distinction? Soldiers, as well as women, practise the minor virtues with punctilious politeness. Where is then the sexual difference, when the education has been the same? All the difference that I can discern arises from the superior advantage of liberty, which enables the former to see more of life.

[A Revolution in Female Manners]

Let not men then in the pride of power use the same arguments that tyrannic kings and venal ministers have used, and fallaciously assert that woman ought to be subjected because she has always been so. But when man, governed by reasonable laws, enjoys his natural freedom, let him despise woman if she do not share it with him – and, till that glorious period arrives, in descanting on the folly of the sex, let him not overlook his own.

Women, it is true, obtaining power by unjust means by practising or fostering vice, evidently lose the rank which reason would assign them, and they become either abject slaves or capricious tyrants. They lose all simplicity, all dignity of mind, in acquiring power, and act as men are observed to act when they have been exalted by the same means.

It is time to effect a revolution in female manners, time to restore to them their lost dignity, and make them (as a part of the human species) labour, by reforming themselves, to reform the world. It is time to separate unchangeable morals from local manners. If men be demi-gods, why let us serve them! And if the dignity of the female soul be as disputable as that of animals; if their reason does not afford sufficient light to direct their conduct whilst unerring instinct is denied, they are surely of all creatures the most miserable, and, bent beneath the iron hand of destiny, must submit to be a fair defect in creation.⁹ But to justify the ways of providence respecting them,¹⁰ by pointing out some irrefragable reason for thus making such a large portion of mankind accountable and not accountable, would puzzle the subtlest casuist.

A follower of Rousseau, Day believed that children were by nature wilful and disobedient; one way of tutoring them was through moral tales. [On State Education]

When, therefore, I call women slaves, I mean in a political and civil sense, for indirectly they obtain too much power, and are debased by their exertions to obtain illicit sway.

Let an enlightened nation¹ then try what effect reason would have to bring them back to nature and their duty; and allowing them to share the advantages of education and government with man, see whether they will become better, as they grow wiser and become free. They cannot be injured by the experiment, for it is not in the power of man to render them more insignificant than they are at present.

To render this practicable, day schools for particular ages should be established by government in which boys and girls might be educated together. The school for the younger children, from five to nine years of age, ought to be absolutely free and open to all classes.² A sufficient number of masters should also be chosen by a select committee in each parish, to whom any complaint of negligence, etc., might be made, if signed by six of the children's parents.

Ushers³ would then be unnecessary, for I believe experience will ever prove that this kind of subordinate authority is particularly injurious to the morals of youth. What, indeed, can tend to deprave the character more than outward submission and inward contempt? Yet how can boys be expected to treat an usher with respect, when the master seems to consider him in the light of a servant, and almost to countenance the ridicule which becomes the chief amusement of the boys during the play hours?

But nothing of this kind could occur in an elementary day-school, where boys and girls, the rich and poor, should meet together. And to prevent any of the distinctions of vanity, they should be dressed alike, and all obliged to submit to the same discipline, or leave the school. The schoolroom ought to be surrounded by a large piece of ground in which the children might be usefully exercised, for at this age they should not be confined to any sedentary employment for more than an hour at a time. But these relaxations might all be rendered a part of elementary education, for many things improve and amuse the senses when introduced as a kind of show, to the principles of which, drily laid down, children would turn a deaf ear – for instance, botany, mechanics, and astronomy. Reading, writing, arithmetic, natural history and some simple experiments in natural philosophy might fill up the day, but these pursuits should never encroach on gymnastic plays in the open air. The elements of religion, history, the history of man, and politics, might also be taught by conversations in the socratic form.⁴

After the age of nine, girls and boys intended for domestic employments or mechanical trades ought to be removed to other schools, and receive instruction in some measure appropriated to the destination of each individual, the two sexes being still together in the morning. But in the afternoon, the girls should attend a school where plain-work, mantua-making, millinery,⁵ etc., would be their employment.

The young people of superior abilities or fortune might now be taught, in another school, the dead and living languages,⁶ the elements of science, and continue the study of history and politics on a more extensive scale, which would not exclude polite literature.

‘Girls and boys still together?’ I hear some readers ask. Yes.⁷ And I should not fear any other consequence than that some early attachment might take place – which, whilst it had the best effect on the moral character of the young people, might not perfectly agree with the views of the parents (for it will be a long time, I fear, before the world is so enlightened that parents, only anxious to render their children virtuous, will let them choose companions for life themselves).

Besides, this would be a sure way to promote early marriages, and from early marriages the most salutary physical and moral effects naturally flow. What a different character does a married citizen assume from the selfish coxcomb who lives but for himself, and who is often afraid to marry lest he should not be able to live in a certain style. Great emergencies excepted, which would rarely occur in a society of which equality was the basis, a man can only be prepared to discharge the duties of public life by the habitual practice of those inferior ones which form the man.

In this plan of education the constitution of boys would not be ruined by the early debaucheries which now make men so selfish, nor girls rendered weak and vain by indolence and frivolous pursuits. But I presuppose that such a degree of equality should be established between the sexes as would shut out gallantry and coquetry, yet allow friendship and love to temper the heart for the discharge of higher duties.

On State Education

² ‘Treating this part of the subject, I have borrowed some hints from a very sensible pamphlet written by the late Bishop of Autun on public education’ (Wollstonecraft’s note). She refers to Talleyrand’s Rapport sur l'instruction publique (1791), which argued for universal public education until the age of 8.

³ Ushers assistant masters.

⁴ conversations in the socratic form Socrates taught a form of enquiry. When his opponents boasted that they knew what justice, piety, temperance or law was, Socrates would ask them to give an account of it in order to demonstrate that the account offered was inadequate, thus indicating the need to revise accepted ways of thinking. The two sides then entered into dialogue.

⁶ the dead and living languages i.e. French and German, as well as ancient tongues such as Latin and Greek.

⁷ Yes Although the norm today, it was rare for boys and girls to be educated together in Wollstonecraft's day. Conservative critics of her book saw it as the recipe for immorality and rebellion.

Helen Maria Williams (1761–1827)

Helen Maria Williams was born in London in 1761 to Charles Williams, an army officer, and Helen Hay. When her father died in 1769 she and her mother moved to Berwick-upon-Tweed, where her mother educated her at home. Her formative years were spent in Scotland, a country which she always loved. In exile in France in 1814, she lamented her inability to return:

Ah, lost to me thy fir-clad hills,
The music of thy mountain rills,
Yet ever shall the mem'ry last,
'Pleasant and mournful' of the past.¹

Williams returned to London in 1781 and, with the help of the Dissenting minister Dr Andrew Kippis, published her first poem, Edwin and Eltruda, A Legendary Tale (1782). The entire episode, she later recalled, was fortuitous: 'My first production, the Legendary Tale of Edwin and Eltruda, was composed to amuse some solitary hours, and without any view to publication. Being shown to Dr Kippis, he declared that it deserved to be committed to the press, and offered to take upon himself the task of introducing it to the world.'² Its success made her well known in literary circles, and within a short time her friends included Fanny Burney, William Hayley, Samuel Johnson, Elizabeth Montagu, Anna Seward, the Wartons, Samuel Rogers and Charlotte Smith. In 1783 she published An Ode on the Peace, and in 1784 Peru, A Poem. In Six Cantos, which she dedicated to Elizabeth Montagu. Boswell recounts the story of her first meeting with Dr Johnson in May 1784, after the appearance of An Ode on the Peace:

He had dined that day at Mr Hoole's, and Miss Helen Maria Williams being expected in the evening, Mr Hoole put into his hands her beautiful 'Ode on the Peace'. Johnson read it over, and when this elegant and accomplished young lady was presented to him, he took her by the hand in the most courteous manner, and repeated the finest stanza of her poem; this was the most delicate and pleasing compliment he could pay.³

More than 1,500 people subscribed to her collected Poems of 1786. It was read by, among others, the young William Wordsworth, then a schoolboy of 16 at Hawkshead Grammar School. As she had become known as a poet of sensibility, it was at that moment fashionable to address sentimental sonnets to her in the periodicals of the day.⁴ This is precisely what Wordsworth did: his first published poem, Sonnet on Seeing Miss Helen Maria Williams Weep at a Tale of Distress, appeared in the European Magazine for March 1787. The most successful single poem in the 1786 volume played to the popular appetite for the Gothic: Part of an Irregular Fragment, Found in a Dark Passage of the Tower (p. 296). The European Magazine observed that it was 'the poem which we esteem the best display of Miss Williams' poetical powers',⁵ while the Monthly Review reprinted it, with the encomium:

Figure 9 Helen Maria Williams (1761–1827), engraved after a painting by an unknown artist, published 1816. Having been a successful poet since the early 1780s, Williams moved to Paris to witness the French Revolution, where she became acquainted with Thomas Paine and Mary Wollstonecraft. In the Irregular Fragment the writer rises on no feeble wing into the regions of fancy and passion. The piece has so much merit that we cannot deny ourselves the satisfaction of presenting it to our readers entire; after premising that it is founded on the idea of an apartment in the Tower, shut up for ages, in which are assembled the ghosts of all those whom history relates to have been murdered in that state prison, and of a murdered royal family, whose story is lost in the lapse of time.⁶

Even as late as 1823, one of the reviewers of her collected poems judged that ‘an Irregular Fragment and her sonnets are all that the volume contains of real poetry.’⁷ This was not fair, but the Fragment is a remarkable work – perhaps the archetypal Gothic poem of the eighteenth century. Its lurid imagery and skilfully contrived climax guaranteed its success. But what many of its readers seem not to have noticed were its political implications. In a volume dedicated to the Queen it was odd, to say the least, to find a poem which portrays the English monarchy as a succession of homicidal maniacs. The 1786 collection is, in fact, most notable for its articulation, via conventional literary forms, of a clearly defined radical intelligence.

Williams’s Julia, A Novel; Interspersed with Some Poetical Pieces (1790) revised Rousseau’s Nouvelle Héloïse, making the triangle one of a man who dies, leaving two women to bring up a child together. The Bastille, A Vision (one of the poetical pieces with which it is ‘interspersed’) offers a cocktail of Gothicism and radicalism in which her target is the French ancien régime, its many injustices symbolized by the Bastille (stormed 14 July 1789). As with the 1786 volume, reviewers missed the novel’s politics; the Monthly Review commented that ‘The pieces of poetry, occasionally introduced, are, in general, elegant, and considerably enhance the value of the volumes.’⁸ The Analytical Review found the poems ‘ingenious and harmonious’,⁹ and the Critical merely noted that ‘The poetry, interspersed, perhaps too frequently interspersed, deserves the character we have already had occasion to give of this lady’s works; it is in general tender, pathetic, and pleasing.’¹⁰

By this time Williams was known for her support of the French Revolution, and it came as no surprise when she visited Paris to witness it for herself – an experience described in her Letters Written in France in the Summer of 1790 (1790), of which extracts are presented here, including her account of a visit to the Bastille (see p. 302). Back in London she published a new edition of her Poems in 1791, before returning to France in July with her mother and two sisters, Cecilia and Persis, explaining her reasons for doing so in A Farewell, for Two Years, to England. A Poem (1791). She was going into a kind of political exile, partly because she wanted to support the French Revolution, and partly because she disapproved of the failure of Wilberforce’s 1791 Bill to regulate the slave trade. The Farewell may not be her best poetical achievement, but it is the product of an intensely felt passion at a particular moment. As the Revolution had not yet resulted in the execution of the king, Williams’s convictions garnered admiration from like-minded reviewers, such as that in the Analytical: ‘The idea of visiting France, now become the first seat of freedom, fires her muse with more than usual ardour. The poem will be read with pleasure by those whose bosoms glow with kindred sentiments.’¹¹ The Monthly also regarded her sympathetically:

Much of nature gives animation to this poem, much fond recollection of the innocent pleasures of early youth. She has, very properly, introduced her favourite subject, the renovation of Gallic liberty, and has taken occasion, gently and tenderly, to expostulate with those of her countrymen who seem unwilling to allow their neighbours the blessing of that freedom which they so happily enjoy. She also adverts, very pathetically, to the late miscarriage of Mr Wilberforce's slave-bill, and, turning to France, exhorts her generously to espouse the cause of the poor Africans.¹²

Even when reviewers disagreed with her politics, as with the Critical, she was indulged: 'Miss Williams' farewell numbers are extremely sweet and musical, and her enthusiasm in the cause of liberty shines with a lustre so bright and ardent as to excite our warm admiration. We cannot say that her principles always coincide with our own, or that her arguments are absolutely incontrovertible, but where they do not convince, we applaud the spirit with which they are delivered, and the numbers in which they are conveyed.'¹³

In Paris she and her lover, John Hurford Stone, were at the centre of expatriate society at White's Hotel. Visitors during this period included Thomas Paine, Mary Wollstonecraft, Charlotte Smith and the 21-year-old Wordsworth, whom she narrowly missed, despite his having procured a letter of introduction to her.

The months following the execution of Louis XVI in January 1793 were difficult ones for English radicals. Williams's support for the Revolution did not waver – a stand that was to cost her dearly. One of the earliest warnings of what was to happen came with an open letter from Anna Seward who, until the execution, had publicly supported events in France. The letter appeared in the Gentleman's Magazine for February 1793, prefaced by an explanation of how it was 'sent to Miss Helen Maria Williams a few days before the tidings of that demoniac transaction, the murder of the deposed and blameless Louis, reached this nation'.¹⁴ She proceeded to articulate her revulsion at the execution of the King, and advised: 'Oh return while yet you may, to the bosom of your native country, which has fostered your talents and enrolled your fame!'¹⁵ She continued: 'Fly, dear Helen, that land of carnage! from the pernicious influence of that equalizing system which, instead of diffusing universal love, content and happiness, lifts every man's hand against his brother.'¹⁶ It concluded ominously: 'Adieu, my dear friend! Love and respect your country half as well as I love and respect you, and we shall soon cease to view you in a state of cold alienation, and of impending danger!'¹⁷ From the point of view of personal survival this was good advice; the outbreak of war with Britain in February, and the Reign of Terror, which began in October 1793, would make life precarious for foreigners. Williams, her mother and sisters were detained in the Luxembourg prison under the general order of 7 October, placing all British and Hanoverian subjects 'in a state of arrest in houses of security'.

While in confinement she continued to record her impressions of Revolutionary France in the Letters Containing a Sketch of the Politics of France (1795). Although her account of the Revolution has drawn accusations of inaccuracy, it provides a vivid and credible account of the affairs of the day. She emphasizes the part played by women in the Revolution, their efforts to fight tyranny and their fortitude: 'My narratives make a part of that marvellous story which the eighteenth century has to record to future times, and the testimony of a witness will be heard. Perhaps, indeed, I have written too little of events which I have known so well; but the convulsions of states form accumulations of private calamity that distract the attention by overwhelming the heart, and it is difficult to describe the shipwreck when sinking in the storm.’¹⁸ None of this was well received at home: the British Critic commented of the 1795 Letters: ‘As usual, the French are all wise, generous, good, great, etc. etc. etc. and every other nation, her own in particular, contemptible in the balance.’¹⁹ Perhaps the most impressive part of the volume is that dealing with Madame Roland (1754–93), wife of Jean-Marie Roland, prominent in the Girondist faction (see p. 312).

Williams and her family owed their release from prison to Jean Debry, a humane deputy to the Convention, who brought suspicion on himself by pleading their cause. They were released in July 1794, and Williams left her family in Paris to join John Hurford Stone in Switzerland, where they may have married. Stone, a Unitarian and fellow radical, was separated from his first wife, who had been left behind in England. But these complications led them to be regarded not only as politically unsound, but as morally reprobate.

Hostilities between Britain and France worsened. At the height of the war, in 1798, letters from Williams and Stone to Joseph Priestley in America were intercepted by an English ship and published in London as evidence of her treachery. The Anti-Jacobin Review crowed: ‘These self-transported patriots triumph, by anticipation, in the conquest of England, the downfall of her monarchy, and the consequent establishment of a republic, under which their pious friend, Dr Priestley, may live unmolested by Kings, by tithes or by Bishops.’²⁰ In the same year Williams’s Tour in Switzerland was published, to receive equally poisonous coverage. The reviewer in the British Critic hardly bothers with the book, instead reviewing her career as a traitor: after she ‘caught the infection of Gallic liberty’ she became ‘the companion of a man employed by the French government . . . Miss or Mrs Williams felt no compunction at attending Mr S. on his excursion, who is, we are told, a married man, and has a wife living in this country.’²¹

She continued to express her views in volumes on French history (1815, 1819) and became a naturalized French citizen in 1817. In October 1820, Wordsworth finally caught up with her on a visit to Paris. Nearly three decades after the Revolution, he was able to pay tribute to her by reciting her sonnet ‘To Hope’ from memory – it had been published only months before his 1791 visit to Paris, when he had unluckily missed her.²²

When her collected poems were issued in 1823, reviews were surprisingly respectful. ‘Anything from the pen of Miss Williams must be important’, declared the Monthly Literary Register. ‘Without deeply entering into comparisons, we may remark that there appears through all her considerable works a sober and masculine propriety seldom encountered in the pages of her fair contemporaries.’²³ The European Magazine concurred: ‘We think the volume a very acceptable offering to the public, and it will be valued by many as a reminiscence of a lady whose name was once so familiar to our studies, but whose pen has latterly kept no pace with the promise of her earlier productions.’²⁴ More grudgingly, the Monthly Review described her poetry as ‘always above mediocrity though wanting in some of the higher characteristics of genius.’²⁵

Still regarded as suspect, she died in Paris in 1827. Her obituarist in the Monthly offered the tart judgement: ‘She wrote several works connected with France, which obtained for her a considerable degree of popularity in that country, as well as in this; but they have been already forgotten.’²⁶ She was buried next to John Hurford Stone, who died in 1818.

Part of an Irregular Fragment, found in a Dark Passage of the Tower

From Poems (1786)

Advertisement

The following poem is formed on a very singular and sublime idea. A young gentleman, possessed of an uncommon genius for drawing, on visiting the Tower of London, passing one door of a singular construction, asked what apartment it led to, and expressed a desire to have it opened. The person who showed the place shook his head and answered, ‘Heaven knows what is within that door; it has been shut for ages.’ This answer made small impression on the other hearers, but a very deep one on the imagination of this youth. Gracious Heaven! An apartment shut up for ages – and in the Tower!

Ye Towers of Julius! London's lasting shame,

By many a foul and midnight murder fed.¹

Genius builds on a slight foundation, and rears beautiful structures on 'the baseless fabric of a vision.' The above transient hint dwelt on the young man's fancy, and conjured into his memory all the murders which history records to have been committed in the Tower: Henry VI, the Duke of Clarence, the two young Princes, sons of Edward IV, Sir Thomas Overbury, etc. He supposes all their ghosts assembled in this unexplored apartment, and to these his fertile imagination has added several others. One of the spectres raises an immense pall of black velvet, and discovers the remains of a murdered royal family whose story is lost in the lapse of time. The gloomy wildness of these images struck my imagination so forcibly that, endeavouring to catch the fire of the youth's pencil, this fragment was produced.

I

Rise, winds of night! Relentless tempests rise!

Rush from the troubled clouds, and o'er me roll;

In this chill pause a deeper horror lies,

A wilder fear appals my shudd'ring soul.

'Twas on this day,² this hour accursed, 5

That Nature, starting from repose,

Heard the dire shrieks of murder burst –

From infant innocence they rose

And shook these solemn towers!

I shudd'ring pass that fatal room, 10

For ages wrapped in central gloom;

I shudd'ring pass that iron door

Which fate perchance unlocks no more;

Death, smeared with blood, o'er the dark portal lours.

II

How fearfully my step resounds 15
Along these lonely bounds;
Spare, savage blast, the taper's quiv'ring fires,
Deep in these gath'ring shades its flame expires.
Ye host of heaven! The door recedes;
It mocks my grasp – what unseen hands 20
Have burst its iron bands?
No mortal force this gate unbarred
Where danger lives, which terrors guard –
Dread powers! Its screaming hinges close
On this dire scene of impious deeds. 25
My feet are fixed! Dismay has bound
My step on this polluted ground –
But lo! the pitying moon a line of light
Athwart the horrid darkness dimly throws,
And from yon grated window chases night. 30

III

Ye visions that before me roll,
That freeze my blood, that shake my soul,
Are ye the phantoms of a dream?
Pale spectres, are ye what ye seem?
They glide more near, 35
Their forms unfold!
Fixed are their eyes, on me they bend –
Their glaring look is cold!
And hark, I hear
Sounds that the throbbing pulse of life suspend! 40

IV

'No wild illusion cheats thy sight
With shapes that only live in night –
Mark the native glories spread
Around my bleeding brow!

The crown of Albion wreathed my head 45
 And Gallia's lillies³ twined below;
 When my father shook his spear,
When his banner sought the skies,
Her baffled host recoiled with fear,
 Nor turned their shrinking eyes. 50
Soon as the daring eagle springs
 To bask in heav'n's empyreal light,
The vultures ply their baleful wings,
 A cloud of deep'ning colour marks their flight,
 Staining the golden day; 55
 But see, amid the rav'nous brood
 A bird of fiercer aspect soar.
The spirits of a rival race⁴
 Hang on the noxious blast, and trace
 With gloomy joy his destined prey, 60
 Inflame th' ambitious wish that thirsts for blood,
And plunge his talons deep in kindred gore.

V

View the stern form that hovers nigh –
Fierce rolls his dauntless eye
 In scorn of hideous death; 65
Till starting at a brother's⁵ name,
Horror shrinks his glowing frame,
 Locks the half-uttered groan,
 And chills the parting breath.
 Astonished Nature heaved a moan 70
When her affrighted eye beheld the hands
She formed to cherish, rend her holy bands.⁶

VI

Look where a royal infant⁷ kneels,
Shrieking and agonized with fear;
He sees the dagger pointed near 75
 A much-loved brother's⁸ breast,
And tells an absent mother all he feels.
His eager eye he casts around;
Where shall her guardian form be found
 On which his eager eye would rest? 80
On her he calls in accents wild
And wonders why her step is slow
 To save her suff'ring child!
Robed in the regal garb, his brother stands
 In more majestic woe, 85
And meets the impious stroke with bosom bare,
Then fearless grasps the murd'rer's hands,
And asks the minister of hell to spare
The child whose feeble arms sustain
His bleeding form from cruel death. 90
In vain fraternal fondness pleads,
 For cold is now his livid cheek,
And cold his last expiring breath.
 And now with aspect meek,
The infant lifts its mournful eye, 95
And asks with trembling voice to die,
If death will cure his heaving heart of pain.
His heaving heart now bleeds!
Foul tyrant, o'er the gilded hour
That beams with all the blaze of power, 100
 Remorse shall spread her thickest shroud;
The furies in thy tortured ear
 Shall howl with curses deep and loud,
And wake distracting fear!
 I see the ghastly spectre rise, 105
 Whose blood is cold, whose hollow eyes
 Seem from his head to start;

With upright hair and shiv'ring heart,
Dark o'er thy midnight couch he bends,
And clasps thy shrinking frame, thy impious spirit rends.' 110

VII

Now his thrilling accents die,
His shape eludes my searching eye;
But who is he,⁹ convulsed with pain,
That writhes in every swelling vein?
Yet in so deep, so wild a groan, 115
A sharper anguish seems to live
Than life's expiring pang can give:
He dies deserted and alone.
If pity can allay thy woes,
Sad spirit, they shall find repose; 120
Thy friend, thy long-loved friend is near;
He comes to pour the parting tear,
He comes to catch the parting breath.
Ah heaven! no melting look he wears,
His altered eye with vengeance glares; 125
Each frantic passion at his soul;
'Tis he has dashed that venomed bowl
With agony and death.

VIII

But whence arose that solemn call?
Yon bloody phantom waves his hand 130
And beckons me to deeper gloom;
Rest, troubled form, I come –
Some unknown power my step impels
To horror's secret cells.
'For thee I raise this sable pall, 135
It shrouds a ghastly band;

Stretched beneath, thy eye shall trace
 A mangled regal race.
 A thousand suns have rolled since light
 Rushed on their solid night; 140
 See, o'er that tender frame grim Famine hangs
 And mocks a mother's pangs!
 The last, last drop which warmed her veins
 That meagre infant drains,
 Then gnaws her fond sustaining breast. 145
 Stretched on her feeble knees, behold
 Another victim sinks to lasting rest;
 Another yet her matron arms would fold,
 Who strives to reach her matron arms in vain,
 Too weak her wasted form to raise. 150
 On him she bends her eager gaze;
 She sees the soft imploring eye
 That asks her dear embrace, the cure of pain –
 She sees her child at distance die!
 But now her steadfast heart can bear 155
 Unmoved the pressure of despair.
 When first the winds of winter urge their course
 O'er the pure stream, whose current smoothly glides,
 The heaving river swells its troubled tides;
 But when the bitter blast with keener force 160
 O'er the high wave an icy fetter throws,
 The hardened wave is fixed in dead repose.

IX

Say, who's that hoary form? Alone he stands,
 And meekly lifts his withered hands –
 His white beard streams with blood! 165
 I see him with a smile deride
 Whence flows a purple flood;
 But sudden pangs his bosom tear –
 On one big drop, of deeper dye, 170

I see him fix his haggard eye
In dark and wild despair!
That sanguine drop which wakes his woe,
Say, spirit, whence its source?
'Ask no more its source to know – 175
Ne'er shall mortal eye explore
Whence flowed that drop of human gore,
Till the starting dead shall rise
Unchained from earth, and mount the skies,
And time shall end his fated course.' 180
'Now th' unfathomed depth behold:
Look but once! A second glance
Wraps a heart of human mould
In death's eternal trance.

X

That shapeless phantom, sinking slow 185
Deep down the vast abyss below,
Darts through the mists that shroud his frame –
A horror nature hates to name!
'Mortal, could thine eyes behold
All those sullen mists enfold, 190
Thy sinews at the sight accursed
Would wither, and thy heart-strings burst;
Death would grasp with icy hand
And drag thee to our grisly band!
Away! the sable pall I spread, 195
And give to rest th' unquiet dead;
Haste, ere its horrid shroud enclose
Thy form, benumbed with wild affright,
And plunge thee far through wastes of night,
In yon black gulf's abhorred repose!' 200
As, starting at each step, I fly,
Why backward turns my frantic eye
That closing portal past?

Two sullen shades, half-seen, advance!
On me a blasting look they cast, 205
And fix my view with dang'rous spells
Where burning frenzy dwells!
Again! their vengeful look – and now a speechless –

4 ‘Richard III, by murdering so many near relations, seemed to revenge the sufferings of Henry VI and his family, on the House of York’ (Williams’s note).

[A Visit to the Bastille]

From Letters written in France in the summer of 1790 (1790)

Before I suffered my friends at Paris to conduct me through the usual routine of convents, churches and palaces, I requested to visit the Bastille, feeling a much stronger desire to contemplate the ruins of that building than the most perfect edifices of Paris. When we got into the carriage, our French servant called to the coachman, with an air of triumph, ‘A la Bastille – mais nous n’y resterons pas.’¹

We drove under that porch which so many wretches have entered never to repass,² and alighting from the carriage descended with difficulty into the dungeons, which were too low to admit of our standing upright, and so dark that we were obliged at noonday to visit them with the light of a candle. We saw the hooks of those chains by which the prisoners were fastened round the neck to the walls of their cells – many of which, being below the level of the water, are in a constant state of humidity; and a noxious vapour issued from them, which more than once extinguished the candle, and was so insufferable that it required a strong spirit of curiosity to tempt one to enter. Good God! – and to these regions of horror were human creatures dragged at the caprice of despotic power. What a melancholy consideration, that

Man, proud man,
Dressed in a little brief authority,
Plays such fantastic tricks before high heaven
As make the angels weep.³

There appears to be a greater number of these dungeons than one could have imagined the hard heart of tyranny itself would contrive, for, since the destruction of the building, many subterraneous cells have been discovered underneath a piece of ground which was enclosed within the walls of the Bastille, but which seemed a bank of solid earth before the horrid secrets of this prison-house were disclosed. Some skeletons were found in these recesses with irons still fastened on their decaying bones.

After having visited the Bastille, we may indeed be surprised that a nation so enlightened as the French submitted so long to the oppressions of their government. But we must cease to wonder that their indignant spirits at length shook off the galling yoke...

When the Bastille was taken, and the old man of whom you have no doubt heard, and who had been confined in a dungeon thirty-five years, was brought into daylight, which had not for so long a space of time visited his eyes, he staggered, shook his white beard, and cried faintly, 'Messieurs, vous m'avez rendu un grand service, rendez m'en un autre, tuez moi! Je ne sais pas où aller.'⁴ 'Allons, allons', the crowd answered with one voice. 'La nation te nourrira.'⁵

As the heroes of the Bastille passed along the streets after its surrender, the citizens stood at the doors of their houses loaded with wine, brandy, and other refreshments which they offered to these deliverers of their country. But they unanimously refused to taste any strong liquors, considering the great work they had undertaken as not yet accomplished, and being determined to watch the whole night, in case of any surprise.

A Visit to the Bastille

[On Revolution]

From Letters written in France in the summer of 1790 (1790)

As we came out of La Maison de Ville, we were shown, immediately opposite, the far-famed lantern at which, for want of a gallows, the first victims of popular fury were sacrificed. I own that the sight of La Lanterne chilled the blood within my veins. At that moment, for the first time, I lamented the revolution, and, forgetting the imprudence or the guilt of those unfortunate men, could only reflect with horror on the dreadful expiation they had made. I painted in my imagination the agonies of their families and friends, nor could I for a considerable time chase these gloomy images from my thoughts.

It is forever to be regretted that so dark a shade of ferocious revenge was thrown across the glories of the revolution. But alas! Where do the records of history point out a revolution unstained by some actions of barbarity? When do the passions of human nature rise to that pitch which produces great events, without wandering into some irregularities? If the French Revolution should cost no farther bloodshed, it must be allowed, notwithstanding a few shocking instances of public vengeance, that the liberty of twenty-four millions of people will have been purchased at a far cheaper rate than could ever have been expected from the former experience of the world.¹

¹ The violence of the Revolution was something that had to be excused by anyone seeking to defend it. None other than William Wordsworth, an admirer of Williams, would address the same subject in his unpublished ‘Letter to the Bishop of Llandaff’ (1793): ‘Alas! the obstinacy and perversion of men is such that she [i.e. Liberty] is too often obliged to borrow the very arms of despotism to overthrow him, and in order to reign in peace must establish herself by violence.’

[Retrospect from England]

From Letters written in France in the summer of 1790 (1790)

Every visitor brings me intelligence from France full of dismay and horror. I hear of nothing but crimes, assassinations, torture and death. I am told that every day witnesses a conspiracy, that every town is the scene of a massacre, that every street is blackened with a gallows, and every highway deluged with blood. I hear these things, and repeat to myself: Is this the picture of France? Are these the images of that universal joy which called tears into my eyes and made my heart throb with sympathy? To me, the land which these mighty magicians have suddenly covered with darkness where, waving their evil wand, they have reared the dismal scaffold, have clotted the knife of the assassin with gore, have called forth the shriek of despair and the agony of torture – to me, this land of desolation appeared dressed in additional beauty beneath the genial smile of liberty. The woods seemed to cast a more refreshing shade, and the lawns to wear a brighter verdure, while the carols of freedom burst from the cottage of the peasant, and the voice of joy resounded on the hill and in the valley.

Must I be told that my mind is perverted, that I am become dead to all sensations of sympathy, because I do not weep with those who have lost a part of their superfluities,¹ rather than rejoice that the oppressed are protected, that the wronged are redressed, that the captive is set at liberty, and that the poor have bread? Did the universal parent of the human race implant the feelings of pity in the heart, that they should be confined to the artificial wants of vanity, the ideal deprivations of greatness; that they should be fixed beneath the dome of the palace, or locked within the gate of the chateau; without extending one commiserating sigh to the wretched hamlet, as if its famished inhabitants, though not ennobled by man, did not bear, at least, the ensigns of nobility stamped on our nature by God?

Must I hear the charming societies in which I found all the elegant graces of the most polished manners, all the amiable urbanity of liberal and cultivated minds, compared with the most rude, ferocious, and barbarous levellers that ever existed? Really, some of my English acquaintance (whatever objections they may have to republican principles) do, in their discussions of French politics, adopt a most free and republican style of censure. Nothing can be more democratical than their mode of expression, or display a more levelling spirit, than their unqualified contempt of all the leaders of the revolution.

It is not my intention to shiver² lances in every society I enter, in the cause of the National Assembly. Yet I cannot help remarking that, since the Assembly does not presume to set itself up as an example to this country, we seem to have very little right to be furiously angry, because they think proper to try another system of government themselves. Why should they not be suffered to make an experiment in politics? I have always been told that the improvement of every science depends upon experiment. But I now hear that, instead of their new attempt to form the great machine of society upon a simple principle of general amity upon the Federation of its members, they ought to have repaired the feudal wheels and springs by which their ancestors directed its movements.

Yet if mankind had always observed this retrograde motion, it would surely have led them to few acquisitions in virtue or in knowledge, and we might even have been worshipping the idols of paganism at this moment. To forbid, under the pains and penalties of reproach, all attempts of the human mind to advance to greater perfection, seems to be proscribing every art and science. And we cannot much wonder that the French, having received so small a legacy of public happiness from their forefathers, and being sensible of the poverty of their own patrimony, should try new methods of transmitting a richer inheritance to their posterity.

² shiver shatter.

The Bastille, A Vision¹

From Julia, A Novel (1790)

I.1

‘Drear cell, along whose lonely bounds
Unvisited by light
Chill silence dwells with night,
Save when the clanging fether sounds!
Abyss where mercy never came, 5
Nor hope the wretch can find,
Where long inaction wastes the frame,
And half annihilates the mind!

I.2

Stretched helpless in this living tomb,
Oh haste, congenial death! 10
Seize, seize this ling’ring breath,
And shroud me in unconscious gloom –
Britain, thy exiled son no more
Thy blissful vales shall see;
Why did I leave thy hallowed shore, 15
Distinguished land, where all are free?’

I.3

Bastille! within thy hideous pile
Which stains of blood defile,
Thus rose the captive’s sighs,
Till slumber sealed his weeping eyes – 20
Terrific visions hover near!
He sees an awful form appear

Who drags his step to deeper cells
Where stranger wilder horror dwells.

II.1

‘Oh tear me from these haunted walls 25
Or those fierce shapes control,
Lest madness seize my soul;
That pond’rous mask of iron² falls,
I see.’ ‘Rash mortal, ha! Beware,
Nor breathe that hidden name! 30
Should those dire accents wound the air,
Know death shall lock thy stiff’ning frame.’

II.2

‘Hark, that loud bell which sullen tolls!
It wakes a shriek of woe
From yawning depths below; 35
Shrill through this hollow vault it rolls!
A deed was done in this black cell
Unfit for mortal ear;
A deed was done, when tolled that knell,
No human heart could live and hear! 40

II.3

Rouse thee from thy numbing trance,
Near yon thick gloom advance,
The solid cloud has shook;
Arm all thy soul with strength to look –
Enough! Thy starting locks have rose, 45
Thy limbs have failed, thy blood has froze;
On scenes so foul, with mad affright,
I fix no more thy fastened sight.’

III.1

‘Those troubled phantoms melt away,
I lose the sense of care! 50
I feel the vital air –
I see, I see the light of day!
Visions of bliss, eternal powers!
What force has shook those hated walls?
What arm has rent those threat’ning towers? 55
It falls – the guilty fabric³ falls!’

III.2

‘Now favoured mortal, now behold!
To soothe thy captive state
I ope the book of fate –
Mark what its registers unfold! 60
Where this dark pile in chaos lies,
With nature’s execrations hurled,
Shall freedom’s sacred temple rise
And charm an emulating world!’

III.3

’Tis her awak’ning voice commands 65
Those firm, those patriot bands,
Armed to avenge her cause
And guard her violated laws!
Did ever earth a scene display
More glorious to the eye of day 70
Than millions with according mind
Who claim the rights of humankind?

IV.1

Does the famed Roman page sublime
An hour more bright unroll
To animate the soul 75
Than this, loved theme of future time?
Posterity, with rev'ence meet,
The consecrated act shall hear;
Age shall the glowing tale repeat
And youth shall drop the burning tear! 80

IV.2

The peasant, while he fondly sees
His infants round the hearth
Pursue their simple mirth
Or emulously climb his knees,
No more bewails their future lot 85
By tyranny's stern rod oppressed,
While freedom guards his straw-roofed cot
And all his useful toils are blessed.

IV.3

Philosophy,⁴ oh share the meed
Of freedom's noblest deed! 90
'Tis thine each truth to scan,
Guardian of bliss and friend of man!
'Tis thine all human wrongs to heal,
'Tis thine to love all nature's weal,
To give each gen'rous purpose birth 95
And renovate the gladdened earth.'⁵

The Bastille, A Vision

¹ This poem is preceded in the novel by the following passage: 'Mr F. called at Mr Clifford's one evening, and finding Charlotte and Julia sitting at work, he desired their permission to read to them a poem written by a friend lately arrived from France, and who, for some supposed offence against the state, had been immured several years in the Bastille, but was at length liberated by the interference of a person in power. The horrors of his solitary dungeon were one night cheered by the following prophetic dream.’ The prison of the Bastille had for years symbolized the injustice of the ancien régime, and its storming on 14 July 1789 (still celebrated today) was welcomed by many on both sides of the English Channel. Williams visited the ruins of the Bastille when she went to Paris in 1790; see p. 302.

2 ‘Alluding to the prisoner who has excited so many conjectures in Europe’ (Williams’s note). The man in the iron mask was a state prisoner during the reign of Louis XIV, and was confined in the Bastille. His identity remains a mystery.

3 the guilty fabric i.e. the physical fabric of the building.

4 Philosophy The works of numerous philosophers, including Rousseau and Holbach, were credited with having generated an intellectual climate favourable to the Revolution.

5 And renovate the gladdened earth Williams’s language in this line is full of millennial optimism; many believed that the French Revolution was the harbinger of a universal spiritual revolution to come.

A Farewell, for Two Years, to England. A Poem (1791)

Sweet spring, while others hail thy op’ning flowers,
The first young hope of summer’s blushing hours,
Me they remind that when her ardent ray
Shall reach the summit of our lengthened day,
Then, Albion, far from thee, my cherished home, 5
To foreign climes my pensive steps must roam,

And twice shall spring, dispelling winter's gloom,
 Shed o'er thy lovely vales her vernal bloom;
 Twice shall thy village-maids, with chaplets gay
 And simple carols, hail returning May; 10
 And twice shall autumn, o'er thy cultured plain,
 Pour the rich treasures of his yellow grain;
 Twice shall thy happy peasants bear along
 The lavish store, and wake the harvest-song,
 Ere from the bounded deep my searching eye, 15
 Ah, land beloved, shall thy white cliffs descry.
 Where the slow Loire, on borders ever gay,
 Delights to linger in his sunny way,
 Oft, while I seem to count, with musing glance,
 The murm'ring waves that near his brink advance, 20
 My wand'ring thoughts shall seek the grassy side,
 Parental Thames, where rolls thy ample tide;
 Where on thy willowed bank, methinks, appears
 Engraved the record of my passing years.
 Ah, not like thine, their course is gently led, 25
 By zephyrs fanned, through paths with verdure spread;
 They flow, as urged by storms the mountain rill
 Falls o'er the fragments of the rocky hill.
 My native scenes! Can aught in time or space
 From this fond heart your loved remembrance chase? 30
 Linked to that heart by ties for ever dear,
 By joy's light smile, and sorrow's tender tear;
 By all that ere my anxious hopes employed,
 By all my soul has suffered or enjoyed!
 Still blended with those well-known scenes, arise 35
 The varying images the past supplies;
 The childish sports that fond attention drew,
 And charmed my vacant heart when life was new;
 The harmless mirth, the sadness robbed of power
 To cast its shade beyond the present hour – 40
 And that dear hope which soothed my youthful breast,
 And showed the op'ning world in beauty dressed;

That hope which seemed with bright unfolding rays
(Ah, vainly seemed!) to gild my future days;
That hope which, early wrapped in lasting gloom, 45
Sunk in the cold inexorable tomb!

And Friendship, ever powerful to control
The keen emotions of the wounded soul,
To lift the suff'ring spirit from despair,
And bid it feel that life deserves a care. 50

Still each impression that my heart retains
Is linked, dear land, to thee by lasting chains.

She too, sweet soother of my lonely hours,
Who gilds my thorny path with fancy's flowers,
The muse who early taught my willing heart 55
To feel with transport her prevailing art,

Who deigned before my infant eyes to spread
Those dazzling visions she alone can shed –
She who will still be found where'er I stray
The loved companion of my distant way; 60

Midst foreign sounds, her voice that charms my ear,
Breathed in my native tongue, I still shall hear;
Midst foreign sounds, endeared will flow the song
Whose tones, my Albion, will to thee belong!

And when with wonder thrilled, with mind elate, 65
I mark the change sublime in Gallia's state,
Where new-born Freedom treads the banks of Seine,
Hope in her eye, and Virtue in her train!

Pours day upon the dungeon's central gloom,
And leads the captive from his living tomb; 70
Tears the sharp iron from his loaded breast,

And bids the renovated¹ land be blessed –
My thoughts shall fondly turn to that loved isle
Where Freedom long has shed her genial smile.

Less safe in other lands the triple wall 75

And massy portal of the Gothic hall,
Than in that favoured isle the straw-built thatch

Where Freedom sits, and guards the simple latch.

Yet, Albion, while my heart to thee shall spring,
To thee its first, its best affections bring; 80

Yet when I hear exulting millions pour
The shout of triumph on the Gallic shore,
Not without sympathy my pensive mind
The bounds of human bliss enlarged, shall find;
Not without sympathy my glowing breast 85

Shall hear, on any shore, of millions blessed,
Scorning those narrow souls, whate'er their clime,
Who meanly think that sympathy a crime,
Who, if one wish for human good expand
Beyond the limits of their native land, 90

And from the worst of ills would others free,
Deem that warm wish, my country, guilt to thee.

Ah, why those blessings to one spot confine,
Which, when diffused, will not the less be thine?

Ah, why repine if far those blessings spread 95
For which so oft thy gen'rous sons have bled?

Shall Albion mark with scorn the lofty thought,
The love of liberty, herself has taught?

Shall her brave sons, in this enlightened age,
Assume the bigot-frown of papal rage, 100

Nor tolerate the vow to Freedom paid
If diff'ring from the ritual they have made?

Freedom, who oft on Albion's fost'ring breast
Has found her friends in stars and ermine dressed,
Allows that some among her chosen race 105

Should there the claim to partial honours trace,
And in the long-reflected lustre shine

That beams through ancestry's ennobled line;

While she, with guardian wing, can well secure
From each proud wrong the undistinguished poor. 110

On Gallia's coast, where oft the robe of state
Was trailed by those whom Freedom's soul must hate;
Where, like a comet, rank appeared to glow

With dangerous blaze that threatened all below –
There Freedom now, with gladdened eye, beholds 115
The simple vest that flows in equal folds.

And though on Seine's fair banks a transient storm²
Flung o'er the darkened wave its angry form,
That purifying tempest now has passed –
No more the trembling waters feel the blast; 120
The bord'ring images, confusedly traced
Along the ruffled stream, to order haste;³
The vernal dayspring bursts the partial gloom,
And all the landscape glows with fresher bloom.

When, far around that bright'ning scene, I view 125
Objects of gen'ral bliss, to Gallia new,
Then, Albion, shall my soul reflect with pride
Thou wert her leading star, her honoured guide;
That, long in slav'ry sunk, when taught by thee,
She broke her fetters, and has dared be free; 130
In new-born majesty she seems to rise,
While sudden from the land oppression flies.
So, at the solemn hour of nature's birth,

When brooding darkness⁴ veiled the beauteous earth,
Heaven's awful mandate pierced the solid night – 135
'Let there be light', it said, 'and there was light!'

Ah, when shall reason's intellectual ray
Shed o'er the moral world more perfect day?
When shall that gloomy world appear no more
A waste, where desolating tempests roar? 140
Where savage Discord howls in threat'ning form,
And wild Ambition leads the madd'ning storm;
Where hideous Carnage marks his dang'rous way,
And where the screaming vulture scents his prey?
Ah, come, blessed Concord, chase with smile serene 145
The hostile passions from the human scene.
May Glory's lofty path be found afar
From agonizing groans and crimson war,

And may the ardent mind that seeks renown
Claim not the martial, but the civic crown, 150
While pure Benevolence, with happier views
Of bright success, the gen'ral good pursues!
Ah, why, my country, with indignant pain,
Why in thy senate did she plead in vain?
Ah, why in vain enforce the captives' cause, 155
And urge humanity's eternal laws?
With fruitless zeal the tale of horror trace,
And ask redress for Afric's injured race?
Unhappy race! Ah, what to them availed
That touching eloquence whose efforts failed? 160
Though in the senate Mercy found combined
All who possess the noblest pow'rs of mind,
On other themes, pre-eminently bright,
They shine, like single stars, with sep'rate light –
Here, only here, with intermingled rays, 165
In one resplendent constellation blaze.
Yes, captive race, if all the force displayed
By glowing Genius, in Compassion's aid,
When with that energy she boasts alone, 170
She made your wrongs, your ling'ring tortures known,
Bade full in view the bloody visions roll,
Shook the firm nerves, and froze the shudd'ring soul,
As when the sun, in piercing radiance bright,
Dispelling the low mists of doubtful light,
Its lustre on some hideous object throws 175
And all its hateful horror clearly shows –
If Genius could in Mercy's cause prevail,
When Interest presses the opposing scale,
How swift had Britons torn your galling chain,
And from their country wiped its foulest stain! 180
But oh, since mis'ry, in its last excess,
In vain from British honour hopes redress,
May other lands the bright example show,
May other regions lessen human woe!

Yes, Gallia, haste! Though Britain's sons decline 185
 The glorious power to save, that power is thine;
 Haste, since, while Britain courts that dear-bought gold
 For which her virtue and her fame are sold,
 And calmly calculates her trade of death,
 Her groaning victims yield in pangs their breath; 190
 Then save some portion of that suff'ring race
 From ills the mind can scarce endure to trace!
 Oh, whilst with mien august thy leaders scan,
 And guard with jealous zeal the rights of man,⁵
 Forget not that to all kind Nature gives 195
 Those common rights, the claim of all that lives.
 But yet my filial heart its wish must breathe
 That Britain first may snatch this deathless wreath;
 First to the earth this act divine proclaim,
 And wear the freshest palm of virtuous fame; 200
 May I, in foreign realms, her glories hear,
 Catch the loved sounds, and pour th' exulting tear!
 And when, the destined hour of exile past,
 My willing feet shall reach their home at last;
 When, with the trembling hope Affection proves,⁶ 205
 My eager heart shall search for those it loves,
 May no sharp pang that cherished hope destroy,
 And from my bosom tear the promised joy,
 Shroud every object, every scene in gloom,
 And lead my bleeding soul to Friendship's tomb! 210
 But may that moment to my eyes restore
 The friends whose love endears my native shore!
 Ah, long may Friendship, like the western ray,
 Cheer the sad evening of a stormy day,
 And gild my shadowy path with ling'ring light, 215
 The last dear beam that slowly sinks in night.

¹ renovated This picks up the millennial hope implied in the final line of the preceding poem. Universal spiritual renewal was one of the expected results of the French Revolution.

² a transient storm a reference to the storming of the Bastille, 14 July 1789, which initiated its demolition and the execution of its governor and some of its garrison. Williams's views on this event are elucidated in her Letters; see p. 302–3.

³ to order haste hasten to order.

⁴ brooding darkness Miltonic; cf. L'Allegro 6: 'Where brooding darkness spreads his jealous wings.'

⁵ the rights of man a reference to Thomas Paine's famous republican work (1791–2).

⁶ proves experiences.

[Madame Roland]¹

From Letters containing a Sketch of the Politics of France (1795)

At this period one of the most accomplished women that France has produced perished on the scaffold. This lady was Madame Roland, the wife of the late minister. On the 31st of May he had fled from his persecutors, and his wife who remained was carried to prison. The wits observed on this occasion that the body of Roland was missing, but that he had left his soul behind.

Madame Roland was indeed possessed of the most distinguished talents and a mind highly cultivated by the study of literature. I had been acquainted with her since I first came to France, and had always observed in her conversation the most ardent attachment to liberty and the most enlarged sentiments of philanthropy – sentiments which she developed with an eloquence peculiar to herself, with a flow and power of expression which gave new graces and new energy to the French language. With these extraordinary endowments of mind she united all the warmth of a feeling heart and all the charms of the most elegant manners. She was tall and well-shaped, her air was dignified, and although more than thirty five years of age she was still handsome. Her countenance had an expression of uncommon sweetness, and her full dark eyes beamed with the brightest rays of intelligence.

I visited her in the prison of St Pelagie, where her soul, superior to circumstances, retained its accustomed serenity, and she conversed with the same animated cheerfulness in her little cell as she used to do in the hotel of the minister. She had provided herself with a few books, and I found her reading Plutarch.² She told me she expected to die, and the look of placid resignation with which she spoke of it convinced me that she was prepared to meet death with a firmness worthy of her exalted character...

When more than one person is led at the same time to execution, since they can suffer only in succession, those who are reserved to the last are condemned to feel multiplied deaths at the sound of the falling instrument and the sight of the bloody scaffold. To be the first victim was therefore considered as a privilege, and had been allowed to Madame Roland as a woman. But when she observed the dismay of her companion, she said to him, 'Allez le premier: que je vous épargne au moins la douleur de voir couler mon sang.'³ She then turned to the executioner and begged that this sad indulgence might be granted to her fellow sufferer. The executioner told her that he had received orders that she should perish first.

'But you cannot, I am sure', said she with a smile, 'refuse the last request of a lady.' The executioner complied with her demand. When she mounted the scaffold and was tied to the fatal plank, she lifted up her eyes to the statue of Liberty near which the guillotine was placed, and exclaimed, 'Ah Liberté, comme on t'a jouée!'⁴ The next moment she perished. But her name will be recorded in the annals of history as one of those illustrious women whose superior attainments seem fitted to exalt her sex in the scale of being.

¹ Manon Jeanne Philipon (1754–93) was an intellectual and writer, and married Jean-Marie Roland in 1781. Although they supported the Revolution, both opposed its worst excesses until 1 June 1793, when she was detained in a series of prisons before being executed on 8 November. Her husband had escaped to Rouen and then to Normandy, but committed suicide when he heard of her death.

Joanna Baillie (1762–1851)

Joanna Baillie was the younger daughter of Dorothea Hunter and James Baillie, a Presbyterian minister of Bothwell, Lanarkshire, later Professor of Divinity at the University of Glasgow. Her mother's family was distinguished: her aunt was Anne Hunter (1742–1821), the poet and Bluestocking; her uncles were the famous surgeons, William and John Hunter. In 1783 William bequeathed his London house in Great Windmill Street to Baillie's brother Matthew, a physician and anatomist. She resided with him from 1784, and on his marriage in 1791 moved to Hampstead, where she was a near neighbour of Anna Laetitia Barbauld.

Her first publication was the little-noticed Poems; wherein it is attempted to describe certain views of nature and of rustic manners (1790). The volume has much charm, and is quite experimental, as the various poems not merely evoke different scenes, but different psychological states. They look forward to her Series of Plays; in which it is attempted to delineate the stronger passions of the mind (3 vols, 1798–1812), the work that attracts most critical attention today, and for which she was best known in her own day. The first volume contained two plays on hate, two on love. It appeared anonymously, leading to speculation about the identity of its author. Her authorship was acknowledged in 1800, the year that saw the first performance of De Monfort with Sarah Siddons in the starring role.

Her dramas were important because they represented a reaction against the highly mannered and overblown acting favoured in her day; instead she favoured 'the expressions of passion', by which she meant truth to human psychology. The power of drama lay in its immediacy, she believed, and in its ability to show us 'the passions, the humours, the weaknesses, the prejudices of men': 'For who hath followed the great man into his secret closet, or stood by the side of his nightly couch, and heard those exclamations of the soul which heaven alone may hear, that the historian should be able to inform us?' Baillie argues that the historian cannot provide such insights into the mind of great men; the dramatist can. Her 'Introductory Discourse' explains this at length, with particular emphasis on the importance of tragedy. Baillie may have discussed these matters with Wordsworth, whom she came to know, and who seems to echo her in his preface to Lyrical Ballads.

Introductory Discourse (extracts)

From A Series of Plays (1798)

Before I explain the plan of this work, I must make a demand upon the patience of my reader, whilst I endeavour to communicate to him those ideas regarding human nature, as they in some degree affect almost every species of moral writings, but particularly the Dramatic, that induced me to attempt it; and, as far as my judgment enabled me to apply them, has directed me in the execution of it.

From that strong sympathy which most creatures, but the human above all, feel for others of their kind, nothing has become so much an object of man's curiosity as man himself. We are all conscious of this within ourselves, and so constantly do we meet with it in others, that like every circumstance of continually repeated occurrence, it thereby escapes observation...

Amongst the many trials to which the human mind is subjected, that of holding intercourse, real or imaginary, with the world of spirits: of finding itself alone with a being terrific and awful, whose nature and power are unknown, has been justly considered as one of the most severe. The workings of nature in this situation, we all know, have ever been the object of our most eager enquiry. No man wishes to see the Ghost¹ himself, which would certainly procure him the best information on the subject, but every man wishes to see one who believes that he sees it, in all the agitation and wildness of that species of terror. To gratify this curiosity how many people have dressed up hideous apparitions to frighten the timid and superstitious! and have done it at the risk of destroying their happiness or understanding for ever. For the instances of intellect being destroyed by this kind of trial are more numerous, perhaps, in proportion to the few who have undergone it than by any other.

How sensible are we of this strong propensity within us, when we behold any person under the pressure of great and uncommon calamity! Delicacy and respect for the afflicted will, indeed, make us turn ourselves aside from observing him, and cast down our eyes in his presence; but the first glance we direct to him will involuntarily be one of the keenest observation, how hastily soever it may be checked; and often will a returning look of enquiry mix itself by stealth with our sympathy and reserve.

But it is not in situations of difficulty and distress alone, that man becomes the object of this sympathetic curiosity; he is no less so when the evil he contends with arises in his own breast, and no outward circumstance connected with him either awakens our attention or our pity. What human creature is there, who can behold a being like himself under the violent agitation of those passions which all have, in some degree, experienced, without feeling himself most powerfully excited by the sight? I say, all have experienced; for the bravest man on earth knows what fear is as well as the coward; and will not refuse to be interested for one under the dominion of this passion, provided there be nothing in the circumstances attending it to create contempt. Anger is a passion that attracts less sympathy than any other, yet the unpleasing and distorted features of an angry man will be more eagerly gazed upon, by those who are no wise concerned with his fury or the objects of it, than the most amiable placid countenance in the world. Every eye is directed to him; every voice hushed to silence in his presence; even children will leave off their gambols as he passes, and gaze after him more eagerly than the gaudiest equipage. The wild tossings of despair; the gnashing of hatred and revenge; the yearnings of affection, and the softened mien of love; all that language of the agitated soul, which every age and nation understands, is never addressed to the dull nor inattentive.

It is not merely under the violent agitations of passion, that man so rouses and interests us; even the smallest indications of an unquiet mind, the restless eye, the muttering lip, the half-checked exclamation, and the hasty start, will set our attention as anxiously upon the watch, as the first distant flashes of a gathering storm. When some great explosion of passion bursts forth, and some consequent catastrophe happens, if we are at all acquainted with the unhappy perpetrator, how minutely will we endeavour to remember every circumstance of his past behaviour! and with what avidity will we seize upon every recollected word or gesture, that is in the smallest degree indicative of the supposed state of his mind, at the time when they took place. If we are not acquainted with him, how eagerly will we listen to similar recollections from another! Let us understand, from observation or report, that any person harbours in his breast, concealed from the world's eye, some powerful rankling passion of what kind soever it may be, we will observe every word, every motion, every look, even the distant gait of such a man, with a constancy and attention bestowed upon no other. Nay, should we meet him unexpectedly on our way, a feeling will pass across our minds as though we found ourselves in the neighbourhood of some secret and fearful thing. If invisible, would we not follow him into his lonely haunts, into his closet, into the midnight silence of his chamber? There is, perhaps, no employment which the human mind will with so much avidity pursue, as the discovery of concealed passion, as the tracing the varieties and progress of a perturbed soul.

It is to this sympathetic curiosity of our nature, exercised upon mankind in great and trying occasions, and under the influence of the stronger passions, when the grand, the generous, the terrible attract our attention far more than the base and depraved, that the high and powerfully tragic, of every composition, is addressed.

This propensity is universal. Children begin to show it very early; it enters into many of their amusements, and that part of them too, for which they show the keenest relish. It tempts them many times, as well as the mature in years, to be guilty in tricks, vexations and cruelty; yet God Almighty has implanted it within us, as well as all our other propensities and passions, for wise and good purposes. It is our best and most powerful instructor. From it we are taught the proprieties and decencies of ordinary life, and are prepared for distressing and difficult situations. In examining others we know ourselves. With limbs untorn, with head unsmitten, with senses unimpaired by despair, we know what we ourselves might have been on the rack, on the scaffold, and in the most afflicting circumstances of distress. Unless when accompanied with passions of the dark and malevolent kind, we cannot well exercise this disposition without becoming more just, more merciful, more compassionate; and as the dark and malevolent passions are not the predominant inmates of the human breast, it hath produced more deeds – O many more! of kindness than of cruelty. It holds up for our example a standard of excellence, which without its assistance, our inward consciousness of what is right and becoming might never have dictated. It teaches us, also, to respect ourselves, and our kind; for it is a poor mind, indeed, that from this employment of its faculties, learns not to dwell upon the noble view of human nature rather than the mean....

If the study of human nature, then, is so useful to the poet, the novelist, the historian, and the philosopher, of how much greater importance must it be to the dramatic writer? To them it is a powerful auxiliary, to him it is the centre and strength of the battle. If characteristic views of human nature enliven not their pages, there are many excellencies with which they can, in some degree, make up for the deficiency, it is what we receive from them with pleasure rather than demand. But in his works no richness of invention, harmony of language, nor grandeur of sentiment will supply the place of faithfully delineated nature. The poet and the novelist may represent to you their great characters from the cradle to the tomb. They may represent them in any mood or temper, and under the influence of any passion which they see proper, without being obliged to put words into their mouths, those great betrayers of the feigned and adopted. They may relate every circumstance however trifling and minute, that serves to develop their tempers and dispositions. They tell us what kind of people they intend their men and women to be, and as such we receive them. If they are to move us with any scene of distress, every circumstance regarding the parties concerned in it, how they looked, how they moved, how they sighed, how the tears gushed from their eyes, how the very light and shadow fell upon them, is carefully described, and the few things that are given them to say along with all this assistance, must be very unnatural indeed if we refuse to sympathize with them. But the characters of the drama must speak directly for themselves. Under the influence of every passion, humour² and impression; in the artificial veilings of hypocrisy and ceremony, in the openness of freedom and confidence, and in the lonely hour of meditation they speak. He who made us hath placed within our breast a judge that judges instantaneously of everything they say. We expect to find them creatures like ourselves; and if they are untrue to nature, we feel that we are imposed upon; as though the poet had introduced to us for brethren, creatures of a different race, beings of another world.

As in other works deficiency in characteristic truth may be compensated by excellencies of a different kind, in the drama characteristic truth will compensate every other defect. Nay, it will do what appears a contradiction; one strong genuine stroke of nature will cover a multitude of sins even against nature herself. When we meet in some scene of a good play a very fine stroke of this kind, we are apt to become so intoxicated with it, and so perfectly convinced of the author's great knowledge of the human heart, that we are unwilling to suppose that the whole of it has not been suggested by the same penetrating spirit. Many well-meaning enthusiastic critics have given themselves a great deal of trouble in this way; and have shut their eyes most ingeniously against the fair light of nature for the very love of it. They have converted, in their great zeal, sentiments palpably false, both in regard to the character and situation of the persons who utter them, sentiments which a child or a clown would detect, into the most skilful depicments of the heart. I can think of no stronger instance to show how powerfully this love of nature dwells within us.³

Formed as we are with these sympathetic propensities in regard to our own species, it is not at all wonderful that theatrical exhibition has become the grand and favourite amusement of every nation into which it has been introduced. Savages will, in the wild contortions of a dance, shape out some rude story expressive of character or passion, and such a dance will give more delight to his companions than the most artful exertions of agility. Children in their gambols will make out a mimic representation of the manners, characters, and passions of grown men and women, and such a pastime will animate and delight them much more than a treat of the daintiest sweetmeats, or the handling of the gaudiest toys. Eagerly as it is enjoyed by the rude and the young, to the polished and the ripe in years it is still the most interesting amusement. Our taste for it is durable as it is universal. Independently of those circumstances which first introduced it, the world would not have long been without it. The progress of society would soon have brought it forth; and men in the whimsical decorations of fancy would have displayed the characters and actions of their heroes, the folly and absurdity of their fellow-citizens, had no priests of Bacchus ever existed.

In whatever age or country the drama might have taken its rise, tragedy would have been the first-born of its children. For every nation has its great men, and its great events upon record; and to represent their own forefathers struggling with those difficulties, and braving those dangers, of which they have heard with admiration, and the effects of which they still, perhaps, experience, would certainly have been the most animating subject for the poet, and the most interesting for his audience, even independently of the natural inclination we all so universally show for scenes of horror and distress, of passion and heroic exertion. Tragedy would have been the first child of the drama, for the same reasons that have made heroic ballad, with all its battles, murders, and disasters, the earliest poetical compositions of every country.

We behold heroes and great men at a distance, unmarked by those small but distinguishing features of the mind, which give a certain individuality to such an infinite variety of similar beings, in the near and familiar intercourse of life. They appear to us from this view like distant mountains, whose dark outlines we trace in the clear horizon, but the varieties of whose roughened sides, shaded with heath and brushwood, and seamed with many a cleft, we perceive not. When accidental anecdote reveals to us any weakness or peculiarity belonging to them, we start upon it like a discovery. They are made known to us in history only, by the great events they are connected with, and the part they have taken in extraordinary or important transactions. Even in poetry and romance, with the exception of some love story interwoven with the main events of their lives, they are seldom more intimately made known to us. To tragedy it belongs to lead them forward to our nearer regard, in all the distinguishing varieties which nearer inspection discovers; with the passions, the humours, the weaknesses, the prejudices of men. It is for her to present to us the great and magnanimous hero, who appears to our distant view as a superior being, as a god, softened down with those smaller frailties and imperfections which enable us to glory in, and claim kindred to his virtues. It is for her to exhibit to us the daring and ambitious man, planning his dark designs, and executing his bloody purposes, marked with those appropriate characteristics which distinguish him as an individual of that class; and agitated with those varied passions, which disturb the mind of man when he is engaged in the commission of such deeds. It is for her to point out to us the brave and impetuous warrior struck with those visitations of nature which, in certain situations, will unnerve the strongest arm, and make the boldest heart tremble. It is for her to show the tender, gentle, and unassuming mind animated with that fire which, by the provocation of circumstances, will give to the kindest heart the ferocity and keenness of a tiger. It is for her to present to us the great and striking characters that are to be found amongst men, in a way which the poet, the novelist, and the historian can but imperfectly attempt. But above all, to her, and to her only it belongs to unveil to us the human mind under the dominion of those strong and fixed passions which, seemingly unprovoked by outward circumstances, will from small beginnings brood within the breast, till all the better dispositions, all the fair gifts of nature are borne down before them. Those passions which conceal themselves from the observation of men; which cannot unbosom themselves even to the dearest friend; and can, often times, only give their fullness vent in the lonely desert, or in the darkness of midnight. For who hath followed the great man into his secret closet, or stood by the side of his nightly couch, and heard those exclamations of the soul which heaven alone may hear, that the historian should be able to inform us? And what form of story, what mode of rehearsed speech will communicate to us those feelings, whose irregular bursts, abrupt transitions, sudden pauses, and half-uttered suggestions, scorn all harmony of measured verse, all method and order of relation?

On the first part of this task her⁴ bards have eagerly exerted their abilities: and some amongst them, taught by strong original genius to deal immediately with human nature and their own hearts, have laboured in it successfully. But in presenting to us those views of great characters, and of the human mind in difficult and trying situations which peculiarly belong to tragedy, the far greater proportion, even of those who may be considered as respectable dramatic poets, have very much failed. From the beauty of those original dramas to which they have ever looked back with admiration, they have been tempted to prefer the embellishments of poetry to faithfully delineated nature. They have been more occupied in considering the works of the great dramatists who have gone before them, and the effects produced by their writings, than the varieties of human character which first furnished materials for those works, or those principles in the mind of man by means of which such effects were produced. Neglecting the boundless variety of nature, certain strong outlines of character, certain bold features of passion, certain grand vicissitudes, and striking dramatic situations have been repeated from one generation to another; whilst a pompous and solemn gravity, which they have supposed to be necessary for the dignity of tragedy, has excluded almost entirely from their works those smaller touches of nature, which so well develop the mind; and by showing men in their hours of state and exertion only, they have consequently shown them imperfectly. Thus, great and magnanimous heroes, who bear with majestic equanimity every vicissitude of fortune; who in every temptation and trial stand forth in unshaken virtue, like a rock buffeted by the waves; who encompassed with the most terrible evils, in calm possession of their souls, reason upon the difficulties of their state; and, even upon the brink of destruction, pronounce long eulogiums⁵ on virtue, in the most eloquent and beautiful language, have been held forth to our view as objects of imitation and interest; as though they had entirely forgotten that it is only from creatures like ourselves that we feel, and therefore, only from creatures like ourselves that we receive the instruction of example.⁶ Thus, passionate and impetuous warriors, who are proud, irritable, and vindictive, but generous, daring, and disinterested; setting their lives at a pin's fee for the good of others, but incapable of curbing their own humour of a moment to gain the whole world for themselves; who will pluck the orbs of heaven from their places, and crush the whole universe in one grasp, are called forth to kindle in our souls the generous contempt of everything abject and base; but with an effect proportionably feeble, as the hero is made to exceed in courage and fire what the standard of humanity will agree to.⁷ Thus, tender and pathetic lovers, full of the most gentle affections, the most amiable dispositions, and the most exquisite feelings; who present their defenceless bosoms to the storms of this rude world in all the graceful weakness of sensibility, are made to sigh out their sorrows in one unvaried strain of studied pathos, whilst this constant demand upon our feelings makes us absolutely incapable of answering it.⁸ Thus, also, tyrants are represented as monsters of cruelty, unmixed with any feelings of humanity; and villains as delighting in all manner of treachery and deceit, and acting upon many occasions for the very love of villainy itself; though the perfectly wicked are as ill fitted for the purposes of warning, as the perfectly virtuous are for those of example.⁹ This spirit of imitation, and attention to effect, has likewise confined them very much in their choice of situations and events to bring their great characters into action; rebellions, conspiracies, contentions for empire, and rivalships in love have alone been thought worthy of trying those heroes; and palaces and dungeons the only places magnificent or solemn enough for them to appear in.

They have, indeed, from this regard to the works of preceding authors, and great attention to the beauties of composition, and to dignity of design, enriched their plays with much striking, and sometimes sublime imagery, lofty thoughts, and virtuous sentiments; but in striving so eagerly to excel in those things that belong to tragedy in common with many other compositions, they have very much neglected those that are peculiarly her own. As far as they have been led aside from the first labours of a tragic poet by a desire to communicate more perfect moral instruction, their motive has been respectable, and they merit our esteem. But this praiseworthy end has been injured instead of promoted by their mode of pursuing it. Every species of moral writing has its own way of conveying instruction, which it can never, but with disadvantage, exchange for any other. The drama improves us by the knowledge we acquire of our own minds, from the natural desire we have to look into the thoughts, and observe the behaviour of others. Tragedy brings to our view men placed in those elevated situations, exposed to those great trials, and engaged in those extraordinary transactions, in which few of us are called upon to act...

From this general view, which I have endeavoured to communicate to my reader, of tragedy, and those principles in the human mind upon which the success of her efforts depends, I have been led to believe, that an attempt to write a series of tragedies, of simpler construction, less embellished with poetical decorations, less constrained by that lofty seriousness which has so generally been considered as necessary for the support of tragic dignity, and in which the chief object should be to delineate the progress of the higher passions in the human breast, each play exhibiting a particular passion, might not be unacceptable to the public. And I have been the more readily induced to act upon this idea, because I am confident, that tragedy, written upon this plan, is fitted to produce stronger moral effect than upon any other. I have said that tragedy in representing to us great characters struggling with difficulties, and placed in situations of eminence and danger, in which few of us have any chance of being called upon to act, conveys its moral efficacy to our minds by the enlarged views which it gives to us of human nature, by the admiration of virtue, and execration of vice which it excites, and not by the examples it holds up for our immediate application. But in opening to us the heart of man under the influence of those passions to which all are liable, this is not the case. Those strong passions that, with small assistance from outward circumstances, work their way in the heart, till they become the tyrannical masters of it, carry on a similar operation in the breast of the monarch, and the man of low degree. It exhibits to us the mind of man in that state when we are most curious to look into it, and is equally interesting to all. Discrimination of character is a turn of mind, though more common than we are aware of, which everybody does not possess; but to the expressions of passion, particularly strong passion, the dullest mind is awake; and its true unsophisticated language the dullest understanding will not misinterpret...

¹ the Ghost probably a reference to the Ghost in Hamlet, who causes such terror in its opening scenes.

3 ‘It appears to me a very strong testimony of the excellence of our great national dramatist [Shakespeare], that so many people have been employed in finding out obscure and refined beauties, in what appear to ordinary observation his very defects. Men, it may be said, do so merely to show their own superior penetration and ingenuity. But granting this; what could make other men listen to them, and listen so greedily too, if it were not that they have received from the works of Shakespeare, pleasure far beyond what the most perfect poetical compositions of a different character can afford’ (Baillie’s note).

4 her i.e. Tragedy’s.

5 eulogiums speeches of praise.

6 ‘To a being perfectly free from all human infirmity our sympathy refuses to extend. Our Saviour himself, whose character is so beautiful, and so harmoniously consistent; in whom, with outward proofs of his mission less strong than those that are offered to us, I should still be compelled to believe, from being utterly unable to conceive how the idea of such a character could enter into the imagination of man, never touches the heart more nearly than when he says, “Father, let this cup pass from me.” Had he been represented to us in all the unshaken strength of these tragic heroes, his disciples would have made fewer converts, and his precepts would have been listened to coldly. Plays in which heroes of this kind are held forth, and whose aim is, indeed, honourable and praiseworthy, have been admired by the cultivated and refined, but the tears of the simple, the applauses of the young and untaught have been wanting’ (Baillie’s note).

7 ‘In all burlesque imitations of tragedy, those plays in which this hero is pre-eminent, are always exposed to bear the great brunt of the ridicule; which proves how popular they have been, and how many poets, and good ones too, have been employed upon them. That they have been so popular, however, is not owing to the intrinsic merit of the characters they represent, but their opposition to those mean and contemptible qualities belonging to human nature, of which we are most ashamed. Besides, there is something in the human mind, independently of its love of applause, which inclines it to boast. This is ever the attendant of that elasticity of soul, which makes us bound up from the touch of oppression; and if there is nothing in the accompanying circumstances to create disgust, or suggest suspicions of their sincerity (as in real life is commonly the case), we are very apt to be carried along with the boasting of others. Let us in good earnest believe that a man is capable of achieving all that human courage can achieve, and we will suffer him to talk of impossibilities. Amidst all their pomp of words, therefore, our admiration of such heroes is readily excited (for the understanding is more easily deceived than the heart), but how stands our sympathy affected? As no caution nor foresight, on their own account, is ever suffered to occupy the thoughts of such bold disinterested beings, we are the more inclined to care for them, and take an interest in their fortune through the course of the play: yet, as their souls are unappalled by anything; as pain and death are not at all regarded by them; and as we have seen them very ready to plunge their own swords into their own bosoms, on no very weighty occasion, perhaps, their death distresses us but little, and they commonly fall unwept' (Baillie's note).

8 'Were it not that in tragedies where these heroes preside, the same soft tones of sorrow are so often repeated in our ears, till we are perfectly tired of it, they are more fitted to interest us than any other: both because in seeing them, we own the ties of kindred between ourselves and the frail mortals we lament; and sympathize with the weakness of mortality unmixed with any thing to degrade or disgust; and also, because the misfortunes, which form the story of the play, are frequently of the more familiar and domestic kind. A king driven from his throne will not move our sympathy so strongly as a private man torn from the bosom of his family' (Baillie's note).

9 'I have said nothing here in regard to female character, though in many tragedies it is brought forward as the principal one of the piece, because what I have said of the above characters is likewise applicable to it. I believe there is no man that ever lived, who has behaved in a certain manner, on a certain occasion, who has not had amongst women some corresponding spirit, who on the like occasion, and every way similarly circumstanced, would have behaved in the like manner. With some degree of softening and refinement, each class of the tragic heroes I have mentioned has its corresponding one amongst the heroines. The tender and pathetic no doubt has the most numerous, but the great and magnanimous is not without it, and the passionate and impetuous boasts of one by no means inconsiderable in numbers, and drawn sometimes to the full as passionate and impetuous as itself' (Baillie's note).

William Lisle Bowles (1762–1851)

Born into a clergy family at Kings Sutton, Northamptonshire, William Lisle Bowles was the pupil of Joseph Warton at Winchester, and Thomas Warton at Trinity College, Oxford, where he matriculated in 1781 (graduated 1792). Rejected in love by the niece of Sir Samuel Romilly, he went on a walking tour of northern England, Scotland and the Continent, during which he composed his Fourteen Sonnets (1789). The edition of a hundred copies sold out immediately, and a second, containing twenty-one sonnets, was published within weeks. They reached a ninth edition by 1805. He published much else, but nothing as popular and influential as the sonnets. Wordsworth and Coleridge read them in 1789, and in Biographia Literaria Coleridge praised ‘the genial influence of a style of poetry, so tender, and yet so manly, so natural and real, and yet so dignified, and harmonious, as the sonnets, etc., of Mr Bowles!’¹ True, it was the combination of the same melancholy as that found in the sonnets of his Oxford tutor, Thomas Warton, with a sophisticated sense of the picturesque and sublime, that made his sonnets distinctive and, in their day, fashionable. His sonnet to the Itchin looks back to Warton’s ‘To the River Lodon’ (see p. 7), and forward to Coleridge’s ‘To the River Otter’ (p. 618).

From Fourteen Sonnets (1789)

Sonnet VIII. To the River Itchin,¹ near Winton

Itchin, when I behold thy banks again,
Thy crumbling margin, and thy silver breast
On which the self-same tints still seem to rest,
Why feels my heart the shiv’ring sense of pain?
Is it that many a summer’s day has passed 5

Since in life's morn I carolled² on thy side?
Is it that oft since then my heart has sighed
 As youth, and hope's delusive gleams, flew fast?
Is it that those who circled on thy shore,
Companions of my youth, now meet no more? 10
 Whate'er the cause, upon thy banks I bend
Sorrowing, yet feel such solace at my heart,
 As at the meeting of some long-lost friend
 From whom, in happier hours, we wept to part.

To the River Itchin

¹ The Itchen (as it is spelled now) runs through Winchester, where Bowles went to school; the Itchen runs behind the school.

² carolled sang and, by implication, wrote poetry.

¹ CC Biographia i 17. He also included three of Bowles's sonnets in his Sonnets from Various Authors (1796).

John Thelwall (1764–1834)

‘Citizen John Thelwall had something good about him’, Coleridge recalled in 1830. ‘We were once sitting in Somersetshire in a beautiful recess. I said to him, “Citizen John! This is a fine place to talk treason in!” “Nay, Citizen Samuel!”, replied he, “it is a place to make a man forget that there is any necessity for treason.”’ As one of the defendants at the treason trials of 1794, Thelwall had good reason to want to forget.

The son of a silk mercer in London, he had been involved in the theatre, the law and the family business before becoming a journalist. His interest in politics was stimulated by involvement in the Society for Free Debate at Coachmakers’ Hall in Southwark. In autumn 1793 he joined the London Corresponding Society and on 21 October became a member of the General Committee. The Society had been founded by Thomas Hardy, a Scottish cobbler, on 25 January 1792, as a means of agitating among those wishing for political reform. The low subscription fee of one penny a week was intended to encourage the involvement of tradesmen and artisans. Thelwall came to the fore at a crowded general meeting on 20 January 1794, which was followed by an anniversary dinner at the Globe Tavern in Fleet Street. By this time he had already begun to prove his extraordinary talents as a political orator, poet and publicist. After the dinner he took the chair to propose the toasts, including one to The Rights of Man, after which he sang republican songs of his own composition, copies of which were later sold to members of the society and the audiences at his political lectures.

At a time of comparative political freedom it is not easy to imagine how dangerous it was to be a radical in 1794. England had been at war with France for a year (and would remain so until 1815), and Pitt’s government was increasingly intolerant of French sympathizers at home. By the spring of 1794 the Terror in Paris was at its height: Robespierre executed Danton and other eminent French politicians in March and April 1794. Undaunted, the London Corresponding Society held a mass meeting on the bowling green at Chalk Farm on 14 April, at which Thelwall acted as master of ceremonies. By this time he was under constant surveillance by government spies, who reported that, when quenching his thirst after the five-hour meeting, he had removed the froth from his tankard with a knife, remarking, ‘So should all tyrants be served!’ That meeting, and another, of the radical Society for Constitutional Information on 2 May, sent alarm through Pitt’s increasingly anxious wartime government. Fears of a French invasion made it imperative that the government stifle dissident voices. Ten days later Thomas Hardy, secretary of the London Corresponding Society, and Daniel Adams, secretary of the Society for Constitutional Information, were arrested at home on the charge of treason. Thelwall and the Revd Jeremiah Joyce were arrested the following day; Horne Tooke, John Lovett, John Richter and John Augustus Bonney on 16 May. Pitt then suspended habeas corpus, allowing him to detain the prisoners in the Tower of London for up to eight months without trial. The Tower was not then the tourist attraction it is today: its cells were cold, unhygienic, brutal places, where the prisoners quickly became ill. The punishment they faced for treason was centuries old: hanging, drawing and quartering. Thelwall distracted himself by composing his Poems Written in Close Confinement (1795).

A few days before the trials, Godwin published an attack on the government case under the title Cursory Strictures on the Charge delivered by Lord Chief Justice Eyre to the Grand Jury. It appeared in the Morning Chronicle for 21 October, and had an immediate impact. The treason trials began on 25 October; one by one, the accused were either acquitted or had their charges dropped, thanks largely to the devastating effect of Godwin's pamphlet.

A committed freethinker, Thelwall continued to agitate and lecture in spite of the fact that government spies followed him everywhere, often paying stooges to heckle or break up his meetings by force. His lectures, delivered in Beaufort Buildings off the Strand, were published in his periodical, the Tribune. They attracted audiences of 400–500, who paid the relatively high entrance fee of one shilling and sixpence (just over £4 or US$7.50 in today's currency), among whom were a number of 'aristocrats'.

The government was constantly seeking excuses for suppressing political dissent; their chance came on 29 October 1795, when the king was attacked by a mob on his way to open Parliament. This, and a large meeting of the London Corresponding Society in the fields near Copenhagen House, Islington, in which Thelwall was involved, provided the government with the excuse they needed: in early November the government introduced two Bills to Parliament, the first extending the definition of treason, and the second forbidding meetings of fifty or more without the consent of local magistrates. The Two Bills, or 'Gagging Acts', as they were known, became law on 18 December. Thelwall warned in the Tribune that they would give rise to even worse problems, and in its last issue he published his moving Civic Oration, announcing his decision to retire from politics (see pp. 326–7). There were many protests by societies across the land, but the government was implacable.

In summer 1796 he left London for Norwich, where he delivered a course of twenty-two lectures, admitting no more than forty-nine people to each one, on the subject of 'Classical History, and particularly the Laws and Revolutions of Rome', a cover under which he commented on current affairs. Later that year he lectured at Great Yarmouth, where the third meeting was broken up by ninety sailors armed with bludgeons. The three remaining lectures were safely delivered, and Thelwall went on to speak at King's Lynn and Wisbech. Throughout these times he was subject to constant harassment by government agents. Lectures at Derby, Stockport and Norwich were broken up by soldiers, and he was chased fifteen miles out of Ashby-de-la-Zouch when passing through on private business.

He was finally driven out of political agitation altogether. When he set off, on 29 June 1797, for a pedestrian tour of the west of England and Wales, he was on the lookout for a suitable retreat. Among those who welcomed him were Coleridge, Wordsworth and his sister Dorothy, whom he met at Nether Stowey. Coleridge, whose own political lectures were curtailed by the two Bills, had begun a correspondence with him in late April 1796, with the words: 'Pursuing the same end by the same means we ought not to be strangers to each other.' He enclosed a copy of his Poems (1796), which Thelwall analysed in his letter of 10 May 1796 (see pp. 327–8). He criticized Coleridge's ornate manner, reminding him of the need to write simply and lucidly; the principles he prescribed were close to those that would be espoused in the preface to Lyrical Ballads, and which are followed in Thelwall's proto-conversation poems, 'Lines written at Bridgwater' and 'To the Infant Hampden'. As 'Lines written at Bridgwater' reveals, Thelwall was at ease among the poets, and for a while entertained the possibility of settling among them. But they were already under surveillance by a government spy, and the landlord of Alfoxden House was sufficiently alarmed to deny the Wordsworths occupation for a further year.

Thelwall moved on, returned to Bristol, Gloucestershire and finally Wales, where he found a small farm in the hamlet of Llys Wen, on the banks of the Wye, to which he retired with his family. This proved disastrous; the locals harassed him, his efforts at farming failed and his beloved daughter, Maria, died. In later years he returned to lecturing, but this time on the subject of elocution. Years after his death, Wordsworth recalled: 'He really was a man of extraordinary talent, an affectionate husband and a good father. Though brought up in the city on a tailor's board he was truly sensible of the beauty of natural objects.'

Stanzas on hearing for certainty that we were to be tried for high treason (composed 28 September 1794)

From Poems Written in Close Confinement in the Tower and Newgate upon a Charge of Treason
(1795)

Short is perhaps our date of life,¹
But let us while we live be gay –
To those be thought and anxious care
Who build upon the distant day.

Though in our cup tyrannic power² 5
Would dash the bitter dregs of fear,
We'll gaily quaff the mantling draught,³
While patriot toasts the fancy cheer.

Sings not the seaman, tempest-tossed,
When surges wash the riven shroud,⁴ 10
Scorning the threat'ning voice of fate
That pipes in rocking winds aloud?

Yes, he can take his cheerful glass,
And toast his mistress in the storm,
While duty and remembered joys 15
By turns his honest bosom warm.

And shall not we, in storms of state,
At base oppression's fury laugh,
And while the vital spirits flow,
To freedom fill, and fearless quaff? 20

Short is perhaps our date of life,
But let us while we live be gay –
To those be thought and anxious care
Who build upon the distant day.

Tower, 28 September 1794

Stanzas on hearing for certainty

¹ Short is perhaps...life The penalty for treason was death (see headnote).

² tyrannic power Shelwall had cause to regard Pitt's government as tyrannical. They had arrested him and his radical friends without specific cause, and had confiscated their possessions.

³ mantling draught The draught of beer is 'mantled' by a head of foam. But the implicit comparison is with the cloak (or mantle) worn by monarchs.

⁴ riven shroud severed rigging.

Dangerous tendency of the attempt to suppress political discussion (published 21 March 1795)

From The Tribune (1795)

While prudent and moderate measures leave the door open to peaceful investigation, men of talents and moral character step forward into the field of politics, and never fail to take the lead in popular meetings and associations, for which nature seems to have intended them.

While this continues, all is peaceful and rational enquiry, and the people, though bold, are orderly. Nor even when persecution inflames their passions, are they easily provoked to actual intemperance. But when words are construed into treason, and men can no longer unbosom themselves to their friends at a tavern, or associate together for the diffusion of political information, but at the peril of their lives, the benevolent and moderate part of mankind retire from the scene of action, to brood, with prophetic anxiety, over the melancholy prospect.¹

Enquiry is thus, it is true, in some degree suppressed, and the counsellors of these overbearing measures are apt to congratulate themselves on their supposed success. But the calm is more dreadful than the hurricane they pretended to apprehend. In the ferment of half-smothered indignation, feelings of a more gloomy complexion are generated, and characters of a very different stamp are called into action.

Men who have neither genius nor benevolence succeed those who had both, and, with no other stimulus than fury, and no other talent than hypocrisy and intrigue, embark in projects which every friend of humanity must abhor – and which, while the free, open, and manly character of the species was yet uncrushed by the detestable system of persecuting opinions, never could have entered the imagination.

Whoever will consult the page of history will find that in every country on the earth where liberty has been alternately indulged and trampled, this has been but too uniformly the progress of the human mind.

Let us ask then this serious question: is it possible for any person to be a more dangerous enemy to the peace and personal safety of the sovereign, than he who advises the persecution of opinion and the suppression of peaceable associations?

Dangerous tendency of the attempt

¹ melancholy prospect Thelwall writes in anticipation of the Gagging Acts of December 1795, which banned ‘seditious meetings’ and aimed to ensure the ‘safety of his majesty’s person’ (see headnote).

Civic oration on the anniversary of the acquittal of the lecturer¹ [5 December],² being a vindication of the principles, and a review of the conduct, that placed him at the bar of the Old Bailey. Delivered Wednesday 9 December 1795 (extracts)

From The Tribune (1795)

I was born near this place.³ My residence can be traced with ease during every part of my life, and if there had been any disgraceful particulars in my history, the industrious malice of faction need not have been confined to general abuses. There have been times in which poverty and misfortune frowned upon my youth, and in which I had to struggle with the bitterest disadvantages to which an independent spirit could be subjected; when without a profession (for I could not eat the bread of legal peculation), I had to support an aged mother and a brother robbed of every faculty of reason.

Yet upon all these embarrassments, when a debating society and a magazine brought me together but about £50 or £60 a year,⁴ I look back with the proud consciousness of never having stooped even to a mean action. Search then, probe me to the quick, and if you can find one stain upon my character, think me in reality a plunderer and an assassin. But if you cannot, what will you think of a profligate administration, with more vices upon their heads than I have words to speak them? What will you think of their assassins, and the black epithets and calumnies with which they have so incessantly pursued me?...

When our beloved associates – when those men of mind and virtue, whose names I will cherish with veneration so long as ‘memory holds her seat’⁵ – when Gerrald, Margat, Muir, Palmer and Skirving⁶ were doomed to Botany Bay without having violated one law or principle of our constitution, it was natural (though it was not wise) for men who revered their talents and their virtues to indulge the British vice of intemperance – for it is a British vice, and we are too apt to be proud of it. It was natural that under such circumstances, our blood should boil, and that we should say angry things, and pass vapouring, intemperate resolutions. But the minister knew that the ‘very head and jut of our offending went but to this – no further!’⁷

What, then, is that administration, which wishes to hang every man who makes use of an intemperate word against them?

But they have been disappointed – and what do they now attempt? They attempt to pass laws which will make all those things treason which they endeavoured to make treason before without any law whatever.

The minister introduces Two Bills.⁸ What are they? Bills that subject a man to all the penalties of High Treason who shall publish, or even write, without publishing, any dissertation which approves any form of government but the existing government of the country....

I cannot be ignorant that these acts are made in a very considerable degree with a view to my destruction. I know also that the time will come when – in consequence of the persecutions I have endured, and the temper (permit me to say) with which I have faced those persecutions – I may be an instrument of some service to the liberties and happiness of my country. I shall not therefore give the minister an opportunity to destroy me upon any trifling contest. I have here maintained myself in decency, and cleared away the encumbrances which former persecutions had brought upon me. With something less than £100⁹ in my pocket I shall retire from this place, for the cultivation of my mind, and, carrying the consciousness of my own integrity into retirement, maintain myself by the labours of my pen.

Having been so long seeking for my country, and having endured so much persecution in that search, I think I shall not be accused either of selfishness or pusillanimity, when I say that I shall now wait till my country seeks for me, and that when my country does seek for me, she shall find me ready for my post, whatever may be the difficulty or the danger.

Letter from John Thelwall to Samuel
Taylor Coleridge, 10 May 1796 (extract)
(edited from MS)

Of your favourite poem I fear I shall speak in terms that will disappoint you. There are passages most undoubtedly in the Religious Musings of very great merit, and perhaps there is near half of the poem that no poet in our language need have been ashamed to own. But this praise belongs almost exclusively to those parts that are not at all religious. As for the generality of those passages which are most so, they are certainly anything in the world rather than poetry (unless indeed the mere glowing rapidity of the blank verse may entitle them to that distinction).

They are the very acme of abstruse, metaphysical, mystical rant, and all ranting abstraction, metaphysics and mysticism are wider from true poetry than the equator from the poles. The whole poem also is infected with inflation and turgidity... ‘a vision shadowy of truth’, ‘wormy grave’, and a heap of like instances might be selected worthy of Blackmore¹ himself. (‘Ye petrify th’ imbrotelled atheist’s heart’ is one of those illiberal and unfounded calumnies with which Christian meekness never yet disdained to supply the want of argument – but this by the way.) ‘Lovely was the death of him whose life was love’ is certainly enough to make any man sick whose taste has not been corrupted by the licentious (I mean ‘pious’) nonsense of the conventicle.²

You may, if you please, ‘lay the flattering unction to your soul’³ that my irreligious principles dictate the severity of this criticism, and, though it may strengthen you in the suspicion, I must confess that your religious verses approach much nearer to poetry than those of Milton on the same subject. In short, while I was yet a Christian, and a very zealous one (i.e. when I was about your age),⁴ I became thoroughly convinced that Christian poetry was very vile stuff – that religion was a subject which none but a rank infidel could handle poetically.

Before I wipe the gall from my pen, I must notice an affectation of the Della Crusca⁵ school which blurs almost every one of your poems – I mean the frequent accent upon the adjectives and weak words... ‘For chiefly in the oppressed good man’s face’ etc.

Having dwelt thus largely upon the defects, I shall proceed to prove my qualifications to set up for a critic by running very slightly over the numerous beauties with which it abounds. ‘The thought-benighted sceptic’ is very happy, as is also ‘Mists dim-floating of idolatry – misshaped the omnipresent sin’. (The word ‘Split’ appears to me ill-chosen and unpoetical.) The whole passage ‘Thus from the elect’...(ll. 102–18), though not quite free either from mysticism or turgidity, is upon the whole very grand and very poetical. Lines 133–5 and 138–44 are also equally fine in sentiment, conception and expression. And though ‘connatural mind’, ‘tortuous folds’, ‘savagery of holy zeal’, ‘at his mouth imbreathe’, and ‘fiendish deeds’, offend me not a little as being affected and pedantic (and therefore of course unpoetical), yet the whole passage, lines 181–255, delights me very much. The satire is dignified, the poetry sublime and ardent. Of the ensuing paragraph, ‘In the primeval age’ etc., the first and third lines are bad; but the ensuing passage consisting of 144 lines beginning with ‘soon imagination conjured up a host of new desires’, and ending at line 364 breathes a rapture and energy of mind seldom to be met with among modern bards. I must however in sincerity add that, according to my judgement, all that follows hangs like a dead weight upon the poem.

Letter from John Thelwall to Coleridge

² conventicle Dissenting religious gathering (or chapel).

³ Hamlet to his mother: ‘Lay not that flattering unction to your soul, / That not your trespass but my madness speaks’ (Hamlet III iv 145–6).

⁴ your age Coleridge was 24; Thelwall is looking back to c.1788.

⁵ The Della Crusicans of the late eighteenth century advocated an affected, ornamented sentimentality, and are probably in Wordsworth’s mind when he mentions the ‘gaudiness and inane phraseology of many modern writers’ in the Advertisement to Lyrical Ballads (1798), p. 337, below.

long excursion in quest of a peaceful retreat¹

From Poems Written Chiefly in Retirement (1801)

Day of my double birth! who gave me first
To breathe life's troubled air, and, kindlier far,
Gave all that makes life welcome – gave me her²
Who now, far distant,³ sheds, perchance, the tear
In pensive solitude, and chides the hours 5
That keep her truant wanderer from her arms –
Hers and our smiling babies; eventful day!
How shall I greet thee now, at thy return,
So often marked with sadness? Art thou, say,
Once more arrived a harbinger of woes, 10
Precursor of a year of miseries,
Of storms and persecutions, of the pangs
Of disappointed hope, and keen regrets,
Wrung from the bosom by a sordid world
That kindness pays with hatred, and returns 15
Evil for good? – a world most scorpion-like
That stings what warms it, and the ardent glow
Of blessed benevolence too oft transmutes
To sullen gloom and sour misanthropy,
Wounding, with venom'd tooth, the fostering breast 20
That her milk turns to gall. Or art thou come,
In most unwonted guise, oh fateful day,
With cheering prophecy of kindlier times?
Of hours of sweet retirement, tranquil joys
Of friendship, and of love – of studious ease, 25

Of philosophic thought – poetic dreams
 In dell romantic, or by bubbling brook,
 High wood, or rocky shore; where fancy's train,
 Solemn or gay, shall in the sunbeam sport,
 Or murmur in the gloom, peopling earth, air, 30
 Ocean, and woodland haunt, mountain and cave
 With wildest fantasies – wild, but not vain,
 For, but for dreams like these, Meonides⁴
 Had never shook the soul with epic song,
 Nor Milton, slumbering underneath the shade 35
 Of fancy-haunted oak, heard the loud strain
 Of heavenly minstrelsy – nor yet had he,
 Shakespeare (in praise of whom smooth Avon still Flows eloquent to every Briton's ear),
 Pierced the dark womb of nature with keen glance, 40
 Tracing the embryo passions ere their birth,
 And every mystic movement of the soul
 Baring to public ken. Oh bards, to whom
 Youth owes its emulation, age the bliss
 Of many a wintry evening, dull and sad 45
 But for your cheering aid! Ye from whose strains,
 As from a font of inspiration, oft
 The quickening mind, else stagnant, learns to flow
 In tides of generous ardour, scattering wide
 Smiling fertility, fresh fruits and flowers 50
 Of intellectual worth!⁵ Oh might my soul
 Henceforth with yours hold converse, in the scenes
 Where nature cherishes poetic thought,
 Best cradled in the solitary haunts
 Where bustling cares intrude not, nor the throng 55
 Of cities or of courts. Yet not for aye
 In hermit-like seclusion would I dwell
 (My soul estranging from my brother man)
 Forgetful and forgotten; rather oft,
 With some few minds congenial, let me stray 60

Along the muses' haunts, where converse, meet
For intellectual beings, may arouse
The soul's sublimer energies, or wing
The fleeting time most cheerily – the time
Which, though swift-fleeting, scatters, as he flies, 65
Seeds of delight, that, like the furrowed grain,
Strewed by the farmer as he onward stalks
Over his well-ploughed acres, shall produce,
In happy season, its abundant fruits.

Day of my double birth,⁶ if such the year 70
Thou usherest in, most welcome! For my soul
Is sick of public turmoil⁷ – ah, most sick
Of the vain effort to redeem a race
Enslaved, because degenerate; lost to hope
Because to virtue lost – wrapped up in self, 75
In sordid avarice, luxurious pomp,
And profligate intemperance – a race
Fierce without courage, abject and yet proud,
And most licentious, though most far from thee.

Ah, let me then, far from the strifeful scenes 80
Of public life (where reason's warning voice
Is heard no longer, and the trump of truth
Who blows but wakes The Ruffian Crew of Power
To deeds of maddest anarchy and blood) –

Ah, let me, far in some sequestered dell, 85
Build my low cot! Most happy might it prove,

My Samuel,⁸ near to thine, that I might oft
Share thy sweet converse, best-beloved of friends,
Long-loved ere known⁹ – for kindred sympathies
Linked (though far distant) our congenial souls! 90

Ah! 'twould be sweet, beneath the neighb'ring thatch,¹⁰
In philosophic amity to dwell,
Inditing moral verse, or tale, or theme,
Gay or instructive.¹¹ And it would be sweet,

With kindly interchange of mutual aid, 95
To delve our little garden plots, the while
Sweet converse flowed, suspending oft the arm
And half-driven spade, while, eager, one propounds,
And listens one, weighing each pregnant word,
And pondering fit reply that may untwist 100
The knotty point – perchance of import high –
Of moral truth, of causes infinite
(Creating power, or uncreated worlds
Eternal and uncaused!), or whatsoe'er
Of metaphysic or of ethic lore 105
The mind with curious subtlety¹² pursues,
Agreeing or dissenting – sweet alike,
When wisdom, and not victory, the end.
And 'twould be sweet, my Samuel (ah, most sweet!),
To see our little infants¹³ stretch their limbs 110
In gambols unrestrained, and early learn
Practical love, and – wisdom's noblest lore –
Fraternal¹⁴ kindness, while rosiest health
Bloomed on their sunburnt cheeks. And 'twould be sweet
(When what to toil was due, to study what,¹⁵ 115
And literary effort, had been paid)¹⁶
Alternate in each other's bower to sit,
In summer's genial season. Or, when bleak,
The wintry blast had stripped the leafy shade,
Around the blazing hearth, social and gay, 120
To share our frugal viands, and the bowl
Sparkling with home-brewed beverage – by our sides
Thy Sara and my Susan,¹⁷ and, perchance,
Alfoxden's musing tenant, and the maid
Of ardent eye who with fraternal love 125
Sweetens his solitude. With these should join
Arcadian Poole,¹⁸ swain of a happier age

When Wisdom and Refinement loved to dwell
With rustic Plainness, and the pastoral vale
Was vocal to the melodies of verse, 130
Echoing sweet minstrelsy.

With such, my friend –
With such, how pleasant to unbend awhile,
Winging the idle hour with song or tale,
Pun or quaint joke or converse, such as fits
Minds gay, but innocent. And we would laugh 135
(Unless, perchance, Pity's more kindly tear
Check the obstreperous mirth) at such who waste
Life's precious hours in the delusive chase
Of wealth and worldly gewgaws, and contend
For honours emptier than the hollow voice 140
That rings in echo's cave, and which, like that,
Exists but in the babbling of a world
Creating its own wonder. Wiselier we
To intellectual joys will thus devote
Our fleeting years, mingling Arcadian sports 145
With healthful industry. Oh, it would be
A golden age revived! Nor would we lack
Woodnymph, or naiad,¹⁹ to complete the group
Of classic fable; for, in happy time,
Sylvanus, Chester,²⁰ in each hand should bring 150
The sister nymphs, Julia of radiant eye
And stately tread, the dryad²¹ of the groves,
And she, of softer mien, the meek-eyed maid,
Pensively sweet, whom Fancy well might deem
The fairy of the brooks that bubble round. 155

Ah, fateful day! what marvel if my soul
Receive thy visits awfully,²² and fain²³
With fancy's glowing characters would trace
Thy yet to me blank legend, painting most
What most my bosom yearns for – friendship's joys, 160

And social happiness, and tranquil hours
 Of studious indolence? Or, sweeter far,
 The high poetic rapture that becalms
 Even while it agitates? Ah, fateful day,
 If that the year thou lead'st (as fain my soul 165
 Would augur, from some hours of joy late passed,
 And friendships unexpected) – if the year
 Thou usherest in, has aught, perchance, in store
 To realize this vision, welcome most –
 Ah most, most welcome! for my soul, at peace, 170
 Shall to its native pleasures then return,
 And in my Susan's arms, each pang forgot,
 Nightly will I repose – yielding my soul
 (Unshared, unharrassed, by a thankless world)
 To the domestic virtues, calm and sweet, 175
 Of husband and of father – to the joys
 Of relative affiance; its mild cares
 And stingless ecstasies; while gentlest sleep,
 Unwooded, uncalled, on the soft pillow waits
 Of envyless obscurity. Ah, come! 180
 Hours of long wished tranquillity, ah come!
 Snatch from my couch the thorn of anxious thought,
 That I may taste the joys my soul best loves,
 And find, once more, 'that Being is a Bliss!'

William Wordsworth and Samuel Taylor Coleridge, Lyrical Ballads (1798)

Lyrical Ballads (1798) is arguably the most important single volume of the period. It signalled a revolution in literary history, and has generated a vast amount of critical literature in the two centuries since its first publication. It is presented here in its entirety, separately from the author selections, so that readers can experience it in something approaching the shape in which it was first published.

It sprang directly out of the annus mirabilis of 1797–8. Its authors spent many days in each other's company, from the moment the Wordsworths moved into Alfoxden House in June 1797, four miles' walk from Coleridge's cottage at Nether Stowey, to the following summer when they moved out. That year was to change the lives and careers of both men forever. Wordsworth was 27, Coleridge 25 and Dorothy 26. In some ways Coleridge was the more innovatory: he would compose his three greatest poems – The Ancient Mariner, Kubla Khan and Christabel (Part I) – and concoct the plan for the poem that would help precipitate the millennium (Christ's thousand-year rule on earth), The Recluse, persuading Wordsworth that he was the only poet able to write it. Together they would plan, write and publish the Lyrical Ballads. Dorothy played an indispensable part in all this, through her record of this period in the Alfoxden journal, which describes the experiences and observations that fuelled the poetry of that moment, and served as a source for much of Wordsworth's poetry (see, for instance, 'A Night-Piece' and 'The Discharged Soldier', pp. 426–31). Its precise descriptions of the natural world constitute a major literary achievement in their own right.

The proposal for a joint volume was already in the air when, on 20 November 1797, Dorothy noted that The Ancient Mariner was to be published 'with some pieces of William's'. In those days poetry tended to be written in ornate rhyming couplets, festooned with a repertoire of devices which had been in fashion since Pope's day. With the exception of such writers as Cowper and Burns, there were few poets with a serious interest in the workings of the human mind or who wrote in a relaxed, colloquial style about human relationships. Such subjects were important to Wordsworth and Coleridge because of 'The Recluse'. It was to set out the vision of a world in which a life-force could enter into the lives of ordinary people through an enlightened perception of nature, improving them morally, and leading ultimately to a kind of non-violent political and social revolution. This is the belief that underpins 'Tintern Abbey', one of the finest of the poems in the collection, as well as 'Goody Blake and Harry Gill', 'The Thorn' and 'The Idiot Boy'.

It is worth considering these works in that light. In 'Goody Blake and Harry Gill' Wordsworth is concerned to explore a scientifically documented case history (see p. 370 n. 1) that demonstrates how words are capable of altering the physical constitution of an individual. In this case they are delivered in the form of a curse, but the argument of the poem is that blessings have an equal and opposite potency. It was Shelley who would write that 'Poets are the unacknowledged legislators of the world' (p. 1247), but 'Goody

Blake and Harry Gill' anticipates that by arguing that if an utterance can render a grown man permanently cold, it should be able to change our intellectual and moral disposition for the better. In his 'Essays upon Epitaphs' (1810), Wordsworth argued precisely that: 'Words are too awful an instrument for good and evil to be trifled with: they hold above all other external powers a dominion over thoughts.' The spell Goody Blake casts over Harry Gill is proof of the power of words. Wordsworth does not explain why Gill is stricken by them – presumably it is due to an unconscious awareness that he has behaved unjustly – but that is not what concerns him. The point of the poem is to acknowledge the power of words as an instrument for both good and evil, and thus legitimize the idea of a poem that could precipitate revolution.

'The Thorn' is daring because Wordsworth provides so little commentary on the retired sea-captain who narrates it¹ – for its true subject, disclosed only in passing, is not Martha Ray but the 'adhesive' sensibility of the man who has become obsessed with her. Did she smother her child? Did she bury its corpse? The answers are irrelevant because Martha Ray, who appears to be the subject of the poem, is nothing of the kind. She is a vector for the captain's prurient inquisitiveness, which prevents him from responding in a compassionate manner to her continuing grief. Rather than offer her shelter and sustenance, he prefers to spy on her through his telescope. Nor is he the only one. Despite being aware of her suffering, the village allows her to remain on the hillside, using her as the focus for lurid speculation. And that, rather than the conjectured history of Martha Ray, is Wordsworth's subject. 'The Thorn' is about a village (and, by implication, a world) that has forgotten how to be human – a far cry from the ideal place to which he wanted to take readers of 'The Recluse'. As with 'Goody Blake and Harry Gill', Wordsworth believed that it was only by confronting the fallen world, with all its injustices and cruelties, that paradise could be regained.

In this context, 'The Idiot Boy' is one of the most daring poems in the volume. One of its earliest readers was the Scottish man of letters John Wilson, then a student at the University of Glasgow, who told Wordsworth that Johnny Foy generated feelings only of 'disgust and contempt': 'it appears almost unnatural that a person in a state of complete idiotism, should excite the warmest feelings of attachment in the breast even of his mother.'² Perhaps like many of Wordsworth's readers, Wilson would have found it easier to accept Johnny Foy as the protagonist of a poem such as Southey's 'The Idiot', written at the same period (see p. 746). But he was missing the point. As Wordsworth answered, 'I have often applied to Idiots, in my own mind, that sublime expression of scripture that, "their life is hidden with God." They are worshipped, probably from a feeling of this sort, in several parts of the East.'

This was an extraordinary thing to say. Far from attempting to compromise with Wilson, Wordsworth insists that Johnny Foy is closer to God, even true visionary enlightenment, than those around him. And the poem is designed to bear that out. His mother's fears, though indicative of her love, are shown to be unfounded; it is as if the natural forces to which he surrendered guarantee his well-being, returning him to Betty at the end of the poem. And his uncanny ability to transcend the physical limitations of the world is heightened by transfiguration first into a fairy-tale wanderer riding the night skies, then into a 'silent horseman-ghost' and finally into a 'fierce and dreadful' sheep-hunter. He is all of those things and none of them. It is as if these possibilities, fantastic though they sound, are incapable of containing him for more than the instant it takes us to envisage them. 'Mighty prophet! Seer blessed!' Wordsworth would write of Hartley Coleridge in 1804 (p. 552); Johnny Foy's disability, in so far as he has one, manifests itself not in the kind of violent or bizarre behaviour that John Wilson expected, but in precisely the kind of exalted status attributed to Hartley. Of all the characters in the volume, Johnny Foy is closest to the protagonist of 'The Recluse'.

Although Coleridge was an inspirational force at the time of this collaboration, he had difficulty writing poems to order for Lyrical Ballads. Originally it was hoped that Christabel would appear in the volume, but he got no further than Part I. 'The Nightingale' was not written specifically for it, while The Dungeon and The Foster Mother's Tale were quarried from Osorio, the play he completed in 1797. All the same, 'The Ancient Mariner' remains one of the most enduringly popular of his poems, and makes an important statement by being the first poem in the book. Wordsworth would come to regret that, and in later editions moved it so that it was not the first thing readers saw when they opened the volume. For the 1800 edition he wrote a 'note' apologizing for the poem's 'great defects' (see p. 520).

Coleridge may not have composed as many poems as he hoped, but his influence is found throughout, permeating Wordsworth's writing more strongly than at any other time in their respective careers. His pantheist beliefs strongly colour 'Lines Written at a Small Distance from my House' and the central statement of 'Tintern Abbey':

And I have felt
A presence that disturbs me with the joy
Of elevated thoughts, a sense sublime
Of something far more deeply interfused,
Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
And the round ocean, and the living air,
And the blue sky, and in the mind of man –
A motion and a spirit that impels
All thinking things, all objects of all thought,
And rolls through all things.

(ll. 94–103)

The peculiarly Coleridgean element is the way in which love of nature has been incorporated into a spiritual vision of all-embracing unity, for Wordsworth is recalling Religious Musings (see p. 628), in which 'tis God / Diffused through all that doth make all one whole' (ll. 144–5).

No one recognized the significance of Lyrical Ballads when it first appeared in early October 1798. Sales were respectable³ (such that by 1807 Francis Jeffrey could remark that 'The Lyrical Ballads were unquestionably popular')⁴ but few copies sold at first, and along with one or two good reviews it attracted some bad ones, including one by Robert Southey (see pp. 751–2). 'If he could not conscientiously have spoken differently of the volume', Wordsworth said, 'he ought to have declined the task of reviewing it.' But then, Southey and Wordsworth had been in competition for some time, and it was not surprising that Southey wished to dampen interest in the work of the man he regarded as his nearest rival. His main argument was that Wordsworth and Coleridge are bad storytellers: having written off 'The Idiot Boy' as 'bald in story' he comments that the other ballads 'are not so highly embellished in narration'.⁵ Southey exemplifies the reader invited, in the Advertisement, to cast away his 'pre-established codes of decision', and respond to a new kind of poetry concerned with 'a natural delineation of human passions, human characters, and human incidents' – one that dispensed with traditional narrative technique in favour of a concentration on emotional or psychological states.

This was way ahead of its time, and entailed the unreal expectation that the poetry-reading public re-educate itself. That couldn't happen overnight, and if in 1798 Wordsworth and Coleridge hoped that it would, they had changed their minds by 1815, by which time they had both received a good deal of criticism for what many regarded as the strangeness and obscurity of their work. It was with the benefit of that experience that Wordsworth observed that 'every author, as far as he is great and at the same time original, has had the task of creating the taste by which he is to be enjoyed: so has it been, so will it continue to be.'⁶ He was right. In due course, Lyrical Ballads changed completely the way in which people read and interpreted poetry. And though sales were not spectacular, they were sufficiently good for it to be enlarged in 1800 by a second volume (consisting of poems by Wordsworth only), and for revised editions to appear in 1802 and 1805.

Constituent poems are presented in the order in which they first appeared in Lyrical Ballads (1798) – not chronologically as is the case elsewhere in this anthology. Dates of composition and attribution are provided at the beginning of each work. Readers should bear in mind that this information was not available to readers of the first edition, which appeared anonymously (although the authors' identities were widely known in literary circles).

Lyrical Ballads, with A Few Other Poems.¹

Advertisement* (by Wordsworth,² composed June 1798)

It is the honourable characteristic of poetry that its materials are to be found in every subject which can interest the human mind. The evidence of this fact is to be sought not in the writings of critics, but in those of poets themselves.

The majority of the following poems are to be considered as experiments. They were written chiefly with a view to ascertain how far the language of conversation in the middle and lower classes of society is adapted to the purposes of poetic pleasure.

Readers accustomed to the gaudiness and inane phraseology of many modern writers,³ if they persist in reading this book to its conclusion, will perhaps frequently have to struggle with feelings of strangeness and awkwardness: they will look round for poetry, and will be induced to enquire by what species of courtesy these attempts can be permitted to assume that title. It is desirable that such readers, for their own sakes, should not suffer the solitary word ‘poetry’ (a word of very disputed meaning) to stand in the way of their gratification, but that while they are perusing this book, they should ask themselves if it contains a natural delineation of human passions, human characters and human incidents; and, if the answer be favourable to the author’s wishes, that they should consent to be pleased in spite of that most dreadful enemy to our pleasures: our own pre-established codes of decision.⁴

Readers of superior judgement may disapprove of the style in which many of these pieces are executed. It must be expected that many lines and phrases will not exactly suit their taste. It will perhaps appear to them that, wishing to avoid the prevalent fault of the day,⁵ the author has sometimes descended too low, and that many of his expressions are too familiar, and not of sufficient dignity. It is apprehended that the more conversant the reader is with our elder writers, and with those in modern times who have been the most successful in painting manners⁶ and passions,⁷ the fewer complaints of this kind will he have to make.

An accurate taste in poetry and in all the other arts, Sir Joshua Reynolds⁸ has observed, is an acquired talent which can only be produced by severe thought, and a long continued intercourse with the best models of composition. This is mentioned not with so ridiculous a purpose as to prevent the most inexperienced reader from judging for himself, but merely to temper the rashness of decision, and to suggest that if poetry be a subject on which much time has not been bestowed, the judgement may be erroneous, and that in many cases it necessarily will be so.

The tale of ‘Goody Blake and Harry Gill’ is founded on a well-authenticated fact which happened in Warwickshire.⁹ Of the other poems in the collection, it may be proper to say that they are either absolute inventions of the author, or facts which took place within his personal observation or that of his friends.

The poem of ‘The Thorn’, as the reader will soon discover, is not supposed to be spoken in the author’s own person: the character of the loquacious narrator will sufficiently show itself in the course of the story. ‘The Rime of the Ancyent Marinere’ was professedly written in imitation of the style, as well as of the spirit, of the elder poets. But with a few exceptions, the author believes that the language adopted in it has been equally intelligible for these three last centuries. The lines entitled ‘Expostulation and Reply’, and those which follow, arose out of conversation with a friend¹⁰ who was somewhat unreasonably attached to modern books of moral philosophy.

Notes

² Throughout this text of Lyrical Ballads, I have provided the reader with authorship details for each work. It should be borne in mind that the volume was published anonymously, so that its first readers were unaware not only of who wrote what, but of the fact that it contained the work of more than one person. Though by Wordsworth, the Advertisement and its ideas would have been worked out with Coleridge.

³ the gaudiness...writers based on Hugh Blair's attack on modern poetry in his Lectures on Rhetoric and Belles Lettres (1783): 'In after ages, when poetry became a regular art, studied for reputation and for gain, authors began to affect what they did not feel. Composing coolly in their closets, they endeavoured to imitate passion, rather than to express it' (ii 323).

⁴ pre-established codes of decision prejudices.

⁵ the prevalent fault of the day gaudy and inane phraseology.

⁶ manners in a letter of 1799, Wordsworth commends the appearance, in Burns's poetry, of 'manners connected with the permanent objects of nature, and partaking of the simplicity of those objects' (EY 255–6).

⁷ elder writers...passions Wordsworth probably has in mind Milton and Shakespeare ('elder writers'), and Burns, Cowper and Joanna Baillie

(‘those in modern times’).

⁸ Sir Joshua Reynolds (1723–92) was the most renowned portrait-painter of the age. His first discourse was delivered in 1769, and subsequent lectures became yearly fixtures at the Royal Academy. For further details see my Wordsworth’s Reading 1770–1799 (1993), p. 116.

⁹ It was a case history in a medical text, Erasmus Darwin’s Zoönomia (1794–6). Wordsworth borrowed it from his friend, Joseph Cottle, in early March 1798.

The Rime of the Ancyent Marinere, in seven parts (by Coleridge, composed November 1797–March 1798)¹

Argument

How a ship, having passed the line,² was driven by storms to the cold country towards the South Pole, and how from thence she made her course to the tropical latitude of the great Pacific Ocean; and of the strange things that befell, and in what manner the ancyent marinere came back to his own country.

I

It is an ancyent marinere,
And he stoppeth one of three:
‘By thy long grey beard and thy glittering eye
Now wherefore stoppest me?’

The bridegroom's doors are opened wide, 5
And I am next of kin;
The guests are met, the feast is set –
Mayst hear the merry din.'

But still he holds the wedding-guest:
'There was a ship', quoth he – 10
'Nay, if thou'st got a laughsome tale,
Marinere, come with me!'

He holds him with his skinny hand,
Quoth he, 'There was a ship –'
'Now get thee hence, thou grey-beard loon, 15
Or my staff shall make thee skip!'

He holds him with his glittering eye –
The wedding-guest stood still,
And listens like a three years' child:
The marinere hath his will.³ 20

The wedding-guest sat on a stone,
He cannot choose but hear;
And thus spake on that ancyeant man,
The bright-eyed marinere:

'The ship was cheered, the harbour cleared, 25
Merrily did we drop
Below the kirk, below the hill,
Below the lighthouse top.

The sun came up upon the left,
Out of the sea came he; 30
And he shone bright, and on the right
Went down into the sea.

Higher and higher every day,
Till over the mast at noon –'

The wedding-guest here beat his breast, 35
For he heard the loud bassoon.⁴

The bride hath paced into the hall,
Red as a rose is she;
Nodding their heads before her goes
The merry minstrelsy.⁵ 40

The wedding-guest he beat his breast,
Yet he cannot choose but hear;
And thus spake on that ancyent man,
The bright-eyed marinere.

‘Listen, stranger! Storm and wind, 45
A wind and tempest strong!
For days and weeks it played us freaks –
Like chaff we drove along.

Listen, stranger! Mist and snow,
And it grew wondrous cauld: 50
And ice mast-high came floating by
As green as emerauld.

And through the drifts⁶ the snowy clifts⁷
Did send a dismal sheen;
Ne shapes of men ne beasts we ken – 55
The ice was all between.

The ice was here, the ice was there,
The ice was all around;
It cracked and growled, and roared and howled
Like noises of a swound.⁸ 60

At length did cross an albatross,
Thorough the fog it came;
And an⁹ it were a Christian soul,¹⁰
We hailed it in God’s name.

The marineres gave it biscuit-worms,¹¹ 65
And round and round it flew:
The ice did split with a thunder-fit;
The helmsman steered us through.

And a good south wind sprung up behind,
The albatross did follow; 70
And every day, for food or play,
Came to the marineres' hollo!

In mist or cloud, on mast or shroud,
It perched for vespers¹² nine,
Whiles all the night, through fogsmoke white, 75
Glimmered the white moonshine.'

'God save thee, ancyent marinere,
From the fiends that plague thee thus!
Why look'st thou so?' 'With my crossbow
I shot the albatross.'¹³ 80

II

The sun came up upon the right,
Out of the sea came he;
And broad as a weft¹⁴ upon the left
Went down into the sea.

And the good south wind still blew behind, 85
But no sweet bird did follow,
Ne any day for food or play
Came to the marineres' hollo!

And I had done an hellish thing
And it would work 'em woe: 90
For all averred¹⁵ I had killed the bird
That made the breeze to blow.

Ne dim ne red, like God's own head
The glorious sun uprist:
Then all averred I had killed the bird 95
That brought the fog and mist.
"Twas right", said they, "such birds to slay,
That bring the fog and mist."

The breezes¹⁶ blew, the white foam flew,
The furrow followed free: 100
We were the first that ever burst
Into that silent sea.

Down dropt the breeze, the sails dropt down,
'Twas sad as sad could be,
And we did speak only to break 105
The silence of the sea.

All in a hot and copper sky
The bloody sun at noon
Right up above the mast did stand,
No bigger than the moon. 110

Day after day, day after day,
We stuck, ne breath ne motion,
As idle as a painted ship
Upon a painted ocean.

Water, water, everywhere, 115
And all the boards did shrink;
Water, water, everywhere,
Ne any drop to drink.

The very deeps did rot: oh Christ,
That ever this should be! 120
Yea, slimy things did crawl with legs
Upon the slimy sea.

About, about, in reel and rout
The death-fires danced at night;

The water, like a witch's oils, 125
Burnt green and blue and white.

And some in dreams assured were
Of the spirit that plagued us so;
Nine fathom deep he had followed us
From the land of mist and snow. 130

And every tongue, through utter drouth,¹⁷
Was withered at the root;
We could not speak, no more than if
We had been choked with soot.

Ah wel-a-day! what evil looks 135
Had I from old and young!
Instead of the cross the albatross
About my neck was hung.

III

I saw a something in the sky
No bigger than my fist; 140
At first it seemed a little speck
And then it seemed a mist;
It moved and moved, and took at last
A certain shape, I wist.¹⁸

A speck, a mist, a shape, I wist! 145
And still it nered and nered:
And an it dodged a water-sprite,
It plunged and tacked and veered.

With throat unslaked, with black lips baked,
Ne could we laugh, ne wail; 150
Then while through drouth all dumb they stood,
I bit my arm, and sucked the blood,
And cried, "A sail! A sail!"

With throat unslaked, with black lips baked,
Agape they heard me call: 155

Gramercy!¹⁹ they for joy did grin
And all at once their breath drew in
As they were drinking all.

She doth not tack from side to side
Hither to work us weal;²⁰ 160
Withouten wind, withouten tide
She steddies with upright keel.

The western wave was all aflame,
The day was well nigh done!
Almost upon the western wave 165
Rested the broad bright sun;
When that strange shape²¹ drove suddenly
Betwixt us and the sun.

And strait the sun was flecked with bars
(Heaven's Mother send us grace!), 170
As if through a dungeon-grate he peered
With broad and burning face.

Alas! thought I, and my heart beat loud,
How fast she neres and neres!
Are those her sails that glance in the sun 175
Like restless gossameres?

Are these her naked ribs, which flecked
The sun that did behind them peer?
And are these two all, all the crew,
That woman and her fleshless pheere?²² 180

His bones were black with many a crack,
All black and bare, I ween;
Jet black and bare, save where with rust

Of mouldy damps and charnel crust
They're patched with purple and green. 185

Her lips are red, her looks are free,
Her locks are yellow as gold;
Her skin is as white as leprosy,
And she is far liker death than he,
Her flesh makes the still air cold. 190

The naked hulk alongside came,
And the twain were playing dice;
"The game is done! I've won! I've won!"
Quoth she, and whistled thrice.

A gust of wind sterte up behind 195
And whistled through his bones;
Through the holes of his eyes and the hole of his mouth
Half-whistles and half-groans.

With never a whisper in the sea
Off darts the spectre-ship; 200

While clombe²³ above the eastern bar
The horned moon, with one bright star
Almost atween the tips.²⁴

One after one by the horned moon
(Listen, oh stranger, to me!) 205
Each turned his face with a ghastly pang
And cursed me with his ee.

Four times fifty living men,
With never a sigh or groan,
With heavy thump, a lifeless lump, 210
They dropped down one by one.

Their souls did from their bodies fly,
They fled to bliss or woe;

And every soul, it passed me by
Like the whiz of my crossbow.' 215

IV

'I fear thee, ancyent marinere,
I fear thy skinny hand;
And thou art long and lank and brown
As is the ribbed sea-sand.²⁵

I fear thee and thy glittering eye, 220
And thy skinny hand so brown –'
'Fear not, fear not, thou wedding-guest,
This body dropt not down.

Alone, alone, all all alone,
Alone on the wide wide sea; 225
And Christ would take no pity on
My soul in agony.

The many men so beautiful,
And they all dead did lie!
And a million million slimy things 230
Lived on – and so did I.

I looked upon the rotting sea
And drew my eyes away;
I looked upon the eldritch²⁶ deck,
And there the dead men lay. 235

I looked to heaven and tried to pray
But or ever a prayer had gusht,
A wicked whisper came and made
My heart as dry as dust.

I closed my lids and kept them close 240
Till the balls like pulses beat;
For the sky and the sea, and the sea and the sky

Lay like a load on my weary eye,
And the dead were at my feet.

The cold sweat melted from their limbs, 245
Ne rot, ne reek did they;
The look with which they looked on me
Had never passed away.

An orphan's curse would drag to hell
A spirit from on high; 250
But oh! more horrible than that
Is the curse in a dead man's eye!
Seven days, seven nights, I saw that curse
And yet I could not die.

The moving moon went up the sky 255
And nowhere did abide;
Softly she was going up
And a star or two beside;

Her beams bemoaned the sultry main
Like morning frosts yspread; 260
But where the ship's huge shadow lay
The charmed²⁷ water burnt away
A still and awful red.

Beyond the shadow of the ship
I watched the water-snakes; 265
They moved in tracks of shining white,
And when they reared, the elfish light
Fell off in hoary flakes.

Within the shadow of the ship
I watched their rich attire: 270
Blue, glossy green, and velvet black,
They coiled and swam, and every track
Was a flash of golden fire.

Oh happy living things! no tongue
Their beauty might declare: 275
A spring of love gusht from my heart
And I blessed them unaware!
Sure my kind saint took pity on me,
And I blessed them unaware.

The self-same moment I could pray, 280
And from my neck so free
The albatross fell off and sank
Like lead into the sea.

V

Oh sleep, it is a gentle thing
Beloved from pole to pole! 285
To Mary Queen²⁸ the praise be yeven;²⁹
She sent the gentle sleep from heaven
That slid into my soul.

The silly³⁰ buckets on the deck
That had so long remained, 290
I dreamt that they were filled with dew
And when I awoke it rained.

My lips were wet, my throat was cold,
My garments all were dank;
Sure I had drunken in my dreams 295
And still my body drank.

I moved and could not feel my limbs,
I was so light, almost
I thought that I had died in sleep
And was a blessed ghost. 300

The roaring wind – it roared far off,
It did not come anear;

But with its sound it shook the sails
That were so thin and sere.³¹

The upper air bursts into life 305
And a hundred fire-flags sheen,³²
To and fro they are hurried about;
And to and fro, and in and out
The stars dance on between.³³

The coming wind doth roar more loud, 310
The sails do sigh like sedge;
The rain pours down from one black cloud,
And the moon is at its edge.

Hark, hark! The thick black cloud is cleft
And the moon is at its side; 315
Like waters shot from some high crag,
The lightning falls with never a jag,
A river steep and wide.

The strong wind reached the ship, it roared
And dropped down like a stone! 320
Beneath the lightning and the moon
The dead men gave a groan.

They groaned, they stirred, they all uprose,
Ne spake, ne moved their eyes;
It had been strange, even in a dream, 325
To have seen those dead men rise.

The helmsman steered, the ship moved on,
Yet never a breeze up-blew;
The marineres all 'gan work the ropes
Where they were wont to do; 330
They raised their limbs like lifeless tools –
We were a ghastly crew.

The body of my brother's son
 Stood by me, knee to knee;
The body and I pulled at one rope 335
 But he said nought to me –
And I quaked to think of my own voice,
 How frightful it would be!

The daylight dawned, they dropped their arms
 And clustered round the mast; 340
Sweet sounds rose slowly through their mouths
 And from their bodies passed.

Around, around, flew each sweet sound
 Then darted to the sun;
Slowly the sounds came back again, 345
 Now mixed, now one by one.

Sometimes a-dropping from the sky
 I heard the lavrock³⁴ sing;
Sometimes all little birds that are,
How they seemed to fill the sea and air 350
 With their sweet jargoning!³⁵

And now 'twas like all instruments,
 Now like a lonely flute,
And now it is an angel's song
 That makes the heavens be mute. 355

It ceased, yet still the sails made on
 A pleasant noise till noon,
A noise like of a hidden brook
 In the leafy month of June,
That to the sleeping woods all night 360
 Singeth a quiet tune –

Listen, oh listen, thou wedding-guest!
 'Marinere, thou hast thy will!

For that which comes out of thine eye doth make
My body and soul to be still.' 365

'Never sadder tale was told
To a man of woman born;
Sadder and wiser thou wedding-guest
Thou'lt rise tomorrow morn!

Never sadder tale was heard 370
By a man of woman born;
The marineres all returned to work
As silent as beforne.

The marineres all 'gan pull the ropes,
But look at me they n'old; 36 375
Thought I, I am as thin as air –
They cannot me behold.

Till noon we silently sailed on,
Yet never a breeze did breathe;
Slowly and smoothly went the ship, 380
Moved onward from beneath.

Under the keel nine fathom deep,
From the land of mist and snow,
The spirit slid, and it was he
That made the ship to go. 385
The sails at noon left off their tune
And the ship stood still also.

The sun right up above the mast
Had fixed her to the ocean;
But in a minute she 'gan stir 390
With a short uneasy motion –
Backwards and forwards half her length,
With a short uneasy motion.

Then like a pawing horse let go,
She made a sudden bound; 395

It flung the blood into my head,
And I fell into a swoond.

How long in that same fit I lay,
I have not to declare;
But ere my living life returned, 400
I heard and in my soul discerned
Two voices in the air.

“Is it he?” quoth one, “Is this the man?
By him who died on cross,
With his cruel bow he laid full low 405
The harmless albatross.

The spirit who bideth by himself
In the land of mist and snow,
He loved the bird that loved the man
Who shot him with his bow.” 410

The other was a softer voice,
As soft as honey-dew;
Quoth he, “The man hath penance done
And penance more will do.” ’

VI

FIRST VOICE

But tell me, tell me! speak again, 415
Thy soft response renewing –
What makes that ship drive on so fast?
What is the ocean doing?

SECOND VOICE

Still as a slave before his lord,
The ocean hath no blast; 420
His great bright eye most silently
Up to the moon is cast –

If he may know which way to go,
For she guides him smooth or grim.
See, brother, see – how graciously 425
She looketh down on him!

FIRST VOICE

But why drives on that ship so fast
Withouten wave or wind?

SECOND VOICE

The air is cut away before
And closes from behind. 430

Fly, brother, fly! more high, more high,
Or we shall be belated;
For slow and slow that ship will go
When the marinere's trance is abated.

'I woke, and we were sailing on 435
As in a gentle weather;
'Twas night, calm night, the moon was high –
The dead men stood together.

All stood together on the deck,
For a charnel-dungeon³⁷ fitter; 440
All fixed on me their stony eyes
That in the moon did glitter.

The pang, the curse, with which they died
Had never passed away;
I could not draw my een from theirs 445
Ne turn them up to pray.

And in its time the spell was snapt
And I could move my een;
I looked far forth but little saw
Of what might else be seen – 450

Like one that on a lonely road
Doth walk in fear and dread,
And having once turned round walks on
And turns no more his head,
Because he knows a frightful fiend 455
Doth close behind him tread.

But soon there breathed a wind on me,
Ne sound ne motion made;
Its path was not upon the sea,
In ripple or in shade. 460

It raised my hair, it fanned my cheek,
Like a meadow-gale of spring –
It mingled strangely with my fears,
Yet it felt like a welcoming.

Swiftly, swiftly flew the ship, 465
Yet she sailed softly too;
Sweetly, sweetly blew the breeze –
On me alone it blew.

Oh dream of joy! Is this indeed
The lighthouse top I see? 470
Is this the hill? Is this the kirk?
Is this mine own countrée?

We drifted o'er the harbour-bar, 38
And I with sobs did pray,
“Oh let me be awake, my God! 475
Or let me sleep alway!”

The harbour-bay was clear as glass, 39
So smoothly it was strewn! 40
And on the bay the moonlight lay
And the shadow of the moon. 480

The moonlight bay was white all o'er
Till rising from the same,
Full many shapes that shadows were
Like as of torches came.

A little distance from the prow 485
Those dark red shadows were;
But soon I saw that my own flesh
Was red as in a glare.

I turned my head in fear and dread
And by the holy rood, 41 490
The bodies had advanced, and now
Before the mast they stood.

They lifted up their stiff right arms,
They held them strait and tight;
And each right arm burnt like a torch, 495
A torch that's borne upright.
Their stony eyeballs glittered on
In the red and smoky light.

I prayed and turned my head away
Forth looking as before; 500
There was no breeze upon the bay,
No wave against the shore.

The rock shone bright, the kirk no less
That stands above the rock;
The moonlight steeped in silentness 505
The steady weathercock.

And the bay was white with silent light,
Till rising from the same
Full many shapes that shadows were
In crimson colours came. 510

A little distance from the prow
Those crimson shadows were;

I turned my eyes upon the deck –
Oh Christ! what saw I there?

Each corse lay flat, lifeless and flat, 515
And by the holy rood

A man all light, a seraph-man⁴²
On every corse there stood.

This seraph-band, each waved his hand –
It was a heavenly sight! 520
They stood as signals to the land,
Each one a lovely light;

This seraph-band, each waved his hand,
No voice did they impart –
No voice, but oh! the silence sank 525
Like music on my heart.

Eftsones I heard the dash of oars,
I heard the pilot's cheer;
My head was turned perforce away
And I saw a boat appear. 530

Then vanished all the lovely lights,
The bodies rose anew;
With silent pace each to his place
Came back the ghastly crew.
The wind that shade nor motion made, 535
On me alone it blew.

The pilot and the pilot's boy,
I heard them coming fast –
Dear Lord in heaven! it was a joy
The dead men could not blast. 540

I saw a third, I heard his voice –
It is the hermit good!⁴³
He singeth loud his godly hymns

That he makes in the wood.
He'll shrieve my soul, he'll wash away 545
The albatross's blood.

VII

This hermit good lives in that wood
Which slopes down to the sea;
How loudly his sweet voice he rears!
He loves to talk with marineres 550
That come from a far countrée.

He kneels at morn, and noon and eve,
He hath a cushion plump;
It is the moss that wholly hides
The rotted old oak-stump. 555

The skiff-boat nered, I heard them talk:
“Why, this is strange, I trow!
Where are those lights so many and fair,
That signal made but now?”

“Strange, by my faith!” the hermit said, 560
“And they answered not our cheer!
The planks look warped, and see those sails,
How thin they are and sere!
I never saw aught like to them
Unless perchance it were 565

The skeletons of leaves that lag
My forest brook along,
When the ivy-tod⁴⁴ is heavy with snow
And the owlet whoops to the wolf below
That eats the she-wolf's young.” 570

“Dear Lord! it has a fiendish look,”
The pilot made reply,

“I am a-feared.” “Push on, push on!”
Said the hermit cheerily.

The boat came closer to the ship 575
But I ne spake ne stirred;
The boat came close beneath the ship
And strait a sound was heard!

Under the water it rumbled on,
Still louder and more dread; 580
It reached the ship, it split the bay –
The ship went down like lead.

Stunned by that loud and dreadful sound
Which sky and ocean smote,
Like one that hath been seven days drowned, 585
My body lay afloat;
But swift as dreams, myself I found
Within the pilot’s boat.

Upon the whirl where sank the ship
The boat spun round and round, 590
And all was still, save that the hill
Was telling of the sound.

I moved my lips – the pilot shrieked
And fell down in a fit;
The holy hermit raised his eyes 595
And prayed where he did sit.

I took the oars; the pilot’s boy,
Who now doth crazy go,
Laughed loud and long, and all the while
His eyes went to and fro: 600
“Ha! ha!” quoth he, “full plain I see
The Devil knows how to row.”

And now all in my own countrée
I stood on the firm land!

The hermit stepped forth from the boat, 605
And scarcely he could stand.

“Oh shrieve me, shrieve me, holy man!”

The hermit crossed his brow.

“Say quick,” quoth he, “I bid thee say
What manner man art thou?” 610

Forthwith this frame of mine was wrenched
With a woeful agony,
Which forced me to begin my tale –
And then it left me free.

Since then, at an uncertain hour, 615
Now oft-times and now fewer,
That anguish comes and makes me tell
My ghastly aventure.

I pass, like night, from land to land,
I have strange power of speech; 620
The moment that his face I see
I know the man that must hear me –
To him my tale I teach.

What loud uproar bursts from that door!
The wedding-guests are there; 625
But in the garden bower the bride
And bridemaids singing are;
And hark, the little vesper bell⁴⁵
Which biddeth me to prayer.

Oh wedding-guest! this soul hath been 630
Alone on a wide wide sea;
So lonely ’twas, that God himself
Scarce seemed there to be.

Oh sweeter than the marriage-feast,
’Tis sweeter far to me 635

To walk together to the kirk
With a goodly company!

To walk together to the kirk
And all together pray,
While each to his great Father bends, 640
Old men, and babes, and loving friends,
And youths and maidens gay.

Farewell, farewell! but this I tell
To thee, thou wedding-guest!
He prayeth well who loveth well 645
Both man and bird and beast.

He prayeth best who loveth best
All things both great and small,
For the dear God who loveth us,
He made and loveth all.⁴⁶ 650

The marinere, whose eye is bright,
Whose beard with age is hoar,
Is gone; and now the wedding-guest
Turned from the bridegroom's door.

He went like one that hath been stunned 655
And is of sense forlorn:
A sadder and a wiser man⁴⁷
He rose the morrow morn.

The Rime of the Ancyent Marinere

¹ For circumstances of composition see Fenwick Note to 'We are Seven', p. 596, below. From 1800 to 1817 this poem was subtitled 'A Poet's Reverie'.

² line equator.

3 Lines 19–20 are by Wordsworth; see p. 596 below.

4 the loud bassoon Coleridge's friend, Thomas Poole, had given a bassoon to the church at Nether Stowey.

5 before her...minstrelsy cf. Chaucer, Squire's Tale 268: 'Toforn hym gooth the loude mynstralcye.'

6 drifts floating ice.

7 clifts clefts.

8 swound swoon.

9 an as if.

10 a Christian soul i.e. a human being.

11 This detail was removed from later versions of the poem.

12 vespers evenings.

13 No explanation for the action is given; it was suggested by Wordsworth after reading Shelvocke's Voyage Round the World (1726): 'we had continual squalls of sleet, snow and rain, and the heavens were perpetually hid from us by gloomy dismal clouds. In short, one would think it impossible that any thing living could subsist in so rigid a climate; and, indeed, we all observed, that we had not had the sight of one fish of any kind, since we were come to the southward of the straits of le Mair, nor one seabird, except a disconsolate black albatross, who accompanied us for several days, hovering about us as if he had lost himself, till Hatley (my second Captain), observing, in one of his melancholy fits, that this bird was always hovering near us, imagined, from his colour, that it might be some ill omen. That which, I suppose, induced him the more to encourage his superstition, was the continued series of contrary tempestuous winds, which had oppressed us ever since we had got into this sea. But be that as it would, he, after some fruitless attempts, at length, shot the albatross, not doubting (perhaps) that we should have a fair wind after it. I must own that this navigation is truly melancholy, and was the more so to us, who were by ourselves without a companion, which would have somewhat diverted our thoughts from the reflection of being in such a remote part of the world' (pp. 72–3). In 1804 Coleridge witnessed the shooting of a hawk during his sea voyage to Malta, and commented in his notebook: 'Poor hawk! Oh strange lust of murder in man! It is not cruelty; it is mere non-feeling from non-thinking' (Notebooks ii 2090).

14 weft signal-flag.

15 averred maintained that.

16 breezes trade winds.

17 drouth dryness.

18 wist was aware of.

19 Gramercy! mercy on us!

20 weal harm.

21 strange shape According to Wordsworth, the ghost-ship was suggested by a dream of Coleridge's friend and neighbour John Cruikshank, who is said to have seen 'a skeleton ship with figures in it'.

22 pheere companion.

23 clombe climbed; still used in everyday speech at the time of writing.

24 The horned moon...tips In a copy of Lyrical Ballads (1798) now at Trinity College, Cambridge, Coleridge explained: 'It is a common superstition among sailors that something evil is about to happen whenever a star dogs the moon.’

25 And thou art long...sea-sand These two lines are by Wordsworth (see p. 721 n. 22).

26 eldritch ghostly.

27 charmed dead calm.

28 Mary Queen the Virgin Mary.

29 yeven given.

30 silly plain, rustic, homely.

31 sere worn.

32 sheen shining.

33 The upper air...between the aurora borealis, which also features in Wordsworth’s ‘The Complaint of a Forsaken Indian Woman’.

34 lavrock lark.

35 jargoning birdsong.

36 n’old would not.

37 charnel-dungeon a dungeon containing dead bodies.

38 harbour-bar bank of silt across the mouth of the harbour.

39 The five stanzas from here to line 502 were omitted from later versions of the poem; they describe the bizarre sight of the resurrected sailors lifting their ‘stiff right arms’ burning brightly ‘like a torch’.

Accusations of strangeness from reviewers, and perhaps even distaste from Wordsworth, may have led Coleridge to remove them.

40 strewn levelled.

41 rood cross.

42 seraph-man The seraphim were the highest order of angels, whose purpose was to glow with the love of God.

43 It is the hermit good! J. C. C. Mays compares the hermit with Wordsworth's Pedlar (see p. 444).

44 ivy-tod ivy-bush.

45 vesper bell bell used to summon the congregation for vespers, evensong.

46 For the dear God...all The failure of the moral satisfactorily to account for the events of the poem, and the mariner's continuing penance, has been noted by many critics, not least Coleridge himself, as Henry Nelson Coleridge recalled: 'Mrs Barbauld, meaning to be complimentary, told our poet, that she thought The Ancient Mariner very beautiful, but that it had the fault of containing no moral. "Nay, madam," replied the poet, "if I may be permitted to say so, the only fault in the poem is that there is too much! In a work of such pure imagination I ought not to have stopped to give reasons for things, or inculcate humanity to beasts"' (CC Table Talk i 273 n. 7; see also ii 272–3).

47 A sadder and a wiser man Wordsworth's 'The Ruined Cottage', which Coleridge would have known by the time he wrote this poem, originally ended:

I turned to the old man and said, 'My friend,

Your words have consecrated many things
And for the tale which you have told I think
I am a better and a wiser man.'

The Foster-Mother's Tale: A Dramatic Fragment (by Coleridge, extracted from Osorio, composed April–September 1797)¹

FOSTER-MOTHER. I never saw the man whom you describe.

MARIA. 'Tis strange! He spake of you familiarly
As mine and Albert's common foster-mother.

FOSTER-MOTHER. Now blessings on the man, whoe'er he be,
That joined your names with mine! Oh my sweet lady, 5
As often as I think of those dear times

When you two little ones would stand at eve
On each side of my chair, and make me learn
All you had learnt in the day; and how to talk
In gentle phrase, then bid me sing to you – 10

'Tis more like heaven to come than what has been!

MARIA. Oh my dear mother! This strange man has left me
Troubled with wilder fancies than the moon
Breeds in the lovesick maid who gazes at it,
Till, lost in inward vision, with wet eye 15

She gazes idly! But that entrance,² Mother!

FOSTER-MOTHER. Can no one hear? It is a perilous tale.

MARIA. No one.

FOSTER-MOTHER. My husband's father told it me,
Poor old Leoni! (Angels rest his soul!)
He was a woodman, and could fell and saw 20

With lusty³ arm. You know that huge round beam
Which props the hanging wall of the old chapel?
Beneath that tree, while yet it was a tree,
He found a baby wrapped in mosses lined

With thistle-beards⁴ and such small locks of wool 25
As hang on brambles. Well, he brought him home
And reared him at the then Lord Velez's cost.
And so the babe grew up a pretty boy –
A pretty boy, but most unteachable,
And never learnt a prayer, nor told a bead,⁵ 30
But knew the names of birds, and mocked⁶ their notes,
And whistled as he were a bird himself.
And all the autumn 'twas his only play
To get the seeds of wild-flowers, and to plant them
With earth and water on the stumps of trees. 35
A friar who gathered simples⁷ in the wood,
A grey-haired man, he loved this little boy,
The boy loved him. And when the friar taught him,
He soon could write with the pen, and from that time
Lived chiefly at the convent or the castle. 40
So he became a very learned youth.
But oh, poor wretch – he read, and read, and read,
Till his brain turned! And ere his twentieth year
He had unlawful thoughts of many things,
And though he prayed, he never loved to pray 45
With holy men, nor in a holy place.
But yet his speech – it was so soft and sweet,
The late Lord Velez ne'er was wearied with him.
And once, as by the north side of the chapel
They stood together, chained in deep discourse, 50
The earth heaved under them with such a groan
That the wall tottered, and had well-nigh fallen
Right on their heads. My Lord was sorely frightened;
A fever seized him, and he made confession
Of all the heretical and lawless talk 55
Which brought this judgement: so the youth was seized
And cast into that hole. My husband's father
Sobbed like a child – it almost broke his heart.

And once as he was working in the cellar,
 He heard a voice distinctly: 'twas the youth's, 60
 Who sung a doleful song about green fields,
 How sweet it were on lake or wild savannah⁸
 To hunt for food and be a naked man,⁹
 And wander up and down at liberty.
 He always doted on the youth and now 65
 His love grew desperate; and, defying death,
 He made that cunning entrance I described –
 And the young man escaped.
 MARIA. 'Tis a sweet tale,
 Such as would lull a listening child to sleep,
 His rosy face besoiled with unwiped tears. 70
 And what became of him?
 FOSTER-MOTHER. He went on shipboard
 With those bold voyagers who made discovery
 Of golden lands.¹⁰ Leoni's younger brother
 Went likewise, and when he returned to Spain,
 He told Leoni that the poor mad youth, 75
 Soon after they arrived in that new world,
 In spite of his dissuasion, seized a boat,
 And all alone set sail by silent moonlight
 Up a great river, great as any sea,
 And ne'er was heard of more. But 'tis supposed 80
 He lived and died among the savage men.

The Foster-Mother's Tale

¹ In editions of Lyrical Ballads after 1798, Coleridge added the subtitle 'A Narration in Dramatic Blank Verse', omitting ll. 4–15, 69–71.

² entrance the entrance to a dungeon, the existence of which has to be explained by the play.

3 lusty strong.

4 thistle-beards the down or pappus which crowns the ‘seeds’ of the thistle, and by which they are carried along by the wind.

5 told a bead i.e. counted a bead on a rosary.

6 mocked imitated.

7 simples medicinal herbs.

8 savannah treeless plain in tropical America.

9 naked man i.e. savage.

10 golden lands South and Central America.

Lines left upon a seat in a Yew-Tree *which stands near the Lake of Esthwaite, on a desolate part of the shore, yet commanding a beautiful prospect*¹ (by Wordsworth, composed April–May 1797)

Nay, traveller, rest! This lonely yetw-ree stands
Far from all human dwelling. What if here
No sparkling rivulet spread the verdant herb?²
What if these barren boughs the bee not loves?
Yet, if the wind breathe soft, the curling waves 5
That break against the shore shall lull thy mind,
By one soft impulse saved from vacancy.
———Who he was
That piled these stones, and with the mossy sod

First covered o'er, and taught this aged tree, 10
Now wild, to bend its arms in circling shade,³
I well remember. He was one who owned
No common soul. In youth by genius nursed,
And big with⁴ lofty views, he to the world
Went forth, pure in his heart, against the taint 15
Of dissolute tongues, 'gainst jealousy and hate
And scorn, against all enemies prepared –
All but neglect. And so his spirit damped
At once, with rash disdain he turned away,
And with the food of pride sustained his soul 20
In solitude. Stranger, these gloomy boughs
Had charms for him⁵ – and here he loved to sit,
His only visitants a straggling sheep,
The stonechat or the glancing sandpiper;
And on these barren rocks, with juniper 25
And heath and thistle thinly sprinkled o'er,
Fixing his downward eye, he many an hour
A morbid pleasure nourished, tracing here
An emblem of his own unfruitful life.
And lifting up his head, he then would gaze 30
On the more distant scene – how lovely 'tis
Thou seest – and he would gaze till it became Far lovelier, and his heart could not sustain
The beauty still more beauteous. Nor, that time,
Would he forget those beings to whose minds, 35
Warm from the labours of benevolence,
The world, and man himself, appeared a scene
Of kindred loveliness: then he would sigh
With mournful joy, to think that others felt
What he must never feel. And so, lost man, 40
On visionary views would fancy feed,
Till his eye streamed with tears. In this deep vale
He died, this seat his only monument.

If thou be one whose heart the holy forms

Of young imagination have kept pure, 45
Stranger, henceforth be warned – and know that pride,
Howe'er disguised in its own majesty,
Is littleness; that he who feels contempt
For any living thing hath faculties
Which he has never used; that thought with him 50
Is in its infancy. The man whose eye
Is ever on himself doth look on one
The least of nature's works – one who might move
The wise man to that scorn which wisdom holds
Unlawful ever. Oh be wiser thou! 55
Instructed that true knowledge leads to love,
True dignity abides with him alone
Who, in the silent hour of inward thought,
Can still suspect, and still revere himself,
In lowliness of heart. 60

Lines left upon a seat in a Yew-Tree

1 Wordsworth had in mind a particular place near Esthwaite Water; the solitary he describes is partly based on the Revd William Braithwaite, who built a yew-tree seat there. Charles Lamb heard this poem read (probably by Wordsworth) when he visited Nether Stowey in early July 1797, and afterwards asked Coleridge to send him a copy, saying: 'But above all, that Inscription! – it will recall to me the tones of all your voices.'

2 spread the verdant herb help the grass to grow.

3 to bend...shade In his Unpublished Tour Wordsworth recalled how 'the boughs had been trained to bend round the seat and almost embrace the person who might occupy the seat within, allowing only an opening for the beautiful landscape' (Owen and Smyser ii 336).

4 big with full of.

⁵ Had charms for him an echo of Charlotte Smith's Sonnet XII. Written on the Sea Shore 7: 'But the wild gloomy scene has charms for me.'

The Nightingale; A Conversational Poem, written in April 1798 (by Coleridge, composed April–May 1798)

No cloud, no relic of the sunken day
Distinguishes the west,¹ no long thin slip
Of sullen² light, no obscure trembling hues.
Come, we will rest on this old mossy bridge.
You see the glimmer of the stream beneath 5
But hear no murmuring: it flows silently
O'er its soft bed of verdure. All is still,
A balmy night, and though the stars be dim
Yet let us think upon the vernal showers
That gladden the green earth, and we shall find 10
A pleasure in the dimness of the stars.
And hark, the nightingale begins its song –
'Most musical, most melancholy' bird!³
A melancholy bird? Oh idle thought!
In nature there is nothing melancholy. 15
 But some night-wandering man whose heart was pierced
With the remembrance of a grievous wrong
Or slow distemper⁴ or neglected love
(And so, poor wretch, filled all things with himself
And made all gentle sounds tell back the tale 20
Of his own sorrows) – he, and such as he,
First named these notes a melancholy strain,
And many a poet echoes the conceit⁵ –
Poet who hath been building up the rhyme
When he had better far have stretched his limbs 25

Beside a brook in mossy forest-dell⁶
By sun or moonlight, to the influxes⁷
Of shapes and sounds and shifting elements
Surrendering his whole spirit, of his song
And of his fame forgetful! So his fame 30
Should share in nature's immortality
(A venerable thing!), and so his song
Should make all nature lovelier, and itself
Be loved, like nature! But 'twill not be so;
And youths and maidens most poetical⁸ 35
Who lose the deep'ning twilights of the spring
In ballrooms and hot theatres, they still,
Full of meek sympathy, must heave their sighs
O'er Philomela's⁹ pity-pleading strains.

My friend, and my friend's sister,¹⁰ we have learnt 40
A different lore; we may not thus profane
Nature's sweet voices always full of love
And joyance! 'Tis the merry nightingale
That crowds and hurries and precipitates
With fast thick warble his¹¹ delicious notes, 45
As he were fearful that an April night
Would be too short for him to utter forth
His love-chant, and disburden his full soul
Of all its music! And I know a grove
Of large extent, hard by a castle huge¹² 50
Which the great lord inhabits not – and so
This grove is wild with tangling underwood,
And the trim walks are broken up, and grass,
Thin grass and king-cups grow within the paths.
But never elsewhere in one place I knew 55
So many nightingales. And far and near
In wood and thicket over the wide grove,
They answer and provoke each other's songs

With skirmish and capricious passagings,¹³
And murmurs musical and swift jug jug 60
And one low piping sound more sweet than all,
Stirring the air with such an harmony,
That should you close your eyes, you might almost Forget it was not day. On moonlight bushes
Whose dewy leaflets are but half-disclosed, 65
You may perchance behold them on the twigs,
Their bright, bright eyes, their eyes both bright and full,
Glist'ning, while many a glow-worm in the shade
Lights up her love-torch.¹⁴

A most gentle maid¹⁵
Who dwelleth in her hospitable home 70
Hard by the castle, and at latest eve
(Even like a lady vowed and dedicate
To something more than nature in the grove)
Glides through the pathways. She knows all their notes,
That gentle maid, and oft, a moment's space, 75
What time the moon was lost behind a cloud,
Hath heard a pause of silence; till the moon
Emerging hath awakened earth and sky
With one sensation, and those wakeful birds
Have all burst forth in choral minstrelsy, 80
As if one quick and sudden gale had swept
An hundred airy harps!¹⁶ And she hath watched
Many a nightingale perch giddily
On blossom's twig still swinging from the breeze,
And to that motion tune his wanton song, 85
Like tipsy joy that reels with tossing head.

Farewell, oh warbler, till tomorrow eve!
And you, my friends – farewell, a short farewell!
We have been loitering long and pleasantly,
And now for our dear homes. That strain again! 90
Full fain it would delay me! My dear babe¹⁷

Who, capable of no articulate sound,
 Mars all things with his imitative lisp –
 How he would place his hand beside his ear,
 His little hand, the small forefinger up, 95
 And bid us listen! And I deem it wise
 To make him nature's playmate. He knows well
 The evening star; and once, when he awoke
 In most distressful mood (some inward pain
 Had made up that strange thing, an infant's dream) 100
 I hurried with him to our orchard-plot
 And he beholds the moon, and hushed at once
 Suspends his sobs and laughs most silently,
 While his fair eyes that swam with undropped tears
 Did glitter in the yellow moonbeam! Well, 105
 It is a father's tale. But if that Heaven
 Should give me life, his childhood shall grow up
 Familiar with these songs, that with the night
 He may associate joy. Once more farewell,
 Sweet nightingale! Once more, my friends, farewell! 110

The Nightingale

1 the west The sun sets in the west.

2 sullen dim.

3 'Most musical, most melancholy' bird Milton, Il Penseroso 62. 'This passage in Milton possesses an excellence far superior to that of mere description: it is spoken in the character of the melancholy man, and has therefore a dramatic propriety. The author makes this remark to rescue himself from the charge of having alluded with levity to a line in Milton – a charge than which none could be more painful to him, except perhaps that of having ridiculed his Bible' (Coleridge's note).

4 distemper depression.

5 conceit thought, fancy.

6 stretched his limbs...forest-dell cf. Gray, Elegy 103: 'His listless length at noontide would he stretch, / And pore upon the brook that babbles by.'

7 influxes perceptions entering the mind.

8 poetical immersed in poetical conventions.

9 Philomela Most poets of the time identified the nightingale with Philomela, raped by her brother-in-law, Tereus, King of Thrace. When she revealed what had happened to her sister, she was saved from his rage by being turned into a nightingale.

10 My friend, and my friend's sister William and Dorothy Wordsworth.

11 his Despite the traditional identification of the nightingale with Philomela, Coleridge is technically correct; male nightingales sing as part of the courtship ritual.

12 a castle huge Coleridge probably has in mind Enmore Castle, home of Lord Egmont. It was demolished in 1834.

13 passagings of music.

14 Lights up her love-torch technically correct; the female glow-worm emits a green light to attract males.

15 A most gentle maid Various real-life counterparts have been suggested, including Dorothy Wordsworth and Ellen Cruikshank, whose father was agent to the Earl of Egmont.

16 airy harps i.e. Aeolian harps.

¹⁷ My dear babe Hartley Coleridge. In a notebook entry for 1797, Coleridge describes how Hartley ‘fell down and hurt himself. I caught him up crying and screaming, and ran out of doors with him. The moon caught his eye, he ceased crying immediately, and his eyes and the tears in them – how they glittered in the moonlight!’ (Notebooks i 219).

The Female Vagrant* (by Wordsworth, derived from ‘Salisbury Plain’, initially composed late summer 1793 and revised for inclusion in Lyrical Ballads, 1798)

‘By Derwent’s side¹ my father’s cottage stood’,
The woman thus her artless story told,
‘One field, a flock, and what the neighbouring flood
Supplied, to him were more than mines of gold.
Light was my sleep, my days in transport² rolled; 5
With thoughtless joy I stretched along the shore
My father’s nets, or watched (when from the fold
High o’er the cliffs I led my fleecy store),³
A dizzy depth below, his boat and twinkling oar.
My father was a good and pious man, 10
An honest man by honest parents bred,
And I believe that, soon as I began
To lisp, he made me kneel beside my bed,
And in his hearing there my prayers I said;
And afterwards, by my good father taught, 15
I read, and loved the books in which I read –
For books in every neighbouring house I sought,
And nothing to my mind a sweeter pleasure brought.

Can I forget what charms did once adorn
My garden, stored with peas and mint and thyme, 20

And rose and lily for the Sabbath morn?
The Sabbath bells, and their delightful chime;
The gambols and wild freaks at shearing time;
My hen's rich nest through long grass scarce espied;
The cowslip-gathering at May's dewy prime; 25
The swans that, when I sought the waterside,
From far to meet me came, spreading their snowy pride.

The staff I yet remember, which upbore
The bending body of my active sire;
His seat beneath the honeyed sycamore 30
When the bees hummed, and chair by winter fire;
When market-morning came, the neat attire
With which, though bent on haste, myself I decked;
My watchful dog, whose starts of furious ire
When stranger passed, so often I have checked; 35
The redbreast known for years, which at my casement⁴ pecked.

The suns of twenty summers danced along –
Ah, little marked, how fast they rolled away!
Then rose a mansion proud our woods among,
And cottage after cottage owned its sway;⁵ 40
No joy to see a neighbouring house, or stray
Through pastures not his own, the master took.
My father dared his greedy wish gainsay:
He loved his old hereditary nook,
And ill could I the thought of such sad parting brook. 45

But when he had refused the proffered gold,
To cruel injuries he became a prey –
Sore traversed⁶ in whate'er he bought and sold.
His troubles grew upon him day by day
Till all his substance fell into decay: 50
His little range of water was denied,⁷
All but the bed where his old body lay,

All, all was seized, and weeping side by side
We sought a home where we uninjured might abide.

Can I forget that miserable hour 55
When from the last hilltop my sire surveyed,
Peering above the trees, the steeple tower
That on his marriage-day sweet music made?
Till then he hoped his bones might there be laid
Close by my mother in their native bowers. 60
Bidding me trust in God, he stood and prayed;
I could not pray – through tears that fell in showers
Glimmered our dear loved home: alas, no longer ours!

There was a youth whom I had loved so long
That when I loved him not I cannot say. 65
Mid the green mountains many and many a song
We two had sung like little birds in May.
When we began to tire of childish play
We seemed still more and more to prize each other:
We talked of marriage and our marriage-day, 70
And I in truth did love him like a brother,
For never could I hope to meet with such another.

His father said that to a distant town
He must repair to ply the artist's ⁸ trade:
What tears of bitter grief till then unknown! 75
What tender vows our last sad kiss delayed!
To him we turned – we had no other aid.
Like one revived, upon his neck I wept,
And her whom he had loved in joy, he said
He well could love in grief: his faith he kept, 80
And in a quiet home once more my father slept.

Four years each day with daily bread was blessed,
By constant toil and constant prayer supplied.
Three lovely infants lay upon my breast,
And often, viewing their sweet smiles, I sighed 85

And knew not why. My happy father died
When sad distress reduced the children's meal –
Thrice happy, that from him the grave did hide
The empty loom,⁹ cold hearth and silent wheel,¹⁰
And tears that flowed for ills which patience could not heal. 90

'Twas a hard change, an evil time was come:
We had no hope, and no relief could gain.
But soon with proud parade, the noisy drum
Beat round to sweep the streets of want and pain.¹¹
My husband's arms now only served to strain 95
Me and his children hungering in his view.
In such dismay my prayers and tears were vain;
To join those miserable men he flew,
And now to the sea-coast, with numbers more we drew.

There foul neglect for months and months we bore, 100
Nor yet the crowded fleet its anchor stirred.
Green fields before us and our native shore,
By fever, from polluted air incurred,¹²
Ravage was made for which no knell was heard.¹³
Fondly we wished and wished away, nor knew 105
Mid that long sickness, and those hopes deferred,
That happier days we never more must view.

The parting signal streamed,¹⁴ at last the land withdrew,

But from delay the summer calms were passed.

On as we drove, the equinoctial¹⁵ deep 110
Ran mountains high before the howling blast.
We gazed with terror on the gloomy sleep
Of them that perished in the whirlwind's sweep,
Untaught that soon such anguish must ensue,
Our hopes such harvest of affliction reap, 115
That we the mercy of the waves should rue.

We reached the western world,¹⁶ a poor devoted¹⁷ crew.

Oh dreadful price of being to resign
All that is dear in being: better far
In Want's most lonely cave till death to pine, 120
Unseen, unheard, unwatched by any star;
Or, in the streets and walks where proud men are,
Better our dying bodies to obtrude,¹⁸
Than dog-like, wading at the heels of war,
Protract a cursed existence with the brood 125
That lap (their very nourishment) their brother's blood.

The pains and plagues that on our heads came down –
Disease and famine, agony and fear,
In wood or wilderness, in camp or town –
It would thy brain unsettle even to hear. 130
All perished; all, in one remorseless year,
Husband and children! One by one, by sword
And ravenous plague, all perished. Every tear
Dried up, despairing, desolate, on board
A British ship I waked, as from a trance restored. 135

Peaceful as some immeasurable plain
By the first beams of dawning light impressed,¹⁹
In the calm sunshine slept the glittering main.
The very ocean has its hour of rest
That comes not to the human mourner's breast. 140
Remote from man and storms of mortal care,
A heavenly silence did the waves invest;²⁰
I looked and looked along the silent air,
Until it seemed to bring a joy to my despair.

Ah, how unlike those late terrific²¹ sleeps! 145
And groans, that rage of racking²² famine spoke,
Where looks inhuman dwelt on festering heaps!²³
The breathing pestilence that rose like smoke!²⁴
The shriek that from the distant battle broke!

The mine's²⁵ dire earthquake, and the pallid host²⁶ 150
Driven by the bomb's incessant thunderstroke
To loathsome vaults²⁷ where heartsick anguish tossed,
Hope died, and fear itself in agony was lost!

Yet does that burst of woe congeal my frame
When the dark streets appeared to heave and gape, 155
While like a sea the storming army²⁸ came,
And Fire from hell reared his gigantic shape,
And Murder, by the ghastly gleam, and Rape
Seized their joint prey – the mother and the child!
But from these crazing thoughts, my brain, escape! 160
For weeks the balmy air breathed soft and mild,
And on the gliding vessel heaven and ocean smiled.

Some mighty gulf of separation passed,
I seemed transported to another world:
A thought resigned with pain, when from the mast 165
The impatient mariner the sail unfurled,
And, whistling, called the wind that hardly curled
The silent sea. From the sweet thoughts of home
And from all hope I was forever hurled.
For me, farthest from earthly port to roam 170
Was best, could I but shun the spot where man might come.

And oft, robbed of my perfect mind,²⁹ I thought
At last my feet a resting-place had found.
Here will I weep in peace (so fancy wrought),
Roaming the illimitable waters³⁰ round; 175
Here watch, of every human friend disowned,
All day, my ready tomb the ocean flood.
To break my dream the vessel reached its bound,
And homeless near a thousand homes I stood,
And near a thousand tables pined, and wanted³¹ food. 180

By grief enfeebled was I turned adrift,
Helpless as sailor cast on desert rock;
Nor morsel to my mouth that day did lift,
Nor dared my hand at any door to knock.
I lay where, with his drowsy mates, the cock 185
From the cross timber of an outhouse³² hung.
How dismal tolled that night the city clock!
At morn my sick heart-hunger scarcely stung,
Nor to the beggar's language could I frame my tongue.

So passed another day, and so the third. 190
Then did I try (in vain) the crowd's resort;
In deep despair by frightful wishes stirred,
Near the seaside I reached a ruined fort.
There pains which nature could no more support,
With blindness linked, did on my vitals fall; 195
Dizzy my brain, with interruption short
Of hideous sense.³³ I sunk, nor step could crawl,
And thence was borne away to neighbouring hospital.

Recovery came with food. But still my brain
Was weak, nor of the past had memory. 200
I heard my neighbours in their beds complain
Of many things which never troubled me:
Of feet still bustling round with busy glee,
Of looks where common kindness had no part,
Of service done with careless cruelty, 205
Fretting the fever round the languid heart,
And groans which, as they said, would make a dead man start.

These things just served to stir the torpid sense,
Nor pain nor pity in my bosom raised;
Memory, though slow, returned with strength; and thence 210
Dismissed, again on open day I gazed
At houses, men and common light, amazed.
The lanes I sought and, as the sun retired,

Came where beneath the trees a faggot blazed.
The wild brood saw me weep, my fate enquired, 215
And gave me food and rest – more welcome, more desired.

My heart is touched to think that men like these,
The rude earth's tenants, were my first relief.
How kindly did they paint their vagrant ease!
And their long holiday³⁴ that feared not grief – 220
For all belonged to all, and each was chief.
No plough their sinews strained; on grating road
No wain they drove; and yet the yellow sheaf
In every vale for their delight was stowed:
For them in nature's meads the milky udder flowed.³⁵ 225

Semblance, with straw and panniered ass, they made
Of potters wandering on from door to door.
But life of happier sort to me portrayed,
And other joys my fancy to allure:
The bagpipe dinning on the midnight moor 230
In barn uplighted, and companions boon
Well-met from far with revelry secure
In depth of forest glade, when jocund June
Rolled fast along the sky his warm and genial moon.

But ill it suited me, in journey dark 235
O'er moor and mountain, midnight theft to hatch;
To charm the surly housedog's faithful bark,
Or hang on tiptoe at the lifted latch.
The gloomy lantern and the dim blue match,
The black disguise, the warning whistle shrill, 240
And ear still busy on its nightly watch,
Were not for me, brought up in nothing ill.
Besides, on griefs so fresh my thoughts were brooding still.

What could I do, unaided and unblessed?
Poor father, gone was every friend of thine! 245
And kindred of dead husband are at best

Small help, and after marriage such as mine,
 With little kindness would to me incline.
 Ill was I then for toil or service fit:
 With tears whose course no effort could confine, 250
 By highway-side forgetful would I sit
 Whole hours, my idle arms in moping sorrow knit.³⁶

I lived upon the mercy of the fields,
 And oft of cruelty the sky accused;
 On hazard, or what general bounty yields³⁷ – 255
 Now coldly given, now utterly refused.
 The fields I for my bed have often used.
 But what afflicts my peace with keenest ruth³⁸
 Is that I have my inner self abused,
 Foregone the home³⁹ delight of constant truth 260
 And clear and open soul, so prized in fearless youth.

Three years a wanderer, often have I viewed,
 In tears, the sun towards that country tend⁴⁰
 Where my poor heart lost all its fortitude.
 And now across this moor my steps I bend – 265
 Oh tell me whither, for no earthly friend
 Have I! She ceased and, weeping, turned away,
 As if because her tale was at an end.
 She wept because she had no more to say
 Of that perpetual weight which on her spirit lay. 270

11 the noisy drum...pain Soldiers were enlisted for the American War of Independence in exactly this manner: drummer-boys would parade round provincial towns, followed by conscription officers promising relief from poverty and hunger if men signed up for war. In 1793, when this poem was written, Wordsworth would have seen this process taking place in aid of the war with Revolutionary France (declared February 1793).

Goody Blake and Harry Gill: A True Story (by Wordsworth, composed 7–13 March 1798)¹

Oh what's the matter? What's the matter?
What is't that ails young Harry Gill,
That evermore his teeth they chatter,
Chatter, chatter, chatter still?
Of waistcoats Harry has no lack, 5
Good duffle grey, and flannel fine;
He has a blanket on his back,
And coats enough to smother nine.

In March, December, and in July,²
'Tis all the same with Harry Gill; 10
The neighbours tell, and tell you truly,
His teeth they chatter, chatter still.
At night, at morning, and at noon,
'Tis all the same with Harry Gill;
Beneath the sun, beneath the moon, 15
His teeth they chatter, chatter still.

Young Harry was a lusty drover,³
And who so stout of limb as he?
His cheeks were red as ruddy clover,
His voice was like the voice of three. 20

Auld Goody⁴ Blake was old and poor,
Ill fed she was, and thinly clad;
And any man who passed her door
Might see how poor a hut she had.

All day she spun in her poor dwelling, 25
And then her three hours' work at night –
Alas, 'twas hardly worth the telling,
It would not pay for candlelight.

This woman dwelt in Dorsetshire,⁵

Her hut was on a cold hillside, 30
And in that country⁶ coals are dear,⁷
For they come far by wind and tide.

By the same fire to boil their pottage,⁸
Two poor old dames (as I have known)
Will often live in one small cottage, 35
But she, poor woman, dwelt alone.
'Twas well enough when summer came,
The long, warm, lightsome summer day;
Then at her door the canty⁹ dame
Would sit, as any linnet gay. 40

But when the ice our streams did fether,¹⁰
Oh, then how her old bones would shake!
You would have said, if you had met her,
'Twas a hard time for Goody Blake.
Her evenings then were dull and dead – 45
Sad case it was, as you may think,
For very cold to go to bed,
And then for cold not sleep a wink.

Oh joy for her, whene'er in winter
The winds at night had made a rout,¹¹ 50
And scattered many a lusty splinter,
And many a rotten bough about.
Yet never had she, well or sick
(As every man who knew her says),
A pile beforehand, wood or stick, 55
Enough to warm her for three days.

Now when the frost was past enduring
And made her poor old bones to ache,
Could anything be more alluring

Than an old hedge to Goody Blake? 60
And now and then, it must be said,
When her old bones were cold and chill,
She left her fire or left her bed
To seek the hedge of Harry Gill.

Now Harry he had long suspected 65
This trespass of old Goody Blake,
And vowed that she should be detected,
And he on her would vengeance take.
And oft from his warm fire he'd go,
And to the fields his road would take, 70
And there at night, in frost and snow,
He watched to seize old Goody Blake.

And once, behind a rick¹² of barley,
Thus looking out did Harry stand;
The moon was full and shining clearly, 75
And crisp with frost the stubble-land.
He hears a noise, he's all awake –
Again? On tiptoe down the hill
He softly creeps: 'tis Goody Blake,
She's at the hedge of Harry Gill. 80

Right glad was he when he beheld her:
Stick after stick did Goody pull.
He stood behind a bush of elder
Till she had filled her apron full.
When with her load she turned about, 85
The by-road back again to take,
He started forward with a shout
And sprang upon poor Goody Blake.

And fiercely by the arm he took her,
And by the arm he held her fast, 90

And fiercely by the arm he shook her,
And cried, 'I've caught you then at last!'
Then Goody, who had nothing said,
Her bundle from her lap let fall,
And kneeling on the sticks she prayed 95
To God that is the judge of all.

She prayed, her withered hand uprearing,
While Harry held her by the arm:
'God, who art never out of hearing –
Oh may he never more be warm!' ¹³ 100
The cold, cold moon above her head,
Thus on her knees did Goody pray,
Young Harry heard what she had said,
And icy cold he turned away.

He went complaining all the morrow 105
That he was cold and very chill;
His face was gloom, his heart was sorrow –
Alas that day for Harry Gill!
That day he wore a riding-coat
But not a whit the warmer he; 110
Another was on Thursday brought,
And ere the Sabbath he had three.

'Twas all in vain, a useless matter,
And blankets were about him pinned;
Yet still his jaws and teeth they clatter 115
Like a loose casement¹⁴ in the wind.
And Harry's flesh it fell away,
And all who see him say 'tis plain
That, live as long as live he may,
He never will be warm again. 120

No word to any man he utters,

Abed or up, to young or old,
But ever to himself he mutters,
'Poor Harry Gill is very cold.'¹⁵
Abed or up, by night or day, 125
His teeth they chatter, chatter still:
Now think, ye farmers all, I pray,
Of Goody Blake and Harry Gill.

Goody Blake and Harry Gill

¹ This poem has a source in a medical treatise, Erasmus Darwin's Zoönomia (1794–6), which Wordsworth read in early March 1798: 'A young farmer in Warwickshire, finding his hedges broke, and the sticks carried away during a frosty season, determined to watch for the thief. He lay many cold hours under a haystack, and at length an old woman, like a witch in a play, approached and began to pull up the hedge. He waited till she had tied up her bottle of sticks and was carrying them off, that he might convict her of the theft; and then, springing from his concealment, he seized his prey with violent threats. After some altercation, in which her load was left upon the ground, she kneeled upon her bottle of sticks, and raising her arms to heaven, beneath the bright moon, then at the full, spoke to the farmer (already shivering with cold): "Heaven grant that thou never mayest know again the blessing to be warm!" He complained of cold all the next day, and wore an upper coat – and in a few days another – and in a fortnight took to his bed, always saying nothing made him warm. He covered himself with very many blankets, and had a sieve over his face as he lay; and from this one insane idea he kept his bed above twenty years for fear of the cold air, till at length he died' (ii 359).

² July stressed on the first syllable.

³ drover cattle farmer.

4 Goody ‘goodwife’; traditional address for a countrywoman, often implying age.

5 Dorsetshire Although Erasmus Darwin (Wordsworth’s source) had located the story in Warwickshire, Wordsworth places it in Dorset, where he and Dorothy lived, 1795–7.

6 country region.

7 coals are dear Coal was shipped from Wales; it was of poor quality and expensive.

8 pottage soup.

9 canty cheerful.

10 fetter chain, bind. The 1790s were a decade notorious for the coldness of its winters; it has been described as a mini ice age.

11 rout party.

12 rick corn-stack; barley and other grain was cut with a scythe and bound into sheaves, which were stacked and thatched to await threshing.

13 Oh may...warm Joseph Cottle recalled how this line gave particular pleasure to Hannah More when she heard the poem: ‘she said, “I must hear Harry Gill once more”. On coming to the words, “Oh may he never more be warm!”, she lifted up her hands in smiling horror’ (Reminiscences of Samuel Taylor Coleridge and Robert Southey (London, 1847), p. 260).

14 casement window.

15 Poor...cold cf. King Lear III iv 147: ‘Poor Tom’s a-cold.’

Lines written at a small distance from my house,¹ and sent by my little boy² to the person to whom they are addressed (by Wordsworth, composed 1–9 March 1798)³

It is the first mild day of March,
Each minute sweeter than before,
The redbreast sings from the tall larch
That stands beside our door.

There is a blessing in the air 5
Which seems a sense of joy to yield
To the bare trees and mountains bare,⁴
And grass in the green field.

My sister, 'tis a wish of mine
Now that our morning meal is done – 10
Make haste, your morning task resign,
Come forth and feel the sun!

Edward⁵ will come with you – and pray
Put on with speed your woodland dress,
And bring no book, for this one day 15
We'll give to idleness.

No joyless forms⁶ shall regulate
Our living calendar;
We from today, my friend, will date
The opening of the year.⁷ 20

Love, now an universal birth,
From heart to heart is stealing,

From earth to man, from man to earth –
It is the hour of feeling.

One moment now may give us more 25
Than fifty years of reason;
Our minds shall drink at every pore
The spirit of the season.

Some silent laws⁸ our hearts may make
Which they shall long obey; 30
We for the year to come may take
Our temper⁹ from today.

And from the blessed power that rolls
About, below, above,
We'll frame the measure¹⁰ of our souls – 35
They shall be tuned to love.¹¹

Then come, my sister, come, I pray,
With speed put on your woodland dress;
And bring no book, for this one day
We'll give to idleness. 40

¹ my house Alfoxden House, where the Wordsworths resided, June 1797–July 1798.

² my little boy Basil Montagu Jr., whose mother had died, and whose father, a friend of Wordsworth's, was unable to look after him.

³ Wordsworth later exchanged the cumbersome original title for 'To my Sister'.

4 mountains bare an exaggeration; the Quantock Hills in which Alfoxden House is located do not compare with the mountains of the Lake District, where Wordsworth grew up.

5 Edward Basil Montagu Jr.

6 forms rules, conventions.

7 We from...year In 1793 the French completely reorganized their calendar to begin from the birth of the republic (22 September 1792) rather than that of Christ.

8 silent laws effectively, New Year's resolutions.

9 temper constitution.

10 measure rhythm, harmony.

Simon Lee, the old Huntsman, with an incident in which he was concerned (by Wordsworth, composed between March and 16 May 1798)

In the sweet shire of Cardigan¹
Not far from pleasant Ivor Hall,
An old man dwells, a little man,
I've heard he once was tall.
Of years he has upon his back, 5
No doubt, a burden weighty;

He says he is three score and ten,
But others say he's eighty.

A long blue livery-coat² has he
That's fair behind and fair before; 10
Yet meet him where you will, you see
At once that he is poor.
Full five and twenty years he lived
A running huntsman³ merry,
And though he has but one eye left, 15
His cheek is like a cherry.

No man like him the horn could sound,
And no man was so full of glee;
To say the least, four counties round
Had heard of Simon Lee. 20
His master's dead, and no one now
Dwells in the Hall of Ivor,
Men, dogs, and horses – all are dead;
He is the sole survivor.

His hunting feats have him bereft 25
Of his right eye, as you may see;
And then, what limbs those feats have left
To poor old Simon Lee!
He has no son, he has no child;
His wife, an aged woman, 30
Lives with him near the waterfall,
Upon the village⁴ common.

And he is lean and he is sick,
His little body's half awry,⁵
His ankles they are swoln and thick, 35
His legs are thin and dry.

When he was young he little knew
Of husbandry or tillage,⁶
And now he's forced to work, though weak –
The weakest in the village. 40

He all the country⁷ could outrun,
Could leave both man and horse behind;
And often, ere the race was done,
He reeled and was stone-blind.⁸
And still there's something in the world 45
At which his heart rejoices,
For when the chiming⁹ hounds are out
He dearly loves their voices!¹⁰

Old Ruth works out of doors with him
And does what Simon cannot do; 50
For she, not over-stout of limb,
Is stouter of the two.
And though you with your utmost skill
From labour could not wean them,
Alas, 'tis very little, all 55
Which they can do between them!

Beside their moss-grown hut of clay
Not twenty paces from the door,
A scrap of land they have, but they
Are poorest of the poor. 60
This scrap of land he from the heath
Enclosed when he was stronger,
But what avails the land to them
Which they can till no longer?

Few months of life has he in store 65
As he to you will tell,

For still, the more he works, the more
His poor old ankles swell.
My gentle reader, I perceive
How patiently you've waited, 70
And I'm afraid that you expect
Some tale will be related.

Oh reader, had you in your mind
Such stores as silent thought¹¹ can bring –
Oh gentle reader, you would find 75
A tale in every thing.¹²
What more I have to say is short,
I hope you'll kindly take it;

It is no tale, but, should you think,
Perhaps a tale you'll make it. 80
One summer day I chanced to see
This old man doing all he could
About the root of an old tree,
A stump of rotten wood.
The mattock¹³ tottered in his hand; 85
So vain was his endeavour,
That at the root of the old tree
He might have worked forever.

'You're overtasked, good Simon Lee,
Give me your tool,' to him I said;¹⁴ 90
And at the word, right gladly he Received my proffered aid.¹⁵
I struck, and with a single blow
The tangled root I severed,
At which the poor old man so long 95
And vainly had endeavoured.

The tears into his eyes were brought,
And thanks and praises seemed to run
So fast out of his heart, I thought
They never would have done. 100
I've heard of hearts unkind, kind deeds
With coldness still returning;
Alas, the gratitude of men
Has oft'ner left me mourning. 16

Anecdote for Fathers, showing how the art of lying may be taught (by Wordsworth, composed between April and 16 May 1798)

I have a boy of five years old,^{1}
His face is fair and fresh to see,
His limbs are cast in beauty’s mould,
And dearly he loves me.

One morn we strolled on our dry walk, 5
Our quiet house all full in view,
And held such intermitted talk

As we are wont² to do.

My thoughts on former pleasures ran;
I thought of Kilve's³ delightful shore – 10
My pleasant home when spring began
A long long year before.

A day it was when I could bear
To think, and think, and think again;
With so much happiness to spare 15
I could not feel a pain.

My boy was by my side, so slim
And graceful in his rustic dress!
And oftentimes I talked to him
In very idleness. 20

The young lambs ran a pretty race,
The morning sun shone bright and warm;
'Kilve', said I, 'was a pleasant place,
And so is Liswyn farm.⁴

My little boy, which like you more?' 25
I said and took him by the arm,
'Our home by Kilve's delightful shore,
Or here at Liswyn farm?

And tell me, had you rather be
(I said and held him by the arm) 30
At Kilve's smooth shore by the green sea
Or here at Liswyn farm?'

In careless mood he looked at me
While still I held him by the arm
And said, 'At Kilve I'd rather be 35

Than here at Liswyn farm.'

'Now, little Edward, say why so,
My little Edward, tell me why.'

'I cannot tell, I do not know.'

'Why this is strange!' said I. 40

'For here are woods and green hills warm;
There surely must some reason be
Why you would change sweet Liswyn farm
For Kilve by the green sea.'

At this, my boy, so fair and slim, 45
Hung down his head, nor made reply,
And five times did I say to him,
'Why? Edward, tell me why?'

His head he raised; there was in sight –
It caught his eye, he saw it plain – 50
Upon the house-top, glittering bright,
A broad and gilded vane.⁵

Then did the boy his tongue unlock
And thus to me he made reply;
'At Kilve there was no weathercock, 55
And that's the reason why.'

Oh dearest, dearest boy! my heart
For better lore would seldom yearn,
Could I but teach the hundredth part
Of what from thee I learn. 60

2 wont used.

3 Kilve small village on the Somersetshire coast, not far from Alfoxden. It is pronounced as a single syllable. See Berta Lawrence, 'Kilve by the Green Sea', Charles Lamb Bulletin NS 91 (1995) 157–8. It is generally agreed that by Kilve Wordsworth means Racedown, and that by Liswyn he means Alfoxden.

4 Liswyn farm John Thelwall, who visited Wordsworth and Coleridge in Somerset in July 1797, had retreated to Llys Wen farm in Wales. Dorothy and William went there for the first time in early August 1798. For more on Thelwall see pp. 322–4.

We are seven* (by Wordsworth, composed between April and 16 May 1798)

A simple child, dear brother Jim,1
That lightly draws its breath,
And feels its life in every limb –
What should it know of death?

I met a little cottage girl,2 5
She was eight years old, she said;
Her hair was thick with many a curl
That clustered round her head.

She had a rustic woodland air
And she was wildly clad; 10

Her eyes were fair, and very fair –
Her beauty made me glad.

‘Sisters and brothers, little maid,
How many may you be?’
‘How many? Seven in all’, she said, 15
And wondering looked at me.

‘And where are they, I pray you tell?’
She answered, ‘Seven are we,
And two of us at Conway³ dwell,
And two are gone to sea. 20

Two of us in the churchyard lie
(My sister and my brother),
And in the churchyard cottage I
Dwell near them with my mother.’

‘You say that two at Conway dwell 25
And two are gone to sea,
Yet you are seven – I pray you tell,
Sweet maid, how this may be?’

Then did the little maid reply,
‘Seven boys and girls are we; 30
Two of us in the churchyard lie
Beneath the churchyard tree.’

‘You run about, my little maid,
Your limbs they are alive;
If two are in the churchyard laid, 35
Then ye are only five.’

‘Their graves are green, they may be seen’,⁴
The little maid replied,

‘Twelve steps or more from my mother’s door,
And they are side by side. 40

My stockings there I often knit,
My kerchief⁵ there I hem,
And there upon the ground I sit,
I sit and sing to them.

And often after sunset, sir, 45
When it is light and fair,
I take my little porringer⁶
And eat my supper there.

The first that died was little Jane,
In bed she moaning lay, 50
Till God released her of her pain
And then she went away.

So in the churchyard she was laid
And all the summer dry,
Together round her grave we played, 55
My brother John and I.

And when the ground was white with snow,
And I could run and slide,
My brother John was forced to go,
And he lies by her side.’ 60

‘How many are you then’, said I,
‘If they two are in heaven?’
The little maiden did reply,
‘Oh master, we are seven!’

‘But they are dead – those two are dead! 65
Their spirits are in heaven!’

'Twas throwing words away, for still
The little maid would have her will
And said, 'Nay, we are seven!'

2 I met...girl The poem is based on Wordsworth's meeting with a child near Goodrich Castle on the River Wye in summer 1793.

3 Conway a sea-port in north Wales, about 120 miles north of Goodrich Castle.

4 Their graves...seen The child regards the graves as proof that her siblings are alive.

5 kerchief headscarf.

6 porringer wooden soup-bowl.

Lines written in early spring (by Wordsworth, composed c.12 April 1798)1

I heard a thousand blended notes2
While in a grove I sat reclined
In that sweet mood when pleasant thoughts
Bring sad thoughts to the mind.

To her fair works did nature link 5
The human soul that through me ran,
And much it grieved my heart to think

What man has made of man.³

Through primrose-tufts, in that sweet bower,
The periwinkle⁴ trailed its wreaths; 10
And 'tis my faith that every flower
Enjoys the air it breathes.⁵

The birds around me hopped and played,
Their thoughts I cannot measure,
But the least motion which they made – 15
It seemed a thrill of pleasure.

The budding twigs spread out their fan
To catch the breezy air;
And I must think, do all I can,
That there was pleasure there. 20

If I these thoughts may not prevent,
If such be of my creed⁶ the plan,
Have I not reason to lament
What man has made of man?

Lines written in early spring

¹ According to Wordsworth this poem was 'composed while I was sitting by the side of the brook that runs down the coomb (in which stands the village of Holford), through the grounds of Alfoxden. It was a chosen resort of mine. The brook fell down a sloping rock so as to make a waterfall considerable for that country, and, across the pool below, had fallen a tree, an ash if I rightly remember, from which rose perpendicularly boughs in search of the light intercepted by the deep shade above' (FN 36).

² notes pronounced so as to rhyme with ‘thoughts’, as Wordsworth, with his Cumbrian accent, would have done.

³ And much...man Wordsworth has in mind the conclusion to Burns’s Man was Made to Mourn: ‘Man’s inhumanity to man / Makes countless thousands mourn.’

⁴ periwinkle evergreen trailing plant with light blue flowers (US myrtle).

⁵ And ’tis...breathes Wordsworth was up-to-date in his botanical knowledge; in 1791 Erasmus Darwin had written, in The Economy of Vegetation, that leaves function as lungs.

⁶ creed credo, belief.

The Thorn (by Wordsworth, composed between 19 March and 20 April 1798)¹

I

‘There is a thorn, it looks so old,
In truth you’d find it hard to say
How it could ever have been young,
It looks so old and grey.
Not higher than a two years’ child, 5
It stands erect, this aged thorn;
No leaves it has, no thorny points –
It is a mass of knotted joints,
A wretched thing forlorn.
It stands erect and, like a stone, 10
With lichens² it is overgrown.

II

Like rock or stone, it is o’ergrown

With lichens to the very top,
And hung with heavy tufts of moss,
A melancholy crop; 15
Up from the earth these mosses creep,
And this poor thorn they clasp it round
So close, you'd say that they were bent
With plain and manifest intent
To drag it to the ground – 20
And all had joined in one endeavour
To bury this poor thorn for ever.

III

High on a mountain's highest ridge
Where oft the stormy winter gale
Cuts like a scythe, while through the clouds 25
It sweeps from vale to vale;
Not five yards from the mountain path
This thorn you on your left espy,
And to the left, three yards beyond,
You see a little muddy pond 30
Of water, never dry.
I've measured it from side to side;
'Tis three feet long and two feet wide.

IV

And close beside this aged thorn
There is a fresh and lovely sight, 35
A beauteous heap, a hill of moss,
Just half a foot in height.
All lovely colours there you see,
All colours that were ever seen,
And mossy net-work³ too is there, 40
As if by hand of lady fair
The work had woven been,
And cups,⁴ the darlings of the eye,
So deep is their vermilion dye.

V

Ah me, what lovely tints are there 45
 Of olive-green and scarlet bright!
 In spikes, in branches, and in stars,
 Green, red, and pearly white.
 This heap of earth o'ergrown with moss,
 Which close beside the thorn you see, 50
 So fresh in all its beauteous dyes,
 Is like an infant's grave in size,
 As like as like can be;
 But never, never, anywhere
 An infant's grave was half so fair. 55

VI

Now would you see this aged thorn,
 This pond and beauteous hill of moss,
 You must take care and choose your time
 The mountain when to cross.
 For oft there sits, between the heap 60
 That's like an infant's grave in size
 And that same pond of which I spoke,
 A woman in a scarlet cloak,⁵
 And to herself she cries,
 "Oh misery! Oh misery! 65
 Oh woe is me! Oh misery!"

VII

At all times of the day and night
 This wretched woman thither goes,
 And she is known to every star
 And every wind that blows; 70
 And there beside the thorn she sits
 When the blue daylight's in the skies,
 And when the whirlwind's on the hill,
 Or frosty air is keen and still,
 And to herself she cries, 75

“Oh misery! Oh misery!
Oh woe is me! Oh misery!” ’

VIII

‘Now wherefore thus, by day and night,
In rain, in tempest, and in snow,
Thus to the dreary mountain-top 80
Does this poor woman go?
And why sits she beside the thorn
When the blue daylight’s in the sky,
Or when the whirlwind’s on the hill,
Or frosty air is keen and still, 85
And wherefore does she cry?
Oh wherefore, wherefore, tell me why
Does she repeat that doleful cry?’

IX

‘I cannot tell, I wish I could;
For the true reason no one knows. 90
But if you’d gladly view the spot,
The spot to which she goes –
The heap that’s like an infant’s grave,
The pond, and thorn so old and grey –
Pass by her door (’tis seldom shut), 95
And if you see her in her hut,⁶
Then to the spot away!
I never heard of such as dare
Approach the spot when she is there.’

X

‘But wherefore to the mountain-top 100
Can this unhappy woman go,
Whatever star is in the skies,
Whatever wind may blow?’
‘Nay rack your brain, ’tis all in vain –
I’ll tell you everything I know; 105
But to the thorn, and to the pond

Which is a little step beyond,
I wish that you would go.
Perhaps when you are at the place
You something of her tale may trace. 110

XI

I'll give you the best help I can:
Before you up the mountain go,
Up to the dreary mountain-top,
I'll tell you all I know.
'Tis now some two and twenty years 115
Since she (her name is Martha Ray)⁷
Gave with a maiden's true goodwill
Her company to Stephen Hill,
And she was blithe and gay,
And she was happy, happy still 120
Whene'er she thought of Stephen Hill.

XII

And they had fixed the wedding-day,
The morning that must wed them both,
But Stephen to another maid
Had sworn another oath, 125
And with this other maid to church
Unthinking Stephen went –
Poor Martha! On that woeful day
A cruel, cruel fire, they say,
Into her bones was sent: 130
It dried her body like a cinder
And almost turned her brain to tinder.

XIII

They say full six months after this,
While yet the summer leaves were green,
She to the mountain-top would go, 135
And there was often seen;
'Tis said a child was in her womb,

As now to any eye was plain –
She was with child and she was mad,
Yet often she was sober-sad 140
From her exceeding pain.
Oh me! Ten thousand times I'd rather
That he had died, that cruel father!

XIV

Sad case for such a brain to hold
Communion with a stirring child! 145
Sad case (as you may think) for one
Who had a brain so wild!
Last Christmas when we talked of this,
Old Farmer Simpson did maintain
That in her womb the infant wrought 150
About its mother's heart, and brought
Her senses back again;
And when at last her time drew near,
Her looks were calm, her senses clear.

XV

No more I know – I wish I did, 155
And I would tell it all to you.
For what became of this poor child
There's none that ever knew;
And if a child was born or no,
There's no one that could ever tell; 160
And if 'twas born alive or dead,
There's no one knows, as I have said.
But some remember well
That Martha Ray about this time
Would up the mountain often climb. 165

XVI

And all that winter, when at night
The wind blew from the mountain-peak,
'Twas worth your while, though in the dark,

The churchyard path to seek:
For many a time and oft were heard 170
Cries coming from the mountain-head.
Some plainly living voices were,
And others, I've heard many swear,
Were voices of the dead.
I cannot think, whate'er they say, 175
They had to do with Martha Ray.

XVII

But that she goes to this old thorn,
The thorn which I've described to you,
And there sits in a scarlet cloak,
I will be sworn is true. 180
For one day with my telescope,⁸
To view the ocean wide and bright,
When to this country⁹ first I came,
Ere I had heard of Martha's name,
I climbed the mountain's height; 185
A storm came on, and I could see
No object higher than my knee.

XVIII

'Twas mist and rain, and storm and rain,
No screen, no fence could I discover;¹⁰
And then the wind – in faith, it was 190
A wind full ten times over!
I looked around, I thought I saw
A jutting crag, and off I ran
Head-foremost through the driving rain,
The shelter of the crag to gain; 195
And, as I am a man,
Instead of jutting crag, I found
A woman seated on the ground.

XIX

I did not speak – I saw her face,
Her face it was enough for me; 200
I turned about and heard her cry,
“Oh misery! Oh misery!”
And there she sits, until the moon
Through half the clear blue sky will go,
And when the little breezes make 205
The waters of the pond to shake,
As all the country know,
She shudders and you hear her cry,
“Oh misery! Oh misery!”

XX

‘But what’s the thorn? And what’s the pond? 210
And what’s the hill of moss to her?
And what’s the creeping breeze that comes
The little pond to stir?’
‘I cannot tell, but some will say
She hanged her baby on the tree; 215
Some say she drowned it in the pond
Which is a little step beyond;
But all and each agree
The little babe was buried there,
Beneath that hill of moss so fair. 220

XXI

I’ve heard the scarlet moss is red
With drops of that poor infant’s blood –
But kill a new-born infant thus?
I do not think she could.
Some say, if to the pond you go, 225
And fix on it a steady view,
The shadow of a babe you trace,
A baby and a baby’s face,
And that it looks at you;

Whene'er you look on it, 'tis plain 230
The baby looks at you again.

XXII

And some had sworn an oath that she
Should be to public justice brought,
And for the little infant's bones
With spades they would have sought. 235
But then the beauteous hill of moss
Before their eyes began to stir,
And for full fifty yards around,
The grass it shook upon the ground.
But all do still aver¹¹ 240
The little babe is buried there,
Beneath that hill of moss so fair.

XXIII

I cannot tell how this may be,
But plain it is, the thorn is bound
With heavy tufts of moss that strive 245
To drag it to the ground.
And this I know, full many a time
When she was on the mountain high,
By day, and in the silent night,
When all the stars shone clear and bright, 250
That I have heard her cry,
"Oh misery! Oh misery!
Oh woe is me! Oh misery!"

The Thorn

¹ Wordsworth recalled that this poem 'arose out of my observing, on the ridge of Quantock Hill, on a stormy day, a thorn which I had often passed in calm and bright weather without noticing it. I said to myself, "Cannot I by some invention do as much to make this thorn permanently an impressive object as the storm has made it to my eyes at this moment?" I began the poem accordingly, and composed it with great rapidity' (FN 14). See also the 'Note to "The Thorn"' (1800), pp. 518–19 below. The poem is in the form of a dialogue; an interlocutor enters at ll. 78–88, 100–3, and 210–13. For Southey's hostile comments, see p. 752.

Ray had been the mistress of the 4th Earl of Sandwich, and on 7 April 1779 had been shot dead on the steps of Covent Garden Theatre by a jealous lover, the Revd James Hackman. Why Wordsworth should have used a name with such painful associations remains unexplained.

The Last of the Flock (by Wordsworth, composed between March and 16 May 1798)¹

In distant countries I have been,
And yet I have not often seen
A healthy man, a man full grown,
Weep in the public roads alone.
But such a one on English ground 5
And in the broad highway, I met;
Along the broad highway he came,
His cheeks with tears were wet.
Sturdy he seemed, though he was sad,
And in his arms a lamb he had. 10

He saw me and he turned aside
As if he wished himself to hide;
Then with his coat he made essay²
To wipe those briny tears away.
I followed him, and said, 'My friend, 15
What ails you? Wherefore weep you so?'
'Shame on me, sir! This lusty lamb,
He makes my tears to flow;
Today I fetched him from the rock –
He is the last of all my flock. 20

When I was young, a single man,
And after youthful follies ran,
Though little given to care and thought,
Yet so it was a ewe I bought;
And other sheep from her I raised, 25
As healthy sheep as you might see.
And then I married, and was rich
As I could wish to be;

Of sheep I numbered a full score,³
And every year increased my store. 30

Year after year my stock it grew,
And from this one, this single ewe,
Full fifty comely sheep I raised –
As sweet a flock as ever grazed!
Upon the mountain did they feed, 35
They throve, and we at home did thrive.
This lusty lamb of all my store
Is all that is alive;
And now I care not if we die
And perish all of poverty. 40

Ten children, sir, had I to feed –
Hard labour in a time of need!
My pride was tamed, and in our grief
I of the parish asked relief.
They said I was a wealthy man; 45
My sheep upon the mountain fed
And it was fit that thence I took
Whereof to buy us bread.
“Do this. How can we give to you”
They cried, “what to the poor is due?” 50

I sold a sheep as they had said,
And bought my little children bread,
And they were healthy with their food;
For me it never did me good.
A woeful time it was for me 55
To see the end of all my gains,
The pretty flock which I had reared
With all my care and pains,
To see it melt like snow away!
For me it was a woeful day. 60

Another still, and still another!
A little lamb and then its mother!
It was a vein that never stopped,
Like blood-drops from my heart they dropped
Till thirty were not left alive; 65
They dwindled, dwindled, one by one,
And I may say that many a time
I wished they all were gone:
They dwindled one by one away –
For me it was a woeful day. 70

To wicked deeds I was inclined,
And wicked fancies crossed my mind,
And every man I chanced to see,
I thought he knew some ill of me.
No peace, no comfort could I find, 75
No ease, within doors or without,
And crazily, and wearily,
I went my work about.
Oft-times I thought to run away;
For me it was a woeful day. 80

Sir, 'twas a precious flock to me,
As dear as my own children be;
For daily with my growing store
I loved my children more and more.
Alas, it was an evil time, 85
God cursed me in my sore distress;
I prayed, yet every day I thought
I loved my children less;
And every week, and every day
My flock, it seemed to melt away. 90

They dwindled, sir, sad sight to see,
From ten to five, from five to three –

A lamb, a wether,⁴ and a ewe;
And then at last, from three to two.
And of my fifty, yesterday 95
I had but only one,
And here it lies upon my arm –
Alas, and I have none!
Today I fetched it from the rock;
It is the last of all my flock.’ 100

The Last of the Flock

¹ In later years Wordsworth recalled that the encounter described here ‘occurred in the village of Holford, close by Alfoxden’ (FN 9). It was apparently relayed to him by one of those who had taken part: ‘I never in my whole life saw a man weep alone in the roads; but a friend of mine did see this poor man weeping alone, with the lamb, the last of the flock, in his arms’ (LY iii 292). Critics observe that this poem refutes the Godwinian argument that ‘property was the cause of every vice, and the source of all the wretchedness, of the poor.’ It also illustrates the disastrous effects of the ‘Speenhamland system’ for paying from parish rates the difference between what a man earned and what he needed to live. Wages were so low that a man could not live without supplementing his earnings from the parish. But if he possessed anything, even a few pounds saved over the years, he was refused both help and employment.

² made essay tried.

³ a full score twenty.

⁴ wether castrated male sheep.

The Dungeon (by Coleridge, extracted from Osorio, composed April–September 1797)¹

And this place our forefathers made for man!
This is the process of our love and wisdom
To each poor brother who offends against us;
Most innocent, perhaps – and what if guilty?
Is this the only cure, merciful God? 5
Each pore and natural outlet shrivelled up
By ignorance and parching poverty,
His energies roll back upon his heart
And stagnate and corrupt; till, changed to poison,
They break out on him like a loathsome plague-spot. 10
Then we call in our pampered mountebanks
And this is their best cure: uncomforted
And friendless solitude, groaning and tears
And savage faces at the clanking hour,
Seen through the steams and vapour of his dungeon, 15
By the lamp's dismal twilight. So he lies
Circled with evil, till his very soul
Unmoulds its essence, hopelessly deformed
By sights of ever more deformity!
With other ministrations, thou, oh nature, 20
Healest thy wandering and distempered child:
Thou pourest on him thy soft influences,
Thy sunny hues, fair forms, and breathing sweets,
Thy melodies of woods, and winds, and waters,
Till he relent, and can no more endure 25
To be a jarring and a dissonant thing
Amid this general dance and minstrelsy;
But, bursting into tears, wins back his way,
His angry spirit healed and harmonized
By the benignant touch of love and beauty.² 30

The Dungeon

¹ In Coleridge's play, this was part of a soliloquy by the protagonist, Albert, when jailed by the Inquisition. Like Wordsworth's 'The Convict' (pp. 414–15), this poem is a plea for penal reform.

² Till he relent... beauty The experience of being harmonized and healed by nature is celebrated in 'This Lime-Tree Bower my Prison' and 'Frost at Midnight'; conversely, 'The Ancient Mariner' and 'Christabel' are concerned with the suffering of those alienated from nature's healing power.

The Mad Mother (by Wordsworth, composed between March and 16 May 1798)¹

Her eyes are wild, her head is bare,
The sun has burnt her coal-black hair,
Her eyebrows have a rusty stain,
And she came far from over the main.
She has a baby on her arm, 5
Or else she were alone;
And underneath the haystack warm,
And on the greenwood stone,
She talked and sung the woods among –
And it was in the English tongue. 10

'Sweet babe, they say that I am mad,
But nay, my heart is far too glad;
And I am happy when I sing
Full many a sad and doleful thing.
Then, lovely baby, do not fear! 15
I pray thee, have no fear of me,

But safe as in a cradle, here
My lovely baby, thou shalt be;
To thee I know too much I owe,
I cannot work thee any woe. 20

A fire was once within my brain,
And in my head a dull, dull pain;
And fiendish faces – one, two, three,
Hung at my breasts, and pulled at me.
But then there came a sight of joy, 25
It came at once to do me good;
I waked and saw my little boy,
My little boy of flesh and blood –
Oh joy for me that sight to see!
For he was here, and only he. 30

Suck, little babe, oh suck again!
It cools my blood, it cools my brain;
Thy lips I feel them, baby, they
Draw from my heart the pain away.
Oh, press me with thy little hand, 35
It loosens something at my chest;
About that tight and deadly band
I feel thy little fingers pressed.
The breeze I see is in the tree,
It comes to cool my babe and me.³ 40

Oh love me, love me, little boy!
Thou art thy mother's only joy;
And do not dread the waves below,
When o'er the sea-rock's edge⁴ we go.
The high crag cannot work me harm, 45
Nor leaping torrents when they howl;
The babe I carry on my arm,
He saves for me my precious soul.

Then happy lie, for blessed am I –
Without me my sweet babe would die. 50

Then do not fear, my boy, for thee
Bold as a lion I will be;
And I will always be thy guide
Through hollow snows and rivers wide.

I'll build an Indian bower;⁵ I know 55
The leaves that make the softest bed;
And if from me thou wilt not go,
But still be true till I am dead –
My pretty thing, then thou shalt sing,
As merry as the birds in spring. 60

Thy father cares not for my breast;
'Tis thine, sweet baby, there to rest,
'Tis all thine own! And if its hue
Be changed, that was so fair to view,
'Tis fair enough for thee, my dove! 65
My beauty, little child, is flown;
But thou wilt live with me in love –
And what if my poor cheek be brown?
'Tis well for me; thou canst not see
How pale and wan it else would be. 70

Dread not their taunts, my little life!
I am thy father's wedded wife,
And underneath the spreading tree
We two will live in honesty.
If his sweet boy he could forsake, 75
With me he never would have stayed;
From him no harm my babe can take,
But he, poor man, is wretched made;
And every day we two will pray
For him that's gone and far away. 80

I'll teach my boy the sweetest things,
I'll teach him how the owlet sings.
My little babe, thy lips are still,
And thou hast almost sucked thy fill.
Where art thou gone, my own dear child? 85
What wicked looks are those I see?
Alas, alas! that look so wild,
It never, never came from me;
If thou art mad, my pretty lad,
Then I must be forever sad. 90

Oh smile on me, my little lamb,
For I thy own dear mother am.
My love for thee has well been tried;
I've sought thy father far and wide.
I know the poisons of the shade, 95
I know the earth-nuts fit for food;
Then, pretty dear, be not afraid –
We'll find thy father in the wood.
Now laugh and be gay, to the woods away,
And there, my babe, we'll live for aye.' 100

The Mad Mother

¹ In later years, Wordsworth recalled that 'The subject was reported to me by a lady of Bristol who had seen the poor creature (by Wordsworth, composed between March and 16 May 1798)'¹

³ The breeze...me In Biographia Literaria Coleridge described these lines as 'so expressive ... of The moon is up, the sky is blue,

The Idiot Boy (by Wordsworth, composed between March and 16 May 1798)¹

'Tis eight o'clock, a clear March night,
The moon is up, the sky is blue,
The owlet² in the moonlight air –
He shouts from nobody knows where,
He lengthens out his lonely shout: 5
Halloo, halloo! A long halloo!

Why bustle thus about your door?
What means this bustle, Betty Foy?
Why are you in this mighty fret?
And why on horseback have you set 10
Him whom you love, your idiot boy?

Beneath the moon that shines so bright,
Till she is tired, let Betty Foy
With girt³ and stirrup fiddle-faddle;
But wherefore set upon a saddle 15
Him whom she loves, her idiot boy?

There's scarce a soul that's out of bed –
Good Betty, put him down again!
His lips with joy they burr at you,
But, Betty, what has he to do 20
With stirrup, saddle, or with rein?

The world will say 'tis very idle –
Bethink you of the time of night?

There's not a mother – no not one,
But when she hears what you have done, 25
Oh Betty, she'll be in a fright!

But Betty's bent on her intent,
For her good neighbour, Susan Gale
(Old Susan, she who dwells alone)
Is sick and makes a piteous moan 30
As if her very life would fail.

There's not a house within a mile,
No hand to help them in distress,
Old Susan lies abed in pain,
And sorely puzzled are the twain, 35
For what she ails⁴ they cannot guess.

And Betty's husband's at the wood
Where by the week he doth abide,
A woodman in the distant vale;
There's none to help poor Susan Gale – 40
What must be done? What will betide?

And Betty from the lane has fetched
Her pony that is mild and good
Whether he be in joy or pain,
Feeding at will along the lane, 45
Or bringing faggots⁵ from the wood.

And he is all in travelling trim,⁶
And by the moonlight, Betty Foy
Has up upon the saddle set
(The like was never heard of yet) 50
Him whom she loves, her idiot boy.

And he must post⁷ without delay
Across the bridge that's in the dale,
And by the church and o'er the down
To bring a Doctor from the town, 55
Or she will die, old Susan Gale.

There is no need of boot or spur,
There is no need of whip or wand,⁸
For Johnny has his holly-bough,
And with a hurly-burly now 60
He shakes the green bough in his hand.

And Betty o'er and o'er has told
The boy who is her best delight
Both what to follow, what to shun,
What do, and what to leave undone, 65
How turn to left, and how to right,

And Betty's most especial charge⁹
Was, 'Johnny, Johnny! Mind that you
Come home again, nor stop at all,
Come home again whate'er befall – 70
My Johnny do, I pray you do.'

To this did Johnny answer make
Both with his head and with his hand,
And proudly shook the bridle too,
And then! his words were not a few, 75
Which Betty well could understand.

And now that Johnny is just going,
Though Betty's in a mighty flurry,
She gently pats the pony's side
On which her idiot boy must ride, 80
And seems no longer in a hurry.

But when the pony moved his legs –
Oh then for the poor idiot boy!
For joy he cannot hold the bridle,
For joy his head and heels are idle, 85
He's idle all for very joy.

And while the pony moves his legs,
In Johnny's left hand you may see
The green bough's motionless and dead;
The moon that shines above his head 90
Is not more still and mute than he.

His heart it was so full of glee
That till full fifty yards were gone
He quite forgot his holly whip
And all his skill in horsemanship – 95
Oh happy, happy, happy John!

And Betty's standing at the door,
And Betty's face with joy o'erflows,¹⁰
Proud of herself and proud of him,
She sees him in his travelling trim; 100
How quietly her Johnny goes!

The silence of her idiot boy –
What hopes it sends to Betty's heart!
He's at the guide-post,¹¹ he turns right,
She watches till he's out of sight, 105
And Betty will not then depart.

Burr, burr, now Johnny's lips they burr¹²
As loud as any mill or near it;
Meek as a lamb the pony moves,
And Johnny makes the noise he loves, 110

And Betty listens, glad to hear it.

Away she hies to Susan Gale,
And Johnny's in a merry tune;¹³
The owlets hoot, the owlets curr,
And Johnny's lips they burr, burr, burr, 115
And on he goes beneath the moon.

His steed and he right well agree,
For of this pony there's a rumour
That should he lose his eyes and ears,
And should he live a thousand years, 120
He never will be out of humour.

But then he is a horse that thinks!
And when he thinks his pace is slack;
Now, though he knows poor Johnny well,
Yet for his life he cannot tell 125
What he has got upon his back.

So through the moonlight lanes they go
And far into the moonlight dale,
And by the church and o'er the down
To bring a Doctor from the town 130
To comfort poor old Susan Gale.

And Betty, now at Susan's side,
Is in the middle of her story,
What comfort Johnny soon will bring,
With many a most diverting thing 135
Of Johnny's wit and Johnny's glory.¹⁴

And Betty's still at Susan's side –
By this time she's not quite so flurried;
Demure with porringer¹⁵ and plate

She sits, as if in Susan's fate 140
Her life and soul were buried.

But Betty (poor good woman!), she –
You plainly in her face may read it –
Could lend out of that moment's store
Five years of happiness or more 145
To any that might need it.

But yet I guess that now and then
With Betty all was not so well,
And to the road she turns her ears,
And thence full many a sound she hears, 150
Which she to Susan will not tell.

Poor Susan moans, poor Susan groans;
'As sure as there's a moon in heaven',
Cries Betty, 'he'll be back again –
They'll both be here, 'tis almost ten; 155
They'll both be here before eleven.'

Poor Susan moans, poor Susan groans,
The clock gives warning for eleven –
'Tis on the stroke. 'If Johnny's near',
Quoth Betty, 'he will soon be here, 160
As sure as there's a moon in heaven.'

The clock is on the stroke of twelve
And Johnny is not yet in sight;
The moon's in heaven, as Betty sees,
But Betty is not quite at ease – 165
And Susan has a dreadful night.

And Betty, half an hour ago,
On Johnny vile reflections cast;
'A little idle sauntering thing!'

With other names, an endless string, 170
But now that time is gone and past.

And Betty's drooping at the heart,
That happy time all past and gone;
'How can it be he is so late?
The Doctor, he has made him wait – 175
Susan, they'll both be here anon!'

And Susan's growing worse and worse,
And Betty's in a sad quandary,¹⁶
And then there's nobody to say
If she must go or she must stay – 180
She's in a sad quandary.

The clock is on the stroke of one,
But neither Doctor nor his guide
Appear along the moonlight road;
There's neither horse nor man abroad, 185
And Betty's still at Susan's side.

And Susan, she begins to fear
Of sad mischances not a few;
That Johnny may perhaps be drowned,
Or lost perhaps, and never found – 190
Which they must both forever rue.

She prefaced half a hint of this
With, 'God forbid it should be true!'
At the first word that Susan said,
Cried Betty, rising from the bed, 195
'Susan, I'd gladly stay with you;

I must be gone, I must away.
Consider, Johnny's but half-wise;

Susan, we must take care of him,
If he is hurt in life or limb –' 200
'Oh God forbid!' poor Susan cries.

'What can I do?' says Betty, going,
'What can I do to ease your pain?
Good Susan tell me, and I'll stay;
I fear you're in a dreadful way, 205
But I shall soon be back again.'

'Good Betty go, good Betty go,
There's nothing that can ease my pain.'
Then off she hies, but with a prayer
That God poor Susan's life would spare 210
Till she comes back again.

So through the moonlight lane she goes
And far into the moonlight dale;
And how she ran and how she walked
And all that to herself she talked 215
Would surely be a tedious tale.

In high and low, above, below,
In great and small, in round and square,
In tree and tower was Johnny seen,
In bush and brake, in black and green, 220
'Twas Johnny, Johnny, everywhere.

She's past the bridge that's in the dale,
And now the thought torments her sore –
Johnny perhaps his horse forsook
To hunt the moon that's in the brook, 225
And never will be heard of more.

And now she's high upon the down,
Alone amid a prospect wide;

There's neither Johnny nor his horse
Among the fern or in the gorse; 230
There's neither Doctor nor his guide.

'Oh saints! What is become of him?
Perhaps he's climbed into an oak
Where he will stay till he is dead;
Or sadly he has been misled 235
And joined the wandering gipsy-folk;

Or him that wicked pony's carried
To the dark cave, the goblin's hall;
Or in the castle he's pursuing,
Among the ghosts, his own undoing, 240
Or playing with the waterfall.'

At poor old Susan then she railed,
While to the town she posts away;
'If Susan had not been so ill,
Alas! I should have had him still, 245
My Johnny, till my dying day.'

Poor Betty, in this sad distemper,
The Doctor's self would hardly spare;
Unworthy things she talked, and wild –
Even he, of cattle¹⁷ the most mild, 250
The pony had his share.

And now she's got into the town
And to the Doctor's door she hies;
'Tis silence all on every side –
The town so long, the town so wide 255
Is silent as the skies.

And now she's at the Doctor's door,

She lifts the knocker – rap, rap, rap!
The Doctor at the casement¹⁸ shows
His glimmering eyes that peep and doze, 260
And one hand rubs his old nightcap.

‘Oh Doctor, Doctor! Where’s my Johnny?’
‘I’m here, what is’t you want with me?’
‘Oh sir, you know I’m Betty Foy
And I have lost my poor dear boy – 265
You know him, him you often see;

He’s not so wise as some folks be.’
‘The devil take his wisdom!’ said
The Doctor, looking somewhat grim,
‘What, woman, should I know of him?’ 270
And grumbling, he went back to bed.

‘Oh woe is me! Oh woe is me!
Here will I die, here will I die;
I thought to find my Johnny here,
But he is neither far nor near – 275
Oh what a wretched mother I!’

She stops, she stands, she looks about,
Which way to turn she cannot tell.
Poor Betty, it would ease her pain
If she had heart to knock again; 280
The clock strikes three – a dismal knell!

Then up along the town she hies,
No wonder if her senses fail,
This piteous news so much it shocked her
She quite forgot to send the Doctor 285
To comfort poor old Susan Gale.

And now she's high upon the down
And she can see a mile of road;
'Oh cruel! I'm almost threescore;
Such night as this was ne'er before, 290
There's not a single soul abroad.'

She listens, but she cannot hear
The foot of horse, the voice of man;
The streams with softest sound are flowing,
The grass you almost hear it growing, 295
You hear it now if e'er you can.

The owlets through the long blue night
Are shouting to each other still,
Fond lovers, yet not quite hob-nob,
They lengthen out the tremulous sob 300
That echoes far from hill to hill.

Poor Betty now has lost all hope,
Her thoughts are bent on deadly sin;
A green-grown pond she just has passed
And from the brink she hurries fast 305
Lest she should drown herself therein.

And now she sits her down and weeps,
Such tears she never shed before;
'Oh dear, dear pony! My sweet joy!
Oh carry back my idiot boy 310
And we will ne'er o'erload thee more.'

A thought is come into her head;
'The pony he is mild and good
And we have always used him well;
Perhaps he's gone along the dell 315
And carried Johnny to the wood.'

Then up she springs as if on wings –
She thinks no more of deadly sin;
If Betty fifty ponds should see,
The last of all her thoughts would be 320
To drown herself therein.

Oh reader, now that I might tell
What Johnny and his horse are doing,
What they've been doing all this time –
Oh could I put it into rhyme, 325
A most delightful tale pursuing!

Perhaps (and no unlikely thought)
He with his pony now doth roam
The cliffs and peaks so high that are,
To lay his hands upon a star 330
And in his pocket bring it home.

Perhaps he's turned himself about,
His face unto his horse's tail,
And still and mute, in wonder lost,
All like a silent horseman-ghost 335
He travels on along the vale.

And now, perhaps, he's hunting sheep,
A fierce and dreadful hunter he!
Yon valley that's so trim and green,
In five months' time, should he be seen, 340
A desert wilderness will be.

Perhaps, with head and heels on fire,
And like the very soul of evil,
He's galloping away, away,
And so he'll gallop on for aye, 345
The bane of all that dread the devil.

I to the muses have been bound
These fourteen years by strong indentures;¹⁹
Oh gentle muses, let me tell
But half of what to him befell, 350
For sure he met with strange adventures.

Oh gentle muses, is this kind?
Why will ye thus my suit repel?
Why of your further aid bereave²⁰ me?
And can ye thus unfriended leave me, 355
Ye muses, whom I love so well?

Who's yon, that, near the waterfall
Which thunders down with headlong force,
Beneath the moon, yet shining fair,
As careless as if nothing were, 360
Sits upright on a feeding horse?

Unto his horse that's feeding free
He seems, I think, the rein to give;
Of moon or stars he takes no heed,
Of such we in romances read – 365
'Tis Johnny, Johnny, as I live!

And that's the very pony too!
Where is she, where is Betty Foy?
She hardly can sustain her fears;
The roaring waterfall she hears, 370
And cannot find her idiot boy.

Your pony's worth his weight in gold,
Then calm your terrors, Betty Foy!
She's coming from among the trees,
And now, all full in view, she sees 375
Him whom she loves, her idiot boy,

And Betty sees the pony too.
Why stand you thus, good Betty Foy?
It is no goblin, 'tis no ghost –
'Tis he whom you so long have lost, 380
He whom you love, your idiot boy.

She looks again, her arms are up,
She screams, she cannot move for joy;
She darts as with a torrent's force,
She almost has o'erturned the horse, 385
And fast she holds her idiot boy.

And Johnny burrs and laughs aloud –
Whether in cunning or in joy
I cannot tell; but while he laughs,
Betty a drunken pleasure quaffs 390
To hear again her idiot boy.

And now she's at the pony's tail,
And now she's at the pony's head,
On that side now, and now on this,
And almost stifled with her bliss, 395
A few sad tears does Betty shed.

She kisses o'er and o'er again
Him whom she loves, her idiot boy;
She's happy here, she's happy there,
She is uneasy everywhere; 400
Her limbs are all alive with joy.

She pats the pony, where or when
She knows not, happy Betty Foy!
The little pony glad may be,
But he is milder far than she, 405
You hardly can perceive his joy.

‘Oh Johnny, never mind the Doctor;
You’ve done your best, and that is all.’
She took the reins when this was said,
And gently turned the pony’s head 410
From the loud waterfall.

By this the stars were almost gone,
The moon was setting on the hill
So pale you scarcely looked at her;
The little birds began to stir, 415
Though yet their tongues were still.

The pony, Betty, and her boy,
Wind slowly through the woody dale;
And who is she, betimes abroad,
That hobbles up the steep rough road? 420
Who is it but old Susan Gale?

Long Susan lay deep lost in thought
And many dreadful fears beset her,
Both for her messenger and nurse;
And as her mind grew worse and worse, 425
Her body it grew better.

She turned, she tossed herself in bed,
On all sides doubts and terrors met her,
Point after point did she discuss,
And while her mind was fighting thus, 430
Her body still grew better.

‘Alas, what is become of them?
These fears can never be endured –
I’ll to the wood.’ The word scarce said,
Did Susan rise up from her bed, 435
As if by magic cured.

Away she posts up hill and down,
And to the wood at length is come,
She spies her friends, she shouts a greeting –
Oh me, it is a merry meeting 440
As ever was in Christendom!

The owls have hardly sung their last
While our four travellers homeward wend;
The owls have hooted all night long,
And with the owls began my song, 445
And with the owls must end.

For while they all were travelling home,
Cried Betty, ‘Tell us Johnny, do,
Where all this long night you have been,
What you have heard, what you have seen – 450
And Johnny, mind you tell us true.’

Now Johnny all night long had heard
The owls in tuneful concert strive;
No doubt too he the moon had seen,
For in the moonlight he had been 455
From eight o’clock till five.

And thus to Betty’s question he
Made answer like a traveller bold
(His very words I give to you):
‘The cocks did crow to-who, to-who, 460
And the sun did shine so cold.’²¹
Thus answered Johnny in his glory,
And that was all his travel’s story.

The Idiot Boy

1 According to Wordsworth this poem was ‘composed in the groves of Alfoxden almost extempore; not a word, I believe, being corrected, though one stanza was omitted. I mention this in gratitude to those happy moments, for, in truth, I never wrote anything with so much glee’ (FN 10). For Southey’s less than charitable comments on the poem, see p. 751.

2 owlet full-grown owl.

3 girt saddle-girth.

4 what she ails what ails her.

5 faggots bundles of sticks for fuel.

6 in travelling trim i.e. saddled.

7 post travel quickly.

8 wand stick, cane.

9 charge instruction.

10 And...o'erflows Defending this poem in a letter to John Wilson, Wordsworth remarked that ‘I have indeed often looked upon the conduct of fathers and mothers of the lower classes of society towards idiots as the great triumph of the human heart. It is there that we see the strength, disinterestedness, and grandeur of love’ (EY 357).

11 guide-post signpost.

12 Burr...burr Coleridge attacked the poem in Biographia Literaria, on the grounds of its ‘disgusting images of ordinary morbid idiocy’; Wordsworth ‘has even, by the “burr, burr, burr” ... assisted in recalling them’ (CC Biographia ii 48–9).

13 tune mood.

14 Johnny's glory Defending this poem in a letter to John Wilson, Wordsworth remarked that, 'I have often applied to idiots, in my own mind, that sublime expression of scripture that, "their life is hidden with God"' (EY 357).

15 porringer wooden soup-bowl.

16 quandary stressed on the second syllable.

17 cattle animals.

18 casement window.

19 indentures contract by which apprentice is bound to a master who will teach him a trade. Wordsworth's apprenticeship to the muses of poetry, by his reckoning, began in 1784, when he was 14.

20 bereave deprive.

21 The cocks...cold According to Wordsworth, these words were spoken by a local idiot and reported to him at Alfoxden by his friend Thomas Poole. They provided the starting point for the poem (FN 10).

Lines written near Richmond, upon the Thames, at Evening (by Wordsworth, derived from a sonnet written 1789,
complete in this form by 29 March 1797)¹

How rich the wave in front, impressed
With evening twilight's summer hues,
While, facing thus the crimson west,

The boat her silent path pursues!²
And see how dark the backward stream, 5
A little moment past, so smiling!
And still, perhaps, with faithless gleam,
Some other loiterer beguiling.³

Such views the youthful bard allure,
But heedless of the following gloom, 10
He deems their colours shall endure
Till peace go with him to the tomb.
And let him nurse his fond deceit;
And what if he must die in sorrow?
Who would not cherish dreams so sweet, 15
Though grief and pain⁴ may come tomorrow?

Glide gently, thus forever glide,
Oh Thames! that other bards may see
As lovely visions by thy side
As now, fair river; come to me! 20
Oh glide, fair stream, forever so;
Thy quiet soul on all bestowing,
Till all our minds forever flow,
As thy deep waters now are flowing.

Vain thought! Yet be as now thou art, 25
That in thy waters may be seen
The image of a poet's heart,
How bright, how solemn, how serene!
Such heart did once the poet⁵ bless
Who, pouring here a later ditty, 30
Could find no refuge from distress
But in the milder grief of pity.

Remembrance! as we glide along,

For him suspend the dashing oar,⁶
And pray that never child of song 35
May know his freezing sorrows⁷ more.
How calm, how still! the only sound
The dripping of the oar suspended!
The evening darkness gathers round
By virtue's holiest powers attended. 40

Lines written near Richmond

¹ The title was concocted for the poem's appearance in Lyrical Ballads: 'The title is scarcely correct. It was during a solitary walk on the banks of the Cam that I was first struck with this appearance, and applied it to my own feelings in the manner here expressed, changing the scene to the Thames, near Windsor' (FN 36).

² How rich...beguiling The poem begins with a picturesque sunset, described in the manner of the picturesque theorist, William Gilpin, whose Observations on the Lakes (1786) Wordsworth admired from his schooldays onwards. Gilpin had described such a scene in exactly this manner: 'its fires, glowing in the west, light up a new radiance through the landscape; and spread over it, instead of sober light and shade, all the colours of nature, in one bright, momentary gleam' (i 91).

³ Some...beguiling The brilliant sky at sunset draws the loiterer's attention away from the darkness coming up behind. Wordsworth is imitating Bowles's Sonnet VIII. On Leaving a Village in Scotland:

Yet still your brightest images shall smile,
To charm the lingering stranger, and beguile
His way ...
(ll. 10–12)

⁴ grief and pain a comment that anticipates the doleful judgement of Resolution and Independence 48–9: ‘We poets in our youth begin in gladness, / But thereof comes in the end despondency and madness.’

⁵ ‘Collins’s “Ode on the Death of Thomson” – the last written, I believe, of the poems which were published during his lifetime. This Ode is also alluded to in the next stanza’ (Wordsworth’s note). William Collins (1721–59) actually published the ‘Ode’ in June 1749, a year before The Passions in 1750. James Thomson (1700–48), poet and author of The Seasons, was buried in Richmond Church. Wordsworth was a lifelong admirer of both.

⁶ For him...oar cf. Collins, ‘Ode on the Death of Mr. Thomson’ 13–16:

Remembrance oft shall haunt the shore

When Thames in summer wreaths is dressed,

And oft suspend the dashing oar

To bid his gentle spirit rest!

⁷ his freezing sorrows Collins suffered spells of insanity and poverty.

Expostulation and Reply (by Wordsworth, composed probably 23 May 1798)¹

‘Why, William, on that old grey stone,
Thus for the length of half a day,
Why, William, sit you thus alone
And dream your time away?’

Where are your books that light bequeathed 5
To beings else forlorn and blind?
Up, up, and drink the spirit breathed

From dead men to their kind!

You look round on your mother earth
As if she for no purpose bore you; 10
As if you were her first-born birth,
And none had lived before you!’

One morning thus, by Esthwaite Lake,²
When life was sweet I knew not why,
To me my good friend Matthew spake, 15
And thus I made reply.

‘The eye it cannot choose but see,
We cannot bid the ear be still;
Our bodies feel where’er they be,
Against or with our will. 20

Nor less I deem that there are powers³
Which of themselves our minds impress,
That we can feed this mind of ours
In a wise passiveness.⁴

Think you, mid all this mighty sum 25
Of things forever speaking,
That nothing of itself will come,
But we must still⁵ be seeking?

Then ask not wherefore, here, alone,
Conversing as I may,⁶ 30
I sit upon this old grey stone
And dream my time away.’

Expostulation and Reply

² Esthwaite Lake Wordsworth attended school at Hawkshead, on Esthwaite Water in the Lake District. Although this poem was inspired by a discussion with William Hazlitt at Alfoxden in 1798, Wordsworth locates it in the Lakes, and characterizes Matthew as his schoolmaster.

³ powers i.e. external to us; natural forces.

⁴ wise passiveness 'Oh how few can transmute activity of mind into emotion,' Coleridge exclaimed in a notebook entry of 1804, 'yet there are [those] who, active as the stirring tempest and playful as a May blossom in a breeze of May, can yet for hours together remain with hearts broad awake, and the understanding asleep in all but its retentiveness and receptivity' (Notebooks i 1834).

⁵ still always.

⁶ Conversing...may i.e. with the natural world.

The Tables Turned: an evening scene, on the same subject (by Wordsworth, composed probably 23 May 1798)¹

Up, up, my friend, and clear your looks!

Why all this toil and trouble?²

Up, up, my friend, and quit your books,

Or surely you'll grow double!

The sun above the mountain's head 5
A freshening lustre mellow
Through all the long green fields has spread,
His first sweet evening yellow.

Books! 'tis a dull and endless strife;
Come hear the woodland linnet – 10
How sweet his music! On my life,
There's more of wisdom in it.

And hark, how blithe the throstle³ sings!
And he is no mean preacher;
Come forth into the light of things, 15
Let nature be your teacher.

She has a world of ready wealth,
Our minds and hearts to bless –
Spontaneous wisdom breathed by health,
Truth breathed by cheerfulness. 20

One impulse from a vernal wood
May teach you more of man,
Of moral evil and of good
Than all the sages can.

Sweet is the lore which nature brings, 25
Our meddling intellect
Misshapes the beautiful forms of things –
We murder to dissect.⁴

Enough of science⁵ and of art,⁶
Close up these barren leaves;⁷ 30
Come forth, and bring with you a heart
That watches and receives.

The Tables Turned

1 The speaker is William from the preceding poem, who simply continues his argument.

2 toil and trouble an echo of the witches in Macbeth: ‘Double, double, toil and trouble’ (IV i 10–11).

3 throstle thrush.

4 We murder to dissect i.e. in analysing what we perceive, we destroy it.

5 science knowledge.

6 art skill, artfulness.

7 barren leaves pages of books.

Old Man Travelling; Animal Tranquillity and Decay, A Sketch (by Wordsworth, composed by June 1797)

The little hedgerow birds
That peck along the road, regard him not.
He travels on, and in his face, his step,
His gait, is one expression; every limb,
His look and bending figure, all bespeak 5
A man who does not move with pain, but moves
With thought. He is insensibly subdued
To settled quiet; he is one by whom
All effort seems forgotten, one to whom
Long patience has such mild composure given, 10
That patience now doth seem a thing of which
He hath no need. He is by nature led

To peace so perfect that the young behold
With envy what the old man hardly feels.

I asked him whither he was bound, and what 15
The object of his journey; he replied:
'Sir, I am going many miles to take
A last leave of my son, a mariner,
Who from a sea-fight has been brought to Falmouth,
And there is dying in an hospital.'¹ 20

Old Man Travelling

¹ Lines 15–20 may have been a late addition to the poem and were removed from texts published after 1815.

The Complaint of a Forsaken Indian Woman (by Wordsworth, composed between early March and 16 May 1798)

When a Northern Indian, from sickness, is unable to continue his journey with his companions, he is left behind, covered over with deer-skins, and is supplied with water, food, and fuel, if the situation of the place will afford it. He is informed of the track which his companions intend to pursue, and, if he is unable to follow or overtake them, he perishes alone in the desert (unless he should have the good fortune to fall in with some other tribes of Indians). It is unnecessary to add that the females are equally, or still more, exposed to the same fate; see that very interesting work, Hearne's Journey from Hudson's Bay to the Northern Ocean.¹ When the Northern Lights² (as the same writer informs us) vary their position in the air, they make a rustling and a crackling noise. This circumstance is alluded to in the first stanza of the following poem.

Before I see another day
Oh let my body die away!

In sleep I heard the northern gleams,³
The stars they were among my dreams;
In sleep did I behold the skies, 5
I saw the crackling flashes drive,
And yet⁴ they are upon my eyes,
And yet I am alive.
Before I see another day
Oh let my body die away! 10

My fire is dead⁵ – it knew no pain,
Yet is it dead, and I remain.
All stiff with ice the ashes lie,
And they are dead, and I will die.
When I was well, I wished to live, 15
For⁶ clothes, for warmth, for food and fire;
But they to me no joy can give,
No pleasure now, and no desire.
Then here contented will I lie,
Alone I cannot fear to die. 20

Alas, you might have dragged me on
Another day, a single one!
Too soon despair o'er me prevailed,
Too soon my heartless⁷ spirit failed;
When you were gone my limbs were stronger – 25
And oh, how grievously I rue
That afterwards, a little longer,
My friends, I did not follow you!
For strong and without pain I lay,
My friends, when you were gone away. 30

My child, they gave thee to another,
A woman who was not thy mother;
When from my arms my babe they took,

On me how strangely did he look!
Through his whole body something ran, 35
A most strange something did I see –
As if he strove to be a man,
That he might pull the sledge for me.
And then he stretched his arms, how wild!
Oh mercy, like a little child! 40

My little joy! My little pride!
In two days more I must have died.
Then do not weep and grieve for me;
I feel I must have died with thee.
Oh wind, that o'er my head art flying 45
The way my friends their course did bend,
I should not feel the pain of dying
Could I with thee a message send.
Too soon, my friends, you went away,
For I had many things to say. 50

I'll follow you across the snow,
You travel heavily and slow;
In spite of all my weary pain,
I'll look upon your tents again.
My fire is dead, and snowy white 55
The water which beside it stood;
The wolf has come to me tonight
And he has stolen away my food.
Forever left alone am I,
Then wherefore should I fear to die? 60

My journey will be shortly run,⁸
I shall not see another sun,
I cannot lift my limbs to know
If they have any life or no.
My poor forsaken child, if I 65

For once could have thee close to me,
With happy heart I then would die
And my last thoughts would happy be.
I feel my body die away,
I shall not see another day. 70

The Complaint of a Forsaken Indian Woman

¹ A reference to Samuel Hearne's Journey from Prince of Wales' Fort in Hudson Bay, to the Northern Ocean (1795), which describes the plight of a sick Indian woman left behind by her tribe: 'The poor woman ... came up with us three several times, after having been left in the manner described. At length, poor creature, she dropped behind, and no one attempted to go back in search of her' (p. 203).

² Northern Lights the aurora borealis.

³ northern gleams Hearne writes: 'I do not remember to have met with any travellers into high northern latitudes, who remarked their having heard the Northern Lights make any noise in the air as they vary their colours or position – which may probably be owing to the want of perfect silence at the time they made their observations on those meteors. I can positively affirm that in still nights I have frequently heard them make a rustling and crackling noise, like the waving of a large flag in a fresh gale of wind' (Journey, p. 224).

⁴ yet still.

⁵ My fire is dead According to Hearne, members of the tribe abandoned to die were left with some provisions: 'the friends or relations of the sick generally leave them some victuals and water, and, if the situation of the place will afford it, a little firing. When those articles are provided, the person to be left is acquainted with the road which the others intend to go, and then, after covering them well up with deer-skins, etc., they take their leave, and walk away crying' (Journey, pp. 202–3).

⁶ For i.e. I wished for ...

⁷ heartless disheartened.

⁸ My journey will be shortly run cf. Samson Agonistes 597–8: ‘My race of glory run, and race of shame, / And I shall shortly be with them that rest.’

The Convict (by Wordsworth, composed between 21 March and October 1796)¹

The glory of evening was spread through the west –
On the slope of a mountain I stood;

While the joy that precedes the calm season of rest²
Rang loud through the meadow and wood.

‘And must we then part from a dwelling so fair?’ 5
In the pain of my spirit I said,
And with a deep sadness I turned to repair
To the cell where the convict is laid.

The thick-ribbed walls that o’ershadow the gate
Resound, and the dungeons unfold; 10

I pause,³ and at length through the glimmering grate⁴
That outcast of pity behold.

His black matted head on his shoulder is bent,
And deep is the sigh of his breath,
And with steadfast dejection his eyes are intent 15
On the fetters that link him to death.

’Tis sorrow enough on that visage to gaze,
That body dismissed from his care;

Yet my fancy has pierced to his heart, and portrays⁵
More terrible images there. 20

His bones are consumed and his life-blood is dried,
With wishes the past to undo;
And his crime, through the pains that o'erwhelm him, descried,
Still⁶ blackens and grows on his view.

When from the dark synod⁷ or blood-reeking field,⁸ 25
To his chamber the monarch is led,
All soothers of sense their soft virtue shall yield,
And quietness pillow his head.

But if grief, self-consumed, in oblivion would doze,
And conscience her tortures appease, 30
Mid tumult and uproar this man must repose
In the comfortless vault of disease.

When his fetters at night have so pressed on his limbs
That the weight can no longer be borne,
If, while a half-slumber his memory bedims, 35
The wretch on his pallet should turn;

While the jail-mastiff howls at the dull-clanking chain,
From the roots of his hair there shall start
A thousand sharp punctures of cold-sweating pain,
And terror shall leap at his heart. 40

But now he half-raises his deep-sunken eye,
And the motion unsettles a tear;
The silence of sorrow it seems to supply,
And asks of me why I am here.

'Poor victim! No idle intruder has stood 45
With o'erweening complacence our state to compare –

But one whose first wish is the wish to be good
Is come as a brother thy sorrows to share.⁹

At thy name, though Compassion her nature resign,
Though in Virtue's proud mouth thy report be a stain,¹⁰ 50
My care, if the arm of the mighty were mine,
Would plant thee where yet thou might'st blossom again.'¹¹

The Convict

¹ Prison reform was a topical issue at the time this poem was first composed, thanks partly to Godwin, who had argued, in the second edition of Political Justice (1796), that it was wrong to punish someone 'for what is past and irrecoverable' (ii 322).

² the calm season of rest i.e. night-time.

³ I pause i.e. to allow his eyes to adjust to the darkness.

⁴ grate barred window to the prison cell.

⁵ portrays visualizes.

⁶ Still continually.

⁷ dark synod secret council.

⁹ No idle...share The narrator tells the convict that he comes not to gloat over, but to share his grief.

¹⁰ At thy...stain Compassionate people feel nothing for convicts, while the virtuous cannot mention them without feeling tainted.

¹¹ My care...again perhaps a plea for the humane transportation of convicts, though it is just as likely that Wordsworth is just suggesting that they be given a second chance.

Lines written a few miles above Tintern
Abbey, on revisiting the banks of the Wye during a tour, 13 July 1798 (by Wordsworth, composed 10–13 July 1798)¹

Five years have passed; five summers, with the length
Of five long winters!² And again I hear
These waters, rolling from their mountain springs
With a sweet inland murmur.³ Once again
Do I behold these steep and lofty cliffs, 5
Which on a wild secluded scene impress
Thoughts of more deep seclusion, and connect
The landscape with the quiet of the sky.⁴
The day is come when I again repose
Here, under this dark sycamore, and view 10
These plots of cottage-ground, these orchard-tufts,
Which, at this season, with their unripe fruits,
Among the woods and copses lose themselves,
Nor, with their green and simple hue, disturb
The wild green landscape. Once again I see 15
These hedgerows – hardly hedgerows, little lines
Of sportive wood run wild; these pastoral farms⁵
Green to the very door; and wreaths of smoke
Sent up in silence from among the trees,

With some uncertain notice,⁶ as might seem, 20
Of vagrant dwellers in the houseless woods,
Or of some hermit's cave, where by his fire
The hermit sits alone.⁷

 Though absent long,
These forms of beauty⁸ have not been to me
As is a landscape to a blind man's eye; 25
But oft, in lonely rooms, and mid the din
Of towns and cities, I have owed to them,
In hours of weariness, sensations sweet,
Felt in the blood, and felt along the heart,
And passing even into my purer mind⁹ 30
With tranquil restoration;¹⁰ feelings too
Of unremembered pleasure – such, perhaps,
As may have had no trivial influence
On that best portion of a good man's life,
His little, nameless, unremembered acts 35
Of kindness and of love. Nor less, I trust,
To them I may have owed another gift,
Of aspect more sublime; that blessed mood
In which the burden of the mystery,¹¹
In which the heavy and the weary weight 40
Of all this unintelligible world
Is lightened – that serene and blessed mood
In which the affections gently lead us on Until the breath of this corporeal frame¹²
And even the motion of our human blood 45
Almost suspended, we are laid asleep
In body, and become a living soul,¹³
While with an eye made quiet by the power
Of harmony, and the deep power of joy,¹⁴
We see into the life of things.¹⁵ 50

 If this

Be but a vain belief – yet oh, how oft
In darkness, and amid the many shapes
Of joyless daylight, when the fretful stir
Unprofitable,¹⁶ and the fever of the world, 55
Have hung upon the beatings of my heart,
How oft, in spirit, have I turned to thee,
Oh sylvan¹⁷ Wye! Thou wanderer through the woods,
How often has my spirit turned to thee!
And now, with gleams of half-extinguished thought, 60
With many recognitions dim and faint
And somewhat of a sad perplexity,¹⁸
The picture of the mind revives again;
While here I stand, not only with the sense
Of present pleasure, but with pleasing thoughts 65
That in this moment there is life and food
For future years.¹⁹ And so I dare to hope,
Though changed, no doubt, from what I was when first
I came among these hills, when like a roe²⁰
I bounded o’er the mountains²¹ by the sides 70
Of the deep rivers and the lonely streams
Wherever nature led, more like a man
Flying from something that he dreads than one
Who sought the thing he loved.²² For nature then
(The coarser pleasures of my boyish days 75
And their glad animal movements all gone by)
To me was all in all.

I cannot paint
What then I was. The sounding cataract
Haunted me like a passion;²³ the tall rock, 80
The mountain, and the deep and gloomy wood,
Their colours and their forms, were then to me
An appetite, a feeling and a love
That had no need of a remoter charm

By thought supplied, or any interest 85
Unborrowed from the eye. That time is past,
And all its aching joys are now no more,
And all its dizzy raptures. Not for this
Faint I, nor mourn, nor murmur; other gifts
Have followed – for such loss, I would believe, 90
Abundant recompense. For I have learned
To look on nature not as in the hour
Of thoughtless youth, but hearing oftentimes
The still, sad²⁴ music of humanity,
Not harsh nor grating, though of ample power 95
To chasten and subdue. And I have felt
A presence that disturbs me with the joy
Of elevated thoughts, a sense sublime
Of something²⁵ far more deeply interfused,
Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns, 100
And the round ocean, and the living air,
And the blue sky, and in the mind of man²⁶ –
A motion and a spirit that impels
All thinking things, all objects of all thought,
And rolls through all things.²⁷ Therefore am I still 105
A lover of the meadows and the woods
And mountains, and of all that we behold
From this green earth, of all the mighty world
Of eye and ear (both what they half-create²⁸
And what perceive) – well-pleased to recognize 110
In nature and the language of the sense,²⁹
The anchor of my purest³⁰ thoughts, the nurse,
The guide, the guardian of my heart, and soul
Of all my moral being.
Nor, perchance, 115
If I were not thus taught, should I the more
Suffer my genial spirits³¹ to decay;

For thou³² art with me,³³ here, upon the banks
Of this fair river – thou, my dearest friend,
My dear, dear friend, and in thy voice I catch I20
The language of my former heart, and read
My former pleasures in the shooting lights
Of thy wild eyes. Oh, yet a little while
May I behold in thee what I was once,
My dear, dear sister! And this prayer I make, I25
Knowing that Nature never did betray
The heart that loved her;³⁴ 'tis her privilege,
Through all the years of this our life, to lead
From joy to joy, for she can so inform³⁵
The mind that is within us, so impress I30
With quietness and beauty, and so feed
With lofty thoughts, that neither evil tongues,³⁶
Rash judgements, nor the sneers of selfish men,
Nor greetings where no kindness is, nor all
The dreary intercourse of daily life, I35
Shall e'er prevail against us, or disturb
Our cheerful faith that all which we behold
Is full of blessings. Therefore let the moon
Shine on thee in thy solitary walk,
And let the misty mountain-winds be free I40
To blow against thee. And in after-years,
When these wild ecstasies shall be matured
Into a sober pleasure, when thy mind
Shall be a mansion³⁷ for all lovely forms,
Thy memory be as a dwelling-place I45
For all sweet sounds and harmonies – oh then
If solitude, or fear, or pain, or grief
Should be thy portion,³⁸ with what healing thoughts
Of tender joy wilt thou remember me,
And these my exhortations! Nor perchance, I50
If I should be where I no more can hear

Thy voice, nor catch from thy wild eyes these gleams
Of past existence, wilt thou then forget
That on the banks of this delightful stream
We stood together; and that I, so long I55
A worshipper of nature, hither came
Unwearied in that service – rather say
With warmer love, oh with far deeper zeal
Of holier love! Nor wilt thou then forget
That, after many wanderings, many years I60
Of absence, these steep woods and lofty cliffs
And this green pastoral landscape, were to me
More dear, both for themselves, and for thy sake.

Lines written a few miles above Tintern Abbey

1 ‘No poem of mine was composed under circumstances more pleasant for me to remember than this: I began it upon leaving Tintern, after crossing the Wye, and concluded it just as I was entering Bristol in the evening, after a ramble of four or five days, with my sister. Not a line of it was altered, and not any part of it written down till I reached Bristol. It was published almost immediately after in the little volume of which so much has been said in these notes’ (FN 15). In conversation and correspondence Wordsworth and his circle usually referred to the poem as ‘Tintern Abbey’.

2 Five years...winters Wordsworth’s first visit to the Wye was in August 1793.

3 ‘The river is not affected by the tides a few miles above Tintern’ (Wordsworth’s note). Wordsworth later commented: ‘The Wye is a stately and majestic river from its width and depth, but never slow and sluggish; you can always hear its murmur. It travels through a woody country, now varied with cottages and green meadows, and now with huge and fantastic rocks’ (Christopher Wordsworth, Memoirs of William Wordsworth (2 vols, London, 1851), i 117).

4 connect...sky The fusing of landscape and sky is a picturesque touch derived from William Gilpin, Observations on the River Wye (1782): ‘Many of the furnaces on the banks of the river consume charcoal which is manufactured on the spot, and the smoke (which is frequently seen issuing from the sides of the hills, and spreading its thin veil over a part of them) beautifully breaks their lines, and unites them with the sky’ (p. 12).

5 pastoral farms sheep farms.

6 With some uncertain notice faintly discernible.

7 as might seem...alone The ‘vagrant dwellers’ (gypsies) and hermit are figments of the imagination; the smoke comes from the charcoal-furnaces (see note 4 above).

8 forms of beauty natural objects, impressed on the mind in the manner described at Pedlar 27–43.

9 my purer mind i.e. the spiritual element of his being.

10 restoration The memory of the ‘forms of beauty’ is spiritually restorative, like the spots of time, Two-Part Prelude i 294, by which the mind is ‘nourished and invisibly repaired’.

11 the burden of the mystery Life is burdensome because the affairs of the world are so often ‘unintelligible’ (l. 41).

12 corporeal frame the physical body.

13 become a living soul alluding to the moment at which Adam was created by God: ‘And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul’ (Genesis 2:7).

14 the deep power of joy ‘Joy’, during the Alfoxden period, is the name given by Coleridge and Wordsworth to the pantheist perception of Nature as unified by a universal life force; see Pedlar 217–18: ‘in all things / He saw one life, and felt that it was joy.’

15 Until the breath...things The ‘forms of beauty’ induce a mystic state in which the poet is released from the confines of the body and instead engages, in a completely spiritual manner, with the life-force of the universe.

16 Unprofitable probably an echo of Hamlet: ‘How ... unprofitable / Seem to me all the uses of this world’ (I ii 133–4).

17 sylvan wooded.

18 sad perplexity due to the fact that the ‘recognitions’ are only ‘dim and faint’; the memorized ‘forms of beauty’ do not match up to what is before the poet as he looks down at the same scene five years later.

19 pleasing thoughts...future years In the five years since his first visit he has derived pleasure from recollections of the Wye Valley; he hopes that the present visit will provide similar benefits in future. The habit of storing mental pictures is described, months before, in Pedlar 30–43.

20 roe small deer.

21 like a roe...mountains from Song of Solomon 2:8–9: ‘The voice of my beloved! Behold, he cometh leaping upon the mountains, skipping upon the hills. My beloved is like a roe, or a young hart.’

22 more like...loved In August 1793 Wordsworth was wandering across the countryside in a state of severe emotional distress, as the newly declared war on France prevented him from returning to Annette Vallon who, in December 1792, had given birth to their illegitimate daughter, Caroline.

23 The sounding...passion cf. Pedlar 31–4, where images of landscape ‘almost seemed / To haunt the bodily sense’.

24 still, sad Wordsworth alludes to the ‘still, small’ voice of God that speaks to Elijah, 1 Kings 19:12.

25 something Wordsworth is deliberately unspecific, but there is little doubt that he is thinking in terms of a universal, pantheistic life-force – the One Life.

26 the light...man probably, as critics argue, a recollection of Virgil, Aeneid vi 724–7 (translated): ‘an inner spirit sustains the sky and the earth and the sea, the bright globe of the moon, the sun and the stars, and mind activates the whole frame, pervading all its members, and blends with the great body.’

27 And I have felt...things This remarkable affirmation of the pantheist One Life should be compared with Pedlar 204–22, composed only months before.

28 half-create Wordsworth notes a borrowing from Young, Night Thoughts vi 427: ‘And half-create the wondrous world they [the senses] see’.

29 the language of the sense what the senses perceive.

30 purest most spiritual.

31 genial spirits creative energies, vitality. Cf. Samson Agonistes 594: ‘So much I feel my genial spirits droop.’

32 thou Dorothy Wordsworth.

33 For thou art with me an allusion to the most famous of the Psalms: ‘Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me' (23:4).

34 that Nature...her probably an allusion to Samuel Daniel, The Civil Wars ii 225–6: 'Here have you craggy rocks to take your part, / That never will betray their faith to you.'

35 inform imbue.

36 evil tongues Milton describes himself as 'On evil times though fallen, and evil tongues' (Paradise Lost vii 26).

William Wordsworth (1770–1850)

William Wordsworth was born on 7 April 1770, the second son of John Wordsworth Sr (1741–83), legal agent for Sir James Lowther, later Earl of Lonsdale, the most powerful landowner in the Lake District. The family was relatively well off, and lived in the grandest house in the main street of the small market town of Cockermouth. In March 1778 Wordsworth's mother Ann died of pneumonia. He was sent to Hawkshead Grammar School in May 1779, on the other side of the Lake District. Here he received an excellent education in the English grammar-school tradition, acquiring expertise in Latin, Greek and mathematics.¹ He lodged with the kindly Ann Tyson in Colthouse, and prospered under two teachers, William Taylor and Thomas Bowman, recent graduates from Cambridge University. They loved contemporary poetry, and with their encouragement Wordsworth became an early reader, and admirer, of Cowper, Charlotte Smith, Helen Maria Williams, Robert Burns and Anna Laetitia Barbauld.²

When he was 13 his father died, leaving him and his siblings (Richard, Christopher, John and Dorothy) orphans. It was a devastating event in emotional and psychological terms, but its most immediate effect was to render the Wordsworth children homeless and at the mercy of relatives, not all of whom were happy to support their upbringing and education. This would be a problem throughout the next decade, as the sums necessary for Wordsworth's university years were stinted, and pressure was exerted on him to become a clergyman.

His good relationships with friends and teachers at school seem to have insulated him from the full impact of his parents' deaths. It was at Hawkshead, when he was 15, that he began to compose poetry; his teachers quickly recognized that he was producing something better than much of what was published at the time. When he was 16, one of his sonnets appeared in a major periodical, the European Magazine. By the time he left Hawkshead he had composed a long poem, 'The Vale of Esthwaite', which included an early version of the spot of time in which he waited for the horses to take him home to see his dying father.³

'Beside the pleasant mills of Trompington / I laughed with Chaucer',⁴ he would write in The Prelude – and Wordsworth's Cambridge years seem to have been happy ones. He continued to write poetry but after his first year failed to distinguish himself in his academic studies. The University syllabus was concerned chiefly with the work of the Greek mathematician Euclid, which he had mastered at Hawkshead;⁵ in later years he suggested that the level of proficiency he had reached at school was so high that he felt unchallenged by the Cambridge course. Nonetheless, he did better in College examinations on Latin and Greek literature, which he translated in his spare time. His relatives were impatient for him to enter the church and become financially independent, and it may have been partly in reaction to them that he went to France for a lengthy walking tour in 1790 with a College friend, Robert Jones.

France was in the grip of Revolution, and Wordsworth and Jones were swept up in it. Wordsworth returned on his own in 1791–2, and stayed for a time at Blois, near Orléans. Here he met Michel Beaupuy, the soldier who was to serve as a mentor (see p. 572, below), and had an affair with a French girl, Annette Vallon. She gave birth to a child, Caroline Wordsworth, in December 1792. By then he was back in London, publishing his poems, An Evening Walk and Descriptive Sketches, as a means of raising money before returning to France to join his family. Although he succeeded in getting the poems into print (they appeared in late January 1793), his return to France was delayed by the execution of Louis XVI in February, which led almost immediately to Britain's declaration of war on France.

His failure to return to Annette and their child caused Wordsworth profound distress – a response that strengthened his attachment to the French cause. One symptom of this was the composition in spring 1793 of a pamphlet defending regicide, A Letter to the Bishop of Llandaff. It argued from a republican position, and suggested that popular violence was an inevitable (and excusable) by-product of revolution. Had it been published at the time it was composed, Wordsworth would almost certainly have been tried for treason. Fortunately for him, it did not appear in print until 1876. The frustrated pamphleteer went on a walking tour that took him to Portsmouth, where he saw the British fleet preparing to fight the French; Salisbury Plain, which he crossed in a hallucinatory state (recalled in Thirteen-Book Prelude xii 312 ff.); Tintern Abbey, which he saw for the first time (see Tintern Abbey, especially ll. 76–84), and finally Wales, where he stayed with Robert Jones.

At this period the radical philosophy of Godwin's Political Justice (see p. 156) had an appeal for him in its non-violent affirmation of revolutionary ideals, and when he returned to London in 1795 the two men became friends, breakfasting together with other rationalists. What he liked about Godwinism was its uncompromising imposition of justice on a society that was (in his view) corrupt; in Godwin's system the process by which reason would take over the running of society was inescapable. But Wordsworth would soon tire of it, because Godwin outlawed emotion. And as he matured in his early twenties, Wordsworth began to come to terms with the grief stemming from the early loss of his parents.

By 1796 he had rejected the strictures of Godwinian rationalism and was living with his sister Dorothy at Racedown Lodge in Dorset. In this country retreat he nurtured his continuing interest in politics while continuing to write poetry – though at this stage he published very little. The closeness of their adult years owed much to grief at their parents' loss in 1783. They lived together as early as 1794, at Windy Brow near Keswick in the Lake District, and it seemed natural that they set up house together in Dorset. Dorothy had no one else with whom she could live, and in those days it was not respectable for single women to live on their own. Her healing and kindly influence provided the environment in which Wordsworth was able to compose the earliest version of The Ruined Cottage, which Coleridge probably heard when he visited the Wordsworths at Racedown in June 1797.

The Ruined Cottage is Wordsworth's first indisputably great poem. It has been aptly described by its first editor, Jonathan Wordsworth, as a 'tragedy'; what distinguishes the version presented here (completed in the spring of 1798) is the optimism of its conclusion in which, confronted by the pain and suffering of the ill-fated Margaret, we are directed to feel consolation at the sight of the spear-grass and other plants in her garden:

I well remember that those very plumes,
Those weeds, and the high speargrass on that wall,
By mist and silent raindrops silvered o'er,
As once I passed did to my mind convey
So still an image of tranquillity,
So calm and still, and looked so beautiful
Amid the uneasy thoughts which filled my mind,
That what we feel of sorrow and despair
From ruin and from change, and all the grief
The passing shows of being leave behind,
Appeared an idle dream that could not live
Where meditation was.

(ll. 513–24)

This is a central statement in Romantic poetry: through Margaret's incorporation into the wildness of the spear-grass and weeds that have taken over her garden, grief at her passing is found to be nothing more than an 'idle dream'. Her earthly fate is thus part of a cosmic process of becoming. In another poem, written in late 1798, Wordsworth would describe a woman whose corpse is 'Rolled round in earth's diurnal course / With rocks and stones and trees!' (see p. 488) – as if part of a larger harmony. Grief is a powerful force throughout Wordsworth's poetry, and in the great work of 1797–8 it finds consolation through apprehension of a cosmic unity.

In this respect, Wordsworth reflects Coleridge's influence, and his plans for a philosophical poem called 'The Recluse', of which The Ruined Cottage was to have been part. Seeing around them the continued hardship and suffering which the French Revolution was intended to counteract, Wordsworth and Coleridge asked themselves how poetry might ameliorate it. The answer was to embody elements of both men's thought. Its central tenet (later to be the subject of Prelude Book VIII) was that love of Nature led to love of mankind; that is to say, the intensely perceived, and imaginatively enhanced, engagement with the life-force running through the natural world could lead, in turn, to sympathy and compassion for all things, including other members of the human race. Essentially, 'The Recluse' would argue that if everyone were 'converted' by imaginative process, the world would be improved, and a sort of Utopia created in which humanity could live in harmony with Nature and itself.

The emphasis on the role of Nature was distinctively Wordsworthian, and is attributed to him when it appears for the first time in Coleridge's poetry, in 'This Lime-Tree Bower my Prison', in July 1797 (p. 632); the pantheism came from Coleridge, who had espoused his conviction in a unifying, all-embracing divinity since 1794, when he wrote the first version of Religious Musings (see p. 628). A poem that explained how love of Nature could lead to universal brotherhood would, Wordsworth and Coleridge believed, precipitate the process. They foresaw a world in which, filled with the loving life-force that flowed through nature, people would feel love for one other. It was something they had already experienced for themselves:

And from the blessed power that rolls
We'll frame the measure of our souls –
They shall be tuned to love.
(‘Lines Written at a Small Distance from My House’ 33–6)

This would lead to the millennium – Christ’s thousand-year rule on earth. Such beliefs were not as mad as they now sound. It was widely believed, as the eighteenth century came to an end, that the American and French Revolutions were harbingers of universal betterment, and that the scriptural prophecies of St John the Divine were soon to be fulfilled. ‘The ancient tradition that the world will be consumed in fire at the end of six thousand years is true, as I have heard from Hell’, Blake had written in The Marriage of Heaven and Hell (1790) (see p. 218 above). Neither Wordsworth nor Coleridge would have declared their views so nakedly, but a millennial brotherhood was in their sights as they devised ‘The Recluse’. Coleridge had wanted to write such a poem himself (he would have called it The Brook), but he so idolized Wordsworth that he persuaded him he was the only poet capable of writing it. What more noble aim than to write the poem that would, in effect, precipitate the end of the world? It would dominate Wordsworth’s poetic ambitions for the next forty years.

Despite Wordsworth’s initial enthusiasm for the concept of pantheism – the belief that the God is all, and all is God – it played less part in his poetry after 1798. Perhaps that was symptomatic of the fact that he found it hard to sustain a belief in the optimistic philosophy Coleridge had formulated. And perhaps that, in turn, was why he never completed ‘The Recluse’. Not that he didn’t try. ‘Home at Grasmere’, Part I, Book I of ‘The Recluse’, was probably composed in 1800; ‘A Tuft of Primroses’ was written in 1806; The Excursion, a lengthy preliminary to ‘The Recluse’, was published in 1814; and he continued to write fragmentary drafts towards it until the 1830s. But Wordsworth of all people was aware that none of these writings, all of which contain poetry worthy of our attention, fulfilled the ambitions of the work originally conceived in 1797–8. Nor did they amount to a complete poem. Claims that his entire published output constituted ‘The Recluse’ were symptomatic of growing desperation at the knowledge that the great epic that would justify his career was slipping from his grasp. When Coleridge expressed disappointment with The Excursion in a letter of 1815 (see pp. 709–11), Wordsworth seems to have lost any real conviction that he could continue with ‘The Recluse’, although he would make spasmodic but failed attempts to revive it. In truth, as readers of Coleridge’s letter may suspect, the original scheme for ‘The Recluse’ was so unrealistic, so grandiose, and so intellectually complex, that no human being could have composed it. However, for a short while in 1798, Wordsworth’s belief in it enabled him to write a number of works he would not otherwise have written, now regarded as among his finest, all of which are included here: The Ruined Cottage, The Pedlar, There is an Active Principle, Not Useless do I Deem and The Discharged Soldier.

Besides ‘The Recluse’, Wordsworth and Coleridge spent their remarkable year of creative work together planning and writing the first volume of Lyrical Ballads (pp. 333–420), designed to help them raise money to visit Germany – then the intellectual hub of Europe, and the perfect place for the author of ‘The Recluse’. They travelled to Germany in early autumn 1798. Confined to Goslar, a small medieval market-town in the Harz mountains, by what he believed to be the severest winter of the eighteenth century,

Wordsworth began a six-week period of intense activity which included composition of most of the first part of what we now call 'The Two-Part Prelude'. He could not proceed with 'The Recluse', but The Prelude was the epic poem he was destined to write. It demanded no academic study, as would 'The Recluse', for its subject matter was his own life. Autobiography was in those days virtually unknown. The only precedent of recent vintage was Rousseau's Confessions (1782–9) – a prose work; poetic autobiography was unheard of, even offensive, to late eighteenth-century taste, and in pursuing it, Wordsworth created a new kind of poem, the latter-day descendants of which include Ginsberg's Howl (1956) and Bunting's Briggflatts (1965).

'The Two-Part Prelude' begins with a despairing question – 'Was it for this ...?' – because he had lost hope of continuing with 'The Recluse'. And yet the poetry of The Prelude poured out of him. It was not essentially philosophical, as 'The Recluse' was to be, but surveyed his teenage years in Hawkshead, during and after the death of his father. Throughout the intervening years those powerful memories had acquired layers of reflection and meditation, and the changes wrought by time on what seems to be an unshakeable hold on the past are an important part of the subject of The Prelude. At first we may not notice how our first glance of the woman with the pitcher on her head in the second of the concluding spots of time in Part I has altered, however subtly, when we see her the second time, so that it is not the pitcher, but 'her garments vexed and tossed' that strike us (see p. 466). What is going on? Wordsworth wants to be faithful to the way in which the mind works, without our being aware of it, on our memories – recasting them in the light of the powerful emotions submerged within. We may not be fully aware of those emotions (in this case fear and apprehension), but they are present nonetheless.

Part II of the poem was finished in late 1799, just as the Wordsworths, back in England, moved into Dove Cottage in Grasmere. Wordsworth thought of The Prelude as an autobiographical poem addressed to Coleridge – out of guilt, largely, because it was not 'The Recluse'. He intended to write a third part, and attempted it in 1801. In early 1804 he may have reconceived it as a poem in five Books, but before finalizing it in that form continued to draft many hundreds of lines that resulted in The Thirteen-Book Prelude in early 1806. It still had no title, and would not be given one until after his death. He thought of it as 'the poem on my life', which would explain his qualifications to write 'The Recluse'. For that reason, he decided not to publish it until 'The Recluse' was finished, and over the rest of his life revised it compulsively. Modern editors have uncovered no less than sixteen distinct versions in his manuscripts, the most important of which are now in print. After his demise it was further altered by his executors prior to publication in 1850. So it was that one of the masterpieces of the Romantic period was known at first hand only to a small coterie – Coleridge, Dorothy, Hazlitt, De Quincey and the poet's family. Byron, Shelley and Keats knew of it only by repute: had they read it, their regard for its author might have been higher.

The Prelude had little appeal to Victorian readers, and its importance was acknowledged only in the twentieth century. We should not be surprised. The story it tells – of promise under constant threat; of a man scarred by loss; of a poetic sensibility and its long, arduous journey to maturity (it is, in essence, a Bildungsroman) – is of our time, one that speaks to our own preoccupation with the individual psyche and the perilous course we trace from youth to adulthood. It is Wordsworth's triumph.

Today Wordsworth is regarded as one of the foremost of the Romantics; during the early 1800s, however, his poetry was less widely known and often misunderstood – in particular, ‘The Thorn’, ‘We Are Seven’ and The Excursion came in for attack and occasional ridicule. Yet by the 1820s Wordsworth had acquired the status of father-figure to second-generation writers such as Keats, Byron and Shelley, who accused him of having betrayed the radical leanings of earlier work (see, for instance, ‘To Wordsworth’, p.1081, and the dedication to Don Juan, p. 960). It is true that he became more conservative, as the apostrophe to Burke in the Fourteen-Book Prelude (see p. 591) reveals. In 1821, in his defence, he told a correspondent:

If I were addressing those who have dealt so liberally with the words ‘renegado’, ‘apostate’, etc., I should retort the charge upon them, and say, you have been deluded by places and persons, while I have stuck to principles – I abandoned France and her rulers when they abandoned the struggle for Liberty, gave themselves up to Tyranny, and endeavoured to enslave the world. I disapproved of the war against France at its commencement, thinking (which was perhaps an error) that it might have been avoided. But after Buonaparte had violated the independence of Switzerland, my heart turned against him and the nation that could submit to be the instrument of such an outrage. (LY i 97)

Politics aside, Wordsworth is sometimes said to have become a worse poet as he got older. That is unfair, though his verse naturally reflected changes in him. All the same, the conclusion to The River Duddon (1820) is one of the finest sonnets he ever composed – a meditation on the past, and the damage wrought by time on human potential (p. 591). Airey-Force Valley (p. 592) is as good as anything in The Prelude, while the Extempore Effusion Upon the Death of James Hogg stands as one of the most impressive elegies of the Romantic period, if only for the remarkable stanza at its heart:

Like clouds that rake the mountain-summits,
Or waves that own no curbing hand,
How fast has brother followed brother,
From sunshine to the sunless land!

(ll. 21–4)

By 1843, when he was appointed Poet Laureate, Wordsworth’s reputation was at its height. At the age of 73, he had outlived all the other major Romantic writers and was still composing and revising. In his final years he was awarded honorary degrees from Durham and Oxford and supervised the final lifetime edition of his poetry in 1849–50. He remains among the most highly regarded, and enduringly popular, of the Romantics.

A Night-Piece (composed by 25 January 1798; edited from MS)¹

The sky is overspread
With a close veil of one continuous cloud
All whitened by the moon, that just appears
A dim-seen orb, yet chequers not the ground
With any shadow – plant, or tower, or tree. 5
At last, a pleasant gleam breaks forth at once,
An instantaneous light; the musing man
Who walks along with his eyes bent to earth
Is startled. He looks about, the clouds are split
Asunder, and above his head he views 10
The clear moon, and the glory of the heavens.
There in a black-blue vault she sails along,
Followed by multitudes of stars, that small,
And bright, and sharp, along the gloomy vault
Drive as she drives. How fast they wheel away, 15
Yet vanish not! The wind is in the trees,
But they are silent;² still they roll along
Immeasurably distant, and the vault
Built round by those white clouds, enormous clouds,
Still deepens its interminable depth. 20
At length the vision closes, and the mind,
Not undisturbed by the deep joy it feels,
Which slowly settles into peaceful calm,
Is left to muse upon the solemn scene.

A Night-Piece

¹ This poem was, Wordsworth recalled many years after its composition, ‘Composed upon the road between Nether Stowey and Alfoxden, extempore. I distinctly recollect the very moment I was struck, as described, “He looks up at the clouds, etc.”’ (FN 13). Critics

note that it reworks a number of images and expressions from a journal entry by Dorothy of 25 January 1798: ‘The sky spread over with one continuous cloud, whitened by the light of the moon, which, though her dim shape was seen, did not throw forth so strong a light as to chequer the earth with shadows. At once the clouds seemed to cleave asunder, and left her in the centre of a black-blue vault. She sailed along, followed by multitudes of stars, small, and bright, and sharp. Their brightness seemed concentrated (half-moon)’ (DWJ i 2).

² But they are silent David Chandler suggests that this is a reply to the question posed by Mrs Barbauld in ‘A Summer Evening’s Meditation’: ‘But are they silent all? Or is there not / A tongue in every star that talks with man...?’ (ll. 48–9).

The Discharged Soldier (composed late January 1798; edited from MS)¹

I love to walk
Along the public way, when, for the night
Deserted in its silence, it assumes
A character of deeper quietness
Than pathless solitudes. At such a time 5
I slowly mounted up a steep ascent²
Where the road’s watery surface, to the ridge
Of that sharp rising, glittered in the moon,
And seemed before my eyes another stream³
Stealing with silent lapse⁴ to join the brook⁵ 10
That murmured in the valley.

On I passed
Tranquil, receiving in my own despite
Amusement as I slowly passed along,
From such near objects as from time to time
Perforce disturbed the slumber of the sense 15

Quiescent⁶ and disposed to sympathy,
With an exhausted mind worn out by toil
And all unworthy of the deeper joy
Which waits on distant prospect – cliff or sea,
The dark blue vault, and universe of stars. 20

Thus did I steal along that silent road,
My body from the stillness drinking in
A restoration like the calm of sleep,
But sweeter far. Above, before, behind,
Around me, all was peace and solitude: 25

I looked not round, nor did the solitude
Speak to my eye, but it was heard and felt.
Oh happy state, what beauteous pictures now
Rose in harmonious imagery! They rose
As from some distant region of my soul 30
And came along like dreams; yet such as left
Obscurely mingled with their passing forms
A consciousness of animal delight,
A self-possession felt in every pause

And every gentle movement of my frame.⁷ 35

While thus I wandered, step by step led on,
It chanced a sudden turning of the road
Presented to my view an uncouth shape,⁸
So near that, stepping back into the shade
Of a thick hawthorn, I could mark him well, 40
Myself unseen. He was in stature tall,

A foot above man's common measure tall,
And lank, and upright. There was in his form
A meagre stiffness. You might almost think
That his bones wounded him. His legs were long, 45
So long and shapeless that I looked at them
Forgetful of the body they sustained.

His arms were long and lean, his hands were bare;
His visage, wasted though it seemed, was large
In feature, his cheeks sunken, and his mouth 50

Showed ghastly⁹ in the moonlight; from behind
A milestone propped him,¹⁰ and his figure seemed Half-sitting and half-standing. I could mark
That he was clad in military garb,
Though faded yet entire. His face was turned 55
Towards the road, yet not as if he sought
For any living object. He appeared
Forlorn and desolate, a man cut off
From all his kind, and more than half detached
From his own nature.

He was alone, 60
Had no attendant, neither dog, nor staff,
Nor knapsack; in his very dress appeared
A desolation, a simplicity
That appertained¹¹ to solitude. I think
If but a glove had dangled in his hand, 65
It would have made him more akin to man.
Long time I scanned him with a mingled sense
Of fear and sorrow. From his lips meanwhile
There issued murmuring sounds, as if of pain
Or of uneasy thought, yet still his form 70
Kept the same fearful steadiness. His shadow
Lay at his feet and moved not.

In a glen
Hard by, a village stood,¹² whose silent doors
Were visible among the scattered trees,
Scarce distant from the spot an arrow's flight.¹³ 75
I wished to see him move, but he remained
Fixed to his place, and still from time to time
Sent forth a murmuring voice of dead¹⁴ complaint,
A groan scarce audible. Yet all the while
The chained mastiff in his wooden house 80
Was vexed, and from among the village trees
Howled, never ceasing. Not without reproach

Had I prolonged my watch, and now, confirmed,
And my heart's specious cowardice¹⁵ subdued,
I left the shady nook where I had stood 85
And hailed the stranger. From his resting-place
He rose, and with his lean and wasted arm
In measured gesture lifted to his head
Returned my salutation. A short while
I held discourse on things indifferent 90
And casual matter. He meanwhile had ceased
From all complaint, his station he resumed,
Propped by the milestone as before. And when, ere long,
I asked his history, he in reply
Was neither slow nor eager; but, unmoved,¹⁶ 95
And with a quiet uncomplaining voice,
A stately air of mild indifference,
He told a simple fact – that he had been
A soldier, to the tropic isles¹⁷ had gone,
Whence he had landed now some ten days past; 100
That on his landing he had been dismissed,
And with the little strength he yet had left
Was travelling to regain his native home.
At this I turned and through the trees looked down
Into the village. All were gone to rest, 105
Nor smoke nor any taper¹⁸ light appeared,
But every silent window to the moon
Shone with a yellow glitter. 'No one there',
Said I, 'is waking; we must measure back
The way which we have come. Behind yon wood 110
A labourer dwells, an honest man and kind;
He will not murmur should we break his rest,
And he will give you food (if food you need)
And lodging for the night.' At this he stooped
And from the ground took up an oaken staff 115
By me yet unobserved – a traveller's staff

Which I suppose from his slack hand had dropped,
And, such the languor of the weary man,
Had lain till now neglected in the grass,
But not forgotten.

Back we turned and shaped 120
Our course toward the cottage. He appeared
To travel without pain, and I beheld
With ill-suppressed astonishment his tall
And ghostly figure moving at my side.
As we advanced I asked him for what cause 125
He tarried there, nor had demanded rest
At any inn or cottage. He replied,
'My weakness made me loath to move; in truth
I felt myself at ease, and much relieved,
But that the village mastiff fretted me, 130
And every second moment rang a peal
Felt at my very heart. I do not know
What ailed him, but it seemed as if the dog
Were howling to the murmur of the stream.'

While thus we travelled on I did not fail 135
To question him of what he had endured
From war, and battle, and the pestilence.¹⁹
He all the while was in demeanour calm,
Concise in answer. Solemn and sublime
He might have seemed, but that in all he said 140
There was a strange half-absence, and a tone
Of weakness and indifference, as of one
Remembering the importance of his theme
But feeling it no longer. We advanced
Slowly, and ere we to the wood were come, 145
Discourse had ceased. Together on we passed
In silence through the shades gloomy and dark;
Then, turning up along an open field,
We gained the cottage. At the door I knocked,
And called aloud, 'My friend, here is a man 150

By sickness overcome. Beneath your roof
This night let him find rest, and give him food –
The service if need be I will requite.’

Assured that now my comrade would repose
In comfort, I entreated that henceforth 155
He would not linger in the public ways
But at the door of cottage or of inn
Demand the succour which his state required,
And told him, feeble as he was, ’twere fit
He asked relief or alms. At this reproof, 160
With the same ghastly mildness in his look,
He said, ‘My trust is in the God of Heaven,
And in the eye of him that passes me.’

By this the labourer had unlocked the door,
And now my comrade touched his hat again 165
With his lean hand, and in a voice that seemed
To speak with a reviving interest
Till then unfelt, he thanked me; I returned
The blessing of the poor unhappy man,
And so we parted. 170

¹ This poem constituted part of Wordsworth’s never-completed epic poem, The Recluse (see pp. 422–3), before being incorporated first into Five-Book Prelude iv 185–321, and then into Thirteen-Book Prelude iv 363–504.

² a steep ascent Briers Brow, above the ferry on the western shore of Windermere.

³ And seemed...stream A few days before this line was composed, 31 January 1798, Dorothy had written: ‘The road to the village of Holford glittered like another stream’ (DWJ i 5).

⁴ lapse flow; cf. Paradise Lost viii 263: ‘And liquid lapse of murmuring streams’.

5 brook Sawrey Brook.

6 Quiescent at repose, inert.

7 self-possession...frame awareness of physical well-being diffused through the body and its activity.

8 an uncouth shape perhaps a reminiscence of Paradise Lost ii 666, which describes Death: 'The other shape, / If shape it might be called that shape had none'. Wordsworth would have known Burke's comments on the lines (see p. 10 above).

9 ghastly ghost-like, pale.

10 A milestone propped him the third milestone from Hawkshead, just beyond Far Sawrey; the milestone has since disappeared from that spot.

11 appertained belonged.

12 a village stood Far Sawrey.

13 an arrow's flight approximately 300 yards.

14 dead muffled, deadened.

15 my heart's specious cowardice he was motivated by fear rather than kindness.

16 unmoved without emotion.

17 tropic isles West Indies. An anachronism: Wordsworth has in mind the campaigns against the French that occurred in the mid-1790s, although the encounter took place during the long vacation of 1788. Conditions were bad – 40,000 British troops had died of yellow fever by 1796. Survivors were often diseased, and had no alternative but to beg in the streets.

The Ruined Cottage (composed 1797–8; edited from MS)1

First Part

'Twas summer and the sun was mounted high;
Along the south the uplands feebly glared
Through a pale steam, and all the northern downs,
In clearer air ascending, showed far off
Their surfaces with shadows dappled o'er 5
Of deep embattled clouds.2 Far as the sight
Could reach those many shadows lay in spots
Determined and unmoved, with steady beams
Of clear and pleasant sunshine interposed –
Pleasant to him who on the soft cool moss 10
Extends his careless limbs beside the root
Of some huge oak whose aged branches make
A twilight3 of their own, a dewy shade
Where the wren warbles while the dreaming man,
Half-conscious of that soothing melody, 15
With sidelong eye looks out upon the scene,
By those impending branches made more soft,
More soft and distant.

Other lot was mine.

Across a bare wide common I had toiled 20
With languid feet which by the slippery ground
Were baffled still; and when I stretched myself
On the brown earth my limbs from very heat
Could find no rest, nor my weak arm disperse

The insect host which gathered round my face
And joined their murmurs to the tedious noise 25
Of seeds of bursting gorse that crackled round.
I rose and turned towards a group of trees
Which midway in that level stood alone;
And thither come at length, beneath a shade
Of clustering elms⁴ that sprang from the same root 30
I found a ruined house, four naked walls⁵
That stared upon each other. I looked round,
And near the door I saw an aged man
Alone and stretched upon the cottage bench;
An iron-pointed staff lay at his side. 35
With instantaneous joy I recognized
That pride of nature and of lowly life,
The venerable Armytage, a friend
As dear to me as is the setting sun.⁶
Two days before 40
We had been fellow-travellers. I knew
That he was in this neighbourhood, and now
Delighted found him here in the cool shade.
He lay, his pack of rustic merchandise
Pillowing his head. I guess he had no thought 45
Of his way-wandering life. His eyes were shut,
The shadows of the breezy elms above
Dappled his face. With thirsty heat oppressed
At length I hailed him, glad to see his hat
Bedewed with water-drops, as if the brim 50
Had newly scooped a running stream. He rose
And pointing to a sunflower, bade me climb
The []⁷ wall where that same gaudy flower
Looked out upon the road.

It was a plot
Of garden-ground now wild, its matted weeds 55
Marked with the steps of those whom as they passed,

The gooseberry-trees that shot in long lank slips,
Or currants hanging from their leafless stems
In scanty strings, had tempted to o'erleap
The broken wall. Within that cheerless spot, 60
Where two tall hedgerows of thick willow boughs
Joined in a damp cold nook, I found a well
Half covered up with willow-flowers and weeds.
I slaked my thirst and to the shady bench
Returned, and while I stood unbonneted⁸ 65
To catch the motion of the cooler air
The old man said, 'I see around me here
Things which you cannot see. We die, my friend,
Nor we alone, but that which each man loved
And prized in his peculiar nook of earth 70
Dies with him, or is changed, and very soon
Even of the good is no memorial left.
The poets, in their elegies and songs
Lamenting the departed, call the groves,
They call upon the hills and streams to mourn, 75
And senseless rocks – nor idly, for they speak
In these their invocations with a voice
Obedient to the strong creative power
Of human passion. Sympathies there are
More tranquil, yet perhaps of kindred birth, 80
That steal upon the meditative mind
And grow with thought. Beside yon spring I stood,
And eyed its waters till we seemed to feel
One sadness, they and I. For them a bond
Of brotherhood is broken: time has been 85
When every day the touch of human hand
Disturbed their stillness, and they ministered
To human comfort. When I stooped to drink
A spider's web hung to the water's edge,
And on the wet and slimy footstone lay 90
The useless fragment of a wooden bowl;⁹

It moved my very heart.

The day has been
When I could never pass this road but she
Who lived within these walls, when I appeared,
A daughter's welcome gave me, and I loved her 95
As my own child. Oh sir! The good die first,
And they whose hearts are dry as summer dust
Burn to the socket.¹⁰ Many a passenger¹¹
Has blessed poor Margaret for her gentle looks
When she upheld the cool refreshment drawn 100
From that forsaken spring, and no one came
But he was welcome, no one went away
But that it seemed she loved him. She is dead,
The worm is on her cheek,¹² and this poor hut,
Stripped of its outward garb of household flowers, 105
Of rose and sweetbriar, offers to the wind
A cold bare wall whose earthy top is tricked¹³
With weeds and the rank speargrass. She is dead,
And nettles rot and adders sun themselves
Where we have sat together while she nursed 110
Her infant at her breast. The unshod colt,
The wandering heifer and the potter's ass,
Find shelter now within the chimney-wall
Where I have seen her evening hearthstone blaze
And through the window spread upon the road 115
Its cheerful light. You will forgive me, sir,
But often on this cottage do I muse
As on a picture, till my wiser mind
Sinks, yielding to the foolishness of grief.
She had a husband, an industrious man, 120
Sober and steady. I have heard her say
That he was up and busy at his loom
In summer ere the mower's scythe had swept
The dewy grass, and in the early spring
Ere the last star had vanished. They who passed 125

At evening, from behind the garden-fence
Might hear his busy spade, which he would ply
After his daily work till the daylight
Was gone, and every leaf and flower were lost
In the dark hedges. So they passed their days 130
In peace and comfort, and two pretty babes
Were their best hope next to the God in heaven.
You may remember, now some ten years gone,
Two blighting seasons when the fields were left
With half a harvest. It pleased heaven to add 135
A worse affliction in the plague of war;¹⁴
A happy land was stricken to the heart –
'Twas a sad time of sorrow and distress.
A wanderer among the cottages,
I with my pack of winter raiment¹⁵ saw 140
The hardships of that season. Many rich
Sunk down as in a dream among the poor,
And of the poor did many cease to be,
And their place knew them not. Meanwhile, abridged
Of daily comforts, gladly reconciled 145
To numerous self-denials, Margaret
Went struggling on through those calamitous years
With cheerful hope. But ere the second autumn,
A fever seized her husband. In disease
He lingered long, and when his strength returned 150
He found the little he had stored to meet
The hour of accident, or crippling age,
Was all consumed. As I have said, 'twas now
A time of trouble: shoals of artisans¹⁶
Were from their daily labour turned away 155
To hang for bread on parish charity,¹⁷
They and their wives and children – happier far
Could they have lived as do the little birds
That peck along the hedges, or the kite¹⁸

That makes her dwelling in the mountain rocks. 160
Ill fared it now with Robert, he who dwelt
In this poor cottage. At his door he stood
And whistled many a snatch of merry tunes
That had no mirth in them, or with his knife
Carved uncouth¹⁹ figures on the heads of sticks; 165
Then idly sought about through every nook
Of house or garden any casual task
Of use or ornament, and with a strange,
Amusing but uneasy novelty
He blended where he might the various tasks 170
Of summer, autumn, winter, and of spring.
But this endured not; his good humour soon
Became a weight in which no pleasure was,
And poverty brought on a petted²⁰ mood
And a sore temper. Day by day he drooped,²¹ 175
And he would leave his home, and to the town
Without an errand would he turn his steps,
Or wander here and there among the fields.
One while he would speak lightly of his babes
And with a cruel tongue; at other times 180
He played with them wild freaks of merriment,
And 'twas a piteous thing to see the looks
Of the poor innocent children. "Every smile",
Said Margaret to me here beneath these trees,
"Made my heart bleed."
At this the old man paused, 185
And looking up to those enormous elms
He said, "'Tis now the hour of deepest noon.
At this still season of repose and peace,
This hour when all things which are not at rest
Are cheerful, while this multitude of flies 190
Fills all the air with happy melody,
Why should a tear be in an old man's eye?"

Why should we thus with an untoward²² mind,
And in the weakness of humanity,
From natural wisdom turn our hearts away, 195
To natural comfort shut our eyes and ears,
And feeding on disquiet, thus disturb
The calm of Nature with our restless thoughts?’

Second Part

He spake with somewhat of a solemn tone,
But when he ended there was in his face 200
Such easy cheerfulness, a look so mild,
That for a little time it stole away
All recollection, and that simple tale
Passed from my mind like a forgotten sound.
A while on trivial things we held discourse, 205
To me soon tasteless.²³ In my own despite
I thought of that poor woman as of one
Whom I had known and loved. He had rehearsed
Her homely tale with such familiar power,
With such an active countenance, an eye 210
So busy, that the things of which he spake
Seemed present, and, attention now relaxed,
There was a heartfelt chillness in my veins.
I rose, and turning from that breezy shade
Went out into the open air, and stood 215
To drink the comfort of the warmer sun.
Long time I had not stayed ere, looking round
Upon that tranquil ruin, I returned
And begged of the old man that for my sake
He would resume his story. 220

He replied,

‘It were a wantonness,²⁴ and would demand
Severe reproof, if we were men whose hearts

Could hold vain dalliance with²⁵ the misery
Even of the dead, contented thence to draw
A momentary pleasure, never marked 225
By reason, barren of all future good.
But we have known that there is often found
In mournful thoughts, and always might be found,
A power to virtue friendly; were't not so
I am a dreamer among men, indeed 230
An idle dreamer. 'Tis a common tale
By moving accidents uncharactered,
A tale of silent suffering, hardly clothed
In bodily form, and to the grosser sense
But ill adapted – scarcely palpable 235
To him who does not think. But at your bidding
I will proceed.

While thus it fared with them
To whom this cottage till that hapless year
Had been a blessed home, it was my chance
To travel in a country far remote; 240
And glad I was when, halting by yon gate
That leads from the green lane, again I saw
These lofty elm-trees. Long I did not rest –
With many pleasant thoughts I cheered my way
O'er the flat common. At the door arrived, 245
I knocked, and when I entered, with the hope
Of usual greeting, Margaret looked at me
A little while, then turned her head away
Speechless, and sitting down upon a chair
Wept bitterly. I wist²⁶ not what to do, 250
Or how to speak to her. Poor wretch! At last
She rose from off her seat – and then, oh sir!
I cannot tell how she pronounced my name:
With fervent love, and with a face of grief
Unutterably helpless, and a look 255
That seemed to cling upon me, she enquired

If I had seen her husband. As she spake
A strange surprise and fear came to my heart,
Nor had I power to answer ere she told
That he had disappeared – just two months gone. 260
He left his house: two wretched days had passed,
And on the third by the first break of light,
Within her casement²⁷ full in view she saw
A purse of gold.²⁸ “I trembled at the sight”,
Said Margaret, “for I knew it was his hand 265
That placed it there. And on that very day
By one, a stranger, from my husband sent,
The tidings came that he had joined a troop
Of soldiers going to a distant land.²⁹
He left me thus. Poor man, he had not heart 270
To take a farewell of me, and he feared
That I should follow with my babes, and sink
Beneath the misery of a soldier’s life.”

This tale did Margaret tell with many tears,
And when she ended I had little power 275
To give her comfort, and was glad to take
Such words of hope from her own mouth as served
To cheer us both. But long we had not talked
Ere we built up a pile of better thoughts,
And with a brighter eye she looked around 280
As if she had been shedding tears of joy.
We parted. It was then the early spring;
I left her busy with her garden tools,
And well remember, o’er that fence she looked,
And, while I paced along the footway path, 285
Called out and sent a blessing after me,
With tender cheerfulness, and with a voice
That seemed the very sound of happy thoughts.

I roved o’er many a hill and many a dale
With this my weary load, in heat and cold, 290
Through many a wood and many an open ground,

In sunshine or in shade, in wet or fair,
Now blithe, now drooping, as it might befall;
My best companions now the driving winds
And now the “trotting brooks”³⁰ and whispering trees, 295
And now the music of my own sad steps,
With many a short-lived thought that passed between
And disappeared. I came this way again
Towards the wane of summer, when the wheat
Was yellow, and the soft and bladed grass 300
Sprang up afresh and o’er the hayfield spread
Its tender green. When I had reached the door
I found that she was absent. In the shade
Where we now sit, I waited her return.
Her cottage in its outward look appeared 305
As cheerful as before, in any show
Of neatness little changed – but that I thought
The honeysuckle crowded round the door
And from the wall hung down in heavier wreaths,
And knots of worthless stonecrop started out 310
Along the window’s edge, and grew like weeds
Against the lower panes. I turned aside
And strolled into her garden. It was changed.
The unprofitable bindweed spread his bells
From side to side, and with unwieldy wreaths 315
Had dragged the rose from its sustaining wall
And bent it down to earth.³¹ The border tufts,
Daisy, and thrift, and lowly camomile,
And thyme, had straggled out into the paths
Which they were used to deck.
Ere this an hour 320
Was wasted. Back I turned my restless steps,
And as I walked before the door it chanced
A stranger passed, and guessing whom I sought,
He said that she was used to ramble far.
The sun was sinking in the west, and now 325

I sat with sad impatience. From within
Her solitary infant cried aloud.
The spot though fair seemed very desolate,
The longer I remained more desolate;
And looking round I saw the corner-stones, 330
Till then unmarked, on either side the door
With dull red stains discoloured, and stuck o'er
With tufts and hairs of wool, as if the sheep
That feed upon the commons thither came
Familiarly, and found a couching-place 335
Even at her threshold.

The house-clock struck eight:
I turned and saw her distant a few steps.
Her face was pale and thin, her figure too
Was changed. As she unlocked the door she said,
“It grieves me you have waited here so long, 340
But in good truth I’ve wandered much of late,
And sometimes – to my shame I speak – have need
Of my best prayers to bring me back again.”

While on the board³² she spread our evening meal
She told me she had lost her elder child, 345
That he for months had been a serving-boy,
Apprenticed by the parish.³³ “I perceive
You look at me, and you have cause. Today
I have been travelling far, and many days
About the fields I wander, knowing this 350
Only, that what I seek I cannot find.
And so I waste my time: for I am changed,
And to myself”, said she, “have done much wrong,
And to this helpless infant. I have slept
Weeping, and weeping I have waked. My tears 355
Have flowed as if my body were not such
As others are, and I could never die.
But I am now in mind and in my heart
More easy, and I hope”, said she, “that Heaven

Will give me patience to endure the things 360
Which I behold at home.”

It would have grieved
Your very soul to see her. Sir, I feel
The story linger in my heart. I fear
'Tis long and tedious, but my spirit clings
To that poor woman. So familiarly 365
Do I perceive her manner and her look
And presence, and so deeply do I feel
Her goodness, that not seldom in my walks
A momentary trance comes over me
And to myself I seem to muse on one 370
By sorrow laid asleep or borne away,
A human being destined to awake
To human life, or something very near
To human life, when he shall come again
For whom she suffered. Sir, it would have grieved 375
Your very soul to see her: evermore
Her eyelids drooped, her eyes were downward cast,
And when she at her table gave me food
She did not look at me. Her voice was low,
Her body was subdued. In every act 380
Pertaining to her house-affairs appeared
The careless stillness which a thinking mind
Gives to an idle matter. Still she sighed,
But yet no motion of the breast was seen,
No heaving of the heart. While by the fire 385
We sat together, sighs came on my ear –
I knew not how, and hardly whence, they came.
I took my staff, and when I kissed her babe
The tears stood in her eyes. I left her then
With the best hope and comfort I could give: 390
She thanked me for my will, but for my hope
It seemed she did not thank me.

I returned
And took my rounds along this road again

Ere on its sunny bank the primrose flower
Had chronicled the earliest day of spring. 395
I found her sad and drooping. She had learned
No tidings of her husband. If he lived,
She knew not that he lived: if he were dead,
She knew not he was dead. She seemed the same
In person or appearance, but her house 400
Bespoke a sleepy hand of negligence.
The floor was neither dry nor neat, the hearth
Was comfortless,³⁴

The windows too were dim, and her few books,³⁵
Which one upon the other heretofore 405
Had been piled up against the corner-panes
In seemly order, now with straggling leaves
Lay scattered here and there, open or shut,
As they had chanced to fall. Her infant babe
Had from its mother caught the trick³⁶ of grief, 410
And sighed among its playthings. Once again
I turned towards the garden-gate, and saw
More plainly still that poverty and grief
Were now come nearer to her. The earth was hard,
With weeds defaced and knots of withered grass; 415
No ridges there appeared of clear black mould,³⁷
No winter greenness. Of her herbs and flowers
It seemed the better part were gnawed away
Or trampled on the earth. A chain of straw,
Which had been twisted round the tender stem 420
Of a young apple-tree, lay at its root;
The bark was nibbled round by truant sheep.
Margaret stood near, her infant in her arms,
And, seeing that my eye was on the tree,
She said, "I fear it will be dead and gone 425
Ere Robert come again."

Towards the house

Together we returned, and she enquired
If I had any hope. But for her babe,
And for her little friendless boy, she said,
She had no wish to live – that she must die 430
Of sorrow. Yet I saw the idle loom
Still in its place. His Sunday garments hung
Upon the self-same nail, his very staff
Stood undisturbed behind the door. And when
I passed this way beaten by autumn winds, 435
She told me that her little babe was dead
And she was left alone. That very time,
I yet remember, through the miry lane
She walked with me a mile, when the bare trees
Trickled with foggy damps, and in such sort 440
That any heart had ached to hear her, begged
That wheresoe'er I went I still would ask
For him whom she had lost. We parted then,
Our final parting; for from that time forth
Did many seasons pass ere I returned 445
Into this tract³⁸ again.

Five tedious years³⁹

She lingered in unquiet widowhood,
A wife and widow. Needs must it have been
A sore heart-wasting. I have heard, my friend,
That in that broken arbour she would sit 450
The idle length of half a sabbath day –
There, where you see the toadstool's lazy head –
And when a dog passed by she still would quit
The shade and look abroad. On this old bench
For hours she sat, and evermore her eye 455
Was busy in the distance, shaping things
Which made her heart beat quick. Seest thou that path? –
The greensward now has broken its grey line –
There to and fro she paced through many a day
Of the warm summer, from a belt of flax 460

That girt her waist, spinning the long-drawn thread
With backward steps.⁴⁰ Yet ever as there passed
A man whose garments showed the soldier's red,⁴¹
Or crippled mendicant⁴² in sailor's garb,
The little child who sat to turn the wheel 465
Ceased from his toil, and she, with faltering voice,
Expecting still⁴³ to learn her husband's fate,
Made many a fond enquiry; and when they
Whose presence gave no comfort were gone by,
Her heart was still more sad. And by yon gate 470
Which bars the traveller's road, she often stood,
And when a stranger horseman came, the latch
Would lift, and in his face look wistfully,
Most happy if from aught discovered there
Of tender feeling she might dare repeat 475
The same sad question.

Meanwhile her poor hut
Sunk to decay; for he was gone, whose hand
At the first nippings of October frost
Closed up each chink, and with fresh bands of straw
Chequered the green-grown thatch. And so she lived 480
Through the long winter, reckless⁴⁴ and alone,
Till this reft⁴⁵ house, by frost, and thaw, and rain,
Was sapped; and when she slept, the nightly damps
Did chill her breast, and in the stormy day
Her tattered clothes⁴⁶ were ruffled by the wind 485
Even at the side of her own fire. Yet still
She loved this wretched spot, nor would for worlds
Have parted hence; and still that length of road,
And this rude bench, one torturing hope endeared,
Fast rooted at her heart. And here, my friend, 490
In sickness she remained; and here she died,
Last human tenant of these ruined walls.⁴⁷

The old man ceased; he saw that I was moved.
From that low bench, rising instinctively,
I turned aside in weakness, nor had power 495
To thank him for the tale which he had told.
I stood, and leaning o'er the garden gate
Reviewed that woman's sufferings; and it seemed
To comfort me while with a brother's love
I blessed her in the impotence of grief. 500
At length towards the cottage I returned
Fondly, and traced with milder interest
That secret spirit of humanity
Which, mid the calm oblivious⁴⁸ tendencies
Of Nature, mid her plants, her weeds and flowers, 505
And silent overgrowings, still survived.
The old man, seeing this, resumed, and said,
'My friend, enough to sorrow have you given,
The purposes of wisdom ask no more:
Be wise and cheerful, and no longer read 510
The forms of things with an unworthy eye:
She sleeps in the calm earth, and peace is here.
I well remember that those very plumes,
Those weeds, and the high speargrass on that wall,
By mist and silent raindrops silvered o'er, 515
As once I passed did to my mind convey
So still an image of tranquillity,
So calm and still, and looked so beautiful
Amid the uneasy thoughts which filled my mind,
That what we feel of sorrow and despair 520
From ruin and from change, and all the grief
The passing shows of being leave behind,
Appeared an idle dream that could not live
Where meditation was. I turned away,
And walked along my road in happiness.'⁴⁹ 525
He ceased. By this the sun declining shot
A slant and mellow radiance, which began

To fall upon us where beneath the trees
We sat on that low bench. And now we felt,
Admonished thus, the sweet hour coming on: 530
A linnet warbled from those lofty elms,
A thrush sang loud, and other melodies
At distance heard peopled the milder air.
The old man rose and hoisted up his load;
Together casting then a farewell look 535
Upon those silent walls, we left the shade,
And ere the stars were visible attained
A rustic inn, our evening resting-place.

¹ In its brief original form, which does not survive, The Ruined Cottage was read to Coleridge on 5 June 1797. This version stems from work of February–March 1798, when it was lengthened and given a more formal structure by the addition of the opening section (ll. 1–54), the central transition (ll. 185–237), and the final lines of reconciliation (ll. 493–538). Wordsworth also added, with Coleridge’s encouragement, a long philosophical account of the narrator’s life which, though important, had the effect of unbalancing the poem. Wordsworth therefore removed it and until 1804 regarded it as a separate work, The Pedlar (see pp. 444–53). The Ruined Cottage meanwhile was the compact and tightly constructed poem printed here. It was later revised with The Pedlar for The Excursion (1814). For comment on the poem’s philosophical aspirations, see pp. 422–3 above.

² deep embattled clouds an allusion to Charlotte Smith, Sonnet LIX 3–4: ‘Sudden, from many a deep embattled cloud / Terrific thunders burst.’

³ twilight The ‘twilight’ in the midst of sunshine is highly reminiscent of Milton’s ‘darkness visible’, and looks back to Virgil’s ‘ingenti ramorum protegat umbra’ (Georgics ii 489).

⁴ clustering elms Elms tend to grow in clusters as groups of them spring from a single root; they are now a rare sight in England thanks to the ravages of Dutch elm disease in the 1970s.

5 four naked walls The nakedness of the walls tends to humanize them and emphasize their vulnerability; cf. Two-Part Prelude i 343.

6 a friend...sun In the original Ruined Cottage of summer 1797 the Pedlar had addressed the poet as ‘stranger’. By February 1798 he was the mouthpiece for Wordsworth’s new philosophy of redemption (see p. 453 n. 1), and the two protagonists had been made old friends as a way of increasing the reader’s confidence in what he had to say. It was daring to make the protagonist a Pedlar; when the poem was revised and published in 1814 critics like Francis Jeffrey disapproved of a lower-class character being given such an exalted role: ‘Did Mr Wordsworth really imagine that his favourite doctrines were likely to gain anything in point of effect or authority by being put into the mouth of a person accustomed to higgler about tape, or brass sleeve-buttons?’ For Jeffrey’s comments, see pp. 739–40.

7 There is a gap in the MS at this point.

8 unbonneted without his hat.

9 The useless...bowl cf. the final chapter of Ecclesiastes, ‘Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth ... Or ever the silver cord be loosed, or the golden bowl be broken, or the pitcher be broken at the fountain, or the wheel broken at the cistern. Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was: and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it.’

10 Burn to the socket The image is of a candle burning down to its socket in a candlestick.

11 passenger passer-by.

12 The worm is on her cheek cf. Viola, in Twelfth Night II iv 110–12: ‘she never told her love, / But let concealment, like a worm in the bud, / Feed on her damask cheek.’

13 tricked decked.

14 war England had been at war with France for five years as Wordsworth was writing in 1798; it should be borne in mind, however, that the poem is set during the aftermath of the American War, which had ended in 1783.

15 winter raiment warm clothes to sell to cottagers.

16 shoals of artisans crowds of workmen.

17 parish charity Until the early part of the century, the poor were the responsibility of their local parish, which received no government funding to help them.

18 kite large hawk.

19 uncouth grotesque, ugly.

20 petted peevish.

21 he drooped an echo of Milton, Samson Agonistes 594: ‘So much I feel my genial spirits droop.’

22 untoward stubborn, perverse.

23 tasteless without taste, insipid.

24 wantonness self-indulgence.

25 hold vain dalliance with draw entertainment from.

26 wist knew.

27 casement window.

28 A purse of gold A ‘bounty’ of three guineas was paid to men when they enlisted – a strong incentive for poor men with starving families.

29 a distant land America.

30 trotting brooks an allusion to Burns's To William Simpson, about the poet and his relationship to nature:

The Muse, nae poet ever fand her,
Till by himsel he learned to wander
Adown some trottin burn's meander ...

(ll. 85–7)

31 the rose...earth a symbol of Margaret herself, without the support of her husband.

32 board table.

33 Apprenticed by the parish Margaret has allowed her son to become an apprentice because she would no longer be responsible for clothing and feeding him.

34 Line defective in the MS.

35 her few books Margaret is literate; this was unusual. In 1795 60 per cent of the female population was unable to read or write. Most received little, if any, formal education.

36 trick habit.

37 mould earth.

38 tract district.

39 Five tedious years ll. 446–92 were the first to be written. They were inspired by Southey's account of a war widow in Joan of Arc (1797), Book VII, who is described as 'tortured with vain hope' for her absent husband.

40 from a belt...steps Robert had been a weaver, and Margaret supports herself in her last years by spinning flax.

41 the soldier's red The British army wore red uniforms, making them easy targets on the battlefield.

42 mendicant beggar.

43 still always.

44 reckless not caring (i.e. for herself).

45 reft bereft (i.e. without Robert).

46 Her tattered clothes a detail picked up from Cowper's Crazy Kate (see p. 19).

47 The poem originally ended at this point. All that follows was composed in spring 1798.

48 oblivious Nature carries on oblivious to human affairs.

49 happiness Wordsworth asks that we regard grief arising from Margaret's unhappy fate as an 'idle dream', because of the implied feeling that her existence continues in the exuberance of the spear-grass. In an early draft in Wordsworth's notebook, this way of thinking is described as a 'strange discipline':

And waking from the silence of my grief
I looked around. The cottage and the elms,
The road, the pathway and the garden wall
Which old and loose and mossy o'er the road
Hung bellying, all appeared – I know not how

But to some eye within me – all appeared
Colours and forms of a strange discipline.
The trouble which they sent into my thought
Was sweet. I looked and looked again, and to myself
I seemed a better and a wiser man.

The concept that grief might be an ‘idle dream’ originated with Bishop Berkeley, whose ideas informed Coleridge’s Religious Musings:

Believe thou, oh my soul,
Life is a vision shadowy of truth,
And vice, and anguish, and the wormy grave,
Shapes of a dream. The veiling clouds retire,
And lo! – the throne of the redeeming God ...

(ll. 396–400)

Unlike Coleridge (and many others at this period), Wordsworth did not expect a Christian apocalypse, but the Pedlar’s meditation asks us to see Margaret’s life and death in terms of universal harmony.

The Pedlar (composed February–March 1798, edited from MS)¹

Him had I seen the day before, alone
And in the middle of the public way,
Standing to rest himself. His eyes were turned Towards the setting sun, while, with that staff
Behind him fixed, he propped a long white pack 5
Which crossed his shoulders, wares for maids who live

In lonely villages or straggling huts.²
I knew him³ – he was born of lowly race
On Cumbrian hills, and I have seen the tear
Stand in his luminous⁴ eye when he described 10
The house in which his early youth was passed,
And found I was no stranger to the spot.
I loved to hear him talk of former days
And tell how when a child, ere⁵ yet of age
To be a shepherd, he had learned to read 15
His bible in a school that stood alone,
Sole building on a mountain's dreary edge,
Far from the sight of city spire, or sound
Of minster clock. From that bleak tenement⁶
He many an evening to his distant home 20
In solitude returning saw the hills
Grow larger in the darkness, all alone
Beheld the stars come out above his head,
And travelled through the wood, no comrade near
To whom he might confess the things he saw. 25
So the foundations of his mind were laid.
In such communion, not from terror free,⁷
While yet a child, and long before his time,
He had perceived the presence and the power
Of greatness, and deep feelings had impressed 30
Great objects on his mind with portraiture
And colour so distinct that on his mind
They lay like substances, and almost seemed
To haunt the bodily sense.⁸ He had received
A precious gift, for as he grew in years 35
With these impressions would he still compare
All his ideal stores, his shapes and forms,
And, being still unsatisfied with aught
Of dimmer character, he thence attained

An active power to fasten images 40
Upon his brain, and on their pictured lines
Intensely brooded, even⁹ till they acquired
The liveliness of dreams.¹⁰ Nor did he fail,
While yet a child, with a child's eagerness
Incessantly to turn his ear and eye 45
On all things which the rolling seasons brought
To feed such appetite. Nor this alone
Appeased his yearning – in the after-day¹¹
Of boyhood, many an hour in caves forlorn
And in the hollow depths of naked crags 50
He sate, and even in their fixed lineaments,
Or¹² from the power of a peculiar eye,¹³
Or by creative feeling¹⁴ overborne,
Or by predominance of thought¹⁵ oppressed,
Even in their fixed and steady lineaments 55
He traced an ebbing and a flowing mind,
Expression ever varying.¹⁶
Thus informed,
He had small need of books; for many a tale
Traditional round the mountains hung,¹⁷
And many a legend peopling the dark woods 60
Nourished imagination in her growth,
And gave the mind that apprehensive power
By which she is made quick to recognize
The moral properties¹⁸ and scope of things.
But greedily he read and read again 65
Whate'er the rustic vicar's shelf supplied:
The life and death of martyrs who sustained
Intolerable pangs,¹⁹ and here and there
A straggling volume, torn and incomplete,
Which left half-told the preternatural tale, 70
Romance of giants, chronicle of fiends,

Profuse in garniture of wooden cuts²⁰
Strange and uncouth, dire faces, figures dire,
Sharp-kneed, sharp-elbowed, and lean-ankled too,
With long and ghostly shanks, forms which once seen 75
Could never be forgotten²¹ – things though low,
Though low and humble, not to be despised
By such as have observed the curious links
With which the perishable hours of life
Are bound together, and the world of thought 80
Exists and is sustained.²² Within his heart
Love was not yet, nor the pure joy of love,²³
By sound diffused, or by the breathing air,
Or by the silent looks of happy things,
Or flowing from the universal face – 85
Of earth and sky. But he had felt the power
Of Nature, and already was prepared
By his intense conceptions to receive
Deeply the lesson deep of love, which he
Whom Nature, by whatever means, has taught 90
To feel intensely, cannot but receive.

Ere his ninth year he had been sent abroad²⁴
To tend his father's sheep; such was his task
Henceforward till the later day of youth.
Oh then, what soul was his, when on the tops 95
Of the high mountains he beheld the sun
Rise up and bathe the world in light! He looked,
The ocean and the earth beneath him lay
In gladness and deep joy. The clouds were touched,
And in their silent faces he did read 100
Unutterable love. Sound needed none,
Nor any voice of joy: his spirit drank
The spectacle. Sensation, soul, and form,
All melted into him; they swallowed up
His animal being. In them did he live, 105

And by them did he live – they were his life.²⁵
In such access of mind,²⁶ in such high hour
Of visitation from the living God,²⁷
He did not feel the God, he felt his works.
Thought was not; in enjoyment it expired. 110
Such hour by prayer or praise was unprofaned;
He neither prayed, nor offered thanks or praise;
His mind was a thanksgiving to the power
That made him. It was blessedness and love.
A shepherd on the lonely mountain-tops, 115
Such intercourse²⁸ was his, and in this sort
Was his existence oftentimes possessed.
Oh then how beautiful, how bright, appeared
The written promise.²⁹ He had early learned
To reverence the volume which displays 120
The mystery, the life which cannot die,
But in the mountains did he FEEL his faith,
There did he see the writing. All things there
Breathed immortality, revolving life,
And greatness still revolving, infinite. 125
There littleness was not, the least of things
Seemed infinite, and there his spirit shaped
Her prospects – nor did he believe; he saw.
What wonder if his being thus became
Sublime and comprehensive?³⁰ Low desires, 130
Low thoughts, had there no place; yet was his heart
Lowly, for he was meek in gratitude
Oft as he called to mind those ecstasies,
And whence they flowed; and from them he acquired
Wisdom which works through patience – thence he learned 135
In many a calmer hour of sober thought
To look on Nature with an humble heart,
Self-questioned where it did not understand,

And with a superstitious³¹ eye of love.

Thus passed the time, yet to the neighbouring town 140

He often went with what small overplus

His earnings might supply, and brought away

The book which most had tempted his desires

While at the stall he read. Among the hills

He gazed upon that mighty orb³² of song, 145

The divine Milton.³³ Lore of different kind,

The annual savings of a toilsome life,

The schoolmaster supplied – books that explain

The purer elements of truth involved

In lines and numbers, and by charm severe, 150

Especially perceived where Nature droops

And feeling is suppressed, preserve the mind

Busy in solitude and poverty.³⁴

And thus employed he many a time o'erlooked³⁵

The listless hours when in the hollow vale, 155

Hollow and green, he lay on the green turf

In lonesome idleness. What could he do?

Nature was at his heart, and he perceived,

Though yet he knew not how, a wasting³⁶ power

In all things which from her sweet influence 160

Might tend to wean³⁷ him. Therefore with her hues,

Her forms, and with the spirit of her forms,

He clothed the nakedness of austere truth.³⁸

While yet he lingered in the elements

Of science, and among her simplest laws, 165

His triangles they were the stars of heaven,

The silent stars; his altitudes³⁹ the crag

Which is the eagle's birthplace, or some peak

Familiar with forgotten years which shows

Inscribed, as with the silence of the thought, 170

Upon its bleak and visionary⁴⁰ sides

The history of many a winter storm,
Or obscure records of the path of fire.⁴¹
Yet with these lonesome sciences he still
Continued to amuse the heavier hours 175
Of solitude. Yet not the less he found
In cold elation, and the lifelessness
Of truth by oversubtlety dislodged
From grandeur and from love, an idle toy,⁴²
The dullest of all toys. He saw in truth 180
A holy spirit and a breathing soul;⁴³
He revered her and trembled at her look,
When with a moral beauty in her face
She led him through the worlds.
But now, before his twentieth year was passed, 185
Accumulated feelings pressed his heart
With an increasing weight; he was o'erpowered
By Nature, and his spirit was on fire
With restless thoughts. His eye became disturbed,⁴⁴
And many a time he wished the winds might rage 190
When they were silent. Far more fondly now
Than in his earlier season did he love
Tempestuous nights, the uproar and the sounds
That live in darkness. From his intellect,
And from the stillness of abstracted thought, 195
He sought repose in vain. I have heard him say
That at this time he scanned the laws of light
Amid the roar of torrents, where they send
From hollow clefts up to the clearer air
A cloud of mist, which in the shining sun 200
Varies its rainbow hues.⁴⁵ But vainly thus,
And vainly by all other means he strove
To mitigate⁴⁶ the fever of his heart.
From Nature and her overflowing soul
He had received so much that all his thoughts 205

Were steeped in feeling.⁴⁷ He was only then
Contented when with bliss ineffable⁴⁸
He felt the sentiment of being spread
O'er all that moves, and all that seemeth still,⁴⁹
O'er all which, lost beyond the reach of thought 210
And human knowledge, to the human eye
Invisible, yet liveth to the heart;
O'er all that leaps, and runs, and shouts, and sings,
Or beats the gladsome air; o'er all that glides
Beneath the wave, yea, in the wave itself, 215
And mighty depth of waters. Wonder not
If such his transports⁵⁰ were; for in all things
He saw one life, and felt that it was joy.⁵¹
One song they sang, and it was audible –
Most audible then when the fleshly ear, 220
O'ercome by grosser prelude of that strain,⁵²
Forgot its functions, and slept undisturbed.⁵³

These things he had sustained⁵⁴ in solitude
Even till his bodily strength began to yield
Beneath their weight.⁵⁵ The mind within him burnt, 225
And he resolved to quit his native hills.
The father strove to make his son perceive
As clearly as the old man did himself
With what advantage he might teach a school
In the adjoining village. But the youth, 230
Who of this service made a short essay,⁵⁶
Found that the wanderings of his thought were then
A misery to him, that he must resign
A task he was unable to perform.
He asked his father's blessing, and assumed 235
This lowly occupation. The old man
Blessed him and prayed for him, yet with a heart

Foreboding⁵⁷ evil.

From his native hills
He wandered far. Much did he see of men,
Their manners,⁵⁸ their enjoyments and pursuits, 240
Their passions and their feelings, chiefly those Essential and eternal in the heart,
Which mid the simpler forms of rural life
Exist more simple in their elements,
And speak a plainer language.⁵⁹ Many a year 245
Of lonesome meditation and impelled
By curious thought he was content to toil
In this poor⁶⁰ calling, which he now pursued
From habit and necessity. He walked
Among the impure haunts of vulgar men 250
Unstained; the talisman⁶¹ of constant thought
And kind sensations in a gentle heart
Preserved him. Every show of vice to him
Was a remembrancer⁶² of what he knew,
Or a fresh seed of wisdom, or produced 255
That tender interest⁶³ which the virtuous feel
Among the wicked, which when truly felt
May bring the bad man nearer to the good,
But, innocent of evil, cannot sink
The good man to the bad.

Among the woods 260
A lone enthusiast, and among the hills,
Itinerant⁶⁴ in this labour he had passed
The better portion of his time, and there
From day to day had his affections⁶⁵ breathed
The wholesome air of Nature; there he kept 265
In solitude and solitary thought,
So pleasant were those comprehensive views,
His mind in a just equipoise⁶⁶ of love.

Serene it was, unclouded by the cares
Of ordinary life – unvexed, unwarped 270
By partial bondage.⁶⁷ In his steady course
No piteous revolutions⁶⁸ had he felt,
No wild varieties of joy or grief.
Unoccupied by sorrow of its own,
His heart lay open; and, by Nature tuned 275
And constant disposition of his thoughts
To sympathy with man,⁶⁹ he was alive
To all that was enjoyed where'er he went,
And all that was endured; and, in himself
Happy, and quiet in his cheerfulness, 280
He had no painful pressure from within
Which made him turn aside from wretchedness
With coward fears. He could afford to suffer
With those whom he saw suffer. Hence it was
That in our best experience he was rich, 285
And in the wisdom of our daily life.
For hence, minutely, in his various rounds
He had observed the progress and decay
Of many minds, of minds and bodies too –
The history of many families, 290
And how they prospered, how they were o'erthrown
By passion or mischance, or such misrule
Among the unthinking masters of the earth
As makes the nations groan. He was a man,
One whom you could not pass without remark⁷⁰ – 295
If you had met him on a rainy day
You would have stopped to look at him. Robust,
Active, and nervous,⁷¹ was his gait; his limbs
And his whole figure breathed intelligence.
His body, tall and shapely, showed in front 300
A faint line of the hollowness of age,
Or rather what appeared the curvature

Of toil; his head looked up steady and fixed.
Age had compressed the rose upon his cheek
Into a narrower circle of deep red, 305
But had not tamed his eye, which, under brows
Of hoary grey, had meanings which it brought
From years of youth, which, like a being made
Of many beings, he had wondrous skill
To blend with meanings of the years to come, 310
Human, or such as lie beyond the grave.
Long had I loved him. Oh, it was most sweet
To hear him teach in unambitious style
Reasoning and thought, by painting as he did
The manners⁷² and the passions. Many a time 315
He made a holiday and left his pack
Behind, and we two wandered through the hills
A pair of random travellers. His eye
Flashing poetic fire he would repeat
The songs of Burns,⁷³ or many a ditty wild 320
Which he had fitted to the moorland harp –
His own sweet verse – and, as we trudged along,
Together did we make the hollow grove
Ring with our transports.

 Though he was untaught,
In the dead lore of schools⁷⁴ undisciplined, 325
Why should he grieve? He was a chosen son.
He yet retained an ear which deeply felt
The voice of Nature in the obscure wind,
The sounding mountain, and the running stream.
From deep analogies by thought supplied, 330
Or consciousnesses not to be subdued,
To every natural form, rock, fruit, and flower,
Even the loose stones that cover the highway,
He gave a moral life;⁷⁵ he saw them feel,
Or linked them to some feeling. In all shapes 335

He found a secret and mysterious soul,
A fragrance and a spirit of strange meaning.
Though poor in outward show, he was most rich:
He had a world about him – 'twas his own,
He made it – for it only lived to him, 340
And to the God who looked into his mind.
Such sympathies would often bear him far
In outward gesture, and in visible look,
Beyond the common seeming⁷⁶ of mankind.
Some called it madness; such it might have been, 345
But that he had an eye which evermore
Looked deep into the shades of difference⁷⁷
As they lie hid in all exterior forms,
Near or remote, minute or vast – an eye
Which from a stone, a tree, a withered leaf, 350
To the broad ocean and the azure heavens
Spangled with kindred multitudes of stars,
Could find no surface where its power might sleep –
Which spake perpetual logic to his soul,
And by an unrelenting agency 355
Did bind his feelings even as in a chain.⁷⁸

The Pedlar

¹ The Pedlar begins abruptly because it was composed originally as part of The Ruined Cottage. It is Wordsworth's earliest piece of autobiographical and philosophical poetry, and was to be a dry run for both The Recluse and The Prelude (though Wordsworth had no idea, as he composed it, that he would soon be writing an autobiographical poem; see Two-Part Prelude headnote, p. 457 n. 1). He decided within the year that these verses were too long for incorporation into The Ruined Cottage and by October 1800 had turned them into an independent work entitled The Pedlar. For a time it was planned to publish the poem with Christabel, and it was revised in 1801–2 with this in mind. However, it remained unpublished (as did Christabel) when, in spring 1804, Wordsworth planned The Excursion, in which the Pedlar, renamed the Wanderer, would be a central character. The Pedlar and The Ruined Cottage were once again brought together and revised as a single entity for The Excursion, published in 1814. The Pedlar remained in manuscript in this early form until 1969.

2 huts cottages.

3 I knew him ‘At Hawkshead also, while I was a schoolboy, there occasionally resided a packman ... with whom I had frequent conversations upon what had befallen him, and what he had observed during his wandering life, and, as was natural, we took much to each other’ (FN 79).

4 luminous shining.

5 ere before.

6 tenement building.

7 not from terror free Burke had celebrated the importance of fear in aesthetic terms in his Sublime and Beautiful (1757) (see p. 8). For Wordsworth, fear is important as it stimulates and intensifies imaginative thought; cf. Two-Part Prelude i 67–80.

8 deep feelings...sense Sublime natural forms are literally stamped (‘impressed’) on the child’s mind as mental ‘images’, thanks partly to strong feelings (of fear, pain, pleasure) that he experienced in their presence.

9 even to be scanned as a single syllable, ‘e’en’.

10 he thence...dreams Recollections of landscape are valued because they can be compared with the imaginary (‘ideal’) scenes that the child creates and stores in his head. The process by which the mind thinks about remembered landscapes ('Intensely brooded'), giving them more and more vividness, was especially important, and underlies the pantheist claims of Tintern Abbey 23–50, and much of the poetry in the Two-Part Prelude.

11 after-day later time.

12 Or either.

13 the power of a peculiar eye especially sharp observation.

14 creative feeling imaginative sympathy.

15 predominance of thought dominance of thought over other kinds of response.

16 Even in...varying Even in the solid and unmovable rocks, the Pedlar perceived the ebb and flow of a pantheistic life-force.

17 for many a tale...hung Legends and folklore nourish the imagination as well as fear. Wordsworth presumably has in mind the kind of story that inspired The Brothers.

18 moral properties It was important to Wordsworth and Coleridge that a natural education be not merely creative, but provide the individual with an understanding ('apprehensive power') of the relationships between people, and enable him to see his relationship to the world around him.

19 The life and death...pangs Wordsworth read Foxe's Book of Martyrs as a schoolboy at Hawkshead.

20 Profuse in garniture of wooden cuts with many woodcut illustrations.

21 the preternatural tale...forgotten Coleridge and Wordsworth believed that children should read fairy-tales as they did when young;

see Coleridge's letter to Poole, p. 638.

22 the curious links...sustained a reference to the associationist philosophy of David Hartley, which informs much of Wordsworth's thinking at this moment. The 'links' that connect the 'perishable hours of life' are emotions (arising, in this case, out of the romances of giants and chronicles of fiends) that confirm the underlying unity and order of the imaginative mind.

23 Within his heart...love Although he can see it in the rocks (ll. 56–7) the boy cannot yet feel within himself the pantheist life-force ('love').

24 abroad out.

25 The clouds...life Wordsworth draws on Coleridge's Reflections on Having left a Place of Retirement 26–42 (see pp. 626–7), in which the poet enjoys a similar pantheistic experience atop a hill.

26 access of mind the boy is incorporated into the larger consciousness of 'the living God'. 'Mind' in this case probably means 'spirit'.

27 in such high hour...God cf. Charles Lloyd's London 82, which celebrates the visionary who 'holds high converse with the present God'.

28 intercourse communion.

29 The written promise This phrase, and the reference to 'the writing' at l. 123, show that Wordsworth is recalling Bishop Berkeley's theory that the natural world is the symbolic language of God's thought. In the same month as The Pedlar Coleridge composed Frost at Midnight 63–7 (see pp. 646, 648).

30 Sublime and comprehensive noble, lofty or well-balanced.

31 superstitious conscientious.

32 orb world.

33 Milton a favourite poet with young Wordsworth.

34 books...poverty Mathematics is here regarded as inhumane, constricted and deadly. In later years Wordsworth admitted to being so good at it that he was put in the fast stream: 'When at school, I, with the other boys of the same standing, was put upon reading the first six books of Euclid, with the exception of the fifth; and also in algebra I learnt simple and quadratic equations' (Owen and Smyser iii 373).

35 o'erlooked didn't notice, whiled away.

36 wasting destructive, consuming.

37 wean A child is 'weaned' from its mother when she ceases to breastfeed it. Nature will wean the boy away from the destructive tendency of geometrical analysis.

38 Therefore...truth The boy clothes the 'austere truth' of geometry with the colours and shapes of the landscape he loves.

39 altitudes in geometrical terms, the height of a triangle measured by a perpendicular from the peak to the base.

40 visionary embodying truth.

41 the path of fire an apocalyptic and tumultuous event in the past, to which the mountains bear witness by their markings.

42 toy hobby.

43 A holy spirit and a breathing soul Nature rather than God.

44 disturbed i.e. with intense passion and creative thought.

45 I have heard...hues The Pedlar attempts to reconcile Newtonian optics with his perceptions of Nature.

46 mitigate reduce.

47 steeped in feeling filled with emotion. For Wordsworth and Coleridge profound thought was possible only for those capable of deep feeling.

48 ineffable indescribable.

49 He felt...still The Pedlar is aware of some divine presence, not unlike the Platonic world soul, infused throughout the natural world.

50 transports raptures.

51 He saw one life, and felt that it was joy This is a primary statement of Wordsworth's pantheistic belief, arrived at under Coleridge's influence in 1798. It recurs in some of the 1798 lyrical ballads (including Tintern Abbey), but virtually disappears from his writing after that year.

52 grosser prelude of that strain The 'music' of ordinary sense experience – so intense that it leads to loss of bodily awareness and a perception of the mystic 'song' of the one life.

53 From Nature...undisturbed ll. 204–22 were transferred to the Two-Part Prelude in autumn 1799, to describe the poet's own feelings when he was 16; see Two-Part Prelude ii 446–64.

54 sustained suffered.

55 These things...weight The transcendent experiences are so intense that they sap his strength.

56 essay trial.

57 Foreboding anticipating.

58 manners way of life.

59 chiefly those...language Partly in reaction to the ornamented and overwrought diction of much late eighteenth-century verse, Wordsworth composed a poetry reflecting the less 'sophisticated' language and experiences of country folk, which he regarded as truer to the emotions. Cf. Preface to Lyrical Ballads (1800): 'Low and rustic life was generally chosen because in that situation the essential passions of the heart find a better soil in which they can attain their maturity, are less under restraint, and speak a plainer and more emphatic language' (see p. 507).

60 poor humble. When The Pedlar was published as part of The Excursion in 1814, Francis Jeffrey attacked the poem for the lowly origins of its protagonist (see pp. 739–40).

61 talisman The Pedlar's thoughts act as a charm that protects him.

62 remembrancer reminder.

63 tender interest compassion.

64 Itinerant travelling.

65 affections feelings.

66 equipoise balance.

67 partial bondage i.e. to the cares of daily life.

68 revolutions reversals, changes.

69 by Nature tuned...man Wordsworth's first statement of the belief that love of Nature leads to love of mankind, the central tenet of The Recluse.

70 without remark without noticing.

71 nervous vigorous.

72 manners way of life.

73 The songs of Burns Wordsworth praised ‘the simplicity, the truth and the vigour of Burns’ (FN 170); see also 338 n. 7.

74 the dead lore of schools philosophy.

75 To every...life He attributed to natural things the ability to act as independent moral agents; effectively, he endowed them with human emotions.

76 seeming conduct, behaviour.

77 shades of difference small and subtle differences perceptible only to the trained mind.

78 such it might...chain Not satisfied with ‘exterior forms’ (l. 348), or with any single ‘surface’ or outward appearance (l. 353), the Pedlar’s eye is trained to perceive the essential – the ‘perpetual logic’ of existence. Because it sees through to what is permanent, it is continuously active (‘unrelenting’ in its ‘agency’), and has the effect of regulating his feelings, linking them into a chain of beneficial associations.

[Not useless do I deem] (composed February–March 1798; edited from MS)¹

‘Not useless do I deem
These quiet sympathies with things that hold

An inarticulate language,² for the man
Once taught to love such objects as excite
No morbid passions, no disquietude, 5
No vengeance and no hatred, needs must feel³
The joy of that pure principle of love
So deeply that, unsatisfied with aught
Less pure and exquisite,⁴ he cannot choose
But⁵ seek for objects of a kindred love 10
In fellow natures, and a kindred joy.
Accordingly he by degrees perceives
His feelings of aversion softened down,
A holy tenderness pervade his frame.⁶
His sanity of reason not impaired 15
(Say rather all his thoughts now flowing clear,
From a clear fountain flowing), he looks round,
He seeks for good, and finds the good he seeks –
Till execration⁷ and contempt are things
He only knows by name, and if he hears 20
From other mouth the language which they speak
He is compassionate, and has no thought,
No feeling, which can overcome his love.
And further, by contemplating these forms
In the relations which they bear to man, 25
We shall discover what a power is theirs
To stimulate our minds, and multiply
The spiritual presences of absent things.⁸
Then weariness⁹ will cease: we shall acquire
The [] habit by which sense is made 30
Subservient still to moral purposes¹⁰ –
A vital essence and a saving power.
Nor shall we meet an object but may read
Some sweet and tender lesson¹¹ to our minds
Of human suffering or of human joy. 35

All things shall speak of man, and we shall read
Our duties¹² in all forms; and general laws
And local accidents¹³ shall tend alike
To quicken and to rouse,¹⁴ and give the will
And power by which a [] chain of good¹⁵ 40
Shall link us to our kind. No naked hearts,
No naked minds, shall then be left to mourn
The burden of existence.¹⁶ Science then
Shall be a precious visitant; and then,
And only then, be worthy of her name.¹⁷ 45
For then her heart shall kindle, her dull eye –
Dull and inanimate – no more shall hang
Chained to its object in brute slavery;
But better taught and mindful of its use
Legitimate, and its peculiar power 50
While with a patient interest it shall watch
The processes of things, and serve the cause
Of order and distinctness; not for this
Shall it forget that its most noble end,
Its most illustrious province, must be found 55
In ministering to the excursive power
Of intellect and thought. So build we up
The being that we are. For was it meant
That we should pore, and dwindle as we pore
Forever dimly pore on things minute, 60
On solitary objects, still beheld
In disconnection, dead and spiritless;
And still dividing, and dividing still,¹⁸
Break down all grandeur, still unsatisfied
With our unnatural toil while littleness 65
May yet become more little, waging thus
An impious warfare¹⁹ with the very life
Of our souls? Or was it ever meant

That this majestic imagery, the clouds,
The ocean, and the firmament of heaven 70
Should be a barren picture on the mind?²⁰
Never for ends²¹ of vanity and pain
And sickly wretchedness were we endued
Amid this world of feeling and of life
With apprehension, reason, will and thought, 75
Affections,²² organs, passions. Let us rise
From this oblivious sleep, these fretful dreams
Of feverish nothingness. Thus disciplined
All things shall live in us, and we shall live
In all things that surround us.²³ This I deem 80
Our tendency, and thus shall every day
Enlarge our sphere of pleasure and of pain.
For thus the senses and the intellect
Shall each to each supply a mutual aid,
Invigorate and sharpen and refine 85
Each other with a power that knows no bound,
And forms and feelings acting thus, and thus
Reacting, they shall each acquire
A living spirit and a character
Till then unfelt, and each be multiplied, 90
With a variety that knows no end.
Thus deeply drinking in²⁴ the soul of things
We shall be wise perforce, and we shall move
From strict necessity²⁵ along the path
Of order and of good. Whate'er we see, 95
Whate'er we feel, by agency direct
Or indirect, shall tend to feed and nurse
Our faculties and raise to loftier height
Our intellectual soul.'

The old man ceased.

The words he uttered shall not pass away;²⁶ 100

They had sunk into me, but not as sounds
 To be expressed by visible characters,
 For while he spake my spirit had obeyed
 The presence of his eye, my ear had drunk
 The meanings of his voice. He had discoursed 105
 Like one who in the slow and silent works,
 The manifold conclusions of his thought,
 Had brooded till Imagination's power
 Condensed them to a passion whence she drew
 Herself new energies, resistless force. 110

Not useless do I deem

1 This was originally part of 'The Pedlar', and is meant to be spoken by him. Though fragmentary, it is important because it articulates the philosophy of Wordsworth's ambitious, never-completed epic poem, The Recluse, describing in detail the means by which love of Nature leads to love of mankind. Years later it was revised and incorporated into The Excursion Book IV (ll. 1198–1292).

2 Not useless...language In the background is the notion, derived from Bishop Berkeley, that all natural things are part of a mental 'language' spoken by God.

3 needs must feel Wordsworth's language indicates that the process he is describing is necessitarian. The individual has no choice but to feel 'the joy of that pure principle of love' emanating from natural objects.

4 exquisite refined.

5 he cannot choose / But Once again, the language indicates that Wordsworth is talking about a necessitarian process; having felt the pantheist impulse of pure love passing through him from the natural world, the individual has no choice but to seek out 'objects of a kindred love' – that is, other people.

6 Accordingly...frame One of the effects of the pure principle of love is to dissolve petty feelings of dislike or hostility, allowing a reciprocal love of other people to ‘pervade’ his spirit.

7 execration hatred.

8 And further...things A central belief behind The Recluse: as in Tintern Abbey, memories of natural forms are impressed on the mind so that the individual can contemplate them at will. Their effect is to ‘stimulate’ or refresh the mind (cf. the ‘tranquil restoration’ of Tintern Abbey 31), and place the individual in contact, on a spiritual level, with natural objects that are not physically present. Essentially Wordsworth is claiming that everyone may experience what is described at Tintern Abbey 26–50.

9 weariness cf. ‘the heavy and the weary weight / Of all this unintelligible world’, Tintern Abbey 40–1.

10 The [] habit...purposes i.e. the way in which perceived natural forms (‘sense’) make us habitually ‘seek for objects of a kindred love / In fellow natures’ (ll. 10–11, above). Nature compels us to love our fellow man.

11 lesson sermon.

12 Our duties i.e. the moral duty to love our fellow man.

13 and general laws / And local accidents i.e. the general laws by which love of nature leads to love of man, and unforeseen incidents (‘local accidents’) which bring us into contact with natural forms.

14 To quicken and to rouse i.e. stimulate the mind, as at l. 27 above.

15 chain of good a chain of association – that is, the beneficial chain that inspires love of mankind through love of nature.

16 No naked hearts...burden of existence The ills of mankind – disease, war, poverty, and other social ills – will be alleviated.

17 Science...worthy of her name Science will then be worthy of its original meaning, ‘knowledge’ (from Latin scientia).

18 solitary objects...dividing still This kind of sterile, forensic thinking, typical of certain approaches to science, was regarded by Wordsworth and Coleridge as anathema to the ambitions of ‘The Recluse’. See, for instance, Coleridge’s letter to John Thelwall of October 1797:

I can at times feel strongly the beauties you describe, in themselves and for themselves, but more frequently all things appear little ... the universe itself, what but an immense heap of little things? I can contemplate nothing but parts, and parts are all little! My mind feels as if it ached to behold and know something great – something one and indivisible. And it is only in the faith of this that rocks or waterfalls, mountains or caverns give me the sense of sublimity or majesty! (Griggs i 349).

19 impious warfare Wordsworth is recalling the ‘impious war’ raised by Satan at Paradise Lost i 43.

20 Or was it ever meant...on the mind Wordsworth’s account of lack of imagination is inspired by Hamlet’s avowal of depression:

this most excellent canopy, the air, look you, this brave o’erhanging firmament, this majestical roof fretted with golden fire, why, it appeareth nothing to me but a foul and pestilent congregation of vapours. What a piece of work is a man, how noble in reason, how infinite in faculties, in form and moving, how express and admirable in action, how like an angel in apprehension, how like a god! – the beauty of the world; the paragon of animals; and yet to me what is this quintessence of dust? (II ii 299–308).

21 ends aims.

22 Affections emotions.

23 Thus disciplined...that surround us A reiteration of the pantheist conviction that underpins much of the Alfoxden poetry, as for instance at Pedlar 105–6, ‘In them did he live, / And by them did he live – they were his life’, or 217–18: ‘in all things / He saw one life, and felt that it was joy.’

24 drinking in cf. the Pedlar, who ‘drank / The spectacle’ (Pedlar 102–3).

25 perforce...strict necessity This passage is necessitarian. The individual has no choice but to be acted upon by ‘forms and feelings’, which acquire their ‘living spirit’ that brings wisdom to the individual, irrespective of his or her will. The phrase ‘strict necessity’ alludes to Paradise Lost v 528.

26 The words...pass away Throughout Wordsworth’s poetry, he is ambitious to formulate a poetry calculated to interest mankind permanently – a poetry that articulates ultimate and immutable truths.

[Away, away – it is the air] (composed between 20 April and 16 May 1798;
first published 1947)¹

Away, away – it is the air
That stirs among the withered leaves;
Away, away, it is not there,
Go hunt among the harvest sheaves.
There is a bed in shape as plain 5
As form of hare or lion’s lair;
It is the bed where we have lain
In anguish and despair.

Away and take the eagle's eyes,
The tyger's smell, 10
Ears that can hear the agonies
And murmurings of hell;
And when you there have stood
By that same bed of pain –
The groans are gone, the tears remain – 15
Then tell me if the thing be clear,
The difference betwixt a tear
Of water and of blood.

Away, away – it is the air

¹ This fragmentary poem is widely thought to be associated with 'The Thorn'.

[The Two-Part Prelude] (Part I composed October 1798–February 1799; Part II, autumn 1799; edited from MS)¹

First Part

Was it for this
That one, the fairest of all rivers, loved
To blend his murmurs with my nurse's song,
And from his alder shades and rocky falls,
And from his fords and shallows, sent a voice 5
That flowed along my dreams?² For this didst thou,
Oh Derwent, travelling over the green plains
Near my 'sweet birthplace',³ didst thou, beauteous stream,
Make ceaseless music through the night and day,

Which with its steady cadence tempering 10
 Our human waywardness, composed my thoughts
 To more than infant softness, giving me,
 Among the fretful dwellings of mankind,
 A knowledge, a dim earnest⁴ of the calm
 Which nature breathes among the fields and groves? 15
 Beloved Derwent, fairest of all streams,
 Was it for this that I, a four years' child,
 A naked boy, among thy silent pools,
 Made one long bathing of a summer's day,
 Basked in the sun, or plunged into thy streams 20
 Alternate all a summer's day, or coursed⁵
 Over the sandy fields, and dashed the flowers
 Of yellow grunsel;⁶ or, when crag and hill,
 The woods, and distant Skiddaw's lofty height⁷
 Were bronzed with a deep radiance, stood alone, 25
 A naked savage in the thunder shower?
 And afterwards, 'twas in a later day,
 Though early,⁸ when upon the mountain-slope
 The frost and breath of frosty wind had snapped
 The last autumnal crocus, 'twas my joy 30
 To wander half the night among the cliffs
 And the smooth hollows where the woodcocks ran
 Along the moonlight turf. In thought and wish
 That time, my shoulder all with springes⁹ hung,
 I was a fell destroyer. Gentle powers 35
 Who give us happiness and call it peace,
 When scudding on from snare to snare I plied
 My anxious visitation – hurrying on,
 Still hurrying, hurrying onward – how my heart
 Panted among the scattered yew-trees and the crags 40
 That looked upon me, how my bosom beat
 With expectation! Sometimes strong desire,
 Resistless, overpowered me, and the bird

Which was the captive of another's toils¹⁰
 Became my prey; and when the deed was done 45
 I heard among the solitary hills
 Low breathings coming after me, and sounds
 Of undistinguishable motion, steps
 Almost as silent as the turf they trod.¹¹
 Nor less in springtime, when on southern banks 50
 The shining sun had from his knot of leaves
 Decoyed the primrose flower, and when the vales
 And woods were warm, was I a rover then
 In the high places, on the lonesome peaks
 Among the mountains and the winds. Though mean 55
 And though inglorious were my views, the end
 Was not ignoble.¹² Oh, when I have hung
 Above the raven's nest, by knots of grass
 Or half-inch fissures in the slipp'ry rock
 But ill sustained, and almost (as it seemed) 60
 Suspended by the blast which blew amain,¹³
 Shouldering the naked crag¹⁴ – oh, at that time,
 While on the perilous ridge I hung alone,¹⁵
 With what strange utterance did the loud dry wind
 Blow through my ears! The sky seemed not a sky 65
 Of earth, and with what motion moved the clouds!
 The mind of man is fashioned and built up
 Even as a strain of music; I believe
 That there are spirits which, when they would form
 A favoured being, from his very dawn 70
 Of infancy do open out the clouds
 As at the touch of lightning, seeking him
 With gentle visitation – quiet powers,
 Retired and seldom recognized, yet kind
 And to the very meanest not unknown. 75
 With me, though rarely, in my early days,
 They communed; others too there are who use,

Yet haply aiming at the self-same end,
Severer interventions, ministry¹⁶
More palpable – and of their school was I. 80
They guided me. One evening, led by them,
I went alone into a shepherd's boat,
A skiff that to a willow-tree was tied
Within a rocky cave, its usual home.
The moon was up, the lake was shining clear 85
Among the hoary mountains; from the shore
I pushed, and struck the oars, and struck again
In cadence, and my little boat moved on
Just like a man who walks with stately step
Though bent on speed.¹⁷ It was an act of stealth 90
And troubled pleasure; not without the voice
Of mountain-echoes did my boat move on,
Leaving behind her still on either side
Small circles glittering idly in the moon
Until they melted all into one track 95
Of sparkling light.¹⁸ A rocky steep uprose
Above the cavern of the willow-tree,
And now, as suited one who proudly rowed
With his best skill, I fixed a steady view
Upon the top of that same craggy ridge, 100
The bound of the horizon, for behind
Was nothing but the stars and the grey sky.
She was an elfin pinnacle;¹⁹ twenty times
I dipped my oars into the silent lake,
And, as I rose upon the stroke, my boat 105
Went heaving through the water like a swan –
When, from behind that rocky steep (till then
The bound of the horizon), a huge cliff,²⁰
As if with voluntary power instinct,²¹
Upreared its head. I struck and struck again, 110
And, growing still in stature, the huge cliff

Rose up between me and the stars, and still,
With measured motion, like a living thing
Strode after me. With trembling hands I turned,
And through the silent water stole my way 115
Back to the cavern of the willow-tree.
There in her mooring-place I left my bark,
And through the meadows homeward went with grave
And serious thoughts; and after I had seen
That spectacle, for many days my brain 120
Worked with a dim and undetermined sense
Of unknown modes of being.²² In my thoughts
There was a darkness – call it solitude
Or blank desertion; no familiar shapes
Of hourly objects,²³ images of trees, 125
Of sea or sky, no colours of green fields,
But huge and mighty forms that do not live
Like living men moved slowly through my mind
By day, and were the trouble of my dreams.²⁴
Ah, not in vain, ye beings of the hills, 130
And ye that walk the woods and open heaths
By moon or starlight, thus from my first dawn
Of childhood did ye love to intertwine
The passions that build up our human soul,
Not with the mean and vulgar works of man, 135
But with high objects, with eternal things,
With life and nature, purifying thus
The elements of feeling and of thought,
And sanctifying by such discipline
Both pain and fear, until we recognize 140
A grandeur in the beatings of the heart.²⁵
Nor was this fellowship vouchsafed to me
With stinted kindness.²⁶ In November days,
When vapours rolling down the valleys made
A lonely scene more lonesome, among woods 145

At noon, and mid the calm of summer nights
When by the margin of the trembling lake
Beneath the gloomy hills I homeward went
In solitude, such intercourse²⁷ was mine.

And in the frosty season, when the sun 150
Was set, and visible for many a mile,
The cottage windows through the twilight blazed,
I heeded not the summons;²⁸ clear and loud
The village clock tolled six; I wheeled about,
Proud and exulting like an untired horse 155
That cares not for its home. All shod with steel
We hissed along the polished ice²⁹ in games
Confederate,³⁰ imitative of the chase
And woodland pleasures – the resounding horn,
The pack loud bellowing, and the hunted hare. 160
So through the darkness and the cold we flew,
And not a voice was idle. With the din,
Meanwhile, the precipices rang aloud,
The leafless trees and every icy crag
Tinkled like iron, while the distant hills 165
Into the tumult sent an alien sound
Of melancholy not unnoticed – while the stars
Eastward were sparkling clear, and in the west
The orange sky of evening died away.

Not seldom from the uproar I retired 170
Into a silent bay, or sportively
Glanced sideways, leaving the tumultuous throng,
To cut across the shadow³¹ of a star
That gleamed upon the ice. And oftentimes,
When we had given our bodies to the wind, 175
And all the shadowy banks on either side
Came sweeping through the darkness, spinning still
The rapid line of motion – then at once
Have I, reclining back upon my heels,

Stopped short: yet still the solitary cliffs 180
Wheeled by me, even as if the earth had rolled
With visible motion her diurnal³² round;
Behind me did they stretch in solemn train³³
Feebler and feebler, and I stood and watched
Till all was tranquil as a summer sea. 185
Ye powers of earth, ye genii of the springs!
And ye that have your voices in the clouds
And ye that are familiars of the lakes
And of the standing pools,³⁴ I may not think
A vulgar hope was yours when ye employed 190
Such ministry³⁵ – when ye through many a year
Thus by the agency of boyish sports
On caves and trees, upon the woods and hills,
Impressed³⁶ upon all forms the characters³⁷
Of danger or desire, and thus did make 195
The surface of the universal earth
With meanings of delight, of hope and fear,
Work like a sea.³⁸

Not uselessly employed,
I might pursue this theme through every change
Of exercise and sport to which the year 200
Did summon us in its delightful round.
We were a noisy crew; the sun in heaven
Beheld not vales more beautiful than ours,
Nor saw a race in happiness and joy
More worthy of the fields where they were sown. 205
I would record with no reluctant voice
Our home amusements by the warm peat-fire
At evening, when with pencil and with slate,
In square divisions parcelled out, and all
With crosses and with cyphers scribbled o'er,³⁹ 210
We schemed and puzzled, head opposed to head,

In strife too humble to be named in verse;
Or round the naked table, snow-white deal,
Cherry or maple, sat in close array,
And to the combat, loo or whist,⁴⁰ led on 215
A thick-ribbed army⁴¹ – not (as in the world)
Discarded and ungratefully thrown by
Even for the very service they had wrought,⁴²
But husbanded⁴³ through many a long campaign.
Oh with what echoes on the board they fell! 220
Ironic diamonds, hearts of sable hue,
Queens gleaming through their splendour's last decay,
Knives wrapped in one assimilating gloom,
And kings indignant at the shame incurred
By royal visages. Meanwhile abroad 225
The heavy rain was falling, or the frost
Raged bitterly with keen and silent tooth,⁴⁴
Or, interrupting the impassioned game,⁴⁵
Oft from the neighbouring lake the splitting ice,
While it sank down towards the water, sent 230
Among the meadows and the hills its long
And frequent yellings,⁴⁶ imitative some
Of wolves that howl along the Bothnic main.⁴⁷
Nor with less willing heart would I rehearse
The woods of autumn and their hidden bowers 235
With milk-white clusters⁴⁸ hung, the rod and line
(True symbol of the foolishness of hope)
Which with its strong enchantment led me on
By rocks and pools where never summer star
Impressed its shadow,⁴⁹ to forlorn cascades 240
Among the windings of the mountain-brooks;
The kite, in sultry calms from some high hill
Sent up, ascending thence till it was lost
Among the fleecy clouds, in gusty days

Launched from the lower grounds, and suddenly 245
Dashed headlong – and rejected by the storm.
All these and more with rival claims demand
Grateful acknowledgement. It were a song
Venial, and such as if I rightly judge
I might protract unblamed, but I perceive 250
That much is overlooked, and we should ill
Attain our object if from delicate fears
Of breaking in upon the unity
Of this my argument⁵⁰ I should omit
To speak of such effects as cannot here 255
Be regularly classed, yet tend no less
To the same point, the growth of mental power
And love of nature's works.

Ere I had seen

Eight summers⁵¹ – and 'twas in the very week
When I was first entrusted to thy vale, 260
Beloved Hawkshead! – when thy paths, thy shores
And brooks, were like a dream of novelty
To my half-infant mind, I chanced to cross
One of those open fields which, shaped like ears,⁵²
Make green peninsulas on Esthwaite's Lake. 265
Twilight was coming on, yet through the gloom
I saw distinctly on the opposite shore,
Beneath a tree and close by the lakeside,
A heap of garments, as if left by one
Who there was bathing. Half an hour I watched 270
And no one owned them; meanwhile the calm lake
Grew dark with all the shadows on its breast,
And now and then a leaping fish disturbed
The breathless stillness. The succeeding day
There came a company, and in their boat 275
Sounded with iron hooks and with long poles.
At length the dead man,⁵³ mid that beauteous scene

Of trees and hills and water, bolt upright
Rose with his ghastly face. I might advert⁵⁴
To numerous accidents in flood or field,⁵⁵ 280
Quarry or moor, or mid the winter snows,
Distresses and disasters, tragic facts
Of rural history that impressed my mind
With images to which, in following years,
Far other feelings were attached, with forms 285
That yet exist with independent life,
And, like their archetypes, know no decay.⁵⁶

There are in our existence spots of time
Which with distinct pre-eminence retain
A fructifying⁵⁷ virtue, whence, depressed 290
By trivial occupations and the round
Of ordinary intercourse, our minds
(Especially the imaginative power)
Are nourished, and invisibly repaired.⁵⁸
Such moments chiefly seem to have their date 295
In our first childhood.

I remember well
(’Tis of an early season that I speak,
The twilight of rememberable life)
While I was yet an urchin,⁵⁹ one who scarce
Could hold a bridle, with ambitious hopes 300
I mounted, and we rode towards the hills.
We were a pair of horsemen: honest James⁶⁰
Was with me, my encourager and guide.
We had not travelled long ere some mischance
Disjoined me from my comrade and, through fear 305
Dismounting, down the rough and stony moor
I led my horse, and, stumbling on, at length
Came to a bottom where in former times
A man, the murderer of his wife, was hung

In irons; mouldered was the gibbet-mast, 310
The bones were gone, the iron and the wood,
Only a long green ridge of turf remained

Whose shape was like a grave.⁶¹ I left the spot
And, reascending the bare slope, I saw
A naked pool that lay beneath the hills, 315

The beacon on the summit,⁶² and, more near,
A girl who bore a pitcher on her head
And seemed with difficult steps to force her way
Against the blowing wind. It was in truth
An ordinary sight, but I should need 320
Colours and words that are unknown to man

To paint the visionary dreariness⁶³
Which, while I looked all round for my lost guide,
Did at that time invest the naked pool,
The beacon on the lonely eminence, 325
The woman and her garments vexed and tossed
By the strong wind.

Nor less I recollect,
Long after, though my childhood had not ceased,
Another scene which left a kindred power
Implanted in my mind. One Christmas-time, 330

The day before the holidays began,⁶⁴
Feverish and tired and restless, I went forth
Into the fields, impatient for the sight
Of those three horses which should bear us home,
My brothers and myself.⁶⁵ There was a crag,⁶⁶ 335
An eminence which from the meeting-point
Of two highways ascending, overlooked
At least a long half-mile of those two roads,
By each of which the expected steeds might come,
The choice uncertain. Thither I repaired 340
Up to the highest summit. 'Twas a day
Stormy, and rough, and wild, and on the grass

I sat, half-sheltered by a naked wall;
Upon my right hand was a single sheep,
A whistling hawthorn on my left, and there, 345
Those two companions at my side, I watched,
With eyes intensely straining, as the mist
Gave intermitting prospects of the wood
And plain beneath. Ere I to school returned
That dreary time, ere I had been ten days 350
A dweller in my father's house, he died,⁶⁷
And I and my two brothers, orphans then,
Followed his body to the grave. The event,
With all the sorrow which it brought, appeared
A chastisement,⁶⁸ and when I called to mind 355
That day so lately past, when from the crag
I looked in such anxiety of hope,
With trite reflections of morality,
Yet with the deepest passion, I bowed low
To God, who thus corrected my desires.⁶⁹ 360
And afterwards the wind and sleety rain
And all the business of the elements,
The single sheep, and the one blasted tree,
And the bleak music of that old stone wall,
The noise of wood and water, and the mist 365
Which on the line of each of those two roads
Advanced in such indisputable shapes⁷⁰ –
All these were spectacles and sounds to which
I often would repair, and thence would drink
As at a fountain.⁷¹ And I do not doubt 370
That in this later time, when storm and rain
Beat on my roof at midnight, or by day
When I am in the woods, unknown to me
The workings of my spirit thence are brought.⁷²
Nor, sedulous⁷³ as I have been to trace 375

How nature by collateral⁷⁴ interest
And by extrinsic passion⁷⁵ peopled first
My mind with forms or beautiful or grand⁷⁶
And made me love them, may I well forget
How other pleasures have been mine, and joys 380
Of subtler origin – how I have felt,
Not seldom, even in that tempestuous time,
Those hallowed and pure motions of the sense
Which seem in their simplicity to own
An intellectual⁷⁷ charm, that calm delight 385
Which, if I err not, surely must belong
To those first-born affinities⁷⁸ that fit
 Our new existence to existing things,
And in our dawn of being constitute
The bond of union betwixt life and joy. 390
 Yes, I remember when the changeful earth
And twice five seasons on my mind had stamped
The faces of the moving year; even then,
A child, I held unconscious intercourse
With the eternal beauty, drinking in 395
A pure organic⁷⁹ pleasure from the lines
Of curling mist, or from the level plain
Of waters coloured by the steady clouds.
 The sands of Westmorland, the creeks and bays
Of Cumbria's rocky limits, they can tell 400
How when the sea threw off his evening shade
And to the shepherd's hut beneath the crags
Did send sweet notice of the rising moon,
How I have stood, to images like these
A stranger, linking with the spectacle 405
No body of associated forms⁸⁰
And bringing with me no peculiar sense
Of quietness or peace – yet I have stood,

Even while my eye has moved o'er three long leagues⁸¹
Of shining water, gathering, as it seemed, 410
Through the wide surface of that field of light
New pleasure like a bee among the flowers.

Thus often in those fits of vulgar⁸² joy
Which through all seasons on a child's pursuits
Are prompt attendants, mid that giddy bliss 415
Which like a tempest works along the blood
And is forgotten – even then I felt
Gleams like the flashing of a shield. The earth
And common face of nature spake to me
Rememberable things – sometimes, 'tis true, 420
By quaint associations, yet not vain
Nor profitless if haply they impressed

Collateral objects and appearances,⁸³
Albeit lifeless then, and doomed to sleep
Until maturer seasons called them forth 425
To impregnate and to elevate the mind.
And if the vulgar joy by its own weight
Wearied itself out of the memory,
The scenes which were a witness of that joy
Remained in their substantial lineaments 430

Depicted on the brain,⁸⁴ and to the eye
Were visible, a daily sight. And thus,
By the impressive agency of fear,⁸⁵
By pleasure, and repeated happiness,
So frequently repeated, and by force 435
Of obscure feelings representative
Of joys that were forgotten, these same scenes
So beauteous and majestic in themselves,
Though yet the day was distant, did at length
Become habitually dear, and all 440

Their hues and forms were by invisible links⁸⁶

Allied to the affections.⁸⁷
 I began
 My story early, feeling, as I fear,
 The weakness of a human love for days
 Disowned by memory, ere the birth of spring 445
 Planting my snowdrops among winter snows.
 Nor will it seem to thee, my friend,⁸⁸ so prompt
 In sympathy, that I have lengthened out
 With fond and feeble tongue a tedious tale.
 Meanwhile my hope has been that I might fetch 450
 Reproaches from my former years, whose power
 May spur me on, in manhood now mature,
 To honourable toil.⁸⁹ Yet should it be
 That this is but an impotent desire,
 That I by such enquiry am not taught 455
 To understand myself, nor thou to know
 With better knowledge how the heart was framed
 Of him thou lovest, need I dread from thee
 Harsh judgements if I am so loath to quit
 Those recollected hours that have the charm 460
 Of visionary things,⁹⁰ and lovely forms
 And sweet sensations that throw back our life
 And make our infancy a visible scene
 On which the sun is shining?

The Two-Part Prelude

¹ This is the earliest complete version of Wordsworth's masterpiece, The Prelude. There were to be three further versions: one in Five Books (completed February 1804); one in Thirteen (completed early 1806); and one in Fourteen (published posthumously in 1850). It was known only to Wordsworth's close friends, including Coleridge, Hazlitt and De Quincey. No one expected Wordsworth to write an autobiographical poem; he began it in Germany in the winter of 1798–9, which he believed to be the coldest of the century, in a state of despair at not managing to get on with The Recluse, the great millennial epic poem proposed by Coleridge (see p. 422). See my comments at pp. 424–5 above.

3 sweet birthplace The quotation marks, which appear in the manuscript, refer the reader to Coleridge's Frost at Midnight 28; it is particularly appropriate that The Prelude, which is addressed to Coleridge, should allude to his work.

4 earnest foretaste, pledge.

5 coursed run.

6 grunsel ragwort.

7 distant Skiddaw's lofty height Skiddaw is the fourth highest peak in the Lake District at 3,053 feet.

8 And...early Wordsworth jumps forward to his time at Hawkshead Grammar School, which he joined in May 1779; he left Hawkshead for Cambridge in the autumn of 1787.

9 springes traps; Wordsworth is thinking of Hamlet I iii 115: 'Aye, springes to catch woodcocks.'

10 toils a pun, meaning both 'trap' and 'labours'.

11 and when...trod Wordsworth's guilt might be explained partly by the fact that woodcock were a delicacy and fetched a good price for those who could catch them – sixteen or twenty pence a couple on the spot before being sent to London on the Kendal stagecoach. They were trapped by snares set at the end of narrowing avenues of stones which the birds would not jump over.

12 the end...ignoble ravens preyed on lambs and anyone who destroyed their eggs was rewarded by the parish. The 'end' (aim) was not, in Wordsworth's case, monetary.

13 amain strongly.

14 Shouldering the naked crag The slightly inflated diction suggests that Wordsworth is recalling Atlas, the Titan of myth, who bore the world on his shoulders.

15 I hung alone See Wordsworth's comments in the 1815 Preface, pp. 588–9.

16 ministry guidance.

17 Just like...speed Wordsworth recalls the description of Michael from Paradise Lost xii 1–2: 'As one who in his journey bates at noon, / Though bent on speed'.

18 sparkling light probably a recollection of the 'tracks of shining white' made by the water-snakes in Coleridge's Ancient Mariner (1798) 266.

19 elfin pinnace The language embodies the child's imaginative absorption; the boat seems to be enchanted.

20 a huge cliff Glenridding Dodd, the stepped-back summit of which causes its peak to make a sudden delayed appearance above the 'craggy steep' of Stybarrow Crag as one rows out from the shores of Patterdale (see Grevel Lindop, A Literary Guide to the Lake District (1993), pp. 317–18).

21 instinct imbued, filled.

22 unknown modes of being forms of life beyond human experience. The vagueness and imprecision is meant to evoke the child's fear.

23 hourly objects objects that can be depended on to be the same from one hour to the next.

24 But huge...dreams As the alien mountain-forms take hold of his imagination, the boy is 'deserted' by the reassuring memories of ordinary things.

25 Ah, not in vain...heart The feelings and thoughts of Wordsworth's childhood were purer for having been associated not with man-made things (as in a town), but the enduring forms of Nature. This natural education has sanctified – that is to say, given value to – the otherwise unpleasant sensations of pain and fear; thus, when his heart beat with terror, he recognized the 'grandeur' of the experience.

26 Nor was...kindness This special relationship with Nature ('fellowship') was not given grudgingly.

27 intercourse companionship (with Nature).

28 The cottage...summons Candle- and fire-light through the cottage windows tell the boy that it is time to go home.

29 We hissed...ice Wordsworth's phrasing recalls Erasmus Darwin's Botanic Garden, 'Hang o'er the sliding steel, and hiss along the ice' (Economy of Vegetation iii 570).

30 Confederate collective; games played in groups.

31 shadow reflection; altered to 'image' in the Thirteen-Book Prelude, and 'reflex' for Fourteen-Book Prelude.

32 diurnal daily, as in A slumber did my spirit seal, in which Lucy is 'Rolled round in earth's diurnal course / With rocks and stones and trees' (ll. 7–8).

33 train sequence, succession.

34 Ye powers...pools The tutelary spirits have their source in Shakespeare, Tempest V i 33: ‘Ye elves of hills, brooks, standing lakes and groves.’

35 ministry guidance

36 Impressed stamped, printed.

37 characters signs, marks.

38 Work like a sea See Cowper, Task vi 737–8: ‘this tempestuous state of human things, / Is merely as the working of a sea.’ Their association with ‘boyish sports’ has given the impression of movement to the poet’s recollection of the landscape in which he grew up.

39 With crosses...o’er noughts and crosses (tick-tack-toe). The line echoes Paradise Lost, where man is ridiculed for attempting to map the heavens, ‘With centric and eccentric scribbled o’er’ (viii 83).

40 loo or whist The description of these eighteenth-century card-games recalls the game of ombre in Pope’s Rape of the Lock iii. See J. R. Watson, ‘Wordsworth’s Card Games’, TWC 6 (1975) 299–302.

41 A thick-ribbed army The cards’ edges have thickened through use.

42 not...wrought cf. for example, the discharged soldier (see p. 427).

43 husbanded saved up; they were survivors.

44 keen and silent tooth ‘Thy tooth is not so keen’, Amiens tells the winter wind in As You Like It II vii 177. But as Owen, Wordsworth as Critic (Oxford, 1969), p. 107 points out, ll. 225–7 are based on Cowper’s Winter Evening: ‘how the frost / Raging abroad, and the rough wind, endear / The silence and the warmth enjoyed within’ (Task iv 308–10; see p. 22).

45 the impassioned game a particularly persuasive detail; the game fully engages the players' emotions ('passions').

46 its long...yellings The ice makes a yelling noise as it breaks up; Coleridge had used this detail in The Ancient Mariner (1798) 57–60.

47 Bothnic main the northern Baltic.

48 milk-white clusters hazel nuts. 'Nutting', composed for The Two-Part Prelude, was discarded immediately and published in Lyrical Ballads (1800) as an independent work; see pp. 485–6.

49 shadow reflection.

50 argument theme; cf. Paradise Lost i 24: 'the height of this great argument'.

51 Ere I had...summers Despite Wordsworth's claims, he went to Hawkshead Grammar School in May 1779 at the age of nine.

52 shaped like ears There are three such peninsulas on the map; the one Wordsworth has in mind is Strickland Ees.

53 the dead man John Jackson, village schoolmaster from Sawrey, was drowned while bathing in Esthwaite Water, 18 June 1779.

54 advert refer.

55 To numerous...field an echo of Othello I iii 134–5: 'Wherein I spake of most disastrous chances, / Of moving accidents by flood and field'.

56 tragic facts...decay A change has taken place in Wordsworth's thought since The Pedlar and Tintern Abbey (composed only months before). As in those works, he is concerned with the storing-up of visual memories in the mind as a result of deep emotional response. However, the images are now treasured not for their permanence but because of quite distinct new feelings that have become attached to them over the years.

57 fructifying the power to make fruitful.

58 repaired As in Tintern Abbey 40–2, the essential characteristic of these remembered ‘spots of time’ is to restore the mind.

59 an urchin Wordsworth was 5 at the time this incident took place. He was staying with his grandparents at Penrith.

60 honest James identified in the Fourteen-Book Prelude as being ‘An ancient Servant of my Father’s house’ (xii 229).

61 Mouldered was the gibbet-mast...like a grave The valley-bottom was Cowdrake Quarry, east of Penrith, where Thomas Nicholson was hanged in 1767 for having murdered a butcher. However, The Prelude is not a record of fact, and it is worth noting that Nicholson’s gibbet had not ‘mouldered down’ in 1775, and a 5-year-old would not have ridden that far. Wordsworth may also have in mind a rotted gibbet in the water-meadows near Ann Tyson’s cottage, the last remains of Thomas Lancaster, hanged in 1672 for poisoning his wife.

62 The beacon on the summit built in 1719 to warn of invasion from Scotland; it is still to be seen, a short building with a pointed roof on the hill above Penrith.

63 visionary dreariness Wordsworth’s point is that in spite of the ordinariness and bleakness of the scene, it was impressed on his mind with all the intensity and power of a vision. At the back of his mind is Milton’s hell, a ‘dismal situation waste and wild’, where there was no light ‘but rather darkness visible’ (Paradise Lost i 60, 63).

64 One Christmas-time...began probably 19 December 1783, when Wordsworth was 13.

65 My brothers and myself Wordsworth's brothers, Richard (1768–1816) and John (1772–1805), also attended Hawkshead Grammar School. The horses were to take them home to Cockermouth; it was a fairly lengthy journey as Hawkshead and Cockermouth were at opposite ends of the Lake District. Whether they chose to go round the coastal route or towards the east, to Keswick, through Ambleside and thence to Hawkshead, it was necessary to travel around the central mountains. The horses were in fact delayed.

66 a crag probably the ridge north of Borwick Lodge, a mile and a half from Hawkshead Grammar School.

67 he died John Wordsworth Sr died on 30 December 1783 after spending a shelterless night lost during his return from the Seignory of Millom two weeks before. His wife, Ann, had died five years previously, just before Wordsworth's eighth birthday.

68 chastisement (stressed on the first syllable) punishment

69 I bowed low to God...desires The child believes he has been punished for looking forward too eagerly to the Christmas holidays – in effect, he has killed his father.

70 indisputable shapes De Selincourt notes an interesting echo of Hamlet addressing his father's ghost: 'Thou com'st in such a questionable shape / That I will speak to thee' (I iv 43–4).

71 fountain stream or well.

72 unknown to me...brought Spots of time mould the adult mind by the power of association, though it remains unaware of their workings.

73 sedulous careful, anxious.

74 collateral indirect, sideways.

75 extrinsic passion emotions not directly related to the natural scenes that were to 'educate' the poet. Nature operated on the boy without his being aware of it.

76 or...or either...or.

77 intellectual spiritual – the sense in which Wordsworth often uses the word.

78 first-born affinities affinities with which the child is born.

79 organic sensuous, bodily.

80 linking...forms Wordsworth emphasizes that he has enjoyed these things in and for themselves, rather than for any association they may have with other things. He has been a 'stranger' to them in so far as he has not seen them before and sees them freshly.

81 three long leagues at least nine miles (a league is a varying measure of about three miles).

82 vulgar ordinary, unremarkable.

83 sometimes...appearances The 'associations' (or juxtapositions) are quaint, but not vain or without benefit if indirectly ('collaterally') they impress natural objects and appearances on the mind.

84 in their substantial lineaments...brain The storing up of visual images is described in similar terms at Pedlar 32–4: 'on his mind / They lay like substances, and almost seemed / To haunt the bodily sense.'

85 the impressive agency of fear fear's ability to stamp 'impressions' on the memory.

86 invisible links associative links in the mind. Wordsworth draws on the theory of the mind's association of ideas derived from sense-experience, as expounded by David Hartley (1705–57) in his Observations of Man (1749) – a strong influence on Coleridge.

87 And thus...affections Fear, pleasure and repeated happiness all work to make the natural world constantly precious ('habitually dear'), and to connect its colours and shapes to the poet's emotions ('affections').

88 my friend Coleridge, to whom the poem is addressed.

89 honourable toil When he composed these lines in February 1799, Wordsworth expected to go on with The Recluse.

90 Missionary things things seen imaginatively.

Second Part

Thus far, my friend, have we retraced the way
Through which I travelled when I first began
To love the woods and fields. The passion yet
Was in its birth, sustained (as might befall)
By nourishment that came unsought; 1 for still 5
From week to week, from month to month, we lived
A round of tumult. Duly were our games
Prolonged in summer till the daylight failed;
No chair remained before the doors; the bench
And threshold steps were empty; fast asleep 10
The labourer, and the old man who had sat
A later lingerer – yet the revelry
Continued, and the loud uproar! At last,
When all the ground was dark, and the huge clouds
Were edged with twinkling stars, to bed we went, 15
With weary joints and with a beating mind. 2
Ah, is there one who ever has been young

And needs a monitory voice to tame
The pride of virtue and of intellect?³
And is there one, the wisest and the best 20
Of all mankind, who does not sometimes wish
For things which cannot be, who would not give,
If so he might, to duty and to truth
The eagerness of infantine desire?
A tranquillizing spirit presses now 25
On my corporeal frame,⁴ so wide appears
The vacancy between me and those days
Which yet have such self-presence⁵ in my heart
That sometimes, when I think of them, I seem
Two consciousnesses – conscious of myself 30
And of some other being. A grey stone
Of native rock, left midway in the square
Of our small market-village, was the home
And centre of these joys; and when, returned
After long absence, thither I repaired, 35
I found that it was split, and gone to build
A smart assembly-room⁶ that perked and flared
With wash and rough-cast, elbowing the ground
Which had been ours. But let the fiddle scream
And be ye happy! Yet I know, my friends,⁷ 40
That more than one of you will think with me
Of those soft starry nights, and that old dame
From whom the stone was named, who there had sat
And watched her table with its huckster's wares,
Assiduous for the length of sixty years.⁸ 45
We ran a boisterous race, the year span round
With giddy motion. But the time approached
That brought with it a regular desire
For calmer pleasures, when the beauteous scenes
Of nature were collaterally attached 50
To every scheme of holiday delight

And every boyish sport – less grateful⁹ else,
And languidly pursued.¹⁰

When summer came
It was the pastime of our afternoons
To beat along the plain¹¹ of Windermere 55
With rival oars, and the selected bourn¹²
Was now an island musical with birds
That sang for ever; now a sister isle
Beneath the oak's umbrageous¹³ covert, sown
With lilies-of-the-valley like a field; 60
And now a third small island¹⁴ where remained
An old stone table and one mouldered cave –
A hermit's history. In such a race,
So ended, disappointment could be none,
Uneasiness, or pain, or jealousy; 65
We rested in the shade, all pleased alike,
Conquered and conqueror. Thus our selfishness
Was mellowed down, and thus the pride of strength
And the vainglory of superior skill
Were interfused¹⁵ with objects which subdued 70
And tempered them, and gradually produced
A quiet independence of the heart.
And to my friend who knows me, I may add,
Unapprehensive of reproof, that hence
Ensued a diffidence and modesty, 75
And I was taught to feel, perhaps too much,
The self-sufficing power of solitude.

No delicate viands¹⁶ sapped our bodily strength;
More than we wished we knew the blessing then
Of vigorous hunger, for our daily meals 80
Were frugal, Sabine fare;¹⁷ and then, exclude
A little weekly stipend,¹⁸ and we lived
Through three divisions of the quartered year

In penniless poverty. But now, to school
Returned from the half-yearly holidays, 85
We came with purses more profusely filled,¹⁹
Allowance which abundantly sufficed
To gratify the palate with repasts
More costly than the dame of whom I spake,
That ancient woman,²⁰ and her board, supplied. 90
Hence inroads into distant vales, and long
Excursions far away among the hills;
Hence rustic dinners on the cool green ground,
Or in the woods, or by a riverside
Or fountain²¹ – festive banquets that provoked 95
The languid action of a natural scene
By pleasure of corporeal appetite.
Nor is my aim neglected if I tell
How twice in the long length of those half-years
We from our funds perhaps with bolder hand 100
Drew largely – anxious for one day, at least,
To feel the motion of the galloping steed.
And with the good old innkeeper,²² in truth,
I needs must say that sometimes we have used
Sly subterfuge, for the intended bound 105
Of the day's journey was too distant far
For any cautious man – a structure famed
Beyond its neighbourhood, the antique walls
Of that large abbey with its fractured arch,²³
Belfry, and images, and living trees, 110
A holy scene! Along the smooth green turf
Our horses grazed. In more than inland peace
Left by the winds that overpass the vale
In that sequestered ruin trees and towers,
Both silent and both motionless alike, 115
Hear all day long the murmuring sea that beats
Incessantly upon a craggy shore.

Our steeds remounted, and the summons given,
With whip and spur we by the chantry²⁴ flew
In uncouth²⁵ race, and left the cross-legged knight, 120
And the stone abbot,²⁶ and that single wren
Which one day sang so sweetly in the nave
Of the old church that, though from recent showers
The earth was comfortless, and, touched by faint
Internal breezes from the roofless walls, 125
The shuddering ivy dripped large drops, yet still
So sweetly mid the gloom the invisible bird
Sang to itself that there I could have made
My dwelling-place, and lived for ever there
To hear such music.²⁷ Through the walls we flew 130
And down the valley, and, a circuit made
In wantonness of heart, through rough and smooth
We scampered homeward. Oh, ye rocks and streams,
And that still spirit of the evening air,
Even in this joyous time I sometimes felt 135
Your presence, when with slackened step we breathed²⁸
Along the sides of the steep hills, or when,
Lightened by gleams of moonlight from the sea,
We beat with thundering hoofs the level sand.²⁹
There was a row of ancient trees, since fallen, 140
That on the margin of a jutting land
Stood near the lake of Coniston, and made
With its long boughs above the water stretched
A gloom through which a boat might sail along
As in a cloister. An old hall³⁰ was near, 145
Grotesque and beautiful, its gavel-end³¹
And huge round chimneys to the top o'ergrown
With fields of ivy. Thither we repaired,
'Twas even a custom with us, to the shore
And to that cool piazza.³² They who dwelt 150

In the neglected mansion-house supplied
Fresh butter, tea-kettle, and earthenware,
And chafing-dish with smoking coals,³³ and so
Beneath the trees we sat in our small boat
And in the covert³⁴ ate our delicate meal 155
Upon the calm smooth lake. It was a joy
Worthy the heart of one who is full-grown
To rest beneath those horizontal boughs
And mark the radiance of the setting sun,
Himself unseen, reposing on the top 160
Of the high eastern hills. And there I said,
That beauteous sight before me, there I said
(Then first beginning in my thoughts to mark
That sense of dim similitude which links
Our moral feelings with external forms) 165
That in whatever region I should close
My mortal life I would remember you,
Fair scenes, that dying I would think on you,
My soul would send a longing look to you,
Even as that setting sun while all the vale 170
Could nowhere catch one faint memorial gleam
Yet with the last remains of his last light
Still lingered, and a farewell lustre threw
On the dear mountain-tops where first he rose.³⁵
'Twas then my fourteenth summer, and these words 175
Were uttered in a casual access
Of sentiment, a momentary trance
That far outran the habit of my mind.
Upon the eastern shore of Windermere
Above the crescent of a pleasant bay, 180
There was an inn³⁶ – no homely-featured shed,
Brother of the surrounding cottages,
But 'twas a splendid place, the door beset
With chaises,³⁷ grooms, and liveries,³⁸ and within

Decanters, glasses, and the blood-red wine.³⁹ 185
In ancient times, or ere the hall was built
On the large island,⁴⁰ had this dwelling been
More worthy of a poet's love, a hut⁴¹
Proud of its one bright fire and sycamore shade.
But though the rhymes were gone which once inscribed 190
The threshold, and large golden characters⁴²
On the blue-frosted signboard had usurped
The place of the old lion, in contempt
And mockery of the rustic painter's hand,
Yet to this hour the spot to me is dear 195
With all its foolish pomp. The garden lay
Upon a slope surmounted by the plain
Of a small bowling-green; beneath us stood
A grove, with gleams of water through the trees
And over the tree-tops – nor did we want 200
Refreshment, strawberries and mellow cream.
And there, through half an afternoon, we played
On the smooth platform, and the shouts we sent
Made all the mountains ring. But ere the fall
Of night, when in our pinnacle we returned 205
Over the dusky lake, and to the beach
Of some small island steered our course, with one,⁴³
The minstrel of our troop, and left him there,
And rowed off gently while he blew his flute
Alone upon the rock – oh then the calm 210
And dead still water lay upon my mind
Even with a weight of pleasure, and the sky,
Never before so beautiful, sank down
Into my heart, and held me like a dream.
Thus day by day my sympathies increased, 215
And thus the common range of visible things
Grew dear to me. Already I began
To love the sun – a boy I loved the sun

Not as I since have loved him (as a pledge
And surety⁴⁴ of our earthly life, a light 220
Which while I view I feel I am alive),
But for this cause: that I had seen him lay
His beauty on the morning hills, had seen
The western mountain touch his setting orb
In many a thoughtless hour, when from excess 225
Of happiness my blood appeared to flow
With its own pleasure, and I breathed with joy.
And from like feelings, humble though intense
(To patriotic and domestic love
Analogous⁴⁵), the moon to me was dear, 230
For I would dream away my purposes,
Standing to look upon her while she hung
Midway between the hills, as if she knew
No other region, but belonged to thee –
Yea, appertained by a peculiar right 235
To thee and thy grey huts,⁴⁶ my native vale.
Those incidental charms which first attached
My heart to rural objects day by day
Grew weaker, and I hasten on to tell
How Nature – intervenient till this time, 240
And secondary⁴⁷ – now at length was sought
For her own sake. But who shall parcel out⁴⁸
His intellect by geometric rules,
Split like a province into round and square?
Who knows the individual hour in which 245
His habits were first sown, even as a seed?
Who that shall point as with a wand, and say,
‘This portion of the river of my mind
Came from yon fountain’? Thou, my friend,⁴⁹ art one
More deeply read in thy own thoughts, no slave 250
Of that false secondary power⁵⁰ by which

In weakness we create distinctions, then
Believe our puny boundaries are things
Which we perceive, and not which we have made.
To thee, unblinded by these outward shows, 255
The unity of all has been revealed;⁵¹
And thou wilt doubt with me, less aptly skilled
Than many are to class the cabinet
Of their sensations,⁵² and in voluble⁵³ phrase
Run through the history and birth of each 260
As of a single independent thing.
Hard task⁵⁴ to analyse a soul, in which
Not only general habits and desires,
But each most obvious and particular thought –
Not in a mystical⁵⁵ and idle sense, 265
But in the words of reason deeply weighed –
Hath no beginning.

Blessed the infant babe⁵⁶
(For with my best conjectures I would trace
The progress of our being)⁵⁷ – blessed the babe
Nursed in his mother's arms, the babe who sleeps 270
Upon his mother's breast, who when his soul
Claims manifest kindred with an earthly soul,
Doth gather passion from his mother's eye!⁵⁸
Such feelings pass into his torpid⁵⁹ life
Like an awakening breeze, and hence his mind, 275
Even in the first trial of its powers,
Is prompt and watchful, eager to combine
In one appearance all the elements
And parts of the same object, else detached
And loath to coalesce.⁶⁰ Thus day by day 280
Subjected to the discipline of love,
His organs and recipient faculties⁶¹

Are quickened,⁶² are more vigorous; his mind spreads,
Tenacious of the forms which it receives.⁶³

In one beloved presence – nay and more, 285

In that most apprehensive habitude⁶⁴

And those sensations which have been derived

From this beloved presence, there exists

A virtue which irradiates and exalts

All objects through all intercourse of sense.⁶⁵ 290

No outcast he, bewildered and depressed:

Along his infant veins are interfused

The gravitation and the filial bond

Of nature that connect him with the world.⁶⁶

Emphatically such a being lives 295

An inmate of this active universe.

From nature largely he receives, nor so

Is satisfied, but largely⁶⁷ gives again –

For feeling has to him imparted strength;

And, powerful in all sentiments of grief, 300

Of exultation, fear and joy, his mind,

Even as an agent of the one great mind

Creates, creator and receiver both,⁶⁸

Working but in alliance with the works

Which it beholds. Such, verily, is the first 305

Poetic spirit of our human life,

By uniform control of after-years

In most abated and suppressed, in some

Through every change of growth or of decay

Pre-eminent till death.

From early days, 310

Beginning not long after that first time

In which, a babe, by intercourse of touch,

I held mute dialogues with my mother's heart,

I have endeavoured to display the means

Whereby the infant sensibility, 315
 Great birthright of our being, was in me
 Augmented and sustained. Yet is a path
 More difficult before me, and I fear
 That in its broken windings we shall need
 The chamois' 69 sinews and the eagle's wing. 320
 For now a trouble came into my mind
 From unknown causes: I was left alone,
 Seeking this visible world, nor knowing why.
 The props of my affections were removed,
 And yet the building stood, as if sustained 325
 By its own spirit. 70 All that I beheld
 Was dear to me, and from this cause it came:
 That now to nature's finer influxes 71
 My mind lay open to that more exact
 And intimate communion which our hearts 330
 Maintain with the minuter properties 72
 Of objects which already are beloved,
 And of those only.
 Many are the joys
 Of youth, but oh what happiness to live
 When every hour brings palpable access 73 335
 Of knowledge, when all knowledge is delight,
 And sorrow is not there! The seasons came,
 And every season brought a countless store
 Of modes and temporary qualities 74
 Which, but for this most watchful power of love, 340
 Had been neglected – left a register
 Of permanent relations, 75 else unknown.
 Hence life, and change, and beauty, solitude
 More active even than 'best society', 76
 Society made sweet as solitude 345
 By silent inobtrusive sympathies

And gentle agitations of the mind
From manifold distinctions (difference Perceived in things where to the common eye No difference is) – and hence, from the same source, 350

Sublimier joy.⁷⁷ For I would walk alone⁷⁸
In storm and tempest, or in starlight nights
Beneath the quiet heavens, and at that time
Would feel whate'er there is of power in sound
To breathe⁷⁹ an elevated mood, by form 355
Or image unprofaned. And I would stand
Beneath some rock, listening to sounds that are
The ghostly language of the ancient earth
Or make their dim abode in distant winds:
Thence did I drink the visionary power. 360
I deem not profitless these fleeting moods
Of shadowy exultation – not for this,
That they are kindred to our purer mind⁸⁰
And intellectual life, but that the soul,
Remembering how she felt, but what she felt 365
Remembering not, retains an obscure sense
Of possible sublimity, to which
With growing faculties she doth aspire,
With faculties still growing, feeling still
That whatsoever point they gain they still 370
Have something to pursue.

And not alone
In grandeur and in tumult, but no less
In tranquil scenes, that universal power
And fitness⁸¹ in the latent qualities
And essences of things, by which the mind 375
Is moved with feelings of delight, to me
Came strengthened with a superadded soul,⁸²
A virtue not its own. My morning walks
Were early; oft before the hours of school⁸³

I travelled round our little lake, five miles 380
Of pleasant wandering – happy time more dear
For this, that one was by my side, a friend
Then passionately loved. With heart how full
Will he peruse these lines, this page (perhaps
A blank to other men), for many years 385
Have since flowed in between us, and, our minds
Both silent to each other, at this time
We live as if those hours had never been.
Nor seldom did I lift our cottage latch
Far earlier, and before the vernal⁸⁴ thrush 390
Was audible, among the hills I sat
Alone upon some jutting eminence
At the first hour of morning, when the vale
Lay quiet in an utter solitude.
How shall I trace the history, where seek 395
The origin of what I then have felt?
Oft in those moments such a holy calm
Did overspread my soul, that I forgot
The agency of sight, and what I saw
Appeared like something in myself – a dream, 400
A prospect⁸⁵ in my mind.
’Twere long to tell
What spring and autumn, what the winter snows,
And what the summer shade, what day and night,
The evening and the morning, what my dreams
And what my waking thoughts supplied, to nurse 405
That spirit of religious love in which
I walked with nature. But let this at least
Be not forgotten – that I still retained
My first creative sensibility,
That by the regular action of the world 410
My soul was unsubdued. A plastic⁸⁶ power
Abode with me, a forming hand,⁸⁷ at times

Rebellious, acting in a devious mood,
A local spirit of its own, at war
With general tendency, but for the most 415
Subservient strictly to the external things
With which it communed.⁸⁸ An auxiliar⁸⁹ light
Came from my mind, which on the setting sun
Bestowed new splendour; the melodious birds,
The gentle breezes, fountains that ran on 420
Murmuring so sweetly in themselves, obeyed
A like dominion, and the midnight storm
Grew darker in the presence of my eye.
Hence my obeisance, my devotion hence,
And hence my transport.⁹⁰
Nor should this perchance 425
Pass unrecorded, that I still had loved
The exercise and produce of a toil
Than analytic industry to me
More pleasing, and whose character I deem
Is more poetic, as resembling more 430
Creative agency – I mean to speak
Of that interminable building⁹¹ reared
By observation of affinities
In objects where no brotherhood exists
To common minds. My seventeenth year was come, 435
And, whether from this habit⁹² rooted now
So deeply in my mind, or from excess
Of the great social principle of life⁹³
Coercing all things into sympathy,
To unorganic natures I transferred 440
My own enjoyments,⁹⁴ or, the power of truth
Coming in revelation, I conversed
With things that really are; I at this time
Saw blessings spread around me like a sea.
Thus did my days pass on, and now at length 445

From Nature and her overflowing soul⁹⁵
I had received so much that all my thoughts
Were steeped in feeling.

I was only then
Contented when with bliss ineffable⁹⁶
I felt the sentiment of being spread 450
O'er all that moves, and all that seemeth still,
O'er all that, lost beyond the reach of thought
And human knowledge, to the human eye
Invisible, yet liveth to the heart;
O'er all that leaps and runs, and shouts and sings, 455
Or beats the gladsome air; o'er all that glides
Beneath the wave, yea in the wave itself
And mighty depth of waters. Wonder not
If such my transports⁹⁷ were, for in all things
I saw one life, and felt that it was joy. 460
One song they sang, and it was audible –
Most audible then when the fleshly ear,
O'ercome by grosser prelude of that strain,⁹⁸
Forgot its functions and slept undisturbed.

If this be error,⁹⁹ and another faith 465
Find easier access to the pious mind,
Yet were I grossly destitute of all
Those human sentiments which make this earth
So dear, if I should fail with grateful voice
To speak of you, ye mountains and ye lakes 470
And sounding cataracts, ye mists and winds
That dwell among the hills where I was born.
If in my youth I have been pure in heart,
If, mingling with the world, I am content
With my own modest pleasures, and have lived 475
With God and nature communing, removed
From little enmities and low desires,
The gift is yours; if in these times of fear,

This melancholy waste¹⁰⁰ of hopes o'erthrown,
If, mid indifference and apathy 480
And wicked exultation, when good men
On every side fall off we know not how,
To selfishness, disguised in gentle names
Of peace and quiet and domestic love,
Yet mingled not unwillingly with sneers 485
On visionary minds¹⁰¹ – if in this time
Of dereliction and dismay I yet
Despair not of our nature, but retain
A more than Roman confidence,¹⁰² a faith
That fails not, in all sorrow my support, 490
The blessing of my life, the gift is yours,
Ye mountains! – thine, oh nature! Thou hast fed
My lofty speculations, and in thee,
For this uneasy heart of ours, I find
A never-failing principle¹⁰³ of joy 495
And purest passion.

Thou, my friend, wast reared
In the great city, mid far other scenes,¹⁰⁴
But we by different roads at length have gained
The self-same bourn. And from this cause to thee
I speak unapprehensive of contempt, 500
The insinuated scoff of coward tongues,
And all that silent language which so oft
In conversation betwixt man and man
Blots from the human countenance all trace
Of beauty and of love. For thou hast sought 505
The truth in solitude, and thou art one,
The most intense of nature's worshippers,
In many things my brother, chiefly here
In this my deep devotion.

Fare thee well!¹⁰⁵
Health and the quiet of a healthful mind 510

Attend thee, seeking oft the haunts of men,
And yet more often living with thyself,
And for thyself. So haply shall thy days
Be many, and a blessing to mankind.

End of the Second Part 106

1 nourishment that came unsought Where in Part I Wordsworth discussed his unconscious reponse to the influence of nature, he aims to show in Part II how nature in adolescence was ‘sought / For her own sake’.

2 a beating mind cf. The Tempest IV i 162–3: ‘A turn or two I’ll walk, / To still my beating mind.’

3 Ah, is...intellect ‘How can anyone who remembers what it was like to be young need a warning (“monitory voice”) not to overrate the achievements of maturity?’

4 corporeal frame body; the effect is similar to that described in Tintern Abbey 44–6.

5 self-presence presence to himself – actuality, immediacy.

6 A smart assembly-room Hawkshead Town Hall, built 1790, covered with gravel stucco (‘rough-cast’) and whitewash. Wordsworth didn’t like white buildings because of the way they stuck out in the landscape.

7 my friends An address to Coleridge and John Wordsworth (the poet’s brother), with whom the poet visited Hawkshead on 2 November 1799.

8 that old dame...years Ann Holme, who set out her wares – cakes, pies and sweets – on the large stone at the end of the market square in Hawkshead.

9 grateful pleasing.

10 languidly pursued Natural beauty is still only an additional ('collateral') pleasure, though it is beginning to be valued.

11 plain flat surface of the lake.

12 boorn aim, destination.

13 umbrageous shady.

14 a third small island Lady Holm, where there was once a chapel to the Virgin Mary.

15 interfused mingled; cf. Tintern Abbey 97.

16 delicate viands decorative delicacies of no nutritional value.

17 Sabine fare The Sabine region of Italy has for centuries been famous for olives, but Wordsworth is more likely to be referring to fish, which are as plentiful in its rivers and lakes as in those of the English Lake District. As a good classicist, Wordsworth knew that the Roman poet Horace owned a farm in Sabina.

18 A little weekly stipend In 1787, the year he left Hawkshead, Wordsworth received sixpence a week.

19 But now...filled When Wordsworth returned to school in January 1787, after the half-yearly holiday, he had an extra guinea (worth 42 'weekly stipends').

20 That ancient woman Ann Tyson was 73 in January 1787.

21 fountain spring or stream.

22 innkeeper who hired out the horses.

23 that large abbey with its fractured arch Furness Abbey is about 20 miles south of Hawkshead, near Barrow-in-Furness. It was founded by Cistercian monks in 1127 and dissolved by Henry VIII in 1539. The fractured arch is still to be seen. Its roof-timbers, stripped of their valuable lead, had long since fallen by Wordsworth's day.

24 chantry chapel where masses were once said for the dead.

25 uncouth unseemly, indecorous (because of their surroundings).

26 the cross-legged knight...abbot The stone figures of several cross-legged knights and an abbot may still be seen in the museum at Furness Abbey.

27 So sweetly...music cf. Shakespeare, Sonnet 73: 'Bare ruined choirs, where late the sweet birds sang.'

28 breathed i.e. let the horses get their breath back.

29 the level sand The return journey took them along Levens Sands from Rampside to Greenodd.

30 An old hall Coniston Hall, dating from 1580, was the seat of the wealthy Le Fleming family.

31 gavel-end gable.

32 cool piazza the shady colonnade formed by the branches of the sycamore trees.

33 chafing-dish with smoking coals portable charcoal stove used to cook trout, or char, from the lake.

34 covert shade.

35 Even as...rose In later years Wordsworth recalled that this image ‘suggested itself to me while I was resting in a boat along with my companions under the shade of a magnificent row of sycamores, which then extended their branches from the shore of the promontory upon which stands the ancient, and at that time the more picturesque, Hall of Coniston, the seat of the Le Flemings, from very early times’ (FN 6).

36 an inn the White Lion at Bowness, now the Royal Hotel.

37 chaises light carriages.

38 liveries uniforms.

39 the blood-red wine an echo of the anonymous ballad, Sir Patrick Spens: ‘The king sits in Dunfermling toune, / Drinking the blude-reid wine’ (ll. 1–2). Wordsworth knew it from Percy’s Reliques of Ancient English Poetry (1765), a copy of which he purchased in Hamburg shortly before starting work on the Two-Part Prelude.

40 the hall...island The first and finest of the neoclassical villas in the Lakes was the circular mansion on Belle Isle in Windermere, designed by John Plaw in 1774 for Thomas English, but not completed until the early 1780s when John Christian Curwen had become its owner. Wordsworth follows the guidebook writers of the day – Hutchinson, West and Gilpin – in deploring the changes that had taken place, including the felling of many trees and the demolition of the old buildings (including, perhaps, the ‘hut’ mentioned here). Dorothy had harsh words for the circular mansion in June 1802: ‘...& that great house! Mercy upon us! If it could be concealed it would be well for all who are not pained to see the pleasantest of earthly spots deformed by man’ (Grasmere Journals 107; her italics).

41 hut cottage.

42 characters letters.

43 one Robert Greenwood, another of Ann Tyson's boarders, who was elected Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge in 1792. Wordsworth remained in touch with him for many years.

44 surety guarantee.

45 To patriotic...analogous His love for the moon was like love of country and family ('domestic love') because it gave him pleasure in the region where he lived.

46 grey huts cottages built of grey stone.

47 intervenient...secondary Nature had been experienced in the midst of other distractions.

48 parcel out divide up, categorize, analyse.

49 my friend Wordsworth turns once more to Coleridge, to whom this poem is dedicated.

50 that false secondary power the power of rational analysis, as opposed to the imaginative perception of unity.

51 To thee...revealed Coleridge was a Unitarian, and capable of writing: "'tis God / Diffused through all that doth make all one whole' (Religious Musings 144–5).

52 to class...sensations classify sensations as if they were exhibits in a cabinet. The metaphor is borrowed from Locke's Essay on Human Understanding: 'The senses at first let in particular ideas, and furnish the yet empty cabinet.'

53 voluble glib, fluent.

54 Hard task a deliberate echo of Milton, who speaks of having to describe the war in heaven as 'Sad task and hard' (Paradise Lost v 564);

describing the growth of the mind is just as worthy of epic treatment for Wordsworth.

55 mystical mysterious, occult.

56 Blessed the infant babe The Infant Babe passage was inspired partly by the death of Coleridge's baby son Berkeley, news of which reached Coleridge in Germany in April 1799, several months after it had taken place; for Coleridge's reaction see his letter to Poole of 6 April 1799, p. 676.

57 The progress of our being Just as Milton charted progress from the Garden of Eden, Wordsworth will trace that of the growing mind.

58 who when...eye When his soul first forms a relationship with another, the baby learns to love by seeing its mother's love in her eyes.

59 torpid dormant.

60 loath to coalesce reluctant to come together, making wholes. Inspired by its mother's love, the baby becomes able to form parts into wholes, ordering what he perceives; in other words, his mind is working imaginatively.

61 recipient faculties senses.

62 quicken enlivened.

63 Tenacious...receives The mind retains visual images; cf. Tintern Abbey 23–50.

64 most apprehensive habitude A relationship ('habitude') best suited to learning ('most apprehensive').

65 this beloved presence...sense The mother's love is a power ('virtue') that infuses all objects which the child perceives, exalting them; cf.

Tintern Abbey 101–2: ‘A motion and a spirit that impels / All thinking things, all objects of all thought.’

66 Along his infant veins...world The child’s loving relationship with his mother is what connects him to natural objects.

67 largely abundantly.

68 Creates...both The child’s mind becomes creative as well as receptive; it is imaginative – working in harmony with Nature. In doing so it acts as an agent of God.

69 chamois mountain antelope which Wordsworth may have seen on his 1790 walking tour which took him through the Alps.

70 The props...spirit The ‘props’ of the boy’s feelings are the ‘incidental charms which first attached / My heart to rural objects day by day’ (ll. 237–8); they are no longer required for his love of nature to exist in its own right.

71 influxes influences.

72 minuter properties qualities known only to those who possess a well-established love of nature.

73 palpable access perceptible increase.

74 modes and temporary qualities short-lived weather or seasonal conditions.

75 register...relations permanent recollection in the mind of changing scenes in nature.

76 best society Wordsworth alludes to Paradise Lost, where Adam in Eden says: ‘For solitude sometimes is best society’ (ix 249).

77 sublimier joy A series of things follows from the permanently impressed features of Nature on the poet's mind: change, beauty, solitude more active than society, society as sweet as solitude and the 'gentle agitations' produced by noticing many distinctions not observable to the untrained eye. From this last feature is produced 'sublimier joy'.

78 Lines 351–71 were composed in January–February 1798, as part of a passage describing the narrator of The Ruined Cottage. While boarding with the Tysons at Colthouse, Wordsworth often went for walks at 1 a.m.

79 breathe inspire.

80 kindred to our purer mind of a spiritual nature.

81 fitness harmony.

82 superadded soul The 'superadded soul' is presumably an element of the 'visionary power' of l. 360. It is additional to natural objects, and is not conferred on them by the perceiving mind: it comes from beyond.

83 oft before the hours of school School began at 6 or 6.30 a.m. during the summer; the five-mile walk would have taken Wordsworth round Esthwaite Water – although that seems a generous estimate for a lake which is little more than a mile long. The friend was John Fleming, who went up to Cambridge in 1785.

84 vernal spring-time.

85 prospect landscape, view.

86 plastic shaping, forming.

87 forming hand an allusion to the creation of Eve at Paradise Lost viii 470: 'Under his forming hands a creature grew.'

88 at times...communed The imagination sometimes behaves with a will of its own, but is usually subordinate to the natural world (i.e. prepared to enhance it).

89 auxiliar enhancing; the ‘auxiliar light’ is the imagination.

90 transport ecstasy. It is because the mind is believed to be ‘lord and master’ over what it perceives that the poet devotes himself to Nature.

91 interminable building mental structure.

92 this habit the ‘observation of affinities’ (l. 433).

93 the great social principle of life love, which might have led Wordsworth to see his feelings reflected in inanimate objects (‘unorganic natures’).

94 or, from excess...own enjoyments Wordsworth has in mind Coleridge’s lines in the 1798 text of Frost at Midnight:

But still the living spirit in our frame

That loves not to behold a lifeless thing,

Transfuses into all its own delights

Its own volition ... (ll. 21–4)

95 Lines 446–64 comprise Pedlar 204–22, incorporated here in autumn 1799, with the necessary change of pronoun from ‘he’ to ‘I’.

96 ineffable indescribable.

97 transports raptures.

98 grosser prelude of that strain sensual joy preceding the more refined pleasures of response to the pantheist one life.

99 If this be error Wordsworth sometimes sounds certain, but it is characteristic of him sometimes to express doubt; cf. Tintern Abbey 50 ff.: ‘If this / Be but a vain belief ...’ The phrasing is in fact borrowed from Shakespeare, Sonnet 116, l. 13.

100 waste desert.

101 when good men...minds Wordsworth is reacting to Coleridge’s exhortation to incorporate into The Recluse an address to ‘those, who, in consequence of the complete failure of the French Revolution, have thrown up all hopes of the amelioration of mankind, and are sinking into an almost epicurean selfishness, disguising the same under the soft titles of domestic attachment and contempt for visionary philosophes’ (Griggs i 527). The most obvious example was that of James Mackintosh, a former apologist for the French Revolution who, in a series of lectures of February–June 1799, attacked the progressive causes he had once advocated. His apostasy drew criticism in a notebook entry by Coleridge: ‘Did Mackintosh change his opinions, with a cold clear predetermination, formed at one moment, to make £5000 a year by that change?’ (Notebooks i 947).

102 more than Roman confidence Although Maxwell adduced the example of the Roman general, Varro, commended after his defeat by Hannibal at Cannae (216 BCE) for not despairing of the republic, Wordsworth may simply be recommending Stoicism. His admiration for Roman history and thought is analysed by Jane Worthington, Wordsworth’s Reading of Roman Prose (1946).

103 principle source.

104 Thou, my friend...other scenes In Frost at Midnight, Coleridge had written: ‘For I was reared / In the great city, pent mid cloisters dim’ (ll. 56–7).

105 Fare thee well! Coleridge in November 1799 was about to go south to become a journalist in London; the Wordsworths were about to move into Dove Cottage.

106 End of the Second Part entered by Dorothy when she copied the poem. She thought it would be continued, and Wordsworth indeed attempted to write a third Part at the end of 1801. However, when he next made a serious start on the poem, in January 1804, he decided to reorganize the work completely, and ended up creating the Five-Book Prelude.

[There is an active principle] (extract) (composed between 6 October 1798 and late April 1799; edited from MS)¹

There is an active principle alive
In all things² – in all natures, in the flowers
And in the trees, in every pebbly stone
That paves the brooks, the stationary rocks,
The moving waters, and the invisible air. 5
All beings have their properties which spread³
Beyond themselves, a power by which they make
Some other being conscious of their life –
Spirit that knows no insulated spot,
No chasm, no solitude. From link to link 10
It circulates, the soul of all the worlds.⁴
This is the freedom of the universe,
Unfolded still the more, more visible
The more we know⁵ – and yet is revered least,
And least respected, in the human mind, 15
Its most apparent home.

There is an active principle

1 Had Wordsworth been able to complete The Recluse in 1798–9, this would have comprised one of its central statements, along with ‘Not Useless do I Deem’ (pp. 453–7). Its overt pantheism looks back to the Alfoxden poetry, especially the central episode of The Pedlar (ll. 204–22). In later years these lines were revised to form the opening of Excursion Book IX (1814).

2 In all things cf. Pedlar 217–18: ‘in all things / He saw one life, and felt that it was joy.’

3 spread cf. Pedlar 208–9: ‘He felt the sentiment of being spread / O’er all that moves, and all that seemeth still.’

4 the soul of all the worlds Wordsworth has in mind the Platonic world soul.

5 Unfolded...know The divine spirit becomes more evident to us as we acquire experience.

[There was a boy] (composed between 6 October and early December 1798)

From Lyrical Ballads (2nd edn, 2 vols, 1800)

There was a boy – ye knew him well,1 ye cliffs
And islands of Winander!2 Many a time
At evening, when the stars had just begun
To move along the edges of the hills,
Rising or setting, would he stand alone 5
Beneath the trees or by the glimmering lake,
And there, with fingers interwoven, both hands
Pressed closely palm to palm and to his mouth
Uplifted, he, as through an instrument,

Blew mimic hootings to the silent owls 10
That they might answer him. And they would shout
Across the watery vale, and shout again
Responsive to his call, with quivering peals
And long halloos, and screams, and echoes loud
Redoubled and redoubled – a wild scene 15
Of mirth and jocund din! And when it chanced
That pauses of deep silence mocked his skill,
Then sometimes in that silence while he hung
Listening, a gentle shock of mild surprise
Has carried far³ into his heart the voice 20
Of mountain torrents; or the visible scene
Would enter unawares⁴ into his mind
With all its solemn imagery, its rocks,
Its woods, and that uncertain heaven, received
Into the bosom of the steady lake.⁵ 25
Fair are the woods, and beauteous is the spot,
The vale where he was born. The churchyard hangs
Upon a slope above the village school,
And there, along that bank, when I have passed
At evening, I believe that near his grave 30
A full half-hour together I have stood
Mute – for he died when he was ten years old.⁶

There was a boy

¹ When first composed, this poem was sent to Coleridge, who told Wordsworth on 10 December 1798 that the lines ‘are very beautiful, and leave an affecting impression’ (Griggs i 452). In early 1804 this poem was incorporated into Five-Book Prelude iv 472–505, and then into Thirteen-Book Prelude v 389–422. It was originally composed in the first person, with all the experiences attributed to the poet.

² Winander Windermere.

³ ‘The very expression, “far”, by which space and its infinities are attributed to the human heart, and to its capacities of re-echoing the sublimities of nature, has always struck me as with a flash of sublime revelation’, wrote De Quincey of this passage in 1839; see p. 850.

⁵ After reading ‘There was a boy’ in December 1798, Coleridge wrote of ll. 24–5: ‘I should have recognised [them] any where; and had I met these lines running wild in the deserts of Arabia, I should have instantly screamed out “Wordsworth!” ’ (Griggs i 453). Wordsworth offered a gloss on ll. 21–5 in his 1815 Preface: ‘The Boy, there introduced, is listening, with something of a feverish and restless anxiety, for the recurrence of the riotous sounds which he had previously excited; and, at the moment when the intenseness of his mind is beginning to remit, he is surprised into a perception of the solemn and tranquillizing images which the Poem describes’ (Owen and Smyser iii 35 n).

⁶ Although, as Wordsworth later recalled, the boy who hooted at the owls was a conflation of himself and a schoolfriend called William Raincock, the grave he has in mind is that of his schoolfriend John Tyson, who died in 1782 at the age of 12.

Nutting (composed between 6 October and 28 December 1798)¹

From Lyrical Ballads (2nd edn, 2 vols, 1800)

It seems a day,
One of those heavenly days which cannot die,
When forth I sallied from our cottage-door,

And with a wallet o'er my shoulder slung,
A nutting-crook in hand, I turned my steps 5
Towards the distant woods, a figure quaint,
Tricked out in proud disguise of beggar's weeds²
Put on for the occasion, by advice
And exhortation of my frugal dame.³
Motley accoutrement! of power to smile 10
At thorns, and brakes, and brambles, and, in truth,
More ragged than need was. Among the woods,
And o'er the pathless rocks, I forced my way
Until, at length, I came to one dear nook
Unvisited, where not a broken bough 15
Drooped with its withered leaves (ungracious sign
Of devastation), but the hazels rose
Tall and erect, with milk-white clusters hung,
A virgin scene! A little while I stood,
Breathing with such suppression of the heart 20
As joy delights in; and, with wise restraint
Voluptuous, fearless of a rival, eyed
The banquet, or beneath the trees I sate
Among the flowers, and with the flowers I played;
A temper known to those who, after long 25
And weary expectation, have been blessed
With sudden happiness beyond all hope.
Perhaps it was a bower beneath whose leaves
The violets of five seasons reappear
And fade, unseen by any human eye, 30
Where fairy water-breaks⁴ do murmur on
For ever; and I saw the sparkling foam,
And, with my cheek on one of those green stones
That, fleeced with moss, beneath the shady trees,
Lay round me scattered like a flock of sheep, 35
I heard the murmur and the murmuring sound,
In that sweet mood when pleasure loves to pay
Tribute to ease; and, of its joy secure,

The heart luxuriates with indifferent⁵ things,
 Wasting its kindness on stocks⁶ and stones, 40
 And on the vacant air. Then up I rose,
 And dragged to earth both branch and bough, with crash
 And merciless ravage, and the shady nook
 Of hazels, and the green and mossy bower,
 Deformed and sullied, patiently gave up 45
 Their quiet being; and, unless I now
 Confound my present feelings with the past,
 Even then, when from the bower I turned away,
 Exulting, rich beyond the wealth of kings,
 I felt a sense of pain when I beheld 50
 The silent trees, and the intruding sky.
 Then, dearest maiden,⁷ move along these shades
 In gentleness of heart; with gentle hand
 Touch – for there is a spirit in the woods.

Nutting

¹ ‘Written in Germany, intended as part of a poem on my own life [The Two-Part Prelude], but struck out as not being wanted there. Like most of my schoolfellows I was an impassioned nutter... These verses arose out of the remembrance of feelings I had often had when a boy, and particularly in the extensive woods that still stretch from the side of Esthwaite Lake towards Graythwaite, the seat of the ancient family of Sandys’ (FN 13).

² weeds clothes.

³ my frugal dame Ann Tyson, Wordsworth’s landlady at Hawkshead. Cf. Two-Part Prelude ii 88–90.

⁴ water-breaks stretches of rapid water.

⁵ indifferent not insensible but neutral, impartial, disinterested.

⁶ stocks tree-stumps, dead wood.

⁷ dearest maiden The anonymous ‘maiden’ (perhaps associated with Wordsworth’s sister Dorothy) is bidden to establish contact with a wood-spirit.

[Strange fits of passion I have known]
(composed between 6 October and 28
December 1798)¹

From Lyrical Ballads (2nd edn, 2 vols, 1800)

Strange fits of passion I have known,
And I will dare to tell,
But in the lover’s ear alone,
What once to me befell.

When she I loved was strong and gay 5
And like a rose in June,
I to her cottage bent my way
Beneath the evening moon.

Upon the moon I fixed my eye,
All over the wide lea;² 10
My horse trudged on, and we drew nigh
Those paths so dear to me.

And now we reached the orchard-plot,
And as we climbed the hill,
Towards the roof of Lucy’s cot 15
The moon descended still.

In one of those sweet dreams I slept,
Kind nature's gentlest boon!
And all the while my eyes I kept
On the descending moon. 20

My horse moved on; hoof after hoof
He raised and never stopped:
When down behind the cottage roof
At once the planet dropped.

What fond³ and wayward thoughts will slide 25
Into a lover's head;
'Oh mercy!' to myself I cried,
'If Lucy should be dead!'

¹ This poem, the three that follow it and 'I travelled among unknown men' (p. 533), comprise what have come to be known as the Lucy poems. 'She was a phantom of delight' is often classed among them. Much ink has been expended on the question of Lucy's identity; for Coleridge's explanation, which remains the most plausible, see his letter to Poole, 6 April 1799, p. 676.

² lea meadow.

³ fond meaning either 'foolish' or 'loving, affectionate'.

Song (composed between 6 October and 28 December 1798)

From Lyrical Ballads (2nd edn, 2 vols, 1800)

She dwelt among th' untrodden ways
Beside the springs of Dove,¹

A maid whom there were none to praise
And very few to love.

A violet by a mossy stone 5
Half-hidden from the eye,
Fair as a star when only one
Is shining in the sky!

She lived unknown, and few could know
When Lucy ceased to be; 10
But she is in her grave, and oh!
The difference to me.

¹ Dove There are three English rivers with this name. Wordsworth probably meant the one in Derbyshire, rather than those in Yorkshire or Cumbria.

[A slumber did my spirit seal] (composed between 6 October and 28 December 1798)¹

From Lyrical Ballads (2nd edn, 2 vols, 1800)

A slumber did my spirit seal,²
I had no human fears;
She seemed a thing that could not feel
The touch of earthly years.

No motion has she now, no force; 5
She neither hears nor sees;
Rolled round in earth's diurnal³ course
With rocks and stones and trees!

A slumber did my spirit seal

¹ When first composed, this poem was sent to Coleridge. In a letter to his friend Thomas Poole of 6 April 1799, Coleridge remarked: ‘Oh, this strange, strange, strange scene-shifter, Death! that giddies one with insecurity, and so unsubstantiates the living things that one has grasped and handled! Some months ago Wordsworth transmitted to me a most sublime Epitaph. Whether it had any reality, I cannot say. Most probably, in some gloomier moments he had fancied the moment in which his sister might die’ (Griggs i 479). Critics ever since have speculated as to the identity of the woman lamented in this poem.

² seal contain, lock up.

³ diurnal daily; cf. Two-Part Prelude i 182.

[Three years she grew in sun and shower]
(composed between 6 October and 28
December 1798)

From Lyrical Ballads (2nd edn, 2 vols, 1800)

Three years she grew in sun and shower,
Then Nature said, ‘A lovelier flower
On earth was never sown;
This child I to myself will take,
She shall be mine, and I will make 5
A lady of my own.

Myself will to my darling be
Both law and impulse, and with me
The girl in rock and plain,
In earth and heaven, in glade and bower, 10
Shall feel an overseeing power
To kindle or restrain.

She shall be sportive as the fawn
That wild with glee across the lawn
Or up the mountain springs, 15
And hers shall be the breathing balm
And hers the silence and the calm
Of mute insensate things.

The floating clouds their state shall lend
To her, for her the willow bend, 20
Nor shall she fail to see
Even in the motions of the storm
A beauty that shall mould her form
By silent sympathy.

The stars of midnight shall be dear 25
To her, and she shall lean her ear
In many a secret place
Where rivulets dance their wayward round,
And beauty born of murmuring sound
Shall pass into her face. 30

And vital feelings of delight
Shall rear her form to stately height,
Her virgin bosom swell,
Such thoughts to Lucy I will give
While she and I together live 35
Here in this happy dell.'

Thus Nature spake – the work was done –
How soon my Lucy's race was run!
She died and left to me
This heath, this calm and quiet scene, 40
The memory of what has been,
And never more will be.

[The Prelude: Glad Preamble] (composed late November 1799; edited from MS)¹

Oh there is blessing in this gentle breeze
That blows from the green fields, and from the clouds,
And from the sky: it beats against my cheek,
And seems half-conscious of the joy it gives.

Oh welcome messenger, oh welcome friend! 5

A captive greets thee, coming from a house
Of bondage, from yon city's walls set free,

A prison where he hath been long immured.²

Now I am free, enfranchised and at large,
May fix my habitation where I will. 10

What dwelling shall receive me? In what vale
Shall be my harbour? Underneath what grove
Shall I take up my home, and what sweet stream
Shall with its murmur lull me to my rest?

The earth is all before me:³ with a heart 15

Joyous, nor scared at its own liberty,
I look about, and should the guide I choose

Be nothing better than a wandering cloud,⁴

I cannot miss my way. I breathe again;
Trances of thought and mountings of the mind 20

Come fast upon me. It is shaken off,
As by miraculous gift 'tis shaken off,

The heavy weight of many a weary day
Not mine, and such as were not made for me.

Long months of peace (if such bold word accord 25
With any promises of human life),

Long months of ease and undisturbed delight
Are mine in prospect – whither shall I turn?

By road or pathway, or through open field,

Or shall a twig or any floating thing 30
 Upon the river, point me out my course?
 Enough that I am free, embrace today
 An uncontrolled enfranchisement; for months
 To come may live a life of chosen tasks,
 May quit the tiresome sea and dwell on shore – 35
 If not a settler on the soil, at least
 To drink wild waters, and to pluck green herbs,
 And gather fruits fresh from their native tree.
 Nay more: if I may trust myself, this hour
 Hath brought a gift that consecrates my joy, 40
 For I, methought, while the sweet breath of heaven
 Was blowing on my body, felt within
 A corresponding mild creative breeze,⁵
 A vital breeze which travelled gently on
 O'er things which it had made, and is become 45
 A tempest, a redundant⁶ energy
 Vexing its own creation. 'Tis a power
 That does not come unrecognized, a storm
 Which, breaking up a long-continued frost,
 Brings with it vernal promises, the hope 50
 Of active days, of dignity and thought,
 Of prowess in an honourable field,⁷
 Pure passion, virtue, knowledge, and delight,
 The holy life of music and of verse.

¹ Wordsworth began work on this passage while walking from Ullswater to Grasmere, 18 November 1799, and completed it soon after moving into Dove Cottage two days later. It was used as the opening to Prelude Book I in all versions of the poem after January 1804.

² immured confined, walled up. The city from which Wordsworth has been released is probably a mixture of Goslar in Germany (where he spent the cold winter of 1798–9) and London.

³ The earth is all before me an allusion to the conclusion of Paradise Lost, as Adam and Eve are expelled from Eden:

Some natural tears they dropped, but wiped them soon;

The world was all before them, where to choose

Their place of rest, and Providence their guide.

They hand in hand, with wandering steps and slow,

Through Eden took their solitary way.

Wordsworth's poem begins where Milton leaves off. He too is making a new start, but does so in a spirit of optimism.

⁴ Providence guided Adam and Eve out of Eden (see the preceding note).

⁵ A corresponding mild creative breeze the subject of much comment among recent critics; see, most notably, M. H. Abrams's title essay in The Correspondent Breeze: Essays on English Romanticism (New York and London, 1984).

⁶ redundant overflowing, exuberant.

⁷ pro prowess in an honourable field a reference to the composition of The Recluse; see p. 422.

[Prospectus to 'The Recluse'] (composed probably November or December 1799; edited from MS)¹

On man, on nature, and on human life,
Thinking in solitude, from time to time
I find sweet passions traversing my soul

Like music;² unto these, where'er I may,
I would give utterance in numerous verse.³ 5
Of truth, of grandeur, beauty, love, and hope,
Of joy in various commonalty⁴ spread,
Of the individual mind that keeps its own
Inviolable retirement, and consists⁵
With being limitless – the one great life⁶ – 10
I sing: fit audience let me find, though few!
‘Fit audience find, though few!’⁷ Thus prayed the bard,
Holiest of men. Urania,⁸ I shall need Thy guidance, or a greater muse (if such Descend to earth, or dwell in highest heaven), 15
For I must tread on shadowy ground, must sink
Deep, and ascend aloft, and breathe in worlds
To which the heaven of heavens⁹ is but a veil.
All strength, all terror, single or in bands,
That ever was put forth by personal forms¹⁰ – 20
Jehovah with his thunder, and the choir
Of shouting angels, and th’ empyreal thrones¹¹ –
I pass them unalarmed. The darkest pit
Of the profoundest hell,¹² night, chaos, death,
Nor aught of blinder vacancy scooped out 25
By help of dreams, can breed such fear and awe
As fall upon me often when I look
Into my soul, into the soul of man –
My haunt, and the main region of my song.
Beauty, whose living home is the green earth, 30
Surpassing far what hath by special craft¹³
Of delicate¹⁴ poets been culled forth and shaped
From earth’s materials, waits upon my steps,
Pitches her tents before me as I move,
My hourly neighbour. Paradise and groves 35

Elysian,¹⁵ blessed islands in the deep
 Of choice seclusion – wherefore need they be
 A history, or but a dream, when minds
 Once wedded to this outward frame of things
 In love, finds these the growth of common day?¹⁶ 40
 Such pleasant haunts foregoing, if my song
 Must turn elsewhere, and travel near the tribes
 And fellowships of man, and see ill sights
 Of passions ravenous from each other's rage,¹⁷
 Insult and injury, and wrong and strife; 45
 Must hear humanity in fields and groves
 Pipe solitary anguish; or must hang
 Brooding above the fierce confederate¹⁸ storm
 Of sorrow, barricadoed¹⁹ evermore
 Within the walls of cities,²⁰ to these sounds 50
 Let me find meaning more akin to that
 Which to God's ear they carry, that even these Hearing, I be not heartless²¹ or forlorn.
 Come thou, prophetic spirit, soul of man,
 Thou human soul of the wide earth, that hast 55
 Thy metropolitan temple²² in the hearts
 Of mighty poets, unto me vouchsafe²³
 Thy foresight, teach me to discern, and part
 Inherent things from casual, what is fixed
 From fleeting,²⁴ that my soul may live, and be 60
 Even as a light hung up in heaven to cheer
 The world in times to come. And if with this
 I mingle humbler matter – with the thing
 Contemplated describe the mind and man
 Contemplating, and who he was, and what 65
 The transitory being that beheld
 This vision, when and where and how he lived
 With all his little realities of life

(In part a fellow-citizen, in part
An outlaw and a borderer of his age) – 70
Be not this labour useless.

Oh great God!

To less than thee I cannot make this prayer;
Innocent mighty spirit, let my life
Express the image of a better time,
Desires more wise and simpler manners, nurse 75
My heart in genuine freedom, all pure thoughts
Be with me and uphold me to the end.

The Brothers: A Pastoral Poem (composed December 1799–early March 1800)¹

From Lyrical Ballads (2nd edn, 2 vols, 1800)

‘These tourists,² Heaven preserve us, needs must live
A profitable life! Some glance along,
Rapid and gay, as if the earth were air,
And they were butterflies to wheel about
Long as their summer lasted; some, as wise, 5
Upon the forehead of a jutting crag
Sit perched with book and pencil on their knee,
And look and scribble, scribble on and look,
Until a man might travel twelve stout miles³
Or reap an acre of his neighbour’s corn. 10

But, for that moping⁴ son of idleness –
Why can he tarry yonder? In our churchyard
Is neither epitaph nor monument,
Tombstone nor name,⁵ only the turf we tread
And a few natural graves.’ To Jane, his wife, 15
Thus spake the homely priest of Ennerdale.
It was a July evening, and he sat
Upon the long stone-seat beneath the eaves
Of his old cottage – as it chanced that day,
Employed in winter’s work. Upon the stone 20
His wife sat near him, teasing matted wool,
While from the twin cards⁶ toothed with glittering wire,
He fed the spindle of his youngest child,
Who turned her large round wheel in the open air
With back and forward steps.⁷ Towards the field 25
In which the parish chapel stood alone
Girt round with a bare ring of mossy wall,

While half an hour went by, the priest had sent
Many a long look of wonder; and at last,
Risen from his seat, beside the snowy ridge 30
Of carded wool which the old man had piled
He laid his implements with gentle care,
Each in the other locked, and down the path
Which from his cottage to the churchyard led
He took his way, impatient to accost 35
The stranger whom he saw still lingering there.

'Twas one well known to him in former days:

A shepherd-lad, who ere his thirteenth year⁸
Had changed his calling – with the mariners
A fellow-mariner – and so had fared 40
Through twenty seasons; but he had been reared
Among the mountains, and he in his heart
Was half a shepherd on the stormy seas.

Oft in the piping shrouds⁹ had Leonard heard
The tones of waterfalls, and inland sounds 45
Of caves and trees. And when the regular wind
Between the tropics¹⁰ filled the steady sail
And blew with the same breath through days and weeks,
Lengthening invisibly its weary line
Along the cloudless main, he, in those hours 50
Of tiresome indolence, would often hang
Over the vessel's side, and gaze and gaze;
And while the broad green wave and sparkling foam
Flashed round him images and hues that wrought
In union with the employment of his heart, 55
He – thus by feverish passion overcome –
Even with the organs of his bodily eye,
Below him in the bosom of the deep
Saw mountains, saw the forms of sheep that grazed
On verdant hills, with dwellings among trees, 60
And shepherds clad in the same country grey

Which he himself had worn.¹¹

And now at length,
From perils manifold, with some small wealth
Acquired by traffic in the Indian Isles,¹²
To his paternal home he is returned 65
With a determined purpose to resume
The life which he lived there – both for the sake
Of many darling¹³ pleasures, and the love
Which to an only brother he has borne
In all his hardships, since that happy time 70
When, whether it blew foul or fair, they two
Were brother shepherds on their native hills.

They were the last of all their race;¹⁴ and now,
When Leonard had approached his home, his heart
Failed in him, and not venturing to enquire 75
Tidings of one whom he so dearly loved,

Towards the churchyard he had turned aside¹⁵
That (as he knew in what particular spot
His family were laid) he thence might learn

If still his brother lived, or to the file¹⁶ 80
Another grave was added. He had found
Another grave, near which a full half-hour
He had remained; but as he gazed there grew
Such a confusion in his memory

That he began to doubt, and he had hopes 85
That he had seen this heap of turf before –

That it was not another grave, but one
He had forgotten. He had lost his path
As up the vale he came that afternoon
Through fields which once had been well known to him, 90
And oh, what joy the recollection now
Sent to his heart! He lifted up his eyes,
And looking round he thought that he perceived
Strange alteration wrought on every side

Among the woods and fields, and that the rocks, 95
And the eternal hills themselves, were changed.

By this the priest, who down the field had come
Unseen by Leonard, at the churchyard gate
Stopped short; and thence, at leisure, limb by limb
He scanned him with a gay complacency.¹⁷ 100

‘Aye’, thought the vicar, smiling to himself,
‘Tis one of those who needs must leave the path
Of the world’s business, to go wild alone –
His arms have a perpetual holiday.

The happy man will creep about the fields 105
Following his fancies by the hour, to bring
Tears down his cheek, or solitary smiles
Into his face, until the setting sun
Write Fool upon his forehead.’ Planted thus

Beneath a shed¹⁸ that overarched the gate 110
Of this rude churchyard, till the stars appeared
The good man might have communed with himself,
But that the stranger, who had left the grave,
Approached. He recognized the priest at once,
And after greetings interchanged (and given 115
By Leonard to the vicar as to one Unknown to him), this dialogue ensued.

LEONARD

You live, sir, in these dales, a quiet life.
Your years make up one peaceful family,
And who would grieve and fret, if – welcome come 120
And welcome gone – they are so like each other
They cannot be remembered? Scarce a funeral
Comes to this churchyard once in eighteen months;
And yet, some changes must take place among you.
And you who dwell here, even among these rocks 125
Can trace the finger of mortality,¹⁹
And see that with our threescore years and ten²⁰

We are not all that perish. I remember
(For many years ago I passed this road)
There was a footway all along the fields 130
By the brook-side; 'tis gone. And that dark cleft –
To me it does not seem to wear the face
Which then it had.

PRIEST

Why, sir, for aught I know,
That chasm is much the same.

LEONARD

But surely, yonder –

PRIEST

Aye, there indeed your memory is a friend 135
That does not play you false. On that tall pike
(It is the loneliest place of all these hills)
There were two springs which bubbled side by side
As if they had been made that they might be Companions for each other! Ten years back, 140
Close to those brother fountains, the huge crag
Was rent with lightning – one is dead and gone,
The other, left behind, is flowing still.²¹
For accidents and changes such as these,
Why, we have store²² of them! A water-spout 145
Will bring down half a mountain – what a feast
For folks that wander up and down like you,
To see an acre's breadth of that wide cliff
One roaring cataract! A sharp May storm
Will come with loads of January snow 150
And in one night send twenty score of sheep
To feed the ravens; or a shepherd dies
By some untoward death among the rocks;
The ice breaks up, and sweeps away a bridge;
A wood is felled. And then, for our own homes – 155

A child is born or christened, a field ploughed,
A daughter sent to service,²³ a web spun,²⁴
The old house-clock is decked with a new face²⁵—
And hence, so far from wanting facts or dates
To chronicle the time, we all have here 160
A pair of diaries: one serving, sir,
For the whole dale, and one for each fireside.²⁶
Yours was a stranger's judgment.²⁷ — for historians
Commend me to these vallies!

LEONARD

Yet your churchyard
Seems (if such freedom may be used with you) 165
To say that you are heedless of the past:
An orphan could not find his mother's grave.
Here's neither head nor foot-stone, plate of brass,
Cross-bones or skull, type of our earthly state
Or emblem of our hopes. The dead man's home 170
Is but a fellow to that pasture field.²⁸

PRIEST

Why there, sir, is a thought that's new to me.
The stonecutters, 'tis true, might beg their bread
If every English churchyard were like ours;
Yet your conclusion wanders from the truth. 175
We have no need of names and epitaphs,
We talk about the dead by our firesides.
And then for our immortal part²⁹ — we want
No symbols, sir, to tell us that plain tale.
The thought of death sits easy on the man 180
Who has been born and dies among the mountains.³⁰

LEONARD

Your dalesmen, then, do in each other's thoughts
Possess a kind of second life. No doubt

You, sir, could help me to the history
Of half these graves?

PRIEST

For eight-score winters past³¹ – 185
With what I've witnessed, and with what I've heard –
Perhaps I might; and on a winter's evening,
If you were seated at my chimney's nook,
By turning o'er these hillocks one by one
We two could travel, sir, through a strange round, 190
Yet all in the broad highway of the world.³²
Now there's a grave – your foot is half upon it –
It looks just like the rest, and yet that man
Died broken-hearted.

LEONARD

'Tis a common case –
We'll take another. Who is he that lies 195
Beneath yon ridge, the last of those three graves? –
It touches on that piece of native³³ rock
Left in the churchyard wall.

PRIEST

That's Walter Ewbank.
He had as white a head and fresh a cheek
As ever were produced by youth and age 200
Engendering in the blood of hale fourscore.³⁴
For five long generations had the heart
Of Walter's forefathers o'erflowed the bounds
Of their inheritance³⁵ – that single cottage
(You see it yonder), and those few green fields. 205
They toiled and wrought, and still, from sire³⁶ to son,
Each struggled, and each yielded as before
A little – yet a little. And old Walter –
They left to him the family heart, and land
With other burdens than the crop it bore. 210

Year after year the old man still preserved
A cheerful mind, and buffeted with bond,
Interest and mortgages, at last he sank,
And went into his grave before his time.³⁷
Poor Walter – whether it was care that spurred him 215
God only knows, but to the very last
He had the lightest foot in Ennerdale.
His pace was never that of an old man –
I almost see him tripping down the path
With his two grandsons after him. But you, 220
Unless our landlord be your host tonight,³⁸
Have far to travel, and in these rough paths
Even in the longest day of midsummer –

LEONARD

But these two orphans...

PRIEST

Orphans – such they were,
Yet not while Walter lived. For though their parents 225
Lay buried side by side as now they lie,
The old man was a father to the boys –
Two fathers in one father – and if tears
Shed when he talked of them where they were not,
And hauntings from the infirmity of love, 230
Are aught of what makes up a mother's heart,
This old man in the day of his old age
Was half a mother to them. If you weep, sir,
To hear a stranger talking about strangers,³⁹
Heaven bless you when you are among your kindred! 235
Aye, you may turn that way – it is a grave
Which will bear looking at.

LEONARD

These boys, I hope
They loved this good old man?

PRIEST

They did, and truly –
But that was what we almost overlooked,
They were such darlings of each other. For 240
Though from their cradles they had lived with Walter,
The only kinsman near them in the house,
Yet he being old they had much love to spare,
And it all went into each other's hearts.
Leonard, the elder by just eighteen months, 245
Was two years taller – 'twas a joy to see,
To hear, to meet them! From their house the school
Was distant three short miles; and in the time
Of storm, and thaw, when every water-course
And unbridged stream (such as you may have noticed, 250
Crossing our roads at every hundred steps)
Was swoln into a noisy rivulet,
Would Leonard then, when elder boys perhaps
Remained at home, go staggering through the fords⁴⁰
Bearing his brother on his back. I've seen him 255
On windy days, in one of those stray brooks –
Aye, more than once I've seen him mid-leg deep,
Their two books lying both on a dry stone
Upon the hither side. And once I said,
As I remember, looking round these rocks 260
And hills on which we all of us were born,
That God who made the great book of the world⁴¹
Would bless such piety.⁴²

LEONARD

It may be then –

PRIEST

Never did worthier lads break English bread:
The finest Sunday that the autumn saw, 265
With all its mealy⁴³ clusters of ripe nuts,

Could never keep these boys away from church
Or tempt them to an hour of sabbath breach.⁴⁴
Leonard and James! I warrant, every corner
Among these rocks, and every hollow place 270
Where foot could come, to one or both of them
Was known as well as to the flowers that grow there.
Like roebucks they went bounding o'er the hills;⁴⁵
They played like two young ravens on the crags.
Then they could write, aye, and speak too, as well 275
As many of their betters.⁴⁶ And for Leonard –
The very night before he went away,
In my own house I put into his hand
A bible, and I'd wager twenty pounds
That if he is alive he has it yet. 280

LEONARD

It seems these brothers have not lived to be
A comfort to each other?

PRIEST

That they might
Live to that end, is what both old and young
In this our valley all of us have wished –
And what for my part I have often prayed. 285
But Leonard –

LEONARD

Then James still is left among you?

PRIEST

'Tis of the elder brother I am speaking –
They had an uncle (he was at that time
A thriving man and trafficked⁴⁷ on the seas⁴⁸),
And but for this same uncle, to this hour 290
Leonard had never handled rope or shroud.
For the boy loved the life which we lead here;

And, though a very stripling, twelve years old,
His soul was knit⁴⁹ to this his native soil.
But, as I said, old Walter was too weak 295
To strive with such a torrent. When he died,
The estate and house were sold, and all their sheep –
A pretty flock, and which, for aught I know,
Had clothed the Ewbanks for a thousand years.
Well – all was gone, and they were destitute; 300
And Leonard, chiefly for his brother's sake,
Resolved to try his fortune on the seas.
'Tis now twelve years since we had tidings from him.
If there was one among us who had heard
That Leonard Ewbank was come home again, 305
From the Great Gavel, down by Leeza's Banks,
And down the Enna, far as Egremont,⁵⁰
The day would be a very festival,
And those two bells of ours, which there you see
Hanging in the open air – but oh, good sir, 310
This is sad talk; they'll never sound for him,
Living or dead. When last we heard of him
He was in slavery among the Moors
Upon the Barbary Coast.⁵¹ 'Twas not a little
That would bring down his spirit, and no doubt 315
Before it ended in his death, the lad
Was sadly crossed.⁵² Poor Leonard, when we parted
He took me by the hand and said to me
If ever the day came when he was rich
He would return, and on his father's land 320
He would grow old among us.

LEONARD

 If that day
Should come, 'twould needs be a glad day for him;
He would himself, no doubt, be then as happy
As any that should meet him.

PRIEST

Happy, sir –

LEONARD

You said his kindred were all in their graves, 325
And that he had one brother...

PRIEST

That is but

A fellow⁵³ tale of sorrow. From his youth
James, though not sickly, yet was delicate;
And Leonard being always by his side
Had done so many offices about him⁵⁴ 330
That, though he was not of a timid nature,
Yet still the spirit of a mountain boy
In him was somewhat checked. And when his brother
Was gone to sea and he was left alone,
The little colour that he had was soon 335
Stolen from his cheek; he drooped, and pined and pined...

LEONARD

But these are all the graves of full grown men...

PRIEST

Aye, sir, that passed away. We took him to us –
He was the child of all the dale. He lived
Three months with one, and six months with another, 340
And wanted neither food, nor clothes, nor love;
And many, many happy days were his.
But, whether blithe or sad, 'tis my belief
His absent brother still was at his heart.
And when he lived beneath our roof, we found 345
(A practice till this time unknown to him)
That often, rising from his bed at night,
He in his sleep would walk about, and sleeping
He sought his brother Leonard. You are moved;

Forgive me, sir – before I spoke to you 350
I judged you most unkindly.

LEONARD

But this youth,
How did he die at last?

PRIEST

One sweet May morning
(It will be twelve years since, when spring returns)
He had gone forth among the new-dropped lambs
With two or three companions, whom it chanced 355
Some further business summoned to a house
Which stands at the dale-head.⁵⁵ James, tired perhaps,
Or from some other cause, remained behind.
You see yon precipice? It almost looks
Like some vast building made of many crags, 360
And in the midst is one particular rock
That rises like a column from the vale,
Whence by our shepherds it is called the Pillar.⁵⁶
James pointed to its summit, over which
They all had purposed to return together, 365
Informed them that he there would wait for them.
They parted, and his comrades passed that way
Some two hours after, but they did not find him
At the appointed place – a circumstance
Of which they took no heed. But one of them, 370
Going by chance, at night, into the house
Which at this time was James' home, there learned
That nobody had seen him all that day.
The morning came, and still he was unheard of;
The neighbours were alarmed, and to the brook 375
Some went, and some towards the lake. Ere noon
They found him at the foot of that same rock,
Dead, and with mangled limbs. The third day after,
I buried him, poor lad, and there he lies.

LEONARD

And that then is his grave. Before his death 380
You said that he saw many happy years?

PRIEST

Aye, that he did.

LEONARD

And all went well with him?

PRIEST

If he had one, the lad had twenty homes.

LEONARD

And you believe then, that his mind was easy?

PRIEST

Yes, long before he died he found that time 385
Is a true friend to sorrow; and unless
His thoughts were turned on Leonard's luckless fortune,
He talked about him with a cheerful love.

LEONARD

He could not come to an unhallowed end!57

PRIEST

Nay, God forbid! You recollect I mentioned 390
A habit which disquietude and grief
Had brought upon him; and we all conjectured
That as the day was warm he had lain down
Upon the grass, and waiting for his comrades
He there had fallen asleep – that in his sleep 395
He to the margin of the precipice
Had walked, and from the summit had fallen headlong.
And so no doubt he perished. At the time
We guess that in his hands he must have had
His shepherd's staff; for midway in the cliff 400
It had been caught, and there for many years
It hung – and mouldered there.

The priest here ended.

The stranger would have thanked him, but he felt
Tears rushing in. Both left the spot in silence,
And Leonard, when they reached the churchyard gate, 405
As the priest lifted up the latch, turned round,
And looking at the grave he said, 'My brother'.
The vicar did not hear the words; and now,
Pointing towards the cottage, he entreated
That Leonard would partake his homely fare. 410
The other thanked him with a fervent voice,
But added that, the evening being calm,
He would pursue his journey. So they parted.
It was not long ere Leonard reached a grove
That overhung the road. He there stopped short, 415
And sitting down beneath the trees, reviewed
All that the priest had said.

His early years

Were with him in his heart – his cherished hopes,
And thoughts which had been his an hour before,
All pressed on him with such a weight that now 420
This vale where he had been so happy seemed
A place in which he could not bear to live.
So he relinquished all his purposes.
He travelled on to Egremont; and thence
That night addressed a letter to the priest 425
Reminding him of what had passed between them,
And adding – with a hope to be forgiven –
That it was from the weakness of his heart
He had not dared to tell him who he was.
This done, he went on shipboard, and is now 430
A seaman, a grey-headed mariner.

The Brothers

1 The Brothers is based on a story told to Wordsworth and Coleridge while on a walking tour of the Lakes in 1799. They heard about Jerome Bowman (who broke his leg near Scale Force, crawled three miles at night on hands and knees, and then died from his injuries) and his son who ‘broke his neck before this, by falling off a crag’, as Coleridge put it. The son was believed ‘to have laid down and slept, but walked in his sleep, and so came to this crag and fell off. This was at Proud Knot on the mountain called Pillar up Ennerdale. His pike-staff stuck midway and stayed there till it rotted away’ (Notebooks i 540). In 1800 Wordsworth appended the following note to the title: ‘This poem was intended to be the concluding poem of a series of pastorals the scene of which was laid among the mountains of Cumberland and Westmorland. I mention this to apologise for the abruptness with which the poem begins.’

2 tourists Even in 1800, the Lake District was a popular tourist resort.

3 stout miles the old English ‘long mile’ of 2,428 yards.

4 moping aimless, purposeless.

5 neither epitaph...name Several Lake District churchyards had no tombstones.

6 twin cards a pair of combs used for teasing out the hairs of wool before they are spun into thread.

7 Upon the stone...steps In the Fenwick Notes of 1843, Wordsworth recalled: ‘I could write a treatise of lamentation upon the changes brought about among the cottages of Westmorland by the silence of the spinning wheel. During long winter nights and wet days, the wheel upon which wool was spun gave employment to a great part of a family. The old man, however infirm, was able to card the wool, as he sate in the corner by the fireside; and often, when a boy, have I admired the cylinders of carded wool which were softly laid upon each other by his side. Two wheels were often at work on the same floor, and others of the family, chiefly the little children, were occupied in teasing and cleaning the wool to fit it for the hand of the carder. So that all except the smallest infants were contributing to mutual support' (FN 20).

8 ere his thirteenth year John Wordsworth, the poet's younger brother, also decided early on that he would be a sailor.

9 shrouds ropes supporting the mast of a ship, climbed when changing sails. The wind plays ('pipes') through them.

10 the regular wind...tropics trade winds blowing towards the equator from the tropics of Cancer and Capricorn.

11 'This description of the calenture is sketched from an imperfect recollection of an admirable one in prose, by Mr Gilbert, author of The Hurricane' (Wordsworth's note). The calenture was defined by Johnson as 'a distemper peculiar to sailors in hot climates, wherein they imagine the sea to be green fields, and will throw themselves into it'. Gilbert's Hurricane (1796) may have been read by Wordsworth in the year of its publication; in later years at Rydal Mount he owned a copy.

12 traffic in the Indian Isles trade in the East Indies.

13 darling dearly loved.

14 They were the last of all their race As in Michael, Wordsworth is concerned in this poem with the dying-out of small landowners – 'statesmen', whose small plots of land had descended through the same families for generations. Wordsworth made this point when he sent the Whig leader, Charles James Fox, a copy of Lyrical Ballads (1800); see p. 527 n. 36.

15 When Leonard...aside probably based on John Wordsworth's arrival in Grasmere at the end of January 1800; according to Dorothy, 'twice did he approach the door and lay his hand upon the latch, and stop, and turn away without the courage to enter (we had not met for several years). He then went to the inn and sent us word that he was come' (EY 649).

16 file row, line.

17 complacency self-satisfaction.

18 shed porchway, roof.

19 the finger of mortality signs of death or change.

20 threescore years and ten seventy years, man's allotted lifespan: 'the days of our years are threescore years and ten' (Psalm 90:10).

21 'The impressive circumstance here described actually took place some years ago in this country, upon an eminence called Kidstow Pike, one of the highest of the mountains that surround Hawes Water. The summit of the Pike was stricken by lightning, and every trace of one of the fountains disappeared, while the other continued to flow as before' (Wordsworth's note).

22 store a good store, plenty.

23 sent to service put to work as a servant.

24 a web spun a piece of cloth woven.

25 decked with a new face repainted.

26 we all...fireside Time is measured by the public events, shared by the community, and private ones, known to each family.

27 Yours was a stranger's judgment painfully ironic; the priest is still unaware of Leonard's identity.

28 The dead...field The graveyard looks the same as the meadow.

29 our immortal part i.e. the soul.

30 ‘There is not anything more worthy of remark in the manners of the inhabitants of these mountains, than the tranquillity – I might say indifference – with which they think and talk upon the subject of death. Some of the country churchyards, as here described, do not contain a single tombstone, and most of them have a very small number’ (Wordsworth’s note).

31 eight-score winters past i.e. the last 160 years (a score is twenty).

32 By turning...world The life-stories of those buried before them comprise a wide range (‘strange round’) of experience, which, taken as a whole, would be revealed as entirely normal (‘in the broad highway of the world’).

33 native a piece of rock embedded in the ground even before the graveyard was put there.

34 He had...fourscore Walter was 80, but he was healthy and vigorous (‘hale’) thanks to his combination of youth and age.

35 the heart...inheritance The Ewbanks were more generous than they could afford.

36 sire father.

37 buffeted...time The cost of Walter’s independence was that the land he inherited was burdened by mortgages and debt.

38 Unless our landlord be your host tonight unless you plan to stay at the inn.

39 If you weep...strangers again, painfully ironic. The Priest is still unaware that the story he has been telling is that of Leonard’s family.

40 fords A ford is a shallow place in a river where people and animals can wade across.

41 the great book of the world i.e. the natural world.

42 piety virtue.

43 mealy meal-coloured.

44 sabbath breach violating the command not to work on the Sabbath (Sunday).

45 Like roebucks...hills cf. Tintern Abbey 68–9.

46 betters social superiors.

47 trafficked traded.

48 he was...seas The poet's cousin, another John Wordsworth, was a successful captain working for the East India Company. Wordsworth's brother John succeeded him as captain of the Earl of Abergavenny.

49 knit joined, attached.

50 'The Great Gavel, so called, I imagine, from its resemblance to the gable end of a house, is one of the highest of the Cumberland mountains. It stands at the head of the several vales of Ennerdale, Wastdale, and Borrowdale. The Leeza is a river which flows into the Lake of Ennerdale; on issuing from the Lake, it changes its name and is called the End, or Eyne, or Enna. It falls into the sea a little below Egremont' (Wordsworth's note).

51 Barbary Coast north coast of Africa.

52 crossed grieved.

53 fellow similar.

54 Had done so many offices about him had looked after him so much.

57 an unhallowed end In 1800 suicide was still regarded as a sin.

Preface to Lyrical Ballads (complete text; composed September 1800)¹

From Lyrical Ballads (2nd edn, 2 vols, 1800)

The first volume of these Poems² has already been submitted to general perusal. It was published as an experiment which, I hoped, might be of some use to ascertain how far, by fitting to metrical arrangement a selection of the real language of men³ in a state of vivid sensation, that sort of pleasure and that quantity of pleasure may be imparted, which a Poet may rationally endeavour to impart.

I had formed no very inaccurate estimate of the probable effect of those Poems: I flattered myself that they who should be pleased with them would read them with more than common pleasure: and on the other hand I was well aware that by those who should dislike them they would be read with more than common dislike. The result has differed from my expectation in this only, that I have pleased a greater number than I ventured to hope I should please.

For the sake of variety and from a consciousness of my own weakness, I was induced to request the assistance of a Friend, who furnished me with the Poems of the ‘Ancient Mariner’, ‘The Foster-Mother’s Tale’, ‘The Nightingale’, and the Poem entitled ‘Love’.⁴ I should not, however, have requested this assistance, had I not believed that the Poems of my Friend would in a great measure have the same tendency as my own, and that, though there would be found a difference, there would be found no discordance in the colours of our style as our opinions on the subject of poetry do almost entirely coincide.

Several of my Friends are anxious for the success of these Poems from a belief that, if the views with which they were composed were indeed realized, a class of Poetry would be produced well adapted to interest mankind permanently, and not unimportant in the multiplicity, and in the quality of its moral relations: and on this account they have advised me to prefix a systematic defence of the theory upon which the poems were written.⁵ But I was unwilling to undertake the task because I knew that on this occasion the Reader would look coldly upon my arguments, since I might be suspected of having been principally influenced by the selfish and foolish hope of reasoning him into an approbation of these particular Poems: and I was still more unwilling to undertake the task because adequately to display my opinions and fully to enforce my arguments would require a space wholly disproportionate to the nature of a preface. For to treat the subject with the clearness and coherence of which I believe it susceptible, it would be necessary to give a full account of the present state of the public taste in this country, and to determine how far this taste is healthy or depraved: which again could not be determined without pointing out in what manner language and the human mind act and react on each other, and without retracing the revolutions not of literature alone but likewise of society itself. I have therefore altogether declined to enter regularly upon this defence; yet I am sensible that there would be some impropriety in abruptly obtruding upon the Public, without a few words of introduction, Poems so materially different from those upon which general approbation is at present bestowed.

It is supposed, that by the act of writing in verse an Author makes a formal engagement that he will gratify certain known habits of association, that he not only thus apprizes the Reader that certain classes of ideas and expressions will be found in his book, but that others will be carefully excluded. This exponent or symbol held forth by metrical language must in different eras of literature have excited very different expectations: for example, in the age of Catullus, Terence, and Lucretius, and that of Statius or Claudian;⁶ and in our own country, in the age of Shakespeare and Beaumont and Fletcher, and that of Donne and Cowley, or Dryden, or Pope. I will not take upon me to determine the exact import of the promise which by the act of writing in verse an Author in the present day makes to his Reader; but I am certain it will appear to many persons that I have not fulfilled the terms of an engagement thus voluntarily contracted. I hope therefore the Reader will not censure me if I attempt to state what I have proposed to myself to perform, and also (as far as the limits of a preface will permit) to explain some of the chief reasons which have determined me in the choice of my purpose: that at least he may be spared any unpleasant feeling of disappointment, and that I myself may be protected from the most dishonourable accusation which can be brought against an Author – namely, that of an indolence which prevents him from endeavouring to ascertain what is his duty, or, when his duty is ascertained, prevents him from performing it.

The principal object, then, which I proposed to myself in these Poems, was to make the incidents of common life interesting by tracing in them (truly,⁷ though not ostentatiously) the primary laws of our nature,⁸ chiefly as far as regards the manner in which we associate ideas⁹ in a state of excitement.¹⁰ Low and rustic life was generally chosen because in that condition the essential passions of the heart find a better soil in which they can attain their maturity, are less under restraint, and speak a plainer and more emphatic language;¹¹ because in that situation our elementary feelings coexist in a state of greater simplicity, and consequently may be more accurately contemplated and more forcibly communicated; because the manners of rural life germinate from those elementary feelings,¹² and (from the necessary character of rural occupations) are more easily comprehended and are more durable; and lastly, because in that condition the passions of men are incorporated¹³ with the beautiful and permanent forms of nature.¹⁴

The language too of these men is adopted (purified indeed from what appear to be its real defects – from all lasting and rational causes of dislike or disgust) because such men hourly communicate with the best objects¹⁵ from which the best part of language is originally derived, and because, from their rank in society and the sameness and narrow circle of their intercourse being less under the influence of social vanity, they convey their feelings and notions in simple and unelaborated expressions. Accordingly, such a language, arising out of repeated experience and regular feelings, is a more permanent and a far more philosophical language¹⁶ than that which is frequently substituted for it by poets who think that they are conferring honour upon themselves and their art, in proportion as they separate themselves from the sympathies of men and indulge in arbitrary and capricious habits of expression, in order to furnish food for fickle tastes and fickle appetites¹⁷ of their own creation.¹⁸

I cannot, however, be insensible to the present outcry against the triviality and meanness both of thought and language which some of my contemporaries have occasionally introduced into their metrical compositions. And I acknowledge that this defect, where it exists, is more dishonourable to the writer's own character than false refinement or arbitrary innovation (though I should contend at the same time that it is far less pernicious in the sum of its consequences).

From such verses the poems in these volumes will be found distinguished at least by one mark of difference – that each of them has a worthy purpose. Not that I mean to say that I always began to write with a distinct purpose formally conceived, but I believe that my habits of meditation have so formed my feelings, as that my descriptions of such objects as strongly excite those feelings will be found to carry along with them a purpose. If in this opinion I am mistaken, I can have little right to the name of a poet; for all good poetry is the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings.¹⁹ But though this be true, poems to which any value can be attached were never produced on any variety of subjects but by a man who, being possessed of more than usual organic²⁰ sensibility, had also thought long and deeply.²¹ For our continued influxes of feeling²² are modified and directed by our thoughts, which are indeed the representatives of all our past feelings.²³ And, as by contemplating the relation of these general representatives²⁴ to each other, we discover what is really important to men, so by the repetition and continuance of this act, feelings connected with important subjects will be nourished, till at length (if we be originally possessed of much organic sensibility) such habits of mind will be produced that, by obeying blindly and mechanically²⁵ the impulses of those habits, we shall describe objects and utter sentiments of such a nature, and in such connection with each other, that the understanding of the being to whom we address ourselves – if he be in a healthful state of association²⁶ – must necessarily be in some degree enlightened, his taste exalted, and his affections ameliorated.²⁷

I have said that each of these poems has a purpose. I have also informed my Reader what this purpose will be found principally to be: namely, to illustrate the manner in which our feelings and ideas are associated in a state of excitement.²⁸ But (speaking in less general language) it is to follow the fluxes and refluxes²⁹ of the mind when agitated by the great and simple affections of our nature. This object I have endeavoured in these short essays³⁰ to attain by various means: by tracing the maternal passion through many of its more subtle windings (as in the poems of ‘The Idiot Boy’ and ‘The Mad Mother’); by accompanying the last struggles of a human being at the approach of death, cleaving in solitude to life and society (as in the poem of the forsaken Indian);³¹ by showing, as in the stanzas entitled ‘We are Seven’, the perplexity and obscurity which in childhood attend our notion of death – or rather our utter inability to admit that notion; or by displaying the strength of fraternal or (to speak more philosophically) of moral attachment when early associated with the great and beautiful objects of nature (as in ‘The Brothers’); or, as in the incident of ‘Simon Lee’, by placing my Reader in the way of receiving from ordinary moral sensations another and more salutary impression than we are accustomed to receive from them.³²

It has also been part of my general purpose to attempt to sketch characters under the influence of less impassioned feelings, as in the ‘Old Man Travelling’, ‘The Two Thieves’, etc. – characters of which the elements are simple, belonging rather to nature than to manners,³³ such as exist now and will probably always exist, and which from their constitution may be distinctly and profitably contemplated. I will not abuse the indulgence of my Reader by dwelling longer upon this subject, but it is proper that I should mention one other circumstance which distinguishes these Poems from the popular poetry of the day. It is this – that the feeling therein developed gives importance to the action and situation, and not the action and situation to the feeling.³⁴ My meaning will be rendered perfectly intelligible by referring my reader to the poems entitled ‘Poor Susan’ and ‘The Childless Father’³⁵ (particularly to the last stanza of the latter Poem).

I will not suffer a sense of false modesty to prevent me from asserting that I point my Reader’s attention to this mark of distinction far less for the sake of these particular Poems than from the general importance of the subject. The subject is indeed important!³⁶ For the human mind is capable of excitement without the application of gross and violent stimulants,³⁷ and he must have a very faint perception of its beauty and dignity who does not know this, and who does not further know that one being is elevated above another in proportion as he possesses this capability.³⁸

It has therefore appeared to me that to endeavour to produce or enlarge this capability is one of the best services in which (at any period) a Writer can be engaged – but this service, excellent at all times, is especially so at the present day. For a multitude of causes, unknown to former times, are now acting with a combined force to blunt the discriminating powers of the mind and, unfitting it for all voluntary exertion, to reduce it to a state of almost savage torpor.³⁹ The most effective of these causes are the great national events⁴⁰ which are daily taking place, and the increasing accumulation of men in cities, where the uniformity of their occupations produces a craving for extraordinary incident which the rapid communication⁴¹ of intelligence hourly gratifies. To this tendency of life and manners the literature and theatrical exhibitions⁴² of the country have conformed themselves. The invaluable works of our elder writers (I had almost said the works of Shakespeare and Milton) are driven into neglect by frantic novels, sickly and stupid German tragedies, and deluges of idle and extravagant stories in verse.⁴³

When I think upon this degrading thirst after outrageous⁴⁴ stimulation, I am almost ashamed to have spoken of the feeble effort with which I have endeavoured to counteract it. And, reflecting upon the magnitude of the general evil, I should be oppressed with no dishonourable melancholy had I not a deep impression of certain inherent and indestructible qualities of the human mind (and likewise of certain powers in the great and permanent objects⁴⁵ that act upon it which are equally inherent and indestructible), and did I not further add to this impression a belief that the time is approaching when the evil will be systematically opposed by men of greater powers and with far more distinguished success.

Having dwelt thus long on the subjects and aim of these poems, I shall request the Reader's permission to apprise him of a few circumstances relating to their style, in order (among other reasons) that I may not be censured for not having performed what I never attempted. The Reader will find no personifications of abstract ideas in these volumes, not that I mean to censure such personifications: they may be well fitted for certain sorts of composition, but in these Poems I propose to myself to imitate – and, as far as is possible, to adopt – the very language of men, and I do not find that such personifications make any regular or natural part of that language. I wish to keep my Reader in the company of flesh and blood, persuaded that by so doing I shall interest him. Not but that I believe that others who pursue a different track may interest him likewise. I do not interfere with their claim; I only wish to prefer a different claim of my own.

There will also be found in these volumes little of what is usually called 'poetic diction':⁴⁶ I have taken as much pains to avoid it as others ordinarily take to produce it. This I have done for the reason already alleged – to bring my language near to the language of men, and, further, because the pleasure which I have proposed to myself to impart is of a kind very different from that which is supposed by many persons to be the proper object of poetry. I do not know how, without being culpably particular,⁴⁷ I can give my Reader a more exact notion of the style in which I wished these poems to be written than by informing him that I have at all times endeavoured to look steadily at my subject. Consequently, I hope that there is in these Poems little falsehood of description, and that my ideas are expressed in language fitted to their respective importance.⁴⁸ Something I must have gained by this practice, as it is friendly to one property of all good poetry – namely, good sense. But it has necessarily cut me off from a large portion of phrases and figures of speech which, from father to son, have long been regarded as the common inheritance of Poets. I have also thought it expedient to restrict myself still further, having abstained from the use of many expressions in themselves proper and beautiful, but which have been foolishly repeated by bad Poets till such feelings of disgust are connected with them as it is scarcely possible by any art of association to overpower.

If in a Poem there should be found a series of lines, or even a single line, in which the language, though naturally arranged and according to the strict laws of metre, does not differ from that of prose, there is a numerous class of critics who, when they stumble upon these prosaisms as they call them, imagine that they have made a notable discovery, and exult over the Poet as over a man ignorant of his own profession. Now these men would establish a canon of criticism which the Reader will conclude he must utterly reject if he wishes to be pleased with these volumes. And it would be a most easy task to prove to him that not only the language of a large portion of every good poem, even of the most elevated character, must necessarily, except with reference to the metre, in no respect differ from that of good prose, but likewise that some of the most interesting parts of the best poems will be found to be strictly the language of prose when prose is well written. The truth of this assertion might be demonstrated by innumerable passages from almost all the poetical writings, even of Milton himself. I have not space for much quotation; but, to illustrate the subject in a general manner, I will here adduce a short composition of Gray, who was at the head of those who by their reasonings⁴⁹ have attempted to widen the space of separation betwixt prose and metrical composition, and was more than any other man curiously elaborate in the structure of his own poetic diction.

In vain to me the smiling mornings shine,
 And reddening Phoebus lifts his golden fire:
 The birds in vain their amorous descant join,
 Or cheerful fields resume their green attire:
 These ears alas! for other notes repine;
A different object do these eyes require;
My lonely anguish melts no heart but mine;
And in my breast the imperfect joys expire;
 Yet Morning smiles the busy race to cheer,
 And new-born pleasure brings to happier men;
 The fields to all their wonted tribute bear;
 To warm their little loves the birds complain.
I fruitless mourn to him that cannot hear
And weep the more because I weep in vain.

It will easily be perceived that the only part of this sonnet which is of any value is the lines printed in italics: it is equally obvious that, except in the rhyme, and in the use of the single word 'fruitless' for 'fruitlessly', which is so far a defect, the language of these lines does in no respect differ from that of prose.

Is there, then, it will be asked, no essential difference between the language of prose and metrical composition? I answer that there neither is nor can be any essential difference. We are fond of tracing the resemblance between poetry and painting, and, accordingly, we call them sisters.⁵⁰ But where shall we find bonds of connection sufficiently strict to typify the affinity betwixt metrical and prose composition? They both speak by and to the same organs; the bodies in which both of them are clothed may be said to be of the same substance, their affections are kindred and almost identical, not necessarily differing even in degree;⁵¹ poetry sheds no tears 'such as angels weep',⁵² but natural and human tears; she can boast of no celestial ichor⁵³ that distinguishes her vital juices from those of prose; the same human blood circulates through the veins of them both.

If it be affirmed that rhyme and metrical arrangement of themselves constitute a distinction which overturns what I have been saying on the strict affinity of metrical language with that of prose, and paves the way for other distinctions which the mind voluntarily admits, I answer that the distinction of rhyme and metre is regular and uniform, and not like that which is produced by what is usually called ‘poetic diction’⁵⁴ – arbitrary, and subject to infinite caprices upon which no calculation whatever can be made. In the one case, the Reader is utterly at the mercy of the Poet respecting what imagery or diction he may choose to connect with the passion, whereas in the other the metre obeys certain⁵⁵ laws, to which the Poet and Reader both willingly submit because they are certain, and because no interference is made by them with the passion but such as the concurring testimony of ages has shown to heighten and improve the pleasure which co-exists with it.

It will now be proper to answer an obvious question, namely, why, professing these opinions, have I written in verse? To this in the first place I reply, because, however I may have restricted myself, there is still left open to me what confessedly constitutes the most valuable object of all writing whether in prose or verse, the great and universal passions of men,⁵⁶ the most general and interesting of their occupations, and the entire world of nature, from which I am at liberty to supply myself with endless combinations of forms and imagery.⁵⁷ Now, granting for a moment that whatever is interesting in these objects may be as vividly described in prose, why am I to be condemned, if to such description I have endeavoured to superadd the charm which, by the consent of all nations, is acknowledged to exist in metrical language? To this, it will be answered, that a very small part of the pleasure given by Poetry depends upon the metre, and that it is injudicious to write in metre, unless it be accompanied with the other artificial distinctions of style with which metre is usually accompanied, and that by such deviation more will be lost from the shock which will be thereby given to the Reader’s associations, than will be counterbalanced by any pleasure which he can derive from the general power of numbers. In answer to those who thus contend for the necessity of accompanying metre with certain appropriate colours of style in order to the accomplishment of its appropriate end, and who also, in my opinion, greatly underrate the power of metre in itself, it might perhaps be almost sufficient to observe, that poems are extant, written upon more humble subjects, and in a more naked and simple style than what I have aimed at, which poems have continued to give pleasure from generation to generation. Now, if nakedness and simplicity be a defect, the fact here mentioned affords a strong presumption that poems somewhat less naked and simple are capable of affording pleasure at the present day; and all that I am now attempting is to justify myself for having written under the impression of this belief.

But I might point out various causes why, when the style is manly, and the subject of some importance, words metrically arranged⁵⁸ will long continue to impart such a pleasure to mankind as he who is sensible of the extent of that pleasure will be desirous to impart. The end of Poetry is to produce excitement in coexistence with an overbalance of pleasure. Now, by the supposition, excitement is an unusual and irregular state of the mind; ideas and feelings do not in that state succeed each other in accustomed order. But, if the words by which this excitement is produced are in themselves powerful, or the images and feelings have an undue proportion of pain connected with them, there is some danger that the excitement may be carried beyond its proper bounds. Now the co-presence of something regular, something to which the mind has been accustomed when in an unexcited or a less excited state, cannot but have great efficacy in tempering and restraining the passion by an intertexture of ordinary feeling. This may be illustrated by appealing to the Reader's own experience of the reluctance with which he comes to the re-perusal of the distressful parts of Clarissa Harlowe, or The Gamester.⁵⁹ While Shakespeare's writings, in the most pathetic scenes, never act upon us as pathetic beyond the bounds of pleasure – an effect which is in a great degree to be ascribed to small but continual and regular impulses of pleasurable surprise⁶⁰ from the metrical arrangement. On the other hand (what it must be allowed will much more frequently happen) if the Poet's words should be incommensurate with the passion, and inadequate to raise the Reader to a height of desirable excitement, then (unless the Poet's choice of his metre has been grossly injudicious) in the feelings of pleasure which the Reader has been accustomed to connect with metre in general, and in the feeling, whether cheerful or melancholy, which he has been accustomed to connect with that particular movement of metre, there will be found something which will greatly contribute to impart passion to the words, and to effect the complex end which the Poet proposes to himself.

If I had undertaken a systematic defence of the theory upon which these poems are written, it would have been my duty to develop the various causes upon which the pleasure received from metrical language depends. Among the chief of these causes is to be reckoned a principle which must be well known to those who have made any of the Arts the object of accurate reflection; I mean the pleasure which the mind derives from the perception of similitude in dissimilitude.⁶¹ This principle is the great spring of the activity of our minds and their chief feeder. From this principle the direction of the sexual appetite, and all the passions connected with it take their origin: It is the life of our ordinary conversation; and upon the accuracy with which similitude in dissimilitude, and dissimilitude in similitude are perceived, depend our taste and our moral feelings. It would not have been a useless employment to have applied this principle to the consideration of metre, and to have shown that metre is hence enabled to afford much pleasure, and to have pointed out in what manner that pleasure is produced. But my limits will not permit me to enter upon this subject, and I must content myself with a general summary.

I have said that Poetry is the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings: it takes its origin from emotion recollected in tranquillity:⁶² the emotion is contemplated till by a species of reaction the tranquillity gradually disappears, and an emotion similar to that which was before the subject of contemplation is gradually produced, and does itself actually exist in the mind.⁶³ In this mood successful composition generally begins, and in a mood similar to this it is carried on; but the emotion, of whatever kind and in whatever degree, from various causes is qualified by various pleasures, so that in describing any passions whatsoever (which are voluntarily described) the mind will upon the whole be in a state of enjoyment.⁶⁴

Now, if Nature be thus cautious in preserving in a state of enjoyment a being thus employed, the Poet ought to profit by the lesson thus held forth to him, and ought especially to take care, that whatever passions he communicates to his Reader, those passions, if his Reader's mind be sound and vigorous, should always be accompanied with an overbalance of pleasure. Now the music of harmonious metrical language,⁶⁵ the sense of difficulty⁶⁶ overcome, and the blind association of pleasure which has been previously received from works of rhyme or metre of the same or similar construction – all these imperceptibly make up a complex feeling of delight, which is of the most important use in tempering⁶⁷ the painful feeling, which will always be found intermingled with powerful descriptions of the deeper passions.⁶⁸ This effect is always produced in pathetic⁶⁹ and impassioned poetry while, in lighter compositions, the ease and gracefulness with which the Poet manages his numbers⁷⁰ are themselves confessedly a principal source of the gratification of the Reader.

I might perhaps include all which it is necessary to say upon this subject by affirming what few persons will deny, that of two descriptions, either of passions, manners, or characters, each of them equally well-executed, the one in prose and the other in verse, the verse will be read a hundred times where the prose is read once. We see that Pope, by the power of verse alone, has contrived to render the plainest common sense interesting, and even frequently to invest it with the appearance of passion. In consequence of these convictions I related in metre the tale of 'Goody Blake and Harry Gill', which is one of the rudest⁷¹ of this collection. I wished to draw attention to the truth that the power of the human imagination is sufficient to produce such changes even in our physical nature as might almost appear miraculous. The truth is an important one; the fact (for it is a fact)⁷² is a valuable illustration of it. And I have the satisfaction of knowing that it has been communicated to many hundreds of people⁷³ who would never have heard of it, had it not been narrated as a Ballad, and in a more impressive metre than is usual in Ballads.

Having thus adverted to a few of the reasons why I have written in verse, and why I have chosen subjects from common life, and endeavoured to bring my language near to the real language of men, if I have been too minute⁷⁴ in pleading my own cause, I have at the same time been treating a subject of general interest; and it is for this reason that I request the Reader's permission to add a few words with reference solely to these particular poems, and to some defects which will probably be found in them. I am sensible that my associations must have sometimes been particular instead of general, and that, consequently, giving to things a false importance, sometimes from diseased impulses I may have written upon unworthy subjects; but I am less apprehensive on this account, than that my language may frequently have suffered from those arbitrary connections of feelings and ideas with particular words, from which no man can altogether protect himself. Hence I have no doubt that, in some instances, feelings even of the ludicrous may be given to my Readers by expressions which appeared to me tender and pathetic. Such faulty expressions, were I convinced they were faulty at present, and that they must necessarily continue to be so, I would willingly take all reasonable pains to correct. But it is dangerous to make these alterations on the simple authority of a few individuals, or even of certain classes of men; for where the understanding of an Author is not convinced, or his feelings altered, this cannot be done without great injury to himself: for his own feelings are his stay and support,⁷⁵ and if he sets them aside in one instance, he may be induced to repeat this act till his mind loses all confidence in itself and becomes utterly debilitated. To this it may be added, that the Reader ought never to forget that he is himself exposed to the same errors as the Poet, and perhaps in a much greater degree: for there can be no presumption in saying, that it is not probable he will be so well acquainted with the various stages of meaning through which words have passed, or with the fickleness or stability of the relations of particular ideas to each other; and above all, since he is so much less interested in the subject, he may decide lightly and carelessly.

Long as I have detained my Reader, I hope he will permit me to caution him against a mode of false criticism which has been applied to Poetry in which the language closely resembles that of life and nature. Such verses have been triumphed over in parodies of which Dr Johnson's stanza is a fair specimen.

I put my hat upon my head,
And walked into the Strand,
And there I met another man
Whose hat was in his hand.

Immediately under these lines I will place one of the most justly admired stanzas of The Babes in the Wood.

These pretty babes with hand in hand
Went wandering up and down;
But never more they saw the man
Approaching from the town.

In both these stanzas the words, and the order of the words, in no respect differ from the most unimpassioned conversation. There are words in both – for example, ‘the Strand’ and ‘the town’ – connected with none but the most familiar ideas; yet the one stanza we admit as admirable, and the other as a fair example of the superlatively contemptible. Whence arises this difference? Not from the metre, not from the language, not from the order of the words; but the matter expressed in Dr Johnson’s stanza is contemptible. The proper method of treating trivial and simple verses to which Dr Johnson’s stanza would be a fair parallelism is not to say this is a bad kind of poetry, or this is not poetry; but this wants sense; it is neither interesting in itself, nor can lead to anything interesting; the images neither originate in that sane state of feeling which arises out of thought, nor can excite thought or feeling in the Reader. This is the only sensible manner of dealing with such verses: Why trouble yourself about the species till you have previously decided upon the genus? Why take pains to prove that an ape is not a Newton when it is self-evident that he is not a man?⁷⁶

I have one request to make of my Reader, which is, that in judging these Poems he would decide by his own feelings genuinely, and not by reflection upon what will probably be the judgement of others. How common is it to hear a person say, ‘I myself do not object to this style of composition, or this or that expression, but to such and such classes of people it will appear mean or ludicrous.’ This mode of criticism, so destructive of all sound unadulterated judgement, is almost universal. I have therefore to request that the Reader would abide independently by his own feelings, and that if he finds himself affected he would not suffer such conjectures to interfere with his pleasure.

If an Author by any single composition has impressed us with respect for his talents, it is useful to consider this as affording a presumption that, on other occasions where we have been displeased, he nevertheless may not have written ill or absurdly. And further, to give him so much credit for this one composition as may induce us to review what has displeased us with more care than we should otherwise have bestowed upon it. This is not only an act of justice but, in our decisions upon poetry especially, may conduce in a high degree to the improvement of our own taste. For an accurate taste in poetry, and in all the other arts (as Sir Joshua Reynolds⁷⁷ has observed) is an acquired talent which can only be produced by thought and a long-continued intercourse with the best models of composition. This is mentioned not with so ridiculous a purpose as to prevent the most inexperienced Reader from judging for himself (I have already said that I wish him to judge for himself), but merely to temper the rashness of decision, and to suggest that if poetry be a subject on which much time has not been bestowed, the judgement may be erroneous, and that in many cases it necessarily will be so.

I know that nothing would have so effectually contributed to further the end⁷⁸ which I have in view, as to have shown of what kind the pleasure is, and how the pleasure is produced which is confessedly produced by metrical composition essentially different from that which I have here endeavoured to recommend. For the Reader will say that he has been pleased by such composition, and what can I do more for him?

The power of any art is limited, and he will suspect that, if I propose to furnish him with new friends, it is only upon condition of his abandoning his old friends. Besides, as I have said, the Reader is himself conscious of the pleasure which he has received from such composition – composition to which he has peculiarly attached the endearing name of Poetry – and all men feel an habitual gratitude and something of an honourable bigotry for the objects which have long continued to please them. We not only wish to be pleased, but to be pleased in that particular way in which we have been accustomed to be pleased.

There is a host of arguments in these feelings, and I should be the less able to combat them successfully, as I am willing to allow that, in order entirely to enjoy the Poetry which I am recommending, it would be necessary to give up much of what is ordinarily enjoyed. But would my limits have permitted me to point out how this pleasure is produced, I might have removed many obstacles and assisted my Reader in perceiving that the powers of language are not so limited as he may suppose, and that it is possible that poetry may give other enjoyments – of a purer, more lasting, and more exquisite nature. But this part of my subject I have been obliged altogether to omit: as it has been less my present aim to prove that the interest excited by some other kinds of poetry is less vivid and less worthy of the nobler powers of the mind, than to offer reasons for presuming that, if the object which I have proposed to myself were adequately attained, a species of poetry would be produced which is genuine poetry, in its nature well-adapted to interest mankind permanently, and likewise important in the multiplicity and quality of its moral relations.

From what has been said, and from a perusal of the Poems, the Reader will be able clearly to perceive the object which I have proposed to myself. He will determine how far I have attained this object and (what is a much more important question) whether it be worth attaining. And upon the decision of these two questions will rest my claim to the approbation of the public.

Preface to Lyrical Ballads

2 The first volume of these Poems Wordsworth refers to Lyrical Ballads (1798), included in this anthology in its entirety; see pp. 337–420.

3 the real language of men Wordsworth's use of this phrase brought him much criticism, because many people responded that no one spoke as people did in his poems. The idea was clearly endorsed by Coleridge in 1800, and probably originated with him. All the same, that didn't stop him from describing it as 'an equivocal expression' in Biographia Literaria (1817); see p. 713.

4 a Friend... 'Love' 'Love' did not appear in Lyrical Ballads 1798, but was added in 1800. The 'Friend' is Coleridge. As for 'The Ancient Mariner', it appeared in the 1800 volume with a sort of apology, written by Wordsworth – see p. 520.

5 they have advised...written The 'Friends' consist of Coleridge. 'I never cared a straw about the theory', Wordsworth told Barron Field, 'and the Preface was written at the request of Coleridge out of sheer good nature. I recollect the very spot, a deserted quarry in the vale of Grasmere, where he pressed the thing upon me, and but for that it would never have been thought of.'

6 Catullus (?84–?54 BCE) was a Roman poet, remembered for a range of work including elegies, epigrams and love poems to his beloved 'Lesbia'; Terence (195–159 BCE) wrote comedies, a polished and urbane writer; Lucretius (99–55 BCE), Roman philosophic poet, author of De rerum natura ('On the nature of things'); Statius (c.45–c.96) was the author of the Thebaid, an epic in the manner of Virgil. Claudian (fourth–fifth century) was the last notable Latin classical poet. He is regarded as a vigorous, skilful, imaginative writer, the author of several epics including The Rape of Proserpine. The latter two authors use a more inflated manner than the earlier ones, and date from a period of general decline. Similarly, Wordsworth contrasts the writing of Dryden and Pope unfavourably with that of earlier times because he thinks of the Augustans as having been guilty of using a form of 'poetic diction' that took them away from life as experienced by ordinary people. It was because of such sentiments that Byron took issue with Wordsworth; he preferred the writing of Pope and Dryden, and believed that everything since had been a deviation from the ‘correct’ path of literature; see pp. 863–4.

7 truly truthfully.

8 the primary laws of our nature i.e. (in this context) the workings of the mind.

9 we associate ideas The association of ideas – that is to say, the way in which emotions are connected with, for instance, memories, is an important element in Wordsworth’s thinking. See Pedlar 78–81, Two-Part Prelude i 418–24, 432–42.

10 a state of excitement i.e. emotional excitement, when we feel intensely.

11 Low and rustic...language a belief first expressed in February 1798, Pedlar 239–45.

12 the manners of rural life...feelings There is an implied comparison with the social life (‘manners’) of the city, which has become detached from ‘elementary’ human emotion.

13 incorporated interfused, united, blended.

14 the passions...nature as, for instance, in the way that Michael’s unfinished sheepfold becomes a symbol of his tragedy, or that Margaret’s ruined cottage embodies hers. The search for permanence – of language and symbol – is fundamental to Wordsworth’s aesthetic.

15 the best objects for example, natural objects.

16 philosophical language i.e. fit for philosophical discourse.

17 fickle tastes and fickle appetites tastes and appetites governed by literary fashion.

18 'It is worthwhile here to observe that the affecting parts of Chaucer are almost always expressed in language pure and universally intelligible even to this day' (Wordsworth's note). Wordsworth believed that 'every great and original writer, in proportion as he is great or original, must himself create the taste by which he is to be relished' (MY i 150).

19 all good poetry...feelings one of Wordsworth's best-known pronouncements; note, however, the sentence that follows, frequently omitted or forgotten.

20 organic innate, inherent.

21 If in this opinion...deeply Wordsworth's championing of 'powerful feelings' is strongly modified by the insistence on long and profound thought.

22 influxes of feeling i.e. 'flowing-in' of emotion; cf. the Pedlar's 'access of mind' (Pedlar 107).

23 For our . . . feelings Emotions in the past work in the present, as thoughts, to alter continuing influxes of emotion in the present.

24 these general representatives thoughts deriving from feelings in the past.

25 by obeying blindly and mechanically It is crucial to the creative act that the poet completely surrender to associations, and habits of thought and feeling.

26 a healthful state of association i.e. a state of mind in which the reader is receptive, and does not impose on the poetry irrelevant prejudices or assumptions.

27 ameliorated improved. Poetry should be emotionally uplifting.

28 the manner...excitement the way in which emotions and ideas interact associatively when the mind is stimulated.

29 fluxes and refluxes ebb and flow.

30 essays attempts.

31 the poem of the forsaken Indian i.e. 'The Complaint of a Forsaken Indian Woman', p. 412.

32 by placing...them The initial pity, which leads the narrator to offer to help Simon Lee, gives way to the more complex sentiment expressed in the final lines of the poem.

33 manners customs.

34 the feeling...feeling a crucial distinction between Wordsworth's poetry and that of many of his more fashionable contemporaries: his poetry is inspired primarily by the emotion behind it rather than by the incidents or the social class of those it describes.

35 'Poor Susan' and 'The Childless Father' These poems, first published in Lyrical Ballads (1800), are not included in this anthology, but Wordsworth's point is borne out just as well by 'Simon Lee', 'The Last of the Flock', 'Complaint of a Forsaken Indian Woman', 'The Thorn' and 'The Idiot Boy'.

36 In view of his stylistic conservatism when it came to prose, it is worth noting that the exclamation mark at this point is Wordsworth's.

37 gross and violent stimulants a reference to the sort of violent or salacious detail often found in Gothic chillers of the day.

38 this capability imaginative sympathy.

39 savage torpor barbaric laziness.

40 national events Britain had been at war with France since 1793.

41 rapid communication the semaphore telegraph (invented 1792) and the stagecoach.

42 exhibitions performances.

43 frantic novels...verse Gothic novels, and plays by sentimental writers like Kotzebue, were popular. Many 'stories in verse' appeared in contemporary periodicals; see Robert Mayo, 'The Contemporaneity of the Lyrical Ballads', PMLA 69 (1954) 486–522.

44 outrageous excessive.

45 the great and permanent objects i.e. primarily the internalized images of objects in the natural world, such as mountains, lakes, trees.

46 poetic diction Two years later, when revising Lyrical Ballads for a further edition, Wordsworth expanded on what he meant by this phrase in an Appendix, excerpts from which are included at pp. 533–6.

47 culpably particular too meticulously detailed.

48 fitted to their respective importance i.e. by the weight of emotion behind them.

49 reasonings Wordsworth was probably aware of Gray's dictum in his correspondence that 'the language of the age is never the language of poetry'. The poem is Gray's 'Sonnet on the Death of Richard West'.

50 we call them sisters This was a commonplace of eighteenth-century aesthetic theory.

51 ‘I here use the word “poetry” (though against my own judgement) as opposed to the word “prose”, and synonymous with metrical composition. But much confusion has been introduced into criticism by this contradistinction of poetry and prose, instead of the more philosophical one of poetry and science. The only strict antithesis to prose is metre’ (Wordsworth’s note).

52 such as angels weep from Paradise Lost i 620, where Satan is lachrymose.

53 celestial ichor the blood of the gods in Greek myth.

54 poetic diction The phrase is discussed at further length in the Appendix Wordsworth added to the Preface for the 1802 edition of Lyrical Ballads; see pp. 533–6.

55 certain fixed.

56 the great and universal passions of men For ‘passions’ think of emotions, or psychological twists and turns. The task of understanding how the human mind worked prior to the existence of a ‘science’ of psychology, in the sense in which it now exists, is Wordsworth’s main project. See also the ‘Note to “The Thorn” ’, pp. 518–19.

57 imagery Wordsworth defined imagery as ‘sensible objects really existing, and felt to exist’.

58 words metrically arranged Wordsworth would probably have been aware of Johnson’s claim that metre ‘shackles attention and governs passions’ (Rambler 88).

59 Wordsworth refers to Samuel Richardson’s Clarissa (1747–8), about the noble but doomed heroine Clarissa Harlowe and the aristocratic rake Robert Lovelace; and Edward Moore’s prose drama of family life, The Gamester (1753).

60 surprise It is worth comparing Coleridge's later notebook entry, dating from March 1805:

Two kinds of pleasure are procured in the two master-movements and impulses of man, the gratification of the love of variety with the gratification of the love of uniformity – and that by a recurrence, delightful as a painless and yet exciting act of memory, tiny breezelets of surprise, each one destroying the ripples which the former had made, yet all together keeping the surface of the mind in a bright dimple-smile! (Notebooks ii 2515)

61 the perception of similitude in dissimilitude The pleasure derived from the combination of uniformity and variety in a work of art was another commonplace of eighteenth-century aesthetics.

62 emotion recollected in tranquillity In August–September 1800 Coleridge recorded in his notebook that poetry was a 'recalling of passion in tranquillity' (Notebooks i 787).

63 The emotion...in the mind What the poet experiences is related to the original emotion, rather than the original emotion itself.

64 so that...enjoyment Wordsworth emphasizes that we gain aesthetic pleasure even from reading poetry that is tragic in theme.

65 harmonious metrical language poetry.

66 the sense of difficulty i.e. that of disciplining the 'language of prose' into metrical form.

67 tempering modifying.

68 deeper passions serious, darker emotions, such as grief.

69 pathetic passionate, deeply felt.

70 numbers i.e. verse, metre.

71 rudest less sophisticated.

72 It was important to Wordsworth to make clear that ‘Goody Blake and Harry Gill’ was not invented, but a true story; see p. 370.

73 it has been...people ‘Goody Blake and Harry Gill’ was in 1800 the most reprinted of the 1798 Lyrical Ballads, having appeared in the Edinburgh Magazine 14 (1799) 387–9, the Ipswich Magazine (1799) 118–19, New Annual Register 19 (1799) 200–3 and the Universal Magazine 105 (1799) 270–1.

74 minute detailed.

75 stay and support cf. ‘Resolution and Independence’ 144: “‘God”, said I, ‘be my help and stay secure.’

76 Why take pains...not a man? Wordsworth alludes to Pope’s Essay on Man:

Superior beings, when of late they saw

A mortal man unfold all Nature’s law,

Admired such wisdom in an earthly shape

And showed a Newton as we show an ape.

(ii 31–4)

Note to 'The Thorn' (composed late September 1800)¹

From Lyrical Ballads (2nd edn, 2 vols, 1800)

This poem ought to have been preceded by an introductory poem which I have been prevented from writing by never having felt myself in a mood when it was probable that I should write it well.

The character which I have here introduced speaking is sufficiently common. The reader will perhaps have a general notion of it if he has ever known a man (a captain of a small trading vessel, for example)² who, being past the middle age of life, had retired upon an annuity or small independent income to some village or country town of which he was not a native, or in which he had not been accustomed to live. Such men, having little to do, become credulous and talkative from indolence. And from the same cause (and other predisposing causes by which it is probable that such men may have been affected) they are prone to superstition. On which account it appeared to me proper to select a character like this to exhibit some of the general laws by which superstition acts upon the mind. Superstitious men are almost always men of slow faculties and deep feelings. Their minds are not loose but adhesive.³ They have a reasonable share of imagination, by which word I mean the faculty which produces impressive effects out of simple elements. But they are utterly destitute of fancy – the power by which pleasure and surprise are excited by sudden varieties of situation and by accumulated imagery.

It was my wish in this poem to show the manner in which such men cleave⁴ to the same ideas, and to follow the turns of passion (always different, yet not palpably different) by which their conversation is swayed. I had two objects to attain: first, to represent a picture which should not be unimpressive, yet consistent with the character that should describe it; secondly (while I adhered to the style in which such persons describe), to take care that words – which in their minds are impregnated with passion⁵ – should likewise convey passion to readers who are not accustomed to sympathize with men feeling in that manner, or using such language. It seemed to me that this might be done by calling in the assistance of lyrical and rapid metre. It was necessary that the poem, to be natural, should in reality move slowly. Yet I hoped that by the aid of the metre, to those who should at all enter into the spirit of the poem, it would appear to move quickly. (The reader will have the kindness to excuse this note, as I am sensible that an introductory poem is necessary to give this poem its full effect.)

Upon this occasion I will request permission to add a few words closely connected with 'The Thorn', and many other poems in these volumes. There is a numerous class of readers who imagine that the same words cannot be repeated without tautology. This is a great error. Virtual tautology is much oftener produced by using different words when the meaning is exactly the same. Words – a poet's words more particularly – ought to be weighed in the balance of feeling, and not measured by the space which they occupy upon paper. For the reader cannot be too often reminded that poetry is passion: it is the history or science of feelings. Now every man must know that an attempt is rarely made to communicate impassioned feelings without something of an accompanying consciousness of the inadequateness of our own powers, or the deficiencies of language. During such efforts there will be a craving⁶ in the mind, and as long as it is unsatisfied the speaker will cling to the same words, or words of the same character.

There are also various other reasons why repetition and apparent tautology are frequently beauties of the highest kind. Among the chief of these reasons is the interest which the mind attaches to words not only as symbols of the passion, but as things, active and efficient, which are of themselves part of the passion. And further, from a spirit of fondness, exultation, and gratitude, the mind luxuriates in the repetition of words which appear successfully to communicate its feelings.

The truth of these remarks might be shown by innumerable passages from the Bible, and from the impassioned poetry of every nation.

Awake, awake, Deborah! Awake, awake, utter a song!

Arise, Barak, and lead thy captivity captive, thou son of Abinoam!

At her feet he bowed, he fell, he lay down. At her feet he bowed, there he fell down dead.

Why is his chariot so long in coming? Why tarry the wheels of his chariot?

(Judges 12: 27, and part of 28; see also the whole of that tumultuous and wonderful poem)

Note to ‘the Thorn’

1 The Thorn (see pp. 383–90) was originally published in Lyrical Ballads (1798) without any explanation. This essay, significant both for what it says about its subject as well as what it says about tautology, was published in the second edition of Lyrical Ballads (1800), in anticipation of the widespread misunderstanding of the poem that was to follow.

2 a captain...example The telescope at line 181 of the poem is the only piece of evidence that supports this suggestion.

3 adhesive persevering, tending to worry at certain ideas. Wordsworth is talking about the psychology of obsession.

4 cleave cling, stick.

5 passion emotion.

6 craving i.e. an emotional craving, or frustration.

Note to Coleridge’s ‘The Rime of the Ancient Mariner’¹

From Lyrical Ballads (2nd edn, 2 vols, 1800)

I cannot refuse myself the gratification of informing such readers as may have been pleased with this poem, or with any part of it, that they owe their pleasure in some sort to me, as the author² was himself very desirous that it should be suppressed. This wish had arisen from a consciousness of the defects of the poem, and from a knowledge that many persons had been much displeased with it.³ The poem of my friend has indeed great defects: first, that the principal person has no distinct character, either in his profession of mariner, or as a human being who having been long under the control of supernatural impressions might be supposed himself to partake of something supernatural; secondly, that he does not act, but is continually acted upon; thirdly, that the events having no necessary connection do not produce each other; and lastly, that the imagery is somewhat too laboriously accumulated. Yet the poem contains many delicate touches of passion, and indeed the passion is everywhere true to nature; a great number of the stanzas present beautiful images and are expressed with unusual felicity of language; and the versification, though the metre is itself unfit for long poems, is harmonious and artfully varied, exhibiting the utmost powers of that metre, and every variety of which it is capable. It therefore appeared to me that these several merits (the first of which, namely that of the passion, is of the highest kind)⁴ gave to the poem a value which is not often possessed by better poems. On this account I requested of my friend to permit me to republish it.

Note to Coleridge's 'the Rime of the Ancient Mariner'

¹ Wordsworth appended this note to Coleridge's poem when it appeared in the second edition of Lyrical Ballads (1800), sending it to the printer a few days before the decision not to include Christabel. His doubts about The Ancient Mariner may have been reinforced by Southey's comments in the Critical Review (see p. 752). The note must have contributed to the 'change' in the relationship between the two men, lamented in Wordsworth's 'A Complaint' (p. 585). It certainly embittered Coleridge in later years; in 1818 he recalled the Wordsworths' 'cold praise and effective discouragement of every attempt of mine to roll onward in a distinct current of my own – who admitted that the Ancient Mariner and the Christabel ... were not without merit, but were abundantly anxious to acquit their judgements of any blindness to the very numerous defects' (Griggs i 631 n. 2).

² the author Coleridge.

³ many persons...with it probably a reference to Southey's damning comment that it was a 'poem of little merit' (see p. 752).

⁴ the first of which...kind a comment consistent with Wordsworth's Note to 'The Thorn', which states that 'poetry is passion; it is the history or science of feelings' (see p. 519).

Michael: A Pastoral Poem (composed October–December 1800)

From Lyrical Ballads (2nd edn, 2 vols, 1800)

If from the public way you turn your steps
Up the tumultuous brook of Greenhead Gill¹
You will suppose that with an upright path
Your feet must struggle, in such bold ascent
The pastoral mountains front you, face to face. 5
But courage! for beside that boisterous brook
The mountains have all opened out themselves,
And made a hidden valley of their own.

No habitation there is seen; but such
As journey thither find themselves alone 10

With a few sheep, with rocks and stones, and kites²
That overhead are sailing in the sky.³

It is in truth an utter solitude,
Nor should I have made mention of this dell
But for one object which you might pass by – 15
Might see and notice not. Beside the brook
There is a straggling heap of unhewn stones;
And to that place a story appertains,

Which, though it be ungarnished with events,
Is not unfit, I deem, for the fireside 20
Or for the summer shade. It was the first,
The earliest of those tales that spake to me
Of shepherds, dwellers in the vallies, men
Whom I already loved – not verily
For their own sakes, but for the fields and hills 25
Where was their occupation and abode.

And hence this tale, while I was yet a boy –
Careless of books, yet having felt the power
Of nature – by the gentle agency
Of natural objects, led me on to feel 30
For passions that were not my own, and think
(At random and imperfectly indeed)

On man, the heart of man, and human life.⁴

Therefore, although it be a history⁵
Homely and rude,⁶ I will relate the same 35

For the delight of a few natural hearts⁷ –
And with yet fonder feeling, for the sake
Of youthful poets who among these hills
Will be my second self when I am gone.

Upon the forest-side in Grasmere vale 40
There dwelt a shepherd, Michael was his name,
An old man, stout of heart and strong of limb.
His bodily frame had been from youth to age
Of an unusual strength; his mind was keen,

Intense, and frugal, apt for all affairs;⁸ 45
And in his shepherd's calling he was prompt
And watchful more than ordinary men.
Hence he had learned the meaning of all winds,
Of blasts of every tone; and oftentimes
When others heeded not, he heard the south 50
Make subterraneous music, like the noise
Of bagpipers on distant Highland hills.
The shepherd, at such warning, of his flock
Bethought him, and he to himself would say,
'The winds are now devising work for me!' 55
And truly at all times the storm that drives
The traveller to a shelter, summoned him
Up to the mountains: he had been alone
Amid the heart of many thousand mists
That came to him and left him on the heights. 60
So lived he till his eightieth year was passed;
And grossly that man errs who should suppose
That the green valleys, and the streams and rocks,
Were things indifferent to the shepherd's thoughts.⁹
Fields, where with cheerful spirits he had breathed 65
The common air, the hills which he so oft
Had climbed with vigorous steps – which had impressed
So many incidents upon his mind
Of hardship, skill or courage, joy or fear;
Which like a book preserved the memory 70
Of the dumb animals whom he had saved,
Had fed or sheltered, linking to such acts,
So grateful in themselves, the certainty
Of honourable gains – these fields, these hills,
Which were his living being even more 75
Than his own blood (what could they less?), had laid
Strong hold on his affections, were to him
A pleasurable feeling of blind love,
The pleasure which there is in life itself.

He had not passed his days in singleness: 80
He had a wife, a comely matron – old,
Though younger than himself full twenty years.
She was a woman of a stirring life,
Whose heart was in her house. Two wheels she had
Of antique form – this, large for spinning wool, 85
That, small for flax – and if one wheel had rest
It was because the other was at work.¹⁰
The pair had but one inmate¹¹ in their house,
An only child, who had been born to them
When Michael telling¹² o’er his years began 90
To deem that he was old – in shepherd’s phrase,
With one foot in the grave. This only son,
With two brave sheep dogs tried in many a storm
(The one of an inestimable worth),
Made all their household. I may truly say 95
That they were as a proverb in the vale
For endless industry. When day was gone,
And from their occupations out of doors
The son and father were come home, even then
Their labour did not cease, unless when all 100
Turned to their cleanly supper-board, and there
Each with a mess of pottage¹³ and skimmed milk,
Sat round their basket piled with oaten cake,¹⁴
And their plain home-made cheese. Yet when their meal
Was ended, Luke (for so the son was named) 105
And his old father both betook themselves
To such convenient work as might employ
Their hands by the fireside – perhaps to card¹⁵
Wool for the housewife’s spindle, or repair
Some injury done to sickle, flail, or scythe,¹⁶ 110
Or other implement of house or field.
Down from the ceiling by the chimney’s edge

(Which in our ancient uncouth country style
Did with a huge projection overbrow¹⁷
Large space beneath) as duly as the light 115
Of day grew dim, the housewife hung a lamp,
An aged utensil which had performed
Service beyond all others of its kind.
Early at evening did it burn, and late,
Surviving comrade of uncounted¹⁸ hours 120
Which going by from year to year had found
And left the couple neither gay perhaps
Nor cheerful, yet with objects¹⁹ and with hopes
Living a life of eager industry.
And now, when Luke was in his eighteenth year, 125
There by the light of this old lamp they sat,
Father and son, while late into the night
The housewife plied her own peculiar²⁰ work,
Making the cottage through the silent hours
Murmur as with the sound of summer flies. 130
Not with a waste of words, but for the sake
Of pleasure which I know that I shall give
To many living now, I of this lamp
Speak thus minutely; for there are no few
Whose memories will bear witness to my tale. 135
The light was famous in its neighbourhood,
And was a public symbol of the life
The thrifty pair had lived. For as it chanced
Their cottage on a plot of rising ground
Stood single, with large prospect north and south, 140
High into Easedale, up to Dunmail Raise,
And westward to the village near the lake.
And from this constant light so regular
And so far-seen, the house itself by all
Who dwelt within the limits of the vale, 145
Both old and young, was named The Evening Star.

Thus living on through such a length of years
The shepherd, if he loved himself, must needs
Have loved his helpmate;²¹ but to Michael's heart
This son of his old age was yet more dear – 150
Effect which might perhaps have been produced
By that instinctive tenderness, the same
Blind²² spirit which is in the blood of all,
Or that a child more than all other gifts,
Brings hope with it, and forward-looking thoughts, 155
And stirrings of inquietude,²³ when they
By tendency of nature²⁴ needs must fail.
From such, and other causes, to the thoughts
Of the old man his only son was now
The dearest object that he knew on earth. 160
Exceeding was the love he bare to him,
His heart and his heart's joy! For oftentimes
Old Michael, while he was a babe in arms,
Had done him female service,²⁵ not alone
For dalliance²⁶ and delight, as is the use 165
Of fathers, but with patient mind enforced
To acts of tenderness; and he had rocked
His cradle with a woman's gentle hand.

And in a later time, ere yet the boy
Had put on boy's attire,²⁷ did Michael love 170
(Albeit of a stern unbending mind)
To have the young one in his sight when he
Had work by his own door, or when he sat
With sheep before him on his shepherd's stool
Beneath that large old oak, which near their door 175
Stood, and from its enormous breadth of shade
Chosen for the shearer's covert²⁸ from the sun,
Thence in our rustic dialect was called
The Clipping²⁹ Tree – a name which yet it bears.

There, while they two were sitting in the shade 180
With others round them, earnest all and blithe,
Would Michael exercise his heart with looks
Of fond correction and reproof, bestowed
Upon the child if he disturbed the sheep
By catching at their legs, or with his shouts 185
Scared them while they lay still beneath the shears.
And when by Heaven's good grace the boy grew up
A healthy lad, and carried in his cheek
Two steady roses that were five years old,
Then Michael from a winter coppice³⁰ cut 190
With his own hand a sapling, which he hooped
With iron, making it throughout in all
Due requisites a perfect shepherd's staff,
And gave it to the boy; wherewith equipped,
He as a watchman oftentimes was placed 195
At gate or gap, to stem³¹ or turn the flock;
And, to his office³² prematurely called,
There stood the urchin, as you will divine,
Something between a hindrance and a help –
And for this cause not always, I believe, 200
Receiving from his father hire³³ of praise,
Though nought was left undone which staff, or voice,
Or looks, or threatening gestures, could perform.
But soon as Luke, now ten years old, could stand
Against the mountain blasts, and to the heights, 205
Not fearing toil, nor length of weary ways,
He with his father daily went, and they
Were as companions – why should I relate
That objects which the shepherd loved before
Were dearer now? – that from the boy there came 210
Feelings and emanations, things which were
Light to the sun and music to the wind,
And that the old man's heart seemed born again?

Thus in his father's sight the boy grew up
And now when he had reached his eighteenth year, 215
He was his comfort and his daily hope.

While this good household thus were living on
From day to day, to Michael's ear there came Distressful tidings. Long before the time
Of which I speak, the shepherd had been bound 220

In surety for his brother's son,³⁴ a man
Of an industrious life and ample means,
But unforeseen misfortunes suddenly
Had pressed upon him, and old Michael now
Was summoned to discharge the forfeiture – 225
A grievous penalty, but little less

Than half his substance.³⁵ This unlooked-for claim,
At the first hearing, for a moment took
More hope out of his life than he supposed
That any old man ever could have lost. 230

As soon as he had gathered so much strength
That he could look his trouble in the face,
It seemed that his sole refuge was to sell
A portion of his patrimonial fields.³⁶
Such was his first resolve; he thought again, 235

And his heart failed him. 'Isabel', said he,
Two evenings after he had heard the news,
'I have been toiling more than seventy years,
And in the open sunshine of God's love
Have we all lived, yet if these fields of ours 240
Should pass into a stranger's hand, I think
That I could not lie quiet in my grave.

Our lot is a hard lot;³⁷ the sun itself
Has scarcely been more diligent than I,
And I have lived to be a fool at last 245
To my own family. An evil man
That was, and made an evil choice, if he

Were false to us; and if he were not false,
There are ten thousand to whom loss like this
Had been no sorrow. I forgive him – but 250
‘Twere better to be dumb than to talk thus.
When I began, my purpose was to speak
Of remedies and of a cheerful hope.
Our Luke shall leave us, Isabel; the land
Shall not go from us, and it shall be free – 255
He shall possess it, free as is the wind
That passes over it. We have, thou knowest,
Another kinsman; he will be our friend
In this distress. He is a prosperous man,
Thriving in trade, and Luke to him shall go 260
And with his kinsman’s help and his own thrift
He quickly will repair this loss, and then
May come again to us. If here he stay
What can be done? Where everyone is poor
What can be gained?’³⁸

At this the old man paused 265
And Isabel sat silent, for her mind
Was busy looking back into past times.
‘There’s Richard Bateman’, thought she to herself,
‘He was a parish-boy³⁹ – at the church door
They made a gathering for him, shillings, pence,⁴⁰ 270
And halfpennies, wherewith the neighbours bought
A basket which they filled with pedlar’s wares,
And with this basket on his arm the lad
Went up to London, found a master⁴¹ there,
Who out of many chose the trusty boy 275
To go and overlook his merchandise
Beyond the seas, where he grew wondrous rich
And left estates and monies to the poor,
And at his birthplace built a chapel, floored
With marble which he sent from foreign lands.’⁴² 280

These thoughts, and many others of like sort,
Passed quickly through the mind of Isabel,
And her face brightened. The old man was glad,
And thus resumed: 'Well, Isabel, this scheme
These two days has been meat and drink to me: 285
Far more than we have lost is left us yet.
We have enough – I wish indeed that I
Were younger, but this hope is a good hope.
Make ready Luke's best garments; of the best
Buy for him more, and let us send him forth 290
Tomorrow, or the next day, or tonight –
If he could go, the boy should go tonight.'

Here Michael ceased, and to the fields went forth
With a light heart. The housewife for five days
Was restless morn and night, and all day long 295
Wrought on with her best fingers⁴³ to prepare
Things needful for the journey of her son.
But Isabel was glad when Sunday came
To stop her in her work; for when she lay
By Michael's side, she for the last two nights 300
Heard him, how he was troubled in his sleep;
And when they rose at morning she could see
That all his hopes were gone. That day at noon
She said to Luke, while they two by themselves
Were sitting at the door: 'Thou must not go, 305
We have no other child but thee to lose,
None to remember – do not go away,
For if thou leave thy father he will die.'

The lad made answer with a jocund⁴⁴ voice,
And Isabel, when she had told her fears, 310
Recovered heart. That evening her best fare
Did she bring forth, and all together sat
Like happy people round a Christmas fire.

Next morning Isabel resumed her work,
And all the ensuing week the house appeared 315

As cheerful as a grove in spring. At length
The expected letter from their kinsman came,
With kind assurances that he would do
His utmost for the welfare of the boy –
To which requests were added that forthwith 320
He might be sent to him. Ten times or more
The letter was read over; Isabel
Went forth to show it to the neighbours round;
Nor was there at that time on English land
A prouder heart than Luke's. When Isabel 325
Had to her house returned the old man said,
'He shall depart tomorrow.' To this word
The housewife answered, talking much of things
Which, if at such short notice he should go,
Would surely be forgotten – but at length 330
She gave consent, and Michael was at ease.

Near the tumultuous brook of Greenhead Gill
In that deep valley, Michael had designed
To build a sheepfold,⁴⁵ and before he heard
The tidings of his melancholy loss 335
For this same purpose he had gathered up
A heap of stones, which close to the brook-side
Lay thrown together, ready for the work.

With Luke that evening thitherward⁴⁶ he walked,
And soon as they had reached the place he stopped, 340
And thus the old man spake to him: 'My son,
Tomorrow thou wilt leave me. With full heart
I look upon thee, for thou art the same
That wert a promise to me ere thy birth,
And all thy life hast been my daily joy. 345
I will relate to thee some little part
Of our two histories; 'twill do thee good
When thou art from me, even if I should speak
Of things thou canst not know of. After thou
First cam'st into the world, as it befalls 350

To new-born infants, thou didst sleep away
Two days, and blessings from thy father's tongue
Then fell upon thee. Day by day passed on,
And still I loved thee with increasing love.
Never to living ear came sweeter sounds 355
Than when I heard thee by our own fireside
First uttering without words a natural tune –
When thou, a feeding babe, didst in thy joy
Sing at thy mother's breast. Month followed month,
And in the open fields my life was passed, 360
And in the mountains, else I think that thou
Hadst been brought up upon thy father's knees.
But we were playmates, Luke; among these hills,
As well thou know'st, in us the old and young
Have played together – nor with me didst thou 365
Lack any pleasure which a boy can know.'

Luke had a manly heart, but at these words
He sobbed aloud. The old man grasped his hand,
And said, 'Nay do not take it so – I see
That these are things of which I need not speak. 370
Even to the utmost I have been to thee
A kind and a good father; and herein
I but repay a gift which I myself
Received at others' hands, for, though now old
Beyond the common life of man,⁴⁷ I still 375
Remember them who loved me in my youth.
Both of them sleep together – here they lived
As all their forefathers had done; and when
At length their time was come, they were not loath
To give their bodies to the family mould.⁴⁸ 380
I wished that thou should'st live the life they lived;
But 'tis a long time to look back, my son,
And see so little gain from sixty years.
These fields were burdened when they came to me;⁴⁹
Till I was forty years of age, not more 385

Than half of my inheritance was mine.
I toiled and toiled; God blessed me in my work,
And till these three weeks past the land was free –
It looks as if it never could endure
Another master. Heaven forgive me, Luke, 390
If I judge ill for thee, but it seems good
That thou should'st go.'

At this the old man paused,
Then pointing to the stones near which they stood,
Thus after a short silence he resumed:
'This was a work for us, and now, my son, 395
It is a work for me. But lay one stone –
Here, lay it for me, Luke, with thine own hands –
I for the purpose brought thee to this place.
Nay, boy, be of good hope: we both may live
To see a better day. At eighty-four 400
I still am strong and stout; do thou thy part,
I will do mine. I will begin again
With many tasks that were resigned to thee;
Up to the heights, and in among the storms,
Will I without thee go again, and do 405
All works which I was wont to do alone
Before I knew thy face. Heaven bless thee, boy;
Thy heart these two weeks has been beating fast
With many hopes. It should be so – yes, yes,
I knew that thou could'st never have a wish 410
To leave me, Luke – thou hast been bound to me
Only by links of love. When thou art gone
What will be left to us? But I forget
My purposes. Lay now the corner-stone
As I requested, and hereafter, Luke, 415
When thou art gone away, should evil men
Be thy companions, let this sheepfold be
Thy anchor and thy shield. Amid all fear
And all temptation, let it be to thee
An emblem of the life thy fathers lived, 420

Who, being innocent,⁵⁰ did for that cause
Bestir them in good deeds. Now fare thee well.
When thou return'st, thou in this place wilt see
A work which is not here. A covenant⁵¹
'Twill be between us – but whatever fate 425
Befall thee, I shall love thee to the last,
And bear thy memory with me to the grave.'

The shepherd ended here, and Luke stooped down
And as his father had requested, laid
The first stone of the sheepfold. At the sight 430
The old man's grief broke from him; to his heart
He pressed his son, he kissed him and wept –
And to the house together they returned.

Next morning, as had been resolved, the boy
Began his journey; and when he had reached 435
The public way he put on a bold face,
And all the neighbours as he passed their doors
Came forth with wishes and with farewell prayers
That followed him till he was out of sight.

A good report did from their kinsman come 440
Of Luke and his well-doing; and the boy
Wrote loving letters, full of wondrous news,
Which, as the housewife phrased it, were throughout
The prettiest letters that were ever seen.

Both parents read them with rejoicing hearts. 445

So many months passed on, and once again
The shepherd went about his daily work
With confident and cheerful thoughts; and now
Sometimes when he could find a leisure hour
He to that valley took his way, and there 450
Wrought at the sheepfold. Meantime Luke began
To slacken in his duty, and at length
He in the dissolute city gave himself
To evil courses; ignominy and shame
Fell on him, so that he was driven at last 455

To seek a hiding-place beyond the seas.

There is a comfort in the strength of love,
'Twill make a thing endurable which else
Would break the heart – old Michael found it so.
I have conversed with more than one who well 460
Remember the old man, and what he was
Years after he had heard this heavy news.
His bodily frame had been from youth to age
Of an unusual strength. Among the rocks
He went, and still looked up upon the sun, 465
And listened to the wind, and, as before,
Performed all kinds of labour for his sheep
And for the land, his small inheritance.
And to that hollow dell from time to time
Did he repair, to build the fold of which 470
His flock had need. 'Tis not forgotten yet
The pity which was then in every heart
For the old man; and 'tis believed by all
That many and many a day he thither went,
And never lifted up a single stone. 475

There by the sheepfold sometimes was he seen
Sitting alone, with that his faithful dog –
Then old – beside him, lying at his feet.
The length of full seven years from time to time
He at the building of this sheepfold wrought, 480
And left the work unfinished when he died.52

Three years, or little more, did Isabel
Survive her husband; at her death the estate
Was sold, and went into a stranger's hand.
The cottage which was named The Evening Star 485
Is gone; the ploughshare has been through the ground
On which it stood. Great changes have been wrought
In all the neighbourhood; yet the oak is left
That grew beside their door, and the remains

Of the unfinished sheepfold may be seen 490
Beside the boisterous brook of Greenhead Gill.

Michael: A Pastoral Poem

1 Greenhead Gill Greenhead Gill (a gill is a Lake District term for a mountain stream) is in the Vale of Grasmere, Cumbria. Wordsworth later recalled that this poem was based on memories of a family who once owned Dove Cottage.

2 kite small bird of prey.

3 but such...sky lines indebted to Dorothy's account of her walk with her brother to the sheepfold on 11 October 1800: 'Kites sailing in the sky above our heads – sheep bleating and in lines and chains and patterns scattered over the mountains' (Grasmere Journals 26).

4 man, the heart of man, and human life the subject of Wordsworth's never-completed epic, The Recluse; see 'Prospectus to "The Recluse"', pp. 491–3.

5 history story.

6 rude unsophisticated, simple.

7 a few natural hearts Wordsworth is painfully aware that in relating a story about poor country folk he is working against public taste. The 'few' for whom he saw himself writing would have included, primarily, Dorothy and Coleridge. "Fit audience find, though few!" Thus prayed the bard, / Holiest of men' ('Prospectus to "The Recluse"' 12–13).

8 apt for all affairs suitable for all kinds of work.

9 And grossly...thoughts Wordsworth told the Whig leader, Charles James Fox, that this poem and The Brothers 'were written with a view to show that men who do not wear fine clothes can feel deeply'.

10 Two wheels...work see Wordsworth's comment on the cottage industry of spinning, p. 494 n. 7.

11 inmate dependent.

12 telling counting.

14 oaten cake a kind of bread eaten by local statesmen (for statesmen see p. 495 n. 14).

15 card comb out.

16 sickle, flail, or scythe implements that reveal Michael's other labours: growing hay (cut with the scythe) and corn (cut with the scythe or sickle and threshed with the flail).

30 coppice a small wood.

31 stem stop.

32 office job, work.

33 hire reward.

34 In surety for his brother’s son Michael made himself liable for his nephew’s debt.

35 Long before...substance The failure of his nephew to pay off the loan Michael had guaranteed, using his land as security, means that he is now forced to pay the penalty – a sum amounting to only slightly less than half his entire capital.

36 patrimonial fields the land he had inherited from his forefathers. This poem is preoccupied with the plight of small landowners – families who passed the same small plot of land from one generation to the next over many centuries. When Wordsworth sent Charles James Fox, the Whig leader, a copy of Lyrical Ballads in 1801, he drew his attention to this poem: ‘The domestic affections will always be strong amongst men who live in a country not crowded with population, if these men are placed above poverty. But if they are proprietors of small estates, which have descended to them from their ancestors, the power which these affections will acquire amongst such men is inconceivable by those who have only had an opportunity of observing hired labourers, farmers, and the manufacturing poor. Their little tract of land serves as a kind of permanent rallying point for their domestic feelings, as a tablet upon which they are written, which makes them objects of memory in a thousand instances when they would otherwise be forgotten. It is a fountain fitted to the nature of social man from which supplies of affection, as pure as his heart was intended for, are daily drawn. This class of men is rapidly disappearing' (EY 314–15).

[I travelled among unknown men]
(composed c. 29 April 1801)

From Poems in Two Volumes (1807)

I travelled among unknown men

In lands beyond the sea;¹

Nor, England, did I know till then

What love I bore to thee.

'Tis passed, that melancholy dream! 5

Nor will I quit thy shore

A second time, for still I seem
To love thee more and more.

Among thy mountains did I feel
The joy of my desire; 10
And she I cherished turned her wheel
Beside an English fire.

Thy mornings showed, thy nights concealed
The bowers where Lucy played;
And thine is, too, the last green field 15
Which Lucy's eyes surveyed!

I Travelled Among Unknown Men

¹ I travelled...sea Wordsworth is probably recalling his visit to Germany, 1798–9.

Appendix to the Preface to Lyrical Ballads: On Poetic Diction (extracts) (composed early 1802)¹

From Lyrical Ballads (2 vols, 1802)

As perhaps I have no right to expect from a reader of an introduction to a volume of poems that attentive perusal without which it is impossible, imperfectly as I have been compelled to express my meaning, that what I have said in the preface should throughout be fully understood, I am the more anxious to give an exact notion of the sense in which I use the phrase 'poetic diction'. And for this purpose I will here add a few words concerning the origin of the phraseology which I have condemned under that name.

The earliest poets of all nations generally wrote from passion excited by real events.² They wrote naturally, and as men. Feeling powerfully as they did, their language was daring and figurative. In succeeding times, poets and men ambitious of the fame of poets, perceiving the influence of such language and desirous of producing the same effect without having the same animating passion, set themselves to a mechanical adoption of those figures of speech, and made use of them, sometimes with propriety, but much more frequently applied them to feelings and ideas with which they had no natural connection whatsoever. A language was thus insensibly produced, differing materially from the real language of men in any situation.

The reader or hearer of this distorted language found himself in a perturbed and unusual state of mind; when affected by the genuine language of passion he had been in a perturbed and unusual state of mind also. In both cases he was willing that his common judgement and understanding should be laid asleep, and he had no instinctive and infallible perception of the true³ to make him reject the false; the one served as a passport for the other.⁴ The agitation and confusion of mind were in both cases delightful, and no wonder if he confounded the one with the other, and believed them both to be produced by the same, or similar, causes. Besides, the poet spake to him in the character of a man to be looked up to, a man of genius and authority.

Thus, and from a variety of other causes, this distorted language was received with admiration, and poets (it is probable) who had before contented themselves for the most part with misapplying only expressions which at first had been dictated by real passion, carried the abuse still further, and introduced phrases composed apparently in the spirit of the original figurative language of passion, yet altogether of their own invention, and distinguished by various degrees of wanton deviation from good sense and nature.

It is indeed true that the language of the earliest poets was felt to differ materially from ordinary language because it was the language of extraordinary occasions – but it was really spoken by men, language which the poet himself had uttered when he had been affected by the events which he described, or which he had heard uttered by those around him. To this language it is probable that metre of some sort or other was early superadded. This separated the genuine language of poetry still further from common life, so that whoever read or heard the poems of these earliest poets felt himself moved in a way in which he had not been accustomed to be moved in real life, and by causes manifestly different from those which acted upon him in real life. This was the great temptation to all the corruptions which have followed. Under the protection of this feeling, succeeding poets constructed a phraseology which had one thing, it is true, in common with the genuine language of poetry – namely, that it was not heard in ordinary conversation, that it was unusual. But the first poets, as I have said, spake a language which, though unusual, was still the language of men. This circumstance, however, was disregarded by their successors. They found that they could please by easier means. They became proud of a language which they themselves had invented, and which was uttered only by themselves. And, with the spirit of a fraternity, they arrogated⁵ it to themselves as their own. In process of time metre became a symbol or promise of this unusual language, and whoever took upon him to write in metre, according as he possessed more or less of true poetic genius, introduced less or more of this adulterated phraseology into his compositions, and the true and the false became so inseparably interwoven that the taste of men was gradually perverted, and this language was received as a natural language – and at length, by the influence of books upon men, did to a certain degree really become so.⁶ Abuses of this kind were imported from one nation to another, and with the progress of refinement this diction became daily more and more corrupt, thrusting out of sight the plain humanities of nature by a motley masquerade of tricks, quaintnesses, hieroglyphics,⁷ and enigmas...

Perhaps I can in no way, by positive example, more easily give my reader a notion of what I mean by the phrase ‘poetic diction’ than by referring him to a comparison between the metrical paraphrases which we have of passages in the Old and New Testament, and those passages as they exist in our common translation; see Pope’s ‘Messiah’ throughout; Prior’s ‘Did sweeter sounds adorn my flowing tongue’, etc., etc.; ‘Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels’, etc., etc; see 1 Corinthians 13.

By way of immediate example, take the following of Dr Johnson:

Turn on the prudent ant thy heedless eyes,
Observe her labours, sluggard, and be wise!
No stern command, no monitory voice
Prescribes her duties, or directs her choice;
Yet, timely provident, she hastes away 5
To snatch the blessings of a plenteous day.
When fruitful summer loads the teeming plain,
She crops the harvest and she stores the grain.
How long shall sloth usurp thy useless hours,
Unnerve thy vigour, and enchain thy powers? 10
While artful shades thy downy couch enclose,
And soft solicitation courts repose,
Amidst the drowsy charms of dull delight
Year chases year with unremitting flight;
Till want now following, fraudulent and slow, 15
Shall spring to seize thee, like an ambushed foe.

(The Ant)

From this hubbub of words pass to the original: ‘Go to the ant, thou sluggard, consider her ways and be wise – which having no guide, overseer, or ruler, provideth her meat in the summer, and gathereth her food in the harvest. How long wilt thou sleep, oh sluggard? When wilt thou arise out of thy sleep? Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep. So shall thy poverty come as one that travaileth, and thy want as an armed man’ (Proverbs 6).

One more quotation and I have done. It is from Cowper’s ‘Verses Supposed to be Written by Alexander Selkirk’.

Religion – what treasure untold
Resides in that heavenly word!
More precious than silver and gold
Or all that this earth can afford. 20
But the sound of the church-going bell
These valleys and rocks never heard,
Ne’er sighed at the sound of a knell,

Or smiled when a sabbath appeared.

Ye winds that have made me your sport, 25
Convey to this desolate shore
Some cordial endearing report
Of a land I must visit no more.
My friends, do they now and then send
A wish or a thought after me? 30
Oh tell me I yet have a friend,

Though a friend I am never to see.

I have quoted this passage as an instance of three different styles of composition. The first four lines are poorly expressed. Some critics would call the language prosaic; the fact is it would be bad prose – so bad that it is scarcely worse in metre. The epithet ‘church-going’ applied to a bell (and that by so chaste a writer as Cowper) is an instance of the strange abuses which poets have introduced into their language till they and their readers take them as matters of course, if they do not single them out expressly as objects of admiration. The two lines ‘Ne’er sighed at the sound’, etc., are in my opinion an instance of the language of passion wrested from its proper use, and, from the mere circumstance of the composition being in metre, applied upon an occasion that does not justify such violent expressions – and I should condemn the passage (though perhaps few readers will agree with me) as vicious poetic diction.

The last stanza is throughout admirably expressed. It would be equally good whether in prose or verse, except that the reader has an exquisite pleasure in seeing such natural language so naturally connected with metre. The beauty of this stanza tempts me here to add a sentiment which ought to be the pervading spirit of a system, detached parts of which have been imperfectly explained in the preface – namely, that in proportion as ideas and feelings are valuable, whether the composition be in prose or in verse, they require and exact one and the same language.

Appendix to the Preface to Lyrical Ballads

¹ Wordsworth added this Appendix to his earlier Preface to Lyrical Ballads (1800) when preparing a further edition in early 1802. In the Preface he said that his poems contained ‘little of what is usually called “poetic diction”’ before proceeding to criticize its use in the poetry of Gray and Pope; see p. 511. It was clearly something that required explanation.

² passion excited by real events cf. Wordsworth’s insistence that the proper object of poetry is truth, p. 538 below.

³ the true i.e. the real – real emotions, real objects.

⁴ the one...other in other words, language became detached from reality.

⁵ arrogated claimed.

⁶ by the influence...so The artificial, distorted language of poets was picked up in colloquial speech and thus, to some extent, became the ‘natural language’.

⁷ hieroglyphics words of unknown or mysterious meaning.

Preface to Lyrical Ballads (extracts) (revised text composed January to April 1802)¹

From Lyrical Ballads (2 vols, 1802)

Taking up the subject, then, upon general grounds, I ask what is meant by the word poet? What is a poet? To whom does he address himself? And what language is to be expected from him? He is a man speaking to men – a man (it is true) endued² with more lively sensibility, more enthusiasm and tenderness, who has a greater knowledge of human nature, and a more comprehensive³ soul, than are supposed to be common among mankind; a man pleased with his own passions and volitions,⁴ and who rejoices more than other men in the spirit of life that is in him, delighting to contemplate similar volitions and passions as manifested in the goings-on of the universe,⁵ and habitually impelled to create them where he does not find them.

To these qualities he has added a disposition to be affected more than other men by absent things as if they were present,⁶ an ability of conjuring up in himself passions which are indeed far from being the same as those produced by real events, yet (especially in those parts of the general sympathy which are pleasing and delightful) do more nearly resemble the passions produced by real events than anything which, from the motions of their own minds merely, other men are accustomed to feel in themselves – whence, and from practice, he has acquired a greater readiness and power in expressing what he thinks and feels, and especially those thoughts and feelings which, by his own choice, or from the structure of his own mind, arise in him without immediate external excitement.

But whatever portion of this faculty we may suppose even the greatest poet to possess, there cannot be a doubt but that the language which it will suggest to him must in liveliness and truth fall far short of that which is uttered by men in real life under the actual pressure of those passions – certain shadows of which the poet thus produces, or feels to be produced, in himself.

However exalted a notion we would wish to cherish of the character of a poet, it is obvious that, while he describes and imitates passions, his situation is altogether slavish and mechanical compared with the freedom and power of real and substantial action and suffering. So that it will be the wish of the poet to bring his feelings near to those of the persons whose feelings he describes – nay, for short spaces of time, perhaps, to let himself slip into an entire delusion, and even confound⁷ and identify his own feelings with theirs, modifying only the language which is thus suggested to him by a consideration that he describes for a particular purpose: that of giving pleasure. Here, then, he will apply the principle on which I have so much insisted – namely, that of selection. On this he will depend for removing what would otherwise be painful or disgusting in the passion; he will feel that there is no necessity to trick out⁸ or elevate nature.⁹ And the more industriously he applies this principle, the deeper will be his faith that no words which his fancy or imagination can suggest will be compared with those which are the emanations of reality and truth....

Aristotle, I have been told,¹⁰ hath said that poetry is the most philosophic of all writing.¹¹ It is so. Its object is truth,¹² not individual and local, but general and operative;¹³ not standing upon external testimony, but carried alive into the heart by passion – truth which is its own testimony, which gives strength and divinity to the tribunal to which it appeals, and receives them from the same tribunal.

Poetry is the image of man and nature. The obstacles which stand in the way of the fidelity of the biographer and historian (and of their consequent utility) are incalculably greater than those which are to be encountered by the poet who has an adequate notion of the dignity¹⁴ of his art. The poet writes under one restriction only – namely, that of the necessity of giving immediate pleasure to a human being possessed of that information which may be expected from him, not as a lawyer, a physician, a mariner, an astronomer, or a natural philosopher, but as a man.¹⁵ Except this one restriction, there is no object standing between the poet and the image of things; between this, and the biographer and historian, there are a thousand.

Nor let this necessity of producing immediate pleasure be considered as a degradation of the poet's art; it is far otherwise. It is an acknowledgement of the beauty of the universe, an acknowledgement the more sincere because it is not formal, but indirect; it is a task light and easy to him who looks at the world in the spirit of love. Further, it is a homage paid to the native and naked dignity of man, to the grand elementary principle of pleasure¹⁶ by which he knows, and feels, and lives, and moves....

Preface to Lyrical Ballads

1 In addition to preparing an Appendix to the Preface originally composed for Lyrical Ballads in 1800, Wordsworth revised the Preface itself. As well as adjusting some of the phrasing, he added this passage on the topic, ‘What is a poet?’ It is one of his most important comments on his craft and vocation.

2 endued endowed.

3 more comprehensive more intense, profound and all-embracing.

4 volitions impulses, good deeds.

5 the universe the created world.

6 To these qualities...present So vividly does the poet recall natural objects, which have ‘impressed’ themselves on his mind, that they seem to be present; the process is described in Tintern Abbey 23–50, and elucidated for the first time in ‘Not Useless do I Deem’ 24–8:

And further, by contemplating these forms

In the relations which they bear to man,

We shall discover what a power is theirs

To stimulate our minds, and multiply

The spiritual presences of absent things ...

7 confound confuse; effectively, the poet cannot tell the difference between his own feelings and those of his subject.

8 trick out dress up.

9 nature natural utterance.

10 I have been told probably by Coleridge, who had been a Grecian (a boy in the highest class) at Christ’s Hospital.

11 Aristotle...writing Wordsworth aimed to compose the great philosophical epic of his day – The Recluse (see pp. 422–3). Aristotle thought poetry the most philosophical genre because it shows men not as they are but as they should be.

12 truth effectively, the real world – real people and real things, as opposed to abstract personifications.

13 operative practical.

14 dignity high status.

15 not as...man i.e. the poet is concerned with fidelity to psychological truth, rather than with facts.

16 pleasure positive sensations (spiritual and physical) deriving from our involvement with the external world.

To H.C., Six Years Old (composed probably between 4 March and 4 April 1802)¹

From Poems in Two Volumes (1807)

Oh thou, whose fancies from afar are brought,
Who of thy words dost make a mock apparel,
And fittest to unutterable thought
The breeze-like motion and the self-born carol;
Thou fairy voyager, that dost float 5
In such clear water, that thy boat
May rather seem

To brood on air than on an earthly stream,²
Suspended in a stream as clear as sky,
Where earth and heaven do make one imagery; 10

Oh blessed vision, happy child,
That art so exquisitely wild,
I think of thee with many fears

For what may be thy lot in future years.
I thought of times when Pain might be thy guest, 15
Lord of thy house and hospitality;
And Grief, uneasy lover, never rest
But when she sate within the touch of thee.
Oh too industrious folly!
Oh vain and causeless melancholy! 20
Nature will either end thee quite,
Or, lengthening out thy season of delight,
Preserve for thee, by individual right,
A young lamb's heart among the full-grown flocks.
What hast thou to do with sorrow 25
Or the injuries of tomorrow?
Thou art a dew-drop, which the morn brings forth,
Not doomed to jostle with unkindly shocks,
Or to be trailed along the soiling earth;
A gem that glitters while it lives, 30
And no forewarning gives;
But, at the touch of wrong, without a strife,
Slips in a moment out of life.

To H.C., Six Years Old

¹ Hartley Coleridge (b. 1796) had already featured in Coleridge's Frost at Midnight, Christabel and The Nightingale, and would appear again in Wordsworth's 'Ode' (pp. 549–54). Lucy Newlyn has observed that this poem is 'close to the rhythms and language' of Marvell's On a Drop of Dew (see Coleridge, Wordsworth, and the Language of Allusion (Oxford, 1986), p. 146).

² ‘See Carver’s description of his situation upon one of the lakes of America’ (Wordsworth’s note). Wordsworth has in mind Carver’s account of Lake Superior: ‘The water in general appeared to lie on a bed of rocks. When it was calm, and the sun shone bright, I could sit in my canoe, where the depth was upwards of six fathoms, and plainly see huge piles of stones at the bottom, of different shapes, some of which appeared as if they were hewn. The water at this time was as pure and transparent as air; and my canoe seemed as if it hung suspended in that element. It was impossible to look attentively through this limpid medium at the rocks below, without finding, before many minutes were elapsed, your head swim, and your eyes no longer able to behold the dazzling scene’ (Jonathan Carver, Travels through the interior parts of North America (1778), pp. 132–3).

The Rainbow* (composed probably 26 March 1802)

From Poems in Two Volumes* (1807)

My heart leaps up when I behold rainbow in the sky;
So was it when my life began,
So is it now I am a man,
So be it when I shall grow old 5
 Or let me die!
The child is father of the man,
And I could wish my days to be Bound each to each by natural piety.

These chairs they have no words to utter,
No fire is in the grate to stir or flutter,
The ceiling and floor are mute as a stone,
My chamber is hushed and still,

And I am alone, 5

Happy and alone.

Oh, who would be afraid of life,
The passion, the sorrow, and the strife,

When he may lie

Sheltered so easily – 10

May lie in peace on his bed,

Happy as they who are dead?

Half an hour afterwards

I have thoughts that are fed by the sun;²

The things which I see

Are welcome to me, 15

Welcome every one;

I do not wish to lie

Dead, dead,

Dead, without any company.³

Here alone on my bed, 20

With thoughts that are fed by the sun

And hopes that are welcome every one,

Happy am I.

Oh life, there is about thee

A deep delicious peace; 25

I would not be without thee –

Stay, oh stay!

Yet be thou ever as now,

Sweetness and breath with the quiet of death,

Peace, peace, peace. 30

These Chairs They Have No Words to Utter

¹ These two poems should be read in the light of Dorothy Wordsworth's journal entry of 29 April 1802, pp. 606–7 below.

² I have thoughts that are fed by the sun an echo of Anna Laetitia Barbauld's A Summer Evening's Meditation, in which Contemplation 'fed on thoughts unripened by the sun' (l. 22).

³ without any company Wordsworth echoes Arcite's dying speech in Chaucer's Knight's Tale:

What is this world? What askest men to have?

Now with his love, now in his colde grave

Allone, withouten any compaignye?

(ll. 2777–9)

Resolution and Independence* (composed probably 3 May–4 July 1802)¹

From Poems in Two Volumes* (1807)

There was a roaring in the wind all night,
The rain came heavily and fell in floods;
But now the sun is rising calm and bright,
The birds are singing in the distant woods;

Over his own sweet voice the stockdove broods,² 5
The jay makes answer as the magpie chatters,
And all the air is filled with pleasant noise of waters.

All things that love the sun are out of doors,

The sky rejoices in the morning's birth,
The grass is bright with raindrops, on the moors 10
The hare is running races in her mirth
And with her feet she from the plashy earth
Raises a mist which, glittering in the sun,
Runs with her all the way, wherever she doth run.

I was a traveller then upon the moor;³ 15
I saw the hare that raced about with joy;
I heard the woods and distant waters roar,
Or heard them not, as happy as a boy –
The pleasant season did my heart employ.
My old remembrances went from me wholly, 20
And all the ways of men, so vain and melancholy.

But as it sometimes chanceth, from the might
Of joy in minds that can no farther go,
As high as we have mounted in delight
In our dejection do we sink as low – 25
To me that morning did it happen so,
And fears and fancies thick upon me came,
Dim sadness, and blind thoughts I knew not nor could name.

I heard the skylark singing in the sky,⁴
And I bethought me of the playful hare; 30
Even such a happy child of earth am I,
Even as these blissful creatures do I fare;
Far from the world I walk, and from all care.
But there may come another day to me –
Solitude, pain of heart, distress, and poverty. 35

My whole life I have lived in pleasant thought
As if life's business were a summer mood,
As if all needful things would come unsought
To genial faith, still rich in genial good;

But how can he expect that others should 40
Build for him, sow for him, and at his call
Love him, who for himself will take no heed at all?

I thought of Chatterton,⁵ the marvellous boy,
The sleepless soul that perished in its pride;
Of him⁶ who walked in glory and in joy 45
Behind his plough⁷ upon the mountainside.
By our own spirits are we deified;⁸
We poets in our youth begin in gladness,
But thereof comes in the end despondency and madness.

Now whether it were by peculiar grace,⁹ 50
A leading from above, a something given,
Yet it befell that, in this lonely place,
When up and down my fancy thus was driven,
And I with these untoward thoughts had striven,
I saw a man before me unawares – 55
The oldest man he seemed that ever wore grey hairs.

My course I stopped as soon as I espied
The old man in that naked wilderness;
Close by a pond, upon the further side,
He stood alone. A minute's space I guess 60
I watched him, he continuing motionless.
To the pool's further margin then I drew,
He being all the while before me full in view.

As a huge stone is sometimes seen to lie¹⁰
Couched on the bald top of an eminence, 65
Wonder to all who do the same espy
By what means it could thither come, and whence;
So that it seems a thing endued with sense,
Like a sea-beast crawled forth, which on a shelf

Of rock or sand repositeth, there to sun itself – 70

Such seemed this man, not all alive nor dead,
Nor all asleep, in his extreme old age.
His body was bent double, feet and head
Coming together in their pilgrimage,
As if some dire constraint of pain, or rage 75
Of sickness felt by him in times long past,
A more than human weight upon his frame had cast.

Himself he propped, his body, limbs, and face,
Upon a long grey staff of shaven wood;
And still as I drew near with gentle pace, 80
Beside the little pond or moorish flood,
Motionless as a cloud the old man stood
That heareth not the loud winds when they call,
And moveth altogether, if it move at all.

At length, himself unsettling, he the pond 85
Stirred with his staff, and fixedly did look
Upon the muddy water, which he conned¹¹
As if he had been reading in a book.
And now such freedom as I could I took,
And drawing to his side, to him did say, 90
‘This morning gives us promise of a glorious day.’

A gentle answer did the old man make
In courteous speech which forth he slowly drew,
And him with further words I thus bespake,
‘What kind of work is that which you pursue? 95
This is a lonesome place for one like you.’
He answered me with pleasure and surprise,
And there was, while he spake, a fire about his eyes.

His words came feebly, from a feeble chest,

Yet each in solemn order followed each, 100
With something of a lofty utterance dressed,
Choice word and measured phrase, above the reach
Of ordinary men – a stately speech
Such as grave livers¹² do in Scotland use,
Religious men, who give to God and man their dues. 105

He told me that he to this pond had come
To gather leeches, being old and poor –
Employment hazardous and wearisome!¹³
And he had many hardships to endure;
From pond to pond he roamed, from moor to moor, 110
Housing, with God's good help, by choice or chance;
And in this way he gained an honest maintenance.¹⁴

The old man still stood talking by my side,
But now his voice to me was like a stream
Scarce heard, nor word from word could I divide; 115
And the whole body of the man did seem
Like one whom I had met with in a dream,
Or like a man from some far region sent
To give me human strength, and strong admonishment.

My former thoughts returned: the fear that kills, 120
The hope that is unwilling to be fed,
Cold, pain, and labour, and all fleshly ills,
And mighty poets in their misery dead.
And now, not knowing what the old man had said,
My question eagerly did I renew, 125
'How is it that you live, and what is it you do?'

He with a smile did then his words repeat,
And said that gathering leeches far and wide
He travelled, stirring thus about his feet
The waters of the ponds where they abide. 130

‘Once I could meet with them on every side
But they have dwindled long by slow decay;
Yet still I persevere, and find them where I may.’

While he was talking thus, the lonely place,
The old man’s shape and speech, all troubled me; 135
In my mind’s eye I seemed to see him pace
About the weary moors continually,
Wandering about alone and silently.
While I these thoughts within myself pursued,
He, having made a pause, the same discourse renewed. 140

And soon with this he other matter blended,
Cheerfully uttered, with demeanour kind,
But stately in the main; and when he ended,
I could have laughed myself to scorn to find
In that decrepit man so firm a mind. 145
‘God’, said I, ‘be my help and stay¹⁵ secure;
I’ll think of the leech-gatherer on the lonely moor.’

Resolution and Independence

² Over...broods See Wordsworth’s comments on this line in the 1815 Preface, p. 589.

⁴ I heard...sky cf. The Ancient Mariner (1798) 347–8: ‘Sometimes a-dropping from the sky / I heard the lavrock sing.’

5 During his short life, Thomas Chatterton (1752–70) composed a number of forged medieval poems supposedly by the fifteenth-century poet, Thomas Rowley. Wordsworth and Coleridge both admired these works as schoolboys. It is often noted that this poem imitates the metre of Chatterton’s Excellent Ballade of Charitie.

6 Robert Burns.

7 Behind his plough Burns was a farmer, and in some of his poems, such as ‘To a Mouse’ (pp. 273–5), described himself at the plough.

8 deified made god-like, divine.

9 grace divine influence.

10 For Wordsworth’s important comments on ll. 64–84 see p. 590.

11 conned studied.

12 livers folk.

13 He told me...wearisome Leeches were widely used in medical treatment. Many illnesses, including fevers, were thought to be caused by an excess of blood; leeches were applied to bleed the patient.

14 maintenance living

15 stay support.

[I grieved for Buonaparte] (composed 21 May 1802)¹

From Poems in Two Volumes (1807)

I grieved for Buonaparte,² with a vain
And an unthinking grief! The vital blood
Of that man's mind, what can it be? What food
Fed his first hopes? What knowledge could he gain?
'Tis not in battles³ that from youth we train 5
The Governor who must be wise and good,
And temper with the sternness of the brain
Thoughts motherly, and meek as womanhood.
Wisdom doth live with children round her knees:
Books, leisure, perfect freedom, and the talk 10
Man holds with weekday man in the hourly walk
Of the mind's business: these are the degrees
By which true Sway doth mount; this is the stalk
True Power doth grow on; and her rights are these.

I GRIEVED FOR BUONAPARTE

¹ On the afternoon of 21 May 1802 at Dove Cottage, Dorothy read Milton's sonnets to her brother. He later recalled that 'I was particularly struck on that occasion with the dignified simplicity and majestic harmony that runs through most of them – in character so totally different from the Italian, and still more so from Shakespeare's fine sonnets. I took fire, if I may be allowed to say so, and produced three sonnets the same afternoon' (FN 19). This poem is one of the three composed that afternoon. It was among the first of many remarkable sonnets which Wordsworth would write over the coming months, the best of which are presented in the pages following. This sonnet was a favourite of Wordsworth's brother John, who would perish in the wreck of the Earl of Abergavenny in 1805. In December 1802, having seen it in manuscript, he wrote to Dorothy: 'I am much pleased with William's sonnet to Bonaparte. I think it is well written. It is like the rest of his sonnets which I have seen not much likely to please common people at the first sight, but I think they are very good.' Helpful critical comment on this poem, and other aspects of Wordsworth's feelings towards Napoleon, may be found in Simon Bainbridge, Napoleon and English Romanticism (Cambridge, 1995), chapter 2.

2 Buonaparte Wordsworth kept abreast of current affairs (including Britain's conflict with France) through the newspapers. He was well aware that Napoleon had been made First Consul in 1799, and that his military campaign had been so successful that Britain was the only country from the original alliance to remain independent of French rule. However, war had been going on for nearly a decade, and all sides had tired of it, so that on 27 March 1802 a peace was agreed that would permit Wordsworth to visit France during the summer and be reunited with Annette Vallon. He would then meet their daughter, Caroline, for the first time.

3 'Tis not in battles Wordsworth was aware that Napoleon's education had been almost exclusively in the army: five years at the military college of Brienne, and a year at the military academy of Paris, before (at the age of 16) becoming second lieutenant of artillery in the regiment of La Fère, a kind of training school for young artillery officers.

[The world is too much with us] (composed late May 1802)

From Poems in Two Volumes (1807)

The world is too much with us; late and soon,
Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers:
Little we see in nature that is ours;
We have given our hearts away, a sordid boon!
This sea that bares her bosom to the moon; 5
The winds that will be howling at all hours
And are up-gathered now like sleeping flowers;
For this, for every thing, we are out of tune;

It moves us not. Great God! I'd rather be
A Pagan suckled in a creed outworn; 10
So might I, standing on this pleasant lea,¹
Have glimpses that would make me less forlorn;
Have sight of Proteus coming from the sea;²
Or hear old Triton blow his wreathed horn.³

The World is too much with us

² Have sight...sea cf. Paradise Lost iii 603–4: 'call up unbound / In various shapes old Proteus from the sea.'

³ Have sight...horn cf. Spenser, Colin Clouts Come Home Againe 245–8: 'Triton blowing loud his wreathed horne ... And Proteus eke with him does drive his heard.'

Composed upon Westminster Bridge, 3
September 1802 (composed probably 31
July 1802, possibly revised early September 1802)¹

From Poems in Two Volumes (1807)

Earth has not any thing to show more fair:
Dull would he be of soul who could pass by
A sight so touching in its majesty:
This city now doth like a garment wear
The beauty of the morning; silent, bare, 5
Ships, towers, domes, theatres, and temples lie

Open unto the fields, and to the sky;
All bright and glittering in the smokeless air.
Never did sun more beautifully steep²
In his first splendour valley, rock, or hill; 10
Ne'er saw I, never felt, a calm so deep!
The river glideth at his own sweet will:³
Dear God! the very houses seem asleep;
And all that mighty heart is lying still!

Composed Upon Westminster Bridge

¹ This famous sonnet was inspired by the view from Westminster Bridge, at about 5.30 or 6.30 on the morning of 31 July 1802, as Dorothy and William were heading out of London to France (where Wordsworth would be reunited with Annette Vallon and meet, for the first time, their daughter Caroline). Dorothy described the view in her journal: 'It was a beautiful morning. The City, St Paul's, with the river and a multitude of little boats, made a most beautiful sight as we crossed Westminster Bridge. The houses were not overhung by their cloud of smoke and they were spread out endlessly, yet the sun shone so brightly, with such a pure light, that there was even something like the purity of one of Nature's own grand spectacles. We rode on cheerfully.' Many years later, Wordsworth suggested that the sonnet was written 'on the roof of a coach, on my way to France' (FN 23), which would make the date of composition 31 July 1802, rather than 3 September, though it is possible that he revised his draft on returning to London in early September. For detailed discussion see 'Earth has not any thing to shew more fair', ed. Peter Oswald, Alice Oswald and Robert Woof (Grasmere, 2002).

² steep bathe, envelop.

³ own sweet will Shakespeare, Sonnet 16, 1.14: 'And you must live, drawn by your own sweet will.'

To Toussaint L'Ouverture¹ (composed August 1802)

From Poems in Two Volumes (1807)

Toussaint, the most unhappy man of men!
Whether the rural milkmaid by her cow
Sing in thy hearing, or thou liest now
Alone in some deep dungeon's earless den –
Oh miserable chieftain, where and when 5
Wilt thou find patience? Yet die not! Do thou
Wear rather in thy bonds a cheerful brow;
Though fallen thyself, never to rise again,
Live, and take comfort. Thou hast left behind
Powers that will work for thee – air, earth, and skies; 10
There's not a breathing of the common wind
That will forget thee; thou hast great allies;
Thy friends are exultations, agonies,
And love, and man's unconquerable mind.

To Toussaint L'ouverture

¹ François Dominique Toussaint L'Ouverture (1746–1803), son of a Negro slave, became governor of San Domingo (Haiti), then a French colony, in 1801. He resisted Napoleon's attempts to reintroduce slavery, leading a popular uprising. All slaves were freed, and non-blacks were amazed by his magnanimity. Toussaint made himself governor-general for life, and dictated a constitution that gave him absolute power. He attempted to convince Napoleon of his loyalty while remaining aware that Napoleon did not trust him and would attempt to reassert French rule as soon as he could. As Wordsworth was aware, Napoleon invaded Haiti in January 1802 with a much larger force than expected. After fierce fighting, Toussaint surrendered in May, and by the time Wordsworth composed this sonnet was in France, where he was imprisoned and tortured at the Fort-de-Joux in the French Alps. He would die there, April 1803. His heroic life and death aroused sympathy in England, where the movement for the Abolition of the Slave-Trade was gathering pace.

[It is a beauteous evening, calm and free]
(composed 1–29 August 1802)¹

From Poems in Two Volumes (1807)

It is a beauteous evening, calm and free;
The holy time is quiet as a nun
Breathless with adoration; the broad sun
Is sinking down in its tranquillity;
The gentleness of heaven is on the sea: 5
Listen! The mighty Being is awake
And doth with his eternal motion make
A sound like thunder – everlastingly.
Dear Child!² Dear Girl! that walkest with me here,
If thou appear'st untouched by solemn thought, 10
Thy nature is not therefore less divine:
Thou liest in Abraham's bosom³ all the year;
And worshipp'st at the Temple's inner shrine,
God being with thee when we know it not.

It is a Beauteous Evening, Calm and Free

¹ This poem was composed on the beach at Calais. William and Dorothy took advantage of the Peace of Amiens in the summer of 1802 to visit France to meet his former French girlfriend, Annette Vallon, and their daughter, Caroline Wordsworth, whom he had not previously seen. Dorothy recorded in her journal for August: 'The weather was very hot. We walked by the sea-shore almost every evening with Annette and Caroline, or William and I alone.... The reflections in the water were more beautiful than the sky itself, purple waves brighter than precious stones for ever melting away upon the sands. The fort, a wooden building at the entrance of the harbour at Calais, when the evening twilight was coming on, and we could not see anything of the building but its shape which was far more distinct than in perfect daylight, seemed to be reared upon pillars of ebony, between which pillars the sea was seen in the most beautiful colours that can be conceived. Nothing in Romance was ever half so beautiful.’ Wordsworth wrote several other sonnets at Calais that August – ‘Fair star of evening, splendour of the west’, ‘Is it a reed that’s shaken by the wind’, and ‘Jones! when from Calais southward you and I’, all published in Poems in Two Volumes (1807).

² Dear child Wordsworth’s daughter, Caroline.

³ Abraham’s bosom see Luke 16:22: ‘And it came to pass that the beggar died, and was carried by the angels into Abraham’s bosom.’

1 September 1802 (composed 29 August–1 September 1802)¹

From Poems in Two Volumes (1807)

We had a fellow-passenger who came
From Calais with us, gaudy in array –
A Negro woman, like a lady gay,
Yet silent as a woman fearing blame;
Dejected, meek – yea, pitiably tame 5
She sat, from notice turning not away,
But on our proffered kindness still did lay
A weight of languid speech, or at the same
Was silent, motionless in eyes and face.
She was a Negro woman driv’n from France, 10

Rejected like all others of that race,
Not one of whom may now find footing there;
This the poor outcast did to us declare,
Nor murmured at the unfeeling ordinance.

1 September 1802

¹ Composed during Wordsworth's brief visit to France during the Treaty of Amiens, 1802. In 1827, he added a headnote: 'Among the capricious acts of tyranny that disgraced these times was the chasing of all Negroes from France by decree of the government. We had a fellow-passenger who was one of the expelled.' In the wake of the disastrous San Domingo campaign, Napoleon deported colonial blacks from the French mainland.

London 1802 (composed September 1802)

From Poems in Two Volumes (1807)

Milton, thou shouldst be living at this hour,
England hath need of thee! She is a fen
Of stagnant waters. Altar, sword, and pen,
Fireside, the heroic wealth of hall and bower,
Have forfeited their ancient English dower 5
Of inward happiness. We are selfish men;
Oh raise us up, return to us again,
And give us manners, virtue, freedom, power!
Thy soul was like a star and dwelt apart;
Thou hadst a voice whose sound was like the sea, 10
Pure as the naked heavens, majestic, free –
So didst thou travel on life's common way,
In cheerful godliness, and yet thy heart
The lowliest duties on itself did lay.

[Great men have been among us] (composed summer 1802)

From Poems in Two Volumes (1807)

Great men have been among us; hands that penned
And tongues that uttered wisdom, better none:
The later Sidney, Marvell, Harrington,
Young Vane,¹ and others who called Milton friend.
These moralists could act and comprehend: 5
They knew how genuine glory was put on;
Taught us how rightfully a nation shone
In splendour; what strength was, that would not bend
But in magnanimous meekness. France, 'tis strange,
Hath brought forth no such souls as we had then. 10
Perpetual emptiness! Unceasing change!
No single volume paramount, no code,
No master spirit, no determined road;
But equally a want of books and men!

Great Men Have Been Among Us

¹ Great men...Vane English republicans of the civil war period. Algernon Sidney was a distinguished republican executed for complicity in the Rye House plot, 1683; he was the author of a republican tract, Discourse concerning Civil Government (1698), which Wordsworth probably read while an undergraduate. Wordsworth had also read the work of Andrew Marvell (1621–78), poet, friend and secretary to Milton, by 1795. James Harrington (1611–77) was the author of the republican classic, Commonwealth of Oceana (1656); Wordsworth is likely to have read it during his time in France, 1791–2. Wordsworth admired Milton's sonnet To Henry Vane the Younger, beginning: 'Vane, young in years, but in sage counsel old'. Vane was executed on 14 January 1662.

Ode (from 1815 entitled Ode. Intimations of Immortality from Recollections of Early Childhood) (composed between 27 March 1802 and 6 March 1804)¹

From Poems in Two Volumes (1807)

*Paulò majora canamus.*²

There was a time when meadow, grove, and stream,
The earth, and every common sight,
 To me did seem
 Apparelled in celestial light,
The glory and the freshness of a dream. 5
It is not now as it has been of yore;
 Turn wheresoe'er I may
 By night or day
The things which I have seen I now can see no more.

 The rainbow comes and goes 10
 And lovely is the rose,
 The moon doth with delight
Look round her when the heavens are bare;
 Waters on a starry night
 Are beautiful and fair; 15
 The sunshine is a glorious birth;
 But yet I know, where'er I go,
That there hath passed away a glory from the earth.

Now while the birds thus sing a joyous song,
 And while the young lambs bound 20
 As to the tabor's³ sound,

To me alone there came a thought of grief;
A timely utterance gave that thought relief
And I again am strong.

The cataracts blow their trumpets from the steep – 25
No more shall grief of mine the season wrong;
I hear the echoes through the mountains throng,
The winds come to me from the fields of sleep

And all the earth is gay;

Land and sea 30

Give themselves up to jollity,

And with the heart of May

Doth every beast keep holiday.

Thou child of joy

Shout round me, let me hear thy shouts, thou happy shepherd-boy!

35

Ye blessed creatures, I have heard the call

Ye to each other make; I see

The heavens laugh with you in your jubilee;

My heart is at your festival,

My head hath its coronal⁴ – 40

The fullness of your bliss, I feel, I feel it all.

Oh evil day! if I were sullen

While the earth herself is adorning

This sweet May morning,

And the children are pulling 45

On every side

In a thousand valleys far and wide

Fresh flowers, while the sun shines warm

And the babe leaps up on his mother's arm –

I hear, I hear, with joy I hear! 50

But there's a tree, of many one,

A single field which I have looked upon,

Both of them speak of something that is gone;

The pansy at my feet

Doth the same tale repeat: 55
Whither is fled the visionary gleam?
Where is it now, the glory and the dream?

Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting.
The soul that rises with us, our life's star,
Hath had elsewhere its setting 60

And cometh from afar.⁵
Not in entire forgetfulness,
And not in utter nakedness,
But trailing clouds of glory do we come
From God, who is our home. 65

Heaven lies about us in our infancy!
Shades of the prison-house begin to close
Upon the growing boy,
But he beholds the light and whence it flows,
He sees it in his joy; 70

The youth who daily farther from the east
Must travel, still is nature's priest,
And by the vision splendid
Is on his way attended:
At length the man perceives it die away 75
And fade into the light of common day.

Earth fills her lap with pleasures of her own;
Yearnings she hath in her own natural kind,
And even with something of a mother's mind
And no unworthy aim, 80

The homely nurse doth all she can
To make her foster-child, her inmate man,
Forget the glories he hath known
And that imperial palace whence he came.

Behold the child among his new-born blisses, 85
A four years' darling of a pygmy size!

See where mid work of his own hand he lies,
Fretted by sallies of his mother's kisses
With light upon him from his father's eyes!
See at his feet some little plan or chart, 90
Some fragment from his dream of human life
Shaped by himself with newly-learned art –

A wedding or a festival,

A mourning or a funeral;

And this hath now his heart, 95

And unto this he frames his song.

Then will he fit his tongue

To dialogues of business, love, or strife;

But it will not be long

Ere this be thrown aside, 100

And with new joy and pride

The little actor cons⁶ another part,

Filling from time to time his 'humorous stage'⁷

With all the persons down to palsied Age

That Life brings with her in her equipage⁸ – 105

As if his whole vocation

Were endless imitation.

Thou⁹ whose exterior semblance doth belie

Thy soul's immensity;

Thou best philosopher who yet dost keep 110

Thy heritage; thou eye among the blind

That, deaf and silent, read'st the eternal deep,

Haunted for ever by the eternal mind;

Mighty prophet! Seer blessed!

On whom those truths do rest 115

Which we are toiling all our lives to find;

Thou, over whom thy immortality

Broods like the day, a master o'er a slave,

A presence which is not to be put by,

To whom the grave 120
Is but a lonely bed without the sense or sight
Of day or the warm light,
A place of thought where we in waiting lie;¹⁰
Thou little child, yet glorious in the might
Of untamed pleasures, on thy being's height – 125
Why with such earnest pains dost thou provoke
The years to bring the inevitable yoke,
Thus blindly with thy blessedness at strife?
Full soon thy soul shall have her earthly freight,
And custom lie upon thee with a weight 130
Heavy as frost, and deep almost as life.

Oh joy! that in our embers
Is something that doth live,
That nature yet remembers
What was so fugitive! 135
The thought of our past years in me doth breed
Perpetual benedictions, not indeed
For that which is most worthy to be blessed –
Delight and liberty, the simple creed
Of childhood, whether fluttering or at rest, 140
With new-born hope forever in his breast –
Not for these I raise
The song of thanks and praise;
But for those obstinate questionings
Of sense and outward things,¹¹ 145
Fallings from us, vanishings,¹²
Blank misgivings of a creature
Moving about in worlds not realized,
High instincts before which our mortal nature
Did tremble like a guilty thing surprised;¹³ 150
But for those first affections,
Those shadowy recollections

Which, be they what they may,
Are yet the fountain-light of all our day,
Are yet a master-light of all our seeing; 155
 Uphold us, cherish us, and make
Our noisy years seem moments in the being
Of the eternal silence – truths that wake
 To perish never,
Which neither listlessness nor mad endeavour, 160
 Nor man nor boy,
Nor all that is at enmity with joy
Can utterly abolish or destroy!
 Hence, in a season of calm weather,
 Though inland far we be, 165
Our souls have sight of that immortal sea
 Which brought us hither,
 Can in a moment travel thither
And see the children sport upon the shore,
And hear the mighty waters rolling evermore. 170

Then sing, ye birds; sing, sing a joyous song!
 And let the young lambs bound
 As to the tabor's sound!
We in thought will join your throng,
 Ye that pipe and ye that play, 175
 Ye that through your hearts today
 Feel the gladness of the May!
What though the radiance which was once so bright
Be now for ever taken from my sight?
 Though nothing can bring back the hour 180
Of splendour in the grass, of glory in the flower,
 We will grieve not, rather find
 Strength in what remains behind,
 In the primal sympathy
 Which having been must ever be, 185
 In the soothing thoughts that spring
 Out of human suffering,

In the faith that looks through death,
In years that bring the philosophic mind.

And oh, ye fountains, meadows, hills and groves, 190
Think not of any severing of our loves!
Yet in my heart of hearts I feel your might;
I only have relinquished one delight
To live beneath your more habitual sway.

I love the brooks which down their channels fret¹⁴ 195
Even more than when I tripped lightly as they;
The innocent brightness of a new-born day

Is lovely yet;

The clouds that gather round the setting sun
Do take a sober colouring from an eye 200
That hath kept watch o'er man's mortality;
Another race hath been, and other palms are won.
Thanks to the human heart by which we live,
Thanks to its tenderness, its joys and fears,

To me the meanest flower¹⁵ that blows can give 205
Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears.

Ode

¹ Probably some or all of stanzas 1–4 (ll. 1–57) composed 27 March 1802. Further composition – possibly including some or, less probably, all of stanzas 5–8 – on 17 June 1802. Most of the last seven stanzas probably composed, and the poem completed, early 1804, by 6 March. See also the Fenwick Note to this poem, p. 595.

² ‘Let us sing of somewhat more exalted things’ (Virgil, Eclogue iv 1).

³ tabor a small drum.

⁴ coronal small garland of flowers worn on the head.

5 The soul...afar Wordsworth suggests that we exist, before birth, in spiritual form. For his later comments on pre-existence, see p. 595.

6 cons learns.

7 humorous stage The theatre is peopled by characters with different moods ('humours'). The quotation is from Samuel Daniel's dedicatory sonnet to Musophilus, To the Right Worthy and Judicious Favourer of Virtue, Mr Fulke Grevill 1–2: 'I do not here upon this hum'rous stage / Bring my transformed verse.' Wordsworth is also recalling the seven ages of man speech, As You Like It II vii 139–66.

8 equipage retinue, attendant following.

9 Thou Hartley Coleridge.

10 To whom...lie See Dorothy Wordsworth's journal, pp. 606–7 below, and 'These chairs, they have no words to utter' 11–12. Lines 121–4 were cut from versions of the poem after 1815.

11 obstinate...things The soul constantly challenges the notion that the outward, material reality of the physical world might be all there is.

12 vanishings Years later, Wordsworth is reported to have said, 'There was a time in my life when I had to push against something that resisted, to be sure that there was anything outside me. I was sure of my own mind; everything else fell away and vanished into thought' (WPW iv 467); see also Fenwick Note to this poem, p. 595 below.

13 like a guilty thing surprised cf. Horatio talking about the ghost at Hamlet I i 148–9: 'And then it started like a guilty thing / Upon a fearful summons.'

14 fret move in an agitated manner.

¹⁵ the meanest flower borrowed from Gray, Ode on the Pleasure Arising from Vicissitude 49: 'The meanest flowret of the vale.'

From The Five-Book Prelude (February– March 1804; edited from MS)¹ [The Infant Prodigy] (from Book IV)

Rarely, and with reluctance, would I stoop
To transitory themes,² yet I rejoice –
And, by these thoughts admonished, must speak out
Thanksgivings from my heart – that I was reared
Safe from an evil which these days have laid 375
Upon the children of the land, a pest³
That might have dried me up, body and soul.
Let few words paint it: 'tis a child – no child,
But a dwarf man – in knowledge, virtue, skill,
In what he is not and in what he is, 380
The noontide shadow of a man complete;
A worshipper of worldly seemliness,
Not quarrelsome (for that were far beneath
His dignity), with gifts he bubbles o'er
As generous as a fountain. Selfishness 385
May not come near him, gluttony or pride;
The wandering beggars propagate his name,
Dumb creatures find him tender as a nun.⁴
Yet deem him not for this a naked dish
Of goodness merely, he is garnished out: 390
Arch are his notices,⁵ and nice his sense
Of the ridiculous; deceit and guile
He can look through and through in pleasant spleen,⁶
At the broad follies of the licensed world;⁷

Though shrewd, yet innocent himself withal, 395
And can read lectures upon innocence.⁸
He is fenced round – nay armed, for aught we know,
In panoply complete;⁹ and fear itself,
Unless it leap upon him in a dream,
Touches him not.¹⁰ In brief, the moral part 400
Is perfect; in learning and in books
He is a prodigy. His discourse moves slow,
Massy and ponderous as a prison door,
Tremendously embossed with terms of art;¹¹
With propositions are the younker's¹² brains 405
Filled to the brim; the path in which he treads
Is choked with grammars; cushion of divine
Was never such a type of thought profound
As is the pillow where he rests his head.¹³
The ensigns of the empire which he holds, 410
The globe and sceptre of his royalties,
Are telescopes and crucibles and maps.¹⁴
Ships he can guide across the pathless sea,
And tell you all their cunning;¹⁵ he can read
The inside of the earth, and spell the stars; 415
He knows the policies of foreign lands,
Can string you names of districts, cities, towns
The whole world over,¹⁶ tight as beads of dew
Upon a gossamer thread! His teachers stare,
The country people pray for God's good grace 420
And shudder at his deep experiments.¹⁷
He sifts, he weighs, takes nothing upon trust –¹⁸
All things are put to question. He must live
Knowing that he grows wiser every day
Or else not live at all¹⁹ – and seeing too 425
Each little drop of wisdom as it falls

Into the dimpling cistern²⁰ of his heart.²¹
Meanwhile old Grandam Earth is grieved to find
The playthings which her love designed for him
Unthought of: in their woodland beds the flowers 430
Weep, and the riversides are all forlorn.

Now this is hollow, 'tis a life of lies
From the beginning, and in lies must end.
Forth bring him to the air of common sense,
And, fresh and showy as it is, the corpse 435
Slips from us into powder. Vanity,
That is his soul, there lives he, and there moves –
It is the soul of everything he seeks;
That gone, nothing is left which he can love.
Nay, if a thought of purer birth should rise 440
To carry him towards a better clime,
Some busy helper still is on the watch
To drive him back, and pound²² him like a stray
Within the pifold²³ of his own conceit,
Which is his home, his natural dwelling-place. 445
Oh, give us once again the wishing-cap
Of Fortunatus, and the invisible coat
Of Jack the giant-killer, Robin Hood,
And Sabra in the forest with St George!²⁴
The child whose love is here at least does reap 450
One precious gain – that he forgets himself.²⁵

These mighty workmen of our latter age²⁶
Who with a broad highway have overbridged
The froward²⁷ chaos of futurity,²⁸
Tamed to their bidding; they who have the art 455
To manage books, and things, and make them work
Gently on infant minds as does the sun
Upon a flower – the tutors of our youth,
The guides, the wardens of our faculties

And stewards of our labour, watchful men 460
And skilful in the usury of time,
Sages who in their prescience would control
All accidents, and to the very road which they
Have fashioned would confine us down
Like engines²⁹ – when will they be taught 465
That in the unreasoning progress of the world
A wiser spirit is at work for us,
A better eye than theirs, most prodigal
Of blessings and most studious of our good,
Even in what seem our most unfruitful hours? 470

From The Five-Book Prelude

¹ In February–March 1804, Wordsworth appears to have reconceived The Two-Part Prelude as a poem in Five Books. A final version seems never to have been completed, because he continued writing until he had produced enough poetry for thirteen Books. In the process he composed some passages of poetry that do not survive elsewhere in the same form. The most important is this uncharacteristic satire on educational theorists. Had the Five-Book version of The Prelude been completed, it would have been followed by ‘There was a boy’, published as an independent poem in Lyrical Ballads (1800) (pp. 484–5). The portrait of the Infant Prodigy was later revised to form Thirteen-Book Prelude v 223–9, 294–388.

² transitory themes Wordsworth rightly recognized the controversy over different ways of educating children to be of its time.

³ pest plague. Wordsworth’s target is the tradition of educationalists who followed in the wake of Locke’s Some thoughts concerning education (1693). These include Rousseau’s Emile (1762) – which Wordsworth had read by 1796; Richard and Maria Edgeworth’s Practical Education (1798) (read by Coleridge shortly after publication) and Thomas Day’s Sandford and Merton (1783–6). See also James

Chandler, 'Wordsworth, Rousseau and the Politics of Education', in Romanticism: A Critical Reader, ed. Duncan Wu (1995), pp. 57–83, and Alan Richardson, Literature, Education and Romanticism (Cambridge, 1994), pp. 51–8.

4 Selfishness...nun Thomas Day's protagonist, Harry Sandford, is 'brave, generous to beggars, kind to animals, even cockchafers, calm in the presence of an angry bull. Even the cattle were glad when he came back after an absence.' The literary model is Chaucer's portrait of the prioress (General Prologue 118–62).

5 Arch are his notices His observations are clever, crafty, even mischievous.

6 pleasant spleen amusement, as at Twelfth Night III ii 68–9: 'If you desire the spleen, and will laugh yourselves into stitches, follow me.'

7 He can...world He is licensed to ignore deceit and guile, and other 'follies'.

8 And can read...innocence richly ironic. The child's sophistication belies his 'goodness'. He is in no position to speak learnedly on the subject of innocence.

9 panoply complete full armour; cf. Cowper's satirical portrait of the clergyman, 'armed himself in panoply complete' (Task ii 345).

10 fear itself...touches him not Without fear, the infant prodigy is deprived of a principal formative influence; cf. The Two-Part Prelude i 139–41.

11 terms of art technical jargon.

12 younker's youngster's.

13 cushion of divine...head The prodigy's pillow is a better symbol ('type') of profound thought than the cushion on which the parson rests his Bible in front of a pulpit. The image is suggested by Cowper's 'plump convivial parson' who 'lays'

His rev'rence and his worship both to rest

On the same cushion of habitual sloth.

(Task iv 597–8)

14 maps The scientific instruments and maps indicate the prodigy's intellectual authority, just as flags ('ensigns'), orb and sceptre symbolize a king's sovereignty.

15 cunning secrets (of their operation).

16 He knows...over cf. John Locke, Some Thoughts Concerning Education: 'I now live in the house with a child ... [who] knew the limits of the four parts of the world, could readily point, being asked, to any country upon the globe ... and could find the longitude and latitude of any place, before he was six years old.'

17 The country people, in their ignorance, fear the prodigy may be seeking forbidden knowledge.

18 he sifts...trust cf. Coleridge's outrage at this tendency, in a letter to Poole, 16 October 1797: 'I have known some who have been rationaly educated, as it is styled. They were marked by a microscopic acuteness; but when they looked at great things, all became a blank and they saw nothing – and denied (very illogically) that any thing could be seen... [they] called the want of imagination Judgment, and the never being moved to rapture Philosophy!' (Griggs i 354–5).

19 He must live...at all Wordsworth regarded knowledge, as opposed to understanding, as redundant: 'Lastly comes that class of objects which are interesting almost solely because they are known, and the knowledge may be displayed; and this unfortunately comprehends three fourths of what, according to the plan of modern education, children's heads are stuffed with, that is, minute remote or trifling facts in geography, topography, natural history, chronology etc., or acquisitions in art, or accomplishments which the child makes by rote and which are quite beyond its age' (MY i 287).

20 dimpling cistern The surface of the water in the barrel ('cistern') dimples with each drop that falls into it.

21 Cf. the manner in which the Wordsworths reared Basil Montagu at Alfoxden: 'You ask to be informed of our system respecting Basil; it is a very simple one, so simple that in this age of systems you will hardly be likely to follow it. We teach him nothing at present but what he learns from the evidence of his senses. He has an insatiable curiosity which we are always careful to satisfy to the best of our ability. It is directed to everything he sees, the sky, the fields, trees, shrubs, corn, the making of tools, carts, etc., etc., etc. He knows his letters, but we have not attempted any further step in the path of book learning. Our grand study has been to make him happy' (EY 180).

22 pound impound.

23 pinfold enclosure for stray animals.

24 Fortunatus' hat took him wherever he wanted; Jack's coat made him invisible while killing giants; St George married Sabra, daughter of the King of Egypt, after rescuing her from a dragon.

25 Wordsworth recommended that children be allowed to read 'fairy tales, romances, the best biographies and histories, and such parts of natural history relating to the powers and appearances of the earth and elements, and the habits and structures of animals, as belong to it not as an art or science, but as a magazine of form and feeling' (MY i 287). See also Coleridge on fairy-tales, p. 638.

26 Lines 452–70 derive from a fragment probably composed in Goslar during the winter of 1798–9, intended as an introduction to ‘There was a boy’.

27 froward wayward, uncontrollable.

28 Who with a broad highway...futuraity Educationalists are compared to Milton’s Sin and Death who in Paradise Lost build a bridge over Chaos to their new empire on earth (x 282–305).

29 engines Educational theories are as imprisoning as manufacturing machines – machine-looms, for instance – which were just coming into use.

Daffodils [‘I wandered lonely as a cloud’] (composed March 1804–April 1807)¹

From Poems (1815)²

I wandered lonely as a cloud
That floats on high o’er vales and hills,
When all at once I saw a crowd,
A host of golden daffodils;³
Beside the lake, beneath the trees, 5
Fluttering and dancing in the breeze.

Continuous as the stars that shine
And twinkle on the milky way,
They stretched in never-ending line
Along the margin of a bay: 10
Ten thousand saw I at a glance,
Tossing their heads in sprightly dance.

The waves beside them danced, but they
Outdid the sparkling waves in glee: –
A Poet could not but be gay 15
In such a jocund company:
I gazed – and gazed – but little thought
What wealth the show to me had brought:

For oft when on my couch I lie
In vacant or in pensive mood, 20
They flash upon that inward eye
Which is the bliss of solitude,⁴
And then my heart with pleasure fills,
And dances with the daffodils.

Daffodils

¹ For the incident that inspired this poem see Dorothy Wordsworth's journal, p. 606 below. In 1815 Wordsworth attached a note: 'The subject of these stanzas is rather an elementary feeling and simple impression (approaching to the nature of an ocular spectrum) upon the imaginative faculty, than an exertion of it.' For further discussion of the poem and its background see Pamela Woof and Madeline Harley, The Wordsworths and the Daffodils (Grasmere, 2002).

² Daffodils was first published in Poems in Two Volumes (1807), without the second stanza, which was added for its appearance in Poems (1815). It is considered to be one of Wordsworth's most felicitous additions to any of his works. Wordsworth never published it with a title, although he referred to it privately as Daffodils from May 1807 onwards.

³ daffodils not the garden daffodils of today but the small, pale and wild Narcissus pseudonarcissus.

⁴ They flash...solitude These two lines were written by Wordsworth's wife, Mary. Coleridge commented in his notebook, 1808–11: "To flash upon that inward eye / Which is the bliss of solitude” – and to make every thing present by a series of images – this an absolute essential of poetry, and of itself would form a poet, though not of the highest class’ (Notebooks iii 3247).

Stepping Westward (composed 3 June 1805)

From Poems in Two Volumes (1807)

While my fellow-traveller and I were walking by the side of Loch Ketterine one fine evening after sunset,¹ in our road to a hut² where, in the course of our tour, we had been hospitably entertained some weeks before, we met in one of the loneliest parts of that solitary region two well-dressed women, one of whom said to us by way of greeting, ‘What you are stepping westward?’

‘What you are stepping westward?’ ‘Yea.’
’Twould be a wildish destiny
If we, who thus together roam
In a strange land, and far from home,
Were in this place the guests of Chance – 5
Yet who would stop, or fear to advance,
Though home or shelter he had none,
With such a sky to lead him on?

The dewy ground was dark and cold;
Behind, all gloomy to behold; 10
And stepping westward seemed to be
A kind of heavenly destiny.
I liked the greeting – ’twas a sound
Of something without place or bound,
And seemed to give me spiritual right 15
To travel through that region bright.

The voice was soft, and she who spake
Was walking by her native lake;
The salutation had to me
The very sound of courtesy: 20
Its power was felt, and while my eye
Was fixed upon the glowing sky,
The echo of the voice enwrought³
A human sweetness with the thought
Of travelling through the world that lay 25
Before me in my endless way.

Stepping Westward

² hut cottage.

³ enwrought interwove, combined.

The Solitary Reaper (composed 5 November 1805)¹

From Poems in Two Volumes (1807)

Behold her, single in the field,
Yon solitary highland lass!
Reaping and singing by herself –
Stop here, or gently pass!
Alone she cuts, and binds the grain, 5
And sings a melancholy strain;
Oh listen! for the vale profound
Is overflowing with the sound.

No nightingale did ever chaunt
So sweetly to reposing bands 10
Of travellers in some shady haunt
Among Arabian sands;
No sweeter voice was ever heard
In springtime from the cuckoo-bird,
Breaking the silence of the seas 15
Among the farthest Hebrides.

Will no one tell me what she sings?
Perhaps the plaintive numbers flow
For old, unhappy, far-off things
And battles long ago; 20
Or is it some more humble lay,
Familiar matter of today?
Some natural sorrow, loss, or pain
That has been, and may be again?

Whate'er the theme, the maiden sang 25

As if her song could have no ending;
I saw her singing at her work
And o'er the sickle bending;
I listened till I had my fill,
And as I mounted up the hill, 30
The music in my heart I bore
Long after it was heard no more.

The Solitary Reaper

¹ ‘This poem was suggested by a beautiful sentence in a MS tour in Scotland written by a friend, the last line being taken from it verbatim’ (Wordsworth’s note). Thomas Wilkinson, the Lake District poet, was a friend of Wordsworth, and his Tours to the British Mountains was published in 1824. The sentence that inspired Wordsworth runs as follows: ‘Passed a female who was reaping alone: she sung in Erse as she bended over her sickle; the sweetest human voice I ever heard: her strains were tenderly melancholy, and felt delicious, long after they were heard no more’ (p. 12).

From The Thirteen-Book Prelude (composed 1804–6; edited from MS)¹

[The Arab Dream] (from Book V)²

Hitherto
In progress through this verse, my mind hath looked Upon the speaking face of earth and heaven³
As her prime teacher, intercourse with man
Established by the sovereign intellect 15
Who through that bodily image hath diffused
A soul divine which we participate,⁴

A deathless spirit. Thou also, man, hast wrought,
For commerce of thy nature with itself,
Things worthy of unconquerable life;⁵ 20
And yet we feel, we cannot choose but feel
That these must perish. Tremblings of the heart
It gives to think that the immortal being
No more shall need such garments; and yet man,
As long as he shall be the child of earth, 25
Might almost 'weep to have'⁶ what he may lose,
Nor be himself extinguished, but survive
Abject, depressed, forlorn, disconsolate.⁷
A thought is with me sometimes, and I say:
'Should earth by inward throes be wrenched throughout, 30
Or fire⁸ be sent from far to wither all
Her pleasant habitations, and dry up
Old ocean in his bed, left singed and bare,
Yet would the living presence still subsist
Victorious, and composure would ensue, 35
And kindlings like the morning – presage sure
(Though slow perhaps) of a returning day.
But all the meditations of mankind,
Yea, all the adamantine holds⁹ of truth
By reason built, or passion¹⁰ (which itself 40
Is highest reason in a soul sublime),
The consecrated works of bard and sage,¹¹
Sensuous or intellectual, wrought by men,
Twin labourers and heirs of the same hopes –
Where would they be? Oh, why hath not the mind 45
Some element to stamp her image on
In nature somewhat nearer to her own?¹²
Why, gifted with such powers to send abroad
Her spirit, must it lodge in shrines so frail?'¹³
One day, when in the hearing of a friend¹⁴ 50

I had given utterance to thoughts like these,
He answered with a smile that in plain truth
'Twas going far to seek disquietude;¹⁵
But on the front¹⁶ of his reproof confessed
That he at sundry seasons had himself 55
Yielded to kindred hauntings¹⁷ – and forthwith
Added that once upon a summer's noon
While he was sitting in a rocky cave
By the sea-side (perusing, as it chanced,
The famous history of the errant knight 60
Recorded by Cervantes),¹⁸ these same thoughts
Came to him, and to height unusual rose
While listlessly he sat, and, having closed
The book, had turned his eyes towards the sea.
On poetry and geometric truth 65
(The knowledge that endures), upon these two
And their high privilege of lasting life
Exempt from all internal injury,¹⁹
He mused; upon these chiefly – and at length,
His senses yielding to the sultry air, 70
Sleep seized him and he passed into a dream.
He saw before him an Arabian waste,
A desert, and he fancied that himself
Was sitting there in the wide wilderness
Alone upon the sands. Distress of mind 75
Was growing in him when, behold, at once
To his great joy a man was at his side,
Upon a dromedary mounted high!
He seemed an Arab of the bedouin tribes;
A lance he bore,²⁰ and underneath one arm 80
A stone, and in the opposite hand a shell
Of a surpassing brightness. Much rejoiced
The dreaming man that he should have a guide
To lead him through the desert, and he thought –

While questioning himself what this strange freight 85
Which the newcomer carried through the waste
Could mean – the Arab told him that the stone
(To give it in the language of the dream)

Was Euclid's Elements.²¹ ““And this”, said he,
“This other”, pointing to the shell, “this book, 90
Is something of more worth.” And at the word
The stranger’, said my friend continuing,
‘Stretched forth the shell towards me, with command
That I should hold it to my ear. I did so,
And heard that instant in an unknown tongue, 95
Which yet I understood, articulate sounds,
A loud prophetic blast of harmony,
An ode in passion uttered, which foretold
Destruction to the children of the earth
By deluge now at hand.’

No sooner ceased 100

The song, but with calm look the Arab said
That all was true, that it was even so
As had been spoken, and that he himself
Was going then to bury those two books –
The one that held acquaintance with the stars 105
And wedded man to man by purest bond
Of nature, undisturbed by space or time;
The other that was a god – yea, many gods,
Had voices more than all the winds, and was
A joy, a consolation, and a hope. 110
My friend continued, ‘Strange as it may seem,
I wondered not, although I plainly saw
The one to be a stone, the other a shell,
Nor doubted once but that they both were books,
Having a perfect faith in all that passed. 115

A wish was now engendered²² in my fear
To cleave unto²³ this man, and I begged leave
To share his errand with him. On he passed

Not heeding me; I followed, and took note
That he looked often backward with wild look, 120
Grasping his twofold treasure to his side.
Upon a dromedary, lance in rest
He rode, I keeping pace with him; and now
I fancied that he was the very knight
Whose tale Cervantes tells, yet not the knight, 125
But was an Arab of the desert too –
Of these was neither, and was both at once.
His countenance meanwhile grew more disturbed,
And, looking backwards when he looked, I saw
A glittering light, and asked him whence it came. 130
“It is”, said he, “the waters of the deep
Gathering upon us.” Quickening then his pace,
He left me. I called after him aloud;
He heeded not, but with his twofold charge²⁴
Beneath his arm, before me, full in view, 135
I saw him riding o’er the desert sands
With the fleet waters of the drowning world
In chase of him. Whereat I waked in terror,
And saw the sea before me, and the book
In which I had been reading at my side.’ 140
Full often, taking from the world of sleep
This Arab phantom which my friend beheld,
This semi-Quixote, I to him have given
A substance, fancied him a living man,
A gentle dweller in the desert, crazed 145
By love and feeling and internal thought
Protracted among endless solitudes –
Have shaped him, in the oppression of his brain,²⁵
Wandering upon this quest, and thus equipped.
And I have scarcely pitied him, have felt 150
A reverence for a being thus employed,
And thought that in the blind and awful lair
Of such a madness, reason did lie couched.

Enow²⁶ there are on earth to take in charge
Their wives, their children, and their virgin loves, 155
Or whatsoever else the heart holds dear –
Enow to think of these; yea, will I say,
In sober contemplation of the approach
Of such great overthrow, made manifest
By certain evidence, that I methinks 160
Could share that maniac's anxiousness, could go
Upon like errand. Oftentimes, at least,
Me hath such deep entrancement half possessed
When I have held a volume in my hand
(Poor earthly casket of immortal verse) –²⁷ 165
Shakespeare or Milton, labourers divine!

From The Thirteen-Book Prelude

¹ Wordsworth began work on the Thirteen-Book Prelude as soon as he abandoned and dismembered the Five-Book version of the poem in early March 1804. As it happens, The Arab Dream was originally composed at the same time as the Five-Book poem, about February 1804, but not apparently included in it. Evidently, Wordsworth knew exactly where he wished to place it when he expanded the poem in March.

² The title of Book V is 'Books', though in fact Wordsworth is preoccupied less with the literary works that have most influenced him than with explaining the purpose of artistic endeavour, and its place within the larger scheme of things.

³ the speaking face of earth and heaven Wordsworth has in mind Coleridge's account of nature as 'The lovely shapes and sounds intelligible / Of that eternal language which thy God / Utters' (Frost at Midnight 64–6).

4 intercourse...participate God has diffused his divine soul through the medium of the natural world (his 'bodily image'), and is thus enabled to engage in converse with man.

5 Things worthy of unconquerable life i.e. works of art that deserve to be immortal.

6 weep to have Shakespeare, Sonnet 64: 'This thought is as a death, which cannot choose / But weep to have that which it fears to lose' (ll. 13–14).

7 yet man...disconsolate Man, while still living ('unextinguished'), must regret possession of earthly achievements that he fears losing, and live on, abject, and disconsolate.

8 fire Some of Wordsworth's ideas here may derive from Thomas Burnet's Sacred Theory of the Earth, Book III of which is entitled 'Concerning the Conflagration'; Wordsworth owned a copy of Burnet at Rydal Mount.

9 adamantine holds indestructible fortresses.

10 passion emotion; 'Poetry is passion: it is the history or science of feelings' (Note to The Thorn, p. 519).

11 The consecrated...sage works of the imagination and the intellect.

12 Oh why...own Wordsworth laments the fact that there is no substance as durable as the mind itself (which he regards as immortal), on which its thoughts might be recorded.

13 shrines so frail i.e. books.

14 a friend Coleridge; though in the Fourteen-Book Prelude the dreamer becomes Wordsworth.

15 disquietude anxiety.

16 on the front immediately after.

17 kindred hauntings similar anxieties.

18 The famous history...Cervantes Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra, Don Quixote, which Wordsworth and Coleridge knew from early childhood.

19 Exempt...injury Poetry and geometry may be subject to external injury (that is to say, books can be damaged), but are perfect in themselves.

20 A lance he bore shades of the Don, who famously used his lance to tilt at windmills.

21 Euclid's Elements Euclid was a Greek mathematician of the third century BCE, whose Elements was the basic textbook of geometry used by Wordsworth at Hawkshead and Cambridge.

22 engendered created.

23 cleave unto stick to.

24 charge burden.

25 oppression of his brain derangement, anxiety.

26 Enow enough.

27 Poor earthly casket of immortal verse a paradox: verse, which is immortal, is contained within the casket, or coffin, of the book.

[Crossing the Alps] (from Book VI)¹

That day we first
 Beheld the summit of Mont Blanc, and grieved
 To have a soulless image on the eye
 Which had usurped upon a living thought 455
 That never more could be.² The wondrous Vale
 Of Chamouny did on the following dawn,
 With its dumb cataracts and streams of ice,
 A motionless array of mighty waves,
 Five rivers broad and vast, make rich amends, 460
 And reconciled us to realities.
 There small birds warble from the leafy trees,
 The eagle soareth in the element;
 There doth the reaper bind the yellow sheaf,
 The maiden spread the haycock in the sun, 465
 While winter like a tamed lion walks,
 Descending from the mountain to make sport
 Among the cottages by beds of flowers.
 Whate'er in this wide circuit we beheld
 Or heard was fitted to our unripe state 470
 Of intellect and heart. By simple strains
 Of feeling, the pure breath of real life,
 We were not left untouched. With such a book³
 Before our eyes we could not choose but read
 A frequent lesson of sound tenderness, 475
 The universal reason of mankind,
 The truth of young and old. Nor, side by side
 Pacing, two brother pilgrims, or alone
 Each with his humour, could we fail to abound
 (Craft this which hath been hinted at before) 480
 In dreams and fictions pensively composed,
 Dejection taken up for pleasure's sake,
 And gilded sympathies. The willow wreath,
 Even among those solitudes sublime,
 And sober posies of funereal flowers 485
 Culled from the gardens of the Lady Sorrow,

Did sweeten many a meditative hour.⁴
Yet still in me, mingling with these delights,
Was something of stern mood, an under-thirst⁵
Of vigour never utterly asleep. 490
Far different dejection once was mine,
A deep and genuine sadness then I felt,
The circumstances I will here relate
Even as they were. Upturning with a band
Of travellers, from the Valais we had clomb⁶ 495
Along the road that leads to Italy;
A length of hours, making of these our guides
Did we advance, and having reached an inn
Among the mountains, we together ate
Our noon's repast, from which the travellers rose 500
Leaving us at the board. Erelong we followed,
Descending by the beaten road that led
Right to a rivulet's edge, and there broke off.
The only track now visible was one
Upon the further side, right opposite, 505
And up a lofty mountain. This we took
After a little scruple⁷ and short pause,
And climbed with eagerness – though not, at length
Without surprise and some anxiety
On finding that we did not overtake 510
Our comrades gone before. By fortunate chance,
While every moment now increased our doubts,
A peasant met us, and from him we learned
That to the place which had perplexed⁸ us first
We must descend, and there should find the road 515
Which in the stony channel of the stream
Lay a few steps, and then along its banks –
And further, that thenceforward all our course
Was downwards with the current of that stream.
Hard of belief, we questioned him again, 520

And all the answers which the man returned
To our enquiries, in their sense and substance,
Translated by the feelings which we had,
Ended in this – that we had crossed the Alps.

Imagination! lifting up itself 525
Before the eye and progress of my song
Like an unfathered vapour; here that power,
In all the might of its endowments, came
Athwart me. I was lost as in a cloud,
Halted without a struggle to break through, 530
And now, recovering, to my soul I say,

‘I recognize thy glory’.⁹ In such strength
Of usurpation,¹⁰ in such visitings
Of awful promise, when the light of sense
Goes out in flashes that have shown to us 535
The invisible world, doth greatness make abode,
There harbours whether we be young or old.
Our destiny, our nature, and our home,
Is with infinitude, and only there –
With hope it is, hope that can never die, 540
Effort, and expectation, and desire,

And something evermore about to be.¹¹
The mind beneath such banners militant¹²
Thinks not of spoils or trophies, nor of aught
That may attest its prowess, blessed in thoughts 545
That are their own perfection and reward –
Strong in itself, and in the access of joy
Which hides it like the overflowing Nile.

The dull and heavy slackening which ensued
Upon those tidings by the peasant given 550
Was soon dislodged. Downwards we hurried fast,
And entered with the road which we had missed
Into a narrow chasm. The brook and road
Were fellow-travellers in this gloomy pass,

And with them did we journey several hours 555
 At a slow step. The immeasurable height
 Of woods decaying, never to be decayed,
 The stationary blasts of waterfalls,
 And everywhere along the hollow rent¹³
 Winds thwarting winds, bewildered and forlorn, 560
 The torrents shooting from the clear blue sky,
 The rocks that muttered close upon our ears,
 Black drizzling crags that spake by the wayside
 As if a voice were in them, the sick¹⁴ sight
 And giddy prospect of the raving stream, 565
 The unfettered clouds and region of the heavens,
 Tumult and peace, the darkness and the light,
 Were all like workings of one mind, the features
 Of the same face, blossoms upon one tree,
 Characters¹⁵ of the great Apocalypse,¹⁶ 570
 The types¹⁷ and symbols of eternity,
 Of first, and last, and midst, and without end.¹⁸

Crossing the Alps

¹ Wordsworth is recounting his tour of the Continent in summer 1790, which he undertook with his College friend, Robert Jones.

² That day...be The actual image of the mountain displaced, in the mind, the image of the unseen mountain, which was more ‘alive’ because it was imaginatively generated.

³ book the book of nature.

⁴ The willow wreath...hour The somewhat artificial manner of all this indicates that Wordsworth is affectionately mocking his youthful self, preoccupied with poetic sorrows.

5 under-thirst a typically original way of talking about his inner world.

6 clomb climbed.

7 scruple moment.

8 perplexed confused.

9 Imagination...glory Against the moment in August 1790 when his imagination had been disappointed, Wordsworth places the ‘glory’ of the present (i.e. the moment of composition, spring 1804).

10 usurpation another usurpation (cf. l. 455 above). This time, however, the usurpation proves the strength, rather than the weakness, of the imagination; it may sound forced, but Wordsworth needs to believe that the imagination can overcome the deadening influences of reality.

11 something evermore about to be Few phrases more succinctly characterize Wordsworth’s literary personality; in his poetry sublimity is always beyond reach.

12 such banners militant i.e. effort, expectation, and desire, and something evermore about to be.

13 rent ravine.

14 sick probably means ‘sickening’, given the ‘giddy prospect’ in the next line.

15 Characters letters.

16 Characters...Apocalypse Contemporary geological theory held that all but the highest Alpine peaks were created by the retreating waters of the Flood. Thus the features of the landscape would indeed have been engraved (‘charactered’) by the first apocalyptic event in the history of mankind. They also function as a reminder of the apocalypse to come.

¹⁷ types letters, as in typeface.

¹⁸ The unfettered clouds...without end Wordsworth's source is Pope, Essay on Man ii 266–72:

All are but parts of one stupendous whole, Whose body nature is, and
God the soul,

That (changed through all, and yet in all the same) ...

Warms in the sun, refreshes in the breeze,

Glowes in the sun, and blossoms in the trees ...

Line 571 echoes Milton's description of God, Paradise Lost v 165: 'Him first, Him last, Him midst, and without end.'

[The London Beggar] (from Book VII)¹

Oh friend,² one feeling was there which belonged

To this great city by exclusive right:

How often in the overflowing streets

Have I gone forwards with the crowd, and said 595

Unto myself, 'The face of everyone

That passes by me is a mystery!'

Thus have I looked, nor ceased to look, oppressed

By thoughts of what and whither, when and how,

Until the shapes before my eyes became 600

A second-sight³ procession, such as glides

Over still mountains, or appears in dreams,

And all the ballast of familiar life –

The present and the past, hope, fear, all stays,⁴

All laws, of acting, thinking, speaking man – 605

Went from me, neither knowing me, nor known.

And once, far travelled in such mood, beyond

The reach of common indications, lost

Amid the moving pageant, 'twas my chance

Abruptly to be smitten with the view 610

Of a blind beggar who, with upright face,
Stood propped against a wall, upon his chest
Wearing a written paper to explain
The story of the man and who he was.
My mind did at this spectacle turn round 615
As with the might of waters, and it seemed
To me that in this label was a type
Or emblem of the utmost that we know
Both of ourselves and of the universe;
And, on the shape of this unmoving man, 620
His fixed face and sightless eyes, I looked
As if admonished⁵ from another world.

The London Beggar

² Oh friend Coleridge.

³ second-sight mystic; second sight is the power by which occurrences in the future are perceived as though they were present.

⁴ stays emotional and psychological support.

⁵ admonished cf. other admonitions in Wordsworth – Ruined Cottage 530 and Resolution and Independence 119.

[London and the Den of Yordas] (from Book VIII)

Preceptress¹ stern, that didst instruct me next –
London, to thee I willingly return!

Erewhile² my verse played only with the flowers 680
 Enwrought upon thy mantle,³ satisfied
 With this amusement, and a simple look
 Of childlike inquisition⁴ now and then
 Cast upwards on thine eye to puzzle out
 Some inner meanings which might harbour there. 685
 Yet did I not give way to this light mood
 Wholly beguiled, as one incapable
 Of higher things, and ignorant that high things
 Were round me. Never shall I forget the hour,⁵
 The moment rather say, when, having thriddled 690
 The labyrinth of suburban villages,
 At length I did unto myself first seem
 To enter the great city. On the roof
 Of an itinerant vehicle⁶ I sat,
 With vulgar⁷ men about me, vulgar forms 695
 Of houses, pavement, streets, of men and things,
 Mean shapes on every side, but at the time
 When to myself it fairly might be said
 (The very moment that I seemed to know)
 ‘The threshold now is overpassed’ – great God! 700
 That aught external to the living mind
 Should have such mighty sway, yet so it was.
 A weight of ages⁸ did at once descend
 Upon my heart – no thought embodied, no
 Distinct remembrances, but weight and power, 705
 Power growing with the weight. Alas, I feel
 That I am trifling; ’twas a moment’s pause,
 All that took place within me came and went
 As in a moment, and I only now
 Remember that it was a thing divine. 710
 As when a traveller hath from open day
 With torches passed into some vault of earth,

The grotto of Antiparos⁹ or the den
 Of Yordas among Craven's mountain tracts;¹⁰
 He looks and sees the cavern spread and grow, 715
 Widening itself on all sides, sees, or thinks
 He sees,¹¹ erelong the roof above his head,
 Which instantly unsettles and recedes –
 Substance and shadow, light and darkness, all
 Commingled, making up a canopy 720
 Of shapes and forms and tendencies to shape
 That shift and vanish, change and interchange
 Like spectres, ferment quiet and sublime
 Which after a short space works¹² less and less,
 Till, every effort, every motion gone, 725
 The scene before him lies in perfect view,
 Exposed and lifeless as a written book.
 But let him pause awhile and look again
 And a new quickening¹³ shall succeed, at first
 Beginning timidly, then creeping fast 730
 Through all which he beholds. The senseless mass,
 In its projections, wrinkles, cavities,
 Through all its surface, with all colours streaming
 Like a magician's airy pageant,¹⁴ parts,
 Unites, embodying everywhere some pressure¹⁵ 735
 Or image, recognized or new, some type
 Or picture of the world; forests and lakes,
 Ships, rivers, towers, the warrior clad in mail,
 The prancing steed, the pilgrim with his staff,
 The mitred bishop and the throned king – 740
 A spectacle to which there is no end.

London and the Den of Yordas

2 Erewhile in the past.

3 Enwrought upon thy mantle In Milton's Lycidas, the River Cam has a 'mantle hairy ... Inwrought with figures dim' (ll. 104–5).

4 inquisition enquiry.

5 the hour i.e. of Wordsworth's first sight of London.

6 an itinerant vehicle i.e. a vehicle that travels around, a stagecoach, probably from Cambridge to London (Wordsworth was probably an undergraduate when he first visited London).

7 vulgar ordinary.

8 A weight of ages Effectively, Wordsworth was conscious of the history of the city.

9 The grotto of Antiparos famous cave on the island of Antiparos in the Aegean. As Wordsworth never went there he must have read about it, possibly in John Ozell's 1718 translation of Joseph Pitton de Tournefort's Relation d'un voyage au Levant (1717), which describes a torchlit procession and mass in the grotto on Christmas Day 1673.

10 the den...tracts limestone cave near Ingleton in West Yorkshire, visited by Wordsworth and his brother John in May 1800. It is the subject of a description by Thomas West in his Guide to the Lakes (3rd edn, 1784), which Wordsworth owned and read.

11 sees, or thinks / He sees from Virgil, Aeneid vi 454: 'aut videt, aut vidisse putat', borrowed also by Milton, Paradise Lost i 783–4.

12 works seethes.

13 quicken invigoration.

¹⁴ magician's airy pageant cf. Prospero's 'insubstantial pageant faded', Tempest IV i 155.

¹⁵ pressure imprint.

[Paris, December 1791] (from Book IX)¹

Where silent zephyrs² sported with the dust
Of the Bastille³ I sat in the open sun,
And from the rubbish gathered up a stone 65
And pocketed the relic in the guise
Of an enthusiast; yet, in honest truth,
Though not without some strong incumbences⁴
And glad⁵ (could living man be otherwise?),
I looked for something which I could not find, 70
Affecting more emotion than I felt.
For 'tis most certain that the utmost force
Of all these various objects which may show
The temper of my mind as then it was
Seemed less to recompense the traveller's pains – 75
Less moved me, gave me less delight – than did
A single picture merely, hunted out
Among other sights: the 'Magdalene' of Le Brun,⁶
A beauty exquisitely wrought, fair face
And rueful, with its ever-flowing tears. 80

Paris, December 1791

¹ Wordsworth is remembering his visit to Paris in December 1791. It was on this residence in France that he met Annette Vallon, with whom he had a child, Caroline, born in December 1792. His immediate excuse for visiting Revolutionary France was to perfect his command of the language so as to qualify as a gentleman's travelling companion or tutor.

² zephyrs small breezes.

³ the dust / Of the Bastille the dust was all that was left of it. The Bastille, a large prison in the centre of Paris, symbol of the tyranny of the ancien régime, had been stormed by the Paris mob on 14 July 1789, and then demolished.

⁴ incumbences feelings of obligation – presumably to the Revolutionary cause (in spite of his posturing as an ‘enthusiast’).

⁵ glad i.e. about the Revolution.

⁶ the ‘Magdalene’ of Le Brun Charles le Brun (1616–90) painted a picture of St Mary Magdalene (the repentant prostitute who washed Christ’s feet with her tears). Wordsworth would have seen it at the Carmelite convent in the rue d’Enfer. It is now in the Louvre.

[Blois, Spring 1792] (from Book IX)¹

A knot of military officers
That to a regiment appertained which then
Was stationed in the city² were the chief
Of my associates; some of these wore swords
Which had been seasoned in the wars, and all 130
Were men well-born³ – at least laid claim to such Distinction, as the chivalry of France.
In age and temper differing, they had yet
One spirit ruling in them all, alike
(Save only one, hereafter to be named)⁴ 135
Were bent upon undoing what was done.
This was their rest, and only hope; therewith
No fear had they of bad becoming worse,
For worst to them was come – nor would have stirred,
Or deemed it worth a moment’s while to stir, 140

In anything, save only as the act
Looked thitherward. One, reckoning by years,
Was in the prime of manhood, and erewhile
He had sat lord in many tender hearts,
Though heedless of such honours now, and changed: 145
His temper⁵ was quite mastered by the times,
And they had blighted him, had eat away
The beauty of his person, doing wrong
Alike to body and to mind. His port,⁶
Which once had been erect and open, now 150
Was stooping and contracted, and a face,
By nature lovely in itself, expressed
As much as any that was ever seen
A ravage out of season, made by thoughts
Unhealthy and vexatious. At the hour, 155
The most important of each day, in which
The public news was read, the fever came,
A punctual visitant, to shake this man,
Disarmed his voice and fanned his yellow cheek 160
Into a thousand colours. While he read,
Or mused, his sword was haunted by his touch
Continually, like an uneasy place
In his own body.

'Twas in truth an hour
Of universal ferment. Mildest men 165
Were agitated, and commotions, strife
Of passion and opinion, filled the walls
Of peaceful houses with unquiet sounds.
The soil of common life was at that time
Too hot to tread upon! Oft said I then, 170
And not then only, 'What a mockery this
Of history, the past and that to come!
Now do I feel how I have been deceived,
Reading of nations and their works in faith –
Faith given to vanity and emptiness; 175

Oh, laughter for the page that would reflect
To future times the face of what now is!⁷
The land all swarmed with passion, like a plain
Devoured by locusts – Carra, Gorsas⁸ – add
A hundred other names forgotten now, 180
Nor to be heard of more. Yet were they powers
Like earthquakes, shocks repeated day by day,
And felt through every nook of town and field.

Blois, Spring 1792

¹ Wordsworth moved to Blois, near Orléans, early in 1792.

² city Blois.

³ men well-born In spring 1792 the French army was staffed largely by royalist officers.

⁴ Save...named Wordsworth's friend, Michel Beaupuy, who converted Wordsworth to the Revolutionary cause.

⁵ temper character.

⁶ port bearing.

⁷ Oh laughter...is He who would attempt to record the events of the Revolution for posterity would only bring mockery upon himself, so complex have things become.

⁸ Carra, Gorsas journalist deputies in the French National Assembly, and members of the Girondin faction with which Beaupuy and Wordsworth consorted. They were probably known to Wordsworth. Carra was guillotined on 31 October 1793, Gorsas on the 7th.

[Beaupuy] (from Book IX)

Among that band of officers was one,¹
Already hinted at, of other mould² – 295
A patriot, thence rejected by the rest,
And with an oriental loathing spurned
As of a different caste.³ A meeker man
Than this lived never, or a more benign,
Meek though enthusiastic to the height 300
Of highest expectation. Injuries
Made him more gracious, and his nature then
Did breathe its sweetness out most sensibly,⁴
As aromatic flowers on Alpine turf
When foot hath crushed them. He through the events 305
Of that great change⁵ wandered in perfect faith
As through a book, an old romance or tale
Of fairy,⁶ or some dream of actions wrought
Behind the summer clouds. By birth he ranked
With the most noble,⁷ but unto the poor 310
Among mankind he was in service bound
As by some tie invisible, oaths professed
To a religious order. Man he loved
As man, and to the mean and the obscure,
And all the homely in their homely works, 315
Transferred a courtesy which had no air
Of condescension, but did rather seem
A passion and a gallantry, like that
Which he, a soldier, in his idler day
Had paid to woman. Somewhat vain he was, 320
Or seemed so; yet it was not vanity
But fondness, and a kind of radiant joy
That covered him about when he was bent
On works of love or freedom, or revolved

By cressets¹⁴ and love-beacons, intercourse
'Twixt her high-seated residence and his Far off at Chambord¹⁵ on the plain beneath) –
Even here, though less than with the peaceful house
Religious, mid these frequent monuments 495
Of kings, their vices or their better deeds,
Imagination, potent to inflame
At times with virtuous wrath and noble scorn,
Did also often mitigate the force
Of civic prejudice, the bigotry 500
(So call it) of a youthful patriot's mind;
And on these spots with many gleams I looked
Of chivalrous delight. Yet not the less,
Hatred of absolute rule, where will of one
Is law for all, and of that barren pride 505
In those who, by immunities unjust,
Betwixt the sovereign and the people stand
(His helpers and not theirs), laid stronger hold
Daily upon me – mixed with pity too
And love, for where hope is, there love will be 510
For the abject multitude. And when we chanced
One day to meet a hunger-bitten girl,
Who crept along, fitting her languid self
Unto a heifer's motion, by a cord
Tied to her arm, and picking thus from the lane 515
Its sustenance, while the girl with her two hands
Was busy knitting in a heartless¹⁶ mood
Of solitude – and at the sight my friend
In agitation said ' 'Tis against that
Which we are fighting', I with him believed 520
Devoutly that a spirit was abroad
Which could not be withstood; that poverty,
At least like this, would in a little time
Be found no more; that we should see the earth
Unthwarted in her wish to recompense 525

The industrious and the lowly child of toil,
All institutes¹⁷ for ever blotted out
That legalized exclusion, empty pomp
Abolished, sensual state and cruel power,
Whether by edict of the one or few; 530
And finally, as sum and crown of all,
Should see the people having a strong hand
In making their own laws, whence better days
To all mankind.¹⁸

Beaupuy

² mould clay, substance.

³ And with...caste He was spurned by the others with the same kind of loathing shown by Indians towards those of a lower caste.

⁴ sensibly perceptibly.

⁵ that great change the Revolution.

⁶ fairy magic.

⁷ By birth...noble Beaupuy was an aristocrat, descended on his mother's side from Montaigne. Many French aristocrats were in favour of the Revolution, though his rank separated him from his fellow-soldiers in Blois. He was 36 when he befriended the 22-year-old Wordsworth.

⁸ Complacently with pleasure.

⁹ end aim, objective.

¹⁰ chartered legislated.

11 a sounder...afterwards i.e. in 1793–5, during his flirtation with Godwinian thought (see next extract).

12 Romorantin small town in the Loire, once a provincial capital.

13 the first Francis Francis I (1515–57); attempts to identify the château and the mistress have been unsuccessful.

14 cressets torches.

15 Chambord a château in the Loire Valley, built by Francis I.

16 heartless despondent, without heart.

17 institutes laws, edicts, judgements.

18 To all mankind Like many supporters of the Revolution, Wordsworth believed that the rest of the world would follow France's example.

[Godwinism] (from Book X)¹

This was the time when all things tended fast 805
To depravation; the philosophy
That promised to abstract the hopes of man
Out of his feelings,² to be fixed thenceforth
For ever in a purer element³
Found ready welcome. Tempting region that 810
For Zeal to enter and refresh herself,
Where passions had the privilege to work,
And never hear the sound of their own names!⁴
But (speaking more in charity) the dream
Was flattering to the young ingenuous mind 815
Pleased with extremes, and not the least with that
Which makes the human reason's naked self

The object of its fervour. What delight!
How glorious, in self-knowledge and self-rule,
To look through all the frailties of the world! 820
And, with a resolute mastery shaking off
The accidents of nature, time and place,
That make up the weak being of the past,
Build social freedom on its only basis,
The freedom of the individual mind, 825
Which (to the blind restraint of general laws Superior) magisterially adopts
One guide, the light of circumstances, flashed
Upon an independent intellect.⁵

Godwinism

¹ For an outline of Godwin's life and ideas, see pp. 155–7. Wordsworth's attachment to Godwinian rationalism occurred in 1794–5, when he and Godwin met frequently in London.

² Out of his feelings Godwin put forward a philosophy by which, true to his origins as a Sandemanian (by which religious belief was completely intellectual), political aspiration was divorced from the emotions.

⁴ Where passions...names Wordsworth points out that Godwin was essentially repressive; emotion was involved in one's commitment to his philosophy, but it was not recognized as such.

⁵ What delight...intellect These lines are all heavily ironic, and satirize Wordsworth's younger self.

[Confusion and Recovery; Racedown, Spring 1796] (from Book X)¹

Time may come
When some dramatic story may afford 880
Shapes livelier to convey to thee, my friend,
What then² I learned, or think I learned, of truth,
And the errors into which I was betrayed
By present objects, and by reasonings false
From the beginning, inasmuch as drawn
Out of a heart which had been turned aside 885
From nature by external accidents,
And which was thus confounded³ more and more,
Misguiding and misguided. Thus I fared,
Dragging all passions, notions, shapes of faith,
Like culprits to the bar;⁴ suspiciously 890
Calling the mind to establish in plain day
Her titles and her honours;⁵ now believing,
Now disbelieving; endlessly perplexed
With impulse, motive, right and wrong, the ground
Of moral obligation, what the rule 895
And what the sanction – till, demanding proof,
And seeking it in everything, I lost
All feeling of conviction, and (in fine)⁶
Sick, wearied out with contrarities,⁷
Yielded up moral questions in despair, 900
And for my future studies, as the sole
Employment of the enquiring faculty,
Turned towards mathematics, and their clear
And solid evidence.⁸
Ah, then it was
That thou, most precious friend,⁹ about this time 905

First known to me,¹⁰ didst lend a living help
To regulate my soul. And then it was
That the beloved woman¹¹ in whose sight
Those days were passed (now speaking in a voice
Of sudden admonition, like a brook 910
That does but cross a lonely road; and now
Seen, heard and felt, and caught at every turn,
Companion never lost through many a league)¹²
Maintained for me a saving intercourse
With my true self. For, though impaired and changed 915
Much, as it seemed, I was no further changed
Than as a clouded, not a waning moon.
She, in the midst of all, preserved me still
A poet, made me seek beneath that name
My office¹³ upon earth, and nowhere else. 920
And lastly Nature's self, by human love
Assisted, through the weary labyrinth
Conducted me again to open day,
Revived the feelings of my earlier life,
Gave me that strength and knowledge full of peace, 925
Enlarged and never more to be disturbed,
Which through the steps of our degeneracy,
All degradation of this age, hath still
Upheld me, and upholds me at this day¹⁴
In the catastrophe (for so they dream, 930
And nothing less) when finally to close
And rivet up¹⁵ the gains of France, a Pope
Is summoned in to crown an Emperor¹⁶ –
This last opprobrium,¹⁷ when we see the dog
Returning to his vomit;¹⁸ when the sun 935
That rose in splendour, was alive, and moved
In exultation among living clouds,
Hath put his function and his glory off,¹⁹

And, turned into a gewgaw,²⁰ a machine,
Sets like an opera phantom.²¹ 940

Confusion and Recovery

¹ From London, where his attachment to Godwinism peaked in 1795, Wordsworth retreated to Racedown Lodge in Dorset, where he lived with Dorothy and made his first serious attempts to write poetry. It was here that, according to The Prelude, he had an emotional crisis precipitated jointly by a disillusionment with Godwin and disappointment at the failure of the Revolution. On 21 March 1796 he described the second edition of Political Justice in terms that indicate his distaste: ‘Such a piece of barbarous writing I have not often seen. It contains scarce one sentence decently written’ (EY 170–1).

² then i.e. during his experience of the Revolution, and in the years following it.

³ confounded confused.

⁴ bar the barrier or wooden rail marking off the immediate precinct of the judge’s seat, at which prisoners are stationed for arraignment, trial or sentence. In Wordsworth’s simile, he analysed his former beliefs and emotions as rigorously as a lawyer cross-examining a witness in a courtroom.

⁵ Calling the mind...honours Wordsworth’s crisis involved a doubt over the value of imaginative thought.

⁶ in fine in the end.

⁷ contrarities unresolved, opposing arguments.

⁸ Turned...evidence Against the continual doubt that seemed to surround the morality of, for instance, regicide, or the suppression of emotion by false prophets like Godwin, Wordsworth turns to mathematics which provides the solace of ‘clear / And solid evidence’, with no moral ambiguity.

9 most precious friend Coleridge.

10 about this time...me not true; Wordsworth met Coleridge in September 1795, and no doubt kept in touch in ensuing months, but close contact did not occur until June 1797.

11 the beloved woman Dorothy, with whom Wordsworth resided at Racedown Lodge from September 1795 to June 1797.

12 league about three miles; by ‘many a league’, Wordsworth just means over a long time.

13 office role, vocation.

14 this day Wordsworth moves forward from 1796 to the time of writing, December 1804.

15 to close...up Wordsworth’s language underlines his dismay; all the gains of the Revolution have now been imprisoned – effectively thrown away.

16 a Pope...Emperor Napoleon had been emperor since May 1804, but summoned Pope Pius VII to crown him on 2 December.

17 opprobrium disgrace.

18 the dog...vomit The French returned to a monarchy – something of which, as a good republican, Wordsworth disapproved. The allusion is to Proverbs 26:11: ‘As a dog returneth to his vomit, so a fool returneth to his folly.’

19 put...off cast...away.

20 gewgaw worthless toy.

21 the sun...phantom The sun of the French Republic, that once rose in glory, now sets, looking more like a clumsy theatrical effect ('opera phantom').

[The Climbing of Snowdon] (from Book XIII)¹

In one of these excursions, travelling then
Through Wales on foot and with a youthful friend,
I left Bethgelert's huts² at couching-time³
And westward took my way to see the sun
Rise from the top of Snowdon. Having reached 5
The cottage at the mountain's foot, we there
Roused up the shepherd who by ancient right
Of office is the stranger's usual guide,
And after short refreshment sallied forth.
 It was a summer's night, a close warm night, 10
Wan, dull and glaring,⁴ with a dripping mist
Low-hung and thick that covered all the sky,
Half threatening storm and rain; but on we went
Unchecked, being full of heart and having faith
In our tried pilot.⁵ Little could we see, 15
Hemmed round on every side with fog and damp,
And, after ordinary travellers' chat
With our conductor, silently we sunk
Each into commerce with his private thoughts.
Thus did we breast the ascent, and by myself 20
Was nothing either seen or heard the while
Which took me from my musings, save that once
The shepherd's cur did to his own great joy
Unearth a hedgehog in the mountain crags

Round which he made a barking turbulent. 25
This small adventure (for even such it seemed
In that wild place and at the dead of night)
Being over and forgotten, on we wound
In silence as before.

With forehead bent
Earthward, as if in opposition set 30
Against an enemy, I panted up
With eager pace, and no less eager thoughts.
Thus might we wear perhaps an hour away,
Ascending at loose distance each from each,
And I, as chanced, the foremost of the band – 35
When at my feet the ground appeared to brighten,
And with a step or two seemed brighter still;
Nor had I time to ask the cause of this,
For instantly a light upon the turf

Fell like a flash.⁶ I looked about, and lo! 40
The moon stood naked in the heavens at height
Immense above my head, and on the shore
I found myself of a huge sea of mist,
Which meek and silent rested at my feet.
A hundred hills their dusky backs upheaved 45
All over this still ocean;⁷ and beyond,
Far, far beyond, the vapours shot themselves
In headlands, tongues, and promontory shapes,
Into the sea – the real sea, that seemed
To dwindle and give up its majesty, 50

Usurped⁸ upon as far as sight could reach.
Meanwhile, the moon looked down upon this show
In single glory, and we stood, the mist
Touching our very feet. And from the shore
At distance not the third part of a mile 55
Was a blue chasm, a fracture in the vapour,
A deep and gloomy breathing-place through which
Mounted the roar of waters, torrents, streams

Innumerable, roaring with one voice.
The universal spectacle throughout 60
Was shaped for admiration and delight,
Grand in itself alone, but in that breach
Through which the homeless voice of waters rose,
That dark deep thoroughfare, had nature lodged
The soul, the imagination of the whole.⁹ 65

A meditation rose in me that night¹⁰
Upon the lonely mountain when the scene
Had passed away, and it appeared to me
The perfect image of a mighty mind,
Of one that feeds upon infinity, 70
That is exalted by an under-presence,
The sense of God, or whatso'er is dim
Or vast in its own being.¹¹ Above all,
One function of such mind had nature there
Exhibited by putting forth,¹² in midst 75
Of circumstance most awful and sublime:
That domination which she¹³ oftentimes
Exerts upon the outward face of things,
So moulds them, and endues, abstracts, combines,¹⁴
Or by abrupt and unhabitual influence 80
Doth make one object so impress itself
Upon all others, and pervade them so,
That even the grossest minds must see and hear
And cannot choose but feel.¹⁵

The power which these
Acknowledge when thus moved, which Nature thus 85
Thrusts forth upon the senses, is the express
Resemblance, in the fullness of its strength
Made visible, a genuine counterpart
And brother, of the glorious faculty
Which higher minds¹⁶ bear with them as their own. 90

This is the very spirit in which they deal
With all the objects of the universe;
They from their native selves can send abroad
Like transformation, for themselves create
A like existence, and, where'er it is 95
Created for them, catch it by an instinct.¹⁷
Them the enduring and the transient both
Serve to exalt. They build up greatest things
From least suggestions,¹⁸ ever on the watch,
Willing to work and to be wrought upon. 100
They need not extraordinary calls
To rouse them: in a world of life they live,
By sensible impressions not enthralled,
But quickened, roused, and made thereby more fit
To hold communion with the invisible world.¹⁹ 105
Such minds are truly from the Deity
For they are Powers,²⁰ and hence the highest bliss
That can be known is theirs – the consciousness
Of whom they are,²¹ habitually infused
Through every image and through every thought, 110
And all impressions. Hence religion, faith,
And endless occupation for the soul,
Whether discursive or intuitive;²²
Hence sovereignty within²³ and peace at will,
Emotion which best foresight need not fear, 115
Most worthy then of trust when most intense;
Hence cheerfulness in every act of life;
Hence truth in moral judgements, and delight
That fails not in the external universe.²⁴
Oh, who is he that hath his whole life long 120
Preserved, enlarged, this freedom in himself? –
For this alone is genuine liberty.²⁵
Witness, ye solitudes where I received

My earliest visitations,²⁶ careless then
Of what was given me, and where now I roam 125
A meditative, oft a suffering, man,
And yet I trust with undiminished powers –
Witness – whatever falls²⁷ my better mind,
Revolving with the accidents of life,
May have sustained – that, howsoe'er misled, 130
I never, in the quest of right and wrong,
Did tamper with myself from private aims;²⁸
Nor was in any of my hopes the dupe
Of selfish passions; nor did wilfully
Yield ever to mean cares and low pursuits, 135
But rather did with jealousy²⁹ shrink back
From every combination that might aid
The tendency, too potent in itself,
Of habit to enslave the mind – I mean
Oppress it by the laws of vulgar sense 140
And substitute a universe of death,³⁰
The falsest of all worlds, in place of that
Which is divine and true.

To fear and love

(To love as first and chief, for there fear ends)³¹
Be this ascribed, to early intercourse 145
In presence of sublime and lovely forms
With the adverse principles of pain and joy –
Evil as one is rashly named by those Who know not what they say.³² From love (for here
Do we begin and end) all grandeur comes, 150
All truth and beauty – from pervading love;
That gone, we are as dust. Behold the fields
In balmy³³ springtime full of rising flowers
And happy creatures! See that pair, the lamb
And the lamb's mother, and their tender ways 155

Shall touch thee to the heart. In some green bower
Rest, and be not alone, but have thou there
The one who is thy choice of all the world –
There linger, lulled and lost, and rapt away –
Be happy to thy fill! Thou call'st this love, 160
And so it is, but there is higher love
Than this, a love that comes into the heart
With awe and a diffusive sentiment,³⁴
Thy love is human merely – this proceeds
More from the brooding soul,³⁵ and is divine. 165

This love more intellectual³⁶ cannot be
Without imagination, which in truth
Is but another name for absolute strength
And clearest insight, amplitude of mind³⁷
And reason³⁸ in her most exalted mood. 170
This faculty hath been the moving soul
Of our long labour: we have traced the stream
From darkness and the very place of birth
In its blind cavern, whence is faintly heard
The sound of waters; followed it to light 175
And open day, accompanied its course
Among the ways of nature; afterwards
Lost sight of it bewildered and engulfed,
Then given it greeting as it rose once more
With strength, reflecting in its solemn breast 180
The works of man and face of human life;
And lastly, from its progress have we drawn
The feeling of life endless,³⁹ the great thought
By which we live, infinity and God.

The Climbing of Snowdon

1 For the final episode of The Prelude, Wordsworth goes back in time to June–August 1791, when he made a walking tour of north Wales with his Welsh College friend, Robert Jones. The account of the climb was composed for the final Book of the Five-Book Prelude in February 1804, and revised the following year for the Thirteen-Book Prelude.

2 Bethgelert's huts the cottages of Beddgelert, a village at the foot of Snowdon.

3 couching-time bed-time.

4 glaring Maxwell suggests that this word is used in the dialect sense of dull, rainy, sticky, clammy.

5 tried pilot experienced guide.

6 a light...flash cf. the central event described in A Night-Piece (p. 426).

7 A hundred hills their dusky backs upheaved...ocean borrowed from Milton's account of Creation, Paradise Lost vii 285–7:

the mountains huge appear
Emergent, and their broad backs upheave
Into the clouds ...

8 Usurped cf. other imaginative usurpations at Book VI, ll. 455 and 533 (pp. 565, 566).

9 The soul, the imagination of the whole The revelation offered on Snowdon is of the identity of soul and imagination.

10 that night The 'meditation' took place in May 1805, as he composed these lines, fourteen months after describing the climbing of Snowdon itself.

11 it appeared...being The experience has been internalized: what is remembered becomes a symbol of the imaginative mind itself, which contains an ‘under-presence’ of power, whether divine or otherwise. Infinity and vastness exist within the poet’s mind.

12 Exhibited by putting forth demonstrated by analogy.

13 she the mind (from l. 74).

14 So moulds them, and endues, abstracts, combines The mist transforms the slopes of the mountain into a sea; in the same way, the imagination is capable of transforming any object it recalls. Cf. Wordsworth’s comments on the imagination in the 1815 Preface (pp. 590–1).

15 That even...feel It is crucial to the millennial scheme of The Recluse that all people, however insensitive to the lure of the metaphysical, should be susceptible to the improving effects of imaginative thought.

16 higher minds Wordsworth believes that some people are particularly prone to imaginative vision.

17 whene’er it is...instinct The imagination is both creative and receptive; on occasion, the transformation occurs outside the individual, and is ‘caught’ by the perceiving mind.

18 They build...suggestions a crucial element in Wordsworth’s thinking. Reviewers of the day criticized him for writing about subjects they considered trivial, but for him the imagination was ‘the faculty that produces impressive effects out of simple elements’ (p. 518).

19 By sensible...world Wordsworth’s elect are not imprisoned by their senses (the view of some Enlightenment thinkers), but are enlivened imaginatively and enabled to perceive the higher world that lies beyond them.

20 Powers divinely empowered beings.

21 the consciousness...are Because the imaginative mind creates and perceives, the very act of perception confirms its individual identity.

22 Whether discursive or intuitive Wordsworth is thinking of the distinction made by Milton between discursive reason (belonging to man), and a higher, 'intuitive' reason, to which man may aspire, which is possessed by angels (Paradise Lost v 487–90).

23 sovereignty within complete spiritual mastery.

24 delight...universe unfailing pleasure at beholding natural objects.

25 liberty one of the primary objectives of the (now failed) French Revolution. Wordsworth is implicitly revising this political term, turning it into a spiritual one. The 'liberty' of the Wordsworthian visionary is interior, a freedom of the soul.

26 ye solitudes...visitations the landscape of the Lakes. The 'visitations' are from the life-force within the natural world – effectively, God (cf. Pedlar 108).

27 falls befalls.

28 never...from private aims This is made clearer in the Fourteen-Book Prelude:

Never did I, in quest of right and wrong,
Tamper with conscience from a private aim ...
(xiv 150–1)

29 with jealousy scrupulously.

30 a universe of death in which the individual is enslaved by unimaginative reliance on the senses; the phrase is from Paradise Lost

ii 622.

31 To love...ends Fear leads to love of nature, and thence to love of mankind. Cf. Thirteen-Book Prelude i 305–6: ‘Fair seed-time had my soul, and I grew up / Fostered alike by beauty and by fear.’

32 Evil...say Neither fear nor pain are evil, because they play their part in shaping the imaginative mind.

33 balmy mild, fragrant.

34 diffusive sentiment a love that comes from outside the individual, and spreads from soul to soul (‘diffusive’).

35 the brooding soul i.e. that of God, as suggested by the allusion to the moment of creation in Paradise Lost i 21–2, where the Holy Spirit ‘Dove-like sat’st brooding on the vast abyss / And madest it pregnant’.

36 intellectual spiritual.

37 amplitude of mind effectively, greatness of soul.

38 reason i.e. intuitive reason, the theme of Book XIII.

39 life endless the afterlife.

Elegiac Stanzas, Suggested by a Picture of Peele Castle¹ in a Storm, Painted by Sir
George Beaumont² (composed between 20
May and 27 June 1806)

From Poems in Two Volumes (1807)

I was thy neighbour once, thou rugged pile!³
Four summer weeks I dwelt in sight of thee;
I saw thee every day, and all the while
Thy form was sleeping on a glassy sea.

So pure the sky, so quiet was the air! 5
So like, so very like, was day to day!
Whene'er I looked, thy image still was there –
It trembled, but it never passed away.

How perfect was the calm; it seemed no sleep,
No mood which season takes away, or brings; 10
I could have fancied that the mighty deep
Was even the gentlest of all gentle things.

Ah then, if mine had been the painter's hand
To express what then I saw, and add the gleam,
The light that never was, on sea or land, 15
The consecration, and the poet's dream,

I would have planted thee, thou hoary pile,
Amid a world how different from this! –
Beside a sea that could not cease to smile,
On tranquil land, beneath a sky of bliss; 20

Thou shouldst have seemed a treasure-house, a mine
Of peaceful years, a chronicle of heaven –
Of all the sunbeams that did ever shine
The very sweetest had to thee been given.

A picture had it been of lasting ease, 25
Elysian quiet,⁴ without toil or strife;
No motion but the moving tide, a breeze,
Or merely silent nature's breathing life.

Such, in the fond delusion of my heart,
Such picture would I at that time have made; 30
And seen the soul of truth in every part –
A faith, a trust that could not be betrayed.

So once it would have been – 'tis so no more;
I have submitted to a new control:
A power is gone, which nothing can restore – 35
A deep distress hath humanized my soul.⁵

Not for a moment could I now behold
A smiling sea⁶ and be what I have been;
The feeling of my loss will ne'er be old –
This, which I know, I speak with mind serene. 40

Then, Beaumont, friend! who would have been the friend,
If he had lived, of him⁷ whom I deplore,⁸
This work of thine⁹ I blame not, but commend;
This sea in anger, and that dismal shore.

Oh 'tis a passionate work! – yet wise and well, 45
Well-chosen is the spirit that is here;
That hulk which labours in the deadly swell,
This rueful sky, this pageantry of fear!

And this huge castle, standing here sublime,
I love to see the look with which it braves, 50
Cased in the unfeeling armour of old time,
The lightning, the fierce wind, and trampling waves.

Farewell, farewell the heart that lives alone,
Housed in a dream, at distance from the kind!¹⁰
Such happiness, wherever it be known, 55
Is to be pitied, for 'tis surely blind.

But welcome fortitude, and patient cheer,
And frequent sights of what is to be borne!
Such sights, or worse, as are before me here –
Not without hope we suffer and we mourn.¹¹ 60

Elegiac Stanzas

² Sir George Howland Beaumont, 7th Baronet (1753–1827) of Coleorton Hall, near Ashby-de-la-Zouch, Leicestershire. He had sketched in the Lakes in 1798, and given Wordsworth a farmstead at Applethwaite, less than two miles north of Greta Hall at the foot of Skiddaw, in 1803.

³ thou rugged pile Piel Castle.

⁴ Elysian quiet i.e. as peaceful as the Elysian fields, where in Greek myth the souls of dead heroes enjoyed eternal life.

⁵ A deep distress...soul the drowning of Wordsworth's brother John (b. 1773) in the wreck of the Earl of Abergavenny, of which he was Captain, 25 February 1805.

⁶ Not for a moment...sea cf. Wordsworth's comment in a letter: 'since the loss of my dear brother, we have all had such painful and melancholy thoughts connected with the ocean that nothing but a paramount necessity could make us live near it' (MY i 212).

⁷ him John Wordsworth.

⁸ deplore lament.

⁹ This work of thine Sir George Beaumont's A Storm: Peele Castle was exhibited at the Royal Academy, 2 May 1806, where Wordsworth probably saw it.

¹⁰ kind humankind.

¹¹ Not without hope...mourn Edward Wilson notes that this line echoes the Book of Common Prayer's 'Order for the Burial of the Dead': 'Oh merciful God ... who also hath taught us, by his holy Apostle St Paul, not to be sorry, as men without hope, for them that sleep in him' ('An Echo of St. Paul and Words of Consolation in Wordsworth's "Elegiac Stanzas"', RES 43 (1992) 75–80).

A Complaint (composed between 30 October 1806 and April 1807)¹

From Poems in Two Volumes (1807)

There is a change – and I am poor;
Your love hath been, nor long ago,
A fountain at my fond heart's door
Whose only business was to flow –
And flow it did, not taking heed 5
Of its own bounty,² or my need.

What happy moments did I count!
Blessed was I then all bliss above!
Now, for this consecrated fount
Of murmuring, sparkling, living love, 10
What have I? Shall I dare to tell?
A comfortless and hidden well.

A well of love – it may be deep –

I trust it is, and never dry;
What matter if the waters sleep 15
In silence and obscurity?
Such change, and at the very door
Of my fond heart, hath made me poor.

A Complaint

¹ ‘Suggested by a change in the manners of a friend’ (FN 9). The friend was Coleridge. Strains had been developing between the Wordsworths and Coleridge since around 1802, the period of Dejection.

² bounty its gift of love.

Star Gazers (composed November 1806)¹

From Poems in Two Volumes (1807)

What crowd is this? What have we here? We must not pass it by;
A telescope upon its frame and pointed to the sky,
Long is it as a barber’s pole, or mast of little boat,
Some little pleasure-skiff that doth on Thames’s waters float.

The showman chooses well his place – ’tis Leicester’s busy Square;

And he’s as happy in his night, for the heavens are blue and fair;
Calm, though impatient, are the crowd, each is ready with the fee,
And envies him that’s looking – what an insight it must be!

Now, showman, where can lie the cause? Shall thy implement have blame –

A boaster that, when he is tried, fails and is put to shame? 10
Or is it good as others are, and be their eyes at fault?

Their eyes or minds? Or finally, is this resplendent vault?²

Is nothing of that radiant pomp so good as we have here?
Or gives a thing but small delight that never can be dear?
The silver moon with all her vales, and hills of mightiest fame, 15
Do they betray us when they're seen? And are they but a name?

Or is it rather that conceit³ rapacious⁴ is and strong?
And bounty⁵ never yields so much but it seems to do her wrong?
Or is it that when human souls a journey long have had
And are returned into themselves they cannot but be sad? 20

Or does some deep and earnest thought the blissful mind employ⁶
Of him who gazes, or has gazed – a grave and steady joy
That doth reject all show of pride, admits no outward sign,
Because not of this noisy world, but silent and divine?

Or is it (last unwelcome thought!) that these spectators rude, 25
Poor in estate, of manners base, men of the multitude,
Have souls which never yet have risen, and therefore prostrate⁷ lie,
Not to be lifted up at once to power and majesty?

Whate'er the cause, 'tis sure that they who pry and pore
Seem to meet with little gain, seem less happy than before; 30
One after one they take their turns, nor have I one espied
That does not slackly go away as if dissatisfied.

Star Gazers

¹ 'Observed by me in Leicester Square as here described, 1806' (FN 14). Wordsworth probably saw the showman charging customers to look through his telescope when walking through Leicester Square with Charles Lamb during a visit to London, April–May 1806.

² resplendent vault the sky; cf. the vault in A Night-Piece (p. 426)..

³ conceit conception, expectation of what we will see down the telescope.

⁴ rapacious greedy; i.e. people expect too much.

⁵ bounty i.e. the reward of seeing the moon down the telescope.

⁶ employ preoccupy.

⁷ prostrate overcome, defeated.

[St Paul's] (composed 1808; edited from MS)¹

Pressed² with conflicting thoughts of love and fear,

I parted from thee, friend,³ and took my way

Through the great city, pacing with an eye

Downcast, ear sleeping, and feet masterless,

That were sufficient guide unto themselves, 5

And step by step went pensively. Now, mark

Not how my trouble was entirely hushed

(That might not be), but how by sudden gift,⁴

Gift of imagination's holy power,

My soul in her uneasiness received 10

An anchor of stability. It chanced

That, while I thus was pacing, I raised up

My heavy eyes and instantly beheld,

Saw at a glance in that familiar spot

A visionary scene: a length of street 15

Laid open⁵ in its morning quietness,

Deep, hollow, unobstructed, vacant, smooth,

And white with winter's purest white, as fair,

As fresh and spotless as he ever sheds

On field or mountain. Moving form was none, 20
Save here and there a shadowy passenger,
Slow, shadowy, silent, dusky, and beyond
And high above this winding length of street,
This noiseless and unpeopled avenue,
Pure, silent, solemn, beautiful, was seen 25
The huge majestic temple of St Paul
In awful sequestration,⁶ through a veil,
Through its own sacred veil of falling snow.

St Paul's

¹ This poem was never published by Wordsworth. It was inspired by his departure early on the morning of 3 April 1808 from Coleridge's lodgings above the Courier offices in the Strand to start his journey back to Grasmere. On 8 April he described it to Sir George Beaumont: 'I left Coleridge at 7 o'clock on Sunday morning; and walked towards the city in a very thoughtful and melancholy state of mind. I had passed through Temple Bar and by St Dunstan's, noticing nothing, and entirely occupied by my own thoughts, when, looking up, I saw before me the avenue of Fleet Street, silent, empty, and pure white, with a sprinkling of new-fallen snow, not a cart or carriage to obstruct the view, no noise, only a few soundless and dusky foot-passengers here and there; you remember the elegant curve of Ludgate Hill in which this avenue would terminate, and beyond and towering above it was the huge and majestic form of St Paul's, solemnized by a thin veil of falling snow. I cannot say how much I was affected at this unthought-of sight in such a place, and what a blessing I felt there is in habits of exalted imagination. My sorrow was controlled, and my uneasiness of mind, not quieted and relieved altogether, seemed at once to receive the gift of an anchor of security' (MY i 209).

² Pressed oppressed.

³ friend Coleridge.

⁴ by sudden gift cf. Resolution and Independence 50–1: ‘Now whether it were by peculiar grace, / A leading from above, a something given ...’

⁵ Laid open cf. Composed upon Westminster Bridge, 3 September 1802, in which ‘Ships, towers, domes, theatres, and temples lie / Open unto the fields, and to the sky.’

⁶ awful sequestration awe-inspiring seclusion.

[Surprised by joy – impatient as the wind] (composed between 1812 and 1814)¹

From Poems (1815)

Surprised by joy – impatient as the wind
I wished to share the transport² – oh, with whom
But thee,³ long buried in the silent tomb,
That spot which no vicissitude⁴ can find?
Love, faithful love recalled thee to my mind – 5
But how could I forget thee? Through what power,
Even for the least division of an hour,
Have I been so beguiled⁵ as to be blind
To my most grievous loss? That thought’s return
Was the worst pang that sorrow ever bore, 10
Save one, one only, when I stood forlorn,
Knowing my heart’s best treasure was no more;
That neither present time, nor years unborn
Could to my sight that heavenly face restore.

Surprised by joy

¹ ‘This was in fact suggested by my daughter Catherine long after her death’ (FN 21). Catherine Wordsworth died 4 June 1812.

² transport ecstasy.

³ thee his dead daughter Catherine.

⁴ vicissitude change, development in human affairs.

⁵ beguiled deceived.

Preface (extract)¹

From Poems (1815)

Imagination (in the sense of the word as giving title to a class² of the following poems) has no reference to images that are merely a faithful copy existing in the mind of certain external objects, but is a word of higher import, denoting operations of the mind upon those objects, and processes of creation or of composition governed by certain fixed laws. I proceed to illustrate my meaning by instances.

A parrot hangs from the wires of his cage by his beak or by his claws, or a monkey from the bough of a tree by his paws or his tail: each creature does so literally and actually. In the first Eclogue of Virgil, the shepherd, thinking of the time when he is to take leave of his farm, thus addresses his goats:

Non ego vos posthac viridi projectus in antro
Dumosa pendere procul de rupe videbo...³

...half way up

Hangs one who gathers samphire⁴>

is the well-known expression of Shakespeare, delineating an ordinary image upon the cliffs of Dover. In these two instances is a slight exertion of the faculty which I denominate⁵ imagination, in the use of one word. Neither the goats nor the samphire-gatherer⁶ do literally hang (as does the parrot or the monkey), but, presenting to the senses something of such an appearance, the mind in its activity, for its own gratification, contemplates them as hanging.

As when far off at sea a fleet descried
Hangs in the clouds, by equinoxial winds
Close sailing from Bengala or the Isles
Of Ternate or Tydore, whence merchants bring
Their spicy drugs; they on the trading flood
Through the wide Ethiopian to the Cape
Ply, stemming nightly toward the pole – so seemed Far off the flying fiend.⁷

Here is the full strength of the imagination involved in the word hangs and exerted upon the whole image. First the fleet (an aggregate of many ships) is represented as one mighty person whose track, we know and feel, is upon the waters; but, taking advantage of its appearance to the senses, the poet dares to represent it as hanging in the clouds, both for the gratification of the mind in contemplating the image itself, and in reference to the motion and appearance of the sublime object to which it is compared.⁸

From images of sight we will pass to those of sound: ‘Over his own sweet voice the stock-dove broods...’⁹ Of the same bird:

His voice was buried among trees,
Yet to be come at by the breeze...¹⁰
Oh cuckoo! shall I call thee bird
Or but a wandering voice?¹¹

The stock-dove is said to coo, a sound well imitating the note of the bird. But by the intervention of the metaphor broods, the affections¹² are called in by the imagination to assist in marking the manner in which the bird reiterates and prolongs her soft note, as if herself delighting to listen to it, and participating of a still and quiet satisfaction like that which may be supposed inseparable from the continuous process of incubation.

‘His voice was buried among trees’: a metaphor expressing the love of seclusion by which this bird is marked, and characterizing its note as not partaking of the shrill and the piercing, and therefore more easily deadened by the intervening shade – yet a note so peculiar, and withal so pleasing, that the breeze, gifted with that love of the sound which the poet feels, penetrates the shade in which it is entombed, and conveys it to the ear of the listener.

...shall I call thee bird
Or but a wandering voice?

This concise interrogation¹³ characterizes the seeming ubiquity of the voice of the cuckoo, and dispossesses the creature almost of a corporeal existence – the imagination being tempted to this exertion of her power by a consciousness in the memory that the cuckoo is almost perpetually heard throughout the season of spring, but seldom becomes an object of sight.

Thus far of images independent of each other, and immediately endowed by the mind with properties that do not inhere in them,¹⁴ upon an incitement¹⁵ from properties and qualities the existence of which is inherent and obvious. These processes of imagination are carried on either by conferring additional properties upon an object, or abstracting¹⁶ from it some of those which it actually possesses, and thus enabling it to react upon the mind which hath performed the process, like a new existence.

I pass from the imagination acting upon an individual image to a consideration of the same faculty employed upon images in a conjunction¹⁷ by which they modify each other. The reader has already had a fine instance before him in the passage quoted from Virgil, where the apparently perilous situation of the goat hanging upon the shaggy precipice is contrasted with that of the shepherd contemplating it from the seclusion of the cavern in which he lies stretched at ease and in security. Take these images separately, and how unaffected the picture compared with that produced by their being thus connected with, and opposed to, each other!

As a huge stone is sometimes seen to lie
Couched on the bald top of an eminence,
Wonder to all who do the same espy
By what means it could thither come, and whence;

So that it seems a thing endued with sense,
Like a sea-beast crawled forth, which on a shelf
Of rock or sand repositeth, there to sun himself –

Such seemed this man, not all alive nor dead,
Nor all asleep, in his extreme old age...
Motionless as a cloud the old man stood
That heareth not the loud winds when they call
And moveth altogether, if it move at all.¹⁸

In these images, the conferring, the abstracting, and the modifying powers of the imagination, immediately and mediately acting, are all brought into conjunction.¹⁹ The stone is endowed with something of the power of life to approximate it to the sea-beast, and the sea-beast stripped of some of its vital qualities to assimilate it to the stone – which intermediate image is thus treated for the purpose of bringing the original image (that of the stone) to a nearer resemblance to the figure and condition of the aged man, who is divested of so much of the indications of life and motion as to bring him to the point where the two objects unite and coalesce in just comparison. After what has been said, the image of the cloud need not be commented upon.

Thus far of an endowing or modifying power. But the imagination also shapes and creates – and how? By innumerable processes, and in none does it more delight than in that of consolidating numbers into unity, and dissolving and separating unity into number – alternations proceeding from, and governed by, a sublime consciousness of the soul in her own mighty and almost divine powers. Recur to the passage already cited from Milton.²⁰ When the compact fleet, as one person, has been introduced ‘sailing from Bengala’, ‘they’ (i.e. the ‘merchants’ representing the fleet resolved into a multitude of ships) ‘Ply’ their voyage towards the extremities of the earth; ‘so’ (referring to the word ‘As’ in the commencement) ‘seemed the flying fiend’ – the image of his person acting to recombine the multitude of ships into one body, the point from which the comparison set out.

‘So seemed’: and to whom ‘seemed’? To the heavenly muse who dictates the poem, to the eye of the poet’s mind, and to that of the reader, present at one moment in the wide Ethiopian, and the next in the solitudes, then first broken in upon, of the infernal regions!

Preface

1 Poems (1815) was Wordsworth’s first attempt to collect his shorter poems. For the occasion he composed an important Preface that outlines his ideas about the imagination.

2 a class In Poems (1815) Wordsworth divided his collected works into ‘classes’ or categories, one of which was ‘Imagination’.

3 Virgil, Eclogue i 76–7: ‘No more, stretched in some mossy grot, shall I watch you in the distance hanging from a bushy crag.’

4 King Lear IV vi 15–16.

5 denominate call.

6 samphire-gatherer one who gathers, a plant that grows on rocks by the sea, the leaves of which were used in pickles. Wordsworth was probably referring to true samphire (Crithmum maritimum), though the leaves of marsh samphire (species of Salicornia) are also eaten.

7 Paradise Lost ii 636–43.

8 Wordsworth first discussed his ideas relating to Milton’s image in a letter to Sir George Beaumont, 28 August 1811:

We had another fine sight one evening, walking along a rising ground about two miles distant from the shore. It was about the hour of sunset, and the sea was perfectly calm, and in a quarter where its surface was indistinguishable from the western sky, hazy and luminous with the setting sun, appeared a tall sloop-rigged vessel, magnified by the atmosphere through which it was viewed, and seeming rather to hang in the air than to float upon the waters. Milton compares the appearance of Satan to a fleet descried far off at sea; the visionary grandeur and beautiful form of this single vessel, could words have conveyed to the mind the picture which Nature presented to the eye, would have suited his purpose as well as the largest company of vessels that ever associated together with the help of a trade wind. (MY i 508)

9 Resolution and Independence 5.

10 'Oh nightingale' 13–14.

11 To the Cuckoo 3–4.

12 affections feelings.

13 interrogation question.

14 do not inhere in them i.e. qualities and properties not actually possessed by the objects themselves.

15 incitement stimulus.

16 abstracting removing.

17 conjunction combination.

18 Resolution and Independence 64–72, 82–4.

19 brought into conjunction i.e. act together.

20 the passage...Milton i.e. Paradise Lost ii 636–43, quoted p. 588.

Conclusion (composed 1818–20)¹

From The River Duddon (1820)

I thought of thee,² my partner and my guide,
As being past away. Vain sympathies!
For backward, Duddon, as I cast my eyes,
I see what was, and is, and will abide;
Still glides the stream, and shall for ever glide; 5
The form remains, the function never dies,
While we, the brave, the mighty, and the wise,³
We men who, in our morn of youth, defied
The elements, must vanish; be it so!
Enough, if something from our hands have power 10
To live, and act, and serve the future hour;
And if, as tow'rd the silent tomb we go,
Through love, through hope, and faith's transcendent dower,⁴
We feel that we are greater than we know.

Conclusion

¹ Wordsworth composed a sequence of sonnets describing the Duddon Valley, which he published in 1820. This concluding sonnet is probably the most famous, and the best. The River Duddon springs from the top of the Wrynose Pass and then descends through one of the most picturesque valleys in the Lake District.

² thee the River Duddon.

³ While we...wise borrowed from Wordsworth's early translation of Moschus' Lament for Bion (1789) 5: 'But we, the great, the mighty and the wise.' Shelley, who frequently alludes to Moschus' Lament, also echoes the line at Mont Blanc 82.

[Genius of Burke!] (composed by 1832; edited from MS)¹

From The Fourteen-Book Prelude (1850), Book
VII (extract)

Genius of Burke! forgive the pen seduced
By specious wonders,² and too slow to tell
Of what the ingenuous, what bewildered men
Beginning to mistrust their boastful guides,³ 515
And wise men, willing to grow wiser, caught
(Rapt auditors!) from thy most eloquent tongue –
Now mute, for ever mute, in the cold grave.⁴
I see him, old but vigorous in age,
Stand, like an oak whose stag-horn branches start 520
Out of its leafy brow, the more to awe
The younger brethren of the grove. But some –
While he forewarns, denounces, launches forth,
Against all systems built on abstract rights,⁵
Keen ridicule; the majesty⁶ proclaims 525
Of institutes and laws hallowed by time;⁷
Declares the vital power of social ties
Endeared by custom, and with high disdain
Exploding upstart theory, insists
Upon the allegiance to which men are born – 530
Some (say at once a froward⁸ multitude)
Murmur (for truth is hated where not loved)
As the winds fret within the Eolian cave,
Galled by their monarch's chain.⁹ The times¹⁰ were big

With ominous change which, night by night, provoked 535
Keen struggles, and black clouds of passion raised;
But memorable moments intervened
When Wisdom, like the goddess from Jove's brain,¹¹
Broke forth in armour of resplendent words,
Startling the synod.¹² Could a youth, and one 540
In ancient story versed, whose breast had heaved
Under the weight of classic eloquence,
Sit, see, and hear, unthankful, uninspired?¹³

Genius of Burke!

² specious wonders i.e. the work of radical writers like Paine, Wollstonecraft and Godwin.

³ the ingenuous...guides young men taken in by radical ideologues like Thomas Paine – of whom Wordsworth had been one.

⁴ Burke died in 1797.

⁵ abstract rights an allusion to Paine's Rights of Man (1791–2), written in response to Burke (p. 24).

⁶ the majesty Burke.

⁷ Of institutes...time One of Burke's central arguments in the Reflections was that society and its laws constituted 'a partnership not only between those who are living, but between those who are living, those who are dead, and those who are to be born' (p. 15).

8 froward wayward, undisciplined.

9 As the winds...chain Aeolus, god of the winds, was given command of the winds by Zeus, and kept them in a cave, releasing them at will.

10 The times Wordsworth is looking back to the French Revolution, 1789–95.

11 the goddess...brain Minerva, daughter of Zeus, was born without a mother, springing fully armed from her father's head when it was split open by the axe of Prometheus.

12 synod House of Commons, where Burke was known for his passionate oratory.

13 Could a youth...uninspired? Wordsworth in youth was no admirer of Burke, and would not, presumably, have confessed to feeling inspired by his words.

Airey-Force Valley (composed September 1835)¹

From Yarrow Revisited, and Other Poems (1835)

Not a breath of air
Ruffles the bosom of this leafy glen.
From the brook's margin, wide around, the trees
Are steadfast as the rocks; the brook itself,
Old as the hills that feed it from afar, 5
Doth rather deepen than disturb the calm
Where all things else are still and motionless.

And yet, even now, a little breeze, perchance
Escaped from boisterous winds that rage without,
Has entered, by the sturdy oaks unfelt, 10
But to its gentle touch how sensitive
Is the light ash that, pendent from the brow
Of yon dim cave, in seeming silence makes
A soft eye-music of slow-waving boughs,
Powerful almost as vocal harmony 15
To stay the wanderer's steps and soothe his thoughts.

Airey-Force Valley

¹ Aira Force is a waterfall on the north shore of Ullswater. This poem celebrates the gorge that rises above it.

Extempore Effusion upon the Death of James Hogg¹ (composed between 21 November and 3 December 1835)

From Poetical Works (1836)

When first,² descending from the moorlands,
I saw the Stream of Yarrow glide
Along a bare and open valley,
The Ettrick Shepherd³ was my guide.

When last⁴ along its banks I wandered, 5
Through groves that had begun to shed
Their golden leaves upon the pathways,
My steps the Border Minstrel⁵ led.

The mighty Minstrel breathes no longer,
Mid mouldering ruins⁶ low he lies; 10
And death upon the braes of Yarrow
Has closed the Shepherd-poet's eyes:

Nor has the rolling year twice measured,
From sign to sign, its steadfast course,
Since every mortal power of Coleridge⁷ 15
Was frozen at its marvellous source;

The rapt One of the godlike forehead,
The heaven-eyed creature sleeps in earth:
And Lamb,⁸ the frolic and the gentle,
Has vanished from his lonely hearth. 20

Like clouds that rake the mountain-summits,
Or waves that own no curbing hand,
How fast has brother followed brother,
From sunshine to the sunless land!

Yet I, whose lids from infant slumbers 25
Were earlier raised, remain to hear
A timid voice that asks in whispers,
'Who next will drop and disappear?'

Our haughty life is crowned with darkness,
Like London with its own black wreath,⁹ 30
On which with thee, oh Crabbe!¹⁰ forth-looking,
I gazed from Hampstead's breezy heath.

As if but yesterday departed,
Thou too art gone before; but why
O'er ripe fruit, seasonably gathered, 35
Should frail survivors¹¹ heave a sigh?

Mourn rather for that holy Spirit,¹²
Sweet as the spring, as ocean deep;
For Her who, ere her summer faded,
Has sunk into a breathless sleep. 40

No more of old romantic¹³ sorrows,
For slaughtered youth and love-lorn maid!
With sharper grief is Yarrow smitten,
And Ettrick¹⁴ mourns with her their Poet dead.

Extempore Effusion upon the Death of James Hogg

² When first Wordsworth first walked along the banks of the River Yarrow in September 1814.

³ The Ettrick Shepherd the name under which Hogg often published. After his father went bankrupt when he was 6, he was removed from school and spent most of his life as a shepherd.

⁴ When last Wordsworth returned to the Yarrow in September–October 1831, when his guide was Sir Walter Scott, a friend since the early 1800s.

5 the Border Minstrel Sir Walter Scott, died 21 September 1832. His earliest literary success had come with The Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border (1802–3).

6 Mid mouldering ruins Scott was buried at Dryburgh Abbey, 26 September 1832.

7 Samuel Taylor Coleridge died 25 July 1834.

8 Charles Lamb died 27 December 1834. Lamb remained a friend of Wordsworth from the time of their first meeting at Nether Stowey in June 1797. It is appropriate that he follows Coleridge in this list, as they had been friends since their time together at Christ's Hospital.

9 Like London...wreath a reference to the pall of black smoke hanging over London, produced by the burning of household fires.

10 George Crabbe died 3 February 1832; see p. 146.

11 frail survivors Wordsworth was 65 at the time of composition.

12 that holy Spirit Felicia Dorothea Hemans, who became a friend of Wordsworth during her visit to the Lake District in 1830, and corresponded with him until the end of her life, shortened by many years' hard work (see pp. 1241–7). She was the most recently deceased of those celebrated here, having died on 16 May 1835.

13 romantic i.e. from old medieval romances, which provided much of Scott's subject matter.

14 Ettrick the village of Ettrick, where Hogg lived, worked and is buried, is in the Scottish lowlands.

[On the 'Ode'] (extract)

From The Fenwick Notes (dictated 1843)

Nothing was more difficult for me in childhood than to admit the notion of death as a state applicable to my own being. I have said elsewhere: ‘A simple child ... that lightly draws its breath, / And feels its life in every limb – / What should it know of death?’¹ But it was not so much from [excess]² of animal vivacity that my difficulty came, as from a sense of the indomitableness³ of the spirit within me. I used to brood over the stories of Enoch and Elijah, and almost to persuade myself that, whatever might become of others, I should be translated in something of the same way to heaven.

With a feeling congenial to this, I was often unable to think of external things as having external existence, and I communed with all that I saw as something not apart from, but inherent in, my own immaterial nature.⁴ Many times while going to school have I grasped at a wall or tree to recall myself from this abyss of idealism to the reality. At that time I was afraid of such processes. In later periods of life I have deplored (as we have all reason to do) a subjugation of an opposite character, and have rejoiced over the remembrances, as is expressed in the lines, ‘obstinate questionings’,⁵ etc. To that dreamlike vividness and splendour which invest objects of sight in childhood, everyone (I believe, if he would look back) could bear testimony, and I need not dwell upon it here.

But having in the poem regarded it as presumptive evidence of a prior state of existence, I think it right to protest against a conclusion which has given pain to some good and pious persons that I meant to inculcate such a belief. It is far too shadowy a notion to be recommended to faith as more than an element in our instincts of immortality. But let us bear in mind that, though the idea is not advanced in revelation, there is nothing there to contradict it, and the fall of man presents an analogy in its favour. Accordingly, a pre-existent state has entered into the popular creeds of many nations, and among all persons acquainted with classic literature is known as an ingredient in Platonic philosophy.

Archimedes said that he could move the world if he had a point whereon to rest his machine. Who has not felt the same aspirations as regards the world of his own mind? Having to wield some of its elements when I was impelled to write this poem on the immortality of the soul, I took hold of the notion of pre-existence as having sufficient foundation in humanity for authorizing me to make for my purpose the best use of it I could as a poet.

On the ‘Ode’

[On ‘We are Seven’] (extract)

From The Fenwick Notes (dictated 1843)

In reference to this poem, I will here mention one of the most remarkable facts in my own poetic history and that of Mr Coleridge.

In the spring of the year 1798,¹ he, my sister and myself started from Alfoxden, pretty late in the afternoon, with a view to visit Lynton and the Valley of Stones near it. And as our united funds were very small, we agreed to defray the expense of the tour by writing a poem to be sent to the new Monthly Magazine set up by Phillips the bookseller, and edited by Dr Aikin.² Accordingly we set off and proceeded along the Quantock Hills towards Watchet, and in the course of this walk was planned the poem of ‘The Ancient Mariner’, founded on a dream (as Mr Coleridge said) of his friend Mr Cruikshank.³ Much the greatest part of the story was Mr Coleridge’s invention, but certain parts I myself suggested; for example, some crime was to be committed which should bring upon the Old

Navigator (as Coleridge afterwards delighted to call him) the spectral persecution, as a consequence of that crime and his own wanderings.

I had been reading in Shelvocke's *Voyages*⁴ a day or two before, that while doubling Cape Horn they frequently saw albatrosses – in that latitude the largest sort of sea-fowl, some extending their wings 12 or 13 feet. 'Suppose', I said, 'you represent him as having killed one of these birds on entering the South Sea, and that the tutelary spirits of these regions take upon them to avenge the crime?' The incident was thought fit for the purpose, and adopted accordingly. I also suggested the navigation of the ship by the dead men, but do not recollect that I had anything more to do with the scheme of the poem.

The gloss with which it was subsequently accompanied was not thought of by either of us at the time – at least, not a hint of it was given to me – and I have no doubt it was a gratuitous afterthought.⁵ We began the composition together on that (to me) memorable evening; I furnished two or three lines at the beginning of the poem, in particular:

And listened like a three years' child:

The mariner had his will.⁶

These trifling contributions all but one (which Mr Coleridge has with unnecessary scrupulosity recorded)⁷ slipped out of his mind – as they well might. As we endeavoured to proceed conjointly⁸ (I speak of the same evening), our respective manners⁹ proved so widely different that it would have been quite presumptuous in me to do anything but separate from an undertaking upon which I could only have been a clog.

Sir Walter Scott (1771–1832)

Scott was the most successful writer of the age: he was more famous, and far more popular, than any other. Critical opinion regards the ‘Waverley’ novels as his masterpiece. Byron liked them so much he claimed to have read each one fifty times (Marchand viii 13), and in 1812 he told Scott that the Prince Regent ‘preferred you to every bard past and present’ (Marchand ii 182). Scott’s influence has been enormous. David Hewitt notes that more plays have been adapted from his works than from any other writer, while the librettos of some ninety operas are based on his poems and novels, including those of Rossini’s La donna del lago (1819), Bellini’s I puritani (1835), Donizetti’s Lucia di Lammermoor (1839), Bizet’s La jolie fille de Perth (1867) and Sullivan’s Ivanhoe (1891). Despite ups and downs, his literary reputation has prevailed, and with the recent publication of the new Edinburgh Edition of his novels, he is as highly regarded as ever. The poems presented here offer an all-too-brief taste of Scott’s verse, and the extract from his diary provides valuable insight into his technique.

He was born in the Old Town of Edinburgh on 15 August 1771 and as an infant contracted polio, which rendered him permanently lame in the right leg. His earliest years were spent at his grandfather’s farm in the Scottish lowlands near Smailholm, where he learnt folk-songs and heard tales of the Jacobite uprising of 1745. He was educated at Kelso and Edinburgh. After a spell at the University of Edinburgh, he trained as a solicitor and qualified as an advocate in 1792. During his youth he was sympathetic to the French Revolution, then ongoing, but with the Reign of Terror he changed his views, like many others fearing a French invasion. It is worth emphasizing that during these early years he became conversant with a range of different tongues in order to enjoy the literature of other lands. He learned Italian so he could read Ariosto; studied Old Norse in order to read the Sagas; and was able to read Schiller in German and to translate into English the ballads of Gottfried August Bürger. This grounding in languages was to stand him in good stead during his career as a writer.

Scott married in 1797 and settled in Edinburgh. Long a collector of traditional Scots ballads, he published Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border in 1802. Most of its contents were songs gathered during his travels in the lowlands, often in fragmentary, variant forms, which he combined to make complete poems. It was a success, and he was soon asked to revise it for further editions. Scott had been writing poems for years, and had no hesitation about inserting his own works into the Minstrelsy; a more ambitious work, The Lay of the Last Minstrel, was published in 1805, written to a metre borrowed from Coleridge’s ‘Christabel’, which he had heard read aloud from manuscript (it was not published until 1816). It was hugely successful, going through 21 British editions in his lifetime. Scott’s second poem, Marmion, did even better, selling 8,000 copies in its first year. With The Lady of the Lake in 1810, Scott bettered even that, for it sold more than 20,000 copies within seven months of publication. He would go on to publish Rokeby (1813) and The Lord of the Isles (1815), but neither matched the success of his earlier works. As he noted, public taste changed with publication of Childe Harold’s Pilgrimage in 1812.

Having yielded poetry to Byron, Scott turned to the novel, publishing Waverley in 1814. He was as successful as he had been with poetry, and many more were to follow: Guy Mannering (1815); The Antiquary (1816); Tales of my Landlord (1816); Rob Roy (1817); Tales of my Landlord, second series (1818); Tales of my Landlord, third series (1819); Ivanhoe (1819); The Monastery (1820); The Abbot (1820); Kenilworth (1821); The Pirate (1821); The Fortunes of Nigel (1822); Pevekil of the Peak (1823); Quentin Durward (1823); Saint Ronan's Well (1823); Redgauntlet (1824); Tales of the Crusaders (1825); Woodstock (1826); Chronicles of the Canongate (1827); The Fair Maid of Perth (1828); Anne of Geierstein (1829); and Tales of my Landlord, fourth series (1831).

By this period of his life Scott was enough of a Tory to voice his support for the magistrates in the wake of the Peterloo Massacre of 1819, and went on to condemn radical politics in The Visionary (1820). By holding such views he earned the disdain of younger writers; Hazlitt loved the Waverley novels but declined the chance to meet their author when visiting Scotland in 1822: 'I should be willing to kneel to him, but I could not take him by the hand', he told their mutual acquaintance Francis Jeffrey.¹

Scott suffered greatly by the financial crisis of 1825, which triggered a recession that for years brought havoc to the publishing world. Financially embroiled with his publishers, Scott became liable for his losses and theirs, and was rendered bankrupt; until the day he died, his earnings passed directly to his creditors, who placed him on an allowance. 'Poor Sir Walter Scott!' wrote Wordsworth, 'he a Baronet! a literary man! A lawyer!' (LY i 432). Scott did not stint in his industry, producing in quick succession Woodstock (1826), The Life of Napoleon Buonaparte (1827), The Fair Maid of Perth (1828), Anne of Geierstein (1829) and the fourth series of Tales of my Landlord (1831), all of which helped discharge his debts. At the same time Scott revised his novels for a collected edition, which began to be published in 1829. It was a huge money-maker, and by the end of 1833, all Scott's creditors had been satisfied. But this intense labour was demanded at a point in his life when he needed to moderate his exertions, and it was to cost him dearly. His wife's death in 1826 caused him to devote longer hours to writing than ever, which in turn caused headaches, depression, intense pain in his lame leg, and other problems. In February 1830 he experienced his first stroke; a second in November damaged his ability to write. He recovered and drove himself harder than ever, precipitating another stroke in April 1831. In the last year of his life he toured the Mediterranean in the hope that his health would improve. He suffered a fourth stroke on his way home and died at Abbotsford in September 1832.

[Melrose Abbey]¹

From The Lay of the Last Minstrel (1805), Canto II

If thou wouldst view fair Melrose aright,
Go visit it by the pale moonlight,
For the gay beams of lightsome day
Gild but to flout the ruins grey.
When the broken arches are black in night, 5
And each shafted oriel glimmers white;
When the cold light's uncertain shower
Streams on the ruined central tower;
When buttress and buttress, alternately,
Seem framed of ebon and ivory; 10
When silver edges the imagery
And the scrolls that teach thee to live and die;
When distant Tweed is heard to rave
And the owlet to hoot o'er the dead man's grave –
Then go, but go alone the while – 15
Then view St David's ruined pile;²
And home returning, soothly swear
Was never scene so sad and fair!

Melrose Abbey

¹ Melrose Abbey dates back to the twelfth century, and was founded by Cistercian monks. By Scott's day it was in ruins, having been sacked by a series of English kings in the fourteenth and sixteenth centuries, and subsequently by Oliver Cromwell.

² St David's ruined pile Melrose was founded at the behest of King David I of Scotland, the twelfth-century ruler known as 'The Saint' of Scotland.

Caledonia¹

From The Lay of the Last Minstrel (1805), Canto VI

I

Breathes there the man, with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,
 'This is my own, my native land!' –
Whose heart hath ne'er within him burned
As home his footsteps he hath turned 5
 From wandering on a foreign strand?
If such there breathe, go mark him well;
For him no minstrel raptures swell;
High though his titles, proud his name,
Boundless his wealth as wish can claim; 10
Despite those titles, power and pelf,²
The wretch, concentred all in self,
Living, shall forfeit fair renown,
And, doubly dying, shall go down
To the vile dust from whence he sprung, 15
Unwept, unhonoured, and unsung.

II

Oh Caledonia, stern and wild,
Meet nurse for a poetic child!
Land of brown heath and shaggy wood,
Land of the mountain and the flood, 20
Land of my sires! What mortal hand
Can e'er untie the filial band
That knits me to thy rugged strand?
Still as I view each well-known scene,
Think what is now, and what hath been, 25
Seems as, to me, of all bereft,
Sole friends, thy woods and streams were left;
And thus I love them better still,
Even in extremity of ill.
By Yarrow's stream still let me stray, 30
Though none should guide my feeble way;
Still feel the breeze down Etrick break
Although it chill my withered cheek;
Though there, forgotten and alone,
The bard may draw his parting groan. 35

Caledonia

¹ It is important to note, as James Reed has observed, that this poem is the 'enraged response of the Minstrel, a Scot who has just been advised by his auditors that he could find a better living south of the border'. The Minstrel is the representative of an older, autonomous Scotland.

² pelf riches.

Lochinvar¹

From Marmion (1808), from Canto V

Oh, young Lochinvar is come out of the west,
Through all the wide Border² his steed was the best;
And save his good broadsword he weapons had none,
He rode all unarmed, and he rode all alone.
So faithful in love, so dauntless in war, 5
There never was knight like the young Lochinvar.

He stayed not for brake and he stopped not for stone,
He swam the Esk river where ford there was none;
But ere he alighted at Netherby gate,
The bride had consented, the gallant came late: 10
For a laggard in love and a dastard in war
Was to wed the fair Ellen of brave Lochinvar.

So boldly he entered the Netherby Hall
Among bridesmen and kinsmen and brothers and all;
Then spoke the bride's father, his hand on his sword 15
(For the poor craven bridegroom said never a word),
'Oh come ye in peace here, or come ye in war,
Or to dance at our bridal, young Lord Lochinvar?'

'I long wooed your daughter, my suit you denied;
Love swells like the Solway³ but ebbs like its tide. 20
And now am I come, with this lost love of mine
To lead but one measure, drink one cup of wine.
There are maidens in Scotland more lovely by far
That would gladly be bride to the young Lochinvar.'

The bride kissed the goblet; the knight took it up, 25
He quaffed off the wine and he threw down the cup.
She looked down to blush and she looked up to sigh
With a smile on her lips and a tear in her eye.
He took her soft hand ere her mother could bar,
'Now tread we a measure!' said young Lochinvar. 30

So stately his form and so lovely her face
That never a hall such a galliard⁴ did grace;
While her mother did fret and her father did fume
And the bridegroom stood dangling his bonnet and plume,
And the bride-maidens whispered, ‘’Twere better by far 35
To have matched our fair cousin with young Lochinvar.’

One touch to her hand and one word in her ear;
When they reached the hall-door, and the charger stood near –
So light to the croup⁵ the fair lady he swung,
So light to the saddle before her he sprung! 40
‘She is won! We are gone over bank, bush, and scaur!⁶
They’ll have fleet steeds that follow’, quoth young Lochinvar.

There was mounting ’mong Graemes of the Netherby clan;
Forsters, Fenwicks, and Musgraves, they rode and they ran;
There was racing and chasing on Cannobie Lee⁷ 45
But the lost bride of Netherby ne’er did they see.
So daring in love and so dauntless in war,
Have ye e’er heard of gallant like young Lochinvar?

Lochinvar

¹ In Scott’s poem, this song is delivered by an English woman at the court of the Scottish king, James IV.

² Border The Border country; the region on either side of the English and Scottish border.

³ Love swells like the Solway The Solway Firth (which forms part of the border between Scotland and England on the west coast) is famous for the rapid inrush of water when the tide comes in.

⁴ galliard a quick and lively dance in triple time.

⁵ croup horse's hindquarters.

⁶ scaur cliff.

⁷ Cannobie Lee a plain.

Lucy Ashton's Song

From Tales of My Landlord (1819); The Bride of Lammermoor

Look not thou on beauty's charming,
Sit thou still when kings are arming,
Taste not when the wine-cup glistens,
Speak not when the people listens,
Stop thine ear against the singer,
From the red gold keep thy finger;
Vacant heart, and hand, and eye,
Easy live and quiet die.

Scott's Diary

From J. G. Lockhart, Memoirs of the Life of Scott (1837–8)

12 February 1826. Having ended the second volume of Woodstock last night, I had to begin the third this morning.¹ Now I have not the slightest idea how the story is to be wound up to a catastrophe. I am just in the same case as I used to be when I lost myself in former days in some country to which I was a stranger. I always pushed for the pleasantest route, and either found or made it the nearest. It is the same in writing. I never could lay down a plan – or, having laid it down, I never could adhere to it. The action of composition always extended some passages, and abridged or omitted others; and personages were rendered important or insignificant, not according to their agency in the original conception of the piece, but according to the success (or otherwise) with which I was able to bring them out. I only tried to make that which I was actually writing diverting and interesting, leaving the rest to fate.

I have been often amused with the critics distinguishing some passages as particularly laboured, when the pen passed over the whole as fast as it could move, and the eye never again saw them, except in proof. Verse I write twice, and sometimes three times over. This *hab nab*² at a venture is a perilous style, I grant, but I cannot help it. When I strain my mind to ideas which are purely imaginative (for argument is a different thing), it seems to me that the sun leaves the landscape – that I think away the whole vivacity of my original conception, and that the results are cold, tame and spiritless. It is the difference between a written oration and one bursting from the unpremeditated exertions of the speaker which have always something of the air of enthusiasm and inspiration. I would not have young authors imitate my carelessness, however.

Scott's Diary

Dorothy Wordsworth (1771–1855)

Dorothy Wordsworth was born in Cockermouth on 25 December 1771. She was brought up with her brothers until the death of her mother when she was six. At that point she was removed from her family and sent to Halifax in Yorkshire, where she was brought up by her mother's cousin, Elizabeth Threlkeld. The ensuing years were not all unhappy, but she very much missed her brothers. When in December 1783 her father died, she was unable to attend his funeral. Between the ages of 15 and 17 she was brought up by her grandmother in Penrith, and from 1788 to 1794 by her kindly uncle, William Cookson, at Fornsett Rectory in Norfolk. By then a young woman, she spent time with a variety of people in various places: with Elizabeth Threlkeld in Halifax, in Newcastle with the Misses Griffiths (other cousins of her mother), with the Hutchinson family at Sockburn and at Rampside with more cousins (this time on her father's side).

Her life changed when, in the summer of 1795, for the first time since childhood, she was able to live with her brother William at Racedown Lodge in Dorset. Here they lived a settled, domestic existence which neither had known in adulthood. This continued at Alfoxden House in Somerset, where they moved to be close to Coleridge, four miles away in Nether Stowey. She had already written many letters which reveal a precocious literary talent, but it was at Alfoxden that her abilities blossomed with the writing of a journal. The manuscripts of the Alfoxden journal are now lost, but transcripts show that her close, detailed observations of the natural world were the inspiration for much of her brother's poetry, and constitute a significant literary achievement in themselves.

She went to Germany with her brother in 1798 and settled with him at Dove Cottage on 20 December 1799. It was probably the most important event in her life. Here she was to write the Grasmere journals which, besides continuing to provide the source for much of Wordsworth's poetry, documented the goings-on of life over the first three years of their lives at Dove Cottage. It was her masterpiece. As Pamela Woof has written:

There is simply nothing like it anywhere else. This Journal calls out to us directly across some two hundred years, and its writer and her world come alive. It sometimes moves in little rushes when days can be noted with a staccato speed; it sometimes slows down to linger on a single figure: a beggar woman, a leech-gatherer, a child catching hailstones at a cottage door, a bow-bent postman with his little wooden box at his back, an old seaman with a beard like grey plush; it sometimes slows to linger on a whole scene: a funeral, or children with their mother by a fire, or a lakeshore on a windy day with daffodils, or a man with carts going up a hill and a little girl putting stones behind the wheels... The Journal conveys directly the unpremeditated rhythms; they seem comfortable with Dorothy's nature; they reflect her wholehearted acceptance of the experience of living.¹

The most important thing about the journals is, of course, that their naturalness and unliterariness depend on the fact that Dorothy never intended them to be published; they were private documents, intended only for her eyes and those of her brother. And yet it is the same perspective as that of the great poet of The Prelude, for here are the same characters, the same village folk, the same sharp observation of the natural world. They are guileless, undeceived, full of compassion and wisdom about the ways of the world. I am indebted in my work on the journals to Pamela Woof's exemplary paperback edition, which contains the most accurate text and the most helpful notes of any thus far published.

Some of Dorothy's poetry was published during her lifetime, mainly alongside her brother's in his collected works. She began writing in about 1805, and seems to have continued writing, very occasionally until after the onset of dementia in 1829. Her last years were marked by a sad and slow decline; she survived her brother by five years, and was nursed until her death by Mary Wordsworth. A selection of her verse is presented here, edited from Dorothy's Commonplace Book at Dove Cottage.

From The Grasmere Journals

Wednesday 3 September 1800

Coleridge, William and John¹ went from home to go upon Helvellyn² with Mr Simpson. They set out after breakfast. I accompanied them up near the blacksmith's – a fine, coolish morning. I ironed till half past three, now very hot. I then went to a funeral at John Dawson's³ – about ten men and four women. Bread, cheese and ale; they talked sensibly and cheerfully about common things. The dead person, 56 years of age, buried by the parish; the coffin was neatly lettered and painted black and covered with a decent cloth. They set the corpse down at the door and, while we stood within the threshold, the men with their hats off sang with decent and solemn countenances a verse of a funeral psalm. The corpse was then borne down the hill and they sang till they had got past the Town End.⁴

I was affected to tears while we stood in the house, the coffin lying before me. There were no near kindred, no children. When we got out of the dark house, the sun was shining and the prospect looked so divinely beautiful as I never saw it. It seemed more sacred than I had ever seen it, and yet more allied to human life. The green fields, neighbours of the churchyard, were green as possible and, with the brightness of the sunshine, looked quite gay. I thought she was going to a quiet spot and I could not help weeping very much.

When we came to the bridge, they began to sing again and stopped during four lines before they entered the churchyard. The priest⁵ met us – he did not look as a man ought to do on such an occasion (I had seen him half-drunk the day before in a pothouse).⁶ Before we came with the corpse one of the company observed he wondered what sort of cue⁷ ‘our parson would be in’? N.B. It was the day after the fair.⁸ I had not finished ironing till 7 o’clock. The wind was now high and I did not walk. Writing my journal now at 8 o’clock. William and John came home at 10 o’clock.

Wednesday 3 September 1800

¹ John Wordsworth (1773–1805), brother of William and Dorothy, a sea-captain, visited Dove Cottage, January–September 1800.

² Helvellyn is a large mountain (3,116 ft) that towers above Grasmere.

³ John Dawson’s farm was on the Rydal road at the top of the hill behind Dove Cottage. The funeral was that of a pauper, Susan Shacklock.

⁴ Town End the small cluster of cottages (including Dove Cottage) just off the main road to Keswick, half a mile from the village of Grasmere.

⁵ The priest Edward Rowlandson, curate of Grasmere for more than forty years. He was notorious for getting drunk.

⁶ pothouse ale-house, tavern.

⁷ cue condition.

⁸ the fair Grasmere fair is held yearly in the meadows between Town End and the village of Grasmere.

Friday 3 October 1800 (extract)¹

When William and I returned from accompanying Jones, we met an old man almost double. He had on a coat thrown over his shoulders above his waistcoat and coat. Under this he carried a bundle and had an apron on and a nightcap. His face was interesting. He had dark eyes and a long nose (John, who afterwards met him at Wythburn, took him for a Jew). He was of Scotch parents but had been born in the army. He had had a wife, ‘and a good woman, and it pleased God to bless us with ten children’; all these were dead but one of whom he had not heard for many years, a sailor. His trade was to gather leeches,² but now leeches are scarce and he had not strength for it. He lived by begging and was making his way to Carlisle where he should buy a few godly books to sell. He said leeches were very scarce partly owing to this dry season, but many years they have been scarce. He supposed it owing to their being much sought-after, that they did not breed fast, and were of slow growth. Leeches were formerly 2s. 6d. per 100; they are now 30s. He had been hurt in driving a cart: his leg broke, his body driven over, his skull fractured. He felt no pain till he recovered from his first insensibility;³ it was then ‘late in the evening, when the light was just going away.’

Friday 3 October 1800

¹ This entry was written a week after the encounter had taken place; it is a source for Wordsworth’s ‘Resolution and Independence’, composed eighteen months later.

² leeches blood-letting was the usual method of treating physical ailments such as fevers, and a favoured means of performing this operation was to apply leeches to the patient's skin.

³ insensibility unconsciousness.

Thursday 15 April 1802¹

It was a threatening misty morning, but mild. We set off after dinner from Eusemere; Mrs Clarkson² went a short way with us but turned back. The wind was furious and we thought we must have returned. We first rested in the large boathouse, then under a furze-bush opposite Mr Clarkson's; saw the plough going in the field. The wind seized our breath, the lake was rough. There was a boat by itself floating in the middle of the bay below Water Millock; we rested again in the Water Millock lane. The hawthorns are black and green, the birches here and there greenish but there is yet more of purple to be seen on the twigs. We got over into a field to avoid some cows – people working, a few primroses by the roadside, woodsorrel flowers, the anemone, scentless violets, strawberries, and that starry yellow flower which Mrs Clarkson calls pilewort.³

When we were in the woods beyond Gowbarrow Park⁴ we saw a few daffodils⁵ close to the waterside. We fancied that the lake had floated the seeds ashore and that the little colony had so sprung up. But as we went along there were more and yet more, and at last, under the boughs of the trees, we saw that there was a long belt of them along the shore, about the breadth of a country turnpike road. I never saw daffodils so beautiful. They grew among the mossy stones, about and about them; some rested their heads upon these stones as on a pillow for weariness, and the rest tossed and reeled and danced, and seemed as if they verily laughed with the wind that blew upon them over the lake. They looked so gay – ever-glancing, ever-changing. This wind blew directly over the lake to them. There was, here and there, a little knot, and a few stragglers a few yards higher up – but they were so few as not to disturb the simplicity and unity and life of that one busy highway. We rested again and again.

The bays were stormy, and we heard the waves at different distances and in the middle of the water like the sea. Rain came on; we were wet when we reached Luff's but we called in. Luckily all was cheerless and gloomy, so we faced the storm – we must have been wet if we had waited; put on dry clothes at Dobson's. I was very kindly treated by a young woman, the landlady looked sour but it is her way. She gave us a goodish supper, excellent ham and potatoes. We paid 7s. when we came away. William was sitting by a bright fire when I came downstairs; he soon made his way to the library piled up in a corner of the window. He brought out a volume of Enfield's Speaker,⁶ another miscellany, and an odd volume of Congreve's plays. We had a glass of warm rum and water; we enjoyed ourselves and wished for Mary.⁷ It rained and blew when we went to bed. N.B. Deer in Gowbarrow Park like to skeletons.

² Mrs Clarkson Catherine Clarkson (1772–1856), wife of Thomas Clarkson (1760–1846), agitator for abolition of the slave trade, from about 1785 onwards. After his health collapsed in 1794 he built a house, Eusemere, on Ullswater. Dorothy had been friendly with the Clarksons since meeting them in September 1800.

³ pilewort the lesser celandine.

⁴ beyond Gowbarrow Park on the western shore of Ullswater, the Park belonged to the Duke of Norfolk.

⁵ daffodils not the garden daffodils of today but the small, pale and wild Narcissus pseudonarcissus.

⁶ Enfield's Speaker William Enfield, The Speaker; or Miscellaneous Pieces Selected from the Best English Writers (1774), popular anthology, frequently reprinted. Dorothy had met Enfield in 1788.

⁷ Mary Mary Hutchinson, who would marry Wordsworth in October.

Thursday 29 April 1802

A beautiful morning. The sun shone and all was pleasant. We sent off our parcel to Coleridge by the wagon. Mr Simpson heard the cuckoo today. Before we went out, after I had written down 'The Tinker', which William finished this morning, Luff¹ called. He was very lame, limped into the kitchen (he came on a little pony).

We then went to John's Grove,² sat a while at first. Afterwards William lay and I lay in the trench under the fence – he with his eyes shut and listening to the waterfalls and the birds. There was no one waterfall above another – it was a sound of waters in the air, the voice of the air. William heard me breathing and rustling now and then, but we both lay still and unseen by one another. He thought that it would be as sweet thus to lie so in the grave, to hear the peaceful sounds of the earth and just to know that one's dear friends were near.³ The lake was still; there was a boat out. Silver How⁴ reflected with delicate purple and yellowish hues as I have seen [in] spar.⁵ Lambs on the island⁶ and running races together by the half-dozen in the round field near us. The copses greenish, hawthorn green.

Came home to dinner, then went to Mr Simpson.⁷ We rested a long time under a wall. Sheep and lambs were in the field – cottages smoking. As I lay down on the grass, I observed the glittering silver line on the ridges of the backs of the sheep, owing to their situation respecting the sun, which made them look beautiful but with something of strangeness, like animals of another kind – as if belonging to a more splendid world. Met old Mr Simpson at the door; Mrs Simpson poorly. I got mullens⁸ and pansies. I was sick and ill and obliged to come home soon. We went to bed immediately – I slept upstairs. The air coldish where it was felt somewhat frosty.

Thursday 29 April 1802

⁴ Silver How mountain on the western side of Grasmere lake, opposite Town End.

⁵ spar crystalline mineral.

⁶ the island in the middle of Grasmere lake.

⁷ Mr Simpson Revd. Joseph Simpson of High Broadrairie, Grasmere, vicar of the small church at Wythburn. He died on 27 June 1807 at the age of 92.

⁸ mullens the mullein is a plant with a spike of yellow flowers and hairy leaves.

4 October 1802

On Monday 4 October 1802, my brother William was married to Mary Hutchinson.¹ I slept a good deal of the night and rose fresh and well in the morning. At a little after 8 o'clock I saw them go down the avenue towards the church.² William had parted from me upstairs. I gave him the wedding ring – with how deep a blessing! I took it from my forefinger where I had worn it the whole of the night before; he slipped it again onto my finger and blessed me fervently.³

When they were absent, my dear little Sara⁴ prepared the breakfast. I kept myself as quiet as I could, but when I saw the two men⁵ running up the walk, coming to tell us it was over, I could stand it no longer and threw myself on the bed where I lay in stillness, neither hearing or seeing anything till Sara came upstairs to me and said, ‘They are coming’. This forced me from the bed where I lay, and I moved I knew not how straightforward, faster than my strength could carry me, till I met my beloved William and fell upon his bosom. He and John Hutchinson led me to the house and there I stayed to welcome my dear Mary. As soon as we had breakfasted we departed.⁶ It rained when we set off. Poor Mary was much agitated when she parted from her brothers and sisters and her home.

¹ Wordsworth had known Mary Hutchinson since early childhood, when they attended Ann Birkett’s dame school together.

² Wordsworth was married at All Saints Church, Brompton-by-Sawdon, Yorkshire, a mile or so down the road from Gallow Hill (today called Gallows Hill), where the Hutchinson family resided. Only five people were present at the service: besides the couple, Mary’s siblings, Thomas, John and Joanna.

³ Pamela Woof comments: ‘That Dorothy wore the ring the night before denotes her full acceptance of Mary Hutchinson and the marriage, and that Wordsworth slipped it for a moment back on to her finger was surely a pledge that the marriage would not exclude her’ (Grasmere Journals 265). The ring may be seen in the Wordsworth Museum, Grasmere.

4 Sara Hutchinson, Mary's sister.

5 the two men John and Thomas Hutchinson, Mary's brothers, were witnesses.

6 we departed for Dove Cottage.

A Cottage in Grasmere Vale* (composed c. 1805, edited from MS)

Peaceful our valley, fair and green,
And beautiful her cottages,
Each in its nook, its sheltered hold,
Or guarded by its tuft of trees –

Many and beautiful they are, 5
But there is one that I love best,
A lowly shed in truth it is,
A brother of the rest.

Yet when I sit on rock or hill,
Down looking on the valley fair, 10
That cottage with its clustering trees
Summons my heart – it settles there.

Others there are whose small domain
Of fertile fields and hedgerows green
Might more entice a wanderer's mind 15
To wish that there his home had been.

Such wish be his! I blame him not,
My fancy is unfettered, wild!
I love that house because it is
The very mountains' child. 20

Fields hath it of its own, green fields,
But they are craggy, steep and bare;

Their fence is of the mountain stone
And moss and lichen flourish there.

And when the storm comes from the north 25
It lingers near that pastoral spot,
And piping through the mossy walls,
It seems delighted with its lot.

And let it take its own delight,
And let it range the pastures bare; 30
Until it reach that group of trees
It may not enter there.

A green unfading grove it is,
Skirted with many a lesser tree –
Hazel and holly, beech and oak – 35
A bright and flourishing company!

Precious the shelter of those trees,
They screen the cottage that I love;
The sunshine pierces to the roof
And the tall pine-trees tower above. 40

After-recollection at sight of the same cottage (edited from MS)

When first I saw that dear abode
It was a lovely winter's day;¹
After a night of perilous storm
The west wind ruled with gentle sway –
A day so mild it might have been 5
The first day of the gladsome spring;
The robins warbled, and I heard
One solitary throstle² sing.

¹ When first...day 20 November 1799, when the Wordsworths moved into Dove Cottage.

² thrortle thrush.

A Sketch* (composed by 1826; edited from MS)

There is one cottage in our dale,
In naught distinguished from the rest,
Save by a tuft of flourishing trees,
The shelter of that little nest.

The public road through Grasmere vale 5
Winds close beside that cottage small,
And there 'tis hidden by the trees
That overhang the orchard wall.

You lose it there – its serpent line
Is lost in that close household grove; 10
A moment lost – and then it mounts
The craggy hills above.

Thoughts on my Sickbed* (composed c.1831; edited from MS)¹

And has the remnant of my life
Been pilfered of this sunny spring?
And have its own prelusive sounds²
Touched in my heart no echoing string?

Ah, say not so! The hidden life, 5
Couchant³ within this feeble frame,

Hath been enriched by kindred gifts
That undesired, unsought-for, came

With joyful heart in youthful days,
When fresh each season in its round 10
I welcomed the earliest celandine
Glittering upon the mossy ground.

With busy eyes I pierced the lane
In quest of known and unknown things;
The primrose a lamp on its fortress rock, 15
The silent butterfly spreading its wings,

The violet betrayed by its noiseless breath,
The daffodil dancing in the breeze,
The carolling thrush on his naked perch,
Towering above the budding trees. 20

Our cottage-hearth no longer our home,
Companions of nature were we;
The stirring, the still, the loquacious, the mute –
To all we gave our sympathy.

Yet never in those careless days 25
When springtime in rock, field, or bower
Was but a fountain of earthly hope
A promise of fruits and the splendid flower –

No! – then I never felt a bliss
That might with that compare, 30
Which, piercing to my couch of rest,
Came on the vernal air.

When loving friends an offering brought,
The first flowers of the year,
Culled from the precincts of our home, 35
From nooks to memory dear,

With some sad thoughts the work was done,
Unprompted and unbidden,

But joy it brought to my hidden life,
To consciousness no longer hidden. 40

I felt a power unfelt before,
Controlling weakness, languor, pain;
It bore me to the terrace-walk,⁴
I trod the hills again.

No prisoner in this lonely room, 45
I saw the green banks of the Wye,⁵
Recalling thy prophetic words –
Bard, brother, friend from infancy!

No need of motion or of strength
Or even the breathing air, 50
I thought of nature's loveliest scenes,
And with memory I was there.

Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1772–1834)

While preparing the manuscript of his Lectures on the English Poets (1818) for publication, Hazlitt scribbled a note about a former friend that would not make it into the printed text:

He is the earliest friend I ever had, and I will add to increase the obligation, that he is the only person from whom I ever learnt anything in conversation. He was the only person I ever knew who answered to my idea of a man of genius, and that idea at the time I first became acquainted with Mr. Coleridge was somewhat higher than it is at present. (Wu ii 379)

When he first met Coleridge in January 1798, Hazlitt fell in love with his intellect, but in after-years felt aggrieved at Coleridge's failure to fulfil his potential. What he did not foresee was that posterity would judge Coleridge to be one of the finest poets of the day, for three remarkable, indisputably great poems – 'The Ancient Mariner', 'Kubla Khan' and 'Christabel'.

Samuel Taylor Coleridge was the tenth and last child of the Reverend John Coleridge, the vicar of the village of Ottery St Mary and headmaster of the local grammar school. Although he died when his youngest son was only 8, John Coleridge had by then filled him with an unquenchable love of ideas and books (see Coleridge's letter to Poole, pp. 638–9). Shortly after his father's death, Coleridge was sent to Christ's Hospital in the City of London, where he was to meet his lifelong friend, Charles Lamb (see This Lime-Tree Bower my Prison and headnote to Lamb, pp. 756–60). As a Grecian (a member of the highest class), he benefited from an excellent education in the classics, although the techniques used to impart such skills were by modern standards less than humane.¹

Coleridge had a turbulent time at Jesus College, Cambridge, where he matriculated in 1791 at the age of 19. It was here that he began to espouse republicanism and became interested in the brand of Unitarianism promoted by the Reverend Joseph Priestley, more famous today for his scientific experiments with electricity and gases than for his theological writings. (Among other things, his experiments with what he called 'phlogiston' led to the discovery of oxygen.) While he was at Cambridge Coleridge became a supporter of William Frend, whose Peace and Union (1793), a pamphlet advocating parliamentary reform and increased suffrage, led to its author's expulsion from the University. In the midst of this, Coleridge joined the King's Light Dragoons under the name Silas Tomkyn Comberbache. It took six weeks and the strenuous efforts of his brother George to gain his release – by no means a straightforward procedure. After an unofficial payment of 25 guineas, the Regimental Muster Roll recorded: 'discharged S. T. Comberbache, Insane; 10 April 1794'.

In June Coleridge met Robert Southey, at that time an undergraduate at Balliol College, Oxford. Southey's achievements included having edited The Flagellant, an anti-flogging journal, at Westminster School, which had led swiftly to his expulsion. Southey was now engaged on Joan of Arc, an epic poem of which 10,000 lines had already been consigned to the fire for being so bad. Together they devised a radical political scheme called 'pantisocracy' – a word deriving from the Greek pant-isocratia, an all-equal society.² Together with Southey's college friend Robert Lovell, they planned to establish a commune on the banks of the Susquehanna River in Pennsylvania, where Priestley had settled in April 1794. Coleridge and Southey hoped that twelve married couples could be converted to pantisocratic ideals, and would embark from Bristol for America in April 1795. In this society which rejected property ownership, the men would each contribute £125 to a common fund, and labour on a landholding for two or three hours a day. As a first step it was decided they would get married in England. Lovell had already married Mary Fricker, whose widowed mother kept a dress shop in Bristol. Mary had two sisters; Southey would marry the third sister, Edith, while Coleridge would marry the eldest, Sara.

Pantisocracy was a product of the moment. It would not survive the pressure of the adult world, and the much hoped-for emigration to America never took place. All the same, Coleridge married Sara on 4 October 1795, something he would later regret. They were temperamentally ill-suited; she took no part in his intellectual life, and resented the increasing amount of time he devoted to his work, much of which was conducted away from home. All the same, they were happy at the outset, Coleridge recording in a letter to his friend Thomas Poole that he was 'united to the woman whom I love best of all created beings ... Mrs Coleridge – MRS COLERIDGE!! – I like to write the name' (Griggs ii 160). She is a key figure in Coleridge's poems of this period, notably The Eolian Harp, Reflections on Having Left a Place of Retirement and This Lime-Tree Bower My Prison.

The mid-1790s were a period of frenetic activity. Coleridge delivered lectures expounding his philosophical and religious beliefs in Bristol in 1795, and founded and largely wrote his own periodical, The Watchman, in 1796. A cornerstone of his thesis was that the millennium – Christ’s thousand-year rule on earth – was nigh, and that the French Revolution was its harbinger: ‘Speed it, oh Father! Let thy Kingdom come!’ he wrote in the final line of Reflections on Having Left a Place of Retirement. Humanity would not be able to resist these redemptive forces, and all would be united in a common apprehension of good. In times as cynical as our own, it is hard to understand how anyone could invent theories so idealistic, but Coleridge was typical of his generation in wishing to do so. They had watched the French Revolution, which had promised so much, go sour; now they wanted to see whether there were other, non-violent means by which its ideals of liberté, egalité and fraternité might be achieved.

His year of intense association with Wordsworth and Dorothy began in July 1797 when Coleridge brought them from Dorset to live a few miles down the road from his cottage in Nether Stowey at Alfoxden House near Holford (see p. 632). Wordsworth’s influence registered immediately in This Lime-Tree Bower my Prison, which contains an element new to Coleridge’s writing: love of nature. At its conclusion he is no longer the self-pitying solitary, ‘Lamed by the scathe of fire’ (as he has it in the earliest text), but is solaced by the awareness of natural beauty even in that most unlovely of birds, ‘the last rook’, on which he bestows a blessing. The emotional arc from pensiveness to consolation is traced also in ‘Frost at Midnight’ and ‘Dejection: An Ode’.

‘Fears in Solitude’ (the title of which aptly describes the usual starting point of the conversation poems) brings together the joint concerns of politics and morality. Its central preoccupation is the fear that the British have become, as Coleridge puts it, ‘A selfish, lewd, effeminated race’, and that in their decadence they have declared war not merely on Revolutionary France, but on God and the natural world. As an emblem of this, he imagines:

Boys and girls,
And women that would groan to see a child
Pull off an insect’s leg – all read of war,
The best amusement for our morning meal!

(ll. 101–4)

At a time of national emergency, this was tantamount to announcing one’s support for the French, and it is little wonder, given the repressiveness of Pitt’s government, that a spy was sent to investigate the possibility that Coleridge and the Wordsworths were in league with them.³

By the time he composed ‘Fears in Solitude’, Coleridge knew that it was written in the same manner as ‘The Eolian Harp’, ‘Reflections on Having Left a Place of Retirement’ and ‘This Lime-Tree Bower’ – sermoni propiora (‘more like conversation’), as he puts it in the epigraph of ‘Reflections’. These ‘conversation poems’ were written as ‘a sort of middle thing between poetry and oratory’ – unabashed about moralizing in a style that was almost prosaic. Although he sometimes sounds apologetic about them, they are now regarded as among his finest works.

It is a mark of his versatility that at the time he was writing his conversation poems, he was also writing three great works that have a distinct rhetorical style, and which take a different view of our place in the cosmos. The first of them, ‘The Ancient Mariner’, is presented here in both the 1798 version (published with Lyrical Ballads, pp. 339–57) and that of 1817 – the first to introduce the marginal glosses which serve both as commentary and counterpoint to the narrative (see pp. 714–31).

Its protagonist continues to fascinate because he is such a potent emanation of our darker side. What is the cause of his woes? A thoughtless, random act of a kind no different from the kind committed by millions of people every day. ‘With my crossbow / I shot the albatross’, he says. Coleridge’s insight is that sometimes we neither know nor can explain why we do what we do. We act, and are condemned to suffer the consequences.

Which, in the Mariner’s case, are no joke. The first thing that happens is that the boat in which he is sailing gets trapped in a dead calm – ‘For all averred I had killed the bird / That made the breeze to blow’. Having run out of drinking water, the Mariner and his shipmates see ‘death-fires’, have nightmares, and dehydrate for lack of moisture. Rightly identifying the Mariner as the cause, the sailors hang the albatross’s corpse round his neck (a full-grown albatross can weigh as much as 26 pounds with a wingspan of 3.5 metres). Then, who should come visiting but Death and his girlfriend, Life-in-Death, ‘who thicks man’s blood with cold’? They play dice: Death wins the sailors and Life-in-Death the Mariner, who is condemned to watch mutely while his shipmates drop dead. ‘The many men so beautiful, / And they all dead did lie!’ It is by random turns that the innocent are punished for the sins of others, or for no reason at all. To which there’s not a great deal to be said, other than that it is a fact of life to which we bear witness every day of our lives. No one else was writing in this way in 1797.

Perhaps Coleridge felt uncomfortable with it. At the time he composed the poem he was a Unitarian priest and would not have professed belief in a world in which random acts led to punishment of the innocent. Like any Christian, he believed in a universe governed by a benevolent, loving God, as described in the poem’s concluding lines.

He prayeth best who loveth best
All things both great and small,
For the dear God who loveth us,
He made and loveth all.

It is a nice thought, but what weight can it carry in the context of what we have seen? This is a story of damnation. It concerns a godless, arbitrary world in which disproportionate misery is dealt out to the suffering innocent. In short, it is a world that is recognizably our own. Don’t be foxed by the archaic diction, the allegory, or the machinery of the traditional ballad, for this is the most contemporary of poems. It speaks of our own twenty-first century sensibility, our sense of powerlessness in the face of forces larger than ourselves.

‘Kubla Khan’ is presented here both in its earliest manuscript text and in the form in which it was published in 1816, with Coleridge’s preface. It is a poem like no other. After what we might imagine to be decades of exertion on the battlefield, the Khan Kubla yearns for repose and peace, building an earthly paradise to which he can retire, walled round for his protection. And yet, for all his wealth and worldly power, he cannot cleanse his Eden of such unsettling elements as ‘Ancestral voices prophesying war!’ Those voices come from the depths of humanity; they speak of violent, hostile urges which are biologically programmed within us. And, despite whatever urge we may feel to make our lives afresh, to find peace, calm and happiness, those ancestral voices will forever have their say. They are part of our inheritance. A poem that went no further would be remarkable enough, but it proceeds to describe a poet-figure attempting to build the Khan's pleasure-dome 'in air', inspired by the vision of 'an Abyssinian maid'. The poet is also a slave to his inspiration, which distinguishes him from those around him. The poem seems to ask what place he has in the world, what function he can reasonably fulfil.

When he published 'Kubla Khan' Coleridge apologized for not having finished it, presenting it 'rather as a psychological curiosity than on the ground of any supposed poetic merits' (p. 639); in truth, it could not have been more complete than it is. Whatever his ambitions for it, 'Kubla Khan' stands as one of the most powerful poems of the Romantic period.

From Coleridge's perspective (and that of his contemporaries) 'Christabel' was also defective in being fragmentary. Only Part I was written in 1798; the remainder of what survives was completed by 1801. Its author had plans to conclude his strange adult fairy-tale, and on that basis was at one stage to have been included in Lyrical Ballads (1800). But he could not bring it to a resolution, and in any case, finished or not, it was altogether too weird for Wordsworth's taste, so it was dropped. It remained in manuscript for years, being read by Coleridge to horrified social gatherings, until Byron, having attended one such reading, instructed his publisher John Murray to put it into print. Anxious to keep the most lucrative bestseller in the stable happy, Murray obliged. It was almost universally panned, perhaps not surprisingly. No one quite knew how to take such a dark tale, particularly one that lacked 'an ending'.

Yet even in its unfinished state, 'Christabel' is a masterpiece. Its plot does not need resolving – at least not in the manner Coleridge proposed (see p. 675 n. 45) – because it depends not on the intricacies of narrative, but on the powerful forces that drive its characters. It is no accident that the poem's protagonist has a name bringing together two suffering innocents from the Bible (Christ/Abel), nor that the 'hissing sound' she emits in Part II indicates her possession by whatever evil spirit Geraldine represents. Its key event is the stripping of Geraldine before she gets into bed with Christabel:

Behold! her bosom and half her side –
A sight to dream of, not to tell!
And she is to sleep by Christabel.

(ll. 246–8)

The nature of what Coleridge is trying to discuss is clearer in the manuscript, where we are told that Geraldine's side is 'lean and old and foul of hue', a detail excised in the published text. It was Hazlitt who pointed out that this line 'is necessary to make common sense of the first and second part'.⁴ What he meant was that it reveals that Geraldine is not really human, that the poem is not therefore concerned principally with a sexual act. For Geraldine is predatory by nature, like a snake or scorpion; she is doomed to 'infect', 'contaminate' or even 'deflower' the 'innocent' Christabel. From the moment of their meeting, she is compelled to convey to Christabel the pain and suffering we will witness in Part II of the poem. When Christabel falls to the ground with a hissing sound, we recognize that some essential part of Geraldine has become part of her, and that the two women now share the same dark secret.

However carefully we explicate Coleridge's three great poems, their precise meaning seems always to elude us – or perhaps, more accurately, it might be said that they speak to a part of us that finds it impossible to articulate the full extent of what it perceives. That may be because they speak to the same part of the psyche that responds to fairy-tales, which need no explication. And therein lies their greatness.

In some ways the most important product of 1797–8 was another fragmentary work: ‘The Recluse’. It was the most ambitious poem Coleridge would never write. For some time he had planned an epic poem about man, nature and society entitled The Brook, an amplification and development of Religious Musings (1794–6). But his love and regard for Wordsworth was such that he ‘gave’ it to him, believing him the only person capable of writing it. Many of its central theories – such as its reworking of the idealist philosophy of Berkeley and the associationist thought of Hartley – went straight into Wordsworth’s poems of that moment; see, for instance, ‘The Ruined Cottage’, ‘The Pedlar’ and ‘Not Useless do I Deem’ (pp. 431–44, 444–53, 453–7). But the tragedy of Wordsworth’s career was that he would never be able to complete it. Wordsworth hoped, when he published The Excursion (1814), that it would be understood to be ‘the second part of a long and laborious work, which is to consist of three parts’⁵ (that is, ‘The Recluse’), but Coleridge was disappointed with it, and his letter to Wordsworth of 1815 (pp. 709–11) elucidates the mind-boggling ambitions of the poem that would never be – far too grandiose for anyone, however gifted, to have written.

Though an exhilarating period, 1797–8, the year of close association with the Wordsworths, was precarious. Coleridge lived on very little, with a growing family to support. In December 1797 the Wedgwood brothers sent him a gift of £100, but Coleridge returned it, saying he needed a secure income. Instead, he took the post of Unitarian minister and travelled to Shrewsbury, where he delivered a sermon on 14 January 1798. Here he met the young William Hazlitt, who describes their first meeting in ‘My First Acquaintance with Poets’ (pp. 794–807). A career as a clergyman might have brought the close working relationship with Wordsworth to a premature conclusion had it not been for the Wedgwoods. After spending the night at Hazlitt’s home in Wem, Coleridge received a letter from them offering him an annuity of £150 a year for life, were he to devote himself to poetry and philosophy. Two days later he wrote to accept, and returned to Stowey, via the Wedgwoods, in early February.

With Wordsworth, Coleridge devised the Lyrical Ballads principally as a means of raising money to visit Germany, which they believed to be the centre of the intellectual world and the most appropriate place for the poet of ‘The Recluse’ to gather his materials. At first Coleridge expected to write as many poems as Wordsworth, but he experienced writer’s block, probably as a result of opium addiction. Instead he quarried two extracts from his play, Osorio, and sent them to Wordsworth with ‘The Ancient Mariner’ and ‘The Nightingale’, neither of which was written specifically for Lyrical Ballads.

When he composed ‘A Letter to Sara Hutchinson’ in April 1802, Coleridge was at odds with his wife and hopelessly in love with Sara Hutchinson (who would become Wordsworth’s sister-in-law); within hours of its composition, he would sit up all night encouraging Wordsworth to propose marriage to Mary Hutchinson. That would always pain him because he could not help but feel jealous at his inability to take the same step with regard to Sara. The enduring misery of his ‘coarse domestic life’ made him increasingly bitter. That, combined with frequent bouts of illness and dependence on opium, led him to resent Wordsworth’s stable and satisfying home life. He solaced himself with the thought of how, in happier times, he, Sara and Mary sat together in front of the fire – an incident recalled in ‘The Day-Dream’, ‘A Letter to Sara Hutchinson’ and ‘A Day-Dream’. But as the years passed even that memory failed to compensate him for the suspicion that Wordsworth had cheated him of happiness, and in December 1806 he would believe he had seen him and Sara Hutchinson in bed: ‘An hour and more with [Wordsworth] in bed – O agony!’⁶ Whether or not this horrific vision was opium-induced, his response was typically extreme, and it served only to deepen his resentment over time. Even before this, the strains between them are evident in such poems as ‘Spots in the Sun’ (p. 704) and Wordsworth’s ‘A Complaint’ (p. 585).

Coleridge’s last conversation poem is a final, valiant attempt to resist the various enemies that were destroying both the friendship and his ability to write poetry. ‘To William Wordsworth’, edited here from the earliest complete manuscript, is his immediate response to the Thirteen-Book Prelude, which he heard its author recite in January 1807. He was one of the few to have read it in its entirety, as it would remain unpublished until after Wordsworth’s death. Coleridge was profoundly impressed by it, and he poured all the energy he could into this celebration of poetic vigour, wanting to do justice to ‘A tale divine of high and passionate thoughts / To their own music chaunted!’ (ll. 39–40). The Prelude is hailed as ultimate proof, were any needed, that Wordsworth was truly the author of ‘The Recluse’. Coleridge could not have been more wrong. Wordsworth had probably never been capable of writing ‘The Recluse’, except perhaps for a few optimistic months in 1798. Neither of them could accept that, and only with the passing of many years would the painful truth begin to dawn.

Given the complications that crept into their friendship, it is remarkable that they remained on close terms for as long as they did. In 1810 a mutual friend, Basil Montagu, falsely told Coleridge that Wordsworth had asked him to say that he had been a complete nuisance to his family because he was a ‘rotten drunkard’. Wordsworth disclaimed the remark as soon as he heard it, but the misunderstandings of earlier years made it impossible for Coleridge either to forget or forgive. Wordsworth visited London in 1812 to effect a reconciliation, but without success. Despite the intercession of mutual acquaintances, frequent meetings in London and a joint tour of the Continent in 1822, they would never recapture the closeness they had once enjoyed.

Coleridge’s later years were mitigated by the generosity of James Gillman, a doctor, and his wife, who took him in as a house guest at their Highgate home from April 1816 until Coleridge’s death in 1834. Their aim was to manage his opium consumption, help him become more productive, and perhaps even prolong his life. They succeeded in all these tasks. A series of long prose works followed, many dictated to amanuenses: The Statesman’s Manual (1816), lectures on Shakespeare, Milton, Dante, Spenser, Ariosto and Cervantes (1819), lectures on philosophy (1818–19), Aids to Reflection (1825) and On the Constitution of Church and State (1829). This was a remarkable achievement for someone whose health was fragile. In addition, Coleridge continued his correspondence and notebooks, and found time to dictate his extensive Opus Maximum, the crowning achievement of his later years. Amidst all this, he managed to compose short poems including some that rank with his best, such as ‘Constancy to an Ideal Object’ (pp. 731–2).⁷ Contrary to his being the underachiever ridiculed by Hazlitt, Coleridge managed to produce numerous works of prose and poetry on a scale manifested only with completion of the Collected Coleridge Edition in 2002.

Sonnet V. To the River Otter*¹ (composed between 1793 and 1796)

From Sonnets from Various Authors* (1796)²

Dear native brook, wild streamlet of the west!³
How many various-fated years have passed,
What blissful and what anguished hours, since last
I skimmed the smooth thin stone along thy breast,
Numbering its light leaps! Yet so deep impressed 5
Sink the sweet scenes of childhood, that mine eyes
I never shut amid the sunny blaze,
But straight with all their tints thy waters rise,
Thy crossing plank, thy margin's willowy maze,
And bedded sand that, veined with various dyes, 10
Gleamed through thy bright transparence to the gaze!
Visions of childhood, oft have ye beguiled
Lone manhood's cares, yet waking fondest sighs –
Ah, that once more I were a careless child!

Sonnet V. To the River Otter

¹ Coleridge was born at Ottery St Mary in Devon on the River Otter.

² In 1796 Coleridge published a short pamphlet of sonnets by himself, Charlotte Smith, Bowles and Warton, among others. This sonnet is indebted to nativity sonnets by two eighteenth-century poets: Warton's 'To the River Lodon' and Bowles's 'To the Itchin'.

³ the west i.e. the west of England.

Letter from S. T. Coleridge to George Dyer,¹ 10 March 1795 (extract)

There is one sentence in your last letter which affected me greatly: ‘I feel a degree of languor, etc. etc., and, by seeing and frequently feeling much illiberality, acquire something of misanthropy’! It is melancholy to think that the best of us are liable to be shaped and coloured by surrounding objects – and a demonstrative proof that man was not made to live in great cities!² Almost all the physical evil in the world depends on the existence of moral evil, and the long-continued contemplation of the latter does not tend to meliorate³ the human heart. The pleasures which we receive from rural beauties are of little consequence compared with the moral effect of these pleasures;⁴ beholding constantly the best possible, we at last become ourselves the best possible. In the country, all around us smile good and beauty, and the images of this divine *καλοκάγαθού*⁵ are miniaturized on the mind of the beholder as a landscape on a convex mirror.⁶ Thomson,⁷ in that most lovely poem, The Castle of Indolence, says,

I care not, Fortune, what you me deny –
You cannot rob me of free nature’s grace!
You cannot shut the windows of the sky
Through which the morning shows her dewy face;
You cannot bar my constant feet to rove

Through wood and vale by living stream at eve...⁸

Alas, alas! She can deny us all this, and can force us, fettered and handcuffed by our dependencies and wants, to wish and wish away the bitter little of life in the felon-crowded dungeon of a great city!

God love you, my very dear sir! I would that we could form a pantisocracy⁹ in England and that you could be one of us! The finely-fibred heart that, like the statue of Memnon,¹⁰ trembles into melody on the sunbeam touch of benevolence, is most easily jarred into the dissonance of misanthropy. But you will never suffer your feelings to be benumbed by the torpedo touch of that fiend – I know you, and know that you will drink of every mourner’s sorrows even while your own cup is trembling over its brink!

Letter from S. T. Coleridge to George Dyer

1 Coleridge met Dyer in London in August 1794, when he persuaded him of the merits of pantisocracy (‘he was enraptured – pronounced it impregnable’; Griggs i 98).

2 man was not made...cities Dyer lived in London.

3 meliorate improve.

4 The pleasures...pleasures It was always important to Coleridge that love of nature had an improving moral effect on the individual. It would be amplified and reworked by Wordsworth into the central principle of The Recluse: that love of nature leads to love of mankind (see Wordsworth, ‘Not Useless do I Deem’, pp. 453–7).

5 καλοκάγαθού nobility and beauty.

6 as a landscape on a convex mirror The Claude Lorraine Glass was a dark or coloured hand-mirror, used by picturesque tourists to reflect the features of the landscape in subdued tones.

7 James Thomson (1700–48), author of The Seasons, a loco-descriptive poem.

8 The Castle of Indolence ii 19–24.

9 pantisocracy Coleridge and Southey wished to go to America and set up an ideal society in which everyone was equal and all possessions were shared (see p. 612).

¹⁰ like the statue of Memnon The statue of Memnon at Thebes in Egypt was believed to give forth a musical sound when touched by the dawn or the setting sun.

Effusion XXXV. Composed 20 August
1795, at Clevedon, Somersetshire¹

From Poems on Various Subjects (1796)

My pensive Sara,² thy soft cheek reclined
Thus on mine arm, most soothing sweet it is
To sit beside our cot, our cot o'ergrown
With white-flowered jasmine and the broad-leaved myrtle³
Meet emblems they of innocence and love), 5
And watch the clouds that late were rich with light
Slow-sad'ning round, and mark the star of eve
Serenely brilliant (such should wisdom be)
Shine opposite! How exquisite the scents
Snatched from yon bean-field! And the world so hushed! 10
The stilly murmur of the distant sea
Tells us of silence. And that simplest lute
Placed lengthways in the clasping casement – hark
How by the desultory breeze caressed!⁴
Like some coy maid half-yielding to her lover, 15
It pours such sweet upbraidings as must needs
Tempt to repeat the wrong. And now its strings
Bolder swept, the long sequacious⁵ notes
Over delicious surges sink and rise,
Such a soft floating witchery of sound 20
As twilight elfins make when they at eve
Voyage on gentle gales from fairyland,
Where melodies round honey-dropping flowers

Footless and wild, like birds of paradise,
Nor pause nor perch, hov'ring on untamed wing. 25

¹ This has come to be regarded as the first of the conversation poems. It is presented here alongside its much later, canonical version, entitled 'The Eolian Harp'. When first published in 1796 it was called 'Effusion XXXV' because Coleridge wanted to number his poems as 'effusions' (inspired outpourings); it was not published under that title again.

² Sara Sara Fricker, with whom Coleridge was in love. He was to marry her less than two months after this poem was composed, on 4 October 1795. In early August he told Southey that 'Domestic happiness is the greatest of things sublunary – and of things celestial it is perhaps impossible for unassisted man to believe anything greater' (Griggs i 158).

³ white-flowered jasmine and the broad-leaved myrtle In Milton's poem Adam and Eve's 'blissful bower' also contains jasmine and myrtle (see Paradise Lost iv 694, 698).

⁴ The Aeolian harp is a stringed instrument placed in front of an open window so as to catch the breeze; it is not unlike modern wind-chimes.

⁵ sequacious following one another in unvarying regularity of order.

The Eolian Harp. *Composed at Clevedon, Somersetshire*¹

Oh the one life within us and abroad,²
Which meets all motion and becomes its soul,
A light in sound, a sound-like power in light,
Rhythm in all thought, and joyance everywhere –
Methinks it should have been impossible 30
Not to love all things in a world so filled,
Where the breeze warbles, and the mute still air
Is Music slumbering on its instrument!³

And thus, my love, as on the midway slope
Of yonder hill I stretch my limbs at noon, 35
Whilst through my half-closed eyelids I behold
The sunbeams dance, like diamonds, on the main,
And tranquil muse upon tranquillity,

Full many a thought uncalled and undetained,
And many idle flitting fantasies 40
Traverse my indolent and passive brain –
As wild and various as the random gales
That swell and flutter on this subject lute!

And what if all of animated nature
Be but organic harps diversely framed, 45
That tremble into thought, as o'er them sweeps,
Plastic⁶ and vast, one intellectual⁷ breeze,
At once the soul of each, and God of all?⁸

But thy more serious eye a mild reproof
Darts, oh beloved woman!⁹ – nor such thoughts 50
Dim and unhallowed dost thou not reject,
And biddest me walk humbly with my God.

Meek daughter in the family of Christ,¹⁰
Well hast thou said and holily dispraised¹¹
These shapings of the unregenerate mind, 55
Bubbles that glitter as they rise and break

On vain philosophy's aye-babbling spring.¹²
For never guiltless may I speak of Him,
Th' Incomprehensible! save when with awe
I praise him, and with faith that inly¹³ feels – 60
Who with his saving mercies healed me,
A sinful and most miserable man
Wildered and dark, and gave me to possess
Peace, and this cot,¹⁴ and thee, heart-honoured maid!

And what if all of animated life
Be but as instruments diversely framed,
That tremble into thought, while through them breathes
One infinite and intellectual breeze,
And all in different heights so aptly hung
That murmurs indistinct and bursts sublime,
Shrill discords and most soothing melodies,

Harmonious form Creation's vast concert?
Thus GOD would be the universal soul,
Mechanized matter as th' organic harps,
And each one's tunes be that which each calls 'I'.

1 It is worth noting that c.1800 Coleridge meditated the image of the Aeolian harp in a marginal note to his copy of Kant's Critik der reinen Vernunft:

The mind does not resemble an Eolian harp, nor even a barrel-organ turned by a stream of water, conceive as many tunes mechanized in it as you like – but rather, as far as objects are concerned, a violin, or other instrument of few strings yet vast compass, played on by a musician of genius.

2 Oh the one life...abroad it is perhaps surprising to find that ll. 26–33 were written not in 1795 but in 1817 (see next note). Coleridge's celebration of the pantheist One Life echoes Wordsworth, The Pedlar 217–18: 'for in all things / He saw one life, and felt that it was joy.'

3 Lines 26–33 comprise the most substantial addition to this version of the poem; they were first published in the errata to Sibylline Leaves (1817). Lines 32–3 as published in 1817, uncorrected by the errata, read: 'Where even the breezes, and the common air, / Contain the power and spirit of Harmony.'

6 Plastic shaping, formative, creative. It is important to Coleridge that God's spiritual influence shape the sensibility of the beings it enters.

7 intellectual spiritual.

8 And what if all...all A major pantheist declaration: 'And what if all natural things are like Aeolian harps, each unique and individual in itself ("diversely framed"), receiving, just as the harps receive the breeze, the spiritual ("intellectual") apprehension of the one God?' An early MS of the poem contains a more detailed and explicit version of ll. 36–40:

⁹ But thy...woman Referring to these lines, Lamb told Coleridge that he and his sister enjoyed the ‘pleasing picture of Mrs C. checking your wild wanderings, which we were so fond of hearing you indulge when among us. It has endeared us more than anything to your good lady, and your own self-reproof that follows delighted us’ (Marrs i 12).

¹⁰ Meek daughter...Christ Coleridge’s language is, of course, figurative. Sara’s father was a Bristol manufacturer who died bankrupt in 1786, leaving his wife and six children penniless. Sara’s mother ran a dress shop.

¹¹ holily dispraised piously attacked. Coleridge’s unease about the pantheist experience of ll. 36–40 is transferred completely to Sara.

¹² Bubbles...spring Can Sara really have thought all this so early in her relationship with Coleridge? He attributes to her the criticisms that he is ‘vain’ (impractical) and ‘aye-babbling’.

¹³ ‘ “L’athée n’est point à mes yeux un faux esprit; je puis vivre avec lui aussi bien et mieux qu’avec le dévot, car il raisonne davantage, mais il lui manque un sens, et mon âme ne se fond point entièrement avec la sienne: il est froid au spectacle le plus ravissant, et il cherche un syllogisme lorsque je rends une action de grâce.” Appel à l’impartiale postérité, par la Citoyenne Roland, troisième partie, p. 67’ (Coleridge’s note to the 1796 text, dropped from versions of the poem after 1803). ‘The atheist is not, to my eyes, deceived; I can live with him as well as – if not better than with – the zealot, because he reasons more. But he is lacking in a certain sense, and my soul does not entirely combine with his: he is untouched by the most ravishing spectacle, and searches for a syllogism when I thank God.’ French copies of Madame Roland’s memoirs were available in England by late July 1795; their popularity led to an English translation later that year, published by Joseph

Johnson (who had published Wordsworth's An Evening Walk in 1793, and who would publish Frost at Midnight in 1798).

¹⁴ cot cottage.

Reflections on having left a Place of Retirement (composed March–April 1796)¹

From Poems (1797)

'Sermoni propiora'. – Horace.²

Low was our pretty cot;³ our tallest rose
Peeped at the chamber-window. We could hear
At silent noon, and eve, and early morn,
The sea's faint murmur. In the open air
Our myrtles blossomed, and across the porch 5
Thick jasmines⁴ twined; the little landscape round
Was green and woody and refreshed the eye.⁵
It was a spot which you might aptly call
The Valley of Seclusion. Once I saw
(Hallowing his sabbath-day by quietness) 10
A wealthy son of commerce saunter by,
Bristowa's⁶ citizen; methought it calmed
His thirst of idle gold, and made him muse
With wiser feelings – for he paused and looked
With a pleased sadness, and gazed all around, 15
Then eyed our cottage, and gazed round again,
And sighed, and said it was a blessed place.
And we were blessed. Oft with patient ear,
Long-listening to the viewless skylark's note
(Viewless, or haply for a moment seen 20
Gleaming on sunny wing), in whispered tones

I've said to my beloved, 'Such,⁷ sweet girl,
The inobtrusive song of happiness,
Unearthly minstrelsy – then only heard
When the soul seeks to hear, when all is hushed 25
And the heart listens!'

But the time when first
From that low dell, steep up the stony mount
I climbed with perilous toil and reached the top –
Oh, what a goodly scene! Here the bleak mount,
The bare bleak mountain speckled thin with sheep; 30
Grey clouds, that shadowing spot the sunny fields;
And river, now with bushy rocks o'erbrowed,
Now winding bright and full with naked banks;
And seats, and lawns, the abbey and the wood,
And cots, and hamlets, and faint city-spire; 35
The channel there, the islands and white sails,
Dim coasts, and cloudlike hills, and shoreless ocean –
It seemed like Omnipresence!⁸ God, methought,
Had built him there a temple: the whole world
Seemed imaged in its vast circumference. 40

No wish profaned my overwhelmed heart⁹ –
Blessed hour! It was a luxury – to be!

Ah, quiet dell, dear cot, and mount sublime!
I was constrained to quit you. Was it right,
While my unnumbered brethren toiled and bled,¹⁰ 45
That I should dream away the trusted hours
On rose-leaf beds, pamp'ring the coward heart
With feelings all too delicate for use?

Sweet is the tear that from some Howard's¹¹ eye
Drops on the cheek of one he lifts from earth; 50
And he that works me good with unmoved face
Does it but half – he chills me while he aids –

My benefactor, not my brother man.¹²
Yet even this, this cold beneficence

Seizes my praise, when I reflect on those 55
 (The sluggard pity's vision-weaving tribe!)
 Who sigh for wretchedness, yet shun the wretched,
 Nursing in some delicious solitude
 Their slothful loves and dainty sympathies!
 I therefore go and join head, heart and hand, 60
 Active and firm, to fight the bloodless fight
 Of Science,¹³ Freedom, and the Truth in Christ.¹⁴
 Yet oft when after honourable toil
 Rests the tired mind, and waking loves to dream,
 My spirit shall revisit thee, dear cot! 65
 Thy jasmine and thy window-peeping rose,
 And myrtles fearless of the mild sea-air;
 And I shall sigh fond wishes, sweet abode!
 Ah, had none greater, and that all had such!
 It might be so, but the time is not yet: 70
 Speed it, oh Father! Let thy Kingdom come!¹⁵

Reflections on having left a Place of Retirement

¹ During the spring of 1796 Coleridge was working industriously on The Watchman, his own journal, for which he wrote much of its contents. He had married Sara Fricker the previous October, and honeymooned with her at a cottage in Clevedon, Somerset. When first published this poem was entitled Reflections on entering into active life. A poem which affects not to be poetry.

² From Satires I iv 42. In a note to Fears in Solitude (1798), Coleridge was to write: 'The above is perhaps not poetry but rather a sort of middle thing between poetry and oratory – sermoni propiora. Some parts are, I am conscious, too tame even for animated prose.'

³ cot cottage.

4 myrtles...jasmynes ‘Meet emblems they of innocence and love’,
Eolian Harp 5.

5 the little landscape...eye cf. Coleridge’s letter to Poole, 7 October 1795: ‘The prospect around us is perhaps more various than any in the kingdom – Mine Eye gluttonizes. – The Sea – the distant Islands! – the opposite Coasts! – I shall assuredly write Rhymes’ (Griggs i 160).

6 Bristowa’s Bristol’s.

7 Such i.e. similar to this (the skylark’s song).

8 Omnipresence the god-like perspective granted Coleridge from the top of the ‘stony mount’ is comparable with that of the visionary of Religious Musings, who ‘Views all creation, and he loves it all / And blesses it’ (ll. 126–7). This is the first poem by either Coleridge or Wordsworth to present the ascent of a mountain as a meeting with divine forces; compare the ascent of Snowdon, Prelude Book XIII.

9 No wish...heart Any materialistic ambitions at such a moment of divine apprehension would be a kind of profanity.

10 While my...bled Britain had been at war with France since 1793.

11 John Howard (1726–90), prison reformer and philanthropist.

12 My benefactor...man A spiritual affirmation of brotherhood is more desirable on its own than a good deed without it.

13 Science knowledge, which would have included such things as chemistry.

14 I therefore...Christ Coleridge was not actually going to sign up as a soldier; the ‘bloodless fight’ will consist of his editing of a new journal dedicated to the causes of Unitarianism and radical politics: The Watchman.

¹⁵ Speed it...come Coleridge looks forward to the millennium (Christ's thousand-year rule on earth), when all people will share his love of nature, and 'fond wishes'.

Religious Musings (extract) (composed 1794–6)¹

From Poems (1797)

There is one Mind,² one omnipresent Mind
Omnific.³ His most holy name is LOVE – 120
Truth of subliming⁴ import! with the which
Who feeds and saturates his constant soul,
He from his small particular orbit flies
With blessed outstarting!⁵ From himself he flies,
Stands in the sun, and with no partial gaze⁶ 125
Views all creation, and he loves it all
And blesses it,⁷ and calls it very good!⁸
This is indeed to dwell with the most high –
Cherubs and rapture-trembling seraphim
Can press no nearer to th' Almighty's throne. 130
But that we roam unconscious, or with hearts
Unfeeling of our universal Sire,
And that in his vast family no Cain⁹
Injures uninjured (in her best-aimed blow Victorious murder a blind suicide),¹⁰ 135
Haply for this some younger angel now
Looks down on human nature – and behold!
A sea of blood¹¹ bestrewed with wrecks where mad
Embattling interests on each other rush

With unhelmed rage!¹²
 'Tis the sublime of man, 140
Our noontide majesty,¹³ to know ourselves
Parts and proportions of one wondrous whole;
This fraternizes¹⁴ man, this constitutes
Our charities and bearings – but 'tis God
Diffused through all that doth make all one whole.¹⁵ 145
This the worst superstition: Him except,
Aught to desire,¹⁶ supreme reality,
The plenitude and permanence of bliss!
Oh fiends of superstition!¹⁷ – not that oft
Your pitiless rites have floated with man's blood 150
The skull-piled temple, not for this shall wrath
Thunder against you from the Holy One!
But (whether ye, th' unclimbing bigot, mock
With secondary gods, or if more pleased
Ye petrify th' imbrothelled atheist's heart¹⁸ – 155
The atheist your worst slave) I o'er some plain
Peopled with death, and to the silent sun
Steaming with tyrant-murdered multitudes,
Or where mid groans and shrieks loud-laughing trade¹⁹
More hideous packs his bales of living anguish – 160
I will raise up a mourning, oh ye fiends,
And curse your spells that film the eye of faith,²⁰
Hiding the present God, whose presence lost,
The moral world's cohesion, we become
An anarchy of spirits! Toy-bewitched,²¹ 165
Made blind by lusts, disherited of soul,
No common centre man, no common sire
Knoweth!²² A sordid solitary thing,
Mid countless brethren with a lonely heart,
Through courts and cities the smooth savage roams 170

Feeling himself, his own low self the whole,
When he by sacred sympathy might make
The whole one self!²³ Self, that no alien knows!
Self, far diffused as fancy's wing can travel!
Self, spreading still, oblivious of its own, 175
Yet all of all possessing! This is faith!²⁴
This the Messiah's destined victory!

Religious Musings

¹ In this important poem the young Coleridge set out, though in very dense and frequently obscure terms, his central religious and political beliefs. He presents the French Revolution in terms of his expectation of the millennium (Christ's thousand-year rule on earth, thought to be nigh) and in this important extract explicates his Unitarian principles.

² There is one Mind Coleridge was a fervent Unitarian, and this opening remark expresses the central Unitarian belief in the absolute unity of the godhead.

³ Omnific all-creating, as at Paradise Lost vii 217: ‘ “Silence, ye troubled waves, and thou Deep, peace”, / Said then th’ Omnific Word.’

⁴ subliming exalting.

⁵ Who feeds...outstarting He who feeds and saturates his soul in the truth that God is Love may transcend (outstart) his earthly state (‘particular orbit’).

⁶ with no partial gaze i.e. with a vision as universal and all-embracing as that of God.

⁷ And blesses it other Coleridgean blessings can be found in The Ancient Mariner (1798) 277 and Frost at Midnight (1798) 49 ff.

8 Views all...good from Genesis 1:31: ‘And God saw every thing that he had made, and behold, it was very good.’

9 Cain the son of Adam and Eve, who killed his brother Abel and brought murder into the world; see Genesis 4:8.

10 Victorious murder a blind suicide Because we are united in a common humanity, murder is as destructive of the aggressor as it is of the victim.

11 A sea of blood The image is from Revelation 16:3.

12 A sea of blood...rage During the period in which this poem was written, the Reign of Terror had come to an end with Robespierre’s execution, and had given way to full-scale war as France had taken on the European allies (1793 onwards). As a committed republican, Coleridge was horrified by what he saw.

13 Our noontide majesty the height of our spiritual existence.

14 fraternizes ‘Fraternité’ was one of the ideals of the French Revolution. Coleridge believes our brotherhood to be affirmed by a collective perception of ourselves as part of the godhead.

15 ’tis God...whole a reiteration of the pantheist belief in a single divinity diffused through the universe; cf. Eolian Harp 36–40.

16 This the...desire i.e the worst superstition is to desire anything except Him.

17 fiends of superstition an attack on European Christians, who are responsible for using superstition as a means of perpetuating the slave trade.

18 th’ imbrothelled atheist’s heart the atheist is, effectively, in the brothel of hell; for Thelwall’s view of this phrase, see p. 328 above.

19 trade the slave trade.

20 I o'er some plain...faith It is not clear whether Coleridge has some specific event in mind, but in general terms he is saying that the present war between France and the allies is leading people to lose faith in God. The image of a film over the eyes echoes the conversion of Saul, the persecutor of the Christians, when 'there fell from his eyes as it had been scales' (Acts 9:18).

21 Toy-bewitched seduced by idle pastimes.

22 An anarchy...Knoweth Coleridge is attacking Godwinian thought, which he despised for its atheism and disapproval of marriage.

23 A sordid...self Instead of enjoying the Unitarian perception of himself as part of the godhead, the Godwinian is a selfish moral degenerate.

24 Self, far diffused...Faith Faith consists of self diffused through the world, integrated with the Unitarian God.

Letter from S. T. Coleridge to John Thelwall,¹ 19 November 1796 (extract)

Your portrait of yourself interested me. As to me, my face, unless when animated by immediate eloquence, expresses great sloth and great (indeed almost idiotic) good nature. 'Tis a mere carcass of a face – fat, flabby, and expressive chiefly of inexpression. Yet I am told that my eyes, eyebrows, and forehead are physiognomically good,² but of this the deponent³ knoweth not. As to my shape, 'tis a good shape enough if measured – but my gait is awkward, and the walk and the whole man indicates indolence capable of energies. I am, and ever have been, a great reader, and have read almost everything – a library-cormorant. I am deep in all out of the way books, whether of the monkish times or of the puritanical era.⁴ I have read and digested most of the historical writers but I do not like history. Metaphysics and poetry and ‘facts of mind’ (i.e. accounts of all the strange phantasms that ever possessed your philosophy-dreamers⁵ from Thoth the Egyptian⁶ to Taylor the English pagan)⁷ are my darling studies.

In short, I seldom read except to amuse myself, and I am almost always reading. Of useful knowledge, I am a so-so chemist, and I love chemistry.⁸ All else is blank, but I will be (please God) an horticulturist and a farmer.⁹ I compose very little and I absolutely hate composition. Such is my dislike that even a sense of duty is sometimes too weak to overpower it.

I cannot breathe through my nose, so my mouth, with sensual thick lips, is almost always open. In conversation I am impassioned, and oppose what I deem error with an eagerness which is often mistaken for personal asperity¹⁰ – but I am ever so swallowed up in the thing, that I perfectly forget my opponent. Such am I.

Letter from S. T. Coleridge to John Thelwall

¹ For Thelwall, see pp. 322–4. Coleridge first wrote to Thelwall in late April 1796, with the words: ‘Pursuing the same end by the same means we ought not to be strangers to each other’ (Griggs i 204). Coleridge probably meant their shared antipathy to private property, and their republicanism.

² physiognomically good i.e. that they indicate good character traits.

³ deponent witness.

⁴ monkish times...era i.e. from the Middle Ages to the seventeenth century.

⁵ philosophy-dreamers visionaries.

⁶ Thoth the Egyptian Thoth is the Greek name for Hermes Trismegistus, a mythological figure said to have founded the art of alchemy.

7 Taylor the English pagan Thomas Taylor (1758–1835), classical scholar and Neoplatonist. Coleridge’s copy of Taylor’s translation of Plato’s Cratylus (1793) was retained at Rydal Mount in later years.

8 chemistry One of Coleridge’s greatest mentors, Joseph Priestley (1733–1804), the founder of modern Unitarianism, was an accomplished chemist and discovered oxygen.

9 an horticulturalist and a farmer Coleridge enjoyed the theory, rather than the practice, of farming. He was a regular reader of the Letters and Papers on Agriculture, Planting, etc., Selected from the Correspondence of the Bath and West of England Society.

10 asperity roughness, boisterousness.

Letter from S. T. Coleridge to Robert Southey, 17 July 1797 (extract) (including early version of This Lime-Tree Bower My Prison)¹

...I am as much a Pangloss as ever – only less contemptuous, than I used to be, when I argue how unwise it is to feel contempt for any thing.²

I had been on a visit to Wordsworth’s at Racedown near Crewkerne³ – and I brought him and his sister back with me and here⁴ I have settled them. By a combination of curious circumstances a gentleman’s seat,⁵ with a park and woods, elegantly and completely furnished, with nine lodging rooms, three parlours and a hall, in a most beautiful and romantic situation by the sea-side, four miles from Stowey – this we have got for Wordsworth at the rent of £23 a year, taxes included!! The park and woods are his for all purposes he wants them – i.e. he may walk, ride, and keep a horse in them, and the large gardens are altogether and entirely his. Wordsworth is a very great man – the only man to whom at all times and in all modes of excellence I feel myself inferior – the only one, I mean, whom I have yet met with⁶ (for the London literati appear to me to be very much like little potatoes – i.e. no great things, a compost of nullity and dullity!).

Charles Lamb⁷ has been with me for a week; he left me Friday morning. The second day after Wordsworth came to me, dear Sara accidentally emptied a skillet of boiling milk on my foot, which confined me during the whole time of C. Lamb's stay and still prevents me from all walks longer than a furlong. While Wordsworth, his sister, and C. Lamb were out one evening, sitting in the arbour of T. Poole's garden,⁸ which communicates with mine, I wrote these lines, with which I am pleased.

Well, they are gone; and here must I remain,
Lamed by the scathe of fire,⁹ lonely and faint,
This lime-tree bower my prison. They, meantime,
My friends, whom I may never meet again,¹⁰

Letter from S. T. Coleridge to Robert Southey, 17 July 1797

¹ The earliest extant text of This Lime-Tree Bower My Prison survives in this revealing letter to Coleridge's former mentor, Robert Southey. The poem was first published in Southey's Annual Anthology (1800), as This Lime-Tree Bower My Prison, A Poem Addressed to Charles Lamb of the India House, London, but probably the best-known version is that in Coleridge's collected poetical works of 1834; see pp. 634–7. By this time some bitterness existed between Coleridge and Southey, thanks largely to the collapse of pantisocracy (see p. 612).

² I am as much...thing Pangloss was the eternal optimist of Voltaire's Candide (1759). Coleridge's emphatic respect for natural things represents a distinctively Wordsworthian way of thinking; he even echoes Wordsworth's Lines Left Upon a Seat in A Yew-Tree (composed by July 1797): ‘he who feels contempt / For any living thing, hath faculties / Which he has never used’ (ll. 48–50).

3 I had been...Crewkerne Wordsworth and his sister had been resident at Racedown Lodge in Dorset since July 1795. Coleridge visited them there in June 1797.

4 here i.e. at Alfoxden House, four miles away from where Coleridge lived at Nether Stowey, Somerset. It was here that Wordsworth’s close association with Coleridge began to bear fruit: The Ruined Cottage (completed February 1798); Lyrical Ballads (composed spring–summer 1798); and blank verse fragments which later contributed to The Prelude and The Excursion.

5 seat residence.

6 Wordsworth...met with A loaded comment, as Coleridge had, only a few years before, idolized Southey in much the same way (see p. 612).

7 Charles Lamb Coleridge’s friend since their shared schooldays at Christ’s Hospital; for more on Lamb, see pp. 756–60.

8 The incompatibility that was to ruin his marriage with Sara Fricker is evident even at this early moment: the claim that his injury had been accidental is questionable. The garden attached to Tom Poole’s house adjoins that of Coleridge Cottage, as visitors can still observe today.

9 Lamed...fire an interesting phrase, eliminated from subsequent versions of the poem, which prompts comparison of Coleridge with Vulcan, whose leg was broken when he was flung out of Olympus.

10 whom I may never meet again an exaggeration; as he has just told Southey, Wordsworth and his sister had moved into Alfoxden House only days before. They would certainly remain for at least a year.

*This Lime-Tree Bower My Prison*¹

From Poetical Works (1834)

In the June of 1797, some long-expected friends paid a visit to the author's cottage, and on the morning of their arrival he met with an accident which disabled him from walking during the whole time of their stay. One evening, when they had left him for a few hours, he composed the following lines in the garden bower.

Well, they are gone, and here must I remain,
This lime-tree bower my prison! I have lost
Beauties and feelings, such as would have been
Most sweet to my remembrance even when age
Had dimmed mine eyes to blindness! They, meanwhile, 5
Friends whom I never more may meet again,
On springy¹¹ heath, along the hilltop edge,¹² 5
Wander delighted, and look down, perchance,
On that same rifted dell, where many an ash
Twists its wild limbs beside the ferny rock,
Whose plummy ferns¹³ forever nod and drip
Sprayed by the waterfall. But chiefly thou, 10
My gentle-hearted Charles!¹⁴ – thou who hast pined
And hungered after nature many a year
In the great city pent, winning thy way,
With sad yet bowed soul, through evil and pain
And strange calamity.¹⁵ Ah, slowly sink 15
Behind the western ridge, thou glorious sun!
Shine in the slant beams of the sinking orb,
Ye purple heath-flowers! Richlier burn, ye clouds!
Live in the yellow light, ye distant groves!
And kindle, thou blue ocean! So my friend, 20
Struck with joy's deepest calm, and gazing round
On the wide view, may gaze till all doth seem

Less gross than bodily,¹⁶ a living thing
 That acts upon the mind, and with such hues
 As clothe the Almighty Spirit, when he makes 25
 Spirits perceive His presence!¹⁷
 On springy heath, along the hilltop edge,
 Wander in gladness, and wind down, perchance,
 To that still roaring dell of which I told;
 The roaring dell, o'erwooded, narrow, deep, 10
 And only speckled by the midday sun;
 Where its slim trunk the ash from rock to rock
 Flings arching like a bridge – that branchless ash,
 Unsunned and damp, whose few poor yellow leaves
 Ne'er tremble in the gale, yet tremble still, 15
 Fanned by the waterfall! And there my friends
 Behold the dark green file of long lank weeds,²
 That all at once (a most fantastic sight!)
 Still nod and drip beneath the dripping edge
 Of the blue clay-stone.
 Now, my friends emerge 20
 Beneath the wide wide heaven – and view again
 The many-steeped tract magnificent
 Of hilly fields and meadows, and the sea,
 With some fair bark, perhaps, whose sails light up
 The slip of smooth clear blue betwixt two isles 25
 Of purple shadow! Yes, they wander on
 In gladness all – but thou, methinks, most glad,
 My gentle-hearted Charles! For thou hast pined
 And hungered after nature many a year
 In the great city pent, winning thy way, 30
 With sad yet patient soul, through evil and pain
 And strange calamity! Ah, slowly sink
 Behind the western ridge, thou glorious sun!
 Shine in the slant beams of the sinking orb,
 Ye purple heath-flowers! Richlier burn, ye clouds! 35
 Live in the yellow light, ye distant groves!

And kindle, thou blue ocean! So my friend,
Struck with deep joy, may stand, as I have stood,
Silent with swimming sense; yea, gazing round
On the wide landscape, gaze till all doth seem 40
Less gross than bodily, and of such hues
As veil the Almighty Spirit, when yet he makes Spirits perceive His presence.

A delight

Comes sudden on my heart, and I am glad
As I myself were there! Nor in this bower, 45
This little lime-tree bower, have I not marked
Much that has soothed me. Pale beneath the blaze
Hung the transparent foliage; and I watched
Some broad and sunny leaf, and loved to see
The shadow of the leaf and stem above 50
Dappling its sunshine! And that walnut tree
Was richly tinged, and a deep radiance lay
Full on the ancient ivy which usurps
Those fronting elms, and now with blackest mass
Makes their dark branches gleam a lighter hue 55
Through the late twilight; and though now the bat
Wheels silent by, and not a swallow twitters,
Yet still the solitary humble-bee
Sings in the bean-flower! Henceforth I shall know
That nature ne'er deserts the wise and pure – 60
No scene so narrow but may well employ
Each faculty of sense, and keep the heart
Awake to love and beauty! And sometimes
'Tis well to be bereaved of promised good,
That we may lift the soul, and contemplate 65
With lively joy the joys we cannot share.
My gentle-hearted Charles! when the last rook
Beat its straight path along the dusky air
Homewards, I blessed it, deeming its black wing
(Now a dim speck, now vanishing in the light) 70
Had crossed the mighty orb's dilated glory

While thou stoodst gazing; or, when all was still,
Flew creaking³ o'er thy head, and had a charm
For thee, my gentle-hearted Charles! to whom
No sound is dissonant which tells of Life. 75

This Lime-Tree Bower My Prison

¹ This is the version of the poem that has entered the canon.

² 'The Asplenium scolopendrium, called in some countries the Adder's tongue, in others the Hart's tongue; but Withering gives the Adder's tongue as the trivial name of the Ophioglossum only' (Coleridge's note). Coleridge and Wordsworth acquired copies of William Withering's Arrangement of British Plants (4 vols, 1796) in August 1800.

¹² the hilltop edge The Wordsworths and Lamb would have climbed up the Quantock Hills behind Coleridge's cottage.

¹³ 'The ferns that grow in moist places, grow five or six together and form a complete "Prince of Wales' feather" – i.e. plummy' (Coleridge's note).

¹⁴ My gentle-hearted Charles! 'For God's sake', Lamb wrote to Coleridge, when the poem was published in 1800, 'don't make me ridiculous any more by terming me gentle-hearted in print, or do it in better verses ... the meaning of "gentle" is equivocal at best, and almost always means "poor-spirited"' (Marrs i 217–18).

15 strange calamity In September 1796 Lamb's sister Mary stabbed their mother to death in a fit of insanity; see p. 758. Lamb had been working in East India House in the City of London since 1792.

16 Less gross than bodily a difficult phrase, meaning, presumably, that the world becomes more spiritualized as Lamb gazes upon it, granting him the experience described in Reflections upon Having Left a Place of Retirement 26–42.

17 'You remember, I am a Berkeleian' (Coleridge's note). George Berkeley, Bishop of Cloyne (1685–1753), denied the existence of the material world in favour of an invisible world created by God, perceptible by human beings in moments of heightened vision.

18 humble-bee Against a copy of the 1817 printed text, Coleridge entered the following note: 'Cows without horns are called Hummel cows, in the country as the Hummel bee, as stingless (unless it be a corruption of humming, from the sound observable).'

19 Awake to love and beauty at around this time Coleridge would describe how the 'wandering and distempered child' would be 'healed and harmonized / By the benignant touch of love and beauty' (The Dungeon 29–30).

³ ‘Some months after I had written this line, it gave me pleasure to find that Bartram had observed the same circumstance of the Savanna crane. “When these birds move their wings in flight, their strokes are slow, moderate and regular; and even when at a considerable distance or high above us, we plainly hear the quill-feathers; their shafts and webs upon one another creak as the joints or working of a vessel in a tempestuous sea” (Coleridge’s note). Coleridge was reading William Bartram’s Travels through North and South Carolina (1794) by summer 1797, and quickly communicated his enthusiasm for the work to Wordsworth.

Letter from S. T. Coleridge to John Thelwall, 14 October 1797 (extract)

I can at times feel strongly the beauties you describe – in themselves and for themselves. But more frequently all things appear little – all the knowledge that can be acquired, child's play; the universe itself, what but an immense heap of little things? I can contemplate nothing but parts, and parts are all little! My mind feels as if it ached to behold and know something great, something one and *indivisible*¹ – and it is only in the faith of this that rocks or waterfalls, mountains or caverns, give me the sense of sublimity or majesty! But in this faith all things counterfeit infinity! ‘Struck with the deepest calm of joy’, I stand

¹ My mind feels...indivisible Coleridge yearns for the transcendental experience described in Religious Musings 140–2.

Letter from S. T. Coleridge to Thomas

Poole,¹ 16 October 1797 (extract)

I read every book that came in my way without distinction. And my father was fond of me, and used to take me on his knee, and hold long conversations with me.² I remember that at eight years old I walked with him one winter evening from a farmer's house a mile from Ottery, and he told me the names of the stars, and how Jupiter was a thousand times larger than our world, and that the other twinkling stars were suns that had worlds rolling round them. And when I came home, he showed me how they rolled round. I heard him with a profound delight and admiration, but without the least mixture of wonder or incredulity. For, from my early reading of fairy tales and genii etc. etc., my mind had been habituated to the Vast – and I never regarded my senses in any way as the criteria of my belief. I regulated all my creeds by my conceptions – not by my sight, even at that age.

Should children be permitted to read romances, and relations of giants and magicians and genii? I know all that has been said against it, but I have formed my faith in the affirmative. I know no other way of giving the mind a love of ‘the Great’ and ‘the Whole’.³ Those who have been led to the same truths step by step through the constant testimony of their senses, seem to me to want a sense which I possess: they contemplate nothing but parts, and all parts are necessarily little. And the universe to them is but a mass of little things. It is true that the mind may become credulous and prone to superstition by the former method – but are not the experimentalists⁴ credulous even to madness in believing any absurdity rather than believe the grandest truths, if they have not the testimony of their own senses in their favour? I have known some who have been rationaly educated, as it is styled. They were marked by a microscopic acuteness, but when they looked at great things, all became a blank and they saw nothing – and denied (very illogically) that anything could be seen, and uniformly put the negation of a power for the possession of a power, and called the want of imagination ‘judgement’, and the never being moved to rapture ‘philosophy’!

Letter from S. T. Coleridge to Thomas Poole

¹ Thomas Poole (1765–1837) was a well-to-do tanner of Nether Stowey. He encouraged and materially helped Coleridge from about 1794 onwards. He found Coleridge a cottage in Nether Stowey which adjoined his own back garden, funded Coleridge’s magazine, The Watchman, and looked after Sara Coleridge and the children during Coleridge’s many absences.

² And my father...me Coleridge was the youngest of John Coleridge’s many children, and probably the favourite. John Coleridge was headmaster of the King Henry VII Grammar School at Ottery St Mary and vicar of St Mary's, until his death in 1781.

⁴ experimentalists those who base their religious faith and beliefs only on what is perceived by the five senses, and on the reason.

Of the Fragment of 'Kubla Khan' ¹

From Christabel; Kubla Khan: A Vision; The Pains of Sleep (1816)

The following fragment is here published at the request of a poet of great and deserved celebrity,² and as far as the author's own opinions are concerned, rather as a psychological curiosity than on the ground of any supposed poetic merits.

In the summer of the year 1797,³ the author, then in ill health, had retired to a lonely farmhouse between Porlock and Lynton on the Exmoor confines of Somerset and Devonshire. In consequence of a slight indisposition, an anodyne had been prescribed,⁴ from the effects of which he fell asleep in his chair at the moment that he was reading the following sentence, or words of the same substance, in Purchas's Pilgrimage: 'Here the Khan Kubla commanded a palace to be built, and a stately garden thereunto. And thus ten miles of fertile ground were enclosed with a wall.'⁵

The author continued for about three hours in a profound sleep (at least of the external senses) during which time he has the most vivid confidence that he could not have composed less than from two to three hundred lines – if that indeed can be called composition in which all the images rose up before him as things, with a parallel production of the correspondent expressions, without any sensation or consciousness of effort. On awaking he appeared to himself to have a distinct recollection of the whole, and taking his pen, ink, and paper, instantly and eagerly wrote down the lines that are here preserved. At this moment he was unfortunately called out by a person on business from Porlock and detained by him above an hour, and on his return to his room, found to his no small surprise and mortification that though he still retained some vague and dim recollection of the general purpose of the vision, yet, with the exception of some eight or ten scattered lines and images, all the rest had passed away like the images on the surface of a stream into which a stone has been cast – but, alas! without the after-restoration of the latter:

Then all the charm
Is broken – all that phantom-world so fair
Vanishes, and a thousand circlets spread,
And each misshapes the other. Stay awhile,
Poor youth, who scarcely dar’st lift up thine eyes –
The stream will soon renew its smoothness, soon
The visions will return! And lo, he stays,
And soon the fragments dim of lovely forms
Come trembling back, unite, and now once more
The pool becomes a mirror.⁶

Yet from the still-surviving recollections in his mind, the author has frequently purposed to finish for himself what had been originally, as it were, given to him. *Ἀὔριον ἄδιον ἄσω,*⁷ but the tomorrow is yet to come.

As a contrast to this vision, I have annexed a fragment of a very different character, describing with equal fidelity the dream of pain and disease.⁸

Of the Fragment of ‘Kubla Khan’

¹ This short essay was prefaced to ‘Kubla Khan’ on its first publication in 1816. It is followed by two texts: the manuscript text (which is the closest we can get to the poem as written in 1797) and the published text of 1816, which is now regarded as canonical.

² a poet of great and deserved celebrity Lord Byron, who described it as ‘a fine wild poem’ (Marchand v 108). ‘Kubla Khan’ and ‘Christabel’ circulated in MS in literary circles for years before they were formally published. Other early readers included Charles Lamb, Walter Scott and Mary Robinson.

³ In the summer ... 1797 The correct date is early November 1797.

⁴ an anodyne ... prescribed Opium was generally used for the treatment of dysentery at this time.

⁵ ‘In Xaindu did Cublai Can build a stately pallace, encompassing sixteene miles of plaine ground with a wall, wherein are fertile meddowes, pleasant springs, delightfull streames, and all sorts of beasts of chase and game, and in the midst thereof a sumptuous house of pleasure, which may be removed from place to place’ (Samuel Purchas, Purchas his Pilgrimage (1613), p. 350).

⁷ Αὔριον ἄδιον ἄσω ‘Tomorrow I shall sing more sweetly’; Theocritus, Idyll i 145.

⁸ a fragment ... disease The Pains of Sleep; see pp. 700–3.

[Kubla Khan] (composed early November 1797; ¹ edited from MS) ²

In Xannadù did Cubla Khan
A stately pleasure-dome decree,
Where Alph, the sacred river, ran
Through caverns measureless to man
Down to a sunless sea. 5
So twice six miles of fertile ground

With walls and towers were compassed round;
And here were gardens bright with sinuous rills
Where blossomed many an incense-bearing tree;
And here were forests ancient as the hills, 10
Enfolding sunny spots of greenery.
But oh, that deep romantic chasm that slanted
Down a green hill athwart a cedarn cover!
A savage place, as holy and enchanted
As e'er beneath a waning moon was haunted 15
By woman wailing for her demon-lover!
And from this chasm, with hideous turmoil seething,
As if this earth in fast thick pants were breathing,
A mighty fountain momentarily was forced
Amid whose swift half-intermitted burst 20

Kubla Khan

¹ The exact date of composition is unknown. If, as seems likely, Coleridge's retirement to a farmhouse occurred during the walking tour to the Valley of the Rocks with the Wordsworths, the probable date is early November 1797.

² This text is edited from the earliest surviving MS in Coleridge's hand, which dates from before February 1804. It is not given a title and may at that stage have been thought of as a 'fragment'. The published text, which differs in a number of particulars, is presented here as a parallel text for ease of comparison. For comment on the two versions see John Beer, 'The Languages of Kubla Khan', in Coleridge's Imagination ed. Richard Gravil, Lucy Newlyn and Nicholas Roe (1985), pp. 218–62.

Kubla Khan

From Christabel; Kubla Khan: A Vision; The Pains of Sleep (1816)

In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
A stately pleasure-dome decree,
Where Alph, the sacred river, ran
Through caverns measureless to man
 Down to a sunless sea. 5
So twice five miles of fertile ground
With walls and towers were girdled round;
And here were gardens bright with sinuous rills
Where blossomed many an incense-bearing tree;
And here were forests ancient as the hills, 10
And folding sunny spots of greenery.

But oh, that deep romantic chasm which slanted
Down the green hill athwart a cedarn cover!
A savage place, as holy and enchanted
As e'er beneath a waning moon was haunted 15
By woman wailing for her demon-lover!
And from this chasm, with ceaseless turmoil seething,
As if this earth in fast thick pants were breathing,
A mighty fountain momentarily was forced
Amid whose swift half-intermitted burst 20
Huge fragments vaulted like rebounding hail,
Or chaffy grain beneath the thresher's flail!
And mid these dancing rocks at once and ever,
It flung up momentarily the sacred river.
Five miles meandering with a mazy motion 25
Through wood and dale the sacred river ran,
Then reached the caverns measureless to man
And sank in tumult to a lifeless ocean.
And mid this tumult Kubla heard from far
Ancestral voices prophesying war!3 30

The shadow of the dome of pleasure
Floated midway on the wave,
Where was heard the mingled measure
From the fountain and the cave;
It was a miracle of rare device, 35
A sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice!

A damsel with a dulcimer
In a vision once I saw:
It was an Abyssinian maid
And on her dulcimer she played, 40
Singing of Mount Amara.⁴
Could I revive within me
Her symphony and song,
To such a deep delight 'twould win me
That with music loud and long, 45
I would build that dome in air,
That sunny dome, those caves of ice!
And all who heard should see them there,
And all should cry, 'Beware, beware!
His flashing eyes, his floating hair! 50
Weave a circle round him thrice,
And close your eyes in holy dread –
For he on honey-dew hath fed
And drank the milk of paradise.'

³ Ancestral voices prophesying war presumably the voices of ancestors looking forward to war in the present; though another way of reading it would be to regard the ancestral voices as speaking to the individual psyche. In March 1798 Coleridge told his brother George: 'I believe most steadfastly in original sin; that from our mothers' wombs our understandings are darkened; and even where our understandings are in the light, that our organization is depraved, and our volitions imperfect’ (Griggs i 396).

4 Mount Amara Coleridge originally wrote ‘Amora’ in the MS. Mount Amara alludes to Purchas his Pilgrimage, in which it is said to be ‘situate as the navel of the Ethiopian body, and centre of their empire, under the equinoctial line where the sun may take his best view thereof, as not encountering in all his long journey with the like theatre ... the sun himself so in love with the sight, that the first and last thing he vieweth in all those parts is this hill.’ See also Paradise Lost iv 281.

5 two grains...dysentery It is worth bearing in mind that the only available treatment for stomach disorders and pains of various kinds (including toothache) was opium or its derivatives. Many people consumed it for entirely legitimate medicinal purposes, and became addicted as a result.

This fragment with a good deal more, not recoverable, composed in a sort of reverie brought on by two grains of opium taken to check a dysentery,⁵ at a farm-house between Porlock and Lynton, a quarter of a mile from Culbone Church, in the fall of the year 1797. S. T. Coleridge

Huge fragments vaulted like rebounding hail,
Or chaffy grain beneath the thresher’s flail!
And mid these dancing rocks at once and ever,
It flung up momentarily the sacred river.

Frost at Midnight* (composed February 1798)¹

From Fears in Solitude*, written in 1798 during an alarm of an invasion; to which are added *France:
an Ode; and Frost at Midnight* (1798)

The frost performs its secret ministry
Unhelped by any wind. The owlet's cry
Came loud – and hark, again! loud as before.
The inmates of my cottage, all at rest,

Have left me to that solitude which suits 5
 Abstruser musings, save that at my side
 My cradled infant² slumbers peacefully.
 'Tis calm indeed! – so calm that it disturbs
 And vexes meditation with its strange
 And extreme silentness. Sea, hill, and wood, 10
 This populous village! Sea, and hill, and wood,
 With all the numberless goings-on of life,
 Inaudible as dreams! The thin blue flame
 Lies on my low-burnt fire, and quivers not;
 Only that film³ which fluttered on the grate 15
 Still flutters there, the sole unquiet thing.
 Methinks its motion in this hush of nature
 Gives it dim sympathies with me who live,
 Making it a companionable form
 With which I can hold commune. Idle thought! 20
 But still the living spirit in our frame
 That loves not to behold a lifeless thing,
 Transfuses into all its own delights
 Its own volition – sometimes with deep faith
 And sometimes with fantastic playfulness.⁴ 25

Frost at Midnight

¹ This is the earliest version, presented here alongside the better-known text of 1834. The main difference is the conclusion to this text, ll. 80–5, eliminated in later revisions. Coleridge's literary source is Cowper's description of a winter evening in The Task, p. 21.

² My cradled infant Hartley Coleridge, born 19 September 1796. He was one and a half years old. This is the first of his numerous appearances in the poetry of Wordsworth and Coleridge, including The Nightingale 91–105, Christabel 644–65, To H.C., Six Years Old and Ode 85–131.

³ ‘In all parts of the kingdom these films are called “strangers”, and supposed to portend the arrival of some absent friend’ (Coleridge’s note). The same detail turns up in Cowper’s description of a winter evening, p. 22.

⁴ But still...playfulness Coleridge’s language indicates that the mind, when it infers the existence of an inner life in external objects, is engaging in an essentially fanciful act – it is making patterns (in the terms of Coleridge’s much later definition of fancy, p. 712) out of fixities and definites. This is emphasized in ll. 20–5 which, in versions of the poem from 1812 to 1817, were expanded:

With which I can hold commune. Haply hence,
That still the living spirit in our frame
Which loves not to behold a lifeless thing,
Transfuses into all things its own Will
And its own pleasures; sometimes with deep faith,
And sometimes with a wilful playfulness,
That stealing pardon from our common sense
Smiles, as self-scornful, to disarm the scorn
For these wild relics of our childish thought,
That flit about, oft go, and oft return
Not uninvited. Ah, there was a time,
When oft, amused by no such subtle toys
Of the self-watching mind, a child at school,
With most believing superstitious wish ...

The 1817 text was briefer:

Making it a companionable form,
To which the living spirit in our frame,
That loves not to behold a lifeless thing,
Transfuses its own pleasures, its own will.
How oft, at school, with most believing mind,
Presageful, have I gazed upon the bars
To watch that fluttering stranger! And as oft ...

In 1834 this passage was replaced by a formulation even more sceptical of the charms of fancy.

Frost at Midnight

From Poetical Works (1834)

The frost performs its secret ministry
Unhelped by any wind. The owlet's cry
Came loud – and hark, again! loud as before.
The inmates of my cottage, all at rest,
Have left me to that solitude which suits 5
Abstruser musings, save that at my side
My cradled infant slumbers peacefully.
'Tis calm indeed! – so calm that it disturbs
And vexes meditation with its strange
And extreme silentness. Sea, hill, and wood, 10
This populous village! Sea, and hill, and wood,
With all the numberless goings-on of life,
Inaudible as dreams! The thin blue flame
Lies on my low-burnt fire, and quivers not;
Only that film which fluttered on the grate 15
Still flutters there, the sole unquiet thing.
Methinks its motion in this hush of nature
Gives it dim sympathies with me who live,
Making it a companionable form
Whose puny flaps and freaks the idling spirit 20
By its own moods interprets, everywhere
Echo or mirror seeking of itself,
And makes a toy of thought.
 Ah me! amused by no such curious toys
Of the self-watching subtilizing⁵ mind,
How often in my early schoolboy days,⁶
With most believing superstitious wish

Presageful have I gazed upon the bars, 30
To watch the stranger there! – and oft belike,
With unclosed lids, already had I dreamt
Of my sweet birthplace, and the old church-tower
Whose bells, the poor man’s only music, rang
From morn to evening all the hot fair-day, 35
So sweetly that they stirred and haunted me
With a wild pleasure, falling on mine ear
Most like articulate sounds of things to come!
So gazed I till the soothing things I dreamt
Lulled me to sleep, and sleep prolonged my dreams! 40
And so I brooded all the following morn,
Awed by the stern preceptor’s⁷ face, mine eye
Fixed with mock study on my swimming book;
Save if the door half-opened, and I snatched
A hasty glance, and still my heart leaped up, 45
For still I hoped to see the stranger’s face –
Townsmen, or aunt, or sister more beloved,
My playmate when we both were clothed alike!⁸
Dear babe,⁹ that sleepest cradled by my side,
Whose gentle breathings heard in this dead calm 50
Fill up the interspersed vacancies
And momentary pauses of the thought;
My babe so beautiful, it fills my heart
With tender gladness thus to look at thee,
And think that thou shalt learn far other lore 55
And in far other scenes! For I was reared
In the great city, pent mid cloisters dim,¹⁰
And saw nought lovely but the sky and stars.
But thou, my babe, shalt wander like a breeze
By lakes and sandy shores, beneath the crags 60
Of ancient mountain, and beneath the clouds
Which image in their bulk both lakes and shores
And mountain crags;¹¹ so shalt thou see and hear

The lovely shapes and sounds intelligible
But oh, how oft,
How oft at school, with most believing mind,
Presageful, have I gazed upon the bars, 25
To watch that fluttering stranger! And as oft
With unclosed lids, already had I dreamt
Of my sweet birthplace, and the old church-tower
Whose bells, the poor man's only music, rang
From morn to evening all the hot fair-day, 30
So sweetly that they stirred and haunted me
With a wild pleasure, falling on mine ear
Most like articulate sounds of things to come!
So gazed I till the soothing things I dreamt
Lulled me to sleep, and sleep prolonged my dreams! 35
And so I brooded all the following morn,
Awed by the stern preceptor's face, mine eye
Fixed with mock study on my swimming book;
Save if the door half opened, and I snatched
A hasty glance, and still my heart leaped up, 40
For still I hoped to see the stranger's face –
Townsmen, or aunt, or sister more beloved,
My playmate when we both were clothed alike!
 Dear babe, that sleepest cradled by my side,
Whose gentle breathings heard in this deep calm 45
Fill up the interspersed vacancies
And momentary pauses of the thought;
My babe so beautiful, it fills my heart
With tender gladness thus to look at thee,
And think that thou shalt learn far other lore 50
And in far other scenes! For I was reared
In the great city, pent mid cloisters dim,
And saw nought lovely but the sky and stars.
But thou, my babe, shalt wander like a breeze
By lakes and sandy shores, beneath the crags 55
Of ancient mountain, and beneath the clouds
Which image in their bulk both lakes and shores

And mountain crags; so shalt thou see and hear
The lovely shapes and sounds intelligible
Of that eternal language which thy God 65
Utters,¹² who from eternity doth teach
Himself in all, and all things in himself.

Great universal teacher! He shall mould¹³
Thy spirit, and by giving make it ask.

Therefore all seasons shall be sweet to thee, 70
Whether the summer clothe the general earth
With greenness, or the redbreasts sit and sing
Betwixt the tufts of snow on the bare branch
Of mossy apple-tree, while all the thatch
Smokes in the sun-thaw; whether the eave-drops fall 75
Heard only in the trances¹⁴ of the blast,
Or whether the secret ministry of cold
Shall hang them up in silent icicles,
Quietly shining to the quiet moon;

Like those, my babe, which ere tomorrow's warmth 80
Have capped their sharp keen points with pendulous drops,
Will catch thine eye, and with their novelty
Suspend thy little soul; then make thee shout
And stretch and flutter from thy mother's arms,

As thou would'st fly for very eagerness.¹⁵ 85
Of that eternal language which thy God 60
Utters, who from eternity doth teach
Himself in all, and all things in himself.
Great universal teacher! He shall mould
Thy spirit, and by giving make it ask.

Therefore all seasons shall be sweet to thee, 65
Whether the summer clothe the general earth
With greenness, or the redbreast sit and sing
Betwixt the tufts of snow on the bare branch
Of mossy apple-tree, while the nigh thatch
Smokes in the sun-thaw; whether the eave-drops fall 70

Heard only in the trances of the blast,
Or if the secret ministry of frost
Shall hang them up in silent icicles,
Quietly shining to the quiet moon.

5 subtilizing given to subtle reasoning.

6 my early schoolboy days a reference to Coleridge's time at Christ's Hospital in the City of London, 1782–91. His lack of enthusiasm for those years may owe something to the use of violence by the masters at the school.

7 preceptor teacher.

8 sister...alike Until well into the nineteenth century, small boys and girls were dressed in frocks until boys were breeched. Coleridge was deeply attached to his sister Anne (1767–91), whose early death from consumption distressed him greatly. In September 1794 he told Edith Fricker that Anne had been 'beautiful and accomplished – like you, she was lowly of heart. Her eye beamed with meekest sensibility' (Griggs i 102).

9 Dear babe Coleridge turns again to his son Hartley.

10 pent mid cloisters dim cf. Charles Lamb who in 'This Lime-Tree Bower My Prison' 'hungered after nature many a year / In the great city pent' (ll. 29–30). Coleridge is alluding to Satan in Paradise Lost, 'one who long in populous city pent' (ix 445).

11 But thou...crags Coleridge had not actually seen the Lake District in February 1798, when these lines were written; Cumbrian lakes do not have 'sandy shores'. He is no doubt thinking of the account of the mountains and lakes in Wordsworth's The Pedlar, which was being written at the same time as this poem.

12 so shalt...utters a reference to Bishop Berkeley's theory that the natural world is the symbolic language of God's thought. At more or less the same time that this was written, Wordsworth was describing the Pedlar's perception of the 'written promise' (Pedlar 119).

13 mould The pantheist perception Coleridge confers on Hartley is formative of the individual; cf. the intellectual breeze of The Eolian Harp (1795), which is 'Plastic' (l. 39).

14 trances moments of suspension, when the blast stills.

15 Lines 80–5 were removed from subsequent versions of the poem, as Coleridge explained in a marginal note made in a copy of the 1798 volume: 'The six last lines I omit because they destroy the rondo, and return upon itself of the poem. Poems of this kind of length ought to lie coiled with its tail round its head. S.T.C.' For Hartley's sensitivity to natural things, see Coleridge's notebook entry, p. 363 n. 17 above.

France: An Ode (composed March—early April 1798)¹

From Fears in Solitude, written in 1798 during an alarm of an invasion; to which are added France:
an Ode; and Frost at Midnight (1798)

I

Ye clouds, that far above me float and pause,
Whose pathless march no mortal may control!
Ye ocean waves, that, wheresoe'er ye roll,
Yield homage only to eternal laws!
Ye woods, that listen to the night-bird's singing, 5
Midway the smooth and perilous steep reclined;
Save when your own imperious branches swinging

Have made a solemn music of the wind!
Where, like a man beloved of God,
Through glooms which never woodman trod, 10
How oft, pursuing fancies holy,
My moonlight way o'er flow'ring weeds I wound,
Inspired beyond the guess of folly
By each rude² shape, and wild unconquerable sound!
Oh ye loud waves, and oh ye forests high, 15
And oh ye clouds, that far above me soared!
Thou rising sun! Thou blue rejoicing sky!
Yea, every thing that is and will be free,
Bear witness for me wheresoe'er ye be,
With what deep worship I have still adored 20
The spirit of divinest liberty.

II

When France in wrath her giant limbs upreared,³
And with that oath⁴ which smote earth, air, and sea,
Stamped her strong foot and said she would be free,
Bear witness for me, how I hoped and feared! 25
With what a joy, my lofty gratulation⁵
Unawed, I sung amid a slavish band;
And when to whelm the disenchanted nation,
Like fiends embattled by a wizard's wand,
The monarchs marched in evil day, 30
And Britain joined the dire array⁶ –
Though dear her shores, and circling ocean,
Though many friendships, many youthful loves
Had swoln the patriot emotion,
And flung a magic light o'er all her hills and groves; 35
Yet still my voice unaltered sang defeat
To all that braved the tyrant-quelling lance,⁷
And shame too long delayed, and vain retreat!
For ne'er, oh Liberty! with partial⁸ aim

I dimmed thy light, or damped thy holy flame; 40
But blessed the paeans of delivered France,
And hung my head, and wept at Britain's name!

III

'And what', I said, 'though blasphemy's loud scream
With that sweet music of deliv'rance strove;
Though all the fierce and drunken passions wove 45
A dance more wild than ever maniac's dream;⁹
Ye storms, that round the dawning east assembled,
The sun was rising, though ye hid his light!'
And when to soothe my soul, that hoped and trembled,
The dissonance ceased, and all seemed calm and bright; 50
When France, her front deep-scarred and gory,
Concealed with clust'ring wreaths of glory;
When insupportably advancing,¹⁰
Her arm made mock'ry of the warrior's ramp,
While, timid looks of fury glancing, 55
Domestic treason, crushed beneath her fatal stamp,
Writhed like a wounded dragon in his gore –
Then I reproached my fears that would not flee,
'And soon', I said, 'shall wisdom teach her lore
In the low huts of them that toil and groan! 60
And conqu'ring by her happiness alone,
Shall France compel the nations to be free,¹¹
Till love and joy look round, and call the earth their own!'

IV

Forgive me, Freedom! Oh forgive these dreams!
I hear thy voice, I hear thy loud lament 65
From bleak Helvetia's¹² icy caverns sent –
I hear thy groans upon her bloodstained streams!
Heroes, that for your peaceful country perished,
And ye, that fleeing spot the mountain snows
With bleeding wounds – forgive me, that I cherished 70

One thought that ever blessed your cruel foes!¹³
To scatter rage and trait'rous guilt
Where Peace her jealous home had built;
A patriot race to disinherit
Of all that made their stormy wilds so dear, 75
And with inexpiable¹⁴ spirit
To taint the bloodless freedom of the mountaineer.
Oh France! that mockest heav'n, adult'rous,¹⁵ blind,
And patriot only in pernicious toils! –
Are these thy boasts, champion of humankind? 80
To mix with kings in the low lust of sway,¹⁶
Yell in the hunt, and share the murd'rous prey;
T' insult the shrine of liberty with spoils
From freemen torn; to tempt and to betray!¹⁷

V

The sensual and the dark rebel in vain, 85
Slaves by their own compulsion! In mad game
They burst their manacles, and wear the name
Of freedom graven on a heavier chain!¹⁸
Oh Liberty! with profitless endeavour
Have I pursued thee many a weary hour: 90
But thou nor swell'st the victor's strain, nor ever
Didst breathe thy soul in forms of human pow'r.¹⁹
Alike from all, howe'er they praise thee
(Nor pray'r, nor boastful name delays thee),
Alike from priesthood's harpy minions 95
And factious blasphemy's obscener slaves,
Thou speedest on thy subtle pinions,
To live amid the winds, and move upon the waves!²⁰
And then I felt thee on the sea-cliff's verge,
Whose pines, scarce travelled by the breeze above, 100
Had made one murmur with the distant surge!
Yes, while I stood and gazed, my temples bare,

And shot my being through earth, sea, and air,
Possessing all things with intensest love,
Oh Liberty, my spirit felt thee there!²¹ 105

France: An Ode

¹ This poem is Coleridge's response to the suppression of the Swiss cantons by the French government. It was an important moment for radicals in Britain, because it was the first time that the French had acted contrary to the principles of the Revolution. When published in the Morning Post, 16 April 1798 (under the title The Recantation: An Ode), it was prefaced by a brief note by the paper's editor, Daniel Stuart: 'The following excellent Ode will be in unison with the feelings of every friend to liberty and foe to oppression; of all who, admiring the French Revolution, detest and deplore the conduct of France towards Switzerland. It is very satisfactory to find so zealous and steady an advocate for freedom as Mr Coleridge concur with us in condemning the conduct of France towards the Swiss Cantons.' When reprinted with corrections by the same paper in 1802, it was accompanied by an Argument:

First stanza: An invocation to those objects in nature the contemplation of which had inspired the poet with a devotional love of liberty. Second stanza: The exultation of the poet at the commencement of the French Revolution, and his unqualified abhorrence of the Alliance against the Republic. Third stanza: The blasphemies and horrors during the domination of the Terrorists regarded by the poet as a transient storm, and as the natural consequence of the former despotism and of the foul superstition of Popery. Reason, indeed, began to suggest many apprehensions; yet still the poet struggled to retain the hope that France would make conquests by no other means than by presenting to the observation of Europe a people more happy and better instructed than under other forms of government. Fourth stanza: Switzerland, and the poet's recantation. Fifth stanza: An address to Liberty, in which the poet expresses his conviction that those feelings and that grand ideal of freedom which the mind attains by its contemplation of its individual nature, and of the sublime surrounding objects (see stanza the first) do not belong to men, as a society, nor can possibly be either gratified or realized, under any form of human government; but belong to the individual man, so far as he is pure, and inflamed with the love and adoration of God in nature.

2 rude rough.

3 When France...upreared i.e. when the Revolution began.

4 that oath When the French Revolution was in its early days, 20 June 1789, the commoners were barred from the meeting-place of the Estates General and instead took an oath in a nearby tennis court, vowing to stand firm until reform of the constitution.

5 gratulation pleasure, exultation.

6 And Britain...array England joined the alliance of Austria and Prussia against France shortly after the execution of Louis XVI, February 1793.

7 the tyrant-quelling lance i.e. of Revolutionary France, with whose interests the young Coleridge identified.

8 partial selfish.

9 And what...dream During Robespierre's Reign of Terror (October 1793 to July 1794) the clergy were persecuted and executed, along with the aristocrats, politicians of all colours, foreigners and anyone identifiable as alien to the interests of the state.

10 When insupportably advancing Coleridge alludes to Milton, Samson Agonistes 136: 'When insupportably his foot advanced.'

11 Shall France...free It was believed that revolution would spread to other countries.

12 Helvetia Switzerland.

13 your cruel foes i.e. France.

14 inexpiable unpardonable, unforgivable.

15 adult'rous France has adulterated the principle of liberty.

16 sway power – in this case, over Switzerland.

17 T' insult...to betray! Coleridge said that this was a reference to the ceding of Belgium and parts of the Venetian Republic by Austria to France, October 1797.

18 wear the name...chain! Coleridge noted that ‘At Genoa the word “Liberty” is engraved on the chains of the galley-slaves and the doors of prisons.’

19 But thou...pow'r Coleridge felt a general disillusionment with those in power at this moment; in March 1798 he told his brother George: ‘As to the rulers of France, I see in their views, speeches, and actions, nothing that distinguishes them to their advantage from other animals of the same species. History has taught me that rulers are much the same in all ages and under all forms of government: they are as bad as they dare to be’ (Griggs i 395).

20 Alike from all...waves The point of the poem is that true liberty is found neither with institutionalized religion (‘priesthood’s harpy minions’) nor with atheistic revolutionaries (‘factious blasphemy’s obscener slaves’); it is found in nature.

21 And shot...there! the poem culminates in another moment of god-like apprehension (cf. Reflections upon Having left a Place of Retirement 26–42). In this case, Coleridge claims that his investment of love in the landscape enabled him to perceive the pantheist life-force in nature – which he regards as representing true liberty.

Fears in Solitude. Written April 1798,
*During the Alarm of an Invasion*¹
(composed 20 April 1798)²

From Fears in Solitude, written in 1798 during an alarm of an invasion; to which are added France:
an Ode; and Frost at Midnight (1798)

A green and silent spot amid the hills!³
A small and silent dell! O'er stiller place
No singing skylark ever poised himself!
The hills are heathy, save that swelling slope
Which hath a gay and gorgeous covering on, 5
All golden with the never-bloomless furze,
Which now blooms most profusely; but the dell,
Bathed by the mist, is fresh and delicate
As vernal cornfield, or the unripe flax,
When through its half-transparent stalks, at eve, 10
The level sunshine glimmers with green light.
Oh 'tis a quiet, spirit-healing nook,
Which all, methinks, would love – but chiefly he,
The humble man, who in his youthful years
Knew just so much of folly as had made 15
His early manhood more securely wise;
Here he might lie on fern or withered heath,
While from the singing lark (that sings unseen –
The minstrelsy which solitude loves best),
And from the sun, and from the breezy air, 20
Sweet influences trembled o'er his frame;⁴
And he with many feelings, many thoughts,
Made up a meditative joy, and found
Religious meanings in the forms of nature!

And so, his senses gradually wrapped

25

In a half-sleep, he dreams of better worlds,
And dreaming hears thee still, oh singing lark,
That singest like an angel in the clouds!

My God! it is a melancholy thing

For such a man, who would full fain preserve 30

His soul in calmness, yet perforce must feel

For all his human brethren; oh my God,

It is indeed a melancholy thing,

And weighs upon the heart, that he must think

What uproar and what strife may now be stirring 35

This way or that way o'er these silent hills –

Invasion, and the thunder and the shout,

And all the crash of onset; fear and rage

And undetermined conflict – even now,

Ev'n now, perchance, and in his native isle, 40

Carnage and screams beneath this blessed sun!

We have offended, oh my countrymen!

We have offended very grievously,

And have been tyrannous. From east to west

A groan of accusation pierces heaven! 45

The wretched plead against us, multitudes

Countless and vehement, the sons of God,

Our brethren! Like a cloud that travels on,

Steamed up from Cairo's swamps of pestilence,

Ev'n so, my countrymen, have we gone forth 50

And borne to distant tribes slavery and pangs –

And, deadlier far, our vices, whose deep taint

With slow perdition murders the whole man,

His body and his soul! Meanwhile, at home,

We have been drinking with a riotous thirst 55

Pollutions from the brimming cup of wealth –

A selfish, lewd, effeminated race,

Contemptuous of all honourable rule,

Yet bartering freedom, and the poor man's life,

For gold, as at a market! The sweet words 60
Of Christian promise (words that even yet Might stem destruction, were they wisely preached)
Are muttered o'er by men, whose tones proclaim
How flat and wearisome they feel their trade.
Rank scoffers some, but most too indolent 65
To deem them falsehoods, or to know their truth.
Oh blasphemous! the book of life is made
A superstitious instrument on which
We gabble o'er the oaths we mean to break,⁵
For all must swear – all, and in every place, 70
College and wharf, council and justice-court,
All, all must swear, the briber and the bribed,
Merchant and lawyer, senator and priest,
The rich, the poor, the old man, and the young,
All, all make up one scheme of perjury, 75
That faith doth reel; the very name of God
Sounds like a juggler's charm; and bold with joy,
Forth from his dark and lonely hiding-place
(Portentous sight!), the owlet Atheism,
Sailing on obscene wings athwart the noon, 80
Drops his blue-fringed lids, and holds them close,
And, hooting at the glorious sun in heaven,
Cries out, 'Where is it?'

Thankless too for peace
(Peace long preserved by fleets and perilous seas),
Secure from actual warfare, we have loved 85
To swell the war-whoop, passionate for war!⁶
Alas! for ages ignorant of all
Its ghastlier workings (famine or blue plague, Battle, or siege, or flight through wintry snows),
We, this whole people, have been clamorous 90
For war and bloodshed, animating sports,
The which we pay for,⁷ as a thing to talk of –
Spectators and not combatants! No guess

Anticipative of a wrong unfelt,
No speculation on contingency,⁸ 95
However dim and vague, too vague and dim
To yield a justifying cause – and forth
(Stuffed out with big preamble, holy names,
And adjurations of⁹ the God in heaven)
We send our mandates¹⁰ for the certain death 100
Of thousands and ten thousands! Boys and girls,
And women that would groan to see a child
Pull off an insect's leg – all read of war,
The best amusement for our morning meal!
The poor wretch, who has learnt his only prayers 105
From curses,¹¹ who knows scarcely words enough
To ask a blessing of his heavenly Father,
Becomes a fluent phraseman, absolute
And technical in victories and defeats,
And all our dainty terms for fratricide, 110
Terms which we trundle smoothly o'er our tongues
Like mere abstractions, empty sounds to which
We join no feeling and attach no form,
As if the soldier died without a wound,
As if the fibres of this godlike frame 115
Were gored without a pang, as if the wretch,
Who fell in battle doing bloody deeds,
Passed off to heaven, translated and not killed,
As though he had no wife to pine for him,
No God to judge him! Therefore evil days 120
Are coming on us, oh my countrymen!
And what if all-avenging Providence,
Strong and retributive, should make us know
The meaning of our words, force us to feel
The desolation and the agony 125
Of our fierce doings?¹²
Spare us yet awhile,

Father and God! Oh spare us yet awhile!
 Oh let not English women drag their flight
 Fainting beneath the burden of their babes,
 Of the sweet infants, that but yesterday 130
 Laughed at the breast! Sons, brothers, husbands, all
 Who ever gazed with fondness on the forms
 Which grew up with you round the same fireside,
 And all who ever heard the sabbath bells
 Without the infidel's scorn, make yourselves pure! 135
 Stand forth! Be men! Repel an impious foe,
 Impious and false, a light yet cruel race
 That laugh away all virtue, mingling mirth
 With deeds of murder; and still promising
 Freedom, themselves too sensual to be free, 140
 Poison life's amities,¹³ and cheat the heart
 Of Faith and quiet Hope, and all that soothes
 And all that lifts the spirit! Stand we forth;
 Render them back upon th' insulted ocean,
 And let them toss as idly on its waves 145
 As the vile seaweeds which some mountain blast
 Swept from our shores! And oh! may we return
 Not with a drunken triumph, but with fear,
 Repenting of the wrongs with which we stung
 So fierce a foe to frenzy!
 I have told, 150
 Oh Britons! Oh my brethren! I have told
 Most bitter truth, but without bitterness.
 Nor deem my zeal or factious¹⁴ or mistimed;
 For never can true courage dwell with them
 Who, playing tricks with conscience, dare not look 155
 At their own vices. We have been too long
 Dupes of a deep delusion!¹⁵ Some, belike,
 Groaning with restless enmity, expect
 All change from change of constituted power –
 As if a government had been a robe 160

On which our vice and wretchedness were tagged
Like fancy-points and fringes,¹⁶ with the robe
Pulled off at pleasure.¹⁷ Fondly these attach
A radical causation to a few
Poor drudges of chastising Providence, 165
Who borrow all their hues and qualities
From our own folly and rank wickedness,
Which gave them birth, and nurse them.¹⁸
Others, meanwhile,
Dote with a mad idolatry; and all
Who will not fall before their images 170
And yield them worship, they are enemies
Ev'n of their country! Such have I been deemed.¹⁹
But oh dear Britain! Oh my mother isle!
Needs must thou prove a name most dear and holy
To me, a son, a brother, and a friend, 175
A husband and a father, who revere
All bonds of natural love, and find them all
Within the limits of thy rocky shores.
Oh native Britain! Oh my mother isle!
How shouldst thou prove aught else but dear and holy 180
To me, who from thy lakes and mountain-hills,
Thy clouds, thy quiet dales, thy rocks, and seas,
Have drunk in all my intellectual²⁰ life,
All sweet sensations, all ennobling thoughts,
All adoration of the God in nature, 185
All lovely and all honourable things,
Whatever makes this mortal spirit feel
The joy and greatness of its future being?²¹
There lives nor form nor feeling in my soul
Unborrowed from my country! Oh divine 190
And beautiful island, thou hast been my sole
And most magnificent temple, in the which
I walk with awe, and sing my stately songs,

Loving the God that made me!

May my fears,
My filial fears, be vain! and may the vaunts 195
And menace of the vengeful enemy
Pass like the gust that roared and died away
In the distant tree, which heard, and only heard;
In this low dell bowed not the delicate grass.
But now the gentle dew-fall sends abroad 200
The fruitlike perfume of the golden furze;
The light has left the summit of the hill,
Though still a sunny gleam lies beautiful
On the long-ivied beacon.²² Now farewell,
Farewell awhile, oh soft and silent spot! 205
On the green sheep-track, up the heathy hill,
Homeward I wind my way; and lo! recalled
From bodings, that have well-nigh wearied me,
I find myself upon the brow, and pause
Startled! And after lonely sojourning 210
In such a quiet and surrounded scene,
This burst of prospect (here the shadowy main,
Dim-tinted, there the mighty majesty
Of that huge amphitheatre of rich
And elmy fields) seems like society 215
Conversing with the mind, and giving it
A livelier impulse, and a dance of thought;
And now, beloved Stowey, I behold
Thy church-tower, and (methinks) the four huge elms
Clust'ring, which mark the mansion of my friend;²³ 220
And close behind them, hidden from my view,
Is my own lowly cottage, where my babe
And my babe's mother²⁴ dwell in peace! With light
And quickened footsteps thitherward I tend,
Rememb'ring thee, oh green and silent dell! 225
And grateful that by nature's quietness
And solitary musings all my heart

Is softened, and made worthy to indulge
Love, and the thoughts that yearn for humankind.

Fears in Solitude

1 In February 1797 the French had landed no less than 1,200 men at Fishguard in preparation for an invasion of England; it was widely feared that they would try again in spring 1798, and that the West Country would be their landing-point. For discussion of this poem see Peter Larkin, “‘Fears in Solitude’: Reading (from) the Dell”, TWC 22 (1991) 11–14.

2 The central argument of the poem is the fear that, in declaring war on himself, man has, like the ancient mariner, declared war on God. In an early MS, Coleridge comments: ‘The above is perhaps not poetry, but rather a sort of middle thing between poetry and oratory – sermoni propiora. Some parts are, I am conscious, too tame even for animated prose.’ The phrase sermoni propiora means ‘more like conversation’. As an anti-war poem, Fears in Solitude might be compared with Wordsworth’s The Female Vagrant, being prepared at this moment for Lyrical Ballads (1798); see pp. 363–70.

3 the hills the Quantock hills in Somerset, close to Nether Stowey.

4 Sweet influences...frame the humble man is responsive to the influence of nature, as recommended in The Eolian Harp 36–40.

5 We gabble...break Coleridge’s target is subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles, the practice whereby Dissenters from the established church were compelled to swear allegiance to its founding principles. As a Unitarian he had an interest in seeing the Test and Corporation Acts repealed.

6 passionate for war Coleridge’s target is popular support for the war with France.

7 animating sports...pay for This is a pious attack on such sports as boxing, cockfighting and the like. The obvious comparison is with gladiatorial combat in ancient Rome.

8 No guess...contingency i.e. there is no attempt to anticipate the harm that will come to those fighting on our behalf.

9 adjurations of appeals to.

10 mandates orders.

11 prayers / From curses probably a recollection of Caliban in The Tempest: 'You taught me language, and my profit on't / Is, I know how to curse' (I ii 363–4). I am grateful to Essaka Joshua for this note.

12 And what if...doings Coleridge's point is that God will punish English people for the way in which they have become hardened to the reality of war.

13 amities friendships.

14 factious Coleridge was disillusioned with politics; as he told his brother George in March 1798, 'I am of no party. It is true, I think the present ministry weak and perhaps unprincipled men, but I could not with a safe conscience vote for their removal' (Griggs i 396).

15 a deep delusion namely, the radical hope that the French Revolution would lead to a new era of justice and enlightenment in human affairs.

16 fancy-points and fringes buttons and bows. As his mother-in-law ran a dress shop, Coleridge would have known that fancy-points were ornate laces used for fastening clothes; their undoing would allow a robe to be 'pulled off'. The fringes would have consisted of lace edgings.

17 As if...pleasure The vice and wretchedness of the ancien régime are compared with a robe that has been removed; Coleridge is saying that vice and wretchedness are not so easily done away with – they are endemic in humanity.

18 Fondly...nurse them It is a foolish (fond) delusion to ascribe radicalism to those responsible for destroying the ancien régime; they are really the servants (drudges) of God, empowered by the inherent evil of those who gave them power – the people.

19 Such have I been deemed During his support of France in the war against England, Coleridge was considered an enemy of the state. He has now, of course, changed his mind (see preceding poem), though it is worth noting that Pitt's spies were watching both Wordsworth and Coleridge at this moment.

20 intellectual spiritual.

21 How shouldst thou prove...being The point is that Coleridge's moral and spiritual being has been shaped by the English countryside – by nature, in fact.

22 the long-ivied beacon A chain of beacons were built across the countryside to warn of threats of invasion from France.

23 the mansion of my friend Alfoxden House, four miles from Nether Stowey, where Coleridge had lodged the Wordsworths.

24 my babe...mother Hartley Coleridge and Sara, who was pregnant with Berkeley Coleridge (see next letter, p. 676).

From Christabel; Kubla Khan: A Vision; The Pains of Sleep (1816)

Preface

The first part of the following poem was written in the year 1797, at Stowey, in the county of Somerset. The second part, after my return from Germany, in the year 1800, at Keswick, Cumberland. It is probable that if the poem had been finished at either of the former periods, or if even the first and second part had been published in the year 1800, the impression of its originality would have been much greater than I dare at present expect. But for this I have only my own indolence to blame. The dates are mentioned for the exclusive purpose of precluding charges of plagiarism or servile imitation from myself.² For there is amongst us a set of critics, who seem to hold that every possible thought and image is traditional; who have no notion that there are such things as fountains in the world, small as well as great; and who would therefore charitably derive every rill they behold flowing, from a perforation made in some other man's tank. I am confident, however, that as far as the present poem is concerned, the celebrated poets whose writings I might be suspected of having imitated, either in particular passages, or in the tone and the spirit of the whole, would be among the first to vindicate me from the charge, and who, on any striking coincidence, would permit me to address them in this doggerel version of two monkish Latin hexameters.

'Tis mine and it is likewise yours;
But an if this will not do;
Let it be mine, good friend! for I
Am the poorer of the two.

I have only to add that the metre of Christabel is not, properly speaking, irregular, though it may seem so from its being founded on a new principle: namely, that of counting in each line the accents, not the syllables. Though the latter may vary from seven to twelve, yet in each line the accents will be found to be only four. Nevertheless, this occasional variation in number of syllables is not introduced wantonly, nor for the mere ends of convenience, but in correspondence with some transition in the nature of the imagery or passion.

Part I

'Tis the middle of night by the castle clock,
And the owls have awakened the crowing cock;
Tu-whit!——Tu-whoo!
And hark, again! the crowing cock,
How drowsily it crew. 5

Sir Leoline, the Baron rich,
Hath a toothless mastiff bitch;
From her kennel beneath the rock
She makes answer to the clock,
Four for the quarters and twelve for the hour, 10
Ever and aye, moonshine or shower,
Sixteen short howls, not overloud;
Some say she sees my lady's shroud.

Is the night chilly and dark?
The night is chilly but not dark. 15
The thin grey cloud is spread on high,
It covers but not hides the sky.
The moon is behind, and at the full,
And yet she looks both small and dull.
The night is chill, the cloud is grey: 20
'Tis a month before the month of May,
And the spring comes slowly up this way.

The lovely lady, Christabel,
Whom her father loves so well,
What makes her in the wood so late 25
A furlong³ from the castle gate?
She had dreams all yesternight
Of her own betrothed knight –

Dreams that made her moan and leap
As on her bed she lay in sleep; 30
And she in the midnight wood will pray
For the weal⁴ of her lover that's far away.

She stole along, she nothing spoke,
The breezes they were still also;
And nought was green upon the oak 35
But moss and rarest mistletoe;
She kneels beneath the huge oak tree
And in silence prayeth she.
The lady leaps up suddenly,
The lovely lady, Christabel! 40
It moaned as near as near can be,
But what it is, she cannot tell:
On the other side it seems to be
Of the huge, broad-breasted, old oak tree.

The night is chill, the forest bare – 45
Is it the wind that moaneth bleak?
There is not wind enough in the air
To move away the ringlet curl
From the lovely lady's cheek;
There is not wind enough to twirl 50
The one red leaf, the last of its clan,
That dances as often as dance it can,
Hanging so light and hanging so high
On the topmost twig that looks up at the sky.

Hush, beating heart of Christabel! 55
Jesu Maria,⁵ shield her well!

She folded her arms beneath her cloak
And stole to the other side of the oak:
 What sees she there?

There she sees a damsel bright 60
Dressed in a silken robe of white;
Her neck, her feet, her arms were bare,
And the jewels disordered in her hair.
I guess 'twas frightful there to see
A lady so richly clad as she – 65
 Beautiful exceedingly!

'Mary mother, save me now!'
Said Christabel, 'And who art thou?'

The lady strange made answer meet
And her voice was faint and sweet. 70
'Have pity on my sore distress,
I scarce can speak for weariness!
Stretch forth thy hand, and have no fear –'

Said Christabel, 'How cam'st thou here?'
And the lady, whose voice was faint and sweet, 75
Did thus pursue her answer meet:

'My sire is of a noble line
And my name is Geraldine.
Five warriors seized me yestermorn –
Me, even me, a maid forlorn; 80
They choked my cries with force and fright
And tied me on a palfrey⁶ white.
The palfrey was as fleet as wind,
And they rode furiously behind.
They spurred amain,⁷ their steeds were white, 85
And once we crossed the shade of night.
As sure as Heaven shall rescue me,
I have no thought what men they be;
Nor do I know how long it is

(For I have lain in fits, I wis) 90
Since one, the tallest of the five,
Took me from the palfrey's back,
A weary woman scarce alive.
Some muttered words his comrades spoke,
He placed me underneath this oak, 95
He swore they would return with haste;
Whither they went I cannot tell –
I thought I heard, some minutes past,
Sounds as of a castle-bell.
Stretch forth thy hand (thus ended she) 100
And help a wretched maid to flee.'

Then Christabel stretched forth her hand
And comforted fair Geraldine,
Saying that she should command
The service of Sir Leoline, 105
And straight be convoyed,⁸ free from thrall,⁹
Back to her noble father's hall.

So up she rose and forth they passed
With hurrying steps, yet nothing fast;
Her lucky stars the lady blessed, 110
And Christabel, she sweetly said,
'All our household are at rest,
Each one sleeping in his bed.
Sir Leoline is weak in health
And may not well awakened be, 115
So to my room we'll creep in stealth
And you tonight must sleep with me.'

They crossed the moat, and Christabel
Took the key that fitted well –
A little door she opened straight 120
All in the middle of the gate,

The gate that was ironed¹⁰ within and without
Where an army in battle array had marched out.
The lady sank, belike through pain,
And Christabel with might and main 125
Lifted her up, a weary weight,
Over the threshold of the gate;
Then the lady rose again
And moved as she were not in pain.

So free from danger, free from fear, 130
They crossed the court – right glad they were.

And Christabel devoutly cried
To the lady by her side,
‘Praise we the Virgin all divine
Who hath rescued thee from thy distress!’ 135
‘Alas, alas,’ said Geraldine,
‘I cannot speak for weariness.’
So free from danger, free from fear,
They crossed the court – right glad they were.
Outside her kennel, the mastiff old 140
Lay fast asleep in moonshine cold.
The mastiff old did not awake,
Yet she an angry moan did make.
And what can ail the mastiff bitch?
Never till now she uttered yell 145
Beneath the eye of Christabel.
Perhaps it is the owlet’s scritch,
For what can ail the mastiff bitch?

They passed the hall that echoes still,
Pass as lightly as you will. 150
The brands¹¹ were flat, the brands were dying,
Amid their own white ashes lying;
But when the lady passed, there came

A tongue of light, a fit of flame,
And Christabel saw the lady's eye, 155
And nothing else saw she thereby
Save the boss of the shield of Sir Leoline tall
Which hung in a murky old nitch¹² in the wall.
'Oh softly tread', said Christabel,
'My father seldom sleepeth well.' 160

Sweet Christabel, her feet she bares
And they are creeping up the stairs,
Now in glimmer and now in gloom,
And now they pass the Baron's room,
As still as death with stifled breath; 165
And now have reached her chamber door,
And now with eager feet press down
The rushes of her chamber floor.

The moon shines dim in the open air
And not a moonbeam enters here. 170
But they without its light can see
The chamber carved so curiously,
Carved with figures strange and sweet
All made out of the carver's brain
For a lady's chamber meet; 175
The lamp with twofold silver chain
Is fastened to an angel's feet.

The silver lamp burns dead and dim,
But Christabel the lamp will trim.¹³
She trimmed the lamp and made it bright 180
And left it swinging to and fro,
While Geraldine in wretched plight
Sank down upon the floor below.

'Oh weary lady Geraldine,

I pray you, drink this cordial¹⁴ wine. 185
It is a wine of virtuous powers –
My mother made it of wild-flowers.’

‘And will your mother pity me,
Who am a maiden most forlorn?’

Christabel answered, ‘Woe is me! 190
She died the hour that I was born.
I have heard the grey-haired friar tell
How on her deathbed she did say
That she should hear the castle bell
Strike twelve upon my wedding day. 195
Oh mother dear, that thou wert here!’
‘I would’, said Geraldine, ‘she were.’

But soon with altered voice said she,
‘Off, wandering mother! Peak and pine!
I have power to bid thee flee.’¹⁵ 200
Alas, what ails poor Geraldine?
Why stares she with unsettled eye?
Can she the bodiless dead espy?
And why with hollow voice cries she,
‘Off, woman, off! this hour is mine – 205
Though thou her guardian spirit be,
Off, woman, off! – ’tis given to me’?

Then Christabel knelt by the lady’s side,
And raised to heaven her eyes so blue;
‘Alas!’ said she, ‘this ghastly ride – 210
Dear lady, it hath wildered¹⁶ you!’
The lady wiped her moist cold brow,
And faintly said, ‘’Tis over now!’

Again the wild-flower wine she drank;

Her fair large eyes 'gan¹⁷ glitter bright, 215
And from the floor whereon she sank,
The lofty lady stood upright:
She was most beautiful to see,
Like a lady of a far countrée.

And thus the lofty lady spake: 220
'All they who live in the upper sky
Do love you, holy Christabel!
And you love them, and for their sake,
And for the good which me befell,
Even I, in my degree will try, 225
Fair maiden, to requite you well.
But now unrobe yourself, for I
Must pray, ere yet in bed I lie.'

Quoth Christabel, 'So let it be!'
And as the lady bade, did she. 230
Her gentle limbs did she undress,
And lay down in her loveliness.

But through her brain, of weal and woe
So many thoughts moved to and fro
That vain it were her lids to close; 235
So halfway from the bed she rose,
And on her elbow did recline
To look at the lady Geraldine.

Beneath the lamp the lady bowed
And slowly rolled her eyes around; 240
Then drawing in her breath aloud
Like one that shuddered, she unbound
The cincture¹⁸ from beneath her breast:
Her silken robe and inner vest
Dropped to her feet, and full in view, 245

Behold! her bosom and half her side –
A sight to dream of, not to tell!

And she is to sleep by Christabel.¹⁹

She took two paces and a stride,
And lay down by the maiden's side; 250

And in her arms the maid she took,
 Ah wel-a-day!

And with low voice and doleful look

 These words did say:

‘In the touch of this bosom there worketh a spell 255

Which is lord of thy utterance, Christabel!²⁰

Thou knowest tonight, and wilt know tomorrow,
This mark of my shame, this seal of my sorrow;

 But vainly thou warrest,
 For this is alone in 260

 Thy power to declare,
 That in the dim forest

 Thou heard'st a low moaning,
And found'st a bright lady surpassingly fair,
And didst bring her home with thee in love and in charity, 265
To shield her and shelter her from the damp air.’

The Conclusion to Part I

It was a lovely sight to see
The lady Christabel, when she
Was praying at the old oak tree.

 Amid the jagged shadows 270

 Of mossy leafless boughs,
 Kneeling in the moonlight

 To make her gentle vows;

Her slender palms together pressed,
Heaving sometimes on her breast; 275

Her face resigned to bliss or bale,

Her face – oh call it fair, not pale!
And both blue eyes more bright than clear,
Each about to have a tear.

With open eyes (ah woe is me!) 280
Asleep, and dreaming fearfully,
Fearfully dreaming, yet I wis,
Dreaming that alone, which is –
Oh sorrow and shame! Can this be she,
The lady who knelt at the old oak tree? 285
And lo! the worker of these harms
That holds the maiden in her arms,
Seems to slumber still and mild,
As a mother with her child.

A star hath set, a star hath risen, 290
Oh Geraldine, since arms of thine
Have been the lovely lady's prison!
Oh Geraldine, one hour was thine –
Thou'st had thy will! By tairn²¹ and rill
The night-birds all that hour were still; 295
But now they are jubilant anew,
From cliff and tower, tu-who! tu-who!
Tu-who! tu-who! from wood and fell!

And see! the lady Christabel
Gathers herself from out her trance; 300
Her limbs relax, her countenance
Grows sad and soft; the smooth thin lids
Close o'er her eyes, and tears she sheds –
Large tears that leave the lashes bright;
And oft the while she seems to smile 305
As infants at a sudden light!

Yea she doth smile and she doth weep

Like a youthful hermitess
Beauteous in a wilderness,
Who praying always, prays in sleep. 310

And if she move unquietly,
Perchance 'tis but the blood so free
Comes back and tingles in her feet.
No doubt she hath a vision sweet:
What if her guardian spirit 'twere? 315
What if she knew her mother near?
But this she knows – in joys and woes,
That saints will aid if men will call,
For the blue sky bends over all!

Part II

'Each matin bell', 22 the Baron saith, 320
'Knells us back to a world of death.'
These words Sir Leoline first said
When he rose and found his lady dead;
These words Sir Leoline will say
Many a morn to his dying day. 325

And hence the custom and law began
That still at dawn the sacristan 23
Who duly pulls the heavy bell
Five and forty beads must tell 24
Between each stroke – a warning knell 330
Which not a soul can choose but hear
From Bratha Head 25 to Windermere. 26

Saith Bracy the bard, 'So let it knell!
And let the drowsy sacristan 27
Still count as slowly as he can! 335

There is no lack of such, I ween,
As well fill up the space between.
In Langdale Pike²⁸ and Witch's Lair²⁹
And Dungeon Ghyll³⁰ (so foully rent),
With ropes of rock and bells of air 340
Three sinful sextons' ghosts are pent,
Who all give back, one after t'other,
The death-note to their living brother;
And oft too, by the knell offended,
Just as their one! – two! – three! is ended, 345
The Devil mocks the doleful tale
With a merry peal from Borrowdale.'³¹

The air is still – through mist and cloud
That merry peal comes ringing loud;
And Geraldine shakes off her dread 350
And rises lightly from the bed,
Puts on her silken vestments white
And tricks her hair in lovely plight,³²
And nothing doubting of her spell
Awakens the lady Christabel. 355

'Sleep you, sweet lady Christabel?
I trust that you have rested well.'

And Christabel awoke and spied
The same who lay down by her side –
Oh rather say, the same whom she 360
Raised up beneath the old oak tree!
Nay, fairer yet, and yet more fair,
For she belike hath drunken deep
Of all the blessedness of sleep!
And while she spake, her looks, her air 365
Such gentle thankfulness declare,

That (so it seemed) her girded vests
Grew tight beneath her heaving breasts.
'Sure I have sinned!' said Christabel,
'Now heaven be praised if all be well!' 370
And in low faltering tones, yet sweet,
Did she the lofty lady greet
With such perplexity of mind
As dreams too lively leave behind.33

So quickly she rose, and quickly arrayed 375
Her maiden limbs, and having prayed
That He who on the cross did groan
Might wash away her sins unknown,
She forthwith led fair Geraldine
To meet her sire, Sir Leoline. 380

The lovely maid and the lady tall
Are pacing both into the hall,
And pacing on through page and groom,
Enter the Baron's presence-room.34

The Baron rose, and while he pressed 385
His gentle daughter to his breast,
With cheerful wonder in his eyes
The lady Geraldine espies,
And gave such welcome to the same,
As might beseem so bright a dame! 390

But when he heard the lady's tale,
And when she told her father's name,
Why waxed35 Sir Leoline so pale,
Murmuring o'er the name again –
Lord Roland de Vaux of Tryermaine? 395

Alas, they had been friends in youth,

But whispering tongues can poison truth,
And constancy lives in realms above;
And life is thorny, and youth is vain,
And to be wroth³⁶ with one we love 400
Doth work like madness in the brain.
And thus it chanced, as I divine,
With Roland and Sir Leoline;
Each spake words of high disdain
And insult to his heart's best brother – 405
They parted, ne'er to meet again!
But never either found another
To free the hollow heart from paining –
They stood aloof, the scars remaining
Like cliffs which had been rent asunder. 410
A dreary sea now flows between,
But neither heat, nor frost, nor thunder
Shall wholly do away, I ween,
The marks of that which once hath been.

Sir Leoline a moment's space 415
Stood gazing on the damsel's face,
And the youthful Lord of Tryermaine
Came back upon his heart again.

Oh then the Baron forgot his age,
His noble heart swelled high with rage; 420
He swore by the wounds in Jesu's side
He would proclaim it far and wide
With trump and solemn heraldry,
That they who thus had wronged the dame
Were base as spotted infamy! 425
'And if they dare deny the same,
My herald shall appoint a week,
And let the recreant traitors seek
My tourney court³⁷ – that there and then

I may dislodge their reptile souls 430
From the bodies and forms of men!
He spake – his eye in lightning rolls!
For the lady was ruthlessly seized, and he kenned³⁸
In the beautiful lady the child of his friend!

And now the tears were on his face, 435
And fondly in his arms he took
Fair Geraldine, who met th' embrace,
Prolonging it with joyous look,
Which when she viewed, a vision fell
Upon the soul of Christabel – 440
The vision of fear, the touch and pain!
She shrunk and shuddered, and saw again
(Ah woe is me! Was it for thee,
Thou gentle maid, such sights to see?)³⁹ –
Again she saw that bosom old, 445
Again she felt that bosom cold,
And drew in her breath with a hissing sound.
Whereat the knight turned wildly round,
And nothing saw but his own sweet maid
With eyes upraised, as one that prayed. 450

The touch, the sight, had passed away,
And in its stead that vision blessed,
Which comforted her after rest,⁴⁰
While in the lady's arms she lay,
Had put a rapture in her breast, 455
And on her lips and o'er her eyes
Spread smiles like light!
 With new surprise,
'What ails then my beloved child?'
The Baron said. His daughter mild
Made answer, 'All will yet be well!' 460
I ween she had no power to tell

Aught else, so mighty was the spell.

Yet he who saw this Geraldine
Had deemed her sure a thing divine,
Such sorrow with such grace she blended, 465
As if she feared she had offended
Sweet Christabel, that gentle maid!
And with such lowly tones she prayed
She might be sent without delay
Home to her father's mansion.

‘Nay, 470

Nay, by my soul!’ said Leoline.
‘Ho! Bracy the bard, the charge be thine!
Go thou with music sweet and loud,
And take two steeds with trappings proud,
And take the youth whom thou lov'st best 475
To bear thy harp and learn thy song,
And clothe you both in solemn vest,
And over the mountains haste along,
Lest wand'ring folk that are abroad
Detain you on the valley road. 480

And when he has crossed the Irthing flood,
My merry bard, he hastes, he hastes
Up Knorren Moor, through Halegarth Wood,41
And reaches soon that castle good
Which stands and threatens Scotland's wastes. 485

Bard Bracy! Bard Bracy! Your horses are fleet,
Ye must ride up the hall, your music so sweet,
More loud than your horses' echoing feet!
And loud and loud to Lord Roland call,
“Thy daughter is safe in Langdale hall! 490
Thy beautiful daughter is safe and free –
Sir Leoline greets thee thus through me.

He bids thee come without delay
With all thy numerous array,
And take thy lovely daughter home; 495
And he will meet thee on the way
With all his numerous array,
White with their panting palfreys' foam!"
And, by mine honour, I will say
That I repent me of the day 500
When I spake words of fierce disdain
To Roland de Vaux of Tryermaine!
For since that evil hour hath flown,
Many a summer's sun have shone;
Yet ne'er found I a friend again 505
Like Roland de Vaux of Tryermaine.'

The lady fell and clasped his knees,
Her face upraised, her eyes o'erflowing;
And Bracy replied, with faltering voice,
His gracious hail⁴² on all bestowing: 510
'Thy words, thou sire of Christabel,
Are sweeter than my harp can tell;
Yet might I gain a boon⁴³ of thee,
This day my journey should not be,
So strange a dream hath come to me, 515
That I had vowed with music loud
To clear yon wood from thing unblessed,
Warned by a vision in my rest!

For in my sleep I saw that dove,
That gentle bird whom thou dost love, 520
And call'st by thy own daughter's name –
Sir Leoline! I saw the same
Fluttering and uttering fearful moan
Among the green herbs⁴⁴ in the forest alone;
Which when I saw, and when I heard, 525

I wondered what might ail the bird,
For nothing near it could I see
Save the grass and green herbs underneath the old tree.

And in my dream methought I went
To search out what might there be found, 530
And what the sweet bird's trouble meant
That thus lay fluttering on the ground.
I went, and peered, and could descry
No cause for her distressful cry;
But yet for her dear lady's sake 535
I stooped, methought the dove to take,
When lo! I saw a bright green snake
Coiled around its wings and neck.
Green as the herbs on which it couched,
Close by the dove's its head it crouched, 540
And with the dove it heaves and stirs,
Swelling its neck as she swelled hers!

I woke; it was the midnight hour,
The clock was echoing in the tower;
But though my slumber was gone by, 545
This dream it would not pass away –
It seems to live upon my eye!
And thence I vowed this self-same day,
With music strong and saintly song,
To wander through the forest bare 550
Lest aught unholy loiter there.'

Thus Bracy said: the Baron the while,
Half-listening heard him with a smile,
Then turned to Lady Geraldine,
His eyes made up of wonder and love; 555
And said, in courtly accents fine,
'Sweet maid, Lord Roland's beauteous dove,
With arms more strong than harp or song,

Thy sire and I will crush the snake!’
He kissed her forehead as he spake, 560
And Geraldine, in maiden wise,
Casting down her large bright eyes,
With blushing cheek and courtesy fine
She turned her from Sir Leoline,
Softly gathering up her train 565
That o’er her right arm fell again,
And folded her arms across her chest,
And couched her head upon her breast,
And looked askance at Christabel –
Jesu Maria, shield her well! 570

A snake’s small eye blinks dull and shy,
And the lady’s eyes they shrunk in her head,
Each shrunk up to a serpent’s eye;
And with somewhat of malice and more of dread
At Christabel she looked askance! 575
One moment and the sight was fled;
But Christabel, in dizzy trance,
Stumbling on the unsteady ground,
Shuddered aloud with a hissing sound;
And Geraldine again turned round 580
And like a thing that sought relief,
Full of wonder and full of grief,
She rolled her large bright eyes divine
Wildly on Sir Leoline.

The maid, alas! her thoughts are gone, 585
She nothing sees, no sight but one!
The maid, devoid of guile and sin,
I know not how, in fearful wise
So deeply had she drunken in
That look, those shrunken serpent eyes, 590
That all her features were resigned
To this sole image in her mind,

And passively did imitate
That look of dull and treacherous hate.
And thus she stood in dizzy trance, 595
Still picturing that look askance
With forced unconscious sympathy
Full before her father's view –
As far as such a look could be,
In eyes so innocent and blue! 600

But when the trance was o'er, the maid
Paused awhile and inly prayed,
Then falling at her father's feet,
'By my mother's soul do I entreat
That thou this woman send away!' 605
She said – and more she could not say,
For what she knew she could not tell,
O'er-mastered by the mighty spell.

Why is thy cheek so wan and wild,
Sir Leoline? Thy only child 610
Lies at thy feet, thy joy, thy pride,
So fair, so innocent, so mild –
The same for whom thy lady died!
Oh by the pangs of her dear mother,
Think thou no evil of thy child! 615
For her and thee, and for no other
She prayed the moment ere she died,
Prayed that the babe for whom she died
Might prove her dear lord's joy and pride!
That prayer her deadly pangs beguiled, 620
 Sir Leoline!
And would'st thou wrong thy only child,
 Her child and thine!

Within the Baron's heart and brain,
If thoughts like these had any share, 625

They only swelled his rage and pain
And did but work confusion there;
His heart was cleft with pain and rage,
His cheeks they quivered, his eyes were wild –
Dishonoured thus in his old age, 630
Dishonoured by his only child,
And all his hospitality
To th' insulted daughter of his friend
By more than woman's jealousy
Brought thus to a disgraceful end. 635
He rolled his eye with stern regard
Upon the gentle minstrel bard,
And said in tones abrupt, austere,
'Why, Bracy, dost thou loiter here?
I bade thee hence!' The bard obeyed; 640
And, turning from his own sweet maid,
The aged knight, Sir Leoline,
Led forth the lady Geraldine!⁴⁵

The Conclusion to Part II ⁴⁶

A little child,⁴⁷ a limber elf,
Singing, dancing to itself, 645
A fairy thing with red round cheeks
That always finds and never seeks,
Makes such a vision to the sight
As fills a father's eyes with light,
And pleasures flow in so thick and fast 650
Upon his heart, that he⁴⁸ at last
Must needs express his love's excess
With words of unmeant bitterness.
Perhaps 'tis pretty to force together
Thoughts so all unlike each other, 655
To mutter and mock a broken charm,
To dally with wrong that does no harm.

Perhaps 'tis tender too and pretty
At each wild word to feel within
A sweet recoil of love and pity. 660
And what if, in a world of sin
(Oh sorrow and shame should this be true!),
Such giddiness of heart and brain
Comes seldom save from rage and pain,
So talks as it's most used to do. 665

Christabel

² plagiarism or servile imitation from myself Walter Scott's poem The Lay of the Last Minstrel (1805) borrowed from Christabel, Scott having been shown a manuscript copy by a mutual acquaintance, John Stoddart, in September–October 1802.

³ A furlong an eighth of a mile (220 yards).

⁴ weal welfare.

12 nitch niche.

13 trim to clean the wick of a lamp for fresh burning.

14 cordial reviving, restorative.

15 Off...flee In a marginal note entered in a copy of the 1816 printed text, Coleridge explained: ‘The mother of Christabel, who is now her guardian spirit, appears to Geraldine, as in answer to her wish. Geraldine fears the spirit, but yet has power over it for a time.’

16 wilderer perplexed, bewildered.

17 'gan began to.

18 cincture belt.

19 Behold...Christabel The MS text of 1800, in the Christabel notebook at the Wordsworth Library, Grasmere, makes Geraldine less human:

Behold! her bosom and half her side
Are lean and old and foul of hue –
A sight to dream of, not to tell,
And she is to sleep with Christabel.

In a MS version of 1816, Geraldine’s side is ‘dark and rough as the sea-wolf’s hide’.

20 In the touch...Christabel A marginal note to a copy of the 1816 printed text by Coleridge reads: ‘As soon as the wicked bosom, with the mysterious sign of evil stamped thereby, touches Christabel, she is deprived of the power of disclosing what had occurred.’

21 tairn The earliest MS version of the poem has a note: ‘Tairn or tarn (derived by Lye from the Icelandic tiorn, stagnum, palus) is rendered in our dictionaries as synonymous with mere or lake; but it is properly a large pool or reservoir in the mountains, commonly the feeder of some mere in the valleys. Tarn Watling and Blellum Tarn, though on lower ground than other tarns, are yet not exceptions – for both are on elevations, and Blellum Tarn feeds the Winander mere.’ This is the first clear indication that the poem is set in the Lake District.

39 Which when she viewed...to see Coleridge's MS note in a copy of the 1816 volume reads: 'Christabel then recollects the whole, and knows that it was not a dream, but yet cannot disclose the fact that the strange lady is a supernatural being with the stamp of the Evil Ones on her.'

40 The touch...after rest In a MS marginal note to a copy of the 1816 printed text, Coleridge wrote: 'Christabel for a moment sees her mother's spirit.'

41 Irthing flood...Halegarth Wood In a MS marginal note to a copy of the 1816 printed text, Coleridge wrote: 'How gladly Sir Leoline repeats the names and shows how familiarly he had once been acquainted with all the spots and paths in the neighbourhood of his former friend's castle and residence.'

42 hail greeting.

43 boon favour.

44 herbs plants.

45 The poem was never concluded, and partly for this reason was not included in Lyrical Ballads (1800). In later years Coleridge gave varying accounts of how it might have ended, including this, the most extensive, recorded by James Gillman: ‘Over the mountains, the Bard, as directed by Sir Leoline, “hastes” with his disciple; but in consequence of one of those inundations supposed to be common in this country, the spot only where the castle once stood is discovered, the edifice itself being washed away. He determines to return. Geraldine being acquainted with all that is passing, like the Weird Sisters in Macbeth, vanishes. Reappearing, however, she waits the return of the Bard, exciting in the meantime, by her wily arts, all the anger she could rouse in the Baron’s breast, as well as the jealousy of which he is described to have been susceptible. The old Bard and the youth at length arrive, and therefore she can no longer personate the character of Geraldine, the daughter of Lord Roland de Vaux, but changes her appearance to that of the accepted though absent lover of Christabel. Next ensues a courtship most distressing to Christabel, who feels (she knows not why) great disgust for her once favoured knight. This coldness is very painful to the Baron, who has no more conception than herself of the supernatural transformation. She at last yields to her father’s entreaties, and consents to approach the altar with this hated suitor. The real lover returning, enters at this moment, and produces the ring which she once had given him in sign of her betrothment. Thus defeated, the supernatural being Geraldine disappears. As predicted, the castle bell tolls, the mother’s voice is heard, and to the exceeding great joy of the parties, the rightful marriage takes place, after which follows a reconciliation and explanation between the father and daughter.’

46 These lines were sent as a fragment to Southey in a letter of 6 May 1801 (Griggs ii 728); it is not clear whether they were at that time considered to form part of Christabel (quite possibly not). They appeared as the conclusion to Part II in the printed text of 1816.

Letter from S. T. Coleridge to Thomas Poole, 6 April 1799¹ (extract)

My baby has not lived in vain! This life has been to him what it is to all of us – education and development! Fling yourself forward into your immortality only a few thousand years, and how small will not the difference between one year old and sixty years appear! Consciousness! It is not otherwise necessary to our conceptions of future continuance than as connecting the present link of our being with the one immediately preceding it – and that degree of consciousness, that small portion of memory, it would not only be arrogant, but in the highest degree absurd, to deny even to a much younger infant.

'Tis a strange assertion that the essence of identity lies in recollective consciousness; 'twere scarcely less ridiculous to affirm that the 8 miles from Stowey to Bridgwater consist in the 8 milestones. Death in a dotting old age falls upon my feelings ever as a more hopeless phenomenon than death in infancy – but nothing is hopeless.

What if the vital force which I sent from my arm into the stone, as I flung it in the air and skimmed it upon the water – what if even that did not perish? It was Life! It was a particle of Being! It was Power! – and how could it perish? Life, Power, Being! – organization may be and probably is their effect; their cause it cannot be! I have indulged very curious fancies concerning that force, that swarm of motive powers which I sent out of my body into that stone – and which, one by one, left the untractable or already possessed mass, and – but the German ocean lies between us. It is all too far to send you such fancies as these! Grief indeed,

Doth love to dally with fantastic thoughts,
And smiling, like a sickly moralist,
Finds some resemblance to her own concerns
In the straws of chance, and things inanimate!²

But I cannot truly say that I grieve. I am perplexed, I am sad – and a little thing, a very trifle, would make me weep. But for the death of the baby I have not wept! Oh, this strange, strange, strange scene-shifter, death! – that giddies one with insecurity, and so unsubstantiates the living things that one has grasped and handled! Some months ago Wordsworth transmitted to me a most sublime epitaph;³ whether it had any reality, I cannot say. Most probably, in some gloomier moment he had fancied the moment in which his sister might die.

Letter from S. T. Coleridge to Thomas Poole

¹ Coleridge's son, Berkeley (born 14 May 1798), died 10 February 1799 during his father's stay in Germany. At first the news was kept from Coleridge, but later Poole thought it better to let him know. This letter is Coleridge's first written response to the news, from Göttingen. Berkeley's death seems to have been a catalyst for the Infant Babe passage in Two-Part Prelude ii 267–310.

² Coleridge quotes himself: Osorio V i 11–14.

³ a most sublime epitaph 'A Slumber did my Spirit Seal', p. 488.

Lines Written in the Album at Elbingerode, in the Hartz Forest (composed by 17 May 1799)¹

From The Annual Anthology (1800)

I stood on Brocken's sovran height,² and saw
Woods crowding upon woods, hills over hills,
A surging scene,³ and only limited
By the blue distance. Heavily my way

Homeward I dragged through fir-groves evermore, 5
Where bright green moss heaves in sepulchral forms,
Speckled with sunshine; and, but seldom heard,
The sweet bird's song became an hollow sound;
And the breeze murmuring indivisibly
Preserved its solemn murmur most distinct 10
From many a note of many a waterfall,
And the brook's chatter, mid whose islet stones
The dingy kidling with its tinkling bell
Leapt frolicsome, or old romantic goat
Sat, his white beard slow-waving. I moved on 15
In low and languid mood,⁴ for I had found
That grandest scenes have but imperfect charms,
Where the sight vainly wanders, nor beholds
One spot with which the heart associates
Holy remembrances of friend or child, 20
Or gentle maid, our first and early love,
Or father, or the venerable name
Of our adored country!
Oh thou Queen,
Thou delegated deity of earth,
Oh dear, dear, England! How my longing eye 25
Turned westward, shaping in the steady clouds
Thy sand and high white cliffs! Oh native land,
Filled with the thought of thee, this heart was proud,
Yea, mine eye swam with tears, that all the view
From sovran Brocken, woods and woody hills, 30
Floated away like a departing dream,
Feeble and dim! Stranger, these impulses
Blame thou not lightly, nor will I profane
With hasty judgement or injurious doubt
That man's sublimer spirit, who can feel 35
That God is everywhere! – the God who framed
Mankind to be one mighty family,
Himself our Father, and the world our home.

Lines Written in the Album at Elbingerode

¹ Coleridge sent this poem in a letter to his wife, 17 May 1799, with the introduction: ‘At the inn they brought us an Album, or Stammbuch, requesting that we would write our names and something or other as a remembrance that we had been there. I wrote the following lines, which I send to you not that they possess a grain of merit as poetry, but because they contain a true account of my journey from the Brocken to Elbinrode’ (Griggs i 504).

² Brocken’s sovran height Coleridge notes that the Great Brocken is ‘the highest mountain in the Hartz, and indeed in north Germany’.

³ A surging scene In Thomas Poole’s copy, Coleridge substituted the phrase, ‘A land of billows’.

⁴ In low and languid mood Coleridge glosses this with a quotation from Southey:

When I have gazed
From some high eminence on goodly vales,
And cots and villages embowered below,
The thought would rise that all to me was strange
Amid the scenes so fair, nor one small spot
Where my tired mind might rest, and call it ‘home’.
(Southey’s Hymn to the Penates)

The Day-Dream (composed March 1802, published The Morning Post 19 October
1802; edited from MS)¹

If thou wert here, these tears were ‘tears of light’!²
But from as sweet a day-dream did I start
As ever made these eyes grow idly bright;
And though I weep, yet still about the heart
A dear and playful tenderness doth linger, 5
Touching my heart as with a baby’s finger.

My mouth half-open like a witless man,
I saw the couch, I saw the quiet room,
The heaving shadows and the firelight gloom;
And on my lips I know not what there ran – 10
On my unmoving lips a subtle³ feeling;
I know not what, but had the same been stealing

Upon a sleeping mother’s lips, I guess
It would have made the loving mother dream
That she was softly stooping down to kiss 15
Her babe, that something more than babe did seem –
An obscure presence of its darling father,
Yet still its own sweet baby self far rather!

Across my chest there lived a weight so warm
As if some bird had taken shelter there; 20
And lo, upon the couch, a woman’s form! –
Thine, Sara,⁴ thine! Oh joy, if thine it were!
I gazed with anxious hope, and feared to stir it –
A deeper trance ne’er rapt a yearning spirit!

And now, when I seemed sure my love to see, 25
Her very self in her own quiet home,
There came an elfish laugh, and wakened me!
'Twas Hartley,⁵ who behind my chair had clomb,⁶
And with his bright eyes at my face was peeping;
I blessed him, tried to laugh – and fell a-weeping. 30

The Day-Dream

¹ The date of composition is conjectural, based on George Whalley's argument that the poem was written prior to 'A Letter to Sara Hutchinson', probably at Greta Hall. When published in the Morning Post, in somewhat revised form, it appeared under the title, 'The Day-Dream, from an Emigrant to his Absent Wife'.

² tears of light The phrase is borrowed from Wordsworth, 'Matthew' 23–4: 'The tears which came to Matthew's eyes / Were tears of light, the oil of gladness.'

³ subtile delicate, fine.

⁴ Sara Hutchinson (1775–1835), Coleridge's 'Asra', was Wordsworth's sister-in-law. Coleridge's unconsummated love for her lasted until his break with Wordsworth led him to reside in London.

⁵ Hartley Coleridge (b. 1796).

⁶ clomb climbed.

The Picture; or, The Lover's Resolution (composed March 1802)¹

From The Morning Post No. 10,584 (6 September 1802)

Through weeds and thorns, and matted underwood
I force my way; now climb, and now descend
O'er rocks, or bare or mossy, with blind foot
Crushing the purple whorts;² while oft unseen,
Hurrying along the drifted forest leaves, 5
The scared snake rustles. Onward still I toil,
I know not, ask not whither. A new joy
Lovely as light, sudden as summer gust
And gladsome as the first-born of the spring,
Beckons me on, or follows from behind, 10
Playmate or guide.³ The master-passion quelled,
I feel that I am free. With dun-red bark
The fir-trees and th' unfrequent slender oak
Forth from this tangle wild of bush and brake
Soar up, and form a melancholy vault 15
High o'er me, murm'ring like a distant sea.
No myrtle-walks are here!⁴ These are no groves
For Love⁵ to dwell in; the low stumps would gore
His dainty feet; the briar and the thorn
Make his plumes haggard; till, like wounded bird, 20
Easily caught, the dusky dryads,⁶
With prickles sharper than his darts, would mock
His little godship, making him perforce
Creep through a thorn-bush on yon hedgehog's back.
This is my hour of triumph! I can now 25
With my own fancies play the merry fool,
And laugh away worse folly, being free.
Here will I seat myself beside this old,
Hollow, and woody oak, which ivy-twine
Clothes, as with network;⁷ here will couch my limbs 30
Close by this river, in this silent shade,

As safe and sacred from the step of man
As an invisible world – unheard, unseen,⁸
And list'ning only to the pebbly stream
That murmurs with a dead yet bell-like sound 35
Tinkling, or bees, that in the neighb'ring trunk
Make honey-hoards. This breeze that visits me
Was never Love's accomplice, never raised
The tendril ringlets from the maiden's brow,
And the blue, delicate veins above her cheek; 40
Ne'er played the wanton, never half-disclosed
The maiden's snowy bosom, scatt'ring thence
Eye-poisons for some love-distempered youth,
Who ne'er, henceforth, may see an aspen-grove
Shiver in sunshine, but his feeble heart 45
Shall flow away like a dissolving thing.
Sweet breeze! thou only, if I guess aright,
Lifest the feathers of the robin's breast,
Who swells his little breast, so full of song,
Singing above me on the mountain ash. 50
And thou too, desert stream! No pool of thine,
Though clear as lake in latest summer eve,
Did e'er reflect the stately virgin's robe,
The face, the form divine, her downcast look
Contemplative, her cheek upon her palm 55
Supported; the white arm and elbow rest
On the bare branch of half-uprooted tree,
That leans towards its mirror! He, meanwhile,
Who from her count'nance turned, or looked by stealth
(For fear is true love's cruel nurse), he now, 60
With steadfast gaze and unoffending eye,
Worships the wat'ry idol, dreaming hopes
Delicious to the soul – but fleeting, vain
Ev'n as that phantom-world on which he gazed!
She (sportive tyrant) with her left hand plucks 65
The heads of tall flow'rs that behind her grow –

Lychnis, and willow-herb, and foxglove-bells;
And suddenly, as one that toys with time,
Scatters them on the pool! Then all the charm
Is broken – all that phantom world so fair 70
Vanishes, and a thousand circlets spread,
And each misshape the other. Stay awhile,
Poor youth, who scarcely dar'st lift up thine eyes –
The stream will soon renew its smoothness, soon
The visions will return! And lo, he stays, 75
And soon the fragments dim of lovely forms
Come trembling back, unite, and now once more
The pool becomes a mirror;⁹ and behold
Each wild-flow'r on the marge inverted there,
And there the half-uprooted tree – but where, 80
Oh where the virgin's snowy arm, that leaned
On its bare branch? He turns, and she is gone!
Homeward she steals through many a woodland maze
Which he shall seek in vain. Ill-fated youth,
Go, day by day, and waste thy manly prime 85
In mad love-gazing on the vacant brook,
Till sickly thoughts bewitch thine eyes, and thou
Behold'st her shadow still abiding there,
The naiad of the mirror!¹⁰
 Not to thee,
Oh wild and desert stream, belongs this tale. 90
Gloomy and dark art thou; the crowded firs
Tow'r from thy shores, and stretch across thy bed,
Making thee doleful as a cavern well!
Save when the shy kingfishers build their nest
On thy steep banks, no loves hast thou, wild stream! 95
This be my chosen haunt – emancipate¹¹
From passion's dreams, a freeman, and alone,
I rise and trace its devious course. Oh lead,
Lead me to deeper shades, to lonelier glooms.
Lo! stealing through the canopy of firs, 100

How fair the sunshine spots that mossy rock,
Isle of the river, whose parted¹² waters
Dart off asunder with an angry sound,
How soon to reunite! They meet, they join
In deep embrace, and open to the sun 105
Lie calm and smooth. Such the delicious hour
Of deep enjoyment, foll'wing love's brief quarrels!
And hark, the noise of a near waterfall!
I come out into light – I find myself
Beneath a weeping birch (most beautiful 110
Of forest trees, the lady of the woods)
Hard by the brink of a tall weedy rock
That overbrows the cataract. How bursts
The landscape on my sight! Two crescent hills
Fold in behind each other, and so make 115
A circular vale, and landlocked, as might seem,
With brook and bridge, and grey-stone cottages,
Half hid by rocks and fruit-trees. Beneath my feet
The whortleberries are bedewed with spray,
Dashed upwards by the furious waterfall. 120
How solemnly the pendent ivy mass
Swings in its winnow!¹³ All the air is calm,
The smoke from cottage chimneys, tinged with light,
Rises in columns; from this house alone
Close by the waterfall, the column slants 125
And feels its ceaseless breeze. But what is this?
That cottage, with its slanting chimney smoke,
And close beside its porch a sleeping child,
His dear head pillowed on a sleeping dog,
One arm between its forelegs, and the hand 130
Holds loosely its small handful of wild-flow'rs,
Unfilleted,¹⁴ and of unequal lengths –
A curious picture, with a master's haste
Sketched on a strip of pinky-silver skin
Peeled from the birchen bark! Divinest maid – 135

Yon bark her canvas, and these purple berries
 Her pencil! See, the juice is scarcely dried
 On the fine skin! She has been newly here,
 And lo! Yon patch of heath has been her couch –
 The pressure still remains! Oh blessed couch, 140
 For this may'st thou flow'r early, and the sun
 Slanting, at eve rest bright, and linger long
 Upon thy purple bells! Oh Isabel,
 Daughter of genius, stateliest of our maids,
 More beautiful than whom Alcaeus wooed, 145
 The Lesbian woman of immortal song,¹⁵
 Oh child of genius, stately, beautiful,
 And full of love to all, save only one,
 And not ungentle ev'n to me! My heart,
 Why beats it thus? Through yonder coppice-wood 150
 Needs must the pathway turn, that leads away
 On to her father's house. She is alone!
 The night draws on – such ways are hard to hit –
 And fit it is I should restore this sketch
 Dropped unawares, no doubt. Why should I yearn 155
 To keep the relic? 'Twill but idly feed
 The passion that consumes me. Let me haste!
 This picture in my hand, which she has left;
 She cannot blame me, that I followed her,
 And I may be her guide the long wood through! 160

The Picture; or, The Lover's Resolution

¹ In March 1802 Coleridge made the following entry in a notebook: 'A poem on the endeavour to emancipate the soul from day-dreams and note the different attempts and the vain ones' (Notebooks i 1153). The poem was The Picture.

² whorts whortleberries.

3 Lines 7–11 recall Wordsworth’s search for a guide in the Glad Preamble (composed early 1800) (see pp. 490–1).

4 No myrtle-walks are here Coleridge may be recalling the myrtle at Clevedon, mentioned at Eolian Harp (1795) 4–5 and Reflections on Having Left a Place of Retirement 5.

5 Love cupid.

6 dryads wood-nymphs.

7 network light fabric made of netted threads.

8 Close by...unseen cf. Coleridge’s notebook entry, March 1802: ‘A river, so translucent as not to be seen – and yet murmuring – shadowy world – and these a dream / Enchanted river’ (Notebooks i 1124).

9 Lines 69–78 are quoted by Coleridge in the introduction to the printed text of Kubla Khan (1816), p. 640.

10 naiad of the mirror nymph of the pond.

11 emancipate free (i.e. from romantic entanglement).

12 disparted divided (by the rock).

13 winnow swinging motion caused by the spray of the waterfall.

14 Unfilleted i.e. the stems of the bunch of flowers are not tied up together.

15 whom Alcaeus...song Sappho, as in Wordsworth’s ‘Alcaeus to Sappho’, published Morning Post 2 October 1800 (see Griggs i 629).

A Letter to Sara Hutchinson¹, 4 April
1802.² Sunday Evening (edited from MS)³

Well! if the bard was weather-wise who made
The dear old ballad of Sir Patrick Spence,⁴
This night, so tranquil now, will not go hence
Unroused by winds that ply a busier trade
Than that which moulds yon clouds in lazy flakes, 5
Or the dull sobbing draught that drones and rakes
Upon the strings of this Eolian lute,⁵
Which better far were mute.
For lo! the new moon, winter-bright,
And all suffused⁶ with phantom light 10
(With swimming phantom light o'erspread,
But rimmed and circled with a silver thread);
I see the old moon in her lap, foretelling
The coming-on of rain and squally blast.
Ah Sara!⁷ that the gust ev'n now were swelling, 15
And the slant night-shower driving loud and fast.

A grief without a pang – void, dark, and drear;
A stifling, drowsy, unimpassioned grief
That finds no natural outlet, no relief
In word, or sigh, or tear – 20
This, Sara, well thou know'st,
Is that sore evil which I dread the most
And oft'nest suffer in this heartless mood,
To other thoughts by yonder throstle wooed,
That pipes within the larch-tree not unseen 25

(The larch which pushes out in tassels green
Its bundled leaflets), wooed to mild delights
By all the tender sounds and gentle sights
Of this sweet primrose-month – and vainly wooed,
Oh dearest Sara, in this heartless⁸ mood. 30

All this long eve so balmy and serene
Have I been gazing on the western sky
And its peculiar tint of yellow-green;
And still I gaze, and with how blank an eye!
And those thin clouds above, in flakes and bars, 35
That give away their motion to the stars,
Those stars that glide behind them and between,
Now sparkling, now bedimmed, but always seen;
Yon crescent moon, as fixed as if it grew
In its own cloudless, starless lake of blue – 40
A boat becalmed! Dear William's sky canoe!⁹
I see them all, so excellently fair;
I see, not feel, how beautiful they are!

My genial spirits fail,¹⁰
And what can these avail 45
To lift the smothering weight from off my breast?
It were a vain endeavour,
Though I should gaze forever
On that green light that lingers in the west:¹¹
I may not hope from outward forms to win 50
The passion and the life, whose fountains are within;
These lifeless shapes, around, below, above –
Oh dearest Sara, what can they impart?
Even when the gentle thought that thou, my love,

Art gazing now like me 55
And see'st the heaven I see –
Sweet thought it is, yet feebly stirs my heart!

Feebly, oh feebly! Yet
(I well remember it)
In my first dawn of youth, that fancy stole 60
With many gentle yearnings on my soul.
At eve, sky-gazing in 'ecstatic fit' 12
(Alas, far-cloistered in a city school, 13
The sky was all I knew of beautiful),
At the barred window often did I sit, 65
And often on the leaded school-roof lay,
 And to myself would say,
'There does not live the man so stripped of good affections
As not to love to see a maiden's quiet eyes
Upraised and linking on sweet dreams by dim connections 70
To moon, or evening star, or glorious western skies!'
While yet a boy, this thought would so pursue me,
That often it became a kind of vision to me.

Sweet thought, and dear of old
To hearts of finer mould! 14 75
Ten thousand times by friends and lovers blessed!
 I spake with rash despair,
 And ere I was aware,
The weight was somewhat lifted from my breast!
Dear Sara! in the weather-fended wood, 15 80
Thy loved haunt where the stock-doves coo at noon,
 I guess that thou hast stood
And watched yon crescent and that ghost-like moon;

And yet far rather, in my present mood,
I would that thou'dst been sitting all this while 85
Upon the sod-built seat of camomile,¹⁶
And though thy robin may have ceased to sing,
Yet needs for my sake must thou love to hear
The beehive murmuring near –
That ever-busy and most quiet thing 90
Which I have heard at midnight murmuring.

I feel my spirit moved:
And wheresoe'er thou be,
Oh sister, oh beloved!
Thy dear mild eyes that see 95
The very heaven I see –
There is a prayer in them, it is for me!
And I, dear Sara, I am blessing thee!¹⁷

8

It was as calm as this, the happy night¹⁸
When Mary, thou and I together were, 100
The low decaying fire our only light,
And listened to the stillness of the air!
Oh, that affectionate and blameless maid,
Dear Mary, on her lap my head she laid –
Her hand was on my brow 105
Even as my own is now,
And on my cheek I felt thy eyelash play.¹⁹
Such joy I had that I may truly say
My spirit was awe-stricken with the excess
And trance-like depth of its brief happiness. 110

Ah fair remembrances that so revivelyr Leoline.
My heart and fill it with a living power –
Where were they, Sara? Or did I not strive
To win them to me on the fretting hour
Then when I wrote thee that complaining scroll,²⁰ 115
Which even to bodily sickness bruised thy soul?
And yet thou blam'st thyself alone, and yet
Forbidd'st me all regret.²¹

10

And must I not regret that I distressed
Thee, best beloved, who lovest me the best? 120
My better mind had fled I know not whither –
For oh! was this an absent friend's employ,
To send from far both pain and sorrow thither,
Where still his blessings should have called down joy?
I read thy guileless letter o'er again, 125
I hear thee of thy blameless self complain,
And only this I learn – and this, alas, I know –
That thou art weak and pale with sickness, grief, and pain,
And I – I made thee so!

11

Oh, for my own sake, I regret perforce 130
Whatever turns thee, Sara, from the course
Of calm well-being and a heart at rest.
When thou and, with thee, those whom thou lov'st best
Shall dwell together in one quiet home,
One home the sure abiding home of all, 135
I too will crown me with a coronal;²²
Nor shall this heart in idle wishes roam

Morbidly soft!
No, let me trust that I shall wear away
In no inglorious toils the manly day; 140
And only now and then, and not too oft,
Some dear and memorable eve shall bless,
Dreaming of all your love and happiness.

12

Be happy, and I need thee not in sight!
Peace in thy heart, and quiet in thy dwelling, 145
Health in thy limbs, and in thy eyes the light
Of love, and hope, and honourable feeling;
Where'er I am, I needs must be content –
Not near thee, haply shall be more content!
To all things I prefer the permanent. 23 150
And better seems it for a heart like mine
Always to know, than sometimes to behold
Their happiness and thine:
For change doth trouble me with pangs untold!
To see thee, hear thee, feel thee, then to part – 155
Oh, it weighs down the heart!
To visit those I love, as I love thee,
Mary, William, and dear Dorothy,
It is but a temptation to repine!
The transientness is poison in the wine, 160
Eats out the pith of joy, makes all joy hollow,
All pleasure a dim dream of pain to follow!
My own peculiar lot, my household life,
It is (and will remain) indifference or strife;
While ye are well and happy, 'twould but wrong you 165
If I should fondly yearn to be among you –
Wherefore, oh wherefore, should I wish to be
A withered branch upon a blossoming tree?

13

But (let me say it, for I vainly strive
To beat away the thought) – but if thou pined, 170
Whate'er the cause, in body or in mind,
I were the miserablest man alive
To know it and be absent! Thy delights
Far off or near, alike shall I partake –
But oh! to mourn for thee, and to forsake 175
All power, all hope of giving comfort to thee;
To know that thou art weak and worn with pain
And not to hear thee, Sara, not to view thee,
Not sit beside thy bed,
Not press thy aching head, 180
Not bring thee health again,
At least to hope, to try
By this voice which thou lov'st, and by this earnest eye –

14

Nay, wherefore did I let it haunt my mind,
This dark distressful dream? 185
I turn from it and listen to the wind
Which long has howled unnoticed! What a scream
Of agony, by torture lengthened out,
That lute sent forth! Oh thou wild storm without!
Or crag, or tairn, 24 or lightning-blasted tree, 190
Or pine-grove whither woodman never clomb, 25
Or lonely house long held the witches' home,
Methinks were fitter instruments for thee,
Mad lutanist, that in this month of showers,
Of dark-brown gardens and of peeping flowers, 195
Mak'st devil's yule, 26 with worse than wintry song,
The blooms and buds and timorous leaves among!
Thou actor, perfect in all tragic sounds,

Thou mighty poet, even to frenzy bold,
 What tell'st thou now about? 200
 'Tis of a rushing of an host²⁷ in rout,
 And many groans from men with smarting wounds,²⁸
 That groan at once from smart, and shudder with the cold!
 But hush, there is a break of deepest silence –
 Again! But that dread sound, as of a rushing crowd, 205
 And groans and tremulous shuddering – all are over.
 And it has other sounds, and all less deep, less loud;
 A tale of less affright,
 And tempered with delight,
 As William's self had made the tender lay! 210
 'Tis of a little child
 Upon a heathy wild²⁹
 Not far from home, but it has lost its way,
 And now moans low in utter grief and fear,
 And now screams loud, and hopes to make its mother hear! 215

15

'Tis midnight, and small thought have I of sleep –
 Full seldom may my friend³⁰ such vigils keep –
 Oh breathe she softly in her gentle sleep!
 Cover her, gentle sleep, with wings of healing,
 And be this tempest but a mountain birth! 220
 May all the stars hang bright above her dwelling,
 Silent, as though they watched the sleeping earth,
 Like elder sisters with love-twinkling eyes!
 Healthful and light, my darling, may'st thou rise,
 And of the same good tidings to me send – 225
 For oh, beloved friend!
 I am not the buoyant thing I was of yore,
 When like an own child, I to joy belonged;

For others mourning oft, myself oft sorely wronged,
Yet bearing all things then as if I nothing bore. 230

16

Ere I was wedded,³¹ though my path was rough,
The joy within me dallied with distress,
And all misfortunes were but as the stuff
Whence fancy made me dreams of happiness;
For hope grew round me like the climbing vine, 235
And leaves and fruitage not my own, seemed mine!
But now ill tidings bow me down to earth,
Nor care I that they rob me of my mirth;
 But oh! each visitation
Suspends what nature gave me at my birth – 240
My shaping spirit of imagination!
I speak not now of those habitual ills
That wear out life, when two unequal minds
Meet in one house, and two discordant wills –
 This leaves me where it finds, 245
Past cure and past complaint – a fate austere
Too fixed and hopeless to partake of fear!

17

But thou, dear Sara (dear indeed thou art,
My comforter, a heart within my heart!),
Thou and the few we love, though few ye be, 250
Make up a world of hopes and fears for me.
And when affliction or distempering pain
Or wayward chance befall you, I complain
Not that I mourn – oh friends most dear, most true!
 Methinks to weep with you 255
Were better far than to rejoice alone –
But that my coarse domestic life³² has known

No griefs but such as dull and deaden me,
No habits of heart-nursing sympathy,
No mutual mild enjoyments of its own, 260
No hopes of its own vintage – none, oh none! –
Whence, when I mourn for you, my heart must borrow
Fair forms and living motions for its sorrow.
For not to think of what I needs must feel,
But to be still and patient all I can, 265
And haply by abstruse research to steal
From my own nature all the natural man –
This was my sole resource, my wisest plan;
And that which suits a part infects the whole,
And now is almost grown the temper of my soul.³³ 270

18

My little children³⁴ are a joy, a love,
 A good gift from above!
But what is bliss, that ever calls up woe,
 And makes it doubly keen,
Compelling me to feel what well I know – 275
What a most blessed lot mine might have been.
Those little angel children (woe is me!),
There have been hours when, feeling how they bind
And pluck out the wing-feathers of my mind,
Turning my error to necessity, 280
I have half-wished they never had been born!³⁵
That, seldom; but sad thought they always bring,
And, like the poet's nightingale,³⁶ I sing
My love-song with my breast against a thorn.

19

With no unthankful spirit I confess 285
This clinging grief, too, in its turn awakes

That love and father's joy – but oh! it makes
The love the greater, and the joy far less.
These mountains too, these vales, these woods, these lakes,
Scenes full of beauty and of loftiness 290
Where all my life I fondly hope to live –
I were sunk low indeed, did they no solace give.
But oft I seem to feel, and evermore to fear,
They are not to me now the things which once they were.³⁷

Oh Sara, we receive but what we give, 295
And in our life alone does nature live;
Ours is her wedding-garment, ours her shroud!
And would we aught behold of higher worth
Than that inanimate cold world allowed
To the poor, loveless, ever-anxious crowd – 300
Ah! from the soul itself must issue forth
A light, a glory,³⁸ and a luminous cloud
Enveloping the earth!
And from the soul itself must there be sent
A sweet and potent voice, of its own birth, 305
Of all sweet sounds the life and element.
Oh pure of heart!³⁹ thou need'st not ask of me
What this strange music in the soul may be,
What and wherein it doth exist,
This light, this glory, this fair luminous mist, 310
This beautiful and beauty-making power!
Joy,⁴⁰ innocent Sara! Joy that ne'er was given
Save to the pure and in their purest hour,
Joy, Sara, is the spirit and the power
That, wedding nature to us, gives in dower⁴¹ 315
A new earth and new heaven
Undreamt of by the sensual and the proud!

Joy is that sweet voice, joy that luminous cloud –
 We, we ourselves rejoice!
 And thence flows all that charms or ear or sight, 320
 All melodies the echoes of that voice,
 All colours a suffusion from that light.
 Sister and friend⁴² of my devoutest⁴³ choice!
 Thou being innocent and full of love,
 And nested with the darlings of thy love; 325
 And feeling in thy soul, heart, lips, and arms
 Even what the conjugal and mother dove
 That borrows genial warmth from these she warms
 Feels in her thrilled wings, blessedly outspread⁴⁴ –
 Thou, freed awhile from cares and human dread 330
 By the immenseness of the good and fair
 Which thou seest everywhere –
 Thus, thus would'st thou rejoice!
 To thee would all things live from pole to pole,⁴⁵
 Their life the eddying of thy living soul. 335
 Oh dear! Oh innocent! Oh full of love!
 Sara, thou friend of my devoutest⁴⁶ choice,
 As dear as light and impulse from above –
 So may'st thou ever, evermore rejoice!

A Letter to Sara Hutchinson

¹ In MS the title actually reads ‘A Letter to ——’, but there can be no doubt that the addressee was Sara Hutchinson. For the relation of this poem to Wordsworth’s ‘Ode’ (the first four stanzas of which were composed at much the same time), see Lucy Newlyn, Coleridge, Wordsworth, and the Language of Allusion (Oxford, 1986), chapter 3.

² 4 April 1802 was the day before Wordsworth set out from Grasmere to propose marriage to Mary Hutchinson. Coleridge later recalled that ‘I – then ill – continued talking with Wordsworth the whole night till the dawn of the day, urging him to conclude on marrying Mary Hutchinson' (Notebooks iii 3304) – a step he could not take with regard to her sister, Sara, even though he very much wanted to.

³ This is the poem from which Coleridge derived Dejection: An Ode (published here in the 1817 text, pp. 693–7). It is a product of the depressed state in which he had been languishing for some time; as long before as March 1801 he had told Godwin that 'The Poet is dead in me; my imagination (or rather the somewhat that had been imaginative) lies, like a cold snuff on the circular rim of a brass candlestick, without even a stink of tallow to remind you that it was once clothed and mitred with flame' (Griggs ii 714). In December that year he sketched the plan of this poem in a notebook entry: 'A lively picture of a man, disappointed in marriage and endeavouring to make a compensation to himself by virtuous and tender and brotherly friendship with an amiable woman – the obstacles – the jealousies – the impossibility of it. Best advice that he should as much as possible withdraw himself from pursuits of morals etc. – and devote himself to abstract sciences' (Notebooks i 1065). By this time he had passed his poetic ambitions on to Wordsworth, in the form of The Recluse, and was hopelessly in love with Sara Hutchinson (Wordsworth's sister-in-law), who preferred Wordsworth's company to his. This poem initiated a dialogue with Wordsworth, who 'replied' with the first version of Resolution and Independence (3–9 May).

⁴ the bard... Spence unknown; Coleridge knew The Ballad of Sir Patrick Spens from Thomas Percy's Reliques of Ancient English Poetry (1765).

⁵ Eolian lute Aeolian harps were placed lengthways in front of open windows, where their strings were 'played' by the wind; see Coleridge's The Eolian Harp, pp. 620–5.

⁶ suffused overspread.

⁷ Sara Hutchinson (1775–1835), Coleridge's 'Asra', was Wordsworth's sister-in-law. Coleridge's unconsummated love for her lasted until his break with Wordsworth led him to reside in London.

8 heartless depressed, discouraged.

9 Dear William's sky canoe as featured in the prologue to Wordsworth's Peter Bell (composed 1798, published 1819).

10 My genial spirits fail an echo of Milton, 'Samson Agonistes' 594: 'my genial spirits droop.'

11 that green light that lingers in the west borrowed from Southey, Madoc (1805) II xxxvi 260: 'The last green light that lingers in the west.'

12 Milton, 'The Passion' 42.

13 a city school Christ's Hospital in the City of London; cf. 'Frost at Midnight' (1798) 26–48.

14 mould form.

15 the weather-fended wood The wood provides cover from wind and rain, and is therefore weather (de)fended. The phrase 'weather-fends' is from Shakespeare, The Tempest V i 10.

16 the sod-built seat of camomile 'sara's seat' was built by Coleridge and the Wordsworths on White Moss Common, Rydal, 10 October 1801.

17 I am blessing thee one in a long line of benedictions; cf. those of Hartley in 'Frost at Midnight' and Charles Lamb in 'This Lime-Tree Bower My Prison'.

18 the happy night the exact date is not known, but it was during Coleridge's visit to Gallow Hill, 2–13 March 1802. It is recalled also in The Day-Dream and A Day-Dream (pp. 678–9, 692–3).

19 And on my cheek...play cf. A Day-Dream 31–2: 'Thine eyelash on my cheek doth play – / 'Tis Mary's hand upon my brow!'

20 that complaining scroll a letter to Sara. The ‘bodily sickness’ of l. 116 may be the sickness into which she had fallen by 29 February 1802, which drew Coleridge back to Gallow Hill from London. He remained at Gallow Hill from 2 to 13 March, weeping aloud when he left for Keswick.

21 Coleridge’s letters not infrequently caused Sara distress. On 13 December 1801 Dorothy recorded: ‘The boy brought letters from Coleridge and from Sara. Sara in bad spirits about Coleridge’ (Grasmere Journals 48).

22 I too...coronal an allusion to Wordsworth’s ‘Ode’: ‘My heart is at your festival, / My head hath its coronal’ (ll. 39–40).

23 To all things...permanent Cf. Wordsworth’s reference to the ‘beautiful and permanent forms of nature’, Preface to Lyrical Ballads, p. 508.

24 tairn expanse of water high among the mountains; see Coleridge’s note to Christabel 294, p. 667 n. 21.

25 clomb climbed.

26 yule festival; yule was the pagan festival that became Christmas. This is the devil’s yule because it is April rather than December.

27 host army.

28 an host...wounds Coleridge was very conscious of the war against France, which had been going on since 1793 and which had halted (temporarily) after signing of the Treaty of Amiens, just a week before; see also Reflections on Having Left a Place of Retirement 43–8, Fears in Solitude.

29 a little child...wild Coleridge has in mind Wordsworth’s ‘Lucy Gray’, published in Lyrical Ballads (1800).

30 my friend Sara Hutchinson.

31 Ere I was wedded Before Coleridge married Sara Fricker in 1795 he had enjoyed a career as a political lecturer and pamphleteer.

32 my coarse domestic life Coleridge's marriage was disintegrating. On 20 October 1802 he told Thomas Wedgwood of what he had endured at Greta Hall: 'Ill-tempered speeches sent after me when I went out of the house; ill-tempered speeches on my return; my friends received with freezing looks' (Griggs ii 876).

33 For not...soul These lines were not included in Dejection: An Ode in 1802, but were readmitted to the 1817 text (see p. 696 below).

34 My little children Hartley (b. 1796) and Derwent (b. 1800). Sara would be born 23 December 1802.

35 I have...born The unsatisfactoriness of his marriage was largely the cause of these guilty feelings about his children, with whom he was spending less and less time. Cf. The Day-Dream 25–30, and his comment to his wife in a letter of Christmas Day 1801: 'Oh my dear Hartley, my Derwent! My children! The night before last I dreamt I saw them so vividly, that I was quite ill in the morning and wept my eyes red' (Griggs ii 776).

36 the poet's nightingale Philomela, one of the subjects of Ovid's Metamorphoses. She was seduced by her brother-in-law, Tereus King of Thrace, who cut out her tongue to prevent her from incriminating him. She was finally turned into a nightingale, her sad song said to derive from the thorn in her breast.

37 They are not...were a reworking of Wordsworth, 'Ode' 9: 'The things which I have seen I now can see no more.'

38 glory divine effulgence of light, as at Wordsworth, 'Ode' 18.

39 Oh pure of heart Sara Hutchinson.

40 Joy In a notebook entry Coleridge glossed joy as ‘when the heart is full as of a deep and quiet fountain overflowing insensibly, or the gladness of joy, when the fountain becomes ebullient’ (Notebooks ii 2279).

41 dower a wedding-gift.

42 Sister and friend i.e. Sara Hutchinson.

43 devoutest most devoted, most attached.

44 Even what...outspread Coleridge has in mind the moment of creation, Paradise Lost i 21–2, where the Holy Spirit ‘Dove-like sat’st brooding on the vast abyss / And madest it pregnant’.

45 To thee...pole Coleridge blesses Sara with the pantheist perception of the one life in the natural world, as he had done Charles Lamb in ‘This Lime-Tree Bower My Prison’.

46 devoutest most devoted, most attached.

A Day-Dream (composed June 1802; published 1828)¹

From Poetical Works (1828)

My eyes make pictures, when they are shut:
I see a fountain, large and fair,
A willow and a ruined hut,²
And thee,³ and me, and Mary⁴ there.
Oh Mary, make thy gentle lap our pillow! 5
Bend o'er us, like a bower, my beautiful green willow!

A wild rose roofs the ruined shed,
And that and summer well agree;
And lo! where Mary leans her head –
Two dear names carved upon the tree! 10
And Mary's tears, they are not tears of sorrow:
Our sister and our friend⁵ will both be here tomorrow.

'Twas day! But now few, large, and bright
The stars are round the crescent moon!
And now it is a dark warm night, 15
The balmiest of the month of June!
A glow-worm fallen, and on the marge remounting
Shines, and its shadow⁶ shines, fit stars for our sweet fountain.

Oh ever, ever be thou blessed!
For dearly, Asra, love I thee! 20
This brooding warmth across my breast,⁷
This depth of tranquil bliss – ah me!
Fount, tree and shed are gone, I know not whither,

But in one quiet room we three are still together.

The shadows dance upon the wall 25
By the still dancing fire-flames made;
And now they slumber, moveless all,
And now they melt to one deep shade!
But not from me shall this mild darkness steal thee;
I dream thee with mine eyes, and at my heart I feel thee. 30

Thine eyelash on my cheek doth play –
'Tis Mary's hand upon my brow!⁸
But let me check this tender lay
Which none may hear but she and thou!
Like the still hive at quiet midnight humming, 35
Murmur it to yourselves, ye two beloved women!

A Day-Dream

¹ The date of composition remains conjectural, but Coleridge himself says that it was written in June (l. 16), and 1802 is a likely year because this poem appears to be closely related to 'A Letter to Sara Hutchinson' and recalls an incident that occurred during Coleridge's visit to Gallow Hill, 2–13 March 1802.

² hut cottage.

³ thee Sara Hutchinson (1775–1835), Coleridge's 'Asra', was Wordsworth's sister-in-law. Coleridge's unconsummated love for her lasted until his break with Wordsworth led him to reside in London.

⁴ Mary Hutchinson (1770–1859), who married Wordsworth on 4 October 1802.

⁵ Our sister and our friend Dorothy and William Wordsworth.

⁶ shadow reflection (in the fountain).

⁷ This brooding warmth...breast Sara has become the ‘the conjugal and mother dove’ of ‘A Letter to Sara Hutchinson’ 327–9.

⁸ Thine eyelash...brow Cf. ‘A Letter to Sara Hutchinson’ 104–7.

Dejection: An Ode (composed c.July 1802)¹

From Sibylline Leaves (1817)

*Late, late yestreen I saw the new moon
With the old moon in her arms;
And I fear, I fear, my master dear,
We shall have a deadly storm.*

(Ballad of Sir Patrick Spence)²

I

Well! if the bard was weather-wise who made
The grand old ballad of Sir Patrick Spence,³
This night, so tranquil now, will not go hence
Unroused by winds that ply a busier trade
Than those which mould yon clouds in lazy flakes, 5
Or the dull sobbing draught that moans and rakes
Upon the strings of this Eolian lute,⁴
Which better far were mute.
For lo! the new moon, winter-bright,
And overspread with phantom light 10
(With swimming phantom light o’erspread,
But rimmed and circled by a silver thread);
I see the old moon in her lap, foretelling

The coming-on of rain and squally blast.
And oh, that even now the gust were swelling, 15
 And the slant night-shower driving loud and fast.
Those sounds which oft have raised me whilst they awed
 And sent my soul abroad,
Might now perhaps their wonted⁵ impulse give,
Might startle this dull pain, and make it move and live! 20

II

A grief without a pang – void, dark, and drear;
 A stifled, drowsy, unimpassioned grief
 Which finds no natural outlet, no relief
 In word, or sigh, or tear –
Oh Lady!⁶ in this wan and heartless mood, 25
To other thoughts by yonder throstle wooed
 All this long eve so balmy and serene,
Have I been gazing on the western sky
 And its peculiar tint of yellow-green;
And still I gaze, and with how blank an eye! 30
And those thin clouds above, in flakes and bars,
That give away their motion to the stars,
Those stars that glide behind them or between,
Now sparkling, now bedimmed, but always seen;
Yon crescent moon, as fixed as if it grew 35
In its own cloudless, starless lake of blue –
I see them all, so excellently fair;
I see, not feel, how beautiful they are!

III

My genial spirits fail,⁷
And what can these avail 40
To lift the smoth'ring weight from off my breast?
 It were a vain endeavour,

Though I should gaze for ever
On that green light that lingers in the west:
I may not hope from outward forms to win 45
The passion and the life, whose fountains are within!

IV

Oh Lady, we receive but what we give,
And in our life alone does nature live;
Ours is her wedding-garment, ours her shroud!
And would we aught behold of higher worth 50
Than that inanimate cold world allowed
To the poor loveless ever-anxious crowd –
Ah! from the soul itself must issue forth
A light, a glory,⁸ a fair luminous cloud
Enveloping the earth! 55
And from the soul itself must there be sent
A sweet and potent voice, of its own birth,
Of all sweet sounds the life and element.

V

Oh pure of heart!⁹ thou need'st not ask of me
What this strong music in the soul may be, 60
What and wherein it doth exist,
This light, this glory, this fair luminous mist,
This beautiful and beauty-making power!
Joy, virtuous Lady! Joy that ne'er was given
Save to the pure and in their purest hour, 65
Life, and life's effluence,¹⁰ cloud at once and shower,
Joy, Lady, is the spirit and the power
Which, wedding nature to us, gives in dower¹¹
A new earth and new heaven
Undreamt of by the sensual and the proud! 70
Joy is the sweet voice, joy the luminous cloud –

We in ourselves rejoice!
And thence flows all that charms or ear or sight,
All melodies the echoes of that voice,
All colours a suffusion from that light. 75

VI

There was a time^{I2} when, though my path was rough,
This joy within me dallied with distress,
And all misfortunes were but as the stuff
Whence fancy made me dreams of happiness;
For hope grew round me like the twining vine, 80
And fruits and foliage not my own, seemed mine!
But now afflictions bow me down to earth,
Nor care I that they rob me of my mirth;
But oh! each visitation
Suspends what nature gave me at my birth – 85
My shaping spirit of imagination!
For not to think of what I needs must feel,
But to be still and patient all I can,
And haply by abstruse research to steal
From my own nature all the natural man – 90
This was my sole resource, my only plan;
Till that which suits a part infects the whole,
And now is almost grown the habit of my soul.

VII

Hence, viper thoughts, that coil around my mind,
Reality's dark dream! 95
I turn from you, and listen to the wind,
Which long has raved unnoticed. What a scream
Of agony, by torture lengthened out,
That lute sent forth! Thou wind, that rav'st without!
Bare crag, or mountain tairn,^{I3} or blasted tree, 100

Or pine-grove whither woodman never clomb,¹⁴
 Or lonely house long held the witches' home,
 Methinks were fitter instruments for thee,
 Mad lutanist, who in this month of show'rs,
 Of dark-brown gardens and of peeping flow'rs, 105
 Mak'st devil's yule,¹⁵ with worse than wintry song,
 The blossoms, buds, and tim'rous leaves among!
 Thou actor, perfect in all tragic sounds,
 Thou mighty poet,¹⁶ e'en to frenzy bold,
 What tell'st thou now about? 110
 'Tis of the rushing of an host¹⁷ in rout,
 With groans of trampled men with smarting wounds¹⁸ –
 At once they groan with pain, and shudder with the cold!
 But hush, there is a pause of deepest silence!
 And all that noise, as of a rushing crowd, 115
 With groans and tremulous shudderings – all is over.
 It tells another tale, with sounds less deep and loud,
 A tale of less affright
 And tempered with delight,
 As Otway's¹⁹ self had framed the tender lay – 120
 'Tis of a little child
 Upon a lonesome wild
 Not far from home, but she hath lost her way,
 And now moans low in bitter grief and fear,
 And now screams loud, and hopes to make her mother hear. 125

VIII

'Tis midnight, but small thoughts have I of sleep;
 Full seldom may my friend such vigils keep!
 Visit her, gentle sleep, with wings of healing,
 And may this storm be but a mountain birth;
 May all the stars hang bright above his dwelling, 130
 Silent, as though they watched the sleeping earth!

With light heart may she rise,
Gay fancy, cheerful eyes,
Joy lift her spirit, joy attune her voice:
To her may all things live, from pole to pole, 135
Their life the eddy of her living soul!
Oh simple spirit, guided from above;
Dear Lady, friend devoutest²⁰ of my choice,
Thus may'st thou ever, evermore rejoice.

Dejection: An Ode

¹ Coleridge first published this poem in the Morning Post, 4 October 1802, as a sort of gift to Wordsworth, whose wedding-day it was (as well as being the seventh anniversary of Coleridge's own unhappy marriage). In that version he addressed it to 'Edmund'; in this text the addressee is a 'Lady'.

² Coleridge knew The Ballad of Sir Patrick Spence from Thomas Percy's Reliques of Ancient English Poetry (1765).

³ the bard...Spence unknown; the ballad is anonymous.

⁴ Eolian lute Aeolian harps were placed lengthways in front of open windows, where their strings were 'played' by the wind; see Coleridge's The Eolian Harp, pp. 620–5.

⁵ wonted expected, usual.

⁶ Lady Coleridge once again has in mind the original addressee of this work, Sara Hutchinson.

⁷ My genial spirits fail An echo of Milton, 'Samson Agonistes' 594: 'my genial spirits droop.'

⁸ glory divine effulgence of light, as at Wordsworth, 'Ode' 18.

9 Oh pure of heart the addressee of the poem, in this case, ‘Lady’.

10 effluence emanation, radiating energies.

11 dower wedding-gift.

12 There was a time echoes Wordsworth, ‘Ode’ 1. In the ‘Letter to Sara Hutchinson’, this was the time ‘Ere I was wedded’ (l. 231).

13 ‘Tairn is a small lake, generally if not always applied to the lakes up in the mountains, and which are the feeders of those in the valleys. This address to the storm-wind will not appear extravagant to those who have heard it at night, and in a mountainous country’ (Coleridge’s note).

14 clomb climbed.

15 yule festival; yule was the pagan festival that became Christmas. This is the devil’s yule because it is April rather than December.

16 Thou mighty poet i.e. the wind of line 93.

17 host army.

18 an host...wounds, In 1815, Britain’s long war with France (which had begun in 1793) had come to an end.

19 This reference to Thomas Otway (1652–85), who, according to Johnson, died in penury after wandering across a heath in a state of near-nakedness, further veils the reference to Wordsworth, whose ‘Lucy Gray’ tells the story of a lost child. Coleridge would have been aware of Charlotte Smith’s interest in Otway.

20 devoutest most devoted, most attached.

Chamouny; the Hour Before Sunrise. A Hymn (composed not before 26 August 1802)¹

From The Morning Post No.10,589 (11 September 1802)

Chamouny is one of the highest mountain valleys of the Barony of Faucigny in the Savoy Alps, and exhibits a kind of fairy world in which the wildest appearances (I had almost said horrors) of nature alternate with the softest and most beautiful. The chain of Mont Blanc is its boundary, and, besides the Arvé, it is filled with sounds from the Arveiron, which rushes from the melted glaciers like a giant mad with joy from a dungeon, and forms other torrents of snow-water, having their rise in the glaciers which slope down into the valley. The beautiful gentiana major, or greater gentian, with blossoms of the brightest blue, grows in large companies a few steps from the never-melted ice of the glaciers. I thought it an affecting emblem of the boldness of human hope, venturing near, and, as it were, leaning over, the brink of the grave. Indeed, the whole vale, its every light, its every sound, must needs impress every mind not utterly callous with the thought, Who would be, who could be an atheist in this valley of wonders? If any readers of The Morning Post have visited this vale in their journeys among the Alps, I am confident that they will not find the sentiments and feelings expressed, or attempted to be expressed, in the following poem, extravagant.

Hast thou a charm to stay² the morning star
In his steep course? So long he seems to pause
On thy bald awful head, oh Chamouny!
The Arvé and Arveiron at thy base
Rave ceaselessly; but thou, dread mountain form, 5
Risest from forth thy silent sea of pines
How silently! Around thee and above,

Deep is the sky, and black – transpicuous,³ deep,
An ebon mass. Methinks thou piercest it
As with a wedge! But when I look again, 10
It seems thy own calm home, thy crystal shrine,
Thy habitation from eternity.
Oh dread and silent form! I gazed upon thee
Till thou, still present to my bodily eye,
Didst vanish from my thought. Entranced in pray'r, 15
I worshipped the Invisible alone.
Yet thou, meantime, wast working on my soul,
E'en like some deep enchanting melody,
So sweet, we know not we are list'ning to it.
But I awake, and with a busier mind 20
And active will self-conscious, offer now,
Not, as before, involuntary pray'r
And passive adoration.

Hand and voice,
Awake, awake! And thou, my heart, awake!
Awake, ye rocks! Ye forest pines, awake! 25
Green fields and icy cliffs, all join my hymn!
And thou, oh silent mountain, sole and bare,
Oh blacker than the darkness, all the night,
And visited all night by troops of stars,
Or when they climb the sky, or when they sink; 30
Companion of the morning star at dawn,
Thyself earth's rosy star, and of the dawn
Co-herald! Wake, oh wake, and utter praise!
Who sank thy sunless pillars deep in earth?
Who filled thy countenance with rosy light? 35
Who made thee father of perpetual streams?
And you, ye five wild torrents, fiercely glad,
Who called you forth from night and utter death,
From darkness let you loose, and icy dens,
Down those precipitous, black, jagged rocks 40
For ever shattered, and the same for ever?

Who gave you your invulnerable life,
Your strength, your speed, your fury, and your joy,
Unceasing thunder, and eternal foam?
And who commanded (and the silence came), 45
‘Here shall the billows stiffen, and have rest’?
Ye ice-falls! Ye that from yon dizzy heights
Adown enormous ravines steeply slope –
Torrents, methinks, that heard a mighty voice,
And stopped at once amid their maddest plunge! 50
Motionless torrents! Silent cataracts!
Who made you glorious as the gates of heav’n
Beneath the keen full moon? Who bade the sun
Clothe you with rainbows? Who with lovely flow’rs
Of living blue spread garlands at your feet? 55
‘God, God!’⁴ the torrents, like a shout of nations,
Utter. The ice-plain bursts, and answers ‘God!’
‘God!’ sing the meadow-streams with gladsome voice,
And pine-groves, with their soft and soul-like sound!
The silent snow-mass, loos’ning, thunders ‘God!’ 60
Ye dreadless flow’rs that fringe th’ eternal frost!
Ye wild goats bounding by the eagle’s nest!
Ye eagles, playmates of the mountain blast!
Ye lightnings, the dread arrows of the clouds!
Ye signs and wonders of the element 65
Utter forth ‘God!’ and fill the hills with praise!
And thou, oh silent form, alone and bare,
Whom, as I lift again my head bowed low
In adoration, I again behold,
And to thy summit upward from thy base 70
Sweep slowly with dim eyes suffused⁵ by tears,
Awake, thou mountain form! Rise like a cloud!
Rise like a cloud of incense from the earth!
Thou kingly spirit throned among the hills,
Thou dread ambassador from earth to heav’n – 75
Great hierarch,⁶ tell thou the silent sky,

And tell the stars, and tell the rising sun,
Earth with her thousand voices calls on God!

Chamouny; the Hour Before Sunrise. A Hymn

1 On 10 September 1802 Coleridge told William Sotheby that he composed this poem ‘when I was on Scafell. I involuntarily poured forth a hymn in the manner of the Psalms, though afterwards I thought the ideas etc. disproportionate to our humble mountains, and, accidentally lighting on a short note in some Swiss poems concerning the Vale of Chamouni and its mountains, I transferred myself thither, in the spirit, and adapted my former feelings to these grander external objects’ (Griggs ii 864–5). However, Griggs notes that the poem could not have been composed until after 26 August 1802 – three weeks after Coleridge’s Scafell ascent. He had certainly not seen Chamouni (now spelled Chamonix) when this poem was written; the main literary inspiration was Frederika Brun’s ‘Chamouny beym Sonnenaufgange’. Coleridge’s poem is often contrasted with the religious scepticism of Shelley’s poem about the same locale, Mont Blanc (pp. 1104–7).

2 stay stop.

3 transpicuous transparent, as at Paradise Lost viii 141.

4 God, God! While climbing in the Lake District Coleridge seems to have been in the habit of shouting ‘Dodd!’ so as to hear the echo, as Charles Lamb pointed out: ‘I have heard your own lips teaching your Cumbrian mountains to resound, Tod, Tod, meaning the unlucky doctor’ (Marrs ii 74–5). Dr William Dodd was a forger hanged at Tyburn in 1777.

5 suffused overspread.

6 hierarch priest.

Letter from S. T. Coleridge to Robert Southey, 11 September 1803 (extract) (including early version of The Pains of Sleep)¹

I have been on a wild journey – taken up for a spy and clapped into Fort Augustus – and I am afraid they may have frightened poor Sara by sending her off a scrap of a letter I was writing to her.² I have walked 263 miles in eight days, so I must have strength somewhere, but my spirits are dreadful, owing entirely to the horrors of every night. I truly dread to sleep; it is no shadow with me, but substantial misery foot-thick that makes me sit by my bedside of a morning and cry. I have abandoned all opiates except ether be one, and that only in fits – and that is a blessed medicine! and when you see me drink a glass of spirit and water, except by prescription of a physician, you shall despise me – but I still cannot get quiet rest –

When on my bed my limbs I lay,
It hath not been my use to pray
With moving lips or bended knees;
But silently, by slow degrees,
My spirit I to love compose, 5
In humble trust my eyelids close
With reverential resignation;
No wish conceived, no thought expressed!
Only a sense of supplication,
A sense o'er all my soul impressed 10
That I am weak, yet not unblessed –
Since round me, in me, everywhere,
Eternal strength and goodness are!

But yesternight I prayed aloud
In anguish and in agony, 15
Awaking from the fiendish crowd
Of shapes and thoughts that tortured me!

Desire with loathing strangely mixed,
On wild or hateful objects fixed:
Pangs of revenge, the powerless will, 20
Still baffled, and consuming still,
Sense of intolerable wrong,
And men whom I despised made strong
Vainglorious threats, unmanly vaunting,
Bad men my boasts and fury taunting – 25
Rage, sensual passion, mad'ning brawl,
And shame and terror over all!
Deeds to be hid that were not hid,

Letter from S. T. Coleridge to Robert

¹ The letter in which Coleridge enshrined this early version of The Pains of Sleep, and the early readings themselves, make the poem more powerful than the version published in 1816 with Christabel and Kubla Khan. Coleridge had embarked on 15 August 1803 on a tour of Scotland with the Wordsworths. Badly depressed, partly thanks to his unfulfilled love for Sara Hutchinson, partly to his opium addiction, he accompanied them as far as Loch Lomond, but departed from them at Arrochar. Attempting to withdraw from opium, he embarked on a marathon walk, covering 263 miles in eight days before reaching Perth on 11 September.

² Probably Sara Hutchinson, with whom Coleridge was hopelessly in love. In August 1803, shortly after setting off on the Scottish tour, he had confided to his notebook: ‘Oh Asra, wherever I am, and am impressed, my heart aches for you’ (Notebooks i 1451).

The Pains of Sleep

From Christabel; Kubla Khan: A Vision; The Pains of Sleep (1816)

Ere on my bed my limbs I lay,
It hath not been my use to pray
With moving lips or bended knees;
But silently, by slow degrees,
My spirit I to love compose, 5
In humble trust mine eyelids close
With reverential resignation;
No wish conceived, no thought expressed!
Only a sense of supplication,
A sense o'er all my soul impressed 10
That I am weak, yet not unblessed –
Since in me, round me, everywhere,
Eternal strength and wisdom are.

But yesternight I prayed aloud
In anguish and in agony, 15
Upstarting from the fiendish crowd
Of shapes and thoughts that tortured me;
A lurid light, a trampling throng,
Sense of intolerable wrong,
And whom I scorned, those only strong! 20
Thirst of revenge, the powerless will Still baffled, and yet burning still!
Desire with loathing strangely mixed,
On wild or hateful objects fixed.
Fantastic passions! Mad'ning brawl! 25
And shame and terror over all!
Deeds to be hid which were not hid,
Which all confused I might not know,
Whether I suffered or I did – 30
For all was horror, guilt and woe,
My own or others, still the same
Life-stifling fear, soul-stifling shame!

Thus two nights passed: the night's dismay
Saddened and stunned the boding day. 35

I feared to sleep – sleep seemed to be
Disease's worst malignity.
The third night when my own loud scream
Had freed me from the fiendish dream,
O'ercome with sufferings dark and wild, 40
I wept as I had been a child –
And having thus by tears subdued
My trouble to a milder mood,
Such punishments, I thought, were due
To natures deepliest stained with sin: 45
Still to be stirring up anew
The self-created hell within,
The horror of their crimes to view,
To know and loathe, yet wish and do!
With such let fiends make mockery – 50
But I – oh wherefore this on me?
Frail is my soul, yea, strengthless wholly,
Unequal, restless, melancholy,
But free from hate and sensual folly!
To live beloved is all I need, 55
And whom I love, I love indeed.
Which all confused I could not know,
Whether I suffered or I did –
For all seemed guilt, remorse or woe, 30
My own or others, still the same
Life-stifling fear, soul-stifling shame!

So two nights passed: the night's dismay
Saddened and stunned the coming day.
Sleep, the wide blessing, seemed to me 35
Distemper's worst calamity.
The third night when my own loud scream
Had waked me from the fiendish dream,
O'ercome with sufferings strange and wild,
I wept as I had been a child – 40
And having thus by tears subdued

My anguish to a milder mood,
Such punishments, I said, were due
To natures deepliest stained with sin:
For aye entempesting anew 45
Th' unfathomable hell within,
The horror of their deeds to view,
To know and loathe, yet wish and do!
Such griefs with such men well agree,
But wherefore, wherefore fall on me? 50
To be beloved is all I need,
And whom I love, I love indeed.

Epigram on Spots in the Sun, from Wernicke¹

From The Morning Post No.10,614 (11 October 1802)

My father confessor is strict and holy,
'Mi fili', still he cries, 'peccare noli.'²
And yet how oft I find the pious man
At Annette's door, the lovely courtesan!³
Her soul's deformity the good man wins, 5
And not her charms – he comes to hear her sins!
Good father, I would fain not do thee wrong,
But ah! I fear that they who oft and long
Stand gazing at the sun, to count each spot,
Must sometimes find the sun itself too hot. 10

Epigram on Spots in the Sun

¹ Like Wordsworth's 'A Complaint', this poem arose out of the strains that had crept into Coleridge's relationship with Wordsworth. Christian Wernicke (1661–1725) was a German poet famous for satirical epigrams.

² Mi...noli 'sin not, my son.'

³ At Annette's door, the lovely courtesan Hardly diplomatic in view of Wordsworth's marriage just days before. Coleridge was aware of Wordsworth's abandonment of Annette Vallon and their child, Caroline, in 1792, and of his visit to Calais to see them in August 1802 (see 'It is a beauteous evening, calm and free', pp. 547–8).

Letter from S. T. Coleridge to Thomas Poole, 14 October 1803 (extract)¹

Wordsworth is in good health, and all his family. He has one LARGE boy, christened John. He has made a beginning to his Recluse.² He was here on Sunday last. His wife's sister, who is on a visit at Grasmere, was in a bad hysterical way, and he rode in to consult our excellent medical men.³ I now see very little of Wordsworth. My own health makes it inconvenient and unfit for me to go thither one third as often, as I used to do – and Wordsworth's indolence, etc., keeps him at home. Indeed, were I an irritable man (and an unthinking one), I should probably have considered myself as having been very unkindly used by him in this respect, for I was at one time confined for two months, and he never came in to see me – me, who had ever paid such unremitting attentions to him!

Letter from S. T. Coleridge to Thomas Poole

¹ This letter, written from Greta Hall, Keswick, where Coleridge's family were now living with Southey, indicates something of the strain that had crept into the relationship with Wordsworth.

² The Recluse was the epic poem planned in 1798, which Coleridge and Wordsworth believed, would help precipitate the millennium (Christ's thousand-year rule on earth predicted in the Bible, as in Revelation 20:6). Coleridge was becoming increasingly impatient at Wordsworth's failure to get on with it.

⁴ 'I find it written of Simonides', composed by 7 October 1803, published in the Morning Post, 10 October 1803. Coleridge may also have in mind some of the poems which were to appear in Poems in Two Volumes (1807).

But we must take the good and the ill together – and by seriously and habitually reflecting on our own faults and endeavouring to amend them, we shall then find little difficulty in confining our attention (as far as it acts on our friends' characters) to their good qualities. Indeed, I owe it to truth and justice, as well as to myself, to say that the concern which I have felt in this instance (and one or two other more crying instances) of self-involution in Wordsworth, has been almost wholly a feeling of friendly regret and disinterested apprehension. I saw him more and more benetted in hypochondriacal fancies, living wholly among devotees, having every the minutest thing, almost his very eating and drinking, done for him by his sister or wife – and I trembled lest a film should rise and thicken on his moral eye.

The habit too of writing such a multitude of small poems was in this instance hurtful to him – such things as that sonnet of his in Monday's Morning Post about Simonides and the ghost.⁴ I rejoice, therefore, with a deep and true joy, that he has at length yielded to my urgent and repeated (almost unremitting) requests and remonstrances, and will go on with The Recluse exclusively – a great work in which he will sail on an open ocean and a steady wind, unfretted by short tacks, reefing and hauling and disentangling the ropes; great work necessarily comprehending his attention and feelings within the circle of great objects and elevated conceptions. This is his natural element. The having been out of it has been his disease; to return into it is the specific remedy – both remedy and health. It is what food is to famine.

I have seen enough positively to give me feelings of hostility towards the plan of several of the poems in the Lyrical Ballads, and I really consider it as a misfortune that Wordsworth ever deserted his former mountain-track to wander in lanes and alleys – though in the event it may prove to have been a great benefit to him. He will steer, I trust, the middle course.

Letter from S. T. Coleridge to Richard Sharp, 15 January 1804 (extract)¹

Wordsworth is a poet, a most original poet. He no more resembles Milton than Milton resembles Shakespeare – no more resembles Shakespeare than Shakespeare resembles Milton: he is himself. And I dare affirm that he will hereafter be admitted as the first and greatest philosophical poet – the only man who has effected a complete and constant synthesis of thought and feeling, and combined them with poetic forms, with the music of pleasurable passion and with imagination, or the modifying power in that highest sense of the word in which I have ventured to oppose it to fancy, or the aggregating power (in that sense in which it is a dim analogue of creation – not all that we can believe but all that we can conceive of creation). Wordsworth is a poet, and I feel myself a better poet, in knowing how to honour him, than in all my own poetic compositions – all I have done or hope to do. And I prophesy immortality to his Recluse, as the first and finest philosophical poem, if only it be (as it undoubtedly will be) a faithful transcript of his own most august and innocent life, of his own habitual feelings and modes of seeing and hearing.

Letter from S. T. Coleridge to Richard Sharp

1 The euphoric tone of this letter may owe something to Coleridge's opium addiction, as well as to the fact that in the week preceding Wordsworth had read The Two-Part Prelude to him, and they had agreed that it would comprise part of 'The Recluse'. Wordsworth had promised Coleridge that he would begin serious work on 'The Recluse' immediately, and in return Coleridge had promised to send him his 'notes' on its contents. Unfortunately those 'notes' never arrived in Grasmere (and it may be doubted whether they ever existed). However, Coleridge's approval of The Prelude initiated a lengthy period of composition that would conclude just over a year later with completion of The Thirteen-Book Prelude.

2 This poem is one of the earliest literary responses to Wordsworth's great poem. Wordsworth, Dorothy, Mary, Coleridge, Hartley and Sara Hutchinson, all spent the Christmas of 1806 at Coleorton, the country seat of Sir George Beaumont, and in the New Year, 7 January 1807, Wordsworth read them the Thirteen-Book Prelude in its entirety. It remained unpublished until 1850.

3 awful i.e. full of awe.

4 Hyblaeen honeyed; Hybla was a Sicilian town near Syracuse, known for honey and herbs.

5 of the hope...aglow a reference to Books IX and X of The Prelude, in which Wordsworth describes his residence in France, 1791–2.

6 and hope aloft...Floating a reference to the Reign of Terror, which led radicals in England to lose hope in the French Revolution.

7 In the MS Coleridge writes: 'Impelling? Directing?'

8 Orphic oracular; communicated by God.

9 ken gaze.

I0 Shed influence Coleridge is thinking of Milton's description of the Pleiades 'shedding sweet influence' (Paradise Lost vii 375).

I1 troublous confusing (because Coleridge had lost hope in himself).

I2 Mid strangers...wounds cf. the 'Letter to Sara Hutchinson', where Coleridge compares the sound of the wind to 'many groans from men with smarting wounds' (l. 202).

I3 benumbed my soul as at 'Letter to Sara Hutchinson' 39: 'I see, not feel, how beautiful they are!'

I4 but i.e. [nothing] but.

I5 that hour...mind a reference to the annus mirabilis of 1797–8.

I6 pity or grief i.e. felt for Coleridge in his present, miserable state.

I7 halcyon kingfisher which, according to classical legend, brought the seas and winds to a calm when it bred in a nest which floated on the ocean.

I8 Eve following eve the evenings when Wordsworth recited The Thirteen-Book Prelude to Coleridge at Coleorton.

I9 thy various strain 'varied in tone and subject matter' i.e. The Prelude.

To William Wordsworth. Lines composed, for the greater part, on the night on which he finished the recitation of his poem in Thirteen Books, concerning the growth

and history of his own mind, January
1807, Coleorton, near Ashby-de-la-Zouch
(composed January 1807; first published 1817; edited from MS)²

Oh friend! Oh teacher! God's great gift to me!
Into my heart have I received that lay
More than historic, that prophetic lay
Wherein (high theme by thee first sung aright)
Of the foundations and the building-up 5
Of thy own spirit, thou hast loved to tell
What may be told, to th' understanding mind
Revealable; and what within the mind
May rise enkindled. Theme as hard as high!
Of smiles spontaneous, and mysterious fear 10
(The first-born they of reason, and twin-birth);
Of tides obedient to external force,
And currents self-determined, as might seem,
Or by interior power; of moments awful,³
Now in thy hidden life, and now abroad, 15
Mid festive crowds, thy brows too garlanded,
A brother of the feast; of fancies fair,
Hyblaeon⁴ murmurs of poetic thought,
Industrious in its joy, by liliated streams
Native or outland, lakes and famous hills! 20
Of more than fancy – of the hope of man
Amid the tremor of a realm aglow, ⁵
Where France in all her towns lay vibrating,
Ev'n as a bark becalmed on sultry seas
Beneath the voice from heaven, the bursting crash 25
Of heaven's immediate thunder, when no cloud
Is visible, or shadow on the main!

Ah, soon night rolled on night, and every cloud
Opened its eye of fire; and hope aloft
Now fluttered, and now tossed upon the storm 30
Floating!⁶ Of hope afflicted, and struck down,
Thence summoned homeward – homeward to thy heart,
Oft from the watchtower of man's absolute self,
With light unwaning on her eyes, to look
Far on – herself a glory to behold, 35
The angel of the vision! Then (last strain!)
Of duty, chosen laws controlling⁷ choice,
Virtue and love! An Orphic⁸ tale indeed,
A tale divine of high and passionate thoughts
To their own music chaunted!

Ah great bard! 40
Ere yet that last swell dying awed the air,
With steadfast ken⁹ I viewed thee in the choir
Of ever-enduring men. The truly great
Have all one age, and from one visible space
Shed influence;¹⁰ for they, both power and act, 45
Are permanent, and time is now with them,
Save as it worketh for them, they in it.
Nor less a sacred roll, than those of old,
And to be placed, as they, with gradual fame
Among the archives of mankind, thy work 50
Makes audible a linked song of truth,
Of truth profound a sweet continuous song
Not learnt but native, her own natural notes!
Dear shall it be to every human heart,
To me how more than dearest! Me, on whom 55
Comfort from thee and utterance of thy love
Came with such heights and depths of harmony,
Such sense of wings uplifting, that the storm
Scattered and whirled me, till my thoughts became
A bodily tumult! And thy faithful hopes, 60

Thy hopes of me, dear friend, by me unfelt
Were troublous^{I1} to me, almost as a voice
Familiar once and more than musical
To one cast forth, whose hope had seemed to die,
A wanderer with a worn-out heart, 65
Mid strangers pining with untended wounds!^{I2}
 Oh friend, too well thou know'st, of what sad years
The long suppression had benumbed my soul,^{I3}
That even as life returns upon the drowned,
Th' unusual joy awoke a throng of pains – 70
Keen pangs of love, awakening, as a babe,
Turbulent, with an outcry in the heart;
And fears self-willed, that shunned the eye of hope,
And hope, that would not know itself from fear;
Sense of passed youth, and manhood come in vain; 75
And genius given, and knowledge won in vain;
And all which I had culled in wood-walks wild,
And all which patient toil had reared, and all
Commune with thee had opened out, but^{I4} flowers
Strewed on my corse, and borne upon my bier, 80
In the same coffin, for the self-same grave!
 That way no more! And ill beseems it me,
Who came a welcomer in herald's guise,
Singing of glory and futurity,
To wander back on such unhealthful road 85
Plucking the poisons of self-harm! And ill
Such intertwine beseems triumphal wreaths
Strewed before thy advancing! Thou too, friend!
Oh injure not the memory of that hour
Of thy communion with my nobler mind^{I5} 90
By pity or grief,^{I6} already felt too long!
Nor let my words import more blame than needs.
The tumult rose and ceased; for peace is nigh
Where Wisdom's voice has found a list'ning heart.

Amid the howl of more than wintry storms 95
The halcyon¹⁷ hears the voice of vernal hours,
Already on the wing!

 Eve following eve,¹⁸
Dear tranquil time, when the sweet sense of home
Becomes most sweet! Hours for their own sake hailed,
And more desired, more precious, for thy song! 100
In silence list'ning, like a devout child,
My soul lay passive, by thy various strain¹⁹
Driven as in surges now, beneath the stars,
With momentary stars of my own birth,
Fair constellated foam still darting off 105
Into the darkness! – now a tranquil sea
Outspread and bright, yet swelling to the moon!
 And when, oh friend, my comforter, my guide,
Strong in thyself and powerful to give strength,
Thy long-sustained lay finally closed, 110
And thy deep voice had ceased (yet thou thyself
Wert still before mine eyes, and round us both
That happy vision of beloved faces,
All whom I deepliest love, in one room all!),
Scarce conscious and yet conscious of its close, 115
I sat, my being blended in one thought
(Thought was it? Or aspiration? Or resolve?)
Absorbed, yet hanging still upon the sound:
And when I rose, I found myself in prayer!

Letter from S. T. Coleridge to William Wordsworth, 30 May 1815 (extract)¹

What did my criticism amount to, reduced to its full and naked sense?
This: that, comparatively with the former poem, The Excursion, as far as it was new to me, had disappointed my expectations; that the excellences

were so many and of so high a class, that it was impossible to attribute the inferiority (if any such really existed) to any flagging of the writer's own genius; and that I conjectured that it might have been occasioned by the influence of self-established convictions having given to certain thoughts and expressions a depth and force which they had not for readers in general. In order, therefore, to explain the disappointment, I must recall to your mind what my expectations were; and as these again were founded on the supposition that (in whatever order it might be published) the poem on the growth of your own mind² was as the ground-plot³ and the roots out of which The Recluse was to have sprung up as the tree. As far as the same sap in both, I expected them doubtless to have formed one complete whole, but in matter, form, and product to be different, each not only a distinct but a different work. In the first I had found 'themes by thee first sung aright'⁴:

Of smiles spontaneous, and mysterious fears
(The first-born they of reason, and twin-birth);
Of tides obedient to external force,
And currents self-determined, as might seem,
Or by some central breath; of moments awful,
Now in thy inner life, and now abroad,
When power streamed from thee, and thy soul received
The light reflected as a light bestowed!
Of fancies fair, and milder hours of youth,
Hyblaeon⁵ murmurs of poetic thought,
Industrious in its joy, in vales and glens
Native or outland, lakes and famous hills!
Or on the lonely high-road, when the stars
Were rising, or by secret mountain streams,
The guides and the companions of thy way;
Of more than fancy – of the social sense
Distending wide, and man beloved as man,
Where France in all her towns lay vibrating,
Ev'n as a bark becalmed beneath the burst
Of heaven's immediate thunder, when no cloud

Is visible, or shadow on the main!
 For thou wert there,⁶ thy own brows garlanded
 Amid the tremor of a realm aglow,
 Amid a mighty nation jubilant,
 When from the general heart of humankind
 Hope sprang forth, like a full-born deity!
 Of that dear hope afflicted, and amazed,
 So homeward summoned! Thenceforth calm and sure
 From the dread watchtower of man's absolute self,
 With light unwaning on her eyes, to look
 Far on – herself a glory⁷ to behold,
 The angel of the vision! Then (last strain!)
 Of duty! Chosen laws controlling choice!
 Action and joy! – AN ORPHIC⁸ SONG INDEED,
 A SONG DIVINE OF HIGH AND PASSIONATE TRUTHS
 TO THEIR OWN MUSIC CHAUNTED!

Indeed through the whole of that poem
*Ἀῦρα τις εἰσεπνέυσε μυστικῶτάτη.*⁹ This I considered as The Excursion, and the second as The Recluse I had (from what I had at different times gathered from your conversation on the plan) anticipated as commencing with you set down and settled in an abiding home, and that with the description of that home you were to begin a Philosophical Poem, the result and fruits of a spirit so framed and so disciplined, as had been told in the former.

Whatever in Lucretius¹⁰ is poetry is not philosophical; whatever is philosophical is not poetry – and in the very pride of confident hope I looked forward to The Recluse as the first and only true philosophical poem in existence. Of course, I expected the colours, music, imaginative life, and passion of poetry, but the matter and arrangement of philosophy – not doubting from the advantages of the subject that the totality of a system was not only capable of being harmonized with, but even calculated to aid, the unity (beginning, middle, and end) of a poem. Thus, whatever the length of the work might be, still it was a determinate length.

Of the subjects announced each would have its own appointed place and, excluding repetitions, each would relieve and rise in interest above the other. I supposed you first to have meditated the faculties of man in the abstract; in their correspondence with his sphere of action – and first, in the feeling, touch, and taste, then in the eye, and last in the ear; to have laid a solid and immovable foundation for the edifice by removing the sandy sophisms¹¹ of Locke and the mechanic dogmatists;¹² and demonstrating that the senses were living growths and developments of the mind and spirit in a much juster as well as higher sense than the mind can be said to be formed by the senses. Next I understood that you would take the human race in the concrete, have exploded the absurd notion of Pope's Essay on Man,¹³ Darwin,¹⁴ and all the countless believers (even, strange to say, among Christians) of man's having progressed from an orang-utan state – so contrary to all history, to all religion, nay, to all possibility; to have affirmed a fall, in some sense, as a fact the possibility of which cannot be understood from the nature of the will, but the reality of which is attested by experience and conscience; fallen men contemplated in the different ages of the world, and in the different states – savage – barbarous – civilized – the lonely cot or borderer's wigwam – the village – the manufacturing town – sea-port – city – universities – and, not disguising the sore evils under which the whole creation groans, to point out, however, a manifest scheme of redemption from this slavery, of reconciliation from this enmity with nature (What are the obstacles? The Antichrist that must be and already is); and to conclude by a grand didactic swell on the necessary identity of a true philosophy with true religion, agreeing in the results and differing only as the analytic and synthetic process, as discursive from intuitive,¹⁵ the former chiefly useful as perfecting the latter.

In short, the necessity of a general revolution in the modes of developing and disciplining the human mind by the substitution of life and intelligence (considered in its different powers, from the plant up to that state in which the difference of degree becomes a new kind – man, self-consciousness – but yet not by essential opposition), for the philosophy of mechanism which in everything that is needworthy of the human intellect strikes death, and cheats itself by mistaking clear images for distinct conceptions, and which idly demands conceptions where intuitions alone are possible or adequate to the majesty of the truth. In short, facts elevated into theory, theory into laws, and laws into living and intelligent powers – true idealism necessarily perfecting itself in realism, and realism refining itself into idealism.

Such or something like this was the plan I had supposed that you were engaged on.

Letter from Coleridge to Wordsworth, 30 May 1815

¹ Wordsworth and Coleridge's friendship had soured in 1810, when a mutual friend, Basil Montagu, told Coleridge of a thoughtless remark Wordsworth made about his opium addiction. Despite repeated attempts to patch things up, both men were aware of a rift that would never be properly healed. Wordsworth had published The Excursion in 1814, for which he had high hopes, as it was supposed to be part of 'The Recluse'; unfortunately, it was greeted by some of the worst reviews he would ever receive, not least Francis Jeffrey's in the Edinburgh Review (see pp. 734–40). Then, on 3 April 1815, Coleridge confided to another mutual friend, Lady Beaumont, that he thought The Excursion less good than The Prelude and that its chief fault was that having by the conjoint operation of his own experiences, feelings, and reason himself convinced himself of truths, which the generality of persons have either taken for granted from their infancy, or at least adopted in early life, he has attached all their own depth and weight to doctrines and words, which come almost as truisms or commonplaces to others. (Griggs iv 564)

Word of this got back to Wordsworth, and on 22 May he wrote to Coleridge to say that he was more 'perplexed than enlightened by your comparative censure' (MY ii 238). On reading that, Coleridge composed this reply, explaining his disappointment in detail. As with many of Coleridge's retrospective comments on 'The Recluse', the reader should approach this letter with caution. It was written over seventeen years after 'The Recluse' was formulated, and provides a plan that may be more detailed than anything ever written by Coleridge in 1798. He had been able to develop (and perhaps embroider) his ambitions for it over the years, without necessarily communicating them to Wordsworth. Furthermore, his disappointment could be coloured by the falling-out between them. Another account of 'The Recluse' may be found at pp. 732–3, below.

2 the poem...mind i.e. The Prelude.

3 ground-plat plot of ground on which the edifice of The Recluse would be built.

4 themes by thee...aright Coleridge's To William Wordsworth 4; he goes on to quote ll. 10–40.

5 Hyblaean honeyed; Hybla was a Sicilian town near Syracuse known for honey and herbs.

6 For thou wert there i.e. in Revolutionary France, 1791–2.

7 a glory an effulgent light.

8 Orphic oracular; communicated by God.

9 'a certain most mystical breeze blew into me' (Aristophanes, The Frogs 313–14).

10 Lucretius, De rerum natura, philosophical poem in six Books.

11 sandy sophisms dry and specious arguments.

12 Locke...mechanic dogmatists John Locke (1632–1704), author of the Essay concerning Human Understanding (1690); other 'dogmatists' probably include Isaac Newton (1642–1727) and Francis Bacon (1561–1626).

13 Essay on Man (1732–4), a philosophical poem, part of a larger work never completed by Pope, in which he seeks to vindicate the ways of God to man and prove that the universe is the best of all possible schemes.

14 Erasmus Darwin (1731–1802), grandfather of Charles Darwin, author of The Botanic Garden (1789–91) and Zoönomia (1794–6).

15 discursive or intuitive The same distinction is mentioned by Wordsworth in Thirteen-Book Prelude xiii 113. Milton had differentiated discursive reason (belonging to man), from a higher, ‘intuitive’ reason, to which man may aspire, and which is possessed by angels (Paradise Lost v 487–90).

From Biographia Literaria (1817)

*Chapter 13 (extract)*¹

The imagination then I consider either as primary or secondary. The primary imagination I hold to be the living power and prime agent of all human perception, and as a repetition in the finite mind of the eternal act of creation in the infinite I AM. The secondary imagination I consider as an echo of the former, coexisting with the conscious will, yet still as identical with the primary in the kind of its agency, and differing only in degree, and in the mode of its operation. It dissolves, diffuses, dissipates, in order to recreate; or, where this process is rendered impossible, yet still at all events it struggles to idealize and to unify. It is essentially vital, even as all objects (as objects) are essentially fixed and dead.

Fancy, on the contrary, has no other counters to play with but fixities and definites. The fancy is indeed no other than a mode of memory emancipated from the order of time and space – while it is blended with, and modified by, that empirical phenomenon of the will which we express by the word ‘choice’. But equally with the ordinary memory the fancy must receive all its materials ready-made from the law of association.

From Biographia Literaria,

¹ The first of the extracts from Biographia consists of the famous definition of the primary and secondary imagination. Coleridge began dictating the volume in July 1815, and it was intended to be a combination of autobiography, a defence of Wordsworth against reviewers such as Jeffrey, and a treatise on philosophy and religion.

*Chapter 14 (extracts)*¹

During the first year that Mr Wordsworth and I were neighbours,² our conversations turned frequently on the two cardinal points of poetry: the power of exciting the sympathy of the reader by a faithful adherence to the truth of nature, and the power of giving the interest of novelty by the modifying colours of imagination. The sudden charm which accidents of light and shade, which moonlight or sunset diffused over a known and familiar landscape, appeared to represent the practicability of combining both. These are the poetry of nature.

The thought suggested itself (to which of us I do not recollect) that a series of poems might be composed of two sorts. In the one, the incidents and agents were to be (in part at least) supernatural – and the excellence aimed at was to consist in the interesting of the affections by the dramatic truth of such emotions as would naturally accompany such situations, supposing them real. And real in this sense they have been to every human being who, from whatever source of delusion, has at any time believed himself under supernatural agency. For the second class, subjects were to be chosen from ordinary life. The characters and incidents were to be such as will be found in every village and its vicinity, where there is a meditative and feeling mind to seek after them or to notice them when they present themselves.

In this idea originated the plan of the Lyrical Ballads, in which it was agreed that my endeavours should be directed to persons and characters supernatural, or at least romantic – yet so as to transfer, from our inward nature, a human interest and a semblance of truth sufficient to procure for these shadows of imagination that willing suspension of disbelief for the moment, which constitutes poetic faith. Mr Wordsworth, on the other hand, was to propose to himself as his object, to give the charm of novelty to things of every day, and to excite a feeling analogous to the supernatural, by awakening the mind's attention to the lethargy of custom, and directing it to the loveliness and the wonders of the world before us – an inexhaustible treasure but for which, in consequence of the film of familiarity and selfish solicitude, we have eyes yet see not, ears that hear not, and hearts that neither feel nor understand.

With this view I wrote 'The Ancient Mariner', and was preparing (among other poems) 'The Dark Ladie' and the 'Christabel', in which I should have more nearly realised my ideal than I had done in my first attempt. But Mr Wordsworth's industry had proved so much more successful, and the number of his poems so much greater, that my compositions, instead of forming a balance, appeared rather an interpolation of heterogeneous matter. Mr Wordsworth added two or three poems written in his own character, in the impassioned, lofty, and sustained diction which is characteristic of his genius. In this form the Lyrical Ballads were published, and were presented by him, as an 'experiment'³ whether subjects, which from their nature rejected the usual ornaments and extra-colloquial style of poems in general, might not be so managed in the language of ordinary life as to produce the pleasurable interest which it is the peculiar business of poetry to impart.

To the second edition he added a Preface of considerable length in which (notwithstanding some passages of apparently a contrary import) he was understood to contend for the extension of this style to poetry of all kinds, and to reject as vicious and indefensible all phrases and forms of speech that were not included in what he – unfortunately, I think, adopting an equivocal expression – called the language of real life.⁴ From this Preface, prefixed to poems in which it was impossible to deny the presence of original genius (however mistaken its direction might be deemed), arose the whole long-continued controversy.⁵ For, from the conjunction of perceived power with supposed heresy, I explain the inveteracy and (in some instances, I grieve to say) the acrimonious passions with which the controversy has been conducted by the assailants.

Had Mr Wordsworth's poems been the silly, the childish things which they were for a long time described as being; had they been really distinguished from the compositions of other poets merely by meanness of language and inanity of thought; had they indeed contained nothing more than what is found in the parodies and pretended imitations of them – they must have sunk at once, a dead weight, into the slough of oblivion, and have dragged the Preface along with them. But year after year increased the number of Mr Wordsworth's admirers. They were found, too, not in the lower classes of the reading public, but chiefly among young men of strong sensibility and meditative minds,⁶ and their admiration (inflamed perhaps in some degree by opposition) was distinguished by its intensity – I might almost say, by its religious fervour.

These facts, and the intellectual energy of the author (which was more or less consciously felt, where it was outwardly and even boisterously denied), meeting with sentiments of aversion to his opinions, and of alarm at their consequences, produced an eddy of criticism which would of itself have borne up the poems by the violence with which it whirled them round and round.

With many parts of this Preface in the sense attributed to them and which the words undoubtedly seem to authorize, I never concurred – but on the contrary objected to them as erroneous in principle, and as contradictory (in appearance at least) both to other parts of the same Preface, and to the author's own practice in the greater part of the poems themselves.⁷ Mr Wordsworth in his recent collection⁸ has, I find, degraded this prefatory disquisition to the end of his second volume, to be read or not at the reader's choice. But he has not (as far as I can discover) announced any change in his poetic creed. At all events, considering it as the source of a controversy in which I have been honoured more than I deserve by the frequent conjunction of my name with his, I think it expedient to declare once for all, in what points I coincide with the opinions supported in that Preface, and in what points I altogether differ...

'What is poetry?' is so nearly the same question with 'what is a poet?' that the answer to the one is involved in the solution of the other. For it is a distinction resulting from the poetic genius itself, which sustains and modifies the images, thoughts, and emotions of the poet's own mind. The poet, described in ideal perfection, brings the whole soul of man into activity, with the subordination of its faculties to each other, according to their relative worth and dignity. He diffuses a tone and spirit of unity that blends and (as it were) fuses each into each by that synthetic and magical power to which I would exclusively appropriate the name of imagination. This power, first put in action by the will and understanding, and retained under their irremissive, though gentle and unnoticed, control (laxis effertur habenis),⁹ reveals itself in the balance or reconciliation of opposite or discordant qualities; of sameness with difference; of the general with the concrete; the idea with the image; the individual with the representative; the sense of novelty and freshness, with old and familiar objects; a more than usual state of emotion, with more than usual order; judgement ever awake and steady self-possession, with enthusiasm and feeling profound or vehement – and, while it blends and harmonizes the natural and the artificial, still subordinates art to nature; the manner to the matter; and our admiration of the poet to our sympathy with the poetry.

Chapter 14

¹ The account given by Coleridge of the evolution of Lyrical Ballads is important, but fictionalizes in retrospect; it differs markedly from that later given by Wordsworth. The facts may be found in the Introduction to Lyrical Ballads, and Other Poems, 1797–1800 ed. James Butler and Karen Green (Ithaca, 1992), pp. 3–12.

² the first year...neighbours July 1797–July 1798, when Wordsworth was at Alfoxden and Coleridge four miles away at Nether Stowey.

³ experiment See the Advertisement to Lyrical Ballads (1798), p. 337 above. See also his remarks to Hazlitt, p. 806 below.

⁵ controversy Coleridge refers to the criticism Wordsworth received particularly from the Edinburgh Review, culminating with Jeffrey's review of The Excursion; see pp. 734–40 below.

⁶ young men...minds such as John Wilson and Thomas De Quincey, both of whom, as young men, wrote admiringly to Wordsworth of the Lyrical Ballads.

⁷ With many parts...themselves Not true; Coleridge was the mastermind behind the Preface, and its fundamental principles were drawn largely from his reading.

⁸ his recent collection Wordsworth published his first collected Poems in 1815.

From Sibylline Leaves (1817)

*Facile credo, plures esse Naturas invisibiles quam visibiles in rerum universitate. Sed harum omnium familiam quis nobis enarrabit? et gradus et cognationes et discrimina et singularum munera? Quid agunt? quae loca habitant? Harum rerum notitiam semper ambivit ingenium humanum, nunquam attigit. Juvat, interea, non diffiteor, quandoque in animo, tanquam in Tabulâ, majoris et melioris mundi imaginem contemplari: ne mens assuefacta hodierniae vitae minutiis se contrahat nimis, et tota subsidat in pusillas cogitationes. Sed veritati interea invigilandum est, modusque servandus, ut certa ab incertis, diem a nocte, distinguamus.*²

(Thomas Burnet, Archaeologiae Philosophicae [London, 1692], p. 68–9)

Part the First

It is an ancient mariner,
And he stoppeth one of three:
'By thy long grey beard and glittering eye
Now wherefore stopp'st thou me?

The bridegroom's doors are opened wide, 5
And I am next of kin;
The guests are met, the feast is set –
Mayst hear the merry din.'

He holds him with his skinny hand,
'There was a ship', quoth he; 10
'Hold off! Unhand me, grey-beard loon!'
Eftsoons his hand dropped he.

He holds him with his glittering eye –
The wedding-guest stood still,
And listens like a three years' child: 15
The mariner hath his will.

The wedding-guest sat on a stone,
He cannot choose but hear;
And thus spake on that ancient man,
The bright-eyed mariner: 20

'The ship was cheered, the harbour cleared,
Merrily did we drop
Below the kirk, below the hill,
Below the lighthouse top.

The sun came up upon the left, 25
Out of the sea came he;
And he shone bright, and on the right
Went down into the sea.

Higher and higher every day,
Till over the mast at noon –’ 30
The wedding-guest here beat his breast,
For he heard the loud bassoon.

The bride hath paced into the hall,
Red as a rose is she;
Nodding their heads before her goes 35
The merry minstrelsy.⁴

The wedding-guest he beat his breast,
Yet he cannot choose but hear;
And thus spake on that ancient man,
The bright-eyed mariner. 40

‘And now the storm-blast came, and he
Was tyrannous and strong;
He struck with his o’ertaking wings,
And chased us south along.

With sloping masts and dipping prow, 45
As who pursued with yell and blow
Still treads the shadow of his foe
And forward bends his head,
The ship drove fast, loud roared the blast,
And southward aye we fled. 50

And now there came both mist and snow,
And it grew wondrous cold:
And ice mast-high came floating by
As green as emerald.

And through the drifts⁵ the snowy clift⁶ 55
Did send a dismal sheen;

Nor shapes of men nor beasts we ken –
The ice was all between.

The ice was here, the ice was there,
The ice was all around; 60
It cracked and growled, and roared and howled
Like noises in a swound.⁷

At length did cross an albatross,
Thorough the fog it came;
As if it had been a Christian soul,⁸ 65
We hailed it in God's name.

It ate the food it ne'er had eat,
And round and round it flew:
The ice did split with a thunder-fit;
The helmsman steered us through. 70

And a good south wind sprung up behind,
The albatross did follow;
And every day, for food or play,
Came to the mariners' hollo!

In mist or cloud, on mast or shroud, 75
It perched for vespers⁹ nine,
Whiles all the night, through fogsmoke white,
Glimmered the white moonshine.'

'God save thee, ancient mariner,
From the fiends that plague thee thus! 80
Why look'st thou so?' 'With my crossbow
I shot the albatross.¹⁰

Part the Second

The sun now rose upon the right,
Out of the sea came he;
Still hid in mist, and on the left 85
Went down into the sea.

And the good south wind still blew behind,
But no sweet bird did follow,
Nor any day for food or play
Came to the mariners' hollo! 90

And I had done an hellish thing
And it would work 'em woe:
For all averred^{I1} I had killed the bird
That made the breeze to blow.
"Ah wretch!" said they, "the bird to slay 95
That made the breeze to blow!"

Nor dim nor red, like God's own head
The glorious sun uprist:
Then all averred I had killed the bird
That brought the fog and mist. 100
" 'Twas right", said they, "such birds to slay,
That bring the fog and mist."

The fair breeze blew, the white foam flew,
The furrow^{I2} streamed off free:
We were the first that ever burst 105
Into that silent sea.

Down dropped the breeze, the sails dropped down,
'Twas sad as sad could be,
And we did speak only to break
The silence of the sea. 110

All in a hot and copper sky
The bloody sun at noon
Right up above the mast did stand,
No bigger than the moon.

Day after day, day after day, 115
We stuck, nor breath nor motion,
As idle as a painted ship
Upon a painted ocean.

Water, water, everywhere,
And all the boards did shrink; 120
Water, water, everywhere,
Nor any drop to drink.

The very deeps did rot: oh Christ,
That ever this should be!
Yea, slimy things did crawl with legs 125
Upon the slimy sea.

About, about, in reel and rout
The death-fires danced at night;
The water, like a witch's oils,
Burnt green and blue and white. 130

And some in dreams assured were
Of the spirit that plagued us so;
Nine fathom deep he had followed us
From the land of mist and snow.

And every tongue, through utter drought, 135
Was withered at the root;
We could not speak, no more than if
We had been choked with soot.

Ah wel-a-day! what evil looks
Had I from old and young! 140
Instead of the cross the albatross
About my neck was hung.

Part the Third

There passed a weary time. Each throat
Was parched, and glazed each eye.
A weary time! a weary time! 145
How glazed each weary eye!
When looking westward, I beheld
A something in the sky.

At first it seemed a little speck
And then it seemed a mist; 150
It moved and moved, and took at last
A certain shape, I wist. 16

A speck, a mist, a shape, I wist!
And still it neared and neared:
And as if it dodged a water-sprite, 155
It plunged and tacked and veered.

With throat unslaked, with black lips baked,
We could nor laugh nor wail;
Through utter drought all dumb we stood! 160
I bit my arm, I sucked the blood,
And cried, "A sail! A sail!"

With throat unslaked, with black lips baked,
Agape they heard me call:
Gramercy! 17 they for joy did grin
And all at once their breath drew in 165
As they were drinking all.

“See, see!” I cried, “She tacks no more,
Hither to work us weal,¹⁸
Without a breeze, without a tide,
She steadies with upright keel.” 170

The western wave was all a-flame,
The day was well nigh done!
Almost upon the western wave
Rested the broad bright sun;
When that strange shape drove suddenly 175
Betwixt us and the sun.

And straight the sun was flecked with bars
(Heaven’s Mother send us grace!),
As if through a dungeon-grate he peered
With broad and burning face. 180

Alas! thought I, and my heart beat loud,
How fast she nears and nears!
Are those her sails that glance in the sun
Like restless gossameres?

Are those her ribs through which the sun 185
Did peer, as through a grate?
And is that woman all her crew?
Is that a Death? And are there two?
Is Death that woman’s mate?

Her lips were red, her looks were free, 190
Her locks were yellow as gold;
Her skin was as white as leprosy,
The nightmare Life-in-Death was she
Who thicks man’s blood with cold.

The naked hulk alongside came, 195
And the twain were casting dice;
“The game is done! I’ve won! I’ve won!”
Quoth she, and whistles thrice.

The sun’s rim dips, the stars rush out,
At one stride comes the dark;¹⁹ 200
With far-heard whisper, o’er the sea,
Off shot the spectre-bark.

We listened and looked sideways up!
Fear at my heart, as at a cup,
My life-blood seemed to sip! 205
The stars were dim, and thick the night,
The steersman’s face by his lamp gleamed white;
From the sails the dew did drip –
Till clomb²⁰ above the eastern bar
The horned moon, with one bright star 210
Within the nether tip.²¹

One after one, by the star-dogged moon
Too quick for groan or sigh,
Each turned his face with a ghastly pang
And cursed me with his eye. 215

Four times fifty living men
(And I heard nor sigh nor groan)
With heavy thump, a lifeless lump,
They dropped down one by one.

The souls did from their bodies fly, 220
They fled to bliss or woe!
And every soul, it passed me by
Like the whiz of my crossbow.’

Part the Fourth

'I fear thee, ancient mariner,
I fear thy skinny hand; 225
And thou art long and lank and brown
As is the ribbed sea-sand. 22

I fear thee and thy glittering eye,
And thy skinny hand so brown –'
'Fear not, fear not, thou wedding-guest, 230
This body dropped not down.

Alone, alone, all all alone,
Alone on a wide wide sea;
And never a saint took pity on
My soul in agony. 235

The many men so beautiful,
And they all dead did lie!
And a thousand thousand slimy things
Lived on – and so did I.

I looked upon the rotting sea 240
And drew my eyes away;
I looked upon the rotting deck,
And there the dead men lay.

I looked to heaven and tried to pray
But or ever a prayer had gushed, 245
A wicked whisper came and made
My heart as dry as dust.

I closed my lids and kept them close
And the balls like pulses beat;
For the sky and the sea, and the sea and the sky 250

Lay like a load on my weary eye,
And the dead were at my feet.

The cold sweat melted from their limbs,
Nor rot nor reek did they;
The look with which they looked on me 255
Had never passed away.

An orphan's curse would drag to hell
A spirit from on high;
But oh! more horrible than that
Is the curse in a dead man's eye! 260
Seven days, seven nights, I saw that curse
And yet I could not die.

The moving moon went up the sky
And nowhere did abide;
Softly she was going up 265
And a star or two beside;

Her beams bemoaned the sultry main
Like April hoar-frost spread;
But where the ship's huge shadow lay
The charmed²³ water burnt away 270
A still and awful red.

Beyond the shadow of the ship
I watched the water-snakes;
They moved in tracks of shining white,
And when they reared, the elfish light 275
Fell off in hoary flakes.

Within the shadow of the ship
I watched their rich attire:
Blue, glossy green, and velvet black,

They coiled and swam, and every track 280
Was a flash of golden fire.

Oh happy living things! no tongue
Their beauty might declare:
A spring of love gushed from my heart
And I blessed them unaware! 285
Sure my kind saint took pity on me,
And I blessed them unaware.

The self-same moment I could pray,
And from my neck so free
The albatross fell off and sank 290
Like lead into the sea.

Part the Fifth

Oh sleep, it is a gentle thing
Beloved from pole to pole!
To Mary Queen²⁴ the praise be given;
She sent the gentle sleep from heaven 295
That slid into my soul.

The silly²⁵ buckets on the deck
That had so long remained,
I dreamt that they were filled with dew
And when I awoke it rained. 300

My lips were wet, my throat was cold,
My garments all were dank;
Sure I had drunken in my dreams
And still my body drank.

I moved and could not feel my limbs, 305
I was so light, almost

I thought that I had died in sleep
And was a blessed ghost.

And soon I heard a roaring wind,
It did not come anear; 310
But with its sound it shook the sails
That were so thin and sere.26

The upper air bursts into life
And a hundred fire-flags sheen,27
To and fro they were hurried about; 315
And to and fro, and in and out
The wan stars danced between.28

And the coming wind did roar more loud,
And the sails did sigh like sedge;
And the rain poured down from one black cloud, 320
The moon was at its edge.

The thick black cloud was cleft, and still
The moon was at its side;
Like waters shot from some high crag,
The lightning fell with never a jag, 325
A river steep and wide.

The loud wind never reached the ship,
Yet now the ship moved on!
Beneath the lightning and the moon
The dead men gave a groan. 330

They groaned, they stirred, they all uprose,
Nor spake, nor moved their eyes;
It had been strange, even in a dream,
To have seen those dead men rise.

The helmsman steered, the ship moved on, 335
Yet never a breeze up-blew;
The mariners all 'gan work the ropes
Where they were wont to do;
They raised their limbs like lifeless tools –
We were a ghastly crew. 340

The body of my brother's son
Stood by me, knee to knee;
The body and I pulled at one rope
But he said nought to me.'

'I fear thee, ancient mariner!' 345
'Be calm, thou wedding-guest!
'Twas not those souls that fled in pain,
Which to their corpses came again,
But a troop of spirits blessed;

For when it dawned, they dropped their arms 350
And clustered round the mast;
Sweet sounds rose slowly through their mouths
And from their bodies passed.

Around, around, flew each sweet sound
Then darted to the sun; 355
Slowly the sounds came back again,
Now mixed, now one by one.

Sometimes a-dropping from the sky
I heard the skylark sing;
Sometimes all little birds that are, 360
How they seemed to fill the sea and air
With their sweet jargoning!30

And now 'twas like all instruments,

Now like a lonely flute,
And now it is an angel's song 365
That makes the heavens be mute.

It ceased, yet still the sails made on
A pleasant noise till noon,
A noise like of a hidden brook
In the leafy month of June, 370
That to the sleeping woods all night
Singeth a quiet tune.

Till noon we quietly sailed on,
Yet never a breeze did breathe;
Slowly and smoothly went the ship, 375
Moved onward from beneath.

Under the keel nine fathom deep,
From the land of mist and snow,
The spirit slid, and it was he
That made the ship to go. 380
The sails at noon left off their tune
And the ship stood still also.

The sun right up above the mast
Had fixed her to the ocean;
But in a minute she 'gan stir 385
With a short uneasy motion –
Backwards and forwards half her length,
With a short uneasy motion.

Then like a pawing horse let go,
She made a sudden bound; 390
It flung the blood into my head,
And I fell down in a swoond.

How long in that same fit I lay,

I have not to declare;
But ere my living life returned, 395
I heard and in my soul discerned
Two voices in the air.

“Is it he?” quoth one, “Is this the man?
By him who died on cross,
With his cruel bow he laid full low 400
The harmless albatross.

The spirit who bideth by himself
In the land of mist and snow,
He loved the bird that loved the man
Who shot him with his bow.” 405

The other was a softer voice,
As soft as honey-dew;
Quoth he, “The man hath penance done
And penance more will do.” ’

Part the Sixth

FIRST VOICE
But tell me, tell me! speak again, 410
Thy soft response renewing –
What makes that ship drive on so fast?
What is the ocean doing?

SECOND VOICE
Still as a slave before his lord,
The ocean hath no blast; 415
His great bright eye most silently
Up to the moon is cast –

If he may know which way to go,
For she guides him smooth or grim.

See, brother, see – how graciously 420
She looketh down on him!

FIRST VOICE

But why drives on that ship so fast
Without or wave or wind?

SECOND VOICE

The air is cut away before
And closes from behind. 425

Fly, brother, fly! more high, more high,
Or we shall be belated;
For slow and slow that ship will go
When the mariner's trance is abated.

'I woke, and we were sailing on 430
As in a gentle weather;
'Twas night, calm night, the moon was high –
The dead men stood together.

All stood together on the deck,
For a charnel-dungeon³¹ fitter; 435
All fixed on me their stony eyes
That in the moon did glitter.

The pang, the curse, with which they died
Had never passed away;
I could not draw my eyes from theirs 440
Nor turn them up to pray.

And now this spell was snapped; once more
I viewed the ocean green,
And looked far forth, yet little saw
Of what had else been seen – 445

Like one that on a lonesome road
Doth walk in fear and dread,
And having once turned round walks on
And turns no more his head,
Because he knows a frightful fiend 450
Doth close behind him tread.

But soon there breathed a wind on me,
Nor sound nor motion made;
Its path was not upon the sea,
In ripple or in shade. 455

It raised my hair, it fanned my cheek,
Like a meadow-gale of spring –
It mingled strangely with my fears,
Yet it felt like a welcoming.
460

Swiftly, swiftly flew the ship, 625

Yet she sailed softly too;
Sweetly, sweetly blew the breeze –
On me alone it blew.

Oh dream of joy! Is this indeed
The lighthouse top I see? 465
Is this the hill? Is this the kirk?
Is this mine own countree?

We drifted o'er the harbour-bar, 32
And I with sobs did pray,
“Oh let me be awake, my God! 470
Or let me sleep alway!”

The harbour-bay was clear as glass,

So smoothly it was strewn!³³
And on the bay the moonlight lay
And the shadow of the moon. 475

The rock shone bright, the kirk no less
That stands above the rock;
The moonlight steeped in silentness
The steady weathercock.

And the bay was white with silent light, 480
Till rising from the same,
Full many shapes that shadows were
In crimson colours came.

A little distance from the prow
Those crimson shadows were; 485
I turned my eyes upon the deck –
Oh Christ! What saw I there!

Each corse lay flat, lifeless and flat,
And by the holy rood,³⁴
A man all light, a seraph-man³⁵ 490
On every corse there stood.
This seraph-band, each waved his hand –
It was a heavenly sight!

They stood as signals to the land,
Each one a lovely light; 495
This seraph-band, each waved his hand,
No voice did they impart –
No voice, but oh! the silence sank
Like music on my heart.

But soon I heard the dash of oars, 500
I heard the pilot's cheer;

My head was turned perforce away
And I saw a boat appear.

The pilot and the pilot's boy,
I heard them coming fast – 505
Dear Lord in heaven! it was a joy
The dead men could not blast.

I saw a third, I heard his voice –
It is the hermit good!
He singeth loud his godly hymns 510
That he makes in the wood.
He'll shrieve my soul, he'll wash away
The albatross's blood.

Part the Seventh

This hermit good lives in that wood
Which slopes down to the sea; 515
How loudly his sweet voice he rears!
He loves to talk with mariners
That come from a far countree.

He kneels at morn, and noon and eve,
He hath a cushion plump; 520
It is the moss that wholly hides
The rotted old oak-stump.

The skiff-boat neared, I heard them talk:
“Why, this is strange, I trow!
Where are those lights so many and fair, 525
That signal made but now?”

“Strange, by my faith!” the hermit said,
“And they answered not our cheer!
The planks look warped, and see those sails,

How thin they are and sere! 530
I never saw aught like to them
Unless perchance it were

The skeletons of leaves that lag
My forest brook along,
When the ivy-tod³⁶ is heavy with snow 535
And the owlet whoops to the wolf below
That eats the she-wolf's young."

"Dear Lord! it hath a fiendish look",
The pilot made reply,
"I am a-feared." "Push on, push on!" 540
Said the hermit cheerily.
The boat came closer to the ship
But I nor spake nor stirred;
The boat came close beneath the ship
And straight a sound was heard! 545
The ship suddenly sinketh.

Under the water it rumbled on,
Still louder and more dread;
It reached the ship, it split the bay –
The ship went down like lead.
The ancient mariner is saved in the pilot's boat.

Stunned by that loud and dreadful sound 550
Which sky and ocean smote,
Like one that hath been seven days drowned,
My body lay afloat;
But swift as dreams, myself I found
Within the pilot's boat. 555

Upon the whirl where sank the ship
The boat spun round and round,

And all was still, save that the hill
Was telling of the sound.

I moved my lips – the pilot shrieked 560
And fell down in a fit;
The holy hermit raised his eyes
And prayed where he did sit.

I took the oars; the pilot's boy,
Who now doth crazy go, 565
Laughed loud and long, and all the while
His eyes went to and fro:
“Ha! ha!” quoth he, “full plain I see
The Devil knows how to row.”

And now all in my own countrée 570
I stood on the firm land!
The hermit stepped forth from the boat,
And scarcely he could stand.

“Oh shrieve me, shrieve me, holy man!”
The hermit crossed his brow. 575
“Say quick”, quoth he, “I bid thee say
What manner of man art thou?”

Forthwith this frame of mine was wrenched
With a woeful agony,
Which forced me to begin my tale – 580
And then it left me free.

Since then, at an uncertain hour,
That agony returns,
And till my ghastly tale is told,
This heart within me burns. 585

I pass, like night, from land to land,

I have strange power of speech;
The moment that his face I see,
I know the man that must hear me –
To him my tale I teach. 590

What loud uproar bursts from that door!
The wedding-guests are there;
But in the garden bower the bride
And bridesmaids singing are;
And hark, the little vesper-bell³⁷ 595
Which biddeth me to prayer.

Oh wedding-guest! this soul hath been
Alone on a wide wide sea;
So lonely 'twas, that God himself
Scarce seemed there to be. 600

Oh sweeter than the marriage-feast,
'Tis sweeter far to me
To walk together to the kirk
With a goodly company!

To walk together to the kirk 605
And all together pray,
While each to his great Father bends,
Old men, and babes, and loving friends,
And youths and maidens gay.

Farewell, farewell! but this I tell 610
To thee, thou wedding-guest!
He prayeth well who loveth well
Both man and bird and beast.

He prayeth best who loveth best
All things both great and small, 615

For the dear God who loveth us,
He made and loveth all.’

The mariner, whose eye is bright,
Whose beard with age is hoar,
Is gone; and now the wedding-guest 620
Turned from the bridegroom’s door.

He went like one that hath been stunned
And is of sense forlorn:
A sadder and a wiser man
He rose the morrow morn.

The Rime of the Ancient Mariner. In seven parts

¹ This was the fifth published text of The Ancient Mariner, and the first in which Coleridge was identified as the author. It is radically different from previous texts in containing the Latin epigraph, marginal glosses, and numerous revisions to the poem itself. The earliest, 1798 version of the poem is presented in this volume with the other Lyrical Ballads at p. 339.

² This adaptation from Burnet may be translated: ‘I can easily believe that there are more invisible than visible beings in the universe. But who will describe to us their families, ranks, affinities, differences, and functions? What do they do? Where do they live? The human mind has always sought knowledge of these things, but has never attained it. I admit that it is good sometimes to contemplate in thought, as in a picture, the image of a greater and better world; otherwise the mind, used to the minor concerns of daily life, may contract itself too much, and concentrate entirely on trivia. But meanwhile we must be vigilant for truth and moderation, that we may distinguish certainty from doubt, day from night.’ Coleridge entered Burnet’s remarks in his notebook, 1801 or 1802; see Notebooks i 1000H and n.

An ancient mariner meeteth three gallants bidden to a wedding-feast, and detaineth one.

The wedding-guest is spellbound by the eye of the old seafaring man, and constrained to hear his tale.

The mariner tells how the ship sailed southward with a good wind and fair weather till it reached the line.³

The wedding-guest heareth the bridal music, but the mariner continueth his tale.

³ line equator.

⁴ before her...minstrelsy cf. Chaucer, Squire's Tale 268: 'To forn hym gooth the louds mynstralcy'e'.

The ship drawn by a storm toward the south pole.

The land of ice, and of fearful sounds where no living thing was to be seen.

Till a great sea-bird, called the albatross, came through the snow-fog, and was received with great joy and hospitality.

And lo! the albatross proveth a bird of good omen, and followeth the ship as it returned northward through fog and floating ice.

⁵ drifts floating ice.

⁶ clift cleft.

⁷ swound swoon.

⁸ a Christian soul i.e. a human being.

The ancient mariner inhospitably killeth the pious bird of good omen.

His shipmates cry out against the ancient mariner, for killing the bird of good luck.

But when the fog cleared off, they justify the same – and thus make themselves accomplices in the crime.

The fair breeze continues; the ship enters the Pacific Ocean and sails northward, even till it reaches the line.

The ship hath been suddenly becalmed.

9 vespers evenings.

10 The central event of the poem was suggested by a travel book which Wordsworth read, Shelvocke's Voyage Round the World (1726); see p. 341 n. 13.

11 averred maintained that.

12 'In the former edition the line was "The furrow followed free". But I had not been long on board a ship before I perceived that this was the image as seen by a spectator from the shore, or from another vessel. From the ship itself the wake appears like a brook flowing off from the stern' (Coleridge's note).

And the albatross begins to be avenged.

A spirit had followed them; one of the invisible inhabitants of this planet, neither departed souls nor angels; concerning whom the learned Jew, Josephus,13 and the Platonic Constantinopolitan,14 Michael Psellus,15 may be consulted. They are very numerous, and there is no climate or element without one or more.

The shipmates in their sore distress would fain throw the whole guilt on the ancient mariner: in sign whereof they hang the dead sea-bird round his neck.

13 Flavius Josephus (c.37–c.100), author of Antiquitates Judaicae and, more famously, De bello Judaico, which Coleridge read in November 1800 (Notebooks i 851).

14 Platonic Constantinopolitan Neoplatonic philosopher from Constantinople (see next note).

15 Michael Constantine Psellus (c.1018–c.1078), whose commentary to the Chaldaean Oracles, as John Livingston Lowes has pointed out, informed both this poem and Kubla Khan; see Lowes, The Road to Xanadu (1978), pp. 216–17.

The ancient mariner beholdeth a sign in the element afar off.
At its nearer approach, it seemeth him to be a ship; and at a dear ransom he freeth his speech from the bonds of thirst.
A flash of joy.
And horror follows. For can it be a ship that comes onward without wind or tide?
It seemeth him but the skeleton of a ship.

16 wist was aware of.

17 Gramercy! mercy on us!

18 weal harm.

And its ribs are seen as bars on the face of the setting sun.
The spectre-woman and her death-mate, and no other on board the skeleton-ship.
Like vessel, like crew!
Death and Life-in-Death have diced for the ship's crew, and she (the latter) winneth the ancient mariner.
At the rising of the moon,
One after another,
His shipmates drop down dead;

19 The sun's rim...dark Coleridge added a marginal gloss in MS in copies of Sibylline Leaves to explain: 'Between the tropics there is no twilight. As the sun's last segment dips down, and the evening gun is fired, the constellations appear arrayed.' Subsequent printed texts included the terser gloss: 'No twilight within the courts of the sun.'

20 clomb climbed.

21 with one bright star...tip In one copy of Sibylline Leaves, Coleridge noted: 'It is a common superstition among sailors "that something evil is about to happen whenever a star dogs the moon.” ’

But Life-in-Death begins her work on the ancient mariner.
The wedding-guest feareth that a spirit is talking to him;
But the ancient mariner assureth him of his bodily life, and proceedeth to relate his horrible penance.
He despiseth the creatures of the calm,
And envieth that they should live, and so many lie dead.
But the curse liveth for him in the eye of the dead men.

22 ‘For the last two lines of this stanza I am indebted to Mr Wordsworth. It was on a delightful walk from Nether Stowey to Dulverton, with him and his sister, in the autumn of 1797, that this poem was planned and in part composed’ (Coleridge’s note). For Wordsworth’s comment on this note, see p. 596.

In his loneliness and fixedness, he yearneth towards the journeying moon, and the stars that still sojourn, yet still move onward; and everywhere the blue sky belongs to them, and is their appointed rest, and their native country, and their own natural homes, which they enter unannounced, as lords that are certainly expected, and yet there is a silent joy at their arrival.

By the light of the moon he beholdeth God’s creatures of the great calm.
Their beauty and their happiness.
He blesseth them in his heart.
The spell begins to break.

23 charmed dead calm.

24 Mary Queen the Virgin Mary.

By grace of the holy Mother, the ancient mariner is refreshed with rain.
He heareth sounds, and seeth strange sights and commotions in the sky and the element.

The bodies of the ship’s crew are inspirited,29 and the ship moves on;

25 silly plain, rustic, homely.

26 sere worn.

27 sheen shining.

28 The upper air...between the aurora borealis.

29 inspirited quickened, animated.

But not by the souls of the men, nor by dæmons of earth or the middle air, but by a blessed troop of angelic spirits, sent down by the invocation of the guardian saint.

30 jargoning birdsong.

The lonesome spirit from the South Pole carries on the ship as far as the line, in obedience to the angelic troop, but still requireth vengeance.

The Polar Spirit's fellow dæmons, the invisible inhabitants of the element, take part in his wrong; and two of them relate, one to the other, that penance long and heavy for the ancient mariner hath been accorded to the Polar Spirit, who returneth southward.

The mariner hath been cast into a trance; for the angelic power causeth the vessel to drive northward, faster than human life could endure.

The supernatural motion is retarded; the mariner awakes, and his penance begins anew.

The curse is finally expiated.

31 charnel-dungeon dungeon containing dead prisoners' bodies.

And the ancient mariner beholdeth his native country.

The angelic spirits leave the dead bodies,

And appear in their own forms of light.

32 bar bank of silt across the mouth of the harbour.

33 strewn levelled.

34 rood cross.

35 seraph-man The seraphim were the highest order of angels, whose purpose was to glow with the love of God.

The hermit of the wood
Approacheth the ship with wonder.
The ship suddenly sinketh.
The ancient mariner is saved in the pilot's boat.

36 ivy-tod ivy-bush.

The ancient mariner earnestly entreateth the hermit to shrieve him; and the penance of life falls on him.
And ever and anon throughout his future life an agony constraineth him to travel from land to land,
And to teach by his own example love and reverence to all things that God made and loveth.

37 vesper-bell bell used to summon the congregation for vespers, evensong.

Constancy to an Ideal Object (composed possibly in 1804; certainly by June 1825)¹

From Poetical Works (1829)

Since all that beat about in Nature's range
Or² veer or vanish, why should'st thou remain
The only constant in a world of change,
Oh yearning thought, that liv'st but in the brain?
Call to the Hours that in the distance play, 5
The fairy people of the future day –
Fond thought! not one of all that shining swarm
Will breathe on thee with life-enkindling breath,
Till when, like strangers shelt'ring from a storm,

Hope and Despair meet in the porch of Death! 10
Yet still thou haunt'st me; and though well I see,
She is not thou, and only thou art she,
Still, still as though some dear embodied Good,
Some living Love before my eyes there stood
With answering look a ready ear to lend, 15
I mourn to thee and say, 'Ah, loveliest friend!
That this the meed of all my toils might be,
To have a home, an English home, and thee!'
Vain repetition! Home and Thou are one.
The peacefull'st cot, the moon shall shine upon, 20
Lulled by the thrush and wakened by the lark,
Without thee were but a becalmed bark³
Whose helmsman on an ocean waste and wide
Sits mute and pale his mouldering helm beside.

And art thou nothing? Such thou art, as when 25
The woodman winding westward up the glen
At wintry dawn, where o'er the sheep-track's maze
The viewless⁴ snow-mist weaves a glist'ning haze,
Sees full before him, gliding without tread,
An image⁵ with a glory⁶ round its head; 30
The enamoured rustic worships its fair hues,
Nor knows he makes the shadow he pursues!⁷

Constancy to an Ideal Object

¹ The notion of an 'ideal object' is an impossibility, as Coleridge believed objects could exist only by their being perceived by other objects. As he writes in Biographia Literaria chapter 12, Thesis 5: 'Each thing is what it is in consequence of some other thing. An infinite, independent thing, is no less a contradiction, than an infinite circle or sideless triangle.'

2 Or Either.

3 bark boat.

4 viewless invisible.

5 ‘This phenomenon, which the author has himself experienced, and of which the reader may find a description in one of the earlier volumes of the Manchester Philosophical Transactions, is applied figuratively in the following passage of the Aids to Reflection: Pindar’s fine remark respecting the different effects of music on different characters holds equally true of genius: as many as are not delighted by it are disturbed, perplexed, irritated. The beholder either recognizes it as a projected form of his own being, that moves before him with a Glory round its head, or recoils from it as a spectre. (Aids to Reflection, 1825)’ (Coleridge’s note).

6 glory corona of light; halo.

7 Coleridge was fascinated by the illusion whereby people in the mountains with the sun behind them cast magnified images of themselves onto cloudscape beyond – a natural phenomenon he had come across in Germany in 1799, known as the Brocken Spectre (see Notebooks i 430).

From Table Talk (edited from MS)

[On ‘The Ancient Mariner’] (dictated 31 May 1830)

The fault of ‘The Ancient Mariner’ consists in making the moral sentiment too apparent and bringing it in too much as a principle or cause in a work of such pure imagination.

[The True Way for a Poet] (dictated 19 September 1830)

Southey picked nature's pockets as a poet, instead of borrowing from her. He went out and took some particular image, for example a water-insect – and then exactly copied its make, colours and motions. This he put in a poem. The true way for a poet is to examine nature, but write from your recollection, and trust more to your imagination than your memory.

[On 'The Recluse']¹ (dictated 21 July 1832)

Wordsworth should have first published his Thirteen Books on the growth of an individual mind,² far superior to any part of The Excursion. Then the plan suggested and laid out by me was that he should assume the station of a man in repose, whose mind was made up, and so prepared to deliver upon authority a system of philosophy. He was to treat man as man – a subject of eye, ear, touch, taste, in contact with external nature, informing the senses from the mind and not compounding a mind out of the senses; then the pastoral and other states, assuming a satiric or Juvenalian spirit as he approached the high civilization of cities and towns; and then opening a melancholy picture of the present state of degeneracy and vice; thence revealing the necessity for and proof of the whole state of man and society being subject to and illustrative of a redemptive process in operation, showing how this idea reconciled all the anomalies, and how it promised future glory and restoration. Something of this sort I suggested, and it was agreed on. It is what in substance I have been all my life doing in my system of philosophy.

Wordsworth spoilt many of his best poems by abandoning the contemplative position, which is alone fitted for him, and introducing the object in a dramatic way. This is seen in 'The Leech-Gatherer'³ and 'Ruth'. Wordsworth had more materials for the great philosophic poet than any man I ever knew or (as I think) has existed in this country for a long time – but he was utterly unfitted for the epic or narrative style. His mental-internal action is always so excessively disproportionate to the actual business that the latter either goes to sleep or becomes ridiculous.⁴ In his reasoning you will find no progression: it eddies, it comes round and round again, perhaps with a wider circle, but it is repetition still.

On ‘The Recluse’

¹ This account of ‘The Recluse’ should be regarded as a supplement to Coleridge’s longer and more detailed account of the poem in his letter to Wordsworth of May 1815; see pp. 709–11. As with that document, it should be approached with caution. ‘The Recluse’ was conceived in 1797–8, and may not have been thought out in quite the way Coleridge suggested over three decades later. For suggestions as to ‘The Recluse’ at the time of its conception, see pp. 422–3.

² The Thirteen-Book Prelude; for Coleridge’s immediate reaction to it, see To William Wordsworth, pp. 706–8.

³ i.e. ‘Resolution and Independence’.

⁴ Coleridge here echoes the point made by Jeffrey in his review of The Excursion, when he notes that its incidents are ‘few and trifling’; p. 739 below.

[Keats]¹ (dictated 11 August 1832)

A loose, not well-dressed youth, met Mr Green and me in Mansfield Lane.² Green knew him and spoke. It was Keats. He was introduced to me, and stayed a minute or so.³ After he had gone a little, he came back and said, ‘Let me carry away the memory, Coleridge, of having pressed your hand.’ There is death in his hand, said I to Green when he was gone. Yet this was before the consumption showed itself.⁴

Keats

¹ Keats's account of this meeting may be found on pp. 1388–9; it took place probably on 11 April 1819. Joseph Henry Green (1791–1863) performed a number of services for Coleridge, including that of amanuensis, confidant, friend and literary executor. Like Keats, he had grown up close to the Swan and Hoop in Moorgate, and was one of Keats's lecturers in anatomy at Guy's Hospital.

² Mansfield Lane ran adjacent to Kenwood House on Hampstead Heath.

³ stayed a minute or so Their respective accounts of the meeting differ most at this point, where according to Keats Coleridge embarked on a lengthy discourse covering a vast range of subjects during which time they walked two miles. It led Keats to regard Coleridge less as a man of imagination than as a 'consequitive reasoner'.

⁴ Keats knew he was fatally infected with tuberculosis by early February 1820.

Francis, Lord Jeffrey (1773–1850)

‘The severest of critics’, Hazlitt remarked of his friend, Francis Jeffrey, ‘is the best-natured of men’ (Wu vii 198). Jeffrey was a lawyer (and later a judge), but is best remembered as one of the founders of the Edinburgh Review, one of the most influential journals of the period. Having attended Glasgow, Edinburgh and Oxford Universities, he preferred the rigorous education he received in his native Scotland. By the time he was admitted to the bar in 1794 he had become a Whig, much to his father’s dismay. His politics would do him no favours: as the Scottish legal system was dominated by Tories, advancement came slowly.

Jeffrey found solace among other intellectuals such as Henry Brougham, Francis Horner and Sydney Smith, who regularly met at his flat in Buccleuch Place. It was Smith who proposed that they establish a periodical to be called the Edinburgh Review, the first number of which appeared in October 1802. Jeffrey, who assumed the role of editor, was doubtful of success – but he turned out to be wrong. The initial printing of 750 copies did not meet demand, and a second printing was called for within the month. By the end of 1803, 2,150 copies of the first issue had been sold in Edinburgh alone, many passing through several hands. Printings of subsequent numbers were expanded, and Longman acquired publication rights in London. By 1809, 9,000 copies were being sold each quarter. Wordsworth had good reason to be irked by the bad reviews of his work that regularly appeared there: they were eagerly devoured by a large readership on both sides of the border.

Despite his reputation for severity, Jeffrey wrote appreciatively of Crabbe, Scott, Byron and, surprisingly, Keats. But he bore a grudge against Wordsworth, Coleridge and Southey, whom he lumped together as the ‘Lake School’, despite their differences as writers. He held them collectively responsible for the Preface to Lyrical Ballads, which he interpreted as an attack on Pope and his imitators. Contrary to what he claims in the review of The Excursion, this made him consistently and unstintingly hostile to Wordsworth: Lyrical Ballads suffered from ‘vulgarity, affectation and silliness’, while the Poems, in Two Volumes (1807) were ‘very flat, feeble, and affected’. And even after delivering a damning review of The Excursion he was not finished with him. The following year he wrote a lengthy essay on The White Doe of Rylstone (1815) which begins:

This, we think, has the merit of being the very worst poem we ever saw imprinted in a quarto volume; and though it was scarcely to be expected, we confess that Mr Wordsworth, with all his ambition, should so soon have attained to that distinction, the wonder may perhaps be diminished when we state that it seems to us to consist of a happy union of all the faults, without any of the beauties, which belong to his school of poetry. It is just such a work, in short, as some wicked enemy of that school might be supposed to have devised, on purpose to make it ridiculous.

As he saw it, Wordsworth was enslaved to a misguided system which it was his duty to condemn lest others be tempted to follow in his path. That system (which consisted, in Jeffrey’s view, of the wrong-headed notions expounded in the Preface to Lyrical Ballads), combined with years of seclusion in the countryside, had made Wordsworth pompous, vain and self-regarding. Jeffrey was wrong, but his review of The Excursion is an important reminder of how shockingly new Wordsworth's poetry seemed even in the second decade of the nineteenth century. The idea of placing peasant folk, country vicars and village children at the centre of poems meant to be read by sophisticated metropolitan readers seemed to many an absurdity, to the point at which Wordsworth was seen as the deserving target of ridicule that set the tone for criticism of his work for decades. One of the least likeable aspects of Jeffrey was his disingenuousness. He claims to regard Wordsworth as 'great' and in later years told Henry Crabb Robinson, 'I was always among Wordsworth's admirers.' 'You had an odd way of showing it', Robinson answered, with some justice (Morley ii 838).

Jeffrey's most notorious attack remains that on The Excursion, which debunks it and its author on the grounds of: (1) a perverse plainness of diction; (2) lowly subject matter; (3) bogus metaphysics. The portrayal of Wordsworth as a self-obsessed, incomprehensible mystic stuck, and was repeated by generations of wags, beginning most famously with Byron in the dedication to Don Juan (see p. 934). In private, Wordsworth remarked that he held Jeffrey's remarks 'in entire contempt, and therefore shall not pollute my fingers with the touch of it' (MY ii 190). All the same, he was aware of its effects, and even if, as he claimed, he did not read it, he probably heard about its contents from others.

Unlike Scott, Jeffrey was always more dependent on his legal career than on his writing for a living. After the Whigs came to power in 1830, he gained the advancement for which he had waited. In 1832 he was elected to Parliament, and two years later was made a judge and became Lord Jeffrey. He was a friend of Carlyle and Dickens. Posterity has granted him a variable press, thanks to his merciless, and not always fair, criticisms of Wordsworth. All the same, Hazlitt, who knew him as a friend, described him as 'a Scotchman without one particle of hypocrisy, of cant, of servility, or selfishness' (Wu vii 198).

Review of William Wordsworth, 'The Excursion'¹ (extracts)

From Edinburgh Review (November 1814)

This will never do. It bears, no doubt, the stamp of the author's heart and fancy – but unfortunately not half so visibly as that of his peculiar system. His former poems were intended to recommend that system, and to bespeak favour for it by their individual merit, but this, we suspect, must be recommended by the system, and can only expect to succeed where it has been previously established. It is longer, weaker, and tamer, than any of Mr Wordsworth's other productions, with less boldness of originality, and less even of that extreme simplicity and lowliness of tone which wavered so prettily, in the Lyrical Ballads, between silliness and pathos. We have imitations of Cowper and even of Milton here, engrafted on the natural drawl of the Lakers – and all diluted into harmony by that profuse and irrepressible wordiness which deluges all the blank verse of this school of poetry, and lubricates and weakens the whole structure of their style.

Though it fairly fills four hundred and twenty good quarto pages,² without note, vignette, or any sort of extraneous assistance, it is stated in the title (with something of an imprudent candour) to be but 'a portion' of a larger work,³ and in the preface – where an attempt is rather unsuccessfully made to explain the whole design – it is still more rashly disclosed that it is but 'a part of the second part of a long and laborious work'⁴ which is to consist of three parts!

What Mr Wordsworth's ideas of length are, we have no means of accurately judging, but we cannot help suspecting that they are liberal to a degree that will alarm the weakness of most modern readers. As far as we can gather from the preface, the entire poem – or one of them (for we really are not sure whether there is to be one or two) – is of a biographical nature, and is to contain the history of the author's mind and of the origin and progress of his poetical powers up to the period when they were sufficiently matured to qualify him for the great work on which he has been so long employed. Now the quarto before us contains an account of one of his youthful rambles in the vales of Cumberland, and occupies precisely the period of three days; so that, by the use of a very powerful calculus,⁵ some estimate may be formed of the probable extent of the entire biography.

This small specimen, however, and the statements with which it is prefaced, have been sufficient to set our minds at rest in one particular. The case of Mr Wordsworth, we perceive, is now manifestly hopeless, and we give him up as altogether incurable, and beyond the power of criticism. We cannot indeed altogether omit taking precautions now and then against the spreading of the malady – but for himself, though we shall watch the progress of his symptoms as a matter of professional curiosity and instruction, we really think it right not to harass him any longer with nauseous remedies, but rather to throw in cordials and lenitives, and wait in patience for the natural termination of the disorder. In order to justify this desertion of our patient, however, it is proper to state why we despair of the success of a more active practice.

A man who has been for twenty years at work on such matter as is now before us, and who comes complacently forward with a whole quarto of it after all the admonitions he has received, cannot reasonably be expected to ‘change his hand, or check his pride’, upon the suggestion of far weightier monitors⁶ than we can pretend to be. Inveterate habit must now have given a kind of sanctity to the errors of early taste; and the very powers of which we lament the perversion, have probably become incapable of any other application. The very quantity, too, that he has written, and is at this moment working up for publication upon the old pattern, makes it almost hopeless to look for any change of it. All this is so much capital already sunk in the concern, which must be sacrificed if it be abandoned:⁷ and no man likes to give up for lost the time and talent and labour which he has embodied in any permanent production. We were not previously aware of these obstacles to Mr Wordsworth’s conversion; and, considering the peculiarities of his former writings merely as the result of certain wanton and capricious experiments on public taste and indulgence,⁸ conceived it to be our duty to discourage their repetition by all the means in our power. We now see clearly, however, how the case stands – and making up our minds, though with the most sincere pain and reluctance, to consider him as finally lost to the good cause of poetry, shall endeavour to be thankful for the occasional gleams of tenderness and beauty which the natural force of his imagination and affections must still shed over all his productions, and to which we shall ever turn with delight, in spite of the affectation and mysticism and prolixity with which they are so abundantly contrasted.

Long habits of seclusion, and an excessive ambition of originality, can alone account for the disproportion which seems to exist between this author's taste and his genius; or for the devotion with which he has sacrificed so many precious gifts at the shrine of those paltry idols which he has set up for himself among his lakes and mountains. Solitary musings, amidst such scenes, might no doubt be expected to nurse up⁹ the mind to the majesty of poetical conception (though it is remarkable that all the greater poets lived, or had lived, in the full current of society) – but the collision of equal minds, the admonition of prevailing impressions, seems necessary to reduce its redundancies, and repress that tendency to extravagance or puerility, into which the self-indulgence and self-admiration of genius is so apt to be betrayed when it is allowed to wanton, without awe or restraint, in the triumph and delight of its own intoxication. That its flights should be graceful and glorious in the eyes of men, it seems almost to be necessary that they should be made in the consciousness that men's eyes¹⁰ are to behold them, – and that the inward transport and vigour by which they are inspired, should be tempered by an occasional reference to what will be thought of them by those ultimate dispensers of glory. An habitual and general knowledge of the few settled and permanent maxims which form the canon of general taste in all large and polished societies – a certain tact, which informs us at once that many things which we still love and are moved by in secret, must necessarily be despised as childish, or derided as absurd, in all such societies – though it will not stand in the place of genius, seems necessary to the success of its exertions; and though it will never enable anyone to produce the higher beauties of art, can alone secure the talent which does produce them from errors that must render it useless. Those who have most of the talent, however, commonly acquire this knowledge with the greatest facility;¹¹ – and if Mr Wordsworth, instead of confining himself almost entirely to the society of the dalesmen and cottagers, and little children, who form the subjects of this book, had condescended to mingle a little more with the people that were to read and judge of it, we cannot help thinking that its texture would have been considerably improved: at least it appears to us to be absolutely impossible that anyone who had lived or mixed familiarly with men of literature and ordinary judgement in poetry (of course we exclude the coadjutors and disciples of his own school)¹² could ever have fallen into such gross faults, or so long mistaken them for beauties. His first essays we looked upon in a good degree as poetical paradoxes,¹³ maintained experimentally in order to display talent and court notoriety; and so maintained, with no more serious belief in their truth, than is usually generated by an ingenious and animated defence of other paradoxes. But when we find that he has been for twenty years exclusively employed upon articles of this very fabric, and that he has still enough of raw material on hand to keep him so employed for twenty years to come, we cannot refuse him the justice of believing that he is a sincere convert to his own system, and must ascribe the peculiarities of his composition, not to any transient affectation, or accidental caprice of imagination, but to a settled perversity of taste or understanding, which has been fostered, if not altogether created, by the circumstances to which we have already alluded.

The volume before us, if we were to describe it very shortly, we should characterize as a tissue of moral and devotional ravings in which innumerable changes are rung upon a few very simple and familiar ideas – but with such an accompaniment of long words, long sentences, and unwieldy phrases, and such a hubbub of strained raptures and fantastical sublimities, that it is often extremely difficult for the most skilful and attentive student to obtain a glimpse of the author's meaning, and altogether impossible for an ordinary reader to conjecture what he is about.

Moral and religious enthusiasm,¹⁴ though undoubtedly poetical emotions, are at the same time but dangerous inspirers of poetry, nothing being so apt to run into interminable dullness or mellifluous extravagance, without giving the unfortunate author the slightest intimation of his danger. His laudable zeal for the efficacy of his preachments,¹⁵ he very naturally mistakes for the ardour of poetical inspiration – and, while dealing out the high words and glowing phrases which are so readily supplied by themes of this description, can scarcely avoid believing that he is eminently original and impressive. All sorts of commonplace notions and expressions are sanctified in his eyes by the sublime ends for which they are employed, and the mystical verbiage of the Methodist pulpit is repeated till the speaker entertains no doubt that he is the elected organ of divine truth and persuasion. But if such be the common hazards of seeking inspiration from those potent fountains, it may easily be conceived what chance Mr Wordsworth had of escaping their enchantment, with his natural propensities to wordiness, and his unlucky habit of debasing pathos with vulgarity.¹⁶ The fact accordingly is that in this production he is more obscure than a Pindaric poet of the seventeenth century,¹⁷ and more verbose ‘than even himself of yore’, while the wilfulness with which he persists in choosing his examples of intellectual dignity and tenderness exclusively from the lowest ranks of society will be sufficiently apparent from the circumstance of his having thought fit to make his chief prolocutor¹⁸ in this poetical dialogue, and chief advocate of providence and virtue, an old Scotch Pedlar, retired indeed from business, but still rambling about in his former haunts, and gossiping among his old customers without his pack on his shoulders. The other persons of the drama are a retired military chaplain, who has grown half an atheist and half a misanthrope; the wife of an unprosperous weaver; a servant girl with her infant; a parish pauper, and one or two other personages of equal rank and dignity.

The character of the work is decidedly didactic, and more than nine-tenths of it are occupied with a species of dialogue, or rather a series of long sermons or harangues which pass between the Pedlar, the author, the old chaplain, and a worthy vicar who entertains the whole party at dinner on the last day of their excursion. The incidents which occur in the course of it are as few and trifling as can be imagined – and those which the different speakers narrate in the course of their discourses are introduced rather to illustrate their arguments or opinions than for any interest they are supposed to possess of their own. The doctrine which the work is intended to enforce, we are by no means certain that we have discovered. In so far as we can collect, however, it seems to be neither more nor less than the old familiar one that a firm belief in the providence of a wise and beneficent Being must be our great stay and support¹⁹ under all afflictions and perplexities upon earth, and that there are indications of his power and goodness in all the aspects of the visible universe, whether living or inanimate – every part of which should therefore be regarded with love and reverence, as exponents of those great attributes.

We can testify, at least, that these salutary and important truths are inculcated at far greater length, and with more repetitions, than in any ten volumes of sermons that we ever perused. It is also maintained, with equal conciseness and originality, that there is frequently much good sense, as well as much enjoyment, in the humbler conditions of life; and that, in spite of great vices and abuses, there is a reasonable allowance both of happiness and goodness in society at large. If there be any deeper or more recondite²⁰ doctrines in Mr Wordsworth's book, we must confess that they have escaped us – and, convinced as we are of the truth and soundness of those to which we have alluded, we cannot help thinking that they might have been better enforced with less parade and prolixity.²¹ His effusions on what may be called the physiognomy²² of external nature, or its moral and theological expression, are eminently fantastic, obscure, and affected....

[At this point Jeffrey summarizes The Excursion, followed by extracts from it, interspersed with his own critical commentary, before concluding the review as follows.]

Nobody can be more disposed to do justice to the great powers of Mr Wordsworth than we are, and, from the first time that he came before us, down to the present moment, we have uniformly testified in their favour, and assigned indeed our high sense of their value as the chief ground of the bitterness with which we resented their perversion.²³ That perversion, however, is now far more visible than their original dignity; and while we collect the fragments, it is impossible not to mourn over the ruins from which we are condemned to pick them. If anyone should doubt of the existence of such a perversion, or be disposed to dispute about the instances we have hastily brought forward, we would just beg leave to refer him to the general plan and character of the poem now before us.

Why should Mr Wordsworth have made his hero a superannuated Pedlar? What but the most wretched affectation, or provoking perversity of taste, could induce anyone to place his chosen advocate of wisdom and virtue in so absurd and fantastic²⁴ a condition? Did Mr Wordsworth really imagine that his favourite doctrines were likely to gain anything in point of effect or authority by being put into the mouth of a person accustomed to higgie about tape, or brass sleeve-buttons? Or is it not plain that, independent of the ridicule and disgust which such a personification²⁵ must excite in many of his readers, its adoption exposes his work throughout to the charge of revolting incongruity, and utter disregard of probability or nature? For, after he has thus wilfully debased his moral teacher by a low occupation, is there one word that he puts into his mouth, or one sentiment of which he makes him the organ, that has the most remote reference to that occupation? Is there anything in his learned, abstract, and logical harangues, that savours of the calling that is ascribed to him? Are any of their materials, the diction, the sentiments, in any, the very smallest degree, accommodated to a person in that condition? Or are they not eminently and conspicuously such as could not by possibility belong to it? A man who went about selling flannel and pocket-handkerchiefs in this lofty diction, would soon frighten away all his customers; and would infallibly pass either for a madman, or for some learned and affected gentleman, who, in a frolic,²⁶ had taken up a character which he was peculiarly ill-qualified for supporting.²⁷

The absurdity in this case, we think, is palpable and glaring: but it is exactly of the same nature with that which infects the whole substance of the work – a puerile ambition of singularity²⁸ engrafted on an unlucky predilection for truisms;²⁹ and an affected passion for simplicity and humble life, most awkwardly combined with a taste for mystical refinements, and all the gorgeousness of obscure phraseology. His taste for simplicity is evinced by sprinkling up and down his interminable declamations a few descriptions of baby-houses,³⁰ and of old hats with wet brims;³¹ and his amiable partiality for humble life, by assuring us that a wordy rhetorician, who talks about Thebes,³² and allegorizes all the heathen mythology, was once a pedlar – and making him break in upon his magnificent orations with two or three awkward notices of something that he had seen when selling winter raiment about the country – or of the changes in the state of society, which had almost annihilated his former calling.

Review of William Wordsworth, ‘The Excursion’

1 Wordsworth published The Excursion in 1814 as part of his great, never-to-be-completed epic, The Recluse. What Jeffrey could not have known was that it had its roots in the annus mirabilis of 1797–8 when Wordsworth had composed ‘The Ruined Cottage’, ‘The Pedlar’ and ‘Not Useless do I Deem’, all of which were incorporated into The Excursion in drastically revised form. Another reader, Coleridge, was also disappointed with The Excursion, but for different reasons (see pp. 709–11).

2 four hundred and twenty good quarto pages In fact, The Excursion was 447 pages long, and carries an explanatory preface of 14 pages and 20 pages of notes. The word ‘quarto’ refers to the format of the volume – a ‘quarto’ consisted of pages made from large folio-size paper folded twice (to produce four separate leaves).

3 a larger work i.e. The Recluse.

4 a long and laborious work unfortunately these were Wordsworth’s exact words, though he did not italicize ‘long’.

5 calculus calculation.

6 monitors judges.

7 which must be sacrificed if it be abandoned In fact, Wordsworth was never to complete ‘The Recluse’, of which The Excursion was part. Jeffrey’s harsh words may have contributed to Wordsworth’s inability to go on with it.

8 certain wanton and capricious experiments on public taste and indulgence Wordsworth himself, in the Advertisement to Lyrical Ballads (1798), had described them as experiments (see p. 337).

9 nurse up cultivate.

10 men's eyes There may be an echo of Shakespeare, Sonnet 29: 'When in disgrace with fortune and men's eyes'.

11 facility ease.

12 the coadjutors and disciples of his own school Coleridge and Southey.

13 paradoxes i.e. puzzles, conundrums.

14 enthusiasm fervour, rapture, perhaps even madness.

15 preachments sermonizing, obtrusive or wearisome discourse.

16 vulgarity the commonplace, banality.

17 a Pindaric poet of the seventeenth century It is not clear why such a poet should necessarily be 'obscure'; though Coleridge may be thinking of the metaphysicals.

18 prolocutor spokesman.

19 stay and support Cheekily, Jeffrey echoes Wordsworth's 'Resolution and Independence' 146.

20 recondite abstruse, profound.

21 parade and prolixity showiness and wordiness.

22 physiognomy outward form.

23 Nobody can ... perversion highly disingenuous; Jeffrey's first review of Wordsworth was of Poems, in Two Volumes (1807), where he described the contents as 'trash', and said that their author appeared 'like a bad imitator of the worst of his former productions'.

24 fantastic fanciful; perhaps also quaint, eccentric.

25 personification dramatic representation of a character; Jeffrey's language emphasizes Wordsworth's artifice.

26 frolic fit of amusement; prank.

27 Perhaps with these comments in mind, Wordsworth appended a note to the 1827 edition of The Excursion, which quoted Robert Heron's Observations Made in a Journey through the Western Counties of Scotland (1793) as follows: 'It is not more than twenty or thirty years, since a young man going from any part of Scotland to England, of purpose to carry the pack, was considered as going to lead the life, and acquire the fortune, of a gentleman.'

28 singularity originality.

29 truisms commonplace thoughts; Jeffrey's point is that Wordsworth is no philosopher.

30 baby-houses See Excursion ii 425.

31 old hats with wet brims See Excursion i 445, or Ruined Cottage 50–1 (p. 432).

32 Thebes The Pedlar (or the Wanderer, as he is called in The Excursion) mentions 'Egyptian Thebes' at Book VIII, l. 216.

Robert Southey (1774–1843)

Southey was born in Bristol, 12 August 1774. He entered Westminster School in April 1788 but was expelled in April 1792 for writing a pamphlet called The Flagellant, attacking the use of corporal punishment. By the time he went up to Balliol College, Oxford, in November 1792, he was a fervent supporter of the French Revolution. He read Godwin's Political Justice as soon as it was published in February 1793, and exclaimed enthusiastically to his friend, Grosvenor Bedford, 'I am studying such a book!'¹ Soon after, he began writing an epic poem, Joan of Arc, which aimed to denounce church and state – the apparatus of the establishment.

On 17 June 1794 he met Coleridge, whose hero-worship of him seems to have begun immediately. Together they planned a 'pantisocracy', a sort of commune on the banks of the Susquehanna River in America, and recruited fellow pantisocrats, including George Burnett and Robert Lovell (Oxford friends of Southey's; for a fuller account, see p. 612 above). In August Coleridge met the Fricker family, who instantly became involved in the project: Lovell had just married the second daughter, Mary; Southey was courting the third, Edith; and, by the middle of the month, Coleridge was engaged to the eldest, Sara. The plan was that Coleridge, Southey and Lovell, with their new wives, would emigrate to America in March 1795.² The scheme failed, partly through lack of money, partly because Southey and Coleridge fell out.

Distressed to hear that Southey was contemplating marriage, and irritated at his decision not to enter the church, his uncle, Herbert Hill, invited him to stay with him in Lisbon, Portugal, in the hope of reforming him. Southey agreed to go, but secretly married Edith before departing. As they travelled through Spain and Portugal, Southey remained impervious to his uncle's attempts to persuade him to become a clergyman. For one thing, he was too contemptuous of the Church of England and its political power to want to become part of it; for another, his vocation as a writer was close to being realized.

Written in the space of six weeks, Joan of Arc was published in 1796, followed by two volumes of Poems (1797, 1799), and Letters Written during a Short Residence in Spain and Portugal (1797). On the basis of Joan of Arc, Lamb declared, 'I expect Southey one day to rival Milton. I already deem him equal to Cowper, and superior to all living poets besides' (Marrs i 16). Wordsworth disagreed: 'You were right about Southey, he is certainly a coxcomb, and has proved it completely by the preface to his Joan of Arc, an epic poem which he has just published' (EY 169).

Southey's poetry is variable. He had facility, but his verse was produced in copious amounts, often at low intensity. Writing to John Thelwall in December 1796, Coleridge offered a clear-sighted account of Southey's creative strengths and weaknesses:

In language at once natural, perspicuous, and dignified, in manly pathos, in soothing and sonnet-like description, and above all, in character and dramatic dialogue, Southey is unrivalled; but as certainly he does not possess opulence of imagination, lofty-paced harmony, or that toil of thinking, which is necessary in order to plan a whole.... I think that an admirable poet might be made by amalgamating him and me. I think too much for a poet; he too little for a great poet. But he abjures thinking and lays the whole stress of excellence on feeling. (Griggs i 294)

This sharp assessment was made early on in Southey's career, and was borne out by what followed. Wordsworth's observation that poetry was not just the product of powerful feelings but of someone who had 'thought long and deeply' (see p. 508) was never more pertinent. Southey's poetry has many charms, but was never the fruit of the meditation everywhere to be found in Wordsworth: that is the main reason why it has fallen from favour.

That said, there was a period in 1797–9 when Southey was the closest rival to Wordsworth and Coleridge. In September 1797, Coleridge told Southey that 'Hannah' 'is to me the most affecting of all your little pieces' (Griggs i 345). It was not wholly original, influenced as it was by Cowper's 'Crazy Kate' (pp. 19–20 above), but shows Southey thinking in ways that parallel those in which Wordsworth and Coleridge were heading. Despite the Christian ending (not a feature of Wordsworth's poetry), 'Hannah' is impressive because it is based on Southey's own observation. 'I met the funeral', Southey wrote, 'and learnt the circumstances in a village in Hampshire'. We cannot know for certain whether it was an influence on 'The Ruined Cottage', but scholars speculate that it might have been.

Unfortunately 'Hannah' is untypical of Southey, and in early April 1797 Coleridge expressed the well-founded fear that he depended 'too much on story and event in his poems, to the neglect of those lofty imaginings that are peculiar to, and definitive of, the poet' (Griggs i 320). The truth of this can be revealed by a comparison of 'The Idiot' with 'The Idiot Boy', or by that of 'The Night' with 'Frost at Midnight'. These are two of many works imitative of Wordsworth and Coleridge that Southey composed in 1798; Christopher J. P. Smith has listed others.³ Unfortunately, instead of learning from them, Southey's treatment of human relationships remains rooted in the eighteenth-century cult of sensibility – trite, lurid and superficial. His friend, William Taylor of Norwich, said that he had 'an imagination excessively accustomed to summon up trains of melancholy ideas, and marshal up funeral processions; a mind too fond by half, for its own comfort, of sighs and sadness, of pathetic emotions and heart-rending woe'.⁴ For that reason, he is at his poorest when at his most ambitious; 'The Battle of Blenheim', perhaps his best and most anthologized work, succeeds because it aims to make a single political point (although the sharp-eyed will note its debt to Wordsworth's 'We are Seven' and 'Anecdote for Fathers').

Despite borrowing from Lyrical Ballads, Southey had no qualms about dismissing it in a notice he wrote for the Critical Review. 'The Idiot Boy' and 'The Thorn' were, he declared, 'bald in story' (see p. 752). He may genuinely have thought so, but it did not stop him summarizing 'The Idiot Boy' at length before quoting sixteen stanzas. Wordsworth was offended. 'Southey's review I have seen', he told their mutual friend (and publisher) Joseph Cottle:

He knew that I published those poems for money and money alone. He knew that money was of importance to me. If he could not conscientiously have spoken differently of the volume, in common delicacy he ought to have declined the task of reviewing it.

The bulk of the poems he has described as destitute of merit. Am I recompensed for this by vague praises of my talents? I care little for the praise of Southey or any other professional critic but as it may help me to pudding.⁵

In September 1803, grieved by the death of his daughter, Southey settled with the Coleridges at Greta Hall, Keswick. He spent the rest of his life there, engaged in unremitting literary activity. One cause for this was Coleridge's departure for London, which meant that Southey had two families to provide for.
